Well, Sir, we went to England, and though in England we occasionally saw what was going on in the Opposition. Oh, how frightened they were lest we should succeed, and cablegram after cablegram came to Canada informing the country, with an expression of regret, that we had miserably and wretchedly failed. They said it was an evidence of want of confidence of the people of England in the present Administration. How could any body of capitalists put any confidence or trust in a Government stained with the Pacific Railway scandal? It was said that if another Government having greater purity of character, and greater ability, and possessing in a great degree the confidence of European capitalists who had undertaken the enterprise, the result would have been There were tears, crocodile tears, perhaps, dropped upon the unhappy fate of Canada in having such an incompetent and criminal Government that could, within nine years from the original transaction, carry out a beneficial arrangement by which it was proposed to endeavor to get English capitalists to take their place and build the road. However, Sir, we did. And in the speech at Hochelaga that I hear so much about, a And in the speech that can hardly be dignified by the name of speech, I announced the fact that we had made the contract firm. I say so now. We made the contract firm. The occasion of my making that speech was upon my arrival at Hochelaga. I was presented with an address by Club Cartier, a Conservative institution, and I made that answer. I do not retract a word. I said: "As for the present I hope it will be equally true, and for the future that I may be able to look down by and bye on the Pacific Railway as completed," and I hoped it would be done with the assistance of hon, gentlemen opposite as long as we were in the Government, but the project that has been laid on the Table to-day, shows that they have abandoned all idea of ever building the Canadian Pacific Railway. By a political plot they are trying to put off the blame upon others; but notwithstanding that plot we are going to build that road, and the original treaty will be carried out. The pledge made to British Columbia, the pledges made in reference to the future of this Dominion will be carried out under the auspices of a Conservative Government, and with the support of a Conservative party. That road will be constructed, and, notwithstanding all the wiles of the Opposition and the flimsy arrangement which has been concocted, the road is going to be built and proceeded with vigorously, continuously, systematically and successfully to a completion, and the fate of Canada will then, as a Dominion, be sealed. Then will the fate of Canada, as one great body, be fixed beyond the possibility of hon gentlemen to unsettle. The emigrant from Europe will find here a happy and comfortable home in Sir John A. Macdonald.

the great West, by the exertion of the Conservative party. But then, Sir, comes the interjection. After the arrangements have been made and the Government had made a contract that hon, gentlemen opposite three or four years ago would have laughed at and bragged and boasted of as a wonderful proof of their superior administrative ability we now have the assertion that the contract was made without due authority. As long as Mordecai sits at the King's gate he will protest. We have had to take part in this discussion with gentlemen who are accomplished actors—my hon friends opposite. These hon gentlemen are perfectly trained histrionics. But, Sir, the best actor is not always successful. We have had tragedy, comedy and farce from the other side. Sir, it commenced with tragedy. The contract was declared oppressive, and the amount of money to be given was enormous. We were giving away the whole lands of the North-West. Not an acre was to be left for the free and independent foot of the free and independent settler. There was to be a monopoly handed over to this Company. We had painted the tyranny of this Company that was to over-ride the people by raising a high tariff, and the tyranny of a great monopoly which was to keep in their control a large area of lands—out of which they expect to build this railway-for some hundreds of year, in order that through the exertions of others the value of their acreage might be increased, and this was the tragedy; and hon. gentlemen opposite played it so well, that if they did not affect the whole audience, we could see tears of pity and sorrow trickling down the cheeks of gentlemen sitting on that side of the House. Then, Sir, we had the comedy. The comedy was that when every one of the speeches of these hon, gentlemen were read to them, it was proved that last year or the year before, and in previous years, they had thought one way, and that now they spoke in another way. Then it was the most amusing and comic thing in the world. Every hon. gentlemen got up and said, "I am not bound by that. It is true that I said so a year ago, or it is true that I said so two years ago, but circumstances alter cases, circumstances are changed in two years, or one year, or in eight months in one case, but what I said eight months ago I am not bound now." This was very comic. It amused us all. It amused the House, and the whole country chuckled on a broad grin. These hon, gentlemen said it is true, we were fools eight months ago, and two years ago; but, because we were fools in the past you have no right, being Ministers, to be fools too; you have no right to advocate the follies we advocated then, when now we assert acts of wisdom on our part. This was the comedy. Now, Sir. the last thing that came was the farce. We had the farce laid on the Table to-day. The tragedy and comedy were pretty successful; but the farce I am afraid, with an impartial audience, in theatrical phrase, will be damned. It is a farce, but still whether it will be farcical in its consequence, I do not know. I do not hink, for my part, that it will be farcical in its consequences, because the greatest punishment that a farce writer or a farce actor can get when he has played his farce, is that his far e is unsuccessful, and the audience hisses the act, and this will be the consequence of this charming farce. It has been played to change the metaphor, Mr. Speaker, I may say it is too thin. It won't catch the blindest. It won't catch the most credulous. It won't catch the most unsuspicious. No one of common sense, no man who can say two and two make four will be caught for one moment by this flimsy scheme, Mr. Speaker. It was concocted here. It was concocted in Ottawa. It was concocted as a political engine, the reason of it was this: Well, the present Government have committed themselves under their hand and seal, and here is the seal of the Minister of Railways, and here is the Order in Council, and here is the contract signed, sealed and delivered. The Government are pledged to it. They cannot get out of it, and we are quite safe. We can make any offer. We can make an offer to build the road for $1,000 a mile. We are quite safe. We can get all these gentlemen to sign, and I think, although I was not here at the time, that my hon. friend from Niagara showed that the incorporators and petitioners themselves, who make the offer, under this precious document, seven or six——

Mr. PLUMB. The number is seven.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Seven of them were disappointed and defeated candidates at former elections. I need not go over their names. I read the speech of my hon: friend, and I find that it is a political plot. I would ask my hon. friend, the member for the West Riding of Durham, if John Walker is not a rather remarkable politician. I would ask my hon. friend if H. H. Cook is not also a remarkable politician, and so on, Mr. Spéaker. It is a political plot got up here. It was quite easy, oh, so easy to make an offer knowing that the Government cannot, or ought not, or will not accept it. We made a bargain with a company in good faith, and we promised that it shall be a compact between the Dominion of Canada and them, provided that the Parliament ratifies We were bound to submit the agreement to Parliament for ratification, and there it was argued. The Op-position say to themselves: "The Government cannot in honor, cannot in decency, if their policy is defeated, remain in office, and, therefore, we will get in, and we will take care of our friends, of these seven or eight-political gentlemen and their confreres. We will make things easy for them, and so arrange it that, even if their offer was accepted by us when we go into office, we can let them out of it." I say that that document shows on its face that it was drawn up here, and for the purpose of removing from these gentlemen apprehension that by any possibility they could get into any scrape, because, on the face of the papers, there is a series of clauses providing that the Government can let them out of it. These hon, gentlemen have made up their minds that we must go, they have made up their minds that we could not respectably remain in office. They said: "Well, our sentiments are known, everybody knows what we think about the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and what we will do, and what our policy is, and what, when we get in, we will carry out, and that is, to let you out of building all the difficult parts of the road." It is a game all on one side, Sir, but it is too thin. It is in vain for the fowler to spread the net in the eyes of a bird. We must be blind as bats, and the country must be blind as owls in the day, if they do not see that there is a net, and they will avoid the net. They will not be caught by it. No web in the net is going to catch the intelligent community with these papers before them. Sir, these hon, gentlemen had better have dealt with this matter in general; they could have said other people are ready to make a contract. If they had said in their places, they knew of their own knowledge that certain people were ready to come forward and build the railway for a small sum; then, Sir, some persons, who would not see that it was merely a flank movement to obstruct the formation of the Company, and to obstruct the organization of the Company, and to delay and postpone the construction of the road, might have had their faith shaken, but no man, be he ever so simple, who is fit to be elected to this House, can read else on these papers than that it is a political trick, and a discreditable trick, as I said before, that will redound permanently to the discredit and dishonor of all those who have concocted it, and of all those who have joined it. I do not believe that the hon. member for the West Riding of Durham will get up in his place and advise this Government or this House to accept the proposition of this second Syndicate. I say I defy him to get up and do so. I know he will not give such advice, I will not believe all he has said, and believe all that those who have spoken from that side of the House have urged respecting the first Syndicate, by advising this House to accept the responsibility of voting for the proposition which has been made by the second Syndicate. These hon, gentlemen cannot do it. What have they told us, Sir? That this proposition was illegal. The hon, member for Gloucester told us it was illegal and unconstitutional for the Government to have made this arrangement with the first Syndicate, and how can he vote to give the contract to this second Syndicate? The hon, member for North Norfolk has told us that some portions of this arrangement are a swindle. Yet those very clauses which he said were a swindle are incorporated in the proposals of the new Syndicate. Those very clauses which the hon, gentleman so eloquently, but rather unparjiamentarily, denounced as a swindle and a fraud, he will find here, with the two exceptions. Let me first look over some of these clauses. In the first place our terms were said to be excessive. In comparison with the terms of the present bogus tender there might be a pretence for assuming that. In the next place it was said that we had no right to contract except upon tenders given in reply to an advertisement. But this is the point to which I will call the attention of the hon. member for North Norfolk. The manner of selecting the lands under our proposal was said by him to be a swindle, a fraud and a robbery. Yet these gentlemen, Sir W. P. Howland and Company, say that they must be allowed to perpetrate that swindle and carry out that fraud or they will not undertake the contract. Surely, this being the case, the hon, gentleman will not vote for the second Syndicate.

An hon, MEMBER. He will do anything.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Then it was said: "Oh, the Government is going to build the road from Thunder Bay to Red River; from Kamloops to Yale, and from Yale to Port Moody. Why the Government will become a partner with the Syndicate, that will never do." Gentlemen who used that argument cannot vote for the new Syndicate. Then there was an argument used that the scheme for issuing bonds was wrong, that the contractors would issue the bonds and leave the bondholders to whistle for their money, and the people of Canada to whistle for their road. Yet the general principle for the issue of bonds is adopted in the proposal of Sir W. P. Howland and Company. Then Mr. Speaker, there was a great grumble at the smallness of the deposit. The offer is a million of dollars. That is the offer made by the gentlemen of the new Syndicate. I have learned from my hon, friend since I came into the House that the new Syndicate gentlemen thought they could go one more-to use the language of my good friend Mr. H. H. Cook-and they have sent down certificates to the extent of twelve or thirteen hundred dollars.

Some hon, MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hon, gentlemen opposite must not be unparliamentary. I am speaking at some disadvantage, because I am not well, but I will make myself heard. The proposition just laid on the Table of the House is that the members of the new Syndicate shall make a deposit of a million of dollars. I understand that they have sent a communication by telegraph stating that they have deposited $1,200,000 as security; that when the contract is signed they will deposit the million dollars permanently. Well, Sir, this is a small trick to put up $200,000 over the million, and yet if you look at the contract lying on your Table you will see that the Syndicate have to put up the whole of $5,000,000 by the 1st May, 1882.

Mr. ANGLIN. No, no.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I beg not to be interrupted again. I think that an old speaker ought to know something about decencies of debate.

An hon, MEMBER. The 1st of December, 1882.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They are to put $1,000,000 to remain permanently in the hands of the Government. They are to put up the other $4,000,000 by the 1st December. 1882—and that is a sufficient security to the country and to this House that the Syndicate will not find it to its advantage to sell the bonds and then abandon the work. The proposition that they would do so is so absurd, so discreditable to those who make it, that it is almost unworthy of notice. But, Sir, before I call the attention of the House to the new Syndicate, and show what a complete farce it is -and I do not use a word too strong when I describe it as farcical-I would say that when I intended to speak on Friday it was simply to state that the Government, as a Government, feels itself bound to carry out the contract it has entered into, in good faith, and that it has a right to challenge, and does challenge the vote of this House. They believe it is the best offer that has been made up to that time. They believe it is one which will be satisfactory to the country. We believe it is one that will not involve ultimately the expenditure of sixpence by the people of Canada. We believe it will carry out that for which it was intended; that we should carry out the early construction of the railway; and, we are bound to ask, on its own merits and without reference to any attempted obstruction at the eleventh hour, by the bringing out of bogus tenders and and I use the word bogus, notwithstanding the respectability of some of the gentlemen who have signed it—that the contract be adopted and the road built according to the wishes of the people and Parliament of Canada. It is not constitutional, and I would not say for a moment or hold any threatening language to the House, indicative of what course the Government ought to take, or would take in the matter, if, when they have submitted their best judgment, which becomes a portion of their policy, it were not adopted. But all I can say is, to use an expression which has been rather celebrated in Canada, that I think we should find and be told by hon. gentlemen opposite—and this document is probably prepared for the purpose of giving them the opportunity—that our usefulness was gone. The hon, gentlemen opposite have not hidden their lights under a bushel; their words have not been spoken in a corner. We knew the governing policy of the Opposition, enunciated on several occasions, and repeated in this House, during the present Session, by the leader of the Opposition. We know he is opposed to the building of the road through British Columbia; that he has, from the time the subject was brought before Parliament, protested against it, using such language to that Province as erring sister depart in peace. We know he has ridiculed the idea of forcing a railroad through an inhospitable region, a sea of mountains, that would get no traffic, but be built at an enormous expense and be of no real value. The hon, gentleman has adhered to that policy. Last Session he moved that the further construction of the road through British Columbia, in allusion to the contract given out by the present Government under advertisements published by the late Government, and for the purpose of carrying out its policy, be postponed, as also all action with that object; and 1 express my regret at the unavoidable absence of my hon. triend from Lambton on this occasion. But great as I regret that, I still more greatly regretted his humiliation at the time last Session when the hon. gentleman's motion was triumph over him, I would not desire a greater humilia-tion, a sorrier fate, or a more wretched ending of a statesman than that, at the whip of the man who had deposed him-of the man who had removed and supplanted him—he should be obliged to eat his own words and vote in favor of postponing the construction of the road through British Columbia—that he should have to Sir John A. Macdonald, asking for tenders for the building of that road. What did that advertisement mean and the calling for tenders? Was it a sham, a fraud-assuming, like those who did not know, that the hon. gentleman went down to the depths of degradation, to use that argument himself, and say that he did not mean anything by that advertisement, but merely wished to ascertain the probable cost of the work? Because it was stated in this House that that was the object of issuing the advertisement so that contractors were called upon to come from not only all parts of the Dominion, but San Francisco, the United States, England and the world to consider this matter, and they were to go over the whole ground with their surveyors and engineers, make their surveys and estimates at the greatest trouble and expense in order to ascertain the character of the work, and that the Canadian Government might be able to say to them afterwards, "Gentlemen we are very much obliged to you for the information you have given us, gathered at your expense and not at that of the public." Not one of the gentlemen of the late Government could have done that...I am sure, or have said that the advertisement was not bona fide, was not for the purpose of giving out the work, otherwise it was a mockery, a delusion and a snare, an injury to every man put to expense in connection with it and to all the professional men and capitalists of the world. I must say the policy of the leader of the Opposition was avowed and expressed. In the first place his policy as a Minister would be to stop all the work in British Columbia -not a mile would be built-not a train would ever run through British Columbia if he could help it. Not an article of trade or commerce would pass over a line through that Province to the East if he had his will, and that Province would be compelled to appeal to the paramount power, to the justice of the British Government and Parliament, where justice is always rendered, to relieve her from connection with a people so devoid of honor, so devoid of character, so unworthy of a place among the nations, and let her renew her immediate connection with Her Majesty's Government, which would see that justice was done to that long suffering people. That was the policy of the leader of the Opposition with regard to the West. Now, his policy with regard to the East, was hostile to the construction of the road north of Lake Superior. He avows his predilection for the Sault Ste. Marie line, to run off the trade into the United States, to strengthen, to renew, to extend and develop our commerce with the United States, to the utter destruction of the great plan, basis and policy of the Dominion, which is to connect the great counties composing the Dominion from sea to sea by one vast iron chain, which cannot and will never be broken. With our common feelings of loyalty and allegiance to our common sovereign, influenced by all the principles which actuate British subjects to desire to live and die under the British crown, we should have in favor of this means of connection the pecuniary interests of British Columbia, inclining them to unite more firmly to the rest of the Dominion, all of the Provinces thus becoming one country in principle, loyalty and interest. That was the policy of hon. gentlemen, and it was supported, and would be supported, by the whole party. It was supported by their organ also. I do not often read it, for I do not think it very wholesome reading, but I am told it now goes in your hands. If I were his worst enemy, and wished to in strongly for the Sault Ste Marie road. Yet we atl triumph over him, I would not desire a greater humilia remember, for I have heard it read many a time, the manner in which that organ in days of old denounced the building of the Sault road as traitorous to the best interests of Canada, and destructive to the future of the Dominionas calculated to unite as willy-nilly with the States, by a commercial connection, which must be followed by a political connection a little later. Times changed, and I am bolie—I use not the word in an offensive sense—his own told that organ strongly supports the hon. leader of the advertisement and all the action of his Government in Opposition just as strong as some years ago it vigorously, and in a loyal British sense, opposed him. Other men govern that paper now, and if the chief man who conducted that paper were now living, I do not believe he would so belie his whole life and all his interests as to surround a great connecting principle which, whatever might be the subjects of contention across the floor, kept him always united with the party of which I am a humble member, always united in defending British interest, in defending monarchical institutions, and in trying as far as possible to keep us a free and independent people of all external relations with any country in the world except our grand old Mother Country of England. Now it is quite clear that this document was prepared here for a political use. I would only call the attention of the House to a very few variations which are made in this contract from the contract that we laid on the Table, and you will see that it is prepared for the express object of enabling the most timid man-including Sir William P. Howland, who would not risk $5,000 unless he were certain of getting it again—it is drawn for the purpose of enabling the most timid man to sign this document, knowing that he was safe. It was-heads, I win; tails, you lose. Those who connected themselves with this expected that the present Government must and would adhere to the first contract, and, therefore, a new Government would take its place, and my hon. friend would take the place which I now unworthily occupy—a place which his individual ability and individual zeal and exertions for his party would enable him to adorn. They knew what his policy would be. He has declared it so recently that I do not think he can change it. To be sure he can change between 1880 and 1881, but then, in this case, the change would be so rapid that even my hon friend's versatility of talent would not allow him to change so speedily as that. Well, I come to the new offer, and what is the first proposition?

"The Company also hereby offers, in the event of the Government desiring to withdraw from the proposed construction of the eastern section, that the Company shall reduce the said subsidy in money and land by the amount apportioned by the said eastern section of the railway under the 9th paragraph of this proposal."

Now, the gentlemen who made that tender did not intend to build the Lake Superior section, because they believed that the present Government would insist upon the Lake Superior section being built. They hoped we would be defeated by the proffer of the second Syndicate, and that the hon gentlemen opposite would come in, and in that event of the Government desiring to withdraw from the proposed construction, they would do it for so much less. They had the previously pledged policy of the hon gentleman that he would withdraw it. Therefore they were preparing in advance, and these other three clauses, convince me, and will convince every man, that this was politically drawn, that this was a political plot, and that these men—some of more means, some of less, and some of none at all—could not by any possibility run a chance of forfeiting a single sixpence, either by building the Lake Superior section or running it for ten years afterwards. The next section is as follows:—

"In the event of the Government desiring to withdraw the said eastern section from construction hereafter, the Company hereby offers to construct within three years, and equip, own and operate as a part of the Canada Pacific Railway, a branch line from South East Bay, Lake Nipissing, to Sault Ste. Marie."

The other section likewise, they were put in the tender which the hon, gentleman opposite would accept, for the purpose of building under this contract, if they get it, the Sault Ste. Marie road and throw over the Lake Superior section. It is so clear that he who runs may read. Now, Sir, the 21st clause, this relates to my constituency and the Province which I represent, and I call the attention to it of my hon. colleague in the representation of Victoria:

"In the event of the Government desiring to postpone or withdraw from the construction of the western section of the said railway, extending from Kamloops to Port Moody, they shall be at liberty to do so at and for a aum of $3,500,000."

There it is again, no chance for a road running towards the sea to Yale. The hon, gentleman is against a mile of railway being-built in British Columbia, and how gladly he would receive those gentlemen whenever they came to say: "Well, you don't want to press us to build this, to go on with that now;" and the hon, gentleman would say: "No, we are too glad to get rid of it." The last clause reads thus:

"In the event of the Government desiring to postpone or withdraw from construction, by the Company hereunder, of the westerly portion of the central section of said railway—"

That is to say, the first contract is to build from Kamloops down to Emory's Bar, that is under contract now; but the remaining 450 miles, from Kamloops through the Rocky Mountains to Jasper House, is the roughest of any portion of the country:—

"Being the westerly 450 miles thereof, as mentioned in the 9th clause of this proposal, the Company offers to reduce the subsidy in money and land by the amount apportioned to the said 450 miles."

That is, the first clause does away with Lake Superior section, the second clause provides for the building of the Sault St. Marie road, the third clause provides that the Government may give up the building of the line from Emory's Bar to Port Moody, and the fourth section gives up the building of anything West of Jasper House. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is the policy of the Government to build all these sections; it is the pledged policy of the Opposition to wipe them out. It is the pledged policy of the Opposition. They cannot go back on their pledged policy. It is in fact a tender for the prairie section of the road, the paying section, the easiest section, the cheapest section, the most profitable section, the section that will be built not only inexpensively, but that will pay whenever population comes in, and population will follow the building of the road. And this whole scheme which was ostensibly to assume the responsibility of building and running the whole line from Lake Nipissing to the Pacific Ocean, is simply an impudent offer to build the prairie section, and to do it by means of political friends, who, when they get in power, will grant them all they want, and allow them to confine their exertions, their responsibilities, and all the liabilities for the future; to building an easy road across the prairies, and so connecting with the American system of railways, and carrying away the trade of the North-West by one or more American channels, to the utter ruin of the great policy under which the Dominion of Canada has been created, to the utter ruin of our hopes of being a great nation, and to the ruin of our prospect of getting possession of the Pacific trade, and connecting Asia with England by a railway passing through the dominions of England. It is as easy as rolling off a log to run a railway across the prairies and work it; but this is an endeavor to deprive this country, to deprive Ontario, to deprive Quebec, to deprive the Maritime Provinces of all connection by railway with the North-West.

Mr. ANGLIN. Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon, gentleman says "hear, hear." Yes; I am proud to say that if our scheme is carried out, the steamer landing at Halifax will discharge its freight and emigrants upon a British railway, which will go through Quebec, and through Ontario to the Far West, on British territory, under the British flag, under Canadian laws, and without any chance of either the immigrant being deluded or seduced from his allegiance or his proposed residence in Canada, or the traffic coming from England or offensive restrictive taxation or customs regulations of a foreign power. So that it is quite clear that these gentlemen are safe as a cherry. They would be under no obligations to build the very expensive portions of the road.

They would be relieved from running any portion of the road that would not pay. Canada might whistle for those connections in her own territory, but the people would gradually see that the colonies would gradually be severed from each other; that we should become a bundle of sticks, as we were before, without a binding cord, and that we should fall, helpless, powerless, and aimless, into the hands of the neighboring Republic. Let us consider what this offer is. These gentlemen are going to build the prairie road for $7,333 a mile, against our $10,000, and they make a corresponding reduction in the quantity of land. But you must remember that if there is a reduction in the quantity of land, that land will lie right alongside the railway on the prairie. They will get all the land where it is most valuable. It has been variously calculated as worth $5, $4, $3, $2, and $1, but it is quite clear that if the prairie section only is to be built, all the land will be taken from the immediate vicinity of the railway, while if the whole is built, much of the land will be taken far away from the railway at diminished value. George Stephen & Co. must take the land where they can get it. They can only get some 11 000,000 acres from Winnipeg to Jasper House, and the remainder of the 25,000,000 acros they must find elsewhere. In order to make it worth a dollar-worth anything at all, they must build branch railways to those points, and this House and country would be only too glad to give them this permission, in order that they might open up other sections of country far away from the main line of the railway. But we have the testimony of hon gentlemen opposite as to what, according to them, the lands in the vicinity of the railway are worth. The railway will run through the most fertile portion of the land, and still turther increase their value, so that the profit to be gained in building the prairie section of the railway out of the lands in the immediate vicinity of the railway which are to be handed over to the new Syndicate, is a much larger profit than all the 25,000,000 will give to a company bound to build the whole line from Lake Nipissing to the Pacific. So it was a very, very safe bargain to make. There is a little point of difference between these two tenders, to which I cannot refrain from calling the attention of the House. I have already stated that, in going over this second offer, I find they have just cut out of the printed paper most of the clauses of the contract and the schedule, but reducing the price. But there are some changes, and there is a change of one little word, to which I think, I ought to call the attention of the House. We all remember the discussion between my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) and the hon. leader of the Opposition upon the question whether there was any power which could force the railway company to construct the railway, and my hon. friend (Mr. Rykert) quoted the Court of Chancery. I stated that if it was merely a permissive contract, it could not, of course, be enforced. The only consequence of a permissive contract not being carried out, would be that either the charter might be cancelled by Parliament, if that was the law, or there might be an action for damages, by way of compensation. But if there was a statutory obligation, if it was not merely permissive but obligatory, not merely a contract between parties but an obligatory statutory obligation, it became a statutory duty imposed by Parliament with a paramount power upon the individual, and if that duty was imposed, it could be enforced by a mandamus. That is my statement. Well, the second clause of the contract made by us is followed, word for word, I may say, except striking out the words "hereby contracted for "—hereby tendered for, they mean of course. It provides that "the contractors immediately after the organization of the Company, will deposit with the Government $1,000,000 in cash or approved within three years, which they stated they were quite securities." There was an obligation we were told, that they "shall" do it, that they must do it. When I came to 1st of January, and they will build that as shortly after S'r John A. Macdonald.

the clause about building the road, the word "shall" in the contract that we made, is struck out and the word "will" put in. The parliamentary statutory obligation to pay the money was left, but when we come to the clause saying they shall build the road, the word "shall" is struck out and the word "will" substituted. The word "will" is merely an expression of intention, and the only consequence, if this is carried out, is that the subsequent part of the contract will be inoperative, because it says that on condition of the promise, the Government agree to make certain payments. So if the promise be not carried out, the payments will not be made. If the word shall is good "shall deposit" it is good for "shall build," yet it is left in for the deposit and struck out for the road. There must be an object in that; that is a statutory obligation which imposes that duty which the Government of the day can force as it can force all duties thrown on Parliament on the subject. I had forgotten a paper that is placed in my hands to which I shall call your attention. I spoke about the value of the land along the prairie section which, of course, must be of more value than the land which the whole Syndicate would have to take for their additional burden and their additional responsibility along the whole line of railway. We will take the Canadian section. Now, this is the statement based on the new proposal. We will value the land grant for the prairie section at $1.00 an acre, and that everybody must admit is absurdly low-

Mr. MILLS. Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes, it is absurdly low. for the land laying twenty-four miles on each side of the prairie section; it must be worth more, when the railway is built, than a dollar an acre. The cash subsidy, 900 miles at $733.33 per mile will be $6,000,000, and the land grant, 10,000 per mile for 900 miles at $1 per acre, will be $9,000,000, making in all, for building the prairie section, at $1 an acre, $15,600,000. If you take the land at $2 an acre, and that is far too low by the estimates of the hon. gentleman opposite, the cash subsidy of the land grant at $2 an acre will make in all $24,600,000. Value the land at $3.18 an acre and it will be worth $28,620,000, making in all, cash and land, $35,220,000, so that for building the prairie section. the cheap section, the easy section, the section which can be run at a profit—at $1 an acre, they will get $17,333.33 per mile; at $2 an acre, they will get $27,333.33 a mile, and $3.18 an acre they will get $39,133 a mile. And this price would be given by hon. gentlemen opposite who say that that section can be built at $8,110 per mile.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. How much would they get on your proposition?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Now, when the House was discussing the sub-division and subsidy, it was alleged that there was a disproportionate sum given to Messrs. Stephen & Co., and this offer was meant to make the public believe that the sum was excessive. I have shown you, that believing as everybody must who looks at this offer, that it is only intended to build the prairie section, the whole thing will vary from $17,000 to $39,000 per mile, according to the various estimates per mile. That is for the prairie section alone. The reason why the sum was put large and full in the original contract for the prairie section, was because that section must be built, first and speedily. That is the portion that can only be built first, and until that is built the population which we believe will readily and eagerly seek shelter and homes in our North-West, cannot get there. It was of the very greatest consequence to the Government that this road should be built at once. This large subsidy was, therefore, given for the prairie section as an inducement for the contractors to push that road there that time as possible. It makes no difference if the security is good; if the capital is in the hands of gontlemen of honor and means, it is of no consequence where the money is expended. The division is made for the purpose of hurrying up the 1,000 miles across the fertile prairies of the North-West, so as to enable the population to go in at once. And, Sir, you must remember they can get no lands near Lake Superior nor in British Columbia, which had been described by hon gentlemen opposite as valueless, that Province being a "sea of mountains." Therefore all the land to be given is concentrated in the prairie country, and we endeavor to induce them to build the road and as many branches as possible by grants in that region. The great object was not only to have the line running from east to west, but to assign the Company lands to be selected by the joint action of the Government and themselves. encourage them to build branches, we give them a large and valuable allowance, so that that whole country may not only be opened up east and west, but be penetrated by herring-bone lines running northward and southward far into the interior. I hear a voice behind me saying that they are to build the Lake Superior section at the same time. We took good care of that. I believe that the men who signed the first contract are men of honor and great wealth, who cannot afford too lose their character, prestige and credit in the markets of the world by breaking a contract. But we felt we had no right to take their word for it, and therefore stipulated in the contract that the Government commence from the beginning of the Canadian Pacific line, possibly at Callandar Station, and proceed vigorously and continuously, and in such a manner that the annual progressshall not secure completion at the end of ten years but shall be such as to show the Government that the Lake Superior road could be finished in ten years. You must remember that this is one contract, and not a separable contract, to build the eastern or the western section. It is a contract to build both, and if the Company failed in performing their contract in carrying out their obligations as to the Like Superior road, or the prairie road, they have no right to claim a subsidy in land or money because of having done so much work on the prairie section. If they fail on one section, although they may have built twice the number of miles that they promised across the prairie, and may have finished them to our thorough satisfaction, when they come to demand the land and the money, if they have not worked vigorously and continuously on the Lake Superior section, achieving a rate of annual progress, assuring us that it will be finished within the proper time, then we shall say: "No you don't - you shall not have this money; true, you have built the prairie section, but you have tailed at other parts of the road which must go on pari passu, and we will not give you a dollar or an acre, because, though you have done the full amount on the prairies, you have made a failure to a great extent else-In order to make a great flourish on the new sections or proposals, the opponents of the old scheme have struck out the 15th clause as follows:-

"For 20 years from the date hereof, no line of railway shall be authorized by the Dominion Parliament to be constructed South of the Canadian Pacific Railway, from any point at or near the Canadian Pacific Railway except such line as shall run South West or to the Westward of S. uth West; nor to within fifteen miles of Latitude 49. And z. the establishment of any new Province in the North-West Territories, provisions shall be made for continuing such prohibition after such establishment until the expiration of the said period."

That was a clause put in deliberately for the same reason that we asked Parliament to build the Canadian Pacific at all. We desire, the country desires, that the road, when built, should be a Canadian road; the main channel for Canadian traffic for the carriage of the treasures and traffic of the west to the seaboard through Canada. So far as we can we shall not allow it to be built for the benefit of the United States lines. Why a train starting from the foot of the United States we have seen evidences of the mad rivalry which has existed occasionally between some great railway lines of that country. We have seen them run railways at ruinous rates, in the hope of breaking each other down. Sir, with our road, backed by a country of scarcely 4,000,000, with our infant country and with our infant capitalists, what chances would they have against the whole of the United States capitalists?

the Rocky Mountains—and I am glad to know perhaps one of the most fertile, if not the most fertile section, lies directly at the eastern slope of the Rocky Mountains-with freight from British Columbia for the east, we desire to keep on our own railroad as long as we legitimately can. We believe it will carry freight as cheaply and satisfy the wants of the country as fairly as any American railway. But, Sir, we desire to have the trade kept on our own side -that not one of the trains that passes over the Canadian Pacific Railway will run int the United States if we can help it, but may, instead, pass through our own country, that we may build up Montreal, Quebec, Toronto, Halifax and St. John by means of one great Canadian line, carrying as much traffic as possible by the course of trade through our own country. I do not mean to say we can prevent cheaper channels being opened. There is nothing to prevent other railroads running across the continent through our own country. Our Dominion is as big as all Europe, and we might as well say that the railways running from Paris to Moscow might supply the wants of all Europe as that this railway might supply the wants of the whole North-West. There will be room for as many railways in that country by-and-bye as there are in Europe; and if there be any attempt—the attempt would be futile on the part of the Canadian Pacific Railway to impose excessive prices and rates, it is folly that would soon be exposed by the construction of rival lines east and west, which would open up our country in all directions and prove amply sufficient to prevent the possibility of a monopoly which has been made such a bugbear of by hon. gentlemen opposite. I was going to say that a train starting from the foot of the Rocky Mountains might obtain connections a line running through in a south-easterly United States. direction with roads in the The hon. gentleman says it is only for 20 years; but I was going to say, that a train starting from the foot of the Rocky Mountains, might be bled by a line from any southerly direction connected with the United States, and so much traffic will be carried off to the United States; and a few miles further another line might connect with another American line, and so on, Sir, until long before we got to Winnipeg or Red River the main portion of the trade would be carried off from our line into 'American channels. That magnificent river, the Rhine, starting with pride from its source, runs through the finest portions of Europe, and yet has a miserable, wretched end, being lost in the sands as it approaches the sen; and such would be the fate of the Canadian Pacific Railway if we allowed it to be bled by subsidiary lines, feeding foreign railways, adding to foreign wealth and increasing foreign revenue by carrying off our trade until, before we arrived at the terminal points in Ontario. and at Montreal, it would be so depleted that it would almost die of inanition. No men in their senses would undertake to build the 450 miles through that stern country to the north of Lake Superior and run it for ten long years, when they knew that unless there was some check placed upon those lines, not a pound of freight would go to the North-West, but it would almost all go to the United States. Some of it would come to us, but the great portion of the trade would go through the United States by the favored line of hon. gentlemen opposite, without any hope of getting it back to Canada at Sault Ste. Mar.e. Sir, we know what a great amount, what an enormous amount of capital American amount, what an enormous amount of capital American capitalists possess who are connected with the railways of the United States. We have seen evidences of the mad rivalry which has existed occasionally between some great railway lines of that country. We have seen them run railways at ruinous rates, in the hope of breaking each other down. Sir, with our road, of breaking each other down. Sir, with our road, backed by a country of scarcely 4,000,000, with our infant country and with our infant capitalists, what chances would

What chance would they have? The Americans would offer to carry freight for nothing, and aye to pay shippers for sending freight that way. It would not all come by Sault Ste. Marie. It would come to Duluth. It would come to Chicago. It would come through a hundred different channels. It would percolate through the United States, to New York and Boston, and to the other ports, and, Sir, after our railway was proved to be useless, they might, perhaps, come into the market and buy up our line as they have bought up other lines. Railway and telegraph lines are under no protection from foreign capitalists coming in and buying them up, getting control of our markets, and cutting us off from the trade which should come from the great West and by Canadian railways to the River St. Lawrence. They could afford for a series of years with their enormous wealth, with their enormous capital, exceeding the revenue of many, many first-class Governments in Europe, to put their rates for freight down to such a figure as would ruin our road, as would ruin the contractors, as would ruin the Company, and render them utterly impossible to continue in competition, and, Sir, what can be more wretched, or more miserable, in any country, than an insolvent railway. What could be more wretched and miserable and destructive to the future of a country than the offering on the market of the stock of insolvent railways? They cannot supply, they cannot renew the rails, they cannot maintain the road-bed in repair, they cannot keep the line supplied with railway stock. Sir, the road would become shrunken, shrunken, shrunken until it fell an easy prey to this ring. We cannot afford to run such a risk. We saw what a wheat ring did in Chicago. They raised the price of the necessaries of life,—the ring in Chicago raised the price of the poor man's loaf for a whole year in order to make a profit at the expense of the laboring poor of Europe, and of all the rest of the world, and a similar combination, but infinitely richer, with infinitely more capital, and infinitely more unscrupulous-and no men are so unscrupulous and so reckless, and are proven to be so unscrupulous and reckless, as the railway speculators and proprietors in the United States—would be found in this case. Sir, it was essentially as a matter of precaution, a matter of necessity, and a matter of self-defence, that we provided that this road should not be depleted of its traffic in the manner which I have mentioned. That road shall be allowed fair play for twenty years from now, and only ten years after construction; and that it should be protected from the chance of being robbed of all the profits, robbed of all the gain, the legitimate gain, which the Company expects to get from this enterprise, and the employment of their capital. This was done only to protect them for the first ten years of their infant traffic. We know perfectly well, it will take many years before that country is filled up with a large population, and the first ten years will be most unprofitable; we know perfectly well that it will require all the exertion, and all the skill, and all the management of the Company to make the eastern and western sections of this road fully compensate them, and fairly compensate them for their responsibility, and for their expenditure during these ten years. In order to give them a chance, we have provided that the Dominion Parliament-mind you the Dominion Parliament: we cannot check any other Parliament; we cannot check Ontario, we cannot check Manitoba—shall for the first ten years after the construction of the road, give their own road into which they are putting so much money and so much land, a fuir chance of existence. The very fact, Sir, that these gentlemen are willing to strike that bargain, and the very fact that they are willing to have their road built so, shows that they do not mean to run the line east of Red River. They can well afford, Mr. Speaker, to allow railways to run into the prairie line. Any railway as a local colonisation line, as a line to supply the wants of the tolls, to American freights, to all the little tricks and hig country lying along the line from east to west, tricks that American railways are addicted to for the Sir John A. Macdonald, the local traffic, and the trade which the road will obtain from Jasper House to Red River, will be amply sufficient to keep it up, and therefore, these gentlemen can well afford to say: "We do not want any such exemptions." But, Mr. Speaker, if they are going to build the road to the north of Lake Superior-if they meant to do it-and run it for ten years they should not allow that road to lie useless, actually useless in their hands, because its traffic would be all rebbed and depleted long before their trade or a pound of trade could cross the Red River to run through Canadian territory. Sir, this is one of the many evidences of the innumerable evidences, patent on the face of the second contract, showing that it is not a bona fide contract, and it is not a bona fide and honest offer to build the road through Canadian territory; but that it is an offer to build a road which is to carry out the declared policy of hon, gentlemen sitting on the opposite side of the House. It is intended for that purpose, and that purpose only. The next clause, Mr. Speaker, is the sixteenth——

An hon. MEMBER. Six o'clock.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Ido not think it will do to divide my remarks, and commence again to-morrow. I shall have an opportunity of speaking again I have no doubt. I may say, however, Sir, that my hon. friend opposite simulated indignation very well,—as healways does—when I moved that the Orders of the Day give way to the discussion of this subject. He appealed to the House and to the country to witness the wickedness of our course. It was well done, Sir, but is was rather significant, because the hon, gentleman had given us fair notice when we were in Committee, that he intended to speak at full length on the subject when you were in the chair. We did not desire to do anything, but to give every latitude for discussion. God knows we have given every latitude for discussion. But we wanted to get on. I knew perfectly well that when you were in the chair the discussion would be renewed, and all we wanted was not to be losing time. We were never such fools as to suppose that the second offer would not come before the House. Any hon, member could bring it up. The parties themselves could present petitions setting forth that they had made the offer. We wanted to go on with the discussion. I appeal to the members of this House as men who are patriots, as men who have the destinies of their country in their hands, not to be hoodwinked, not to be fooled, not to be led away by a disingenuous and discreditable trick. I know we can appeal to our countrymen; I know we can appeal to the patriotism of the people of Canada. We can tell them that we want a line that will connect Halifax with the Pacific Ocean. We can tell them, even from the mouth of our enemies, that out of our lands we can pay off every single farthing, every cent taken out of the pockets of the people, twenty-fold, and we will have a great Pacific Railway. This is what we will have. Let me draw a contrast! You are asked to have a railway running from the United States and to the United States. You are asked to have a line by which the trade from the east will run into the States, and by which the legitimate profits of the Lake Superior road will be destroyed. You are asked to have a line by which the trada from the West will run into the States. Mr. Speaker, the whole thing is an attempt to destroy the Pacific Railway. I can trust to the intelligence of this House, and the patriotism of this country, I can trust not only to the patriotism but to the common sense of this country to carry out an arrangement which will give us all we want, which will satisfy all the loyal legitimate aspirations which will give us a great, an united, a rich, an improving, a developing Canada, instead of making us tributary to American laws, to American railways, to American bondage, to American purpose of destroying our road. Look on this picture and then on that and I know which choice will be made by the people of Canada. And, Sir, I believe before the general elections in 1883, hon, gentlemen opposite will try to make the people forget, will try to make the people disremember, to use a western phrase, this publican plot, and will eat their own words before the people as they are trying to do now with regard to the National Policy—and in doing so they will lose the respect of the people of Canada.

Mr. BLAKE moved the adjournment of the debate. House adjourned at Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

TUESDAY, 18th January, 1881.

· REPORT.

PAPERS.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER presented a statement showing deposits made on account of certain persons offering to construct and operate the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. BLAKE asked the hon. Minister to state the aggregate amount.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER said that the amount so telegraphed was $1,420,000; but there was evidently an inaccuracy in one of the telegrams stating that two amounts of $75,000, mentioning the sum total as $100,000 had been paid in, and so, he supposed, the total sum was 1ro.. $1,420,000 and $1,450,000.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 31) to enlarge and extend the powers of the Crédit Foncier Eranco Canadien.—(Mr. Girouard.) Jacques Cartier.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Before the Orders of the Day are called I desire to call attention to a paragraph which appeared in the Ottawa Free Press last night, to the following effect:—

"We have no hesitation in saying that the Hansarl report of Mr. White's (Cardwell) speech on the evening of the 13th, has been cooked outrageously. Perhaps Mr. White was ashamed of his utterances and had them struck out, but, in doing so, he has made the report of the debates worthless, because unreliable."

So far as this statement refers to myself personally, I am indifferent to it, and I certainly would not call the attention of the House to it, or to keep the time of the House in respect to it; but it reflects very seriously upon the gentlemen performing the very difficult and laborious duty of recording the debates of this House. I have only, therefore, to say that I did not see the Hansard report of that speech until after it was published, and, so far as I could read and understand it, it contained everything I said on that occasion, even those passages which some gentlemen might consider rather strong. The suggestion that the Hansard reporters in any way "cooked" the speech is entirely incorrect.

Mr. HESSON rose and said he desired to call attention to a matter of some importance to himself and the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Trow). At page 9 of the debates of January 13th, that hon. member is reported as saying:—

"The meetings in this district have been unanimous in the condemnation of this scheme, and I have received resolutions; bearing five hundred signatures from a township in that hon, gentleman's riding, condemning the scheme."

He had carefully examined all the petitions placed upon the Table by the hon. member for South Perth, and he found there were 315 names upon the petition purporting to come from his (Mr. Hesson's) riding. The total number of signatures to the petitions presented by the hon. gentleman was 686, of which 371 were from his own riding, and the balance from North and South East Hope. The speaker also corrected the statements published in the debates of same date, at page 10:—"And the petition from an important township containing nearly 100 electors," and stated that instead of 100 the number should be 400.

-CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Charles Tupper for the second reading of the Resolutions reported from the Committee of the Whole on the 13th of January instant, granting certain moneys and lands for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. BLAKE. I feel, Sir, deeply impressed with the sense of responsibility which, I am sure, must weigh on every independent member of this House who knows he has a free vote to give, and will, for that vote, be responsible to his constituents and to the country, as to the course he shall take upon this question. I regret that the hon. First Minister, who may be said to have introduced the regular debate upon the resolutions of the Minister of Railways, should, upon a topic whose range was certainly wide enough to have given every opportunity for legitimate discussion, have introduced some observations ill calculated to preserve that judicial temper, that calmness of tone which it is desirable should prevail during this debate. The hon, gentleman was good enough to express words of sympathy, for which I am sure we all feel grateful, at the unfortunate illness of the hon, member for Lambton (Mr. Muckenzie); and I am sure the whole House will regret to know that my hon. friend, as the First Minister stated, is confined to his bed by severe illness, and is utterly unable to participate in this debate. Under these circumstances, I think the hon. gentleman might have abstained from certain further allusions of a very different tone and complexion, which he made in the course of those remarks. My hon, friend's course, as a public man, has been before the people of this country for a great many years. His course of procedure on which the hon, gentleman animadverted in terms of very great severity, has been discussed last Session and this Session. His explanations and statements are before the country. It was utterly unnecessarily and exceedingly that the occasion of his absence should untimely have been seized upon to repeat those accusations then made. My hon. friend clearly stated last Session, that he had always adhered to the view that the railway should be so constructed as not to necessitate any increase in the rate of taxation, that his action as the leader of the Liberal party, and as the controller, to a large extent, of the destinies of the country for a long term of years, had been in that He pointed out that this House, in the year direction. 1876, had, by a vote almost unanimous, with, I think, only ten dissentients in the whole House, reaffirmed that often affirmed resolution; had incorporated it into the Statute-book, and it had become once more the law of the land; and he affirmed that in all he had done subsequently, as in all he had done before, he had no intention to disregard that important part of the policy so re-affirmed, and that it was not his intention, if it should be found that the cost of the construction of the section in British Columbia, having regard to the financial position of the country, was such that the construction could not be proceeded with without increasing the rate of taxation, to have proposed to this Parliament to prosecute that construction. My hon. friend, looking to the condition of this country in the two last years, burthened as it was by the largely increased rate of taxation imposed by hon, gentlemen opposite, and with a deficiency notwithstanding in the revenue, could not consistently with those well known views of his agree in the proposal that the railway should be proceeded with in British Columbia at that time. That was his statement, a satisfactory statement, and at all events a statement which should have saved him from the aspersions which the First Minister took the opportunity yesterday of attempting to throw upon him. The hon, gentleman was also pleased to use language with regard to myself, which even in this critical position of the country coming from him cannot be passed by without one instant's notice. I have borne in silence, from an anxiety not to trouble the House with personal observations, from a feeling that a man who takes a leading part must endure in silence a great many aspersions, the insinuations which from time to time have been made by some of the hon, gentleman's followers upon that topic. But a sensible man-to compare great things with very small ones-who, passing through the village street, finds himself assailed by a pack of village dogs, will not, of course, turn round and heed their barking at his heels; while he takes that attitude toward the pack, if the master of the pack assails him he may be well entitled to answer his challenge. Sir, I have to say, with regard to the hon. gentleman's statement that I had supplanted the hon, member for Lambton in the office of leader of the Liberal party which I now occupy, that that statement could not, his knowledge, be true, and that it possesses in itself not one particle of foundation. I am not about one center into lengthy details, but my views with respect to positions of leadership or of place and power are tolerably well known to all good enough to interest themselves in my public career, and are best known to those who know me best; and they know well that I have never coveted any position of that kind; that, on the contrary, I have always shunned it; that I assumed this position with the utmost reluctance; that I remain here to-day with the utmost reluctance, and if I had the wishing cap of Fortunatus for one moment, the wish I would use it to accomplish would be that the path of honor and of duty might allow me to retire from this position. But, Sir, while that is so, and while the only thing that abates my desire to see hon. gentlemen opposite defeated is the reflection that their defeat would involve my accession to office, I will use it, so long as I am entrusted with a position of influence such as I now occupy, with a desire to effect some share of good for the country in which I live. It is but the hope that I may, to some extent, increase the happiness and advance the prosperity of my countrymen that nerves me to my task; and it is only because I believe that the legalization of the contract, which it is in effect proposed to legalize by these resolutions, will be not merely injurious, but almost fatal to the future of my country, that I now oppose them. It is the advancement of the country which is the only legitimate aim of party. Our belief is that the advancement of the country requires the withdrawal of this contract, and therefore, our belief is that it is a proper party aim. If we made party an end instead of a means, we would, as an hon, friend near me said the other day, desire by all means the legalization of this contract, for I believe in my conscience that the legalization of this contract means the ruin of the Government which legalizes it; but we prefer to save the country although we save the Government. We has no life not even such a life as a contract under the do not choose to injure the country in order to destroy the Act would have before ratification; it has no life whatever, Mr BLAKE,

Government, and our earnest effort, therefore, is that the country may not be ruined, even though its preservation involves the retention of their seats by hon. gentlemen opposite. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman often quotes a motto which is a very good one-country first and party afterwards. It is an admirable motto, but it seems to me to be a little misapplied as applied to this case, because it means, as I read the future, that they propose to ruin the country first in order that they may ruin their party afterwards. That seems to me to be the inevitable position into which their leaders are plunging hon, gentlemen opposite. This is a great occasion for private members of Parliament; it is just such an occasion as my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) said the other day, as is seldom vouchsafed to private members—one in which they can with effect assert their independence—assert their position; assert their right to consider what is really in the interests of the country, and press on hon. Ministers, those who are, in fact, their servants or agents, the necessity of reconsidering their position, and not plunging their country, their party and all, in one common ruin. Now, Sir, what is the present situation and the future outlook? At this moment there are various courses of action which are open to Parliament. You may adopt this contract which is before you. You may adopt the offer which is before you. You may call for tenders on the new conditions which are contained in the contract. You may proceed only with the construction of the prairie line this moment you may do various things. Your hands are not tied as a Parliament by anything that has occurred. You may assert that they are; you may pretend to the people that they are, but I warn you that the people will not accept any such pretence. You have before you various alternative courses of action. But it is only necessary just now, for the purpose of a decision on the motion which is before you to determine this: Whether the course which is proposed to you by that motion to take is or is not worse than any of the other courses. I maintain it is. I maintain that the consummation of this contract is the worst course that Parliament can take of any which can be suggested. And if it be not the best but the worst; if it be not even the worst, but if it be inferior to any other course which is open, then that suffices to determine us to condemn the contract and seek some better way. Anybody who believes that any other course that is open to Parliament is better than the course to be taken in confirming-this contract ought to vote, will, if he votes according to his duty to his constituents and his obligation to his conscience, vote against the legalization of this contract. Are we free to accept or reject this contract? If we be not free, why this resolution? Why are we asked to assent. Is this a question put to us to which there is only the answer "Yes" to be returned? May not we say "no," as freely as "yes"? It is clear that the question being put we are to answer it in such a way as is most consistent with the interests of our country; and we are therefore free, from the very fact that it is put before us, free to reject—as free to reject as we are to accept. Even had the contract been made under the provisions of the Canadian Pacific Railway Act expressly, we would have been free. Under that Act, it is expressly provided that no contract shall be binding until it has been laid on the Table of the House of Commons for 30 days without disapproval, unless sooner approved by resolution. So that if it professed to be, and in fact was a contract under the Act by the very terms of the Act, there was reserved or to this House the power to decide whether the contract should be agreed to or not, and until such decision the contract was not bind-But the contract is beyond, and is not merely ing. beyond, but contrary to, the provisions of the Act, and it unless Parliament breathes into it the breath of life. Else, why these proceedings? If it has life why the resolutions upon which to found a Bill, which Bill is to become an Act of Parliament. If all this be needful in order to make this a legal contract, then it is not now a legal contract. Is there then some obligation upon Parliament to ratify this contract-to ratify the proceedings of the Executive in this matter? No, there is none whatever. Even in the case of a treaty which is a thing within the prerogative of the Crown—which is a species of transaction under the forms of the British Constitution to be accomplished by the Crown without the assent of Parliament—save in a certain class of particulars—even in the case of a Treaty Parliament may disapprove. I will take the views of the First Minister upon the analogous question -though that was, in my opinion, rather the case of a treaty than of a contract like this-but I will argue from them that we are perfectly clear that we are wholly free to act. said the hon. First Minister last Session in the discussion upon the Boundary Award? That was, if you will, a case of treaty; it is the nearest analogy to it; it was an arrangement between two powers independent in their own sphere—a transaction between the Government of the Dominion and the Government of the Province of Ontario, for the establishment of a particular tribunal, in order to the determination of the question at issue between them. After that arrangement had been made it was communicated to Parliament without dissent. After its communication votes of money were taken in order to meet expenses which were to be incurred by the investigation, without dissent unanimously. The transaction proceeded for several years. Fresh arbitrators were appointed to succeed those who, by change of office, or death, had been removed. There was no vote proposed in Parliament against those steps; the award was ultimately made, and answering the argument that under those circumstances the case resembled that of a treaty and that Parliament would be taking a most grave step—though I admit one not beyond its power—if it repudiated the mode of trial which has been so adopted and so sanctioned. The First Minister said:

"But the Government, without the previous consent of Parliament, left the question to three arbitrators, only one of whom was a lawyer, the other two being laymen, and provided that the decision of the majority should be final. So that we might have had the two laymen differing from the legal arbitrator, and deciding as to the construction of a statute, upon the question of the boundary according to that statute. It seems to me it was a most unwise thing to assume so great a power without the previous solemn deliberation of Parliament. It is well enough to say it was afterwards mentioned in Parliament, after the good faith of the Government was pledged, and that no objection was taken by Parliament. That is not the way in which Parliament ought to have been treated by the Government, its servants, who ought to have taken it into their confidence. The right to submit the question in this manner ought to have been given by Parliament, instead of its being assumed to be within the proper jurisdiction of any Government, which I deny. No Government could thus decide to give away hundreds of miles of country, or millions of acres of land, without the authority of Parliament. The member for Bothwell says that this Government is continuous. Yes, but Governments are not despotic; and this act far exceeded the right of any constitutional government."

Again he says: "But the Government, without the previous consent of Parliament, left

Again he says:

"It is clear that it is a conventional line, and, being a conventional line, I do not think we can do better than to have it looked into in order to ascertain whether it is a good or a bad bargain. If it be a bad bargain, there is no question of good or bad faith in the matter. It is a question for Parliament to decide, whether they will agree to diminish the eastern boundary and give up a certain tract of land which is claimed to belong to the Dominion, or not."

I call the attention of the hon. gentleman's supporters to these words. The question, he says, is whether it be a good or a bad bargain. And Parliament is bound to decide whether it be a good or a bad bargain; and if they think it a bad bargain there is no question of good faith—they must reject it. Let us apply these plain words to this bargain now before us. This, however, is not the case of a treaty at all unless, indeed, you invest the Syndicate beforehand with those powers-I might almost say the despotic l sovereignty-which the contract proposes to give them. But to day, at any rate, perhaps for ever-if hon. gentlemen will do their duty here, I say for ever—the Syndicate will not assume the position of an independent pawer a compact with which may properly be dignified by the name of treaty. It is not then the prerogative of the Executive, it is contrary to the power which was given by Parliament to the Executive in this matter. I say it is not merely a thing for which there was no authority, it is a thing in respect of which Parliament gave a limited authority; and where a limited authority has been given to the Executive to enter into a contract in a particular way, contracts beyond, outside, and contrary to that way, are absolutely in contravention of parliamentary polity, and are entirely beyond the power of the Executive. There has been as yet no ratifica-tion; as yet this House has not sunk so low as to ratify this contract.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BLAKE, I hear some sounds from which I am disposed to believe that some hon. members of this House-I hope not a majority—are inclined to sink so low as to ratify this contract. It is admitted to require our consent in order that it may become binding. Then, if it requires our consent, we are free to consent or to dissent. It is in terms dependent upon our consent. The contract says, that it shall be binding only in case a Bill is passed in certain specified terms appended to the instrument. We are certainly free to reject or amend that Bill, and unless we pass it in precisely those terms, this contract is not binding. Its nature renders it dependent upon our consent. It involves the grant of large public works, exceeding 7.0 miles of railway, of many millions of public monies, of large areas of land; It involves the Government entering into an obligation with private individuals, to become contractors for the construction of a railway, and, for all these reasors, in its essence, it is such as can be operative only by the free action of this Parliament. I have shown that it is immaterial for this purpose, whether the contract is within or without the Canadian Pacific Railway Act; because, even if within the act, it can continue to live only by our voice; if without the act it can obtain life only by our voice; in either event our free consent is necessary in order to its being a legal contract. Now, that is our situation. We are free to accept or reject the contract as the interests of this country shall seem to us to demand. The hon. Minister went back to the Allan contract. I shall take a very short space of time with reference to that portion of his speech. He said that the Allan contract was the best for this country except this one, and he threw the responsibility for its failure upon us. Well, Sir, Sir Hugh Allan and the hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Abbott) went to England in order to arrange bonds for to float the Allan scheme. They came back again and applied to Government for better terms in two particulars. First, they wanted an extension of time of, I think, four years for the completion of the work; secondly, they wanted that the subsidy of $30,000,000 should be so applied as that they might use it as coupons for interest on bonds to be floated by them. The Government determined that it was not in the public interest to agree to these concessions, and they refused to agree to them; although Sir Hugh Allan's company declared that with thase concessions they would be able to float the scheme. Sir Hugh Allan's company then asked the cancellation of the contract and the return of their million, and the Government did cancel the contract and return the million. Now, Sir, either the Government was confident that they could do better than Sir Hugh Allan's proposal at that time, or else they were so very friendly to Sir Hugh Allan, that they were determined to relieve him from his difficult position; because you find that they abandoned the caution money and gave up the million, and left the public without any contract, and without any deposit or security to answer the default which had been made by Sir Hugh Allan. Again, the Government was satisfied that Sir Hugh Allan's proposal was not in the interests of the country, because, for the trifling extension of four years, and a slight alteration in the terms of the payment of the subsidy, easier to the country than the other mode.—he said he could go on, and yet the Government refused to let him go on with these alterations. I fail to see, therefore, how the Liberal party can be responsible for this transaction, ended by the Government's own decision to cancel the contract, and return the deposit rather than make some trifling modifications upon which Sir Hugh Allan declared the readiness and the ability of his company to proceed with the work. The hon. gentleman insinuated that the course which the Opposition had taken, relative to the Government, had interfered with Sir Hugh Allan's success. I have proved to you, if you accept his own testimony upon the subject, if you agree to adopt his own views, what his difficulties were, and all that he asked in order to overcome them. But suppose that incidenatly and indirectly the action of the Opposition had affected the contract. It is a new doctrine to say that the Opposition is responsible when the Government has failed. Sir, the Opposition could not have acted if hon gentlemen had not supplied the facts. It was not our exposure of the facts, but the existence of the facts, that troubled them. We are not responsible because the hon, gentlemen opposite made the bargain they did make with Sir Hugh Allan. We are not responsible because an hon. gentleman opposite received one-third of $100,000, and because the hon. First Minister called for $10,000 more. It is not we who are responsible for those events which moved this country as it had never been moved before or since, until now as it is moved this day by the transaction before us. It is the men who committed these acts who are respon-ible for the their consequences. Well, Sir, I dislike to recall these occurrences, and had the chief actors in this exhibited a proper penitence, had they confessed their fault and promised not to sin again, my mouth would have been sealed on that subject from that time out, for I cannot but feel that this transaction, which reflecting upon the honor, the integrity and the high standing of men invested by the people of Canada with power, has reflected upon the honor, the integrity and the high standing of the whole country itself. But, Sir, when hon. gentlemen flaunt this subject before us as the hon. Minister of Railways does once or twice every Session, when they declare that it is the proudest act of their lives to vindicate and defend it, and when the hon. First Minister brings it into this discussion, as he did the other day, it becomes necessary to observe that what hon gentlemen glory in as a thing proper to have been done in the past, we have no security that they will not commit in the future; it becomes proper to observe that they may repeat, at the earliest opportunity which is open to them, these transactions which they avow and vindicate to day, and if they were proper then, I suppose they are proper now; it becomes proper to point out that there is a serious danger to this country from the attitude which is taken by hon. gentlemen opposite with reference to this painful business. The hon, gentleman observed that although Sir Hugh Allan's contract was good, this was far better. I deny it. The Allan contract was for half the money, and although it was for a much larger acreage of land, it was for an acreage of land given at a time when that land was infinitely less valuable than the smaller acreage now is. Hon. gentlemen opposite have always talked of 50,000,000 acres being equal in value, acre for acre, to 25,000,000 acres. But after the statement of the leader of the Government last night, that 25,000,000 acres along the line of railway would be worth more than 25,000,000 further away, I suppose hon gentlemen will not longer argue that the outer 25,000, that there must be a relaxation of those terms, that we Mr. BLAKE.

000 acres is equal in value to the inner 25,000,000 acres But irrespective of that, the questions of ease of construction, of time, of the condition of the country, of knowledge of the country, of immigration, and all the consideration to which we have adverted in this discussion, are potent factors in determining of Low much less value any particular parcel of land was in 1871, 1872, or 1873, than it is to-day, At that time there was more work to do, and railway work was more e pensive. At that time hor, gentlemen had more expanded ideas on the subject than they have now. They rettled that the terminus should be at Esquimalt; they were going to build the railway across the Narrows, and in that way reach Victoria. That was their plan. An Order in Council is on record showing the hon, gentleman's wisdom and far-sighted views. The hon. Minister of Public Works defended that policy; but we do not hear him today telling us what a splendid harbor is to be found at Esquimalt. We have heard a good deal of discussion about the impropriety of abandoning the Island Railway-

Mr. BUNSTER. No.

Mr. BLAKE. I am taking the hon. gontleman's part. I am pointing out to his friends that they are abandoning his cause. I have been accused of destroying that railway very unjustly, though all I did was to record a vote with the minority, along with many hon, gentlemen opposite against it.

Mr. LUNSTER Your advice has always been to abandon British Columbia altogether.

Mr. BLAKE. I deny that. What I said was that, if the Province of British Columbia insisted upon the bargain as to railway construction being fulfilled according to its terms, which I believed was impossible without ruin to this country, and if, so insisting, they demanded as an alternative to be released from union with us, I would say let thom go, and I say so again.

Mr. BUNSTER. Well, you have just repeated it.

Mr. BLAKE. I never said I wanted them to go. I only said I wanted them to be reasonable, and I am sure, if they were all like my hon, and amiable friend from Vancouver (Mr. Bunster), we should not hear so much of this tall talk as we hear from that quarter. Those vast ideas that prevailed in 1871, 1872 and 1873, beginning with the rash and reckless, mad and insane bargain, to commence this railroad in two years and to finish it in ten; going on with the determination that Esquimalt should be the terminus, before they had a survey made at all; going on to let a contract before they had any knowledge whatever; have ended in this rash and reckless, and improvident bargain which is an appropriate remedy for the difficulties in which the Conservative party have been involved since their original falt, in the shifting plans which for original falt, in the shifting plans which for three Sessions they have been presenting to accomplish this work. The hon. First Minister says that the Government of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), acknowledged that the obligation with British Columbia could not, without national disgrace, be postponed, and with curious inconsistency, at another portion of his speech, declares that the resolution which we passed, and which declared our determination that the work should be so accomplished as not to increase the rate of taxation, was no infringement of the bargain with British Columbia, since it was assented to by its delegates here present, reported by them to the Legislature at home, met with no dissent, and must be taken as part of the bargain. If so, how could there be national disgrace or dishonor in precoolings according to the 'terms' of that resolution? hon friend from Lambton, in his address to his electors, previous to the election of 1874, stated that it was impossible to proceed according to the terms of that bargain, could proceed no faster than the resources of the country would allow, and that British Columbia must be communicated with so to arrange in what manner that could be done. British Columbia was, to my mind, wholly unreasonable. She declined, in effect, to treat, and an arrangement better than which was subsequently discussed might have been then accomplished had she assumed a different attitude. But she stuck to the letter of the bargain, insisted on the pound of flesh, was determined that there should be a commencement within two years, protested because there was not a commencement within two years, and a vigorous prosecution of the work at that. That was the attitude British Columbia assumed, and to which is largely due the small progress which has been made in the accomplishment of her desires. The hon, gentleman must remember that both parties in this Parliament, in 1874, adopted a resolution, and placed it on the Statute book as part of the Supply Bill, declaring the agreed policy of all parties, with but ten dissentients, that the work should be prosecuted only in such a manner as would not involve an increase in the then existing rates of taxation. Well, that was the policy on which the elections were run—the policy of both parties. No man was found to raise his voice and say that any arrangement should be made which should violate that proposition, which commanded practically the unanimous assent of this House. The Government of the hon, member for Lambton advertised for tenders in 1876 and 1878. That advertisement was expressly under the conditions of the Canadian Pacific Railway Act; and, if I rightly remember, my hon. friends in this House repeatedly stated that the contractors were to take on account of their cash subsidy, at their cost, the works under construction. The Government was not to go forward in building, but was to hand over existing contracts to the contractors who were to take over the works at cost, and that was to be so much on account of the $10,000 per mile cash subsidy under that Act. As the hon, gentleman has stated, no success resulted from those advertisements for tenders.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Hear, hear.

Mr. BLAKE. That is quite correct; they failed of success. The hon, gentleman has said there were certain reasons, some or all of which might have conduced to that result. He pointed out some which, no doubt, had to do with it. First of all the money market was very different from what it has been lately. We were in a period of very great depression. The United States bad, during several previous years, been engaged most extensively, in advance of the real wants of their country, in railway construction. The collapse of the Northern Pacific had occurred and had precipitated a general collapse of credit in that country. That collapse had principally affected railways and railway enterprises, so that it was almost impossible to get European capitalists to look at railways, at any rate in the United States. I do not believe I exaggerate in saying that hundreds of railways in the United States defaulted in the payment of their bonds; scores of them fell into the hands of receivers and were foreclosed, etc. Such was the discredited condition of railway enterprises on this continent. There was a general crisis and depression. There was, therefore, a scarcity of capital available for such enterprises, even if they had not been discredited by the circumstances to which I have alluded; and the North-West was not so much developed or so well known as it has since become. These were three of the circumstances to which the hon. gentleman, more slightly than I, did allude, as closely bearing on the non-success of the tenders at that time. The hon, gentleman was good enough also to suggest that there were other circumstances. He said that the credit of Canada, under a Liberal Government, was, perhaps, not so good as it would have been under that scheme? Was it that the Canadian Pacific Railway a Conservative Government. Well, I am not about to enter. into that question, except for one instant, and for one proof. The credit of Canada was such under the Liberal Government, that in face of those adverse circumstances to which I have alluded, in face of the general discredit of, at any rate American railway securities, in the face of the heavy cloud which the great burden of the Canadian Pacific Railway obligation had cast on this country, my hon, friend beside me, (Sir Richard Cartwright), was able to achieve the placing of our securities at a reduced rate of interest, by issuing four per cent bonds. For the first time in our financial history, he was able to inaugurate that great advance of Canadian credit which was involved in that step.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Hear, hear.

Mr. BLAKE. He was able to place his loan better than any loan had been placed before. And hon, gentlemen opposite who have walked in his footsteps in the fours, and were successful enough to achieve additional profit through the improved condition of the money market, by placing them a little better-

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Hear, hear.

Mr. BLAKE. Will choose to forget the progressive increase of Canadian credit which occurred under the Liberal Government, and will forget they are walking in the footsteps of my hon friend from Centre Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright) when they go on placing the fours which he gave them the opportunity of placing, by initiating that transaction on the Exchange.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Hear, hear.

Mr. BLAKE This Government found themselves in this position: that advertisements for the construction of the Pacific Railway, under the Act of 1874, had been issued and had failed of success. They determined on a new policy. They did not propose to continue those advertisements; they did not propose to continue to invite tenders under that Act. But they determined to ask Parliament to agree to a fresh policy. What policy was that? It was the policy brought down the Session of 1879, in the shape of resolutions to which Parliament by a great majority assented, the gist and essence of which resolutions were that Imperial aid of a substantial character should be sought in order to the accomplishment of this great enterprise. At long and at last, hon, gentlemen confessed that the burden was too heavy for the back. At last they decided that it was an Imperial enterprise, in a large measure, and that the Imperial Government should be called upon to bear their share of the burden, and they proposed to us that they should be authorized to ask forand they said they had no doubt they could obtain—that Imperial aid. Well, I need hardly say that plan, had it resulted in a grant—I do not say in a guarantee—but in a grant, in the production of substantial Imperial aid, would have been introduced a wholly new factor into the problem of constructing the Canadian Pacific Railway. The proposal of the hon. gentlemen was significant and important. They went with great éclat. From time to time we were told great results were to follow. We were told, when they returned, that great results had followed. I remember the o gan of the Tory party announcing that in due time they would be revealed. But, we never got any reports of the proceedings of these hon. gentlemen, never a scrap of paper which showed what they had done in England; and it turned out in the end that, at any rate, so far as the obtaining of substantial Imperial aid was concerned, their mission had been a failure. Hon, gentlemen were then face to face with the problem afresh, and last Session, some eight or nine months ago, they once more brought down a scheme for solving it. What was

Act of 1874 should be utilized, to let to a company; that advertisements should be issued for tenders, that a private contractor should be called on to build the road? Not at all. That scheme was that it should be constructed as a Government work, leaving out for the present the eastern link. This was declared to be, in their opinion, the true policy. It was justified by the proposition that the conditions had wholly changed, and that now the most proper and profitable thing to do was to proceed with the construction of this as a Government work. Was it that they said it would be difficult to obtain its construction by a company? Not so. They declared that if they now issued advertisements, the response would be satisfactory and immediate; but although that was their opinion, they were determined to proceed with the construction as a Government work. show the hon. gentleman that I am speaking by the book, I will read from the speech of the hon. Minister of Railways in laying the policy of the Government before the House last Session:

"Hon gentlemen must not forget, as I said before, that the whole aspect of affairs in this country has entirely changed within a brief period; that that which would have been pr-perly regarded as highly imaginative in relation to the development of the Canadian North-West, must now be looked upon with very different eyes indeed. My hon. predecessor need only recall to his mind the fact that he publicly advertised, in 1876, offering $10,000 a mile and 20,000 acres of land for the construction of the road, and asking how much more capital tenderers would require four per cent. upon for twenty-five years to induce them to undertake this work. And what was the response? Not a tender. So completely had the hon. gent emen opposite succeeded in imbuing the minds of capitalists in this country and abroad with the hopelessness of this enterprise, that not one of them would undertake it as a commercial enterprise."

Then he proceeds with the statement of an offer he had at that time:

"Supposing the Government were to tut an advertisment like that in the papers asking on what terms capitalists would come forward and conthe papers asking on what terms capitalists would come forward and construct the road from Red River to Kamloops, and repay us all the expenditure we have made beyond Red River, and undertake to maintain and operate not only all that part of that road, but the rest of the road down to Yale or Burrard Inlet? Would there be no response? If such a proposal were made to-morrow, does he not know that the first capitalists of this country would come to the front and offer to construct and operate that road on terms that would forever settle the question as to whether this mediatelying rould be a swinner bring the country. that road on terms that would forever settle the question as to whether this undertaking would be a serious burden on the people of this country. I have good reason to state that such an offer as that would secure the construction and operate of the whole line from Red River to Kamloops, with the operation and maintenance of all the road to the Pacific, at a cost not exceeding $13,000 or $10,000 per mile from Red River to Kamloops, and 26 000,000 acres of land. In that case, we would be in this position as the hon. gentleman would see, that the whole expenditure of an unknown quantity, proving a burden that could not be calculated, would be entirely removed, and we would be in a position of having this great national work accomplished within ten years, and on terms that would involve comparatively light expenditure from the people of this country, and that would be a thousand times recouped from the development of the North-West."

Being so persuaded, he said, "I will not advertise for tenders —I will not give the opportunity—I will proceed myself to construct this as a Government work." That then was the declared, defined policy of the Government last Session. Now they ask their followers to agree to these views. I dissented from them are did now benefits. to these views. I dissented from them, as did my hon. friends. We did not believe that it was prudent for the Government to proceed at that time with the work in British Columbia. We did not offer any dissent, and, on the contrary, we heartily consented to the completion of the road from Thunder Bay to Selkirk, and to proceeding with the road into the prairie region. But we said we ought to confine ourselves to that and to getting people into the country, and that when we had developed the country, and given it a backbone, the middle would sustain the rest of the scheme, and that it would be time enough to deal with such questions as the ends of the railway on the attainment of such results. Then there was no issue raised by parties last Session as to the construction by the Government of the prarie part of the road. The only issue was whether the Government should go on with the British Columbia section. adhesion of their followers, did avow that they should go on construct, for the benefit of the contractors, sections of the Mr, BLAKE, with it as a Government work, not merely through the prairies, but also through the most difficult region of all, from Yale to Kamloops in British Columbia. Will hon. gentlemen opposite say that all this time they were perfectly satisfied that it was the wish of every man in Parliament that they should adopt a reverse course. Ministers say that after the Session they proceeded upon their new departure—that they were satisfied they were carrying out the unanimous wish of the people's representative in making an effort to do that through a company which they had persuaded the people's representatives to agree they should do themselves. How did the people's representatives signify their wishes? I dare say they signified their wishes in a caucus room in one way and expressed them in this House in another way. But we can only tell the mode in which they signified their wishes by their votes, and so far as votes or speeches, or public action of any description went, I deny that hon. gentleman opposite had the tangible, visible and moral support of Parliament in proceeding on this new departure after last Session. On the contrary, they had themselves committed Parliament and their supporters to a wholly different proposition. Now I will give my own opinion as to the reason of this post sessional departure: that couse, I believe, was taken by the Administration, and the Premier, with a view of receding from what they considered was a dangerous path; that they learned from day to day after they had taken their line, that they were pursuing a dangerous path. The Minister of Public Works the other day, the First Minister yesterday, and the Minister of Railways on more than one occasion, have admitted that the people of this country were disquieted and alarmed by the policy of the Administration—not by the policy of constructing as they were proposing to construct the prairie road, but by the policy of constructing they were proposing to construct the western end by the policy of expending $10,000,000 on a difficult piece of railway in the middle of British Columbia, on the 127 miles. That was what alarmed hon. gentlemen opposite. Ministers knew they had succeeded in alarming the country, and the alarm in the country reacted upon themselves. They felt that they could not pursue their policy without bringing upon themselves ruin and destruction as a party, and they therefore determined to retrace their steps and revert to some other mode of constructing the Pacific Railway; but I wholly deny they had obtained the authority of Parliament, in any way, for the new departure. But they determined to do a great deal more than was required, as I think, and as the Speech from the Throne puts it, by a recurrence to the old proposal that the work should be let to a company. What the proposal should be, it is not now necessary to discuss in the abstract. What we have got to discuss is the proposal to let the work on the conditions before us. Ministers determined or found after they had commenced that they must change their policy, and were obliged to let the work on wholly new, hitherto unheard of and undreamt of conditions. I hold, first of all, that if there be new conditions there was no authority from Parliament to make them. The very suggestion that they are new, shows you that Parliament did not agree to them. Second, they determined to let it without inviting tenders, and for this there was not merely no authority from Parliament, but Parliament had expressly said that no contract for the construction of any section of the railway should be let without obtaining tenders; and therefore they were not merely going without the authority but flying in the face of Parliament when they proceeded to let without inviting tenders. I have said they determined upon wholly new conditions, and I proceed to point out to the House what those new conditions were. By the Act of Parliament no power whatever But the Government, by a large majority, secure of the is given to the Government to agree with the contractors to work which are to be handed over to them. That proposition I by down unhestatingly. By the contract now before us the Government binds itself to complete the unfinished sections—to begin and finish the heaviest sections now unlet, and to hand over to the contractors the whole works, comprising more than 700 miles of completed railway, including the Pembina Branch, with a net earning of nearly $70,000 a year, to the contractors for their own benefit. I maintain there is in this particular an entire departure from and reversal of the authority of the Act of Parliament. By the Act, the cash expenditure of the Government, as principal money to be paid to the contractors, was to be $10,000 a mile, or about $27,000,000 for the whole line, apart from the cost of surveys, which might or might not be made part of the amount. By the contract, the cash expenditure as principal money, of which the contractors are to receive the benefit, is at least in cash and works, $53,000,000, apart from the cost of surveys, which are not to form part of the amount. So that the cash expenditure of the Government by the contract as principal money is to be about double the cash expenditure of the Government as principal under the Act of Parliament. By the Act the land grant was to be taken, so far as obtainable, along or in the immediate vicinity of the whole line to the Pacific Ocean, and it was to be of fair average quality, thus embracing a large proportion of land not fit for settlement. I will not enter into the discussion-for it is entirely unnecessary for this purpose -whether you are to embrace the land between Lake Nipissing and the Ontario boundary, wherever that may be. It suffices to establish my proposition, that from the Ontario boundary to the Pacific Ocean, in the tract of country through which the railway is to pass, and from which the lands not merely were to be taken, but could be taken, according to the report of Mr. Marcus Smith, published in the Engineer's report of 1880, the 605 miles from Pembina River to Burrard Inlet, containing 515 miles unfit for settlement, and but 90 odd miles fit for settlement; and, if you add to this the most moderate allowance possible, say 200 miles from the boundary of Ontario to the Pembina River, including the water stretches, and the unfertile parts, you get over 700 miles out of some 1,500 or 1,600 in which the land along the line of the railway lands grantable by the Dominion Government unfit for settlement. The hon, gentleman opposite says the true way to strike an average under those circumstances is, first of all, to leave out all the bad land and then take the average of the good. But I do not understand that to be the meaning of average. I understand that an average is ascertained by taking the bad and the good and arriving at the mean. By this contract the land is to be taken, not along the whole line of the railway, not down to the Pacific at all, not from the infertile parts, but in the North-West Territories between Selkirk and Jasper, and it is not to include any land not fairly fit for settlement. Now, if the average of the whole would involve a reduction in quality by virtue of the circumstance that there are large areas of infertile and barren land, it is clear that the exclusion of the infertile and barren land by the new contract, is of itself a difference, so great as to revolutionize this part of the agreement altogether. The Minister of Railways has stated not in this House, but elsewhere, that he takes the two expressions to be equivalent, that he takes lands of fair average quality along the whole line of the railway, to be the same as land which shall not include any unfit for settlement, but I do not believe that the hon. Minister will, by reason, justify that argument in this House; and I do

which he used before to cover the disgrace in which he was involved with reference to the standard of the railway, and press upon the Syndicate to write him another letter, saying that at the time of making the contract, it was supposed that there was no material difference between lands of fair average quality along the whole line of the railway, and lands to be taken in the fertile belt, excluding any not fairly fit for settlement, and that they are willing to take lands of fairly average quality. If the terms mean the same, and the result to the Syndicate be the same, let us have the change of words, and I venture to say that this trifling change of words would be a change which would save millions upon millions to this country. The contract as to the lands also provides that the area of those portions of sections which are covered by lakes or water stretches shall not be counted, and that the Company shall take fresh lands for those covered by water. Mark you, it is not that they are deprived of the land covered by water; it is not that they are to refuse sections which contain large portions covered by water, but they are entitled to the dry land and the wet land, the water privilege and the wharf privilege, the harbor privilege and the water frontage, and everything which arises out of the circumstance of their being proprietors of a section fronting on a lake or river, only they are not to be charged with the lands covered by water, but are to get good dry fertile land elsewhere to an equivalent area. That is not contemplated by or provided for in the Canadian Pacitic Railway Act. By the Act the land which is not to be found near the railway is to be appropriated at other places to be determined by the Government; by the contract the contractors are given very large powers of selection. It is provided that they may select the place anywhere in the fertile belt or elsewhere. And if they lay out a branch line of railway which they can lay out as they please—and lay it out as all they need do—then alternate sections fronting on a projected branch line, not upon a built branch line, are to be appropriated by and to belong to them. Their title does not depend on their completing a branch line, but only on their completing sections of the main; and they take the land as they complete sections of the main. So the only branch railway they have to build in order to secure branch sections is a railway projected on a piece of cartridge paper and fyled in the office of the Secretary of State. And even if they do not lay out such a branch railway they can still select the places where to take the lands, and in that case the front line, as between them and the Government, is to be a matter of selection and agreement. The vital point is where the land shall be taken, and that is the Company's right; the minor point is where shall the front line be chalked out, and that is arranged between the Company and the Government. By consent of the Government, they may take whole blocks and areas of land not in alternate sections to meet the deficiency, anywhere in the North-West Territory. These are some of the changes which exist between this contract and the Canadian Pacific Railway Act. By the Act Government was to have control of the sales of two-thirds of the land grant; by the contract, the contractors obtain the lands, and the Government has no control, whatever, over those sales. By the Act, the subsidy and the land grant are to be payable in proportion to the value of the work done, as compared with the estimated value of the whole work contracted for; so that the Government, estimating that the whole work would cost $80,000,000, would give land and money just in proportion to the part of $80,000,000 represented by the work done. By the contract, the subsidy and the land grant are to be payable in amounts wholly disproportionate on the prairie not believe, if he attempts his justification, that he will find section, which is the easiest and most profitable to be any supporters in that view. But if it be so, if it be that these constructed, and which is intended to be first conterms are equivalent. I hope that he will use the influence structed. I do not suppose I need enlarge on this point. I could not do justice to it as the hon. First Minister did last evening. You heard him; he was discussing a proposition that went $10,000,000 better on this point, which proposed to take $10,000,000 less in cash and land than the Government proposed to give for the prairie section. He pointed out that that comparatively moderate proposition would give enormous profits, as he said, on the prairie section. He went into the figures; he showed you that at $1 an acre the amount of money would give millions upon millions of profit; that at $2 an acre the profit was trebled; that at $3 an acre the profit was quadrupled. This was his position. He pointed out the disproportion of the figures, and he showed you, too, a demonstr tion that there is here a serious departure from the provisions of the Canadian Pacific Railway Act, under which, and according to which, the Government could have given land and money only in proportion of the cost of the prairie section as compared with the cost of the rest of the work. The hon. gentleman declared that this was defensible, because he wanted to encourage the contractors. He thought it would encourage them, and I rather think he was right. I think it was a very great encouragement. The Minister thought it would encourage them, not merely to give them enough money to build the whole line, not merely to give them enough hard cash to do everything that is wanted to be done on the prairie; not merely, as the hon member for Westmoreland (Sir Albert J. Smith), demonstrated the other day, to build the first 100 miles for them, then to allow them to take it over and to say: "Now, we will pay you the cost of this; what is your bill? $800,000 is our bill! Here is the cheque for that amount, now you will please in exchange give us a cheque for a million, because we are to have $10,000 a mile on that section, and therefore we are entitled to have a million for your having built it. So we exchange, and upon that part of the transaction the contractors are to put $200,000 coolly into their pockets, and then they are to perhaps obtain 1,250,000 acres of land more because the Government has built 100 miles of railway which the contractors are immediately to own and work, and which is to return a revenue from the very hour they begin to work it. I need hardly say that a very considerable basis of credit is given by this transaction. What is the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Schultz) doing for his railway? Why, he has bought some 130,000 acres of land from the Government, and is to pay them $1 an acre for it, and upon that basis of credit he is building a railway 300 miles long; while these people are to get ready built a paying railway of 100 miles, perhaps $200,000 in cash, 1,250,000 acres of land, and then, as they go on, they are to get $10,000 a mile and 12,500 acres a mile as they go. I do agree with the hon, gentleman that it is a great encouragement. Well, Sir, if the proposition which is laid upon the Table is, as to the prairie section, indefensible and monstrous, and offers prodigious and inordinate profits to the contractors, what is the proposition which is $10,000 000 worse? I am, however, at present concerned only to point out to you that these conditions in this particular are obviously not merely beyond, but contrary to the conditions of the Canadian Pacific Railway Act. Now, the hon gentleman said in this connection—I will refer to it though it is a little out of the line of my argument—that he trusted to the honor of the Syndicate. I have known the time when the hon, gentlemen had not so much confidence in their honor. That has been referred to before, it is good to refer to it again, when the hon, gentleman makes an argument of it. Why, I remember when he turned George Stephen out of the Harbor Commission of Montreal, and said he was not fit to attend to the harbor work of that city. But, now he says he is just the man to take control of the interests of this domain. I remember the time when he and the hon. the Minister of Railways gave a character to the wealthiest man and the most Mr. BLAKE.

influential man on this Syndicate, in fact though not in name, then an hon, member of this House, wholly inconsistent with the character he now gives him. But these appeals to reliance upon the personal honor of men are wholly out of the question, because these gentlemen expressly stipulate in this contract that they shall not be personally engaged. The only personal engagement is this single one, that they will undertake, after the Company is organized, that the Company shall deposit a million dollars for security. That is the sole personal undertaking they make. The next minute after the organization and the deposit of the million dollars, there is an end to all personal obligation. They may depart with every shilling of interest in this concern, without loss of honor. We give them leave to do so. We do not restrain them in any way. There is nothing to prevent Mr. Stephen or Mr. Smith or anybody else, from selling out to New York capitalists, the day after the Act passes, every shilling of interest in this concern. The Canada Southern Railway passes through Ontario, but, do you know where it is owned? It is owned in Belgium, to-day. It is controlled from Belgium, and the great majority of the stock of the Canada Southern Railway is owned in Belgium. American railway securities are finding their way into every market, and the mode of action which is being adopted by large syndicates of capitalists is to obtain control of a railway by investing in its securities. That is the principle of action in the United States and in Europe just now, and it is competent to, and would not be in the least dishonorable on the part of these gentlemen, to depart with the contract the moment after you have given it to them, and sell their shares and stock to whoever they please. Therefore, there is no question of personal honor, there is no question of personal or financial ability, there is no question of the capacity of the Company, whose corporators two months hence you may have no idea of now at all. That is not all. Under the Act the capital stock of the Company and all its property remain liable for Dominion, provincial and municipal taxation. There is nothing to exempt them. Government have no power to exempt them. Government could make no binding contract that they should be exempt. Under the authority which Parliament gave, and which is on the Statute book, no contract could be made that would exempt their property from taxation. By the contract all that property, their station houses, their harbors, their elevators, telegraphelines, road-bed, rails, rolling stock, the equipment and all their property and capital stock are wholly free forever from Dominion taxation, from taxation in new provinces, and from taxation by municipalities in new provinces. Hon. gentlemen will observe that here is an important departure from the Canadian Pacific Railway Act, a departure of great consequence, upon which it will be my duty, and the duty of others, further to enlarge at a later stage. While under the Act the land grant of the Company would remain subject to taxation, under the contract that grant is exempt from taxation of all kinds until used or occupied for twenty years from the date of the grant. That also is an exemption of great value to the Company, of enormous value to the Company; an exemption which, added to the right of selection, makes the land grant a wholly different thing from a land grant subject to taxation. A land grant subject to taxation, in a country like that, is as different from a land grant not subject to taxation as a fertile field is different from a rugged hill. There is an annual burden increasing as the country grows and prospers, of the most serious character, upon all the lands which are subject to the common burden, and this makes the contract altogether different, and makes the value of the Company's possession enormously greater, besides which we have to consider its injurious effects upon the development of the country and upon the prosperity of the adjoining settlers. Under the Act all the materials required by the contractors is to be subject to import duties; there is nothing in the Cauadian Pacific Railway Act to say that the imports the contractors require should be free of duty; but under the contract a large part of these materials are exempted from import duties. I will point out later on what that exemption, so far as one can guess it, really is. I will prove that it is very much more material than hon, gentlemen opposite seem to suppose Under the Act, Canada or any new provinces are not hindered in any way from constructing other railways as the people may, from time so time, require them. There is nothing in the Canadian Pacific Railway Act saying that the Company shall be permitted and that other people shall not be permitted, to construct railways. But in the contract it is stipulated and agreed that this Parliament and new Provinces shall not for twenty years be allowed to construct any railways in certain directions or to the boundary, which may be supposed to interfere to some extent with the Canadian Pacific Railway. By the Act the Government has unrestricted power to regulate from time to time the tariff of tolls; but by the contract the power of the Government to fix a tariff is limited to the case in which the railway company is receiving a net profit of ten per cent. on all the capital, from whatever source derived, invested in the construction of the Under the Act the Government would have power to prescribe from time to time the accommodation and the trains to be provided by the Company, but by the contract no such power is reserved to the Government, and there is no regulating power in those regards at all. Under the Act the Government would have power to acquire the railway at any time that the public interest might demand; by the contract the Government is given no such power. Under the Act, the grades of the railway, the materials, the manner of construction, and the mode of working, including the construction and capacity of the rolling stock, were to be such as might be determined by the Government in Council, and it was as we all know, formerly the declared policy of the Government and Parliament that the grades should be very low. By the contract, however, the Union Pacific Railway as at first constructed, is fixed as the approximate standard, and it is well known that the grades of that railway are very high. By the Act no power is given to the Company to build branch railways, except one to the Georgian Bay and one to Pombina; by the contract power is given to the Company forever to build branch railways in various parts of the Dominion, and by the contract many other important privileges and powers are given to the Company, which I shall not now recapitulate, but which privileges and powers are not at all authorized by the Canadian Pacific Railway Act. Now, Sir, I think I have proved to you with some degree of fulness and clearness that this contract cannot be said to be one authorized by the Canadian Pacific Railway Act of 1874. I defy any hon, gentleman to rise here and argue seriously that this contract, such as it is, is authorized by that Act. On the contrary, I maintain that the conditions to which I have referred, and which are, some of them, not contained in, and some of them expressly contradicted by, the Canadian Pacific Railway Act, are conditions wholly novel, unheard of and undreamt of, until the 10th of December, when this contract was laid on the Table of this House. Had the Government invited tenders for the construction of this railway on the basis of the Canadian Pacific Railway Act of 1874, and failed of receiving them, and then proceeded to make this bargain, they could not have justified themselves by that invitation at all, because you must have invited tenders on some general basis, like that on which you proposed to make your bargain. I deny that you have authority to make a private bargain until after tenders have the general terms on which you propose to deal. You must give the public the opportunity of knowing that you are willing to accept tenders on wholly different terms; you must say, "Gentlemen, we invite you to tender for the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway; we do not hold ourselves bound by the Act of Parliament, or by its price. Tell us how much land and how much money you want, what works you would like us to construct, what privileges, what exemptions you want, what restrictions, what alterations in the Act of Parliament you want." It must be a sort of go-as-you-please tender. So far from there being such an invitation, there was no invitation whatever, except indeed the invitation which the hon. First Minister says he gave at a religious pic-nic at Bath, on the 29th of June; and he rather sneered at me when I asked if that was a notice, saying that I was taking a legal view of it. He admitted that it was not a legal notice, but he said, notice is notice among men of sense. Well, let it be so. What did the hon, gentleman do at the picnic? He said—and as if he thought people did not believe his own words, for which I think he had no ground, he called on the Finance Minister beside him, to corroborate him—that the Government—I speak from memory—had two offers for the construction and working of the railway. Capitalists, he said, of undoubted standing and ability have come to us, and want us to allow them to build this railway, and make fortunes out of it. The Government is considering these offers, and you may relieve yourselves from any anxiety that this road is going to cost the country a cent of money. Was that a notice to the rest of the world that tenders were being invited from the rest of the world for the construction of the Pacific Railway on any terms that the rest of the world pleased to offer? Was it a notice that the Government was prepared to arrogate to itself authority to set aside every one of those essential principles of the Canadian Pacific Railway Act, and to make a bargain wholly dissimilar from, and contrary to, those principles? Am I taking a legal, a technical, usi prius point when I say that no capitalists other than these favored men with whom the Government are dealing, can be supposed or expected to offer for this work on such an invitation as the hon, gentleman gave at this religious picnic? I was really surprised to hear the First Minister of this country, himself a distinguished statesman, at the head of a very large majority of too faithful followers, I was surprised to see him in such straits, driver so hard that he was obliged to justify his course as First Minister of this country, by arguing that because at a picnic he had said he had got offers from two sets of capitalists, he was really inviting the public to come forward and tender on the conditions now upon the Table. The hon, gentleman said that no one then complained of want of authority. Why, we did not know what the hon, gentleman was doing. He took good care then, he took good care since, he has taken good care new, not to let us know what he Where are there tenders? Where was doing. Where is this are these offers? correspondence? On what conditions were these offers? On what conditions was the Government bargain made in England? We do not know it now; the eapitalists of the world do not know it now. And yet the hon, gentleman tells us that we did not complain that he was violating the authority of the Act. It was not until he put that paper on the Table that we knew how far he had violated the authority of the Act of Parliament. However exacting our duty to be vigilant may be, it cannot bind us to warn against errors that we do not know have been committed, to complain of improprieties whose existence we are not aware of. The hon. whose existence we are not aware of. gentleman contends that he might have contracted under the advertisement of 1878. Now, I will read you been obtained, and you must obtain them on the general under the advertisement of 1878. Now, I will read you basis of your bargain. To do that you must communicate that advertisement, under which the hon gentleman says he might have let this contract which is now on the Table. That advertisement reads as follows: -

"The Government of Canada will receive proposals for constructing and working a line of railway extending from the Province of Ontario to the waters of the Pacific Ocean, the distance being about 2,000

"Memorandum of information for parties proposing to tender will be forwarded on application as underneath. Engineers' Reports, maps of the country to be traversed, profiles of the surveyed line, specifications of preliminary works, copies of the Act of the Parliament of Canada under which it is proposed the railway is to be constructed, descriptions of the natural features of the country and its agricultural and mineral resources, and other information, may be seen on application at this Department, or to the Engineer-in-Chief at the Canadian Government Offices, 31 Que.n Victoria street, E. C., London."

Well, if I have proved to you that this contract could not be made under the Canadian Pacific Railway Act, I have proved to you that it could not be let under the authority of that advertisement. I am sure, interested as we always are in all the hon, gentleman's speeches, excited by curiosity as we are always when we see that he is going to address the people, hanging, as we make up our minds to hang, upon his utterances, we will, for the future, regard them with double interest and excitement, because we do not know what advertisement may be contained in them, we do not know but that we may be getting notice of something or other in some ambiguous terms at any moment when he makes a speech at a picnic. After having given this notice to Canadian capitalists, that tenders were about to be invited on the conditions now upon the Table for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and, therefore, expecting as the hon. gentleman did, no doubt, from the speech of the hon, the Minister of Railways, that on an advertisement of that kind being issued tenders would flow in abundance, he did not wait; he went to England to let the contract there. So far as I know, the trio that went to England on that occasion did not there invite tenders, but there, as well as here, conducted everything in secrecy. They engaged in private negotiations, in diplomatic feats, but, as the hon. himself said the other day, very nearly ended in failure. Well, now, was this asking for tenders? Was this letting the contract under the terms of the Canadian Pacific Railway Act after tenders have been obtained therefor? And was the public at large fairly alive to the view that there a railway contract was to be let on the terms and conditions laid on the Table, because of those mysterious and secret proceedings? Well, they returned. Extraordinary to say, notwithstanding that formal notice that the hon. Minister had given at Bath, notwithstanding his immediately running away to England so as to be ready to receive tenders, he did not receive tenders for the construction of the railway on these terms from Canadian capitalists; and moment they came back they announced no day of grace—they did not tell us they were surprised or disappointed that the Canadian capitalists did not come forward and ask once more-but they told us before their arrival, and more elaborately in that speech at Hochelaga, that a "contract firm" had been made. Well, if the contract firm was made in England-though my belief is that the contract was made by these gentlemen in England cabling to Mr. George Stephen on this side—and closed before these gentlemen came out, I need hardly say that after that period at which they announced the contract was closed, there was no opportunity Canadian capitalists to tender. But, even then, although the matter was said to be ended-we do not know how it was in fact, because publicity is not allowed in this matter, and we have not been permitted to see what the contract was that was made in England; we do not know how much of this extraordinary bargain was made on this side of the water, and how much is to be found in the language of the document—the negotiations went on as to what are called minor details for several weeks, and cendent importance; let us do everything and press Mr. BLAKE.

on the twenty-first October the document was finally signed and sealed by the hon. Minister of Railways. Even then secrecy was observed. Although the whole thing was concluded, although that opportunity for the public to tender, which these hon, gentlemen seemed to have apprehended, would have been taken advantage of, if they made the conditions public, had now passed, although they had made the bargain, although they had signed, sealed and delivered it, still there was secrecy observed. It must not be made known. We will wait a little and let out just as much as will induce the country to believe the best possible bargain was made. We will tell them we have arranged for the building of the railway for $25,000,00 and 25,000,000 acres of land. Do not let us say anything about where the acres are to be obtained, how they are to be selected, the quality of the acres, the non-taxation of the acres, the non-taxation of the company, the monopoly created by the fettering of the country as to new railways; nothing must be said about all those other things; and above and beyond all, for any sake, do not let us say that the Government, announcing that it has got a Company to construct the Canadian Pacific Railway, is making a further bargain itself to build the most difficult unlet section of that work for the benefit of the contractors. Let us announce first so much as shall mi-lead and delude the people into a false frame of mind with reference to the thing we have done. Let us keep the rest carefully dark. Let us not even announce that Parliament is going to meet early until the latest possible moment. Let us convene Parliament a fortnight before the time for adjourning at Christmas for the holidays and bring down the statement that it is of the utmost importance the railway contract should be let at once, and propose to Parliament to sit de die in diem and close the bargain by the 23rd December. Let us disregard the statements made at Hochelaga, that the contractors were prepared to go on entirely irrespective of the time when Parliament should sit; let us wholly disregard that statement made before the Session; let us, when an adjournment is proposed for a day, say at once," no, no,the contractors want to get out the ties, which they cannot get out till this contract is let," although the First Minister had pledged his word that they would go on immediately, even if Parliament did not begin its sittings till February, with that work. Let us forget all that, and put every pressure upon members of this House and lacerate their domestic affections even, if only by any means we can delay to the latest possible moment to divulge - what shall I call it?-yes, I shall call it our plot-then let us do everything in our power to secure the consummation of this plot before the country at large can speak, or anybody else can make any proposal which shall put in a different light the bargain we are supporting We shall be bound to acknowledge, no doubt, that the conditions of this bargain are onerous, but representing that 50,000,000 acres, of which a large portion is remote, is worth as much acre per acre as what is nearthat land was worth as much acre per acre in the North-West five years ago as to-day—that average land is worth as much as selected land—representing that $55,000,000 or $60,000,000 is not more to-day than $30,000,000 was then, we may be able to befool the people into the belief that this contract, with all its privileges, pre-emptions and monopolies, is better than any previous proposal; but let us for any sake guard against the possibility of its being brought into dreadful contrast with any other proposal on this subject. Let us expedite matters; let us ask His Excellency to say that the public interest requires the immediate completion of the road; let us tell those who propose serious and deliberate discussion that they are factious and obstructive; let us threaten them with a dead look, and say we shall depart from the usual course of Parliament, and refuse the periods for consideration, deliberation and discussion which Parliament usually gives on a question of this trans-everything we can in order that this scheme may be got through with before any contrast can be made between it and what capitalists may do, if we but let them have an opportunity-I ask you and every hon. member who saw this Syndicate contract on the morning of the 11th of December last, whether he was not thunderstruck at the conditions which, until that time had been concealedwhether the circumstance that the Government was to build the road from Yale to Port Moody did not take away his breath—whether the circumstance that there were those monopolies, privileges, exemptions did not astonish himwhether the circumstance that the contract was so diametrically opposed to the Canadian Pacific Act, 1874, which was the only authority the Government could look to, did not strike him with surprise—whether he did not feel aghast at the prospect before him and the country? If that view existed as to the distribution of the subsidies and all the other points of the scheme, I ask you how is it possible to contend, as until this moment hon. gentlemen have chosen to contend, that there was a fair opportunity given other capitalists before this tender was laid on the Table—to contend that no men could be found to form a company, and that therefore the Government was justified in letting the work without competition. The First Minister acknowledges that Parliament is free to decide on this question. He says, contrary in my opinion, to the constitution and the law of the country, that he could have let this contract in a way that could have bound us without our consent. I know he is a strong Minister, but not strong enough for that. The law and the constitution do not permit it; but the hon. gentleman was kind and gracious enough to add that he thought it his duty to obtain the consent of Parliament to so important a transaction. So he has kindly given the people of Canada the opportunity, through their representatives, of deciding whether they will consent to this contract: I hope he will not make that opportunity a merely nominal one, and that the consent ot those representatives will be a free consent; that he will not tell hon, gentlemen, as I suppose he has told them elsewhere as well as last evening, that they are quite free to act, but that they must act in one way; that they are quite free to decide, but must say "yes." I hope it will not be said that the Parliament of Canada is called to decide in this matter just as the Ministry decided before Parliament came together; else Parliament might as well not have been called, and Ministers might as well have been entrusted with the decision. But since Parliament never gave the Government authority to bind us-since that is acknowledged, and they have submitted the question for our decision—I trust that in this, the most vital, transcendent question that ever engaged our attention, the decision of Parliament will be a free decision, not obtained by the authority of a porty leader or the crack of the party whip.

Mr. WHITE (East Hastings). They have only a majority of seventy.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Yes; ninety.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon member for East Hastings says they have only a majority of seventy. I thought it was more. Another hon gentleman says it is more than seventy. Well, all I can tell him is, that if there is a majority of seventy or more for this contract, to-morrow or next day, there will, I believe, be a majority of many hundreds or thousands against it, as soon as we have the next general elections.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. That is what you said in 1878.

Mr. BLAKE. I did not say it in 1878.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Then your friends said it for you.

Mr. RLAKE. I did not say it, however. I assert, and the House will recollect, that the country was wholly surprised on the morning of the 11th of December, when it found what were the conditions of this contract; and, within five weeks of that day, a proposal has been handed to the Government, and is now upon the Table, based very largely, too largely in my opinion, upon those conditions, but com-pared with the first contract, infinitely preferable. The persons who have made that proposal are men of the highest standing in this community for wealth, for credit, for business ability and knowledge of railway construction and management. They comprise in themselves the most successful men, taken all together, that we know of. The combination is the strongest combination, as I said the other day that been ever witnessed of Canadian capitalists. To that combination names are being added every day. I received a few minutes ago a telegram from one of the new Syndicate who informs me that Messrs. E. and C. Gurney, of Hamilton, gentlemen well known here and every-where, strong supporters of hon. gentlemen opposite, men of active business ability, who have made fortunes for themselves, and are worth certainly much more than a million, have requested this day to be added to the new company. I have no doubt that in the course of the next few days many similar applications will be made from various parties, by those who believe that the old bargain is so desperately bad and involves such enormous and extravagant profits, that the new one, comparatively moderate as it is, contains within itself the elements of a large future. men who have made this proposal, are men who do not owe such money as they had to one lucky speculation. They are men whose commercial position and present wealth are the result of a long course of honorable toil and of long and well tried business ability and experience. These have proved, by more than the outcome of one satisfactory speculation, their capacity successfully to deal with whatever they choose to grapple with; and at this proposal made by such men, men at whom the hon. gentlemen opposite cannot sneer, men whose position and standing in this community is beyond the power of a sneer to affect; they may attempt to sneer at it, but they cannot do it successfully—this proposal, made by business men with such means and capital, is now upon the Table. It is made, as I have said, within five weeks of the time at which any body, except the favored Syndicate, had the opportunity at even guessing at what was the basis of the conditions the Government would propose for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway at all, and the Government took three or four months in negotiations, and they took, after they came out here and said they had made the bargain, six or seven weeks in concluding the details; and yet, they say you ought to have come sooner. They say you should have come almost the moment after you saw our proposal—you should have jumped into the market.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. They ought to have come before they saw the proposal.

Mr. BLAKE. I am quite aware the hon. gentleman and his friends are accustomed to "go it blind," but business men do not go it blind, and business men like to see what the general terms and conditions on which a tender is to be made are before they make an offer. The new offer for the construction of the whole line contains, however, proposals which are objectionable. The objections are those common to both. The new proposal is, notwithstanding, infinitely better than the old one. It may not be the best possible. I do not believe it is the best possible. I believe if fair opportunity were given to the capitalists of this country, there would be a much better offer yet submitted; but if you are to choose between these two, if the anxiety of Parliament and this House to complete this bargain, to take this subject out of the political arena, to relieve themselves from all trouble and try to determine their fate by having this question at once determined is to preclude further competition. I say that as honest men, choosing between one proposal and the other, we cannot, and ought not, to hesitate in our choice. I say the new proposal is infinitely better than the contract on the Table. You say it is too late. The hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) says it is too late, and that they ought to have made a bargain before they saw the conditions.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I said they ought not to have waited until the contract is laid on the Table of the House, and that before that they ought to have considered whether they could have made an offer or not.

Mr. BLAKE. They had the idea that the Pacific Railway was under the Act to be built for $10,000 a mile.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. They had that before them.

Mr. BLAKE. And they assumed that was your bargain. They had not before them the fact that the Government was willing to build the line from Kamloops to Port Moody; and that they were willing to grant these various extraordinary privileges. For one hour I have been pointing out the enormous difference between the Canadian Pacific Railway Act and the basis for this contract, and yet the hon. gentleman says they had the Act before them, when I have shown that the whole basis of letting is wholly different from that Act. The Government did not let the public know before Parliament met what they proposed to do. Why did they not? And the Minister of Railways, who is never at a loss when cornered by an argument, but always states that that makes his position infinitely stronger, said, the other day: "Why, of course, we did not advertise; it would have been the very worst thing possible to have advertised." Allow me, for it is a precious morsel, to correct the hon. gentleman out of his own mouth. The hon gentlemen said:

"What is the condition of things to-day, supposing this Government were to put an advertisement like that in the papers asking on what terms capitalists would come forward and construct the road from Red River to Kamloops, and repay us all the expenditure we have made beyond Red River, and undertake to maintain and operate not only all that part of that road, but the rest of the road down to Yale or Burrard Inlet? Would there be no response? If such a proposal were made to-morrow, does he not know that the first capitalists of this country would come to the front and offer to construct and operate that road on terms that would forever settle the question as to whether this undertaking would be a serious burden on the people of this country."

The hon, gentleman at first thought that by advertising capitalists would be induced to come forward, but he subsequently changed his policy, determined that he would not advertise, and ran away to England to negotiate with foreign, instead of domestic, capitalists, for the construction of this work. Well, the hon, gentlemen say it is too late, but I think it will not be so held by the country. My belief is that it will be held by the country that "it is never too late to mend;" that it is never too late to save many millions of dollars; to save exemptions, concessions, and privileges infinitely more onerous than the many millions you are spending. I can, with confidence, challenge hon, gentlemen opposite to meet their constituents on this question—whether it is too late for this Parliament to choose the better, and wnether it is bound to accept the worse.

AFFER RECESS.

Mr. BLAKE. I heard an hon. gentleman the other evening, with reference to this subject, and, he thought, as applicable to this transaction, quote the old French proverb, "After the marriage of my daughter I found plenty of sons-in-law." But, Sir, I do not think the proverb will apply to this case. Had we, indeed, entrusted the Executive with power to make a binding contract in this matter, had we handed over the fair North-West to the Executive, with power to contract to offer $6,600,000 and 9,000,000 acres as proposed by the offer, it is very much worse to give $9,000,000 and 11,250,000 acres as is proposed in this contract. Well, the her in marriage to any person, however old, ugly Mr. Blake.

might fix, then the proverb might be applicable, and we might not be able to quarrel about the conditions of dowry. But the fair North-West is ours yet. The question whether there shall be a contract or not is free for decision. It is not until we have decided to ratify the contract that it is too late. You say it is too late. Are we, then, as a Parliament, bound to accept the worse instead of the better value? Those who so declare themselves are bound to justify themselves, and they can justify themselves only by declaring that the action of Parliament ought to be, and is in effect, that of a mere machine for registering the decrees of the Executive, and is not a free judgment as to whether this contract is fit to be made legal or not. If this contract is not fit to be made legal we are bound not to make it into a law. If we do not, we are free to see what better we can do, but you must not first determine you will make this law which without your consent is not law, and then say because you have made it into law, it is too late to look ahead and do better if you can. I say this new offer is tangible evidence, real, substantial evidence of the most plain and palpable description, that the contract is not fit to be legalized; and each of us must justify upon that basis the vote he is called upon now to give upon this question. Too late! Too late to save $12,500,000 in money, and in land! Too late to dispose with all those monopolies, those exemptions, those privileges! Let us see for a moment, now, what it is too late for us to do. In the first place, the contract on the Table provides for a cash subsidy of $25,000,000 and 25,000,000 acres of land. For the same work those who submit the offer, propose to accept $22,000,000 and 22,000,000 acres of land. There is thus a saving of $3,000,000 in hard cash, and 3,000,000 of acres, equal, at the Government valuation of $3.18 per acre, to $9,540,000, or a total of $12,540,000. Next the contract provides as a standard the Union Pacific Railway as it was when first constructed. The proposal is to take the Union Pacific as it stood in 1873. Neither of them is good; but the offer is very much better than the contract. The hon. Minister of Railways will say, I have got a letter. I have to say the letter is not worth the paper on which it is written. It is a voluntary statement made without any consideration by three members of the Syndicate, as to what they are willing to do; but they cannot be bound by it. Still less can the incorporated company which is to have the contract be bound by it in any way. But, further, that letter takes the date of February, 1873; and large improvements were made in the construction of the Union Pacific during 1873, and the early part of 1874; and therefore a proposal to take 1873 is much better than to take the road at the very beginning of 1873. Next, the contract provides for giving $9,000,000 and 11,250,000 acres, for the prairie section, 900 miles, while the offer proposes to accept $6,600,000 and 9,000,000 acres for the same work, making a saving on the prairie section of $2,400,000 and 2,250,000 acres, or a total saving, at the same estimate, of $9,550,000 on that part of the work. Now, hon gentlemen opposite may say that the distribution of the subsidy as proposed in this offer is wholly disproportionate to the relative cost of the prairie and of the other parts of the road. I shall have the pleasure for once in my life of agreeing with hon. gentleman. While it is wholly disproportionate, the only observation I have to offer is, that in the offer the sum is not so disproportionate as in the contract. If an inordinate share of profit, as the Minister of Interior observed, is awarded by the offer for the prairie section, a still more inordinate proportion is awarded by the contract; if it is bad to offer $6,600,000 and 9,000,000 acres as proposed by the offer, it is very much worse to give $9,000,000 and 11,250,000 acres as is proposed in this contract. Well, the

the western 450 miles at Kamloops, while the offer proposes $5,400,000 and 6,750,000 acres for the same work, making a saving of $600,000 cash and 750,000 acres, or a total, on the former estimate, of $2,985,000. To that the same observations apply I will not discuss whether the prices arranged in the contract are excessive; but this is clear, that whatever they are the prices proposed in the offer are very much more satisfactory. Then the contract procides that the Government:

"Shall also permit the admission free of duty, of all steel rails, fish plates and other fastenings, spikes, bolts and nuts, wire, timber and all material for bridges to be used in the original construction of the railway, and of a telegraph line in connection therewith, and all telegraphic apparatus required for the first equipment of such telegraph line."

The offer proposes to undertake the work without any exemptions from duty, and this will effect a large and direct further public saving. It is clear that every dollar which is paid into the Treasury in consequence of the duties not being removed, is a dollar diminished from the contractor's price. Now, let us see, so far as we can judge, what the number of dollars is in this particular. The hon. Minister of Railways says it is a mere trifle, about $60,000 or $70,000, and in one speech he placed that the sum of $90,000, and on another occasion placed it at between, I believe $90,000 and $100,000. The hon. gentleman omitted, however, to consider two material questions. He seemed altogether to ignore the question of material and telegraphic apparatus required for the construction and equipment of the telegraph line. The duty on the materials required for a telegraph line 2,700 miles in length must be very large. The hon. Minister did not omit, but gave, in my opinion, an inaccurate view of exemptions in regard to rails. The Minister said that was nothing, that steel rails are exempt now, and therefore nothing is given to those gentlemen. Does he suppose that those gentlemen, or their lawyer, were so foolish as to have a clause inserted in the contract except they derive some benefit from it? Why was this exception inserted in regard to steel rails if they were practically exempt already. They had it inserted because there could not be a practical exemption for them. Steel rails are by law subject to a duty of 10 per cent., but by the law it is provided that until 1st January next they shall be exempt from that duty. All steel rails imported after that date will be subject to the 10 per cent. The Government is to hand over to these gentlemen 5,000 tons of steel rails, and I believe they will want no more, or if they do, they will require but a triffe more before the period arrives at which the duty comes upon steel rails. Are you to suppose that the men who are not to complete their enterprise for ten long years are going to buy, between now and the 1st of January next, 180,000 tons of steel rails, which is the whole quantity they will require to complete the railway. The question of interest, on which I have heard some astounding calculations by hon. gentlemen opposite, with respect to a former purchase of steel rails, crops up. is also the question of rust, of which we have heard time and again, and that rails rust a great deal faster when not used. These important considerations which have been referred to in connection with the purchase of steel rails, were no doubt present to the minds of the Syndicate. It is made plainer that the Syndicate would have practically to pay the duty on the rails, except for this special provision exempting them from duty. It is plain that the provision was not intended to be nugatory, that neither the Syndicate nor the Ministry inserted it as a mere farce, as a useless provision and as one suggesting nothing, but that they inserted it because they knew the duty would otherwise have to be paid, and they intended it should not be paid, Estimating only the price in Sentember and October, the five and six times the rates of railways to the duty on the rails would amount to $576,000. It has been South. It is not unreasonable to say that a some-estimated that the duty on the fish-plates would amount to what high rate may be allowed in respect to the $12,000, the bolts and nuts $60,000, the spikes to $108,000, making a total, including rails, of $786,000 for rails and fastenings. But besides these you have bridge material and also telegraphic apparatus. Now, as to bridge material, even if wooden structures only are used, we know that in some cases, these wooden structures will be gigantic, and a large amount of bolts will be required for them. The exemption for even wooden bridges is a serious matter, but there is no provision that wooden bridges shall be used, and the Minister said that this exemption would be a temptation to use iron instead of wood. If they bring in iron bridges, it is quite clear that the exemption will be a most serious matter. We know what duty has been paid for the Hull bridge. It is somewhere about $22,000 or $23,000, and the Minister of Customs has it under seizure for under-valuation and is claiming some thousands of dollars more for that bridge. I think the exemption from taxation may be reasonably estimated at, under all the circumstances, at least one million dollars, and very likely it will be a great deal more, and that, therefore, if we compare the contract with the offer, in this single particular you find the contract one million of dollars in cash, and probably much more, worse than the offer. If then it is too late, it is too late not morely to save the $12,500,000 to which I have already adverted; it is too late not merely to secure something nearer approaching a reasonable distribution of the subsidy, but it is also too late—and how much these hon, gentlemen regret it!—to save one million dollars more of hard cash in respect of duties. Well, Sir, there is the railway monopoly. The contract provides:

to For 20 years from the date hereof, no line of railway shall be authorized by the Dominion Parliament to be constructed south of the Canadian Pacific Railway, from any point at or near the Canadian Pacific Railway except such line as shall run south-west, or to the westward of south-west: nor to within fifteen miles of Latitude 49. And in the establishment of any new Province in the North-West Territories, provision shall be made for continuing such prohibition after such establishment until the expiration of the said period."

While the offer proposes to undertake the work without any such restriction. Now what does this railway monopoly mean? What does this freedom from competition for the through trade of the North-West really mean? I say that although this subject has been discussed at some length and from various points of view, the public mind and this House has not yet grasped the full significance of that part of the business. I regard it as by far the most serious question of all. I regard it as infinitely surpassing in seriousness all the other questions before us in connection with this matter. I have proved to you what the gentlemen to whom you are now about to entrust, if you do entrust them with the future of the North-West, to whom you are about to award this monopoly power, do with that monopoly which they now have. I have proved to you what they do with the single talent with which they are entrusted, and you may depend upon it they will make usury of the ten talents if you please to give it to them, and will be in that respect faithful servants, but not to you Sir, but to themselves I have shown you that their rates on the St. Paul and Manitoba are monopoly rates; I have shown you that their rates for wheat are between five and six times the competitive rates charged on railways south of St Paul, or at any rate on the series of railways between Montreal and St. Paul. I have shown you as to other goods -mixed goods similar results; as with respect to agricultural implements upon which I gave freight quotations. I have proved to you that the way these gentlemen use their power on the 390 miles they have got, as an avenue or gateway to the North-West, is to charge between smaller traffic, though I believe that that hardly applies to the traffic as extensive as that which even the St. Paul and Manitoba Railway has. But if you do allow extra for a smaller traffic, still the surplus, after making an allowance say of one-half the additional rate, is enormous. It amounts to paying them one and a half rates, and afterwards for the transport of one bushel of wheat, paying them 25 cents per bushel extra beyond the rate and a half. Now what does this mean? Thut a toll shall be taken to the tune of 25 cents a bushel beyond an ample compensation for the transport of wheat. An hon, gentleman at a former stage of this debate whose soul was above buttons, said he would not consider a question of this kind in reference to fractions of cents on freight, or any such-paltry thing as that. He will allow me to tell him when we get down to the bushel, and find how much it is, it is easy to go up to the millions of bushels and find how much it is then. The furmers of the North-West will understand, as he a farmer ought to understand, what 25 cents or 27½ cents means very well. In 1870 Minnesota, with a population of about 400,000, produced between 17,000,-000 and 18,000,000 in bushels of wheat and a large quantity of other grain. If you assure that you can get into the North-West within a reasonable time 40,000 farmers raising 400 bushels each you get a production of 16,000,000 bushels. I say nothing of other grains or of cattle, but I take wheat alone, and going far inside of the figures which hon. gentleman gave as to immigration and settlement, as to the improvement of the land, you find a production within a few years—take ten years if you like—of 16 million bushels, and that there is a surplus making a liberal allowance for domestic consumption and seed of over 13,000,000 bushels. Now, what does 25 cents a bushel mean? It means $3,250,000 a year of a tax upon the farmers of the North-West on that particular item of their produce. It means that reduction in values to them; it means a rent on these lands for wheat of three and a quarter millions a year. I have taken a fair profit; I have added to that fair profit half as much again; I have tried to satisfy a fair-minded monopolist, and after I have done so I have shown that if you give these same men the exaggerated opportunities for continuing their tax as you propose to do, you will compel the farmers of the North-West to pay a rent in respect of their wheat lands of $3,250,000.

Mr. PLUMB. Who would buy the land under those cir cumstances?

Mr. BLAKE. I tell the hon, gentleman that they are the existing circumstances. I am projecting into the future the existing circumstances, because the policy of the Government proposes to project into the future, the existing circumstances; because at this day you have a monopoly which, on the 1st of July, 1882 you could be free from, but which you are determined to make perpetual. I am, therefore, entitled to say that the men to whom you are giving the power to keep closed the avenues of the North-West who have at present control of those avenues, who are using that control as I have pointed out, will continue to use it in a manner in which they are now using it. But that is not all, because the people of the North-West must import as well as export, and they must pay freight on their imports as well as their exports. We know quite well that there are, among the imports which will come into that country, goods which are charged for at much higher rates by the railway companies. We know, also, from what I have informed the House as to agricultural implements, that somewhere about the same proportion of extra rates, of monopoly rates, of toll, tax, duty, imports, in addition to a fair charge for transportation, is levied by the St. Paul and Manitoba Rail. way. I say it is a moderate estimate to double what I have estimated as the rent for the wheat lands in ten years, as the toll, or rent, or charge, that they will put upon the and, therefore, I deal with it at this stage. I have said that Mr. BLAKE.

imports of the North-West. I say it is a low calculation that the monopoly will be worth $10,000,000 a year to this Company in ten years, if the North-West be one-half at that time what you now depict. Now, mark that I have dealt with this subject apart altogether from local trade. I am not considering what local rates that Company may charge for the large quantities of timber, coal and produce which may be larger than the through trade. They will, no doubt, have much local trade, and for that local trade there may be competition, and you may have tresh railways in the North-West which will do some portion of the local trade, and which will, to some extent, control their total monopoly. But I am not dealing with local traffic, I am dealing only with the through traffic which depends not upon mileage, but upon the monopoly. You give them the southward gate to Pembina, you give them the eastward gate to Thunder Bay, you give them control of both gates, and you allow them to put up the bars, and to charge such a toll as will just leave it worth a man's while to live in that country and to raise wheat and buy goods. Now, Sir, what is the result at present? Why, even in summer time when you have got free navigation, when you have got a great water highway to within a comparatively short distance, the rates are but a trifle lower. I told the House before that they are only about $10 a car lower on the whole distance. It is true we have but a short railwaymileage, but they are determined to exact their toll as long as they alone furnish the means of access. Now, I say the question of the price of land is nothing, it sinks into insignificance, whether you shall charge a man $1, $2, $3, $4 or $) for his land, compared with the toll that it is competent to this company to exact, and that this company is at present exacting on the St. Paul and Manitoba Railway; whether you charge him $2 or $5, for his land the interest on that sum measures the amount he loses per annum, a few cents for each acre. Your monopoly taxes him dollars instead of cents. The hon, gentleman has said that there are various remedies. The hon. Minister of Railways has given us on sundry occasions-not so much here as elsewhere-several remedies. I will proceed to consider them one by one. His first remedy was branch lines south of the Canadian Pacific Railway. He said that there were three lines chartered which may stretch away to the Rocky Mountains, and if the Canadian Pacific charged too much those three lines would compete with it. Why, these lines are feeders to the Canadian Pacific. It is possible that they may to some extent affect a certain amount of the local trade of the Canadian Pacific Railway, but it is quite clear that whatever goods from outside the North-West into the North-West and into the interior, even if they pass along either one of these three lines, must reach them by the monopoly gates, by Thunder Bay, or by Pembina. They have the gates, they have the avenues, and they can charge such tolls as they please, and leave to the local railways the remainder what they choose not to charge as the price at which it shall carry the stuff. Therefore, that argument of the hon. gentleman as to through traffic, as to that traffic in which the people of those territories and ourselves are chiefly interested in this moment, as to the tax upon the grain of the North-West, as to the tax on the imports into the North-West, it is quite clear that these lines will furnish no relief and it is also clear that it is the intention of the Administration that there shall be no such relief, because this prohibition is expressly designed to prevent a competitive railway. On the face of it it is so designed, though it permits railways which would be feeders to the Canadian Pacific Railway. On the face of it it prohibits railways which could be so built as to be competitors with the Canadian Pacific Railway for the through trade. The hon. the Minister of Interior gave this as his only remedy, it is, no remedy, there is only one, and that an impossible people of the country to build a fresh railway of a thousand miles long, from Selkirk down to Nipissing, and then to make connection with some independent line to Ontario or Quebec, then, indeed, you may get competitive through traffic. But that is the price—to compete with private or public capital in constructing 1,000 miles less of railway. That will be imperative in order to get a competitive through line. And that is the only feasible remedy against a monopoly that you suggest to us. Your competitive line inside the country is no competitor as to through traffic. Your competitive line, reaching outside the country and becoming effective, must not merely reach through the prairie, but through 1,000 miles or thereabouts of unproductive territory, and then compete with a railway built through that territory wholly at the expense of the State. The second remedy of the hon. Minister was like unto the first, only worse. He said, we have not confined ourselves to chartered railways to the south; there are two railways already chartered to the north; and depend upon it if this monopoly is so oppressive as is predicted, if these people continue to charge too high rates, those railways will be built out to James' Bay and from James' Bay is the shortest route to Liverpool, with an ocean open for a considerable portion of the year, and trade will go that way, and thus the monopoly will be destroyed. The hon. Minister of Railways in his discourses in the city which he lately adorned, and in which I now reside, and also in the city of Montreal, a remedy for the monopoly he is proposing to create, and that if it is only oppressive enough, if it is only grinding enough to induce a resort to relief, the relief is open, they are not actually shut up to it. They can, and he said they soon would, build a railway to James' Bay to take the wheat to Europe, and bring back the imported goods by that quarter. Now, do you think it would be a good thing for this country, first, to establish a monopoly under which the people would groan, so that they would be obliged to build that railway, in order to relieve themselves, and so deprive you of the whole benefit of the trade of the North-West, by sending away from your ports, the wheat and grain to come down, and by sending away from your ports and merchants, the imported and manufactured goods to go up, by providing a new entrepot, a new emporium, on the shores of James' Bay, a rival to Montreal and Toronto, leaving them, not figuratively, but literally, in the cold, while you have provoked the destruction of that which you hoped from the acquisition of the North-West. To what end are you spending all these millions? To what end are you incurring all these burdens? What is your interest in the North-West? I have said before, and I repeat, you have a noble interest, the interest of those engaged in the task of building up a great country. But you also have, you avow it, and it is not discreditable to avow it—a material interest. You believe your own prosperity will be largely augmented by the prosperity of that country. You believe that you will be compensated, not only in the sense to which I refer, but also by the large development of your trade and commerce. You believe that your seaboard and inland towns will be stimulated, that a tide of trade will flow through their veins, that their wealth will be increased by the prosperity of the North-West; and a Minister seriously tells us, "True it is that there is a risk of a monopoly, but true it also is that we have provided for deliverance by the building of a railway to St. James, Bay, the shortest route to Liverpool;" so that you have the hope that the whole of the trade of the North-West will be lost to Canada. "Oh, but," said the Minister, "we have self-interest. It is the interest of any Company to stimulate traffic;" and he applied a phrase which I quoted from the joint letter of Mesers. Vanderbilt and Jewett, in that direction. These Railway Presidents said it was the way in which you can make it a remedy. If this interest of any company to charge as high as the traffic monopoly becomes so intolerable that it shall pay the would bear, and yet stimulate production; but the hor. would bear, and yet stimulate production; but the hor. gentleman said it was to their interest to stimulate production; the lower they charged, the more production was stimulated, and, therefore, they would charge low down. The hon gentleman, blind to the facts, deaf to the complaints coming from the neighboring Republic, ignorant of the committees, the senatorial and State investigations, and the various bills directed to the remedying of the mischiefs arising from the excessive charges of railway companies, says this glorious principal of self-interest will insure you low charges. Well, does it? Do you not know that everywhere the railway companies charge just as high as they can, not as low as they can? Do you not know that they consider, not how low can we carry this stuff and make a profit; but, how high can we carry this stuff, and get the stuff to carry? The hon, gentleman said that the leading men in the St. Paul and Manitoba Railway Company would charge low rates, because it was their interest to stimulate production. Well, the St. Paul and Manitoba Railway Company have a large interest in stimulating production now, and do they charge low rates? You know they do not! The hon. Minister himself admitted that they charged exceedingly high rates, so that his axiom as to the principle that would modify charges does not appear to be strictly axiomatic in their case. No, Sir, this question is too serious to be burked in this way. It is, I do not hesitate to say, the practical question in the politics of the United States to-day. It is a question increasing in magnitude every day. It is a question on which we are bound to have regard to the complexities and difficulties which have grown up and are growing up about it, and to take care that we do not ensure. as by this contract we will ensure, their creation on an enormously exaggerated scale in the domains of the North-West. The Committee on Railways of the New York Board of I rade and Transportation has recently issued a report which. I dare say, has got into the hands of a good many members. I want to read some extracts from that interesting report as perhaps the latest exhibition of popular sentiment on the part of a very large commercial body, having an enormous, perhaps the deepest, practical interest in the redress of those abuses, except the farmers and others laboring under them in the West. That report states:

"Since last year, public sentiment, regard ng this question, has steadily advanced and has crystalized into demanding that railway charges shall be based upon cost and risk of service and be alike to all under like circumstances. Governor Cornell, in his recent message to the Legislature, alludes to this subject as follows:—

"'The last Legislature devoted a large part of its Session to the consideration of measures designed to remedy certain evils in railroad management. The two Houses having failed to agree, the unsatisfactory condition of this important subject still continues, and should receive your thoughtful attention. Aside from public texation perspens no question as thoughtful attention. Aside from public taxation, perhaps no question so seriously touches the people at large. Every community and all branches of business are directly affected by it. Unjust discriminations in the rates of transportation cause embarrassment and unnatural competition."

Then they quote the testimony of Mr. Blanchard, a railway officer, who says:

"It has been our policy in this matter, while keeping within the Statute "It has been our poncy in this matter, while keeping within the Statute law as far as I knew it, or had occasion to know it, that wherever this public unwritten law comes into contact with the interests of the shareholders, I believe it to be my conscientious duty to decide in favor of the shareholders; I knew of no claim that the non-shareholding interests had upon me as a railroad officer so long as I was within the written law, to concede its views in the matter of rates, and in the management of our traffic."

I will also again read the passage of the letter to which I before referred, and from which the hon. gentleman drew Vanderbilt and Jewett say : his inference.

"That the managers of a railway company desire to make all the money they can for their clients, and to do this they have before them the question what rate within their chartered limits will an article bear that will yield the largest profit and at the same time stimulate its production."

This report goes on to say:

"An illustration of the workings of this policy is found in the present situation of the New York Central and Hudson River Railway. The carnings for the past year were nearly 12 per cent. net upon its grossly inflated capital, besides adding largely to equipment, which was charged to operating expenses. It is now reported in Wall street that a further inflation of its capital is to be made under the guise of a consolidation with the Lake Shore road. In 1867 and 1868, $47,000,000 of watered stock were added to the capital of the New York Central and Hudson River Railway, upon which regular 8 per cent. dividends have since been stock were added to the capital of the New York Central and minson River Railway, upon which regular 8 per cent. dividends have since been paid, and these dividends upon that water, with the interest thereon, compounded annually for 13 years, now amount to over $75 000,000, while the stock itself is quoted in the market at $150 per share. In other words, if instead of watering the stock of these roads in 1867 and 1868, Mr. Vanderbilt had reduced the rates for transportation to a point which would have wielded 8 per cent not upon the then outstanding rapital, the public have yielded 8 per cent. net upon the then outstanding capital, the public would at the present time have been $75,000,000 better off, and $47,000,000 of stock, which cost only the paper and ink with which it was printed, and which is now quoted at $150 per share, would not now be in existence and form a pretext for further taxing the industry and commerce of this State and country for all time to come."

Well, Sir, this proves that it might carry freight and passengers at very much lower rates and pay a handsome dividend on the cost, and it proves that the rates in the United States are, as I have contended, very exorbitant yet, as a rule, if the hon. gentleman's statement is correct. This extract goes on to say:

"This is but a single illustration; there are hundreds of others equally flagrant, but this will serve to illustrate how the public health is being concentrated in few hands by a system of taxation, under the gare of tolk or charges for transportation, compared with which the tells exacted by the robber-Barons of the feudal ages were petty, and between the justice of which it is hard to distinguish. In the one case there are, to be sure, forms of law, but they are forms only, and have been enacted to suit the wishes of our modern Barons of the rail. • • • Of course the direct tendency of of our modern barons of the rail.

Of course the direct vendency of these abuses in our transportation system is to nullify the principle upon which our Government is founded; instead of the equal distribution of wealth it tends to make a few very rich, and the many poor. The feudalistic tendencies of the age are very marked, and unless prompt and vigorous efforts are made to check this rapidly-growing power it will be too late.

• • Your Committee believe that the American public, and especially * Your Committee believe that the American public, and especially the people of this State, are not yet ready to acknowledge that there is a dominant and privileged class to which all the rest of the community must pay tribute; that every barrel of flour and ton of coal must be depreciated to the producer, or unduly enhanced in cost to the consumer, in order that the few may live in undue luxury at the expense of the many. We have faith that the intelligence and patriofism of the American people will be equal to the emergency of controlling the creatures of their creation, and invoking the influence of every citizen to this end."

There, Sir, is the feeling of that body of business men in the State of New York as to the evils under which they at present labor, evils under which they labor in consequence of the gigantic power and strength which these aggregates of wealthy corporations have obtained, very largely through their power, by reason of their monopoly. Because in a sense, all railways, even where there is competition, are monopolies, as to some part of their trade. There is a local traffic always in respect to which there is no competition. They are all more or less a monopoly; some are absolute monopolies, such as the monopoly you propose to create in this North-West, and these are the most odious examples; some are only limited monopolies. the evil exists in all and the remedy mu applied, more or less stringently to all. Now, the question of cost of railway transportation-I mean, not what they choose to charge, but what it absolutely costs—is still an unsettled question. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) quoted the other evening a speech which I made in 1874, in which I expressed the opinion that a bushel of wheat would not come down from the Saskatchewan by all-rail route to the seaboard, because it would cost too much. Well, that opinion was, I believe, a sound opinion, according to the existing lights and condition of things, and I will give the hon. gentleman the reason. First of all, let me give him an authority or two. Mr. Poor's book on railways for the year 1880, states that freight is now moved at a rate per ton per mile which five years ago would have been regarded as impossible. The rates of 1873 on the New York Central, to which I have just adverted, would have given for 1879 $31,000,000 of tion as to the unproductive and productive parts of the enter-Mr. BLAKE.

return, instead of $19,000,000. In 1870 it was thought that the lowest possible rates for all, rail from Chicago to New York would be 24 cents a bushel, but in 1878 the average all, rail rates between Chicago and New York was only 161 cents, and the lake and canal rate was as low as 10 cents or under; and in 1879, wheat was taken from Chicago to Liverpool for 17 cents. On this subject I have some statistics which, of course, the hon member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) may use as he just now suggested, as indicating that notwithstanding the monopoly there was a reduction in rates. The railway rates per ten per mile show a decrease from 1873 to 1879 of nearly one hulf, as will be seen by the following table:-

N. Y. Central	1.57	.80
N. Y. Lake Erie & Western	1.45	.78
Pennsylvania.	1.41	.79
Pittsburg, Fort Wayne & Chicago,	1.41	.76
Lake Shore & Michigan	1.33	 .64
Michigan Central,	1.22	.69
Chicago & Albany,	2 12	1.05
Chicago, Burlington & Quincy,	1.92	1.02
Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific,	2.29	1.43

That does not prove there is no danger of a monopoly, but that, to a certain extent, competition has, where competition was brought to bear, had had an effect in reducing the rates; but to by far the largest extent, those rates have been reduced by economies in the conduct of railway We have, as I stated before, the steel rail which of itself has effected perhaps the most important economy, the heavy engine, the large car, and divers minor improvements which have reduced the actual cost of moving a ton or a bushel to something like one third of what the actual cost was ten years ago, And therefore it is that I say those figures do not prove in the slightest degree that there has been a great reduction which is due to competition. l admit that a certain portion of the reduction is in certain cases due to competition, but I say that the actual cost has fallen far below the reductions, that a larger profit is made by many railway companies than was made when the higher rates were charged. Now. what I want is that you should realize that the cost of railway transportation is, as yet, in a state of flux or transition. There is no doubt, whatever, in my opinion, that very large improvements will be made, which will still further reduce the actual cost of transportation to the companies I cannot believe that for many years there will continue to be a waste of ninety-three per cent. of the motive power of the coal burned on the locomotives.

Mr. PLUMB. That was Mr. Atkinson's calculation.

Mr. BLAKE. I believe, with reference to steel rails, that a prospect exists, indeed, it is said that certain results have been accomplished, enabling the trade to make strel rails from a very inferior class of ore; and if that be so, and the cost of those rails is very much further reduced, a most important item of railway economy that has been already considerably advanced will be much further enhanced. It is, therefore, quite possible-that the cost to the Companies of railway transport may be still further reduced. I am not, therefore, ashamed of having expressed, five years ago, the opinion I did; and I believe the reduction by these improvements in the actual cost of railway transportation is an element we are bound to take into consideration as most important in settling the conditions of this contract. I believe the fact that you can build and work a railroad so much cheaper, that the cost of transporting goods is so very much reduced, is a thing you should consider when you talk of paying a company many millions to meet the cost of building and running such a railroad. If I prove the cost of running is reduced enormously, I prove the cost of transportation is reduced enormously. Therefore, the whole situa-prise is immensely improved in favor of the Company by the power of using the road cheaper than it could have been used ten years ago, even cheaper than five years ago. I say it is not wise to hand over the savings which result from this economy, and the further savings which will result from further economies, to a Company. I say those savings belongs to the people. Transportation must have relation to the cost of the service, and if you know the cost of the service has been very much diminished, and it is possible it may be very much further diminished it is your bounden duty to see that that saving inures to the public and not to the corporation you are creating, and to whom you are making a present of the railway. If, then, you exclude competition, and if you decline to provide for power to acquire the railway, so as to be relieved from competition, what do you do? You practically tell the Company, "Go on, apply all your economies, get all your improvements, reduce the cost of transport of freight as much as you can, and when you have done that you have simply enlarged the margin of your profit, because you are still allowed by our provision, which forbids competition, to charge as high a rate as the traffic will bear and therefore the saving is yours and has been effected for your sole benefit. The Minister of the Interior, however, justifies these restrictions as not merely good in the interest of the Syndicate; but in the interest of the North West. He said it was a political conception which they wanted to introduce into the scheme of the Company—that the Government themselves were anxious that those restrictive provisions should be put in, and that we must protect our infant country, our infant railway, and our infant iudustries. Such a lusty batch of infants I never heard coming together at one breath. But the hon, gentleman does not carry out his National, his Japanese, Policy; because, while in the interest of the North-West, he says he imposes a restriction upon the building of railways which should communicate with the frontier, he leaves to the Syndicate the liberty to build those railways if they will. He places in their hands and at their tender mercy this new plant, this offshoot of the National Policy, he allows to an American company, which this one may be converted into in 24 hours, if they choose, in furtherance of the American interests to build railways with the calamitous results which the hon. gentleman has depicted, connected with, uniting with the railways on the American frontier. He gives them by this contract the absolute right to build such roads and make such connections. Whoever heard of a Minister propounding, as a great state policy, that there should be no railway connections, between the Canadian North-West and the United States, and saying that he had accomplished his object by preventing everybody else from making that connection, while, at the same time, he puts it in the hands of a company of speculators to make it as often as they please, Whatever be the true policy of this contract, let us effectuate it, and forbid the Syndicate as well as the rest of the world violating it; but do not pretend to defend and justify such restriction as things done in the interest of the North-West, and proper to be continued, while you allow this Company, which is largely American to-day, and may be altogether American tomorrow, to have exclusive power to destroy your new national Railway Policy. The views of hon, gentlemen opposite with reference to our North-West seem to me of the gloomiest character. They say, first of all, when you want to get an emigrant into that country, the only way you can do it is to practically blindfold him; because if you let him see or get within 100 miles of the American frontier he will be quite sure to go to the United States. After you have blindfolded him and settled him in the North West, what is the present phase of the Government policy? They say, if you intend to keep him in our country, you have got to hundred miles through American territory is the best chance fetter him, and if you wish to keep his trade you must also of relief from ten years bondage to the American system, fetter his trade; if you build the railway close to the to the Chicago and South-Western interests that can be boundary both himself and his trade will go to Dakota and Minnesota and stay there too. If I thought that the future of the North-West depended on this drastic application, upon this compulsion, this forcing, upon this insisting upon particular measures, and lines and routes of railway, I should have very little hope in that future. My own belief is that if people do not want that country, they will not go there -that it they do not like it they will not stay there, and if they do not like the avenues of trade, they will seek a place where it is freer; and my own opinion is that you will accomplish nothing by the restrictive and constructive process you propose to apply. The right hon gentleman says that not a pound of freight will go by the North Shore if other routes are open. Well, I never said half so hard a thing of the North Shore as that. I never thought but that some trude would go over it. But it appears there are other routes so infinitely more advantageous in the hon. gentleman's view that not a pound of freight will go that way unless you render impossible that it shall go any other way. Other ways are so much better, so much cheaper, that it must go by them, and you only get a chance of staeblishing a business by the North Shore route only by rendering it impossible for freight to go by any other line. If that be so, I would strongly recommend you not to build it. That is the state of things existing with reference to that road, a road which has a shorter mileage, and is at no expense for capital account at all, so they have only to earn the expenses of management in order to make it pay them handsomely; yet it cannot compete with other roads, and in order to get a pound of freight over it you must prevent other roads from being built, and other means of ingress and egress from being given to the country. There must be something wrong in this, Sir, I would like to know the reason why the North Shore Road having no interest account to pay, and being also the shortest road, can never get a pound of freight if it is allowed to be bled by other roads. Well, what is wanted is not that. This story is not correct in my opinion. These views of the hon. gentlemen are altogether exaggerated views. I will tell you what is wanted It is that this Company should have power to charge a higher rate for going over the railway than they could charge if there was exaggerated views. I competition. It is not because they could not take a pound of freight over the North Shore if there was another road, but it is because they could not get the monopoly rates they want to charge on the North Shore, if you allow the people the choice of routes and the benefit of competition. The hon. gentleman waxes eloquent upon this subject. He said, you are going to do this only for ten years after the railway is established. He said the American railways were very powerful, that they would carry for nothing, that they would take hold of that trade and insist on having it and having over got, would hold it for ever. What are you going to do by your policy for ten long years. You are going to leave the only all rail outlet from the country by Chicago. You are not merely not creating competition, but providing that they shall have the traffic at their own prices. And if it be true that channels of traffic once worn, it is difficult to get out of them; if it be true that connections once formed are important factors in the commerce of the country, I say that the future of this country is seriously bound up in the hon. gentleman's policy. I say that a policy which determines that for ten long years there shall be no all-rail connection except by Chicago and Southern lines is one more calculated to carry out the views he deprecates and create the result he dreads than any other conceivable policy. And I repeat that the Sault line which within three years would give you a chance of getting the traffic back again after passing a few hundred miles through American territory is the best chance conceived, and if you do not adopt that view you will rue it, not for ten years, but for all your lives. The hon. gentleman denounced me as a traitor for supporting a scheme which would give you seven years during which your scheme declines, an all-rail connection within the North-West, which would give you within three years, not merely an all-rail connection with the North West, but would take the commerce of the Western States well as the North-West down to Ontario and Quebec. The hon, gentleman denounced me as a traitor for proposing that scheme. I did not propose it; it was he that proposed it, in this House, last Session, and the leader of the Government in the Senate announced last Session that it was the intention of the Government at this Session of Parliament to propose a subsidy for the construction of that very line. The Minister of Rai ways at Montreal and Toronto applauded the plan and said it was of the utmost importance to this country. If I am a traitor it is from him I learned my treason. The hon, gentlemen says it is a grand thing to join the Provinces. I want them joined soon. I want them joined quicker than he does. I want them joined by the easy, cheap and expeditious route I have pointed out, by a route which will cost you little money, and which will give you connection seven years sooner than you propose to get it. If you want the Provinces joined adopt my plan. The hon, gentleman says my policy is never to build the British Columbia section. Not so. That is not my policy. I know that hon, gentlemen choose to say so, as they have frequently chosen to misrepresent and mistate my views. I have said: "Wait until the country is strong enough for the task; utilize our resources in the construction of the road where we most want it and which will produce the earliest results. I have said my policy was to supply a strong backbone to our railway system, with a population which would maintain it, and develop the North-West, and enrich ourselves as we hope to enrich ourselves by its trade and traffic, and then proceed with the construction of the ends. I have said that my policy is not one of abandonment but of postponement, and I believe that postponement just now in the work of building the ends, would result as the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) said in his speech, in our being able to construct the ends on much better terms, five years hence and to complete them almost as speedily as we can do by beginning to-day. But that is not the question now. You have here two proposals for the construction of the whole line, and between those two proposals you have to choose. The hon. gentleman gave another remedy against high rates, the remedy of the Governor in Council, but this is one which I will discuss later on if the llouse will permit me, as I desire for the moment to pass to another point. I shall show you that the remedy proposed is inadequate, and the other remedy by the fettering, cramping that remedy by the fettering, cramping that which it imposes, is still more inconditions I have shown you that the adequate. proposes the creation of the most odious monopoly, with reference to the North-West Territory, that was ever proposed to any country in the world, at any time in the history of the world. A monopoly more oppressive and monstrous in its creation, at this time, when we know what the railway companies are doing, and the evils and difficulties which are already in existence owing to the creation of these gigantic enterprises—a monopoly which not we only, but our children, and children's children will rue, if you choose to create it. Well, Sir, the old contract creates this monopoly; the new proposal abrogates this monopoly. It leaves you perfectly free to charter railway lines where you deem meet. It leaves you perfectly free to create proper conditions and such competitions as may be desirable, proper conditions and such competitions as may be desirable, in the offer. Yours is the choice, for it you will be held and it leaves the Provinces free to do the same. It does responsible. Then the contract provides that the land not tie your hands. Do you want that your hands should grant shall be exempt from taxation for twenty years, unless Mr. BLAKE.

be tied, or that they should be free to act as the public interest may require. If you want to tie them, take the contract; if you want to keep them free, take the proposal. The choice is yours; the responsibility of choosing is yours. Choose, then, and choose wisely. The contract frees from taxation, the railway, its property and its stock. That exemption is contrary to the general rule in the United States. A little book which contains the report of Charles Francis Adams and others on the subject of railway taxation in the United States, and elsewhere, summarises the law upon this subject and makes it to appear that in the whole of the States of the Union there is no instance of general exemption from taxation. There may be one or two isolated cases in particular States of partial and temporary exemptions from taxation of particular railways under special circumstances; but the general rule of almost universal application is that there is no exemption in one form or another from taxation. The instances which the hon. Minister of Railways quoted in other places in Minnesota and Wisconsin, are instances of exemption from taxation by one Statute and the imposition of taxation by another—a license tax, a tax upon gross receipts, is imposed in lieu of other taxes, and it may be that this is the fairest mode of taxation. Some hon. gentlemen have said that it is of very little consequence, that the road-bed is taxed very lightly in Ontario, that some of our Legislatures have declined to tax railway companies at all. But what kind of railway companies were these? They were railways built with private capital and were not paying interests on their investments. I do not say that a rule of this kind does not apply to a railway that is built at the public charge, and that is given a monopoly to secure it in obtaining good rates for its traffic. But this is no temporary exemption, it lasts for ever; no matter how bloated this corporation may become, no matter how magnificent may be its network of railways, no matter how blooming its country, no matter how prosperous the towns which are tributary to it, no matter how exaggerated its dividend, forever, and forever and forever you free it from Dominion, new Provincial and municipal taxation. In considering that you have to look at the general resultof taxation. Some of the United States railways you find paying a tax of $300 or $400 per annum, and $600 or $800 per annum is paid as taxes by the English railways. You find, therefore, that the possibilities of railway taxation are very great. You find the Illinois Central Railway paying almost the whole expenses of the Government of that State, and you find the people so nervous less the Legislature should be corrupted and should dispense with that, that they have actually put a clause in the constitution providing that the taxation of the Illinois Central Railway shall not be modified by the Legislature, but shall be referred to the general voice of the people. But you do not keep your hands free, you tie them, and you say for all time we will never charge this railway company any taxation upon its property, its stock, or its capital. I say that I can well conceive a time when a tax on the gross receipts of railways might be a very satisfactory tax and a very satisfactory source of revenue to this Dominion. A tax for transportation would apparently be a very equal taxation, and if the necessity arose of adding to the revenue, it is quite possible that we might wish to avail ourselves of such a tax. There is another point in which this exemption is objectionable. It places this Company in the position of a monopoly by itself, because it places at a disadvantage all competitors who are to raise the funds themselves to build their railways. The contract requires perpetual exemption, the offer does not demand any exemption at all. Choose! the choice is yours; take the perpetual exemption in the contract or take the liability to taxation sold or occupied from the date of the grant. The money gain to the Company is enormous, there can be no doubt about that. There can be no doubt that the burdens which this Company are freed from are most serious. Hon. gentlemen opposite have said so. They have said they could not use this land grant otherwise, that nobody would buy if they supposed the Syndicate was te be subjected to the same taxes as the rest of the world. They get the choice of land and they are not to pay the same taxes as the rest of the community. Why should they not? Is it because they get a large profit? Because they are getting altogether four prices for building the prairie section, that therefore they are to be untaxed and free? Then the indirect loss is still greater by this mode of settlement, by the burdens it imposes on the adjoining settlers for the benefit of the railway company itself, by the imposition of double taxes on those who go in for the benefit of this great corporation. I do not know of anything that will more interfere with the development of the North-West than this clause of exemption from taxation. Will you free the lands, or will you make them subject to taxation? Will you give the Company the benefit of the exemption from taxation, or will you let the lands be subject to taxation, and let the progress of the North-West country be advanced by those lands, like other lands, being subject to taxation? The choice is yours; choose, there is no power for the Government to acquire the railway in the contract. In the Pacific Railway Act there was express power to for your choice you will be held responsible. Now, again, acquire the railway; in the offer there is express power to acquire the railway. The problem of the regulation of railways is a difficult one, and I do not think that a satisfactory solution has yet been reached, I believe it to be still under discussion. I have read a good deal of the discussion on that subject by the acute minds who have been for some years engaged in its investigation in the neighboring Republic, and something of what has been done in England and on the continent of Europe; and I repeat that I do not think that it can be laid down by any man with any degree of positiveness that the true solution of this gigantic development of modern commerce, ever increasing in size, in importance, in portentiousness, has yet been reached. In its solution it may be necessary that there should be radical changes, that you should provide new conditions altogether; it may even be necessary that Government should owning and run or lease to others the right to run on railways. That may be one solution. Now, I say that it is improvident in the last degree that with this question, in this state of undetermined solution, you should tie your hands and in creating a new railway, not give yourselves the power, if at any time the public interest shall demand it, to acquire the railway with a view to regulate the question of rates. I do not say you shall acquire; I hope the day will never arrive that you may want to acquire it, but I say you ought, if you be prudent men, to take the power into your hands to acquire it if the public interest should demand that step. That, as I have said, was the unanimously agreed policy of this country as embodied without dissent in the Canadian Pacific Railway Act of 1874. Now, I want to know whether you propose to keep that right in your hands or to give it away. The contract gives it away; the offer keeps it in your hands. The choice, I say again, is yours; choose! You will be held responsible for your choice. Then there is a limitation of the power of the Governor in Council to reduce the right of tolls. By this contract the General Railway Act is varied in favor of this great corporation. By the General Railway Act the Governor in Council can reduce at any time the established toll to any point. Under any circumstances whatever they think the interest of the public requires they are free to do. They are free to do this with reference to railways construct-to this railway, to be constructed by the public money and really at the risk of the public, a limitation not conferred, not given in favor of the railway companies, is imposed. This company must earn a dividend of ten per cent. before you can reduce the established toll. I admit that the first toll is to be fixed by the Governor in Council, and I have already pointed out that the first tell is necessarily to be sanctioned at rates which should not be permanent. You have a sparse population, a minimum traffic, and therefore increased cost in transporting passengers and goods. That is to be taken into account in your early freight tariff, and you cannot reduce this early freight tariff unless ten per cent. dividend is being paid, not on the private capital but on the whole capital, public and private which is invested in that railway. There may be $8,000,000 a year of dividend before the Governor in Council can interfere. Such is the result of the contract. The offer contains no such limitation. It leaves the Governor in Council to the same power as to the Canadian Pacific Railway which it has as to other railways. It leaves them free to deal with this case as with other cases as the interests of the public require. Will you create the limitation and restrict the power of the Governor in Council in order to carry the contract, or will you take the offer which says that the Governor in Council is free to deal with this railway as with others? The choice once more is yours-choose; and take the responsibility! There is no provision whatever in this contract for a Canadian interest in the Company. This is a contract made by persons whose interests are outside of this country altogether. I do not think much of the English holding in point of extent. I do not believe the house of Morton, Rose & Co. has any substantial interest in this undertaking at all. They may be brokers for the sale of the bonds; they may have some trivial interest in it; but I do not believe they will have more.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. What about the French house?

Mr. BLAKE. I do not know the French house with the Dutch name. As to the American house we know about them, and as to the American railway proprietors we know about them. Hon gentlemen opposite who assumed an ultra-patriotic tone, as to the connection of Americans when they prepared the Allan contract, took at that time extraordinary precautions to obtain a Canadian holding. They took care to obtain subscriptions in the different Provinces, in some sort of proportion to the wealth of each Province, and they arranged that those subscriptions should be by Canadians, and that there should be no transfer for at least, I think, six years. All that is now reversed. You have a Canadian policy as to nonconnection with American Railways, unless the Syndicate agrees; but you have an American policy as to the holding; for it need hardly be said that the potent proprietors in this company are the proprietors of the St. Paul and Manitoba Railway, and that they and the New York representatives of Stephen and Company, are the ruling spirits of this concern. But why not give some Canadians an opportunity to hold some interest in the Canadian Pacific Railway? Do you not think you would by that means have a better security that the railway would be run in Canadian interests, than by the precautions you are now taking? At any rate, do you not think it reasonable that you should give Canadians a change to have some interest in a railway which they are to pay for with their taxes and their lands? The contract contains no such provision, but the contrary, The offer contains a proposal that stock books shall be opened in the principal cities of the various Provinces, with the view to the allotment of stock to Canadians in each Province. Your choice is free again. Such are the terms of the contract as compared with the terms of the offer, and ed by private capital and at private risk; but in reference I do not hesitate to say, that whether you regard the money, the lands, the allocation of the subsidies, the monopoly, the exemption from taxation of the property, the exemption from taxation of the land, the exemption from duties, the provisions as to the regulation of rates and fares, or the provisions as to the Canadian holding, you find most important improvements in the offer over the contract; you find that these two instruments cannot be looked at at the same moment without the conviction being impressed upon the mind that there is no comparison between them as to which you should choose. The options to be given to the Government in this offer, I entirely agree with the hon, gentlemen opposite, are not advantageous. I adhere to the view I have expressed in this House and elsewhere, that if you were going to open this question and to deal with it, as we were dealing with it last Session, the true view would be to construct at this moment the line only across the prairies, and to build the Sault Branch. I am however of opinion that these advantages could be bought too dear, and I am of opinion that the terms which these gentlemen propose for these various options are quite inadmissable, because I believe that the work of the middle section by itself could be done, as the hon. Minister stated the other day, very much cheaper than it could be done if you adopted those options. I am, therefore, quite in accord with him in the view that it ought not to be in the policy of any Government or Parliament to accept those options at all. But, refusing to avail ourselves of these alternatives, the offer stands as an offer to build and work the whole line, and must be so dealt with. It is an offer to do just the work which the contractors propose to do, to assume just the obligations which the contractors propose to assume, to enter into just the liabilities which the contractors propose to enter into, to do just the same things as they propose to do, only on terms directly and indirectly infinitely better for this country. So treated, it saves you in cash, irrespective of all other points, $3,000,000, with which you can build the Sault line without a penny of expense. You can go to work and build this whole railway, and take the $3,000,000 which is saved over the other contract, and with that aid a company which willin that give you the Sault line too. The hon. gentleman said that this offer was a plot--a discreditable plet-concoted male fide and not intended to be carried out. and another hon, gentleman seemed to insinuate that I knew something of its terms. I may say that I knew nothing whatever of its terms until I saw it after it was signed. Had I been consulted on the subject, and had I chosen to offer advice, I certainly would have offered advice that many of the blemishes which are common to both offers should be removed from this offer. I was not consulted or the offer, not knowing, as I said, what was in the papers until the offer came down here signed. I do not know, then, where it was drawn. I think if it was drawn here. some of these blemishes would not be in it. But I am in the region of conjecture, as the hon. gentleman was, and I, therefore, do not assert anything positive on the subject, as he when dealing positively with the subject chose to do. Now, Sir, the hon, gentleman says that there are Reformers in the offer. It is true the large majority are Reformers. Mr. Hendrie, a man of skill, means and great ability and success in railway construction, is an important member of that Syndicate, and he is well-known to be a strong supporter of hon, gentlemen opposite. It is not, therefore, exclusively a Reform combination. But I have heard a good many complaints about the political color of the other Syndicate. The hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Wright) almost wept the other day because he said, the old Syndicate was a grit Syndicate; and really it seems to me that this is a choice of evils. I wonder why it is you cannot get people with pluck, of so acting. Punish them, if you please, if energy and capital enough to build the Pacific Railway, unless you go to the Reformers. The hon, gentlemen answer to your challenge. It was said a while ago that Mr. BLAKE.

said there were some defeated Reform candidates in the new Syndicate. Well, the most recently defeated Reform candidate happens, I believe, to be in the old Syndicate, for we know that Mr. Donald A. Smith, whose seat was taken by the hon, member for Selkirk (Mr. Scott) is the latest defeated reform candidate whose name is connected with that offer.

Mr. PLATT. His name is not there.

Mr. BLAKE. I know you do not see it, but it is there for all that, and you know it well. So that the latest defeated Reform candidate, and, I will add, the Reform candidate most obnoxious to hon. gentlemen opposite, to judge by their expressions, is in the old Syndicate; and, therefore, if it be calamitous that defeated Reform candidates should be in it, you will reject the contract of which Mr. Donald A. Smith, although not in name, is practically the most important, substantial and effective member. Now, I will give you an answer to my question. It is because the Reformers have so very large a proportion of the wealth, business ability, and pluck of this

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. We represent the poor people.

Mr BLAKE. And very poor representatives of them you are! The hon, gentleman said, using an expression which I had supposed was hardly parliamentary, and which had better, perhaps, not have fallen from the lips of the First Minister, that this was a bogus contract. He said it was bogus because those that presented it knew perfectly well that the Government was absolutely pledged to the old contract, and he proceeded, as I said before, to crack the party whip, to apply the lash to his followers, to tell them that the Government must say they felt their usefulness gone if they rejected this contract. Well, if the hon. Minister who has been using for the month past all his persuasions in private to induce his followers to keep an unbroken front-

Mr. ROCHESTER and several hon. MEMBERS. No. no. Mr. BLAKE. Well, Sir, I am quite sure that he did not apply to the honorable member for Carleton any persussion, because he was quite weil aware that hon. member would do exactly as he wished. I do not believe that he talked to everyone of them. I said that he had been using all his powers of persuasion to keep an unbroken front.

An hon. MEMBER. You speak from past experience, no doubt.

Mr. BLAKE. No; I never was under the hon. gentleman. I never had occasion to use any persuasion. I say that these private suggestions and requests from recalcitrant followers proving ineffective, the hon. gentleman was obliged to propose yesterday to change his course and make a public declaration. He, a powerful Minister, with a majority of 70 or 80 at his back, declared that this must be treated as a question of confidence, and that his followers must understand that the Government would stand or fall by the assent, or dissent from this contract. He told them, in fact, that they must choose between the Government and the contract. The hon. gentleman says that this contract is a bogus one, that these gentlemen have put it in dishonorably, without any intention of fulfilling it. Well, I think the people of this country who know the names and the characters of these persons. will resent that insult to them, an insult wholly undeserved, an insult which the First Minister had no right to cast on such a combination of persons as are represented in that they meant nothing, and that there would be found for them an easy way to escape; that if the Government rejected the other contract some hitch would take place. But you know by what has been laid on the Table that over $1,400,000 in cash now stands deposited as security, that these gentlemen will, if this charter is granted and this Company formed, put in the million dollars which the up to these two, I prefer the offer; I do not say that I Company formed, put in the million dollars which the contract, in common with the offer, requires that the Company should deposit. Therefore, the forfeit of that $1,400,000 is the price these gentlemen must pay for not carrying out their agreement. Punish them, if they are guilty. The hon, gentleman speaking, to use a phrase which I borrow from hon, gentlemen opposite, from the agreement agreement agreement agreement agreement agreement when that if past experience, said: Oh! these gentlemen know that if their friends got in, they would let them off. He knew what hon, gentlemen opposite had done with the Allan contract:

Mr. McCALLUM. What about the Foster contract?

Mr. BLAKE. I am speaking of the Allan contract. He knew what the evils were, what the difficulties were, and knowing them the determined to hand over without the authority of Parliament, a million dollars of security which had been deposited by the Allan Company for the performance of this contract and to cancel its obligations; and he supposed that others would go and do likewise. It is very easy for this House to make it impossible for any government to cancel the contract or to return the deposit. For my part, I would say these gentlemen would deserve to be punished if they were guilty of the conduct ascribed to them. They ought not to be allowed to escape if they made an offer which was going to involve them in loss, but should be held strictly to its terms, and the last dollar extracted from them. I have no doubt these gentlemen are animated, in the first place, by a desire to assume a profitable undertaking. But I have no doubt they are also animated by the feeling that the terms of this contract are wholly inordinate, that they losses to this country which it can hardly endure, that while they may make their fortunes out of a more moderate offer, they will have the satisfaction of saving their country from losses by monopoly and otherwise which are involved in the contract on the Table. Now, I ask what better proof could be given of the madness of your course in not advertising for tenders, than the offer backed by the names to which I have referred, and the deposit of $1,400,000 affords? What better proof could there be that you ought not to have attempted to let this gigantic contract on these unprecendented terms in a holeand-corner secrét fashion, without giving the public, Canadians and foreigners the opportunity of tendering, than the circumstance that this offer is given? How can you defend it-your departure from the principles of the Canadian Pacific Act, from the principles of the Public Works Act, from the well known and appured general principles that ought to regulate public affairs—how can you defend it from the statements made by the Minister in charge of this measure last Session, in the face of such a resolution as this? The hon, gentleman said that I would not dare to advise the Government and the House to accept the second offer. I have no hesitation, if you shut up this House to a decision of this question, this Session and at this time—if there is no choice, but between these two schemes—in saying that the offer shall be accepted and not the contract. It is perfectly plain if you have no further choice, no other way, and can make no change of policy, that of the two offers on the Table, the offer should be accepted and the contract refused. The offer may not be all I could wish—indeed it is not; it may not be all that could be desired, I believe it is not; but if you tell me the question is now in this state, that we are to decide between the contract and the offer, I unhesitatingly say that I advise you and my friends to accept the offer instead of the contract, and I believe that such will be the opinion of the country too.

Mr. ROCHESTER. But there is a talk of a third con-

Mr. BLAKE. That may be. I have said if we are shut would not go for a better offer. I said expressly, that, with the proposals before us, I have no hesitation in saying that the offer should be accepted, and that benefits incalculable would result to the country from its acceptance in preference to the contract. The hon, gentleman says it is not intended to be carried out; but you can make its authors carry it out. These names are as good as the names to that contract, and better. These names are names which, without any discredit to the gentlemen connected with that contract, would compare favorably with them and would command public confidence as fully as theirs do. In addition you have the deposit of $1,400,000 as security for the carrying out of their undertaking; with the gentlemen of the Syndicate you have nothing but their word and their statements. I do not say these are not good enough; I believe they are. I believe that the agreement of these gentlemen to deposit $1,000,000 would be implemented if the contract was less favorable, and that it will be implemented of course in such a contract. But, I believe the security of $1,400,000 is as good as you can have, and that you can make the tenderers carry out their obligations. The hon, gentleman called the offer fraudulent. If that name is to be applied to either of these instruments I have no hesitation in saying to which it'should be applied. I have read the papers and looked at the offers accompanying them, and I believe that if you are to call one of them a fraud, the contract is the fraud, and not the offer. The hon. gentleman said that these men knew that the Government must stand by the contract, and that therefore they never could be called to carry out their offer. I did not know it-I do not know it yet-I do not know there is any obligation under which the Government rests to stand by this contract. Are Governments infallible? Do they never make mistakes? Are they bound to ruin their country to preserve their reputation for infallibility? Should they not retreat from a false step? Is it not, the nobler, more moral, more patriotic course, if you find you have erred, to acknowledge your error, retrace the false step and return to the right path. For my own part I will say we would undertake never again to mention that error, that false step, if we could only induce you to retract or withdraw, to do the thing which is for the interest of the country, instead of shutting your-selves up in an attitude of infallibility, which I do not know belongs to a Government—and declaring, no matter what the arguments of your followers and of the Opposition may be, no matter what the feeling in the country may be, no matter what better offers you may get-that you are bound and shut up to do nothing else than to stand to the contract which you imprudently signed. The hon. gentleman says it must be so and that he or his party must stand and fall by it. But is this so in fact? They need not. They may if they please take more than one course which would be better for their country than to stand or fall by it. If they do choose by that course to insist and force their followers to agree upon this contract being passed into a law, it is their voluntary act. There is nothing binding them to do it. It is their own choice to stand by the contract in the face of light—in the face of argument—in the face of the opportunity of doing better, and upon them and those who support them, in that course, the penalty will fall. For my part, I would be glad to see the Government strengthened, by taking a different course. I have no doubt, that they would be thus strengthened, in the minds of the country, and that it would experience a feeling of relief, on both sides of politics, if they should hear, as a result of this debate, that hon. gentlemen opposite, controlling public affairs, had agreed to yield a little to the wishes of the public; that Government had agreed to look on this question in the light in which, I venture to suggest, it should be looked at and not to insist upon the attribute of infallibility, to which, certainly, their action, on this occasion, does not indicate they have any very great claim. If they will persist, what is the secret motive? What should induce hon. Ministers against the will of the country, against the will of many of their own friends, against common sense, against light -

Mr. BLAKE. Against light, against reason,-I do not mean to appeal to the member for Carleton.

Mr. ROCHESTER. I am glad you do not.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not pretend that he is open to conviction. Why will hon gentlemen opposite, against light and reason, insist upon this contract? What is the reason we could not get the first offers? They are secret, concealed from us. The old contract was secret, and concealed from us. No advertisement was issue for this contract. The whole work was done in the dark. What is the secret reason or motive for all this mystery, andwhy is it that we cau learn so little of the circumstances which preceded that fatal action? We know not But we may conjecture for ourselves that this, no more than those other things, was concealed from the pure air and light of day without some reason. What is the secret reason and notive of this persistence? Let the House and the Country answer. The hon, gentleman has alleged that if I had my way I would be disposed to give those acres and subsidies for the middle section on the prairies alone, and give up the ends of the road. The hon, gentleman had no right to say so, and I tell him he is wholly wrong. I have already stated, and I will now repeat, that I believe that the errors of the contract, in regard to the distribution of the subsidies, exist in a modified form, though to a highly important extent, in the offer that I believe three prices for the prairie section would, perhaps, instead of four, be prescribed in the offer, and that I would not affirm it to be advisable for the House to give three prices for the prairie section standing alone. My opinion is that the prairie section ought to be constructed itself by a company for a subsidy much less than its cost, because if the company was to work it would be a profitable section to work after a while. Entertaining that opinion it would certainly be an act of treason on my part to propose to pay three prices for its construction standing alone. But this this does not interfere with the offer for the whole line. The hon, gentleman says that the fact that the monopoly clause is struck out of this present offer is a proof that it is not genuine, because no man in his senses would offer, he says, to build and run the railway without the monopoly clause. Well, Sir, this gives us a little of the true inwardness of this monopoly clause. It proves to us that this is a Syndicate clause and not a Government policy, and that proof is quite consistent with the observation I formerly made that the Syndicate is free to build if it pleases, and that all the rest of the world is restrained. I say, Sir, that there could be no better proof of the monstrous character of the policy in which the hon gentleman proposes involving the country, than that he should tell the House deliberately that no company would undertake to construct and work this railway including both ends, without a monopoly of the North-West Territory for 20 years, and I say that if that is the-price we are called on to pay for the immediate construction of the road, it is a price too great, and one which we should we can contrast those offorts with your determination to never be called upon to pay. The hon, gentleman says ruin our common country. I want to know whether, under Mr. BLAKE.

that we shall destroy the future of our country by our suggestion; that we expose it to American subjugation, that American railways and American combinations will control us, and that we shall be a miserable country under the heel of these great corporations, and under the control of their working. Well, Sir, my opinion is that if this contract goes into force you will have this American system of working railways introduced into the North-West. It is the working of the American system and their views that we have demonstrated as applying to the St. Paul and Manitoba Railway, and you will simply be importing that system into our own North-West Territories. But the hon, gentleman doubtless intended to go, and did go, further. He says that the policy of proceeding slowly with the building of the ends and getting in the meantime the connection by the Sault was one involving American subjugation. I say that there is but one way in which you can imperil the future of this country and render possible that dark future which the hon. gentleman depicts, and that is by so burdening the resources and crushing the energies and the standing the development of this country that you drive it into this course of destruction. I say that what hon, gentlemen are proposing to do to-day, at once inflicting great burdens on us and at the same time taking away our hope of relief, from the monopolies and the exemptions they are creating in the North-West, is the real road to that American subjugation which the hon. gentleman professes to dread. Give us a reasonable taxation, give us no undue burdens, give us a rapid development of the North-West, give us an early all-rail connection with that country, and you leave us free from those inducements to change which the plan which the hon, gentleman proposes may perhaps involve. But tell us that with one hand you will impose on us all these heavy, heavy burdens, and with the other withdraw from us as you are doing all the expected compensations from the North-West, and then you yourselves commit the mischief you profess to deprecate. We know what the politicians of Prince Edward Island say. They say that her local men raised her debt by building a railway to such a pitch that she had to go into the Confederation because she could not pay her taxes. They say she was railroaded into Confederation. We know that the local politicans of Newfoundland proposed to build a railway, and it was immediately charged against them that they wanted to raise her debt so as to throw the Province into Confederation. And such was the feeling that I believe it is an ordinary custom for the electors of that Province, to require from their candidates that they shall take a solemn oath not to advocate Confederation, before they will trust them with their suffrages. If Prince Edward Island was taxed into Confederation, and Newfoundland was threatened to be taxed into Confederation, what are you doing with regard to the Domimon of Canada? You propose with one hand to tax us and with the other to withdraw those resources out of which taxation may be paid. You are proposing to make our condition almost intolerable. It is easy to see the game of the Government. The game is to call this proposal, signed as it is, and backed as it is by money and means, a mere farce, a trick, which they say we shall be ashamed to mention two years hence. Sir, the hon. gentleman will find it mentioned two years hence, and that other parties than ourselves will be ashamed to refer to this transaction; he will find it is not the offer which will be a source of shame, but the contract which he proposes shall supersede the offer. He will find that not now, not two years, nor ten, nor twenty years hence will the Liberal party have occasion to be ashamed of any proposition or sugges tion they have made, of any action they have proposed to take. We can point with pride to our efforts to save the country, and we can contrast those offorts with your determination to all these circumstances, in the face of all this, you are determined to persist. If you determine to persist, I can only say that you remind me of nothing so much as those of old who being possessed by evil spirits rushed violently down a steep place into the sea and all perished in the waters; for sure 1 am that those who propose to vote for this contract under these present circumstances, are first ruining their country and afterwards committing political suicide. But, Sir, I will hope for better things, and in order that the feelings of this House may be tested and its opinion obtained upon the state of things as we present it, I move in amendment, that the said resolutions be not now read a second time, but that it be resolved:

That the late Government invited tenders for the construction and working of the Canadian Pacific Railway, under the Act of 1874.

That no tenders were received in answer to those invitations.

That no tenders were received in answer to those invitations. That the policy of the present Government approved by this House in the Session of 1879, was to obtain Imperial aid towards the work. That the policy of the present Government approved by this House in the Session of 1880, was to construct the Railway as a Government work. That it appears that during the recess the Government determined to attempt to make a Contract for the construction and working of the Railway on wholly new conditions.

That the Canadian Pacific Railway Act provides that the works on any

That the Canadian Pacific Railway Act provides that the works on any section or sub-section of the Railway shall not be given out to any Contractor except after tenders shall have been obtained therefor.

That the Government did not invite tenders on the basis of the said new conditions or at all.

That such new conditions were not made known by the Government at

That such new conditions were not made known by the Government at any time prior to the making of the Contract nor until the night of the 10th December last, when the Contract was laid on the Table.

That the said new conditions, not authorized or contemplated by the Canadian Pacific Railway Act, are of the most vital importance, and amongst the same are the following:—

1. By the Act no power is given to the Government to agree with the

1. By the Act no power is given to the Government to agree with the Contractors to construct, for the benefit of the Contractors, sections of the work to be handed over to the Contractors.

By the Contract the Government binds itself to complete the unfinished sections, to begin and finish the heaviest section now unlet, and to hand over to the Contractors for their own benefit the works, including those now in operation, and comprising over 700 miles of Railway, of which the Pembina Branch alone is yielding nearly $70,000 a year net revenue.

2. By the Act the cash expenditure of the Government, as principal money to be paid to the Contractors, is to be $10,000 a mile, or about $27,000,000 for the whole line; apart from the cost of surveys which might or might not form part thereof.

By the Contract the cash expenditure of the Government, as principal money of which the Contractors receive the benefit, is to be in cash and works to be handed over to the Contractors, at least $53,000,000, apart from the cost of surveys which do not form part thereof.

3. By the Act the land grant is to be taken so far as obtainable along or in the immediate vicinity of the whole line of Railway to the Pacific Ocean, and is to be of fair average quality, thus embracing a large proportion of land not fit for settlement.

By the Contract the land is all to be taken in the North-West Territories, between Selkirk and Jasper, and is not to include any land not fairly fit for settlement.

4. By the Act the land not to be found near the Railway is to be appropriated at other places, to be determined by the Government.

By the Contract the Contractors are given large powers of selection of the land.

5. By the Act the Government is to have control of the sales of two-thirds of the land grant.

By the Contract this power is taken away.

By the Act the subsidy and land grant are to be payable in proportion to the value of the work done as compared with the estimated value of the work contracted for

By the Contract the subsidy and land grant are to be payable in amounts wholly disproportionate on the prairie section, which is the easiest and most profitable, and is intended to be earliest completed.

7. Under the Act the property and capital stock of the Company remain liable to Dominion, Provincial and Municipal taxation.

By the Contract such property and capital stock are perpetually exempted from taxation by the Dominion, new Provinces or Municipalities

8. Under the Act the land grant of the Company remains subject to

By the Contract the land grant is exempted from the Dominion, Provincial and Municipal taxation before mentioned, until sold or occupied, for twenty years from the date of the grant.

9. Under the Act all the materials required by the Contractors remain subject to import duties.

By the Contract a large part of such materials is exempted from import duties.

10. Under the Act Parliament and any new Provinces are in no wise hindered from authorizing the construction of other railways as the public interest may require.

By the Contract it is agreed that Parliament and any new Provinces shall not for twenty years authorize the construction of any railways running in certain directions which might interfere with the Canadian Pacific Railway.

11. By the Act the Government has unrestricted power to regulate from time to time the tariff of tolls.

By the Contract the rower of the Contract.

By the Contract, the power of the Government to reduce an established tariff is limited to the case in which the Company is making a net revenue exceeding 10 per cent. on the capital invested in the construction of the railway.

12. Under the Act the Government would have power to prescribe from time to time the accommodation and the trains to be provided by the Company.

By the Contract such power is not given to the Government.

13. Under the Act the Government would have power to acquire the Railway at any time the public interest might demand. By the Contract the Government has no such power.

14. By the Act the grades of the Railway and the materials and manner of construction and the mode of working, including the description and capacity of the rolling stock, are to be such as may be determined by the Governor in Council; and it was formerly the declared policy of Governments and Parliament that the grades should be very low.

By the Contract the Union Pacific Railway as first constructed is fixed as the approximate standard; and its grades are very high.

15. By the Act no power is given to the Company to build branch railways, save one to Georgian Bay and one to Pembina.

By the Contract power is given to the Company forever to build branch lines in various parts of the Dominion.

16. By the Contract divers other important privileges and powers are given to the Company not authorized or contemplated by the Act.

That such new conditions wholly alter the basis for tendering.

That no opportunity was given to Canadian capitalists or to the public to tender for the work on the basis of any of such new conditions.

That by the Canadian Pacific Railway Act it is provided that no Contract made under the authority of that Act for the construction of any portion of the main line of the Railway shall be binding until it shall have been laid before the House of Commons for one month without being disapproved, unless sooner approved by a resolution of the House.

That the Contract now on the Table does not come within the previsions of the said Act, and is of no force unless legalized by Parlia-

That the said Contract expressly provides that the same shall be binding only in the event of an Act of Incorporation being granted to the projected Company as set out in Schedule A to the Contract.

That Parliament is free to reject such a Bill.

That it is now proposed that Parliament shall legalize the Contract.

That this House is under no obligation to do so, and it is its duty to refuse to do so, unless satisfied that the public interest requires such a step.

That the conditions of the Contract are extremely onerous and disadvantageous to the country.

That it now appears that terms much more favorable to the country. can be obtained.

That on the 14th day of January instant, only five weeks after the said new conditions were made public, an offer, which is now on the Table, was made to the Government by Canadian capitalists of high standing and ample means, credit, and business ability, comprising. Sir W. P. Howland, H. H. Cook, A. R. McMaster, Wm. Hendrie, John Stuart, John Proctor, P. S. Stephenson, John Walker, D. MacFie, Peleg Howland, A. T. Wood, Allan Gilmour, J. Carruthers, K. Chisholm, A. W. Ross, Geo A. Cox, P. Larkin, W. D. Lovitt, Barnet & McKay, James McLaren, and Alexander Gibson, to complete those parts of the Railway to be built by the Contractors, and to equip and maintain and work the whole Railway from Lake Nipissing to the Pacific Ocean, and to perform all the obligations undertaken by the Contractors on terms far less onerous to the country, in the following respects: far less onerous to the country, in the following respects:-

1. The Contract provides for a cash subsidy of $25,000,000, and a land grant of 25,000,000 acres.

The offer proposes to accept $22,000,000 and 22,000,000 acres, making a saving of $3,000,000 in cash, and 3,000,000 acres, equal, at the Government estimate of $3,18 per acre to $9,510,000, or a total saving of $12,-540,000 on this head.

2. The Contract provides as a Standard the Union Pacific Railway as first constructed.

The offer proposes that Railway as in 1873.

3. The Contract provides for the giving of $9,000,000 and 11,250,000 acres for the prairie 900 miles.

The offer proposes to accept $6,600,000 cash and 9,000,000 acres for the same work, making a saving on that part, of $2,400,000 and 2,250,-000 acres, or a total saving on that part, at the Government estimate, of $9,555,000.

4 The Contract provides for the giving of $6,000,000 cash and 7,500,000 acres for the Western 450 miles to Kamloops.

The offer proposes to accept $5,400,000 cash and 6,750,000 acres for the same work, making a saving on that part of $600,000 cash and 750,000 acres, or a total saving on that part, at the Government estimate of $600,000 cash.

750,000 acres, or a total saving on that part, at the Government estimate, of $2,985,000.

5. The Contract provides that the Government shall permit the admission free of duty of all steel rails, fish-plates and other fastenings, spikes, bolts and nails, wire, timber, and all material for bridges to be used in the original construction of the railway, and of a telegraph line in connection therewith and all the telegraphic apparatus raquired for the first equipment of such telegraph line.

The Contract provides that the Canadian Pacific Railway and all tations and station grounds, workshops, buildings, yards, and other property, rolling stock and appurtenances, required and used for the construction and working thereof, and the capital stock of the Company, shall be for ever free from taxation by the Dominion or by the municipal

The offer proposes to undertake the obligations without any such exemption, thereby effecting a great further public gain, and removing a most serious hindrance to the development of the North-West.

9. The Contract contains no provision giving to the Government power to acquire the Railway.

The offer proposes that the Government shall be entitled at any time after completion to acquire the Railway on terms to be settled by agreement or arbitration, thus enabling the Government, in case the public interest shall be found at any time to demand that step, to acquire the Railway with a view to its being dealt with as those interests may then

Company in the several Provinces.

The offer proposes that the Act to be passed shall provide for the opening of stock books in the principal cities of each Province with a view to such allotment.

That the said offer, besides its proposal for the whole line, contains certain alternative proposals in case the Government stould desire to withdraw from or postpone the construction of certain paris of the line by the Contractors. That the conditions of those alternative proposals are not such as should be accepted, but the refusal to accept the same leaves untouched the offer for the whole line, which stands independent of the said alternatives.

That it appears that the said tenderers have deposited in chartered Banks of Canada over $1.400,000, which is held by such banks as security that if the tender is accepted and the charter granted, the million of dollars to be deposited with the Government as security for construction will be deposited as proposed by the tender.

That it is not in the public interest that the Contract according to the terms of which the $25,000,000 and 25,000,000 acres are proposed to be granted, should be legalized.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Mr. Speaker, it has been my good fortune, Sir, during many years of public life, to listen, either in the local Legislature of my Province or in the Parliament of Canada, to many important and interesting discussions, and I do not hesitate to say, Sir, the debate which has taken place on this great and important question has been dealt with on both sides of the House in a most masterly manner. I have felt during the last three or four days, that it would be almost presumption on the part of any member on this side of the House to undertake to add one word to the able and eloquent and exhaustive speeches that have been delivered by my colleagues in the Government and by our supporters behind us and in front of us. Sir, we know that with the ability, the eminent ability of the leader of the Opposition, and able men who sit behind him, are quite competent and able to deal with this or any other almost everything that could be said for or against this question, has been said, and it did appear to me Sir, this evening, when the leader of the Opposition was taking up this subject and arguing it in the manner he has done—and in an able manner too-it was scarcely necessary for him to throw out the insinuation, or to ask the question: " Is it possible that there are members in this House who will sink so low as to ratify the contract which is submitted for consideration." Sir, it did appear to me that if the hon. member had a good case, if he had a strong case, if he had an irresistible case, he would depend upon his arguments rather than upon the imputation which he cast on mem, bers sitting on this side of the House. Sir, with the risk of going over ground that has been already traversed half a dozen times, though I have precedent for it—for I think that a large portion of the speech made by the hon.gentleman (Mr. Blake) has been for the sixth time made either here or out of Parliament-and therefore, I am emboldened to occupy ground and repeat arguments which have been adduced perhaps in a more able manner, and represented more ably than is in my power to-night; but it is necessary, in order that we may see exactly what our position is, where we stand and what is expected from us in the country, to go back into the early history of this question of building the Canadian Pacific Railway. Sir, the hon. member asks: "Can we sink so low as to ratify this contract?" Let me say that, as one of the members of the Government of 1873, as a member of the House of Commons at that time and as a representative of one of the constituencies of the Dominion of Canada, I feel, Sir, that I am bound—and I believe in the interests of this country—to see ratified and carried out the agreement that was entered into when British Columbia was admitted as part and portion of the Dominion of Canada. Sir, we all know, and recollect perfectly well, the discussion which took place in this House in 18,1 and 1872 upon this question. We know the opposition that was offered to the admission of British Columbia on the terms contained in the Union agreement, and also the objections which were offered to the proposition to construct the Pacific Railway. Further, we all remember perfectly the conditions which surrounded that proposition by the votes of Parliament and by the terms of Union, and I say, however, that we, especially on this side of the House, are bound to see them carried out. and I hold that the hon. gentlemen opposite are even more bound than we are to see them fulfilled. What was the state of the case in 1873 when hongentlemen opposite came into power? The leader of the late Government, in his place the other night, said the hon member for Bothwell had intimated that it was quite competent for the Parliament of Canada to have passed a law which would have swept away terms and conditions of Union upon which British Columbia came into Confederation He took exception to this, and did not concur with the hon. gentleman. He did not believe it would have been right or proper to do so under the circumstances, and held that they had not the right by legislation to deprive British Columbia of any of the terms or conditions contained in the contract. Sir, there was only one way in which this could have been obviated. The leader of the Opposition stated to-night that he had said to British Columbia: If it is necessary that we should carry out the terms of Union with reference to the construction of this railway in all its details, rather than do that, you can go.

Mr. BLAKE. No, I did not. I said if you depend, as the price of that connection, upon these terms, I would say, you can go.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Then I would say that that is a distinction without a difference. Sir, when the hon. gentlequestion in a most exhaustive and complete manner. We man was a member of the Government in 1873, and up to know, Sir, that during the discussion which has occupied February, 1874, did he say to British Columbia, when they -three or four weeks, in Parliament and out of Parliament, had the only opportunity in their power, or the power of Parliament, to take advantage of, in order to relieve them from these terms: "We feel that this arrangement, which was made by the late Government, is too onerous, and that the responsibility is too great, and instead of carrying them out, we leave to you the option of withdrawing from the Union?" No, Sir; and yet this was the only thing it was left open to the Government of the time to do, if they believed that this contract was one which could not be literally or fairly carried out. As honest men they should have told British Columbia: "We cannot hold to this contract; we cannot but violate these conditions, and we say to you, that if you insist upon it, go in peace." No, Sir, they did not say so, and, in failing to do so, they admitted that the terms that they urged were onerous, and such that they could not be literally carried out by the Government of this country. They looked at the advantages of having British Columbia in the Union, and said: "No; we will not offer British Columbia the choice of going out, but we will make such arrangements and conditions with her as we feel we can carry out; and they bound themselves to terms and conditions which were still more onerous and more difficult to carry out, and imposed a greater responsibility than did the terms in which that Province came into the Union. Sir, what did they do? Though the original terms declared, by the vote of this Parliament, that this road was only to be built on condition that it did not increase the rate of taxation, what did they do, Sir? Why, they increased the taxation of this country $3,000,000 a year; and for what purpose? In order to enable them to carry out the terms of Union and construct the Canadian Pacific Railway. And what more did they do, Sir? They came down to this House and passed an Act, in 1874, which p ovided that, in lieu of what had been previously agreed upon, which was $30,000,000 and 50,000,000 acres of land, they would give $10,000 a mile, and 20,000 acres of land per mile, and further to give whatever might be considered reasonable. We will take the illustration made here the other night in the case of the Georgian Bay Branch, in connection with which was also offered 4 per cent. for twenty-five years on such sum as might be named by parties tendering, and land worth, at $1 an acre, $30,000 a mile, and at $2 an acre, $50,000 a mile. They said, we will give 4 per cent. additional on what sum may be considered necessary, and in the case of the Georgian Bay Branch the Government agreed to pay interest on $7,500 a mile for twenty-five years; and what more, Sir? They provided for the construction of 120 miles of railway, for which no provision whatever was made by the late Administration, at a cost of $1,400,000; and did they provide that the land which should be granted should be subject to taxation? Not at all. Provision was made as follows:-

"20,000 acres for each mile of the second sub-section contracted for shall be appropriated in alternate sections, taken along the line of such railway, or at convenient distance therefrom, each section having a frontage of not less than 3 miles or more than 6 miles, on the line of such railway; and two-thirds of the quantity—which was 36 million acres so appropriated, shall be sold by the Government at such price as may from time to time be agreed upon between the Governor in Council and contractors, and the proceeds thereon shall be accounted for and paid."

To the contractors, free from any charge of administration, as well as of management, and the remaining one-third be paid to the contractors. Thirty-six millions of the fiftyfour million acres were to remain in the possession of the Government to be sold by them and not subject to taxation until sold. What is the case under the present proposition:

"The said lands to be of fair average quality and not to include any land already granted or occupied under any patent, license of occupation or pre-emption right, and when a sufficient quantity cannot be found in the immediate vicinity of the railway, then the same quantity or as much as may be required to complete such quantity shall be appropriated at such other places as may be determined by the Governor in Council."

They provided that there should be 54,000,000 acres of land, $27,000,000 in cash, and $1,400,000, which amount—admitting the estimate made by the hon, members for Brant and West Middlesex the other night-capitalized makes $4,376 per mile, or $13,000,000, and for the branches over $13,000,000, to be added to the present proportion. Sir, what did they do further than this? They entered into more onerous engagements than existed in 1873. It was found that remonstrances came from British Columbia. Remonstrances were laid, I may say, at the foot of the Throne by the Government of British Columbia. They sent a representative to England, which led eventually to the services of Lord Carnarvon, the then Secretary of State for the Colonies, being brought into play to settle this difficult and important question. What do we find were the terms agreed upon by the late Government in order to settle this question with British Columbia? I have them before me here, and I will read them because they establish most clearly that the proposition accepted by the late Government was more onerous and more expensive to Canada than was the proposition of 1873:

"1. That the railway from Esquimault to Nanaimo shall be commenced as soon as possible and completed with all practicable despatch.

"2. That the surveys on the mainland shall be pushed on with the utmost vigor.—On this point after considering the representations of your Ministers, I feel that I have no alternative but to rely, as I do most fully and readily upon their assurances that no legitimate effort or expense will be spared first to determine the best route for the line; and, secondly, to proceed with the details of the engineering work. It would be distasteful to me, if indeed it were not impossible, to prescribe strictly any minimum of the time or expenditure with regard to work of so uncertain a nature, but, happily, it is equally impossible for me to doubt that your Government will loyally do its best in every way to accelerate the completion of a duty left freely to its sense of honor and justice.

"3. That the waggon road and telegraph line shall be immediately constructed."

This was no part of the original agreement. It was one of the propositions made to the late Government in 1874; but that was withdrawn, and we find that the late Government agreed that a waggon road and telegraph line should be constructed. The estimated cost of the telegraph line alone was million dollars, which has to be added to the liability agreed to by hon, gentlemen opposite. It goes on:

"There seems here to be some little difference of opinion as to the special value to the Province of the undertaking to complete these two works; but after considering what has been said, I am of opinion that they should both be proceeded with at once, as indeed is suggested by your Ministers.

"4. That $2,000,000 a year and not $1,500,000 shall be the minimum expenditure on railway works within the Province, from the date at which the surveys are sufficiently completed to enable that amount to expended on construction. In naming this amount I understand that, it being alike the interest and the wish of the Dominion Government to urge on with all speed the completion of the works now to be un ertaken, the annual expenditure will be as much in excess of the minimum of $2,000,000 as in any year may be found practicable.

"5. Lastly, That on or before the 31st of December, 1890, the railway

"5. Lastly, That on or before the 31st of December, 1890, the railway shall be completed and open for traffic from the Pacific sea-board to a point at the western end of Lake Superior, at which it will fall into connection with existing lines of railway through a portion of the United States, and also with the navigation on Canadian waters. To proceed at present with the remainder of the railway extending by the country northward of Lake Superior, to the existing Canadian lines ought not, in my opinion, to be required, and the time for undertaking that work must be determined by the development of settlement and the changing circumstances of the country. The day is, however, I hope, not very far distant when a continuous line of railway, through Canadian territory, will be practicable, and I, therefore, look upon the position of the scheme as postponed rather than abandoned."

This, Sir, was the proposition made by Lord Carnarvon through the Governor General. I will now read an extract from the Minute of Council in answer to this proposition:

"The Committee of Council respectfully request that Your Excellency will be pleased to convey to Lord Uarnarvon their warm appreciation of the kindness which led his Lordship to tender his good offices to effect a settlement of the matter in dispute, and also to assure his Lordship that every effort will be made to secure the realization of what is expected."

In answer to that, Lord Carnarvon said:

"It has been with great pleasure that I have received this expression of their opinion. I sincerely rejoice to have been the means of bringing to a satisfactory conclusion a question of so much difficulty, of removing, as I trust, all ground of future misunderstanding between the Province of British Columbia and the Dominion, and of thus contributing towards the ultimate completion of a public work in which they, and indeed the whole Empire, are interested."

Now, Sir, this was the agreement entered into by hon. gentlemen opposite, which as I stated before, was certainly more onerous than the original proposition of 1871-2. Well, Sir, the operation of this proposition, with reference to the Nanzimo Branch of the railroad, was suspended by an adverse vote in the Senate. The Government of the day were censured, and especially the leader of the Government. The insinuation was thrown out that he was a party really to the defeat of the proposition, and when Lord Dufferin visited British Columbia he made a statement which, as we all know, could only be made on the responsibility of his advisers. What did he say in defence of the then leader of the Government:

"I would sooner cut my right hand off than utter a single word that I o not know to be an absolute truth. Had Mr. Mac-"I would sooner cut my right hand off than utter a single word that I do not know to be an absolute truth. * * * Had Mr. Mackenzie dealt so treacherously by Lord Carnarvon, by the representative of his Sovereign in this country, or by you, he would have been guilty of a most atrocious act, of which I trust no public man in Canada or in any other British colony could be capable. I tell you in the most emphatic terms, and I pledge my honor on the point that Mr. Mackenzie was not guilty of any such base and deceifful conduct; had I thought him guilty of it, either he would have ceased to be Prime Minister, or I should have left the country." left the country."

Then he goes on to speak the opinions and intentions of the Government. He says:

"My only object in touching upon them at all is to disabuse your minds of the idea that there has been any intention on the part of Mr. Mackenzie, his Government, or of Canada, to break faith with you. Every single item of the Carnarvon Terms is at this moment in course of fulfilment."

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us see where we stand at this period in the proceedings. Here an opportunity was open to these hon, gentlemen when the Government was formed, of which the present leader of the Opposition was a member. They went to the country and declared distinctly that this policy would be carried out. They brought down a Bill and placed it upon the Statute-book giving 54,000,000 acres of land and $27,000,000 for the completion of that road. They provided for $1,400,000 to be paid in addition to that, and they practically provided for $13,000,000 to be paid in addition, which, if you add the whole together is $41,500,000 and 54,000,000 acres of land. They undertook to build a telegraph line in addition to that at a cost of another million dollars, making the whole expenditure under the Bill of 1874, and under the contracts they entered into subsequently, $96,500,000 - making it infinitely more expensive than the proposition of 1873, and more expensive by $20,000,000 than the proposition now on the Table of the House. In addition to that, what did they do? A large portion of this 50,000,000 acres of land was not lying near the railway, and which, according to the arguments of my hon. friend opposite, was less valuable than the 25,000,000 in the present proposition. Admitting such to be the case, what did they do in addition to what I have already stated? They brought down in 1878 a Bill expressive of the opinions of that Government, and which gave to the country their policy. In order to make these 54,000,000 acres of land more valuable. they decided to give 10,000 acres of land per mile to the branches in order to carry those branches through the 54,000,-000 acres and make them as valuable as if they lay close Therefore, in addition to 54,000,000 acres to the railway. and $40,000,000 odd, they gave 64,000,000 acres of land under the provisions of these two Acts, and $40,000,000 of money for the construction of that railway and its branches. Whereas the proposition before the House at the present time gives not a dollar for the branches in the shape of land which may be estimated at a dollar an acre. Let me read the terms of the three propositions that have been made by Parliament, and let me give you what I consider is the practical operation of these terms; then it will be for hon. members opposite to point out, if they can, any fallacy in this statement. In 1872 we concluded, because they form a part of the agreement that Sir LEONARD TILLEY.

provided 50,000,000 acres of land and $30,000,000; branches. say 170 miles, at an average of $1 an acre, $3,400,000, $83,400,000. Valuing the land at an average of $2 an acre it would be $136,800,000. If we have 150,000,000 acres of land fit for settlement, as it is alleged, it would leave in the hands of the Government 96,600,900 acres. The proposition of 1874 was: for main line, say 2,600 miles, cash, $10,000 per mile, $26,000,000; land, 52,000,000 acres; interest, 4 per cent., or $7,500 per mile, for 25 years, $12,400,000; branches, 170 miles, $1,700,000, Georgian Bay Branch, $405,280; land, 20,000 acres per mile, 170 miles, 3,400,000 acres; $12,000 per mile to Canada Central, cash, $1,444,000, total, $97,349,280. If the calculation was made at $2 an acre it would amount to $152,449,280; land left in hands of Government, 92,600,000 acres. Now we come to the proposition of 1880. Money expenditure and sums required to complete sections of railway, $28,000,000; eash bonus, $25,000,000; land, 25,000,000 acres at $1 an acre, $25.000,000; subsidy to Canada Central, $1,444,000; total $79,444,000. If calculated at $2 an acre, $104,444.900; land left with the Government, 125,000,000 acres. If we add to that the proposal of 1878, in reference to the branches, you have for 1,000 miles of branches at 10,000 acres per mile, $10,000,600. You have then, the proposal of 1874, $97,349,280; 10,000,000 acres for branches at $1 per acre, $10,000,000. If the land for main line and branches were computed at $2 an acre, 67,400,000 acres, the total would be, under the 1874 proposition, $174,749,280, as against $124,444,000 for main line and branches under the present arrangement. This statement I hold is not susceptible of being broken down in any form. Now let us see in what condition we stood in 1878. In that year the obligation rested upon the Government of constructing the Pacific Railway, in ten years, from Thunder Bay to the Pacific coast, the obligation to spend at least $2,000,000 a year in British Columbia. This is evidence that the Government intended carrying that out, or else there was fraud and deception, which I cannot believe. We find that, on May 20th, 1876, there was an advertisement published inviting proposals for building the Canada Pacific Railway. The hon. gentleman read the Canada Pacific Railway notice of the 20th of May, and continued: This you would imagine was evidence, as strong as it was possible for any evidence to be, that the Government was sincere, and that they were determined to carry out in 1876, and again in 1878, the contract which they had solemnly entered into, and which was ratified by Parliament in 1874-5 by a solemn compact made by the Government of Canada, to which the Imperial Government was a party—a compact between the Imperial Government, the Government of British Columbia, and the Government of Canada—that this contract would be honorably, honestly, and faithfully fulfilled. Well, Sir, down to 1878, when these gentlemen left the Government, no active steps in this direction had been taken. These advertisements had been asked for, and some iron rails had been removed from Vancouver Island to the mainland,—evidence on the part of the Government of their intention to proceed honestly and fairly in accordance with the contract they had entered into. Will it be said this was a delusion and a sham? Certainly not; I cannot believe for a moment, I would not insinuate for an instant, that the members of the Administration were not sincerely determined to carry out this work. And let me go a little further. Let me say, Sir-while it has been insinuated that the delay that took place in the surveys was for the purpose of evading, for a time, the responsibilities upon which they entered, I will not say that I will take it for granted they did everything in good faith in reference to this matter; and I ask the House and the country whether there could be any more binding obligation on the part of the Government than this obligation to go on when the surveys were the moment the surveys were completed, so as to enable them to locate the road, they should proceed at once with the expenditure of $2,000,000 a year. It has been said by the leader of the Opposition that throughout this matter they never lost sight of the original resolution, which provided that the taxation of the country should not be increased, but they did it in 1874, when they deliberately—I do not blame them for it—took upon themselves to change that original resolution and did tax the people of this country to the extent of $3,000,000 a year for its completion. That the taxation was increased is a matter of record. It cannot be gainsaid. If the hon, member had been in his place, and I regret he is not, I would ask him why, when the surveys were completed, they opposed this Gov-ernment in 1880, a year ago, when we brought down a proposition for the purpose of building the road, as printed in the contract they had entered into. I would ask him why they did not give us their support in assisting us to carry out the agreement, and why they moved an amendment here which declared that the contract entered into should be violated by stopping all expenditure in British Columbia, on the ground that the taxation of the country should not be increased. I believe that is the ground he took. Now, I hold that we were not relieved by the circumstances of the country in that respect. They were not relieved by the financial condition of the country. I have in my hand some statements that I have prepared, and I am satisfied that with reference to their accuracy there can be no doubt. They show what the taxation of the people of Canada was at the different periods when this subject was under the consideration of Parlia ment. What was it in 1871? The Customs revenue for the year 1870 and 1871—that was the year it was first introduced was $11,841,104; Excise, $4.295,944; total, $16,137,048. The average population according to the Census of 187, which was 3,485,761, showed that from Excise and Customs, which establish the taxes of the country, was $4.63\frac{1}{2} per head.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. No; $2.75.

Sir SAMUEL L. TILLEY. What I have stated is the fact. In 1874, when the late Government came down and increased taxation, what was the result? I have grouped 1873-4 and 1874-5, because the effect of the Tariff then introduced by the hon. Minister of Finance rendered this necessary. In 1873-4 receipts from Customs were $14,325,192; from Excise, $5.594,903; in 1874.5 the receipts from Customs were $15,341,011; from Excise, $5,069,687, making a total of $40,340,793; the estimated population was at that time 3,800,000, or an average per head of $5.31. In 1876-7 the receipts from Customs were $12,546,987; from Excise, $4,941,897; in 1877-8 the receipts from Customs were $12,782,824; from Excise, $4,858,671, making a total of $35,130,379; the estimated population at that time being 3,900,000, or an average of $4.50 per head. The estimates for the current year were: From Customs, $15,300,000; from Excise, $,213,000; making a total of $20,513,000, with a population of 4,000,000, and an average of $5.12\frac{3}{4} per head. Probable receipts from Customs, $17,000,000; from Excise, $5,200,000; making a total of $22,200,000; average, $5.55 per head. Now, can it be said by those hon gentlemen that they were restrained from carrying out their obligations because to do so was to increase taxation? If they had increased the taxation, by the propositions which it was said they contemplated at the time, from 172 per cent. to 20 per cent., then they would have had the means sufficient to have paid the necessary expenditure and without raising the taxation per head of the population above what it was when they made this engagement. The Government asked for the vote last year for the construction of this road to enable them to fulfil we estimated that our revenue would be $15,300,000 from Customs, and that the Excise duty would be equal to what it was in 18.3.4. We estimated last year that the Customs to be received this year would be $15,300,000, and the Excise duty $5,213,000, making a total of $20,013,000, an average of $5.12\frac{2}{3}, less than that of 1873-4 when they entered into this obligation. Then the hon gentlemen were found recreant to their pledges to British Columbia, and opposed this scheme upon the plea that it would lead to taxation, beyond what they themselves had placed upon the country, in order to carry this matter out. I cannot believe that the hon, member for Lambton, who I regret is not now in his place, readily and cheerfully accepted the resolution of the present leader of the Opposition. I cannot believe, considering the struggle that he appears to have made. step by step, in order to carry this out, that he readily accepted the proposition of the hon gentleman opposite. If we have a right to expect from our supporters on this side of the House, who have always been in favor of the construct on of a Pacific Railway on British territory, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, that they will support us in this scheme, we have a right also to expect that the hon. gentlemen who were members of the late Administration, from 1873 to 1878, and who, with the r supporters, renewed and extended the obligations we had entered into in 1871, should also accept the proposition which is now before the House. Yet we find them g ving their preference to the new offer, which is submitted for the purpose of defeating the whole scheme. I do not say this is done by those who place their names to the offer, but I mean those who first concocted and suggested it, knowing well that it could not be accepted by the members of this House, and ought not to be supported by the electors out of it, who believe in the con-struction of the Pacific Railway on British territory. There are some very extraordinary circumstances in connection with this matter. The gentlemen who are connected with this Syndicate have not concealed their views upon the subject of the construction of a Pacific Railway from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Many of them have given free and open expression to opinions adverse to such a project. A great portion of these gentlemen favored the proposition made a year ago by the leader of the Opposition. I believe they honestly felt that it was taking a greater responsibility upon the Dominion than we ought to assume. Well, it does appear to me strange that gentlemen who have entertained these opinions should have so soon changed them. Not long ago they thought it unwise for the Government to construct the road, though the Government had 125,000,000 acres of land left, and in addition a revenue, from the population that will be thrown in there, in excess of what the Syndicate received, of $4 or $5 per head, yet these sixteen individuals are prepared to throw their money into this scheme. What these gentlemen believed was dangerous for the Government to undertake, they are themselves prepared to assume. It has been asked why these gentlemen did not make this proposition before. It is said they did not know anything about it. This is a mistake as proved by the advertisements quoted. The hon leader of the Opposition said to-night that the condition of affairs in 1874 was different from the condition now. He said the land was not worth as much in 187+ as it is now, that money is more abundant now than it was then. Let me tell him that capitalists, members of Parliament and the Government, in 1871, valued that land at what it would be worth when the railway was constructed. Let me tell the hon, gentleman that the advertisement was in the papers and sent broadcast. The notice asking for tenders was published down to 1878, when the Pembina Branch was built, and when other contracts were well under way by the late Government, when we knew as much about it as we the contract entered into by the hon, gentlemen opposite, and do to-day. The hon, gentleman says he is prepared to stand by any statements of his when the circumstances are not changed! What are the changed circumstances from 1878 to the present moment, with reference to the value of this land, with reference to the facilities of getting into that country, and as to its future? Down to 1878 no tender was offered. It is said it was not known how liberal we were going to be. But I have just shown that the proposition of 1874 was more than we are proposing at the present moment, and still not one of those gentlemen took sufficient interest in the matter, or had sufficient public spirit, to make any offer to build the road upon terms better than those now proposed. This is my solution of the difficulty. Then, Sir, the Government was known to be solemnly pledged to the completion of the railroad from the head of Lake Superior to the Pacific Ocean, and if these gentlemen had then made a proposal, they would have been bound to construct it from beginning to end, and work it afterwards. But the changed attitude of hon gentlemen opposite last year, the declaration made by the leader of the Opposition, the vote of the party, and their subsequent opinions expressed everywhere as to the inadvisability of constructing and working the British Columbia section, are known everywhere; and if the terms "bogus," and "delusion," and a "snare" are applicable to anything, I do not think them applicable to the men who have put up their money, but to the hon members who have proposed to submit this proposition; because I am prepared to show that these gentlemen, knowing the views entertained by the Opposition, and knowing that the Government, under existing circumstances, could not possibly go back on the solemn contract they had entered into, felt sure that they would not have to deal with the Government whose policy was to build the road from ocean to ocean, but with those who have expressed their willingness to postpone the eastern and the British Columbia sections. The hon, gentleman says the money has been put up, Were I a capitalist, I would not hesitate to put up money on a proposition of this kind, knowing that there would be nothing to build but the prairie section of 900 miles, and that they would receive, free of cost to them, the 450 miles of railway at the head of Lake Superior and the Pembina Branch. That is one of the most lucrative propositions that could possibly be made. It is no wonder that they are prepared to take hold of this work. Suppose now that this proposition was accepted, and that the whole matter passed into the hands of hon, gentlemen opposite.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Suppose you accept it yourself

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. An acceptance by us of a proposition which on the face of it clearly declares the determination not to build what we hold to be necessary, would be an admission on our part that we are not to be true to British Columbia, or true to our own principles. No, Sir, it cannot be accepted, so far as this side of the House is concerned. Suppose that our friends opposite assumed the responsibility of dealing with this matter, having declared distinctly and emphatically that it is not desirable to build the British Columbia section, at present at all events, having declared in effect that they would not be bound by the solemn compact with British Columbia, would not their first act be to say: "Don't build anything in British Columbia. We accept your proposals not to do anything in British Columbia. Columbia or north of Lake Superior; we will give you, under the terms of your contract for the construction of the prairie section, 450 miles of railway at the head of Lake Superior and the Pembina Branch, together with the lands and money allotted to that section," and what would all that amount to? It would be as follows:—

Cash		$ 6,600,000

Total ...... $ 31,916,000 Sir Leonard Tilley. Valuing the land at a dollar an acre they would receive $35,362 a mile; at two dollars an acre, $45,362 a mile; or at three dollars an acre, $60,000 a mile for constructing 900 miles of railway between Winnipeg and the foot of the Rocky Mountains. Under these circumstances is it to be wondered at that these men are ready to make such a magnificent bargain for themselves?

Mr. MILLS. What do the terms with the Syndicate give them for the same section?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I will show what we give for the same section, and point out the fallacy of the argument used by the hon. gentlemen opposite, when they seek to establish that we are ruuning the risk of the Syndicate taking their money and lands and abandoning the whole thing after they have built the line to the foot of the Rocky Mountains. It has been said that under the terms of that contract these contractors may build from Red River to the foot of the Rocky Mountains; that they may then, after having obtained the sum of money per mile, and the land that is appropriated for that section, abandon it and make millions by the transaction. Let me say that cannot be done. What do the terms of this contract require? They require that while the prairie section is being rapidly constructed, the eastern portion of it, that portion of it north of Lake Superior, shall be continuously and vigorously prosecuted; that is, that each year—that road being 650 miles in length—65 miles of it shall be constructed.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. It does not say that.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It says what is equal to it, because it says distinctly that it must be prosecuted in such a manner year by year as that it will be finished in ten years. There is no question about that. What do we find? Three years have been named as the time necessary to build the prairie section, but it will probably require four years, especially if any delay occurs in the legislation on the subject. From the time that they commence operations next spring to build the road from Winnipeg to the foot of the Rocky Mountains—during that time (four years) they have to construct 280 miles north of Lake Superior; and it was of the utmost importance in the consideration of the Government that that condition should be placed in the contract, because we knew that, unless that portion of the work was pressed forward vigorously, a pressure might possibly be brought, at the expiration of three or four years, to abandon what we considered a point of vital importance in its construction. The 900 miles completed, and $9,000,000 paid under the terms of that Syndicate, and bonds issued and the money placed in the hands of the Government, they will receive eighty cents per acre for the land to which they are entitled. This will make for the 900 miles, cash at $10,000 per mile, $9,000,000; bonds, eighty cents per acre on 11,250 acres per mile, $9,000,000; 260 miles north of Lake Superior, at $15,381 per mile, $3,999;8±0; land grant (20 per cent. reserve held as security by the Government), 2,007,408 acres at $1 per acre, $2,007,408, making a total of $24,007,248 for the construction of 1,160 miles of railway. Supposing, at the expiration of this time, they forfeit their contract, they would loose $1,000,000 deposited, and interest for four years, $1,400,000, or $2,400,000 in all, which, deducted from the $24,007,248, leaves $22,007,248, that they would receive in money and lands at a dollar an acre. Supposing the Government had to take it out of their hands at the expiration of that time, then the 1,160 miles would cost the Government $19,317 per mile; and if you value that land at $1 an acre, it would cost $21,689 per mile, including the 260 miles north of Lake Superior. If at $2 per acre, the Government would obtain that 1,160 miles at $33,550. That would be the result supposing that, under the original contract, the road would again pass into the hands of the Government, so that even under these circumstances we would be pretty safe at all events. Now, Sir, we are asked to abandon the terms that have been entered into between the Government and the Syndicate, and accept the proposition before the House. I have given ample reason why the present Government, at all events, cannot accept these terms. The hon gentleman spent some time endeavoring to establish that the members of this House were free to act in dealing with this question. It appeared to me ridiculous to waste so much time in settling this point. The Government never pretended to say that the House was not free; but as far as the Government is concerned, we are not free. The offer is there, and I do not he state to say that were I an independent member, having supported the proposition for the construction of the Pacific Railway through British Columbia in 1871, having sustained the proposition a year ago for the construction of it by the Government, that now when a proposition was submitted that took it out of the hands of the Government, I would feel, as a vast majority of the people feel, that it is a relief to know the extent of the liabilities of the Government of Canada in the construction and management of this railway. Therefore, the statement of the hon. gentleman was an insult to every member of this House who may feel himself called on conscientiously to vote for this contract. I am satisfied there has been no pressu e placed on hon, members in reference to this matter. Had the Government a narrow majority of eight or ten, and the Government was determined to hold office and power—and I think we have given evidence in the very proposition before the Houe, that the Government was not bent in holding on to office and power-there might be ground for the hon. gentleman's suppostion; but the very course we have adopted precludes any such supposition. Even my hon, friend opposite has indicated that, in his judgment, the course taken by the Government is calculated to weaken rather than strengthen them. When the Government give up the patronage, the influence they may exercise under the distribution of patronagea power felt by some of us in 1878 in constituencies in which that patronage was exercised in the interests of the party-you have the assurance and the guarantee that the Government and its supporters are acting on patriotic principles. It is an assurance and guarantee that the Government and their supporters, if they sustain us, are acting upon patriotic principles. Nothing could be more illogical than the statement of the leader of the Opposition, and his arguments, with reference to the probable high freights that will be charged by this Syndicate. He told the House that the freights charged upon the line of railway, owned by some of the gentlemen who formed part of the Syndicate, were excessive and oppressive, and that, notwithstanding the great competition of railways in the United States, those railways charge 40 cents a bushel when 15 cents would pay. Did the hon, gentleman not say that?

Mr. BLAKE. I said there was a period, I think in November, when the charge was 40 cents.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Did the hon. gentleman not speak to-night of the monopolies of those railways, and read authorities to show the effect such monopolies had upon settlement, the high prices they charged, and that, too, in a country where the competition of railways is so great? What was the remedy he proposed? That we should build our road through American territory instead of encouraging the construction of a line of railway through the Dominion, and over which we would have legal authority to fix the tolls. It appears to me most illogical and marvellous that the hon gentleman should desire to make us ways. Last Session, when Bills were introduced asking as in the case of the present Syndicate, they were to receive authority to connect railroads in the North-West with those the subsidy for the Prairie section and the 450 miles of road n the States, the Government opposed the passage of such Bills, why did the hon. gentleman not then raise his voice against that proposition? Did the late leader of the Opposition raise his voice against it? Certainly not. What would be the advantage in giving away 40 or 50 million dollars and 25,000,000 acres of land to a company, if we were not to have the trade of the country to be opened up by the railway? It is in the interest of the Dominion that Parliament should take steps to secure the trade of the North-West, for our own sea ports instead of for the United States. We are completing our canals at the cost of millions, and proposing to spend millions more for the purpose of drawing the produce of the North-West to our own ports? The leader of the Opposition objected to the faxation exemption clauses; but taxation of railways is a very unusual thing in several Provinces of the Dominion. We have 900 miles of railways, in New Brunswick, 400 built by the Government of the Province or the Dominion, and 500 by companies with subsidies averaging perhaps, on the whole, $15,000 a mile; and yet there is not to-day, and has not been since 1870, one cent of taxation in any shape on those 500 miles owned by the people in that Province. In addition to that, authority was given to a company to build a road from Fredericton to Little Falls, 160 miles. The New Brunswick Legislature gave 10,000 acres per mile to encourage its construction, the company being free from taxation 10 years after the grant. With regard to the 1,800,000 acres thus granted, I know that a large portion of the grant was not given till long after the contract was made and the road completed. We did not hear, at the time, any great outery in the Province in regard to that matter. I have stated that the policy of Quebec has been to allow every iron or wooden road to go free of taxation. In Nova Scotia large subsidies have been given to railroads, and a similar policy has been followed in other Provinces. The principle is well recognized in all the Provinces, and when people go into the North-West and get 160 acres of land for $10, and a railroad within 24 miles of them-when they have all these facilities and advantages, I do not see why the representatives of the Dominion should be so solicitous for the welfare of these new-comers rather than for the interests of the rest of the Dominion. The hon, gentleman refers to the freedom from taxation of the 25,000,000 acres. Have I not shown that, of the 54,000,000 granted in 1874, 36,000,000 were to be free. I would like to know whether a word was said in opposition to that exemption in 1874.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Not a word.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Now the present exemption, however, is magnified into a serious business. Hon, gentlemen opposite say that the land is worth $2 an acre. But what guarantee is there, the Syndicate may say, that we will obtain that price for it. Is it likely that they will obtain $2 an acre when the Government are giving away every alternate block free, for settlement, and especially if the land is liable to taxation by the municipalities. know that much of that land would be, under such circumstances, to a great extent rendered valueless. It must be considered that this Syndicate will have to pay, during the first ten years of the construction of this work, at least $1,000,000 a year for interest and other expenses connected with the management of these lands, and in the next ten years, an average of $1,500,000 a year, making for the twenty years for interest on the money they would borrow and other expenses, $25,000,000. That has to come out of the lands in the first place. If subjected to anything like the taxation suggested by hon. gentlemen opposite, $1,000,000 a year, what capitalists would put a entirely dependent on a foreign country and on foreign rail- dollar into an enterprise under these circumstances, unless, from Thunder Bay to Selkirk, with the Pembina Branch? If subject to this competition, surely its lands should be free from taxation. Well, Sir, one of the difficulties they would have to contend with, was very clearly described by the hon leader of the Opposition last Session, and I will read another extract from his speech:

"Another circumstance which vitiates this estimate is, that settlers "Another circumstance which vitates this estimate is, that settlers will not buy railway lands as long as free grants are obtainable. I speak generally; of course there will be instances in which a settler will buy railway lands; and the capitalist who wants more than 320 acres will doubtless buy railway lands adjoining his free grant. But speaking generally, you will find that settlers will not purchase railway lands so long as free grants are obtainable. There is a good reason why they should not."

That is only one short year ago, and these circumstances have not changed in so material a degree since that time as to warrant any particular change of base. We have not changed our policy with reference to the giving of the lands. We have not decided, as we did in 1871, that the lands shall not be sold at less than $2.50 per acre. But the hon. gentleman now changes his opinion, though the circumstances have in no way altered. Again he says:

"The Session of 1878 followed with the same result nor did aught occur to shake the deliberate solemn and repeatedly affirmed declaration of Parliament on this subject. But meantime further progress was made, and to some inquiries the Government answered, that it hoped to be able shortly to advertise for tenders for the whole work on the land and money basis subject to the approval of Parliament. It was the policy of the Government, at the earliest moment at which the condition of surveys would plan by which the road could be constructed in any short time without increasing the rate of taxation."

Referring to probable receipts from lands, Mr. Blake said (page 1444, Hansard, 1880):

"All that we can get from the lands in that country for the next few years, during which we shall be engaged in the construction of the road, will not, I believe, do more than help to eke out that interest."

Now, Sir, what change has taken place? We have simply accepted what he considered the only available means of constructing the Pacific Railway without embarrassing the finances of the country, and still the hon. gentleman is not prepared to accept our proposal. He said his estimate of receipts per acre of land, based on the First Minister's calculation, was $1.75 per acre, and a little further on he added:

"But apart from these errors of calculation, reducing so largely the fund upon which we were to depend for building the Columbia section of the Canadian Pacific Railway, there are other considerations which wholly vitiate the estimate of the hon. gentleman. The average price to be realized largely depends upon the sale of lands in the nearre belts, and if anything occurs to disturb the sales in them, it is quite clear that even the smaller average I have stated cannot be realized."

Now, Sir, in the face of this declaration on the part of the hon. member, he now values the land at $3.18 per acre. And what circumstances have changed since that time? We know perfectly well that if these lands were subject to taxationif municipalities could impose any taxation upon them they thought proper-their value would be greatly reduced. Now, the hon gentleman argues in favor of a taxation that would render necessarily an increase of the subsidy, to be paid out of the Dominion Treasury, in order to induce the Company to accept the contract. The hon. gentleman will, perhaps, say now, that he escapes all responsibility for his declaration by proposing to accept the new offer. But I have shown, Sir, that the new proposal is entirely impracticable. Then, Sir, with reference to the financial view of the matter. The hon. gentleman held that the condition of things was more favorable now than in 1874 for constructing the railway. He has spoken of the rate of interest at the present time, but he has not taken into account the value of labor at that time as compared with its value at the present time-a Sir LEONARD TILLEY.

He called attention to the fact that the late Minister of Finance had inaugurated a new policy, that he had placed on the market four per cent. securities for the first time at which money could be obtained at that rate.

Mr. BLAKE. I did not say by which money could be obtained at four per cent.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. That he floated four per cent. securities for the first time.

Mr. BLAKE. I said he floated fours.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. He made this statement in connection with his denunciation of the present Government, for not advertising for tenders. The late Finance Minister for the first time in the history of this country visited England, and in two years floated $35,000,000 of securities without asking for any tender whatever.

Sir R!CHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Does the hon, gentle man mean to say that this was not done before—that the mode adopted was different from that adopted before, because if so he must be ignorant of the facts.

LEONARD TILLEY. Then, Sir, I must be ignorant of the facts, however, for I do say that. do not know of any securities of this Dominion being placed on the market without competition. He floated them at four per cent., put his own value upon them; he did not ask for tenders for them, and now we are committing an offence though we have asked for tenders, and have submitted them for the consideration of the House. The leader of the Opposition says we are in a better position to-day, owing to the greater abundance of money and to the fact that we can get it at four per cent. But there is more to be said than that, and hon gentlemen will see what I mean when I tell them that the securities of New South Wales in 1874, 1875, 1876, 1877 and 1878, ranked next to consols, they were the best colonial securities placed on the English market, they were worth five per cent. more than ours in those years, and to-day ours are worth more than these. The financial condition of the Government to-day, with regard to its facilities for borrowing money, places us in the position, that the rate at which money can now be borrowed changes a five per cent premium payment to the payment of that rate for a limited period. To-day, if we enter into this contract, we are able, by paying five per cent., to lay by one per cent. as a sinking fund, and to pay off this whole debt in forty one years. Our credit is such to-day as to enable us to obtain the money, and pay interest upon it at half a million dollars per annum less than would have been possible under the rate of 1874. From the economy, the zeal and good management of my friend, the Minister of Railways, we will save in the present year half a million dollars in the working of the Intercolonial Railway. Between this and 1:85, by the redemption of securities falling due, bearing five and six per cent. interest, with four per cent. securities, we will save another half million, so that, as far as the Government is concerned, it is now in a position to meet its liabilities under this contract. If all the liabilities to fall on the Dominion of Canada under the terms of this contract were matured, we have revenue enough to pay the expenditure that would thereby fall upon the Government this year, and the interest on the whole debt, as well as other charges. So far as our financial position is concerned there is, therefore, no question; and we have accomplished all this without materially increasing the rate of taxation per head of the population, by the adoption of a policy which the late Government should have adopted—a policy which would have enabled them to reduce the $5.30 per head, a policy which would have given them revenue to meet the expenditure on the Pacific Railway, and prevented the depressed state of difference which would more than compensate for any trade and business in the country. If they had accepted advantage we may have on account of the rate of in- | that policy they would now have had ample means without increasing the taxes of the people of Canada, and would have avoided the depression through which we passed from 1873 to 1878, by the construction of the railways, and giving employment to a considerable portion of our popula-The hon, the leader of the Opposition, at the opening of Parliament, asked for delay. He proposed that we should not discuss this matter in Parliament before the recess. He asked that the Government should not make its statement in defence of the contract that had been entered He asked that hon, members should, during the recess, go to the country and discuss the propositions with their constituents. Members of the Opposition prepared a protest and sent it throughout the length and breadth of the land. They prepared petitions and sent them into localities where the subject had scarcely been heard of and where it had not been discussed, in order to get a snap verdict against the Government. This was the object of the leader of the Opposition; but the proposal which he had in view the carrying out that idea, was not accepted by the Government. The Minister of Railways, in a masterly speech which has not been answered yet, submitted to this House the contract. He showed, step by step, that if hon, gentlemen opposite were consistent, they should vote for this proposition. He showed that the terms they had proposed with British Columbia were more excessive than ours. His speech went to the country. The reply went to the country. Hon. gentlemen opposite in Ontario, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island discussed this matter, and they expected to bring pressure to bear, by petitions and otherwise, upon the members of this House, to induce them to abandon this contract. Did they succeed? They signally failed. I have listened to the leader of the Opposition with great pleasure and with admiration for his talent, and I do not hesitate to say that were I going into court with a doubtful case, and were he my counsel, I would not despair of success. hon, gentleman has publicly, on three or four occasions, presented his objections to the proposition. But with all his ability he failed to carry, in those localities where the other side of the case was also presented, public sentiment with him.

An hon. MEMBER. Yes.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I doubt it. The country was not roused. It was not excited. Petitions, though they have been circulated by hundreds and thousands, have not poured into this House in extraordinary numbers against this proposal. That was the result in Ontario. That was, also, the result in Montreal. At Halifax, the bon. mcmber for Gloucester, in an able manner, presented the objections to the contract. I could not but think how changed matters are in Nova Scotia I recollect, some three or four months ago, a writer to a St. John's paper on the other side of politics, spoke of the absence of leading men in the Opposition there to lead their party. I feel flattered as a New Brunswicker, and gratified as a member of the Government, that the proposals of the Government are such that men of talent are so scarce in the Opposition in Nova Scotia, they had to send to St. John's, to the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin)---who had not ventured to address his own constituents, who had not addressed my constituents—to go to the city of Halifax, in order to present his objections and opposition to this contract. Have we seen the Table groaning with petitions from Nova Scotia? Have we seen the thousands or tens of thousands of signatures expected as the result of his continued effort on that occasion? We have not seen them. In my native county in New Brunswick the hon. member for Queen's held a meeting. What did he say? He said, as was said in Montreal, Toronto, Hamilton and London, that if this proposal was carried out the people of those localities would be saddled with greatly increased taxes. I think it was five millions for New Brunswick. I forget how much it was for Ontario, of the Opposition showed clearly that down to last year, the

An hon. MEMBER. Forty millions.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Did these gentlemen, who were presenting the taxation view of the question, did the hon, member for Queen's point out to the people that, if the lands were so valuable; the 125,000,000 acres which would be left would, at half the value placed upon them by gentlemen opposite, pay the cost of construction and leave a surplus besides? No, they did not. I hear that petitions are in course of signature in my own city-none have yet been presented here, but I suppose they will come up in We have had a mammoth petition presented from Prince Edward Island. I have read the speeches of gentlemon down there, and they have been most energetic in that little Island. I have admired its people since I visited it first in 1854. It is one of the loveliest spots in the Dominion of Canada, and contains 11 million of acres of land that cannot be excelled in fertility, in my judgment, in the North-West; and it was an Island which we all coveted and desired to bring into this Union. Our Government made many efforts to induce them to come in. We were anxious to carry out the original plan of Confederation; and more than that, we found that, in our effort to protect our fisheries, the Island was a difficulty in the way. Its differed from those of the other Provinces. found them anxious that the American fishermen should come into their ports and do business, trade, and fish there, and the policy which they thus pursued with reference to this matter, was an embarrassment and difficulty to us, and the public interests made it desirable that they should come into the Union. After a time we succeeded in making terms with them, and they entered Confederation, and the gentleman who visited that Island during the recess was one of the parties to the negotiation of the terms of Union, and he knows perfectly well that at that time speeches were made on this subject of a most inflammatory character, pointing out the taxation which would be imposed on Prince Edward Island by the construction of this road—that this was part and parcel of the contract in 1873, when they came into the Union, and that this was the policy which was then agreed upon. But did those who recently visited Prince Edward Island, and took a very active part in this matter, tell the 4,000 who, it is said, signed this petition, that the construction of this railway formed a part of the engagements of the Dominion of Canada when they came into the Union? Did they point this out? Did they go further and show that—in consideration of the large expenditure to be incurred by the Parliament of Canada for the construction of railways and canals, and in view of the possible readjustment of the financial arrangments between Canada and the several Provinces now embraced in the Dominion, as well as the isolated and exceptional position of Prince Edward Island-that Province shall, on entering the Union, in view of these considerations, be entitled to incur a debt equal to $50 a head of its population, as shown by the Census of 1871—that is to say, $4,701,050. Whereas New Brunswick and Nova Scotia came into the Union with a debt of $27.50 a head, and in consideration of the Government having undertaken to build this Pacific Railway, and to give 50 million acres of land and 30 million dollars, the Government agreed to give the Island $27.50 per head over and above New Brunswick and Nova Scotia in consideration for such expenditure. I wonder whether this fact was stated to the gentlemen who signed this petition against the construction of this road? I do not believe it, and if this had been mentioned; I believe that not 400 names would be on it, instead of 4,000. I only refer to this matter because hon, gentlemen opposite have sought to make political capital out of this question on the Island. I may say that this Island has been and will be treated, notwithstanding these advantageous terms, most liberally by all Governments. Let me add, the leader

Island had received, from 1873 to 1879, one million dollars more in expenditure and appropriation than they paid into the Treasury. And he is quite correct. We are prepared to and will deal with the Island most liberally, and they have no reason to complain down to the present moment, neither will they for the future, because the money which will be collected during the present year, under the existing tariff, is ample to meet the interest on the cost of construction, were it completed now. This year, that little Island will not have paid, judging from the last six months' returns, into the Treasury as much as they will have received directly for the support of their Government, and 80 cents per head, and the interest on the $800,000 given them in lieu of their lands. Still, Sir, our friends on the Island have not been told that this road was part and parcel of the engagement of the Dominion when they came into the Union; and that they have had compensation for it. I venture to say that if they were informed of this fact, many of them would not have appended their names to this document. Further, my statement does not include either the $50,000 loss of last year in the running. of their railroad, or the $30,000 or $100,000 loss on it for the previous year; therefore I am satisfied that, as far as both Governments are concerned, the Island people have been liberally dealt with, and at the present moment, thoughtheir taxation is at present sufficient to pay the interest on the completion of the road under the terms of the present Syndicate, they still have a handsome balance in their favor. Now, Sir, what is the fact? It has been apparent and evident to hon gentlemen opposite that this agitation of theirs is a failure. And why? Simply because their own friends, when the whole case is stated, could not be brought to vote Want of Confidence in their own leaders. That is one reason, It is because it is shown clearly and distinctly by every gentleman who has spoken on this side of the House that the terms of 1874 were more onerous, more expensive to the Dominion, would cost more, would take as much money out of the Treasury and more lands from the country than the present proposition. That is unquestionable, and, therefore, if they denounced the present proposition they would have to condomn their friends in this House. In the next place, the hon, gentlemen opposite have made out so strong a case, with reference to the value of the land in the North-West, that they could not produce any effect by the cry of increased taxation, because it became at once apparent that if we got as much money out of our public lands as they represented, the revenue thus obtained would be ample to pay all that was expended, and all that the country would be called upon for in connection with this undertaking. Well, Sir, what was to be done? The hon. gentleman states he knew nothing of the details of the second proposition; but I venture to say that some political triend of the hon. gentleman opposite suggested to these gentlemen, or to some gentlemen, that this new offer could be made. I ven-ture to affirm that hon gentlemen opposite found it was utterly impossible to make headway otherwise against their own legislation, and against their own proposition. They have not been able to excite the country; they did not succeed in producing such an effect as would be likely to remove the present Government and party from power in 1883, and therefore some other step should be taken. I do not wonder; I am not surprised, if, when the leader of the Opposition came here, he found it necessary to indicate to the press generally which supported them that there must be a strong demonstration in advance against this contract, and a strong domonstration before its terms were known.

Mr. BLAKE. I did not do so.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Then, Sir, when it was supposed that this contract involved only 25,000,000 acres of who is our emigration agent and who had been to the Sir Leonard Tilley.

land and $25,000,000, the hon, gentleman took this course. and why? Because any person who has observed the state of public opinion during the last eighteen months must have been satisfied, and especially when it was known that the leader of the Government had made an arrangement by which the liability of the Government with reference to the expenditure on the Canadian Pacific Railway was placed on the shoulders of capitalists, that the popularity of the Administration was assured, and hence some steps must be taken or else this Government was perfectly safe for the elections of 1883. Looking at the National Policy and seeing the favorable condition of the country and the increased prosperity of Canadian manufacturers everywhere, they found that it was necessary that something should be made out of this question, if it were possible, and therefore they came back with the determination before, as. they say, they knew the details of the measure, and before they knew what they call its objectionable features, to denounce and condemn it very strongly; and when they discovered that this would not work, they saw that they must have some other proposition submitted to the House. Then this new Syndicate was proposed and the result is before the House. It is supposed by hon. gentlemen opposite that this will have the desired effect; but, Sir, as I stated at the outset, the Government cannot accept this offer, which bears on the face of it the acceptance of terms at variance with those to which-we, as a Government, have been bound since 1871. Would it not be said by British Columbia, if we accepted this proposition with its conditions, that we were abandoning the work there, and that we had broken faith with British Columbia; would not the people of British Columbia have the right to take ala: m and to feel at once that their position was sacrificed, and that the eagagements made by both Governments were to be ignored; therefore, Sir, I hold this proposition cannot be accepted by us, and will not be accepted by the great bulk of the members of this House. They found it was necessary that something. should be made out of it if possible, and therefore they came here with the determination before, as they say, they knew the details, to condemn it. They condemned it in the press daily, and when they found that would not work they. concluded that they must have some other proposition. Thus this new scheme was submitted, and it was supposed this would have the desired effect; it has signally failed. The hon, member has recited all the distinctions between the contract of 1874 and the new contract. You may take the most extravagant estimates that have been made by the leader of the Opposition, and they do not make up the difference between the terms of 1874 and those of 1880; therefore, I say all that the hon, gentleman has said in the recital of the differences between the present proposition and the old contract goes for nothing, as far as we are concerned, because it does not carry out what we believe is. of the greatest importance to this country. Look at it in connection with our trade relations, with reference to the settlement of that country by emigrants. The leader of the Opposition very facetiously said this proposition was to send emigrants through to the North-West blindfold. Do we not know that hundreds and thousands of men who have left the Old Country, and even Canada, for our North-West have been induced by agents of those land and railway companies to buy lands in the United States. One of the advantages of having this railway Syndicate interested in the land is the guarantee given that they will not charge exorbitant rates of freight, because the moment they do that they depreciate the value of the land. You cannot obtain high rates of freight and high prices for land. If they did not own the land as well as the railway they would have a single interest in the railway, whereas now they have a double interest in the land and the railway. I recollect being in conversation with a gentleman from Liverpool, North-West. He said: "As long as our people have to run through the ordeal through which I had to pass as a stranger, are that at my age I will have had enough of it by that we cannot expect to have this country settled as rapidly as when once the Canadian Pacific Railway is completed from the head of Lake Superior to Manitoba.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. You cannot do that in ten years.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No, not north of Lake Superior; but we will have the railroad and water communication. We have that in the summer. Shall we accept the policy that places us entirely dependent upon the United States authorities to get into our country? That is a serious and important question. I recollect perfectly well, when we were considering the terms of the Union, that some gentlemen who were present at that convention, when discussing the question of the construction of the Intercolonial Railway, a gentleman who has since passed away, declared distinctly and emphatically, that so important did he consider the advantage of railway communication between the different Provinces on Canadian Territory, that he would be willing to construct six Intercolonial Railways rather than not have that communication. He advocated on broad national grounds the construction of the Pacific Railway on our own territory; and it was because he desired that when the millions of acres in the North-West were settled, the products of that country should be brought down to Montreal, Quebec, Halifax, St. John or Toronto by a continuous line of railway through Canadian territory, either owned by the Dominion Government or under contractors selected by them. When we consider that this is a vital part of our policy, I can well believe there are very few hon. members, if any, who will accept the proposition of hon, gentlemen opposite. In that case it is desirable that the eastern and western sections should be abandoned, the contractors would obtain possession of the nine hundred miles of railway over the prairie and the road from the head of Lake Superior, as well as the Pembina Branch, and they would thus make a desirable and magnificent bargain, without any of the responsibility connected with the running of the railway afterwards over its more remunerative sections. Practically there was no responsibility in running the railway for ten years from the foot of the Rocky Mountains to Winnipeg and the head of Lake Superior. That might be safely entered upon by those gentlemen willing to invest their money, but if you say to them: "You will be bound to build the road from Lake Nipissing to the Pacific Ocean and work it for ten years," I will guarantee those gentlemen would hesitate before they put a dollar in that enterprise or risk a cent of their money. Under these circumstances, I hold that the proposal submitted is, for practical considerations, fallacious, because it does not accomplish, what we are bound to accomplish and desire to see accomplished, for patriotic and other reasons. I might appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite, who entered into solemn obligations, who directed the representative of Her Majesty to assure British Columbia in such emphatic terms that every provision of the Carnarvon terms was being fulfilled; and I can imagine what the feelings of Lord Dufferin must have been when he read the proceedings of this House a year ago. I can imagine how he must have telt when he read the proposition of the leader of the Opposition and remembered that he himself had been authorized by that gentleman to assure the people of British Columbia in 1876 that the terms were in course of execution, that he would rather cut off his right hand than be guilty of misleading the people of that Province. I can imagine that the only excuse he could have found for him was the supposition that the taxation of 1879 was as great per head as that of 1874. I wonder what that gentleman will now think of those who authorized him to make such a statement and placed him in such a false and unenviable body of which I ever heard. The other proposal offers position. We hear a good deal about the next general to construct the identical self-same work for many millions election, but there is no fear of the result. The probabilitie time.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. It is very likely.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Very likely; but if the hon. member intends by that remark to indicate that my chance of securing a seat is doubtful, I may answer him by saying that I would be prepared to go to his own county and measure swords with him.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. I would be glad to see you.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Even in the hon, gentleman's own county, I would run the risk, because if there is one constituency in New Brunswick that is being benefitted by the National Policy more than another it is his. The hon, member ought to express to the Government his deep gratitude for this advantage.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Suppose we both resign and try the electors.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The Opposition have invited us, or some of our supporters, to change places on this question, and have told us very graciously that if our friends will vote down this proposition, they will allow us to remain in power. The member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) said he hoped for a Pentecostal conversion on the Ministerial side.

Mr. MILLS. It is much needed.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I am afraid he and his friends have little claim upon the spirit that produced that conversion. Gentlemen who violate solemn compacts, or betray their master, have very little claim to such a sacred influence.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I am sure the House will agree that at this late hour, and after listening to two such elaborate speeches as that of the member for West Durham and that of the Finance Minister, it would be very unreasonable to tax its patience further to-night, and I will therefore move that the House now adjourn.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I will just observe that the attention of the House has been kept on the keenest possible edge for at least nine and a half hours, and that it is hardly reasonable to expect any further demand on its patience.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I trust that now that the object of delay has been removed by the hon. gentlemen getting a new proposal before the House, we shall continue the discussion as if we seriously intended to bring it to a conclusion. I can assure the hon. gentlemen opposite that it is the intention of the Government steadily to prosecute this decision until it is brought to a close.

Motion lost on division.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. At half-past 12 in the morning it is unreasonable for any one to attempt to make a lengthy speech. I think one thing must be clear to the House that the furthest of all things from the mind of the hon, the Minister of Finance was the discussion of the merits of the extremely simple proposition which is now before the House. Here are two propositions for performing identical portions of work. One of these propositions proposes to construct it for a very large sum of money, with most extraordinary privileges, with most extraordinary monopolies, under such conditions as my hon, friend beside me (Mr. Blake) truly said were never granted in any country, were never dreamed of by any member of Parliament before, and were never submitted for the consideration of this or any other representative body of which I ever heard. The other proposal offers less and to remove all these extremely objectionable clauses which, according to the admission of one after another of the warmest and strongest supporters of the hon. gentleman, had shaken even their long tried and trusty allegiance. The hon. Finance Minister does not attempt in the slightest degree to deal with these propositions. He goes into a long history of the circumstances under which we became bound to construct the railway to British Columbia. He enters into a digression on the relative merits of his London loans. He wanders up and wanders down, but he steadily refuses to face the simple proposition now before the House: shall we take a proposition likely to save to the people of Canada an enormous number of millions?—if you put anything like an approximate value on the exemptions and on the monopolies which are granted by the one contract and which are taken off by the other. The merits of the two he carefully eschews. He shelters himself under this pretext: that he and his friends, no matter what their supporters may say, have set their feet down and that they mean to carry the first bargain, which they made, as was well said, in secrecy, without the knowledge even of their own friends, and without the slightest idea of the people of the country, much less of any capitalists abroad or here as to the changed conditions which were about to be submitted or allowed to be imported by the Government into these new contracts. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman tells us that he, as a member of the Cabinet of 1873, feels that he is bound to carry out our agreement with British Columbia. What have these two proposals got to do with that? Does the one contract offer to carry out the agreement any better than the other? Both are alike in that respect, for it is well known by every hon. gentleman in this House that British Columbia has never pretended to say that it was interested in the construction of that large portion of the railway north of Lake Superior. He says the late Government were equally bound to carry out that agreement. Well, Sir, all Governments, in a certain sense, are equally bound to carry out an agreement which has been ratified by Parliament and made part of the terms of Confederation. But to say that the gentlemen on this side of the House, who protested from first to last in the strongest possible manner against the terms of that mad bargain made with British Columbia in 1871, saying that they foresaw all the evils, all the difficulties, all the misfortunes which have befallen Canada in consequence of our representatives having made that bargain without consulting the people, whose instincts would assuredly have them to reject it—to say that we are morally bound in the same way as that hon gentleman is bound, is to state a proposition for which, to use his own phrase, there is not the slightest foundation. The only obligation we had in the matter was the obligation which we inherited from those gentlemen who entered into that agreement against our protest and against every dictate of common sense and The hon, gentleman tells us that we ought to have informed British Columbia that the arrangement should be broken off. We did tell British Columbia that our policy from the first was to fulfil the bargain only to that extent which we found the resources of the people of Canada would warrant. On that point there was no uncertain sound. In the address of the hon. member for Lambton to his constituents, that condition was clearly insisted on. In my Budget Speech, made a few months afterwards, that condition was insisted on in the plainest terms. It was repeated in our negotiations with the British Government. It was stated by myself again and again to Lord Carnarvon. It was stated in the terms as a precedent of keeping faith with British Columbia that we should go to that extent, and to that extent alone should go to that extent, and to that extent alone to which we could go in our judgment without unduly burdening the people of Canada. The hon gentleman tells us that has been done in the way of construction of the we increased the taxation $3,000,000 in order to build that Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT.

railway. A more absurd statement was never made by any hon. member of this House. What are the facts? The facts are that hon. gentlemen opposite, before leaving office, had reduced the taxation $1,250,000; and that for the purpose of providing for the admission of Prince Edward Island into the Union, for the purpose of providing for the interest on the debts of the Provinces they assumed, for divers increases in the indemnity of the members of this House and the Senate, and for many other things, they had been responsible for the addition of the remaining $1,750,000. What we did was purely to provide for those unnecessary and foolish additions to expenditure and to make good a portion of the taxation which had been removed by these hon. gentlemen. The whole $3,000,000, within the merest trifle, was taken up in providing for those deficiencies and those additions which, not we, but those hon, gentlemen had placed upon the country. To talk of our putting on increased taxation of $3,000,000 for the purpose of providing means to go on with that road, is an entire delusion. We put on those $3,000,000 to put us in as good a position as we were in when that bargain was made originally with British Columbia, a thing of a totally different character. But the hon. gentleman tells us also that that involved Canada in additional expenditure. What is the fact? Canada had undertaken to build a road of 3,000 miles—because these hon. gentlemen were to go from Esqumalt, not from the much nearer point which we subsequently chose, to Callander Station, in ten years—and to begin the road in two years. What did the Carnarvon Terms do? They cut off very nearly one third, and if you measure by value far more than one-third, of the entire distance-the whole of the 650 miles north of Lake Superior was put to one side. The expensive portion of the road from Esquimalt to the Narrows was likewise thrown aside, so that we had 20 years to do two-thirds of the work which they had undertaken to do in ten years. Were those onerous terms? The hon, gentlemen will have to revise the facts which are disclosed on the Statute-books before they can maintain such an argument as that. Then the hon, gentleman tells us these terms were $20,000,000 more then the terms now offered. Does the hon, gentleman suppose that the House is ignorant of the total alteration, which has been so often dwelt upon, in the whole value of that territory within the five or six years which have elapsed since the hon. member for Lambton introduced his measure? Up to the moment when railway communication was established through the United States by the enterprise, to give them their just due, of the St. Paul and Manitoba Railway, land in the Red River country was almost absolutely valueless. Immediately afterwards a great and enormous increase in their value took place, and there is no possibility of comparing the actual value of an acre there before and after that railway communication was established. Why these hop, gentlemen proposed, apart from the expenditure of the surveys, to give $53,000,000, when at the outside we propose to give some $27,000,000, because I entirely deny the assertion that the hon, gentlemen opposite have any right whatever to say that we would have given a guarantee of interest of $7,500 per mile for 25 years on the remaining portion of the road, the guarantee proposed by my hon. friend was to be given for the more difficult portions of the road. Not one syllable was said by him as to his willingness to accept the proposition asking for so much additional subsidy as a substantial guarantee of interest on $7,500 a mile for twenty years. That is a pure assumption of the hon. Minister of Railways, for which he can produce no evidence whatever. They tell us that down to 1878 no steps had been taken by my hon, friends and colleagues to implement the Act.

scheme had been set on foot and mostly accomplished by the hon, member for Lambton before he left office. So far sathe Carnarvon Terms went, my hon. friend and colleagues had done all that was in their power to do, lawfully, up to 1878, but they distinctly declined to commit themselves further than this, namely: that they would expend a certain portion of the money in British Columbia, provided always the resources of Canada permitted it to be done. Last year my hon, friend, the present leader of the Opposition, in view of the then financial condition of the country, with a deficit of $1,500,000, as now ascertained, staring us in the face, inspite of the enormous increased rate of taxation imposed in 1879, was in perfect accordance with the hon, member for Lambton's proposal in the course he took. He had a perfect right to say, under those conditions, that we were in no respect able to go on with that work in British Columbia. Neither then, nor now, nor hereafter did my hon, friend say more than this: "That it was not prudent, in his judgment, that we should go on with the work in British Columbia in the present financial condition of the country." I do not propose at this late hour to go into minute details as to the onus of taxation, but I will point out to the Minister of Finance that it is absurd to take receipts from Customs and Excise as the true measure of the onus of taxation on the people. The true measure of the onus of taxation, particularly under the scheme which he introduced two years ago, is the amount of money taken out of the pockets of the people, and not merely the amount that goes into the Treasury. To-day we are burdened with a taxation 50 to 60 per cent. greater than that of 1878. It is quite true that amount does not go into the Treasury, but it is equally true that it goes out of the pockets of the people, and that whatever may be the return, by sub-dividing Customs and Excise, they pay vastly more taxes to-day than under our regime. It is perfectly true that the taxation had been increased in 1874, although it is also true that that taxation was imposed for the purpose of making good expenditure caused by hon, gentlemen opposite. He tells us that the new Syndicate knew perfectly well months ago what were the terms and conditions of the Government offer. Must I go over again the eloquent speech of the member for West Durham, and point out that in no single possible conceivable respect were the terms in the contract on the Table the same as those laid down in the Act of 1874. If my memory serves me, my hon. friend enumerated sixteen important points, without counting others of less importance, in all of which this contract differs, and most materially, from the terms in that Act and those embodied in the advertisement of the late Government, and from the terms which alone the capitalists of Canada had a right to expect would be considered or received by the Government asked for in the tenders. He tells us that this new Syndicate have no honest intention of completing the contract. They have given every possible material guarantee that they are prepared to go on with their bargain; and until the First Minister rose yesterday and declared that it was the policy of his Government to stand or fall by the contract, I do not believe the House conceived it possible that so old, so experienced a statesman as himself could have committed so tremendous a blunder as this, having an opportunity of constructing all he wishes for an enormous number of millions less than the price he had agreed to pay, and would have, in the teeth of that offer, proceeded in his obstinate course of forcing his supporters and the country to accept a bargain so infinitely worse than the one in his power to accept. He tells us that these gentlemen are going to get the prairie section of the railway, and with it the Thunder Bay section and Pembina Branch. So far as I understand the offer, they cannot obtain the Thunder Bay and Pembina Branches unless the Government choose, contrary to their proposition, to make a free guft of them. The terms in both contracts in that respect are the tion, he states that his estimates were decidedly too low on his have constructed, or are to construct, be given only when the whole 2,000 miles, which each Syndicate offers to build, is completed. In that respect they stand on no better footing than the old Syndicate. They stand on a far worse footing than the old Syndicate, in this respect: that for the Prairie Branch they will receive $2,500,000 in cash less and 2,500,000 acres of land less-many millions taken altogether in land and money less than the first Syndicate are to receive; and when he talks to us about the new Syndicate constructing this work and making an enormous profit, although they offer to do the work for so many millions less, has he forgotten that we have no sort of security that the old Syndicate will construct more than the prairie section unless it suits their purpose? Every security existing in the old is to be found in the new scheme, with this difference: that its authors will receive an enormous sum less for the Prairie Branch than the old Syndicate. When the right hon, gentleman talks about their prosecuting the eastern section, 200 to 280 miles, as a security, he forgets entirely to tell the House that for whatever the old Syndicate built on the eastern section they are to receive a liberal subsidy in cash and a very considerable quantity of valuable land, and will have extremely little to lose even if they built that section; because the sums they are to receive from the Government, although far less in proportion than what they are to receive for the prairie branch, are still sufficiently liberal to enable them to construct the road at very little risk. The proper construction of the terms of this contract may be a matter for legal minds; but if I understand it right, for every 20 miles they construct they receive a distinct amount in money and land. It is perfectly clear that you obtain extremely little security by their construction of a considerable section of the eastern branch, unless the hon, gentleman is prepared to show that the terms offered for it are so much below the genuine value of the work—which he did not attempt to show—that it could only be constructed at very considerable loss. I do not think that that can he shown; and looking to the enormous alterations that have taken place, as regards the cost of constructing such works, within the last few years, I doubt exceedingly whether he can show that the old Syndicate are likely to lose anything by going on with the eastern section. Practically all the security he gets, with regard to the Prairie Branch, is simply this deposit of $1,000,000 and the right of retaining one-fifth of our own lands. According to the statements made, I am informed, by the First Minister yesterday, and repeated, more or less, by the Finance Minister to-night, the profits that can be made by the old Syndicate in constructing this prairie section are so enormous that they might well agree to forfeit four or five millions, and still come out with a very large and valuable property, for the construction of that portion of the road; and although that is a matter which might come up more appropriately at a later stage of the discussion, I think it right to call the attention of the House to the fact that it would be very possible, unless great precaution is taken in locating the land, that this Prairie Branch may become a mere branch of the St, Paul and Manitoba railroad and be perfectly independent either of the Thunder Bay, section or of the Pembina Branch itself. He tells us it is a great relief to the people of Canada to know the extent of their liabilities. That is precisely what we complain we do not know. You are retaining for ten whole years a task of constructing the most difficult portions by far of this work. We are told that they may cost less than originally supposed. The Minister of Railways comes down, as he tells us, year by year, with varying estimates. He makes them each year less on the sections that suit himself; but although he tells us he will reduce them on the eastern secsame. Those portions of the road that the Government central section. The section that goes out of his hands may increase in cost, and the section that remains in his hands may be very largely diminished in cost. We have no means of knowing what those portions of the road, not difficult, are likely to cost, or whether the estimates for the most difficult are likely to be exceeded. It may be that the improvements in railroad construction already noticed, and the greater facilities for communication in the North-West, may, in a short time, materially reduce the cost of the sections to be built. But we have no sort of ground for accepting the statement that we know definitely what our liability is. We know we have to complete the road from Thunder Bay to Selkirk, and that most expensive section from Kamloops to Post Moody. We know nothing definitely as to what it may cost us; but judging from our experience of former railroads, till they are completed and delivered over, we shall not know what they will cost us. The hon, gentleman talks of the Government giving up their patronage and the power of letting contracts, and yet, on those large sections, they retain the patronage connected with the giving of contracts. Where is the advantage to the country? I grant that it would be an advantage to the country if we knew once and for all what the sections are going to cost us; but we only know that we have undertaken at our own cost to complete 700 miles of the most difficult part of the railroad and hand it over as a free gift to the Syndicate, old or new, as the case may be. The hon gentleman talks of the new proposal falling short of attaining his object of carrying this road from the Atlantic to the Pacific. It rests simply with hon. gentlemen opposite; but for their own needless obstinacy in taking up the position they have assumed—it was perfectly free to them, at any rate, till yesterday afternoon, to have accepted the new contract, and bound its authors in any shape they pleased—they could have attained their whole object, and greatly strengthened their position in doing so at a vastly cheaper rate than originally proposed. The First Minister taunted my hon, friend from West Durham with his proposition to build the road by the new Syndicate, with the remark that it was putting us into American hands, by carrying a road through American territory. Who are the St. Paul and Manitoba Railway Company except an American corporation? Where are their interests except in the State of Minnesota, and except in connection with the valley of the Red River in that State? An hon. gentleman has handed me an advertisement of these gentlemen. (The hon, gentleman read from the advertisement of the St. Paul and Manitoba Railway Company, to the effect that they were offering 2,000,000 acres of the best wheat lands in the Red River valley at prices of from $3 to $5 per acre), and continued: I think the hon. gentleman had better not taunt hon. members on this side of the House with being disposed to put the control of this great railway into American hands, for if there are any men who are putting this road absolutely and unreservedly into American hands it is these hon. gentlemen. They know very well that to-morrow, if the business interests of Mr. Stephens or Mr. Smith required it, they may, and very likely will, part with their interests in that road to any Americans who are willing to pay them what they think they are worth, and once the contract is signed there is no possible means, as the contract stands, of preventing them from transferring the whole of their interests to any American company that may be organized—to the Messrs. Vanderbilt or any other body of American capitalists who may choose to buy them. There is no precaution inscribed in this contract, such as was inserted in the original contract with Sir Hugh Allan; and much as I disapprove of the incidents connected with that contract, I cannot but approve of the provision which prevented the members who joined that corporation from transferring their rights and interest in the Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT.

the Government of Canada. But there is no such provision here; they are perfectly in the power of these men, and they may transfer everything they may have or may acquire under the contract to any capitalists—Belgian, Russian, English or American—whenever it suits their business interests to do so. The hon, gentleman says we need not dread a monopoly because the Governor in Council is to fix the original tolls. That argument has been disposed of again, and again, and again. We know perfectly well that they will be obliged to fix these tolls at the outset at an unduly high standard, but they have voluntarily deprived themselves by this contract of those reserved powers which exist in all other railways, and once having fixed them at a certain rate, the Company will retain that rate until they are in receipt of enormous profits; and I call attention to the fact that the Minister of Finance has not, nor, so far as I know, has any other Minister, authoritatively ventured in this House to deny the construction placed on this clause by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake). More than once, more than half a dozen times, has my hon. friend and other hon. gentlemen on this side called attention to the fact that according to their construction of the contract—and few will dispute the right of the hon, member for West Durham to be heard on a question of legal construction—the power which the Governor in Council retains could not be exercised, if the terms are once fixed, until ten per cent. shall have been paid on the whole capital expended on the construction of the Railway. If the Minister of Finance is prepared to say that they will alter that clause, that they will introduce such terms and words as will remove the ambiguity, if ambiguity there is, he ought in common justice to his supporters to make that statement here and now. And surely the members of the Government, who have spoken so often and so long, might state authoritatively what their view of that particular sentence is; but I warn them that it will not do to produce letters which say that two or three members of the corporation just about to be formed are willing to take a particular view of the construction of the clause. I trust before the House quits the discussion of this subject that an opportunity will be taken to ensure that there shall be no ambiguity in the construction of that particular clause. The hon. gentleman talks about the land monopoly, and says we need not have any fear of giving the company power to hold 25,000,000 acres without being subject to taxation, because under the old Act of 1874, we we would not have taxed 36,000,000 acres of land. The hon, gentleman forgets, I think, that the interests of the Government and the interests of the Syndicate do not by any means run in the same plane. The Government reserved that right knowing perfectly well that it would be their duty, and that they would be compelled by Parliament, at once to put the lands in the market at moderate terms, whenever the interests of immigration and settlement required it. But are the Syndicate going to consider what the interests of settlement require. On the contrary, they will consider only what is in their own interest. If it is to their interests to sell a few million acres on moderate terms and retain the rest, they will do so. If they find it to be their interest to retain the whole of it, they will do so. They will not pay attention to the wants of incoming settlers, or the wants of the population, unless these wants accord with their own interests. And bearing in mind that the Government are bound in all reason and all conscience to provide homesteads over about 25,400,000 acres for the settlers, whom we all desire to see pour into that country, it is quite clear that it will be to the interests of the Syndicate during a great portion, at any rate, of the ensuing 20 years, to hold the whole or the greater part of the 25,000,000 acres which they reserve. It is perfectly proposed Canadian Pacific Railway without the consent of clear that if the Government succeeded, by offering homesteads by allowing the purchase of the lands at liberal rates, in inducing any considerable emigration into that country, the Syndicate will reap the advantage from that immigration. Nor can the Government, without destroying the future of that country, refuse to give liberal grants or pre-emption rights. Sir, in what manner the hon gentleman arrived at his computation that the Syndicate-which is to receive in the lowest case \$10,000 per mile in cash and then an immense quantity of valuable lands—will require to pay \$1,000,000 a year in interest or for the cost of the administration of the lands, I would much like to know. What is the cost of the administration of the lands to be? They have no taxes to pay, their exemption is perfectly good; what administering their lands? what cost will they incur in I would like to know whether they are going to start with an expenditure out of their own pockets of \$25,000,000? Why, that sum, added to the Government grant, would much more, in my judgment, than pay for every single mile of the whole 2,000 that they are called upon to construct. The computation, it appears to me, is absurd. I cannot understand under what possible circumstances the hon, gentleman can conceive that any such annual expenditure will be made by them, or how, even in his own mind, he arrived at that computation. And here I pause, because I am following the hon. gentleman step by step, and if I am a little irregular in my remarks, I must plead his precedent. Here I find he has interjected a discussion on the respective value of certain loans made by me and by himself. That is an old subject. Al! I have to say is that as respects the rate of interest paid by me, he is mistaken in saying that when the loans at 4 per cent. were floated in the London market, it involved a payment of 5 per cent., unless the hon. gentleman is choosing to add the per cent. paid as sinking fund, and which exists in his loan as well as in mine. But the hon, gentleman was good enough to call attention to the difference in the rates of securities. He was good enough to call attention to the fluctuations in Australian securities, and to boast, reasonably enough, that whereas in former times those securities ranked better than ours—now they rank worse. That is true, but I will call attention to this—that when in 1876 I floated a 4 per cent. loan at 91, at that identical moment the United States Government was barely able to obtain par for a loan of  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. The securities I floated stood as well as the securities of the United States in the London market. When the hon, gentleman floated a loan in 1879 he failed to get within 10 or 12 per cent. of the price which the United States securities ranked at. My loan, as compared with United States securities, was relatively 10 per cent. better than the hon. gentleman's. Now, I do not attach much importance to that; it is a fact, however, that at the moment our 4 per cents, were sold in the London market, United States 4½ per cents, were selling at the same rate, allowing for the difference in interest, and that when his loans were effected, United States securities were 10 or 12 per. cent. better than the sum he was able to obtain for his. He talks of getting money out of the land to pay for all we spend. As I pointed out before, the lands we have will have to be given away in order to keep faith with our own people and with settlers. For that reason, after we give 25,000,000 acres to the old Syndicate, or 22,000,000 acres to the new one, and distributing a like proportion among the settlers, the hon. gentleman will find that very little, indeed, will go into the Treasury from the sales of those lands. I do not say that this is an impolitic policy; on the contrary, it is one I approve of, and one which the House on both sides should compel the hon. gentleman to carry out. But it is fatal to his pretension that he will succeed in getting a considerable amount of money out of the lands which adjoined those to be given to the Syndicate. feetly reasonable, thing to do; or they might have said: The hon. gentleman's vivid imagination leads him to wonder "under these circumstances, we feel it our duty in the what were Lord Dufferin's feelings at reading the proposi- interests of the people whose guardians we are, to see if we

tion advanced by the hon. member for West Durham. "I think Lord Dufferin, who understood the situation thoroughly, would have said that when there was a deficit of $1,500,000 my hon. friend was perfectly justified in saying that Canada was in no respect called upon to go on and spend any money in British Columbia. Lord Dufferin understood thoroughly the condition of our affairs, and he never expressed any other opinion than that Canada was bound to do as much as she could for British Columbia as soon as her resources permitted, and not before. But I think the hon. gentleman might more wisely have hesitated when he talked to this side of the House about violating compact and about treachery to the country. Why, let him look at Lord Dufferin's despatch laid on the Table of this House, and he will see the terms in which Lord Dufferin spoke of the men who declared on their oath of office and their fealty as Ministers of the Crown, and on their personal honor, that they were absolutely innocent of all the things the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Huntington) had laid to their charge. I can hardly conceive a more humiliating condition than that in which this strong Government, this Government who boasted of having such a hold in this House, and of representing such an overwhelming majority in the country, now find themselves placed. This is the result of all those foolish and idle boastings in which they and their organs indulge so often. We were told we would see how easy it was for sage and experienced statesmen to build the Pacific Railway and not cost the people one cent. They are going to give $25,000,000 to this Syndicate; they are going to build, at a cost which they themselves estimate will amount to $28,000,000, some 700 miles of road, make a present of it to the Syndicate, and yet it is not to cost the people of Canada one cent. We were told they had all the capitalists of the world at their doors, asking, begging, praying to be permitted to compete for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. And this is the result—a contract on such terms, as I remarked, as was never dreamed of, and never before proposed to any representative assembly, a contract which gives such exemptions, such privileges, such extraordinary monopolies as I did not believe even the old Syndicate would have dared to ask for, had not the extreme and wanton folly of those hon. gentlemen's utterances placed them in such a position that they were utterly helpless in the hands of the syndicate and their adroit advisers. Now, we have the result before us. What were the pretexts which were alleged by the hon, gentlemen four weeks ago? Why, we were told that there was something to be said against this, no doubt; that there were many objectionable clauses in it, things in it which they could not defend. There were two parties to the transaction, they told us. They had, after all, made the best bargain it was in their power to make; that was their excuse and their plea-not that the bargain was a good one, but that it was the best bargain it was possible to make. Well, all the plausibility, if there was any in it, that the excuse may have had, has gone. Now, we find that capitalists of equal standing, of equal wealth and experience, come forward and say: "We will do this work for you," and on terms which I do not hesitate to say, if you put the just value on the exemptions, and if you put a very moderate value indeed on the enormous privileges of the monoply that is granted them, is $40,000,000, at least, better that the offer contained in the contract heretofore laid on the Table. Sir, there were four courses open, as I think, and fairly and favorably open, to these hon. gentlemen. They might with good reason have withdrawn the original contract altogether, and, if they had seen fit, gone on as they proposed to us nine months ago and constructed this road as a Government work; or they might have accepted this new offer, also a perfectly legitimate, a percannot get better terms than either;" or they might comes here, made by men of the very highest standing an offer which they have shown by the very best possible true and proper arbiters, and let then say whether tests is a bend fide offer—how are these men met? With they would retain these hon, gentlemen and their contract $40,000,000 worse than the offer now made, or be ruled by that "aristocratic demagogue," my hon, friend from West Durham (Mr. Blake). These hon, gentlemen talked of sacrificing something to their honor. Millions must, if need be, be given up to their honor. It reminds one of the words of the poet, not the hon. Member for Niagara:

> "Their honor rooted in dishonor stood, And faith unfaithful keeps them falsely true."

What is the true position of this House? Are these gentlemen the despots of Canada? As I understand the case, the members of this House are the agents of the people of Canada, and these hon. gentlemen are the agents of the agents of the people of Canada. I can well understand gentlemen in the awkward position in which these hon. gentlemen now find themselves, saying and feeling too that it was their duty to submit to considerable sacrifices for the purpose of carrying out a contract to which they had agreed; and, Sir, if it was their land they proposed to sacrifice, if it was their money they proposed to give away, if the price of those exemptions were to come out of their pockets, if those monopolies were to hurt them, and them alone, then I could understand their telling us that their honor forbade the sacrifice. But are they going to lose one cent by forcing the original contract? Are they going to suffer in any way? The parties who are going to suffer are the people of Canada. It is the birthright of the people of Canada which you propose to give away; it is the money of the people of Canada you propose to sacrifice; it is out of the pockets of the people of Canada that all these exemptions and charges are to be defrayed; it is the people of Canada, and their children and grandchildren, who are to suffer if you create these extortionate and exorbitant monopolies. The duty of an agent in such a case differs from the duty of the His duty is not to sacrifice his principal's money and rights, but if the agent has fatally compromised himself, the least the agent can do, if he be an honorable man, is to refer the matter to the principal and abide by the principal's decision. If these hon, gentlemen desire to maintain the name of honorable men, that is what they should be prepared to do, and not to talk to us of honor in carrying out a contract which they rashly pledged themselves to. I say if ever there was a Government on the face of the earth who were bound so to conduct their negotiations as to give no legitimate cause for suspicion, it was the majority of the members of the present cabinet. Now, Sir, what have these hon, gentlemen done? Knowing that they stood suspected, knowing that their past record would not bear investigation, even if they did not care for their own honor and reputation, they should consider the effect of their conduct on their followers behind them; and yet they must needs carry on their negotiations in secret, they must needs refuse information which this House and country had a right to have, they must needs keep these terms so studiously concealed that until 1 read that contract, I had not the faintest idea that reckless as they are, they would commit so ridiculous and foolish an act as to set their hands to such a bargain as that; knowing all that, what did they do when the contract come down? We find them in the most desperate hurry to get rid of the discussion, in most desperate haste, that within ten days a matter which they themselves admit to be the most important with which the Parliament of Canada has ever had to deal should be carried through without the slightest chance or possibility of appealing to the country Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT.

an offer which they have shown by the very best possible tests is a bend fide offer-how are these men met? With vituperation and abuse of the very grossest kind, not only by the organs of hon, gentlemen opposite, but men in this House also. What do these gentleman propose to do? They propose to save the people of Canada many milions of dollars in money and land, and to remove those monopolies which hon. gentlemen wish to create. Is that a crime? Is it to be held a crime in this country if several Canadian capitalists come forward to say: "You have made a bad bargain; we will undertake to construct this road at a less cost than proposed in the contract brought down; we will free you from a number of these embarrassing clauses and restrictions which you have unfortunately placed in your original bargain." The hon. gentleman dared to hint that this bargain was a fraudulent one - that it contained the elements of deceit, the elements of hypocrisy, the elements of a political dodge. All I can say is this: that when we come to consider these two offers, when we consider how the original negotiations were conducted, when we regard the extraordinary secrecy with which this: whole matter from first to last has been negotiated, we must say that if everything was honest and above board, with respect to the original contract, the whole circumstances attendant upon its introduction have been most fortunate.

"With every feature of a knave complete
If it be honest'tis a devilish cheat."

What is the conduct of hon. gentlemen towards their supporters in this matter? I do not believe a party was ever so dragooned as those hon, gentlemen have been upon this occasion. All discussion has been shut off, all remonstrance forbidden. They have recourse, with their majority 70 strong, to the last and ugly argument which a ministry driven into a corner has recourse to. They have told their supporters that if they dared to listen to better terms or to sanction them when offered, they will have to choose between seeing them out of office or probably dissolution and accepting the contract. I do not remembor a single hon. gentleman opposite, even among the Ministers themselves, who has ventured to say that this contract is just the contract he would like to see. Do these hon, gentlemen deliberately mean to tell us that a monopoly is a good thing, that exemptions from taxation are good things, that it is a good thing in itself to deprive the Governor in Council of the right of reducing tolls from time to time, when, as we all know, this whole question of railway rates is one which is hourly and daily changing, and which has changed enormously within the last four or five years, which may affect our whole commercial relations, our whole water system, which may in a hundred ways so affect our trade and commerce, that it is a thing entirely on the cards that we find ourselves compelled again to repurchase this road at a very large cost in order toprevent our people from being ground and crushed to earth by the terrible tyranny to which these gentlemen propose to deliver them. Are they going to tell us that it is a good and wise thing in itself to expend $25,000,000 when we need expend only $22,000,000, to give away 25,000,000 acres when men of equal capacity and respectability are willing to do the work for 22,000,000? If these hon, gentlemen have the slightest confidence in their cause, if they believe that they have the country with them on this question, when could they have a fairer or better opportunity for putting it to the test. Let them with all the energy, wisdom and sagacity they possess, their great numerical strength, let them do as I say hon. gentlemen in such a case are bound to do, take the will of the people on this question, and then I say when or obtaining from other parties any offer which might once the people have the question before them, when once replace the one now before us. And when this new offer the people have decided this matter, we will be willing to assist them to the best of our power in putting this on the Statute-book in a better shape than the present one.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK moved the adjournment of the Debate.

Motion agreed to; and (at 1:30 o'clock, a.m.,) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 19th January, 1881.

BILL INTRODUCED.

The following Bill was introduced and read the first time:

WILLIAMSBURGH CANAL.

Mr. ROSS (Dundas), enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to make an appropriation and have the same placed in the Estimates this Session, towards effecting urgent improvements for navigation and other purposes, at the Rapide du Plat Section of the Williamsburgh Canal?

Mr. LANGEVIN. This is one of the matters that is under the consideration of the Government in connection with the matters that would receive attention when the Estimates are taken up by Council.

SHELBURNE HARBOUR.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne), enquired, Whether the Government propose to place a sum in the Estimates for the erection of a fog-whistle at the entrance to Shelburne Harbor, Nova Scotia, and whether the Department of Marine and Fisheries intend placing an automatic buoy this year, at the entrance of Lockport Harbor, in Shelburne County?

Mr. POPE (Queen's). I am unable to state at present what is the intention of the Government with respect to the proposal spoken of.

ORDER OF PUBLIC BUSINESS.

Mr. BLAKE. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would desire to call the attention of the hon. First Minister that when the first arrangement was made that the Pacific Railway question should have precedence, it was understood that an opportunity would be offered by arrangement, across the floor, to call the Order paper for undebated and unopposed notices; and I would invite the hon gentleman to name a time at which the paper will be called. It will be convenient to name a time, simply because hon members may then be present.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I quite understand the point referred to by the hon. gentleman, but he will see that we have been discussing the question connected with the Pacific Railway policy in Committee for a long time. We have now got you, Mr. Speaker, in the Chair, and the discussion has gone on very fully, and I hope will proceed still more fully. I think it will be to the convenience of the House, and will meet with the wishes of the majority, that the question upon concurrence shall be finally carried, or the reverse. As soon as the question of concurrence is finally carried—and I assume, as a matter of fact, that it will be carried—I will be quite prepared to give every attention, perhaps by personal communication with the leader of the Opposition, to making full arrangements by which the general business of the House shall be carried on.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Charles Tupper for the second reading of the resolutions reported from the Committee of the Whole on the 13th January instant, granting certain moneys and lands for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the motion of Mr. Blake in amendment thereto.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, we have been for nearly six weeks discussing the terms of the Pacific Railway contract, that was laid on the Table of the House on 11th December last, Circumstances have placed me where I had a very good opportunity of listening to the speeches that have been made for and against the measure, and I think if listening to speeches, some of them eloquent, others long and labored, others again witty and wearisome, is calculated to place a man in a fit frame of mind to give an intelligent vote upon this question. I think I may claim to be as properly qualified as any hon, member in this respect; but before giving my vote I desire to give expression to some of my opinions upon the matter in debate. Sir, I think the first point that must commend itself to our attention, is the fact that hon. gentlemen opposite have used every endeavor to excite public opinion as to this contract. What was their first attempt? By making excited harangues in this House, and by holding public meetings, indignation meetings, from one end of the country to the other. When at places where full and free discussion the meetings went took place, against and when free and fair discussion was prethey found on the following night, or was prevented, a few days, large and enthusiastic meetings held which endorsed the Government scheme. It is clear to any one that hon gentlemen on the opposite side failed to excite any popular indignation in the country by means of public meetings. What was the next step taken by hon. gentlemen opposite? They circulated petitions throughout the country. At every principal polling place, on the 3rd of January, petitions were circulated, asking Parliament not to confirm the Canadian Pacific Railway contract. Sir, those petitions, we know, were prepared in Ottawa, they were sent to people through the country, and will the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), or any of his hon. friends, declare that those petitions are true, or that ten per cent. of those who signed them "read" with alarm and astonishment the terms of the contract. I ask any hon, gentlemen opposite to state if such is the case.

- Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Only the men of mark have done that.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Yes; only the men of mark have done that. I think the persons who read the contract and signed petitions against it are very few in number, and that those who have intelligently read the contract, have come to the conclusion that, under all circumstances, it is a fair and reasonable proposition to accept, and that it is better for the country to accept it than reject it. But what is the last and culminating step the hon. gentlemen have taken? They have brought down a proposition from those rich capitalists. When the hon, member for West Durham, yesterday, boasted they belonged to his party; the hon, gentleman declared that the Liberal party had on its side all the rich men and capitalists—who invariably act against the interests of the people. That was the boast he made in the House yesterday, and when it was suggested that we must be the representatives of the poor people, he retorted by saying, we must be poor representatives.

Mr. BLAKE. I said you were poor representatives.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Is it because we are the representatives of the mass of the people that we are poor representatives, and that it was only the representatives of the rich and the capitalists who could be intelligent, and could be good representatives? That is not in accordance, at all events, with the opinions generally held by the great Liberal leaders in England and this country heretofore. All the efforts of hon, gentlemen opposite have culminated in this offer brought down and laid on the Table of this House. What has been the result? The hou. member for West Durham has risen in his place and said he cannot recommend it to this House; that he cannot endorse its terms; but he did this after its defects had been pointed out by the First Minister. Before that time the hon. gentleman, and those who sit beside him, received with enthusiastic cheers the announcement that the offer was to be laid on the Table. They knew its terms; the terms had been canvassed, scanned and criticized, and prepared under the direction of hon, gentlemen opposite, and I do not think the offer reflects very much credit on them. It is a patent piece of plagiarism from beginning to end. If there were anything required to remove my doubts as to the wisdom of accepting the contract, the offer submitted would at once remove those doubts. The points on which I had doubts as to whether the contract should receive my approval, all appear in the offer, and it is time for me to say that these doubts have been removed, and that I am at liberty to vote for this contract now before the House. The hon. member for West Durham undertook, yesterday, to give the House a lecture on constitutional law and parliamentary government, and he told us we were free to accept or reject the contract. It did not require a gentleman of astuteness to tell us that. What are we called here for? Take the amendment and you will find that the wordy preamble winds up by telling us that the House is not bound to legalize the contract unless it is in the public interest to do so. We know that. Hon. members are brought here to consider this matter, and to accept, reject or modify the contract. Of course, if we amend it without the consent of the contracting parties, it is equivalent to rejecting it, for the contractors are then released; but we can accept, reject or amend it as Parliament pleases. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman, not content with that, appealed to us to dissever ourselves from pleases. the ties of party, to come forth and consider this matter free from party and for the best interests of the people. I think that is rather a curious appeal to be made by the hon. member for West Durham. Why does he behold the mote in his brother's eye, and considers not the beam that is in his own eye? Who, of all public men in this country, has been the most frequently called upon by the young and ardent politician of Ontario to dissever himself from the ties of party, but the hon. gentleman from West Durham? Who has stood more than once shivering on the brink of party and feared to launch away? The hon, member for West Durham. Who was it that yielded to the whip of the party leader and entered the Government in 1875—for I will not do the hon. gentleman the injustice to suppose that it was any desire for place or power that induced him to enter into that Government, which he had been trying the Session before to undermine and upset? Sir, it was the whip of the party leader that called him there, and here we are called upon now to receive his rebuke for partyism. When I heard him addressing the House yesterday in those terms I could not think how applicable to him were these lines:

"Here lies our good Edward whose genius was such, We scarcely can praise or blame it too much; Who born for the universe, narrowed his mind, And to party gave up what was meant for mankind."

There was another appeal the hon, gentleman made yes location of the Pacific Railway was decided upon. Does not terday, backed up by the hon, and gallant knight for Centre the hon, member for West Durham remember that that Mr. Kirkpatrick.

Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright), and that was that there should be a dissolution and an appeal to the country. And this is the last resort, after their efforts to excite indignation in the country!

"Despair and utter dissolution is the scope of all their aims."

Well, I do not think they will be gratified in this respect. There has been no public expression of opinion to justify a dissolution. There have been petitions presented to this House signed by 15,000 people, representing two per cent. of the voters of this country, and it is for such opinion that hon. gentlemen opposite ask for expression of dissolution. Last night the hon, member for Centre Huron supported most strongly an appeal to the people. I had the pleasure of meeting that hon. gentleman a short time ago at a meeting of the citizens of Kingston, a meeting called by order from Ottawa, on the requisition of the officers of the Reform Association of the city of Kingston, and I will do the Reformers of Kingston the justice to state that it was a large meeting of the intelligent citizens of Kingston. There we had a free and fair discussion, and I leave it to the hon. gentleman himself to say whether that meeting did not decide in favor of the contract.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Decidedly not; they carried a resolution against it.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. The hon, gentleman says "no." At that meeting the hon, gentleman promised the people that he would come back and finish his speech on another occasion.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I challenge him now, in the face of this House and of this country, to go back to the city of Kingston and discuss this contract again before another meeting. I will go further, and I will challenge him to do this. The city of Kingston is represented in this House by a Reformer. It is a Reform constituency according to the hon. gentlemen opposite. I challenge him now to ask his friend and follower, the hon. member for the city of Kingston (Mr. Gunn) to resign his seat and to open the constituency.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. We will do it.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. If he will resign his seat for Centre Huron I will resign mine for Frontenac, and I will run against the hon, and gallant knight in Kingston, and we will test the opinion of that constituency. I will go to the city of Kingston, where the hon. gentleman has lived all bis life and where he is best known, and I will contest with him the question whether this contract should be endorsed. If he does not accept the challenge let him never state again that the people of Kingston are against this contract. I have just had put into my hands a report of a meeting last night at Port Hope, called by the hon. gentlemen opposite, which states that the meeting was three to one in favor of the Government. Now, let us see what are the points in this contract that hon. gentlemen object to. Hon. gentlemen opposite have stated that this contract was illegal because it was not in accordance with the Act of 1874; there were no tenders invited, therefore the whole thing was illegal and we were wasting our time discussing this matter. I suppose that if the Parliament of Canada had power to pass the Act of 1874, they have power to pass this Act, and if one is legal the other must be so. But I have known some contracts made with regard to the Pacific Railway which do not and could not come under the terms of the Act of 1874. They tell us about advertising for tenders, and about getting parliamentary authority. I would ask him to tell us what parliamentary authority they had when they made the contract for 50,000 tons of steel rails, and for making a telegraph line before the location of the Pacific Railway was decided upon. Does not point was raised in this House, that the illegality of the course pursed by the hon, member for Lambton was pointed out, and that when a motion was made declaring that the contract for the construction of the telegraph line was not warranted by the Act of 1874, that hon, gentleman left the House rather than vote upon it? These contracts were assumed to be made under the Act of 1874, and did we hear those hon gentlemen condemn them? No; they were as mute as mice, and they voted for the contracts. But now when this offer is made for the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway, an offer which the whole country was delighted to hear of, hon. gentlemen opposite raised the quibble that there was no power to receive tenders, because an advertisement had not been issued bearing the royal coat of arms at the head of it. It was known throughout the country that the Government was considering tenders for the construction of this road; the journals of the hon. gentlemen stated that people were asked to come here from all parts of Canada to take stock in this road, but after coming here they refused it and went away. We were told by hon, gentlemen opposite that the Act of 1874 was infinitely better than the present contract, for two reasons: first, that the money grant was much less, and, secondly, that the land grant gave no power of selection, and the Company had to take the good and the bad from Lake Nipissing through to the Pacific Ocean. Now, Sir, we all know that the boundaries of Ontario extend, at all events, to the Winnipeg River, and some contend that they extend a great deal farther; therefore, there could be no land given to the contractors under the Act of 1874, between Lake Nipissing and that point. All that land had to be made up from other points that represent a distance of 650 miles. Yet we are told by the hon, member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) that the contractors under the Act of 1874 had to take their land, good and bad, from Nipissing to the Pacific Ocean. Did he read that Act, or did he speak in ignorance? Did he intend to mislead the House or not? Which ever horn of the dilemma the hon, gentleman chooses to take they must both be equal y unpleasant for him. The Act of 1874 prescribes further that we shall give a cash subsidy of $10,000 a mile and a guarantee of 4 per cent. interest upon the whole amount, but we find that this resolution, which has been placed in your hands, and which ought to be correct in every particular, states that by the Act the cash expenditure to be paid to the contractor is to be $10,000 a mile, or about $27,000,000 for the whole line, apart from the cost of the surveys, which might or might not form part thereof. Well, Sir, if that document, as it ought, tells the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, where is the reference in it to the 4 per cent. guarantee? Do we not know that that guarantee means another $8,000 a mile at least? Mr. Foster undertook to build a portion of the line on a guarantee of 4 per cent. on $12,500 a mile, but a Mr. Munson offered to do it on a guarantee of 4 per cent. on $7,500 a mile. That contract was assigned to Mr. Foster, but he found that he could not do the work and his deposit was returned to him. Therefore, I think we are justified in assuming that the lowest sum they could do it for was the 4 per cent. guarantee on $12,500 a mile, which is equal to $8,000 in cash. And yet no statement of this is made in this document of the hon, gentlemen. This resolution also states that by the Act the Government is to have control of the sales of twothirds of the land grant, and that the land grant of the Company remains subject to taxation. To both of these statements I demur; they are not a correct statement of the case. The land sales were not subject to the uncontrolled control of the Government. They could not sell the lands except at prices fixed on by the Government and the contractors; both parties had to agree to thirds of those lands remain in the hands of the Government, and does the hon. gentleman mean to say that while they are in the hands of the Government they are subject to taxation, that until sold they are liable to taxation? Where is that stated in the Act? At the most, only one-third of the lands to be given to the Company can be held subject to taxation, and, therefore, the Act of 1874 and the contract now before the House, with regard to taxation, are practically the same. The hon. member for West Durham tried to make a great point about a clause in this offer, which is not in the contract, and which the new Syndicate generously give the Parliament of Canada power to resume possession of this railway after it is built. Now, I would like to call the attention of the House to this clause:

"At any time after the completion of the Canadian Pacific Railway, or of the parts thereof that are to be completed hereunder, the Government shall be entitled to acquire the same and all the property and assets of the Company, paying therefor such compensation as may be agreed upon; or in case of disagreement, such compensation shall be settled by the decision of the majority of three arbitrators, one to be chosen by the Government, one by the Company, and the third by the two so appointed."

Now, what does this amount to? It does not say, you will observe, that the Government or the Parliament of Canada are to have power of resuming possession of this line on paying to these contractors the amount of money put in by them; but simply that we are taking back the property and assets of the Company, after the completion of the road. Another clause of this offer says:

"Upon the completion of the eastern and central sections, the Government shall convey to the Company, with a suitable number of station buildings and with water service (but without equipment), those portions of the Canadian Pacific Railway constructed or to be constructed by the Government, which shall then be completed."

So that all the work on this railway done by the Government is to be handed over to this Company, and to become its property and assets, together with 22,000,000 acres and $22,000,000, and the Government and Parliament of Canada are to have power to buy all this back on paying the Company compensation therefor. A pretty clause that is. Taking the land at $3 an acre, we are to buy back our land for $66,000,000, and the portions of the road built by the Government for $28,000,000, and the work representing the moneys bonus 22,000,000 in all, $116,000,-000 which Canada is to have the privilege of paying these gentlemen to get back our road. Woll, Sir, I would sooner have the contract without any such clause at all. The Parliament of Canada, like the Parliament of Great Britain. is supreme, and if, in the public interest, it becomes necessary to resume possession of this or any other road, the Parliament of Canada has a right to do it upon providing, in a fair and reasonable manner, for vested interests. Have we never heard how the Parliament of Great Britain took away from the slave owners of the West Indies their slaves and paid them for them? Have we never heard how the Parliament of Great Britain took away from the Irish Church the property that belonged to it and paid for it? Have we never heard how the Parliament of Great Britain at the present day are contemplating taking away from the landlords of Ireland their land? Do we not know that the Parliament of Great Britain resumed possession of all the telegraph lines of that country, and simply paid interested parties for their vested interests? What more could they do than make compensation for taking away property and assets? Sir, this clause, of which so much has been made, is the veriest nonsense, and I believe this House and the country will infinitely prefer to have this contract as it is without any power of resumption. Why, when it leaked out through some leaky individual that the Government were going to take back this road at the end of twenty years, the Globe newspaper had an article headed "An Impossible Bargain," which ridiculed the idea, and could not believe that even the Government of Sir John them. As to the lands remaining subject to taxation, two- Macdonald could be guilty of such a gross piece of imprudence as to insert in the contract power to take back this road which it would cost so much to run.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). That was to take it back for nothing.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Yes; to take it back for nothing after the ine was completed, and run it. We know the opinion of hor. gentlemen opposite as to the cost of running this road. In 1879, not so long ago as eighteen months, there was a debate in this House with regard to the setting apart of 100,000,000 acres of land for the building of this road. Hon. gentlemen opposite ridiculed the idea of that land being sufficient for the purpose. The hon. member for Lambton said:

"If the hon gentleman's expectation of getting $2 per acre for those 100,000,000 acres should be realized, I will confess to him that I have been utterly mistaken in my idea on this subject,"

That was in 1879. We have the opinion of another leading member of the Opposition, as to the cost of running the road. Mr. Mills said in 1879:

"Mr. Fleming some years ago estimated that the interest on the money required for the construction of the railway, and the cost of working the railway for many years, would amount to $14,000,000 per year."

No wonder, entertaining and giving expression to these opinions, hon. gentlemen opposite should be utterly astonished at the idea of the Government resuming possession or allowing these contractors to build the road and then hand it back to the Government, so that the Government would be at the cost of running it. No wonder they should raise a howl through the country when it was suggested that was the ease; but with their usual facility for turning somersaults, as soon as it was known that contract bound the contractors to efficiently maintain and operate the road forever, they immediately changed their tase and said: "Oh! we ought to get possession of this road again."

Mr. MILLS. That is what Mr. Fleming said.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Is Mr. Fleming a member of the Opposition?

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. They say he belongs to the Government.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. And Mr. Fleming was quoted with approval by the hon, member for Bothwell.

Mr. MILLS. What do you say is the cost of running the road and interest on the money?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I say the cost of running the road will be from $6,000,000 to $8,000,000 a year, and the interest which the Syndicate will have to pay on borrowed money will be some $3,000,000 more; and I say that for many years the traffic will not pay for the expenditure of running that road. The same year the hon member for Gloucester (Mr.Anglin) gave expression to his opinion which was utterly at variance with the opinions expressed by him the other day. The opinions of hon gentlemen opposite have all changed in one year. We have heard of persons who changed their opinions in the course of one revolving moon. One revolving year brings about a complete change of opinion in the minds of hon gentlemen opposite. Should the Government, in a very short time, come down and say: "We do not approve of this contract;" no doubt these hon, gentlemen would laud it to the skies; and the following year they would again cry out: "Oh! you should build it by a company." The hon member for Gloucester said:

"The entire cost would at least be $100,000,000. The estimated expenditure was increasing from 50 per cent. to 70 per cent. First 500,000 acres, next 625,000, then 750,000 must be settled merely to pay the interest. Did any one imagine that the settlement of that country would progress more rapidly than at that rate? There would be more than sufficient to pay interest on the m.ney, and by the time the road would be built a very great portion of those lands would be disposed of. They could not imagine that, by any manipulation of these lands, money could be got to pay one-fourth the cost of the railway."

Mr. Kirkpatrick.

That was in 1879, eighteen months ago. What was the attack made on us eight months ago, in which the whole artillery of hon. gentleman opposite, all the eloquence they could command were brought to bear. They attacked one flank of our party on this question and tried to frighten it by magnifying the cost of building the railway, by belittling the lands in that country, by belittling our chance of bringing settlers into it, and they made such a mountain of a molehill that they actually did frighten some of our members and prevented one or two from voting for our measure last Session. But when they find we have made finite the ultimate result of this undertaking, they change their base. They attack the other flank of our army. They say "Oh! this road could be built so easily and so cheaply, and these lands are worth so much that you are giving it all away; you are giving too much for it—although we are giving much less than they said last year it would cost." I do not think now their attack would have even as much effect has it had last year. I am confident, as the hon. Minister of Railways said, that this debate has had one good effect. It has brought forth from the other side some patriotic speeches. It has made hon, gentlemen opposite praise the country and acknowledge we have a great and glorious future before us with respect to the North-West. What were the speeches they made last year? They tell us now that we are giving 25,000,000 acres of land, and that they are worth all the way from $2 to $5 per acre, but they agree pretty much on $3 as the value. I believe that in the course of time when the country becomes settled, the average price realized will be $3 per acre. How long will it take to settle that country to sell the lands?

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Ten years you said last Session.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. If the opinions of the hon. gentlemen opposite are worth anything they must be worth something on this point. Let us see what these opinions are. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) is considered to be a shining light on statistics by hon. gentlemen opposite. He gives statistics on every question and all sides of that question. I will quote some of his figures, and ask him if he will go back on himself now, or agree with me that it would take a long time to settle those lauds. Eight months ago the question of how long it would take to settle that country was up for discussion. On this side of the House the prophecy was made that we would have 550,000 people in there in ten years, but the hon. member for North Norfolk ridiculed the idea. He said: "It took the United States thirty years to found a population of 555,000 into the north-western States. Do you expect to have more people into our North-West than the United States did into theirs? I do not believe that you will have 350,000 there in ten years." He gave a little calculation of what would be the value of the lands and how much would be realized from them in ten years. The member for North Norfolk said last Session, what I am going to read from page 1560 of the Hansard:

"But suppose the population would be less than 350,000 within the next ten years—if it reaches that number, settlement will be much more rapid than in the United States North-West, under similar circumstances—he will find, taking the average holdings in that country, he will have disposed of 4,410,000 acres in farms derived one-third each from homestead grants, and preemption, and railway land sales, 1,470,000. If we add, for sales of speculators, 750,000 acres, it will make a total of 5,160,000 acres, representing in money and mortgages $6,676,000 instead of $71,000,000. But I predict he will not see 350,000 in our North-West in ten years."

Now, if we do not see 350,000 people in our North-West in ten years, and the Syndicate, not being able to dispose of 5,000,000 acres, how long will it take them to settle the country or dispose of their 25,000,000 acres, and get back this $3 an acre, which hon gentlemen opposite say the land will fetch? If they go to the market of England to-day, and raise a dollar an acre on their land, do you know that in twenty years they will have to pay, by way of interest, no less than $2 for the $1 so borrowed, and then the land must realize $3 an acre before they will have recouped themselves, the mere bonds to be issued on their lands? I think it will be an average of twenty years before this large tract can be disposed of. If they have succeeded in that time I shall be glad; because it will be an evidence of the industry, ability, and exertions of the Company, of bringing settlers into that country.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. You said the land would be worth $3 an acre last Session.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. We are taking your words and estimate now. If you do not think your statements are reliable, of course I am willing to change my argument, but I am trying to convince hon. gentlemen opposite of the fallacy of their arguments from their own statements. If they will however, take the statements of my friends on this side, and prove to them that this is a good principle to go upon, I shall be quite satisfied. I shall be prepared to prove to them in that case that this is a good bargain. But I am trying to prove to those hon. gentlemen out of their own mouths, the statement I am making, that this land is really only worth to the contractors one dollar per acre for the purpose of raising money; while hon, gentlemen opposite have told us enough about the cost of building this railway, they have omitted all mention of the interest to be paid by the contractors for the money they must raise, before getting any money from the lands. They have not told us anything about the expense the contractors will be put to in bringing settlers into that country. We know the expenditure incurred by railways in the Western States for the settlement of their lands. I have been told, on good authority, that one railway, which may be taken as an example, the Atcheson, Santa Fé and Topeka Railway Company, incur an outlay for advertising their lands, and bringing settlers upon them of, on an average, no less than eighty-eight cents an acre. If these Canadian contractors simply build their line and sit down and expect immigrants to come upon their lands, they will be sadly mistaken, in regard to any profitable result. They have got to send agents all over Europe and the world, to follow the example of the railways in the States, and to be active and energetic to beat them. Is there any hon member in the House who has not observed at the various railway at the various railway stations, glass cases and jars containing wheat, corn, and other products of the Western States, not placed there by the Government of the United States, but by active railway corporations for the purpose of attracting emigrants to their lands? The Syndicate will have to follow this example, and advertise their rich and fertile lands all over the world, with their numerous inducements to settlers. Hon. gentlemen opposite did not make any allowance for this duty and outlay. How many millions will it cost the Syndicate in the next twenty years for this work before they can sell ] their lands, build the road, and make it pay running expenses. I do not think it will be less, including interest on the annual expenditure than nine or the form of the second this new offer. It tells us that ten million dollars. When considering whether this the Government are to furnish 75 per cent. of the cost of the railway, this great national highway, should be built steel rails whenever they are brought into the country, so all by the Government or a company, we must remember that its construction by a company would greatly relieve our Immigration Department from the expense of bringing immigrants into this country. The expense would, to a great extent, fall on the company, and the Dominion Treasury would be relieved pro tanto. We have some other clauses in this contract which hon. gentlemen opposite are relying upon as being very onerous. The fact that will be that their friends on the Opposition benches will 25,000,000 acres and $25,000,000 are not too much to give have control of the government of this country, and that the Syndicate, is I think proved by the new offer, which only deducts 3,000,000 acres and $3,000,000 from that allowing everything in free—there is no reason for amount for the work. If the one company would be a new exemption clause. Of course, if the old Syndi-land monopoly, so would the other. If granting 25,000,000 acres would creat a large railway monopoly, what would be the effect of granting 22,000,000 acres? Would the effect be not practically the same. But the fact that the new company has made such an offer, asking a nominally smaller amount, shows they never expect to carry out the contract in its entirety. The money and land grant to the old Syndicate is accepted by the country as fair and reasonable. It was known this amount of money and land would be given throughout the length and breadth of the country, yet nobody came forward to offer to do the work for less. The real objection then is not to the want of the land and the money bonus, but to the other clauses of the contract, which I am prepared to discuss with hon, gentlemen opposite. The strong point the hon. member for West Durham took against the contract, in his first speech, related to the question of the standard. He drew a terrible picture of the Northern Pacific Railway, when first built, running upon stilts, with cotton-wood ties, and so forth; all sorts of horrors were painted should the Canadian Pacific be built on such a standard. Now that objection has been removed. A letter has been laid on the Table, stating it was not their intention to follow that standard, but that the standard should be that of the Union Pacific Railroad in 1873. Hon. gentlemen opposite have no improvement to make on that, because they put the same as a condition in the new offer made. Hon. gentlemen opposite, sitting behind their leader, have made some terrible calculations as to the profit the Syndicate will make. The member for Centre Huron said that this change as to the standard as he called it, but as I would call it, this making plain of the real meaning of the clause, was worth no less to the country than $10,000,000. That is so much less profit to the contractors. With reference to the clause dealing with the exemption of materials from the payment of duty, it is undoubtedly a concession to the Syndicate for reasons which are quite plain. The hon. member for Lambton estimated that the amount of these exemptions would be between four and five millions dollars, but I have been trying to calculate, and I can arrive at no such enormous sum. If you calculate the duty upon the bolts, nuts and fish-plates at 30 per cent., and upon the spikes at 20 per cent., for the quantity of these articles required for 2,000 miles of railway, you get a total of $98,000. Fish-plates are free at the present moment, and will be free until the first of January. So with regard to steel rails. I do not think the House or the country would ask these gentlemen to construct a great public work of this kind and tell them hereafter they were going to impose duties upon articles which now, according to the policy of the Government, are admitted free, but we should rather deal with them on the basis of the present tariff. And even if you include the duty upon wire, the whole of the exemptions do not amount to more than $130,000, and that surely is not a large sum for hon, gentlemen opposite to make such a fuss about. But thay tell us if we accept the new offer there will be none of these exemptions. But there is a very peculiar exemption clause in this new offer. It tells us that the new Syndicate would have to do would be to buy the steel rails for the whole of their contract this year, bring them in and then the Government would have to pay 75 per cent. of the cost. They would get them in free of duty, and the country and not the Company would have to pay the interest. And whatelse? These contractors know very well that if they succeed in carrying their offer the consequence cate were to put up iron bridges the duty would amount to a great deal. But we could not force the contractors to build iron bridges. They are to build a first-class road upon the standard of the Thunder Bay branches, built by the late Minister of Public Works, and there was no iron bridges upon that road. And then we could not therefore bind them to build iron bridges. It it not desirable that we should encourage them to build iron bridges by allowing the material for such structures to come in as cheaply as possible. I think the reason for the clause in question is plain and palpable to any one who looks at the matter from a patriotic point of view. Then it is said that the clause with regard to exemption from taxation is eliminated from the new offer. But in the Globe of last Saturday we find rather a curious statement with reference to this subject. It says:

"The Canadian Syndicate asks for none of these franchises, being willing to leave the question of taxation on the road stock, and lands to be decided in the North-West, as it has been decided elsewhere."

That is to say, we propose to change the forum, to change the venue, and appeal to the people in that country Is not this a palpable subterfuge? Is it not patent that this railway corporation, which will be a powerful corporation—as any corporation which builds the railway will be—which will be of incalculable benefit to that country, and will have the privilege of locating towns and villages and stations and workshops, will be able to say to the municipalities: "You must exempt us from taxation or you cannot have the station. We will move it a mile or two further on." This present exemption clause only applies to the prairie section from the western boundary of the Province of Manitoba to the Rocky Mountains; it does not apply to the line west of Lake Superior, where they will be liable to taxation.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. It applies to the branches through the territories.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Yes; in the west, but it does not apply to the parts in Ontario or Manitoba, or in British Columbia. The people in these provinces can tax the road as much as they like. But are they going to do so? When it was announced that the road was to be built by the Syndicate, a deputation from the city of Winnipeg went to Mr. Angus and Mr. Hill, in St. Paul, and offered them freedom from taxation forever and a free site if they would build their workshops in Winnipeg. And that is the place to which these hon, gentlemen say let us refer the question of taxation. If they were sincere they would require a clause binding their Syndicate not to ask or to accept exemption from taxation, but they know very well that as the offer stands the people will be only too glad to exempt the Company from taxation. As to the exemption of the land, it would be a monstrous thing for us to give these gentlemen a land grant of 25,000,000 acres, and then tax the land. How could these gentlemen raise money in Europe, if they had to tell capitalists that their security was liable to be taxed. Why, Sir, we could pay the whole expenses of this Government by the taxes upon those lands, but it would not be fair or politic to do so.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. It was fair in 1872.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. No; because, by the Act of 1874, the lands remained in the hands of the Government. If we were to refuse to ratify this contract now, what would be the consequence? That these lands would fall back into the hands of the Government. Would they be liable to taxation? Will the country be any better off, if we refuse to give this condition? If we undertook to build the road ourselves, will we be any better off, and will we get taxes on our own lands?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Sir Hugh Allan's contract did not tax them.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I am not speaking of that, but of the present contract. I do not know what was in Sir Hugh Allan's contract in that regard, and it does not make any difference in my argument. Under Sir Hugh Allan's contract we gave $30,000,000 and 50,000,000 acres of land. and we put in a clause that the land should be liable to taxation. But he could not raise any money on the lands, and perhaps that was the very clause that caused him to fail. We do not want to give another contract that, when presented to the money markets of Europe, will fail. There must be no more failure in this matter. We are in earnest this time to build this road, through from ocean to ocean, and we will put no condition in it that will prevent its being carried through to successful completion. The greatest objection that hon. gentlemen see, is the monopoly clause, as they call it—that this Company shall have complete control of the North-West. I fail to see that they are going to have the monopoly hon. gentlemen predict. But such a thing of having control of a single line for an outlet was not beyond the contemplation of hon. gentlemen opposite. In 1878 the hon, member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), then a member of the Ministry, introduced a Bill with respect to Colonization Railways, and what do we find him stating? He is speaking of the settlement of the North-West, and in favor of a Bill which promised to give to any ten or five persons who would come forward and form a company, letters-patent incorporating them, and giving them authority to build railways wherever they liked, and giving ten sections a mile for all east of the 102 west meridian, west of that point twelve sections, in the Peace River district twenty sections, all showing that they were not only willing to give millions of acres for building the Pacific Railway proper, but to give other millions of acres to build lines of railway up into the fertile belt, which, I ask the hon. gentlemen to remember, will be built under this contract without any further subsidy or land grant.

Mr. MILLS. How do you know?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Because the land will be of no use to them, unless railways are built to them and through them, and because the organ of the hon gentlemen opposite states that such will be the policy. The Globe newspaper states that one effect of this contract will be the building of brauch lines by this Company throughout the North-West, without any further subsidy or bonus at all. So that we will not only have a line of railway of 2,700 miles, but we will have railway permeating the North-West besides the principal line. Suppose they received the same bonus per mile as the hon gentleman offered to give the colonization railways, we will have 2,140 miles more of railway built into this fertile belt, and all for nothing.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. They are not obliged to build any.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. They are not obliged to build any, but they are men of common sense, and they know that they have a vast state there which will be useless to them, just as it is useless to us now, unless they build railways into it; and they know a great deal bettter than hon, gentlemen opposite pretend to know that these lands can only be made use of by putting settlers upon them, and they can only get settlers to go there by building railways to the lands. This they will undoubtedly do. The Globe assumes that with this power of building branch railways and taking alternate sections on each side of the branch line, even for a distance of only 6 miles, we shall have no less than 3,640 branch lines. This is the calculation of the Globe, and I hope it will be realized. Look at the railway statistics of these Western States that have made the most rapid progress in popu-

Let me read a table of the number lation and wealth. of miles that were built in the Western States in 1878: Ohio, 6,233 miles; Indiana,4,066 miles; Illinois, 8,624 miles; Michigan, 3,338 miles; Wisconsin, 2,963 miles; Iowa, 3,038 miles; Missouri, 4,426 miles; Pennsylvaria, 5,682 miles; making a total of 38,422 miles. It is estimated that fully 7,000 miles have been built in those States since the close of 1878. Now, this shows that railways are required to be built to develop and open up this country. We are not engaging in any new experiment. We have seen the effect of the policy we are now pursuing in those States to the south of the line. We have just as fertile land as the Western States, just as salubrious a climate and many people believe that we have better land and better climate. All we want is the same energy, the same push and the same determination to develop our North-West, as have been exhibited south of the line. There is one difference between our public men and those of the great Republic, and that is, that go where you will in the United States you never find there public men decrying their country and advocating the claims of another country; you never find them uttering jeremiads about the future downfall of their country, about a growing debt or about a huge monopoly that is going to gnaw out the vitals of their country. Sir, I believe this railway company will not be a monopoly and I will tell you why.

Mr. MILLS. Will they value their lands at $5.50 an

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. It is the railways that give that value to the lands. What is the value of that land to us now? For every section the Company has that is worth $5 an acre, we have a section lying alongside of it that will be worth the same. Ought we to find fault with these men for making improvements on their lands when such improvements will benefit the Government lands also? If the Company's lands will be worth $5 an acre the people of Canada have good reason to rejoice that the immediate results of the building of this road will be to augment to such an extent the value of the lands in the North-West. And yet hon, gentlemen opposite wanted to delay this work, and last year they said we ought to build only 100 miles west to the prairie. When these men were in office during five years they never got a mile of that railway built west of Red River.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. It would have been better if you had not built to the west of Red River either.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Well, we are going to build it This contract is going to receive the endorsement of Parliament and the peeple; it will be built; and this Parliament will have the proud satisfaction of showing that they have voted for a contract which will enable this country to carry out the terms of the contract with Lord Carnaryon, made by hon, gentlemen opposite. What prospect would there have been of doing that if the amendment of last year had been adopted. Hon, gentlemen ought to remember the terrible denunciation uttered by Lord Dufferin upon any man who would be guilty of such base and treacherous conduct as to break that contract. The terms entered into with Lord Carnarvon were: first, that the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway should be built; second, that no less than $2,000,000 should be spent annually in railway construction on the mainland in British Columbia; and third, that the railway should be built from the western end of Lake Superior to the Pacific Ocean on the 31st of December, 1890. There was no clause, as was stated by the hon, member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright), respecting no increase of taxation, and this the clause in the Carnarvon terms which refers to increase of taxation.

Mr. ANGLIN. I say the Government, now or then, had no right to bind this country by any declaration.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I ask the hon. gentleman to point out the clause in the the Carnarvon terms, which limits the engagement.

Mr. MILLS. The terms were made subject to the resolution limiting the rate of taxation, and to the Act of

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. No. Sir, they were not, and the hon, member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) did not take exception to these terms, but only to one of them—that for the construction of the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway, which he refused to be a party to. When the Bill referring to that railway was thrown out, the then leader of the Government made overtures to the hon. member for West Durham to enter the Government, and at the next Session he stated that that clause was to be omitted, but that all the others were to remain intact; and the hon. member for West Durham then became equally bound to them. I would like to read the language used by Lord Dufferin in British Columbia, when he was told that his Prime Minister had intrigued to throw out these terms. He said:

"Had Mr. Mackenzie dealt so treacherously by Lord Carnarvon, by the "Had Mr. Mackenzie dealt so treacherously by Lord Carnarvon, by the representative of his Sovereign in this country, or by you, he would have been guilty of a most atrocious act, of which I trust no public man in Canada, or in any other British Colony, could be capable. I tell you, in most emphatic terms, and I pledge my own honor on the point. that Mr. Mackenzie was not guilty of any such base and deceitful conduct; had I thought him guilty of it, either he would have ceased to be Prime Minister or I should have left the country."

These are the terms which Lord Dufferin applied to any man who would be guilty of trying to break the Carnarvon terms. The Government, of which the hon. member for West Durham was a member, were bound to carry out those terms; but by their resolution of last Session, they showed that the language of Lord Dufferin was applicable to them. The country will receive with satisfaction the action of this House in endeavouring to keep that pledge; and when the Government tell us that this pledge shall be kept to the letter, without causing an increase of taxation, I say this is something that will redound to the credit of hon. gentlemen who were engaged in the negotiations for that purpose, and will be a matter of which they may be justly proud in future years. Before the hon. gentleman interrupted me I was showing that the branch railways in the North-West would be built by this Company without the grant of an additional dollar, or an additional acre of land; so that for the grant of 25,000,000 acres of land, and $25,000,000, we shall not only have the Canadian Pacific Railway, but 2,000 miles of branch railways permeating the North-West and opening up that country. But, say hon. gentlemen, "It is true you are going to open up that country, but there is only one outlet." Well, Sir, the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), when Minister of the Interior, made use of the following language, which shows clearly that the Government had it in contemplation to build this road by a company, and to give to that company the only outlet from the country. He says, indeed, that he was aware that it was important to avoid railway communication through the adjoining Republic, and I suppose my hon friend in the Government, after reading the hon. gentleman's speech, inserted this clause in the contract with regard to allowing other railways to go no further than fifteen miles of the boundary. The hon, gentleman said, in 1878:

Cartwright), respecting no increase of taxation, and this contract was solemnly entered into irrespective of increase of taxation.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Yes; irrespective of increase of taxation. I ask hon. gentlemen who say "no," to point out

So that this limiting the outlet to a single line is the policy which hon, gentlemen on this side have taken from the hon, gentlemen opposite. They appear to have got into trouble with everything they adopted from hon, gentlemen opposite, who make it a point to object specially to everything they formerly advocated. I do not think this Company of monopolists is going to be of any consequence. Will this railway have no competition? What is the line 49? Is it not an imaginary line? Are there not lands to be settled to the south of that line, and if the railway proves to be a monopoly, if it should exact an onerous tariff, so that it would be impossible for settlers to live there, what would be the consequence? Would the settlers go in, or, if they should go in, will they remain there? Will they not go to the south of the line, where they will have competition in railways?

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. No doubt.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Is it likely those business men will allow this to take place? Is it likely they will kill the hen that is laying for them the golden egg?—that they will drive away the settlers from whom they expect to get a return, and from whom only they could get a return for their investment? The arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite are altogether inconsistent. First of all you hear an hon. member state, as either the hon. member for Centre Huron or West Durham did last night, that the Syndicate is going to have such a large grant for building the prairie section that all they would have to do would be to put the profits in their pockets and walk away. Up gets another gentlemen, and tells us we are going to have the hugest monopoly possible, which would make millions out of running the road. If they are going to make millions by running the road, there is no danger of them walking off after building the prairie section. If there is a monopoly, there is no danger that they will not finish the road. contract has been constructed so that every part may be readily connected with the other parts; and the reason why a larger subsidy is given for the prairie section than hon. gentlemen opposite wish, is that the contractors may have means whereby they can build this portion of the road rapidly, and build the collateral branches to the north of the main line, and to assist in defraying the cost of the more difficult portions, and to pay running expenses at the outset. There are some clauses in this contract which the hon. gentlemen tell us should not be accepted. But these are unimportant details. They tell us that in a measure of this kind, involving millions of dollars and consequences of the greatest moment to this country, we should haggle over these details. Let us see what is the opinion of the hon gentlemen opposite in this respect. On this side of the House, we find it impossible to guide our action by the opinions of hon. gentlemen opposite. When we read the speeches of hon. gentlemen one Session, ruminate over them and try to approach somewhat nearer the policy they advocate, they tell us the next Session, that is not what they meant at all. They turn their coats so rapidly and deftly it is impossible to follow the changes. Let me tell you what the hon. member for North Norfolk, that shining light, has told us about these unimportant details. Speaking of the great advance the Western States had made since Stephen A. Douglas, in 1850, had, by his energy, push and determination, carried out the policy which we are endeavoring to inaugurate to-day, of giving land grants to railways, and getting railways to permeate the country, the policy which has changed these prairies from a wilderness without inhabitants, into a country blossoming like the rose, with flourishing cities, towns and hamlets, through the length and breadth of it, he said:

"Some of the railways had perhaps been subsidized more than were necessary in land grants, but capitalists would not embark their money Mr. KIRKPATRICK.

unless they had a prospect of a fair return; and it was folly to haggle with them about an unimportant difference when important differences were at stake."

If that was the case two years ago, what is the case now? Are there no important interests at stake here? Is it not important that we should settle that great country, and carry out the pledged faith of the country. And if it is, why should we haggle about these unimportant details? Is it that hon, gentlemen opposite may get back to the places they formerly occupied? I am sorry I do not see the hon, member for Centre Huron in his place, because when I think of the getting back, it calls to my mind his expressions, last night, about the Pacific scandal. It seems he can never make a speech, in or out of this House, without alluding to the so-called Pacific scandal. What ought to be the course of that hon, gentleman? It seems to me that if he were wise and prudent, he would never mention the Pacific scandal again. We all know that there was not a platform or a hustings in this country where the charges were not made, with all the force that eloquence could command, with all the venom that malice and hatred could supply. There was not a town, or hamlet, or house from Victoria to Cape Breton that had not heard of these charges, where these charges were not discussed. But what was the answer the people made to them. They said to the hon. gentlemen opposite; either we do not believe you; or, true or false, we would sooner have Sir John A. Macdonala and his colleagues with all those charges, than a repetition of the acts of incapacity, extravagance and corruption which were disgraceful to your Government and disastrous to the country. That is the answer they gave to these charges; and if hon. gentleman opposite had any regard for their own characters and their reputation as statesmen, they would never refer to that subject again. The people of Canada have fully con-idered these charges. They have heard them discussed over and over again, and have given their opinion of them, and that opinion was not complimentary, at all events, to the hon. gentlemen opposite. I do not desire to take up longer the time of the House. I feel that this matter has been discussed ad nauseam. I do not desire to make so many thousand lineal yards of a speech. I have had to listen to such addresses, and know that we have now arrived at a period of the debate when it is necessary to shorten our speeches, and come, if possible, to a vote. I have to thank hon. members on both sides for the patient hearing they have given me, trusting that I have said something which will show that I am justified in the opinion, that it is better in the interest of the country that this contract should be adopted, than that it shall be rejected

Mr. GUTHRIE. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has gone over most of the arguments that have been offered the House during the discussion on this question by the hon, gentlemen opposite, and has attempted to answer objections that have come from this side of the House, or the country, to this bargain. But the singular thing about his speech is, that he has forgotten that all his arguments in support of this contract apply with even greater force to the offer on the Table of the House. Let us hear what some of those arguments are. told that the ratification of this contract will enable us to carry out the engagement with British Columbia. not the acceptance of the offer of Sir William Howlan I and associates do the same thing? What is that offer? It has not suited the interests of hon. gentlemen opposite to represent it correctly. It is a positive, and absolute, and unconditional offer to build the whole road. There is nothing whatever, if this Government choose to accept it, that will enable these gentlemen to recede from their offer. All that Government have to do in order to secure the construction of this railway, as completely, to the same length, to the same extent as the offer they have accepted, is to procure its acceptance by this House; and in every respect, in regard to the giving of security, in regard to the work to be done, in regard to the time at which it is to be done, and the quality of the work, and everything about it, this new offer is substantially the same as the other, so like it that the hon. gentleman just sat down said it appeared to be a plagiarism. Now let us see what there is in it to justify hon. members on the Ministerial side in representing that the gentlemen who signed this offer do not intend to do the whole work. They say, in the second clause of it, that they will deposit the money, $1,000,000, for the whole line, the same as the other offer proposes. In clause 3 they say that they will lay out, construct and equip the eastern section—that is the whole of the road from Nipissing westward to Red River, and the central section of the same gauge and of the same standard of quality as the other, with this exception, that the later offer is more definite, as it binds the new Company to adopt the standard of the Union Pacific Railway as it was in 1873; and in that respect it is superior to the offer recommended by the Government. We are told that the contract made with Stephen & Co. is interpreted by the letter. Well, that letter is signed by only some of the gentlemen who bind themselves to this agreement. It is well known that unless they had authority from the others, it would not be binding. These gentlemen are to be incorporated, and what is to be the position of the Company after incorporation? All the obligations contained in this contract are to be assumed by the corporation -- not the obligations contained in the contract and letter, but the obligations contained in the contract. I do not say that this cannot be amended, but that so far it has not been amended. What further does the new offer undertake? That the work of the contract shall be commenced at the same place, shall be carried on in the same way, and completed at the same time, all through, from Nipissing westward. It further provides that the Government shall construct the road from Yale to Port Moody, and finish the Thunder Bay Branch, and so forth, just as in the old contract. In fact, if the contract is binding upon Stephen and the others, this offer is binding upon Sir William Howland and his partners; so there is no foundation for the attempt made to deceive the House and country regarding the offer on the Table. What are the clauses that hon, gentlemen opposite say will enable the contractors to escape? The clauses are from 19 onwards. It is stipulated as follows:-"The Company also hereby offer in the event of the Government desiring to withdraw from the proposed construction of the work, certain reductions," &c., and it is so all through, but that is an option given entirely to the Government. They can exercise it or leave it alone, and if it is their policy to build the whole road, as no doubt it is now-although it was not, one short year ago-these gentlemen offer to do it; they offer to do it as completely, thoroughly and quickly as Stephen and Company. Now, then, what becomes of the assertions and arguments we have heard from ministerial lips all through this discussion? What becomes of the question of keeping faith with British Columbia, and of observing the Carnarvon terms? What becomes of the question of a private company offering the best mode of promoting immigration, and of the question of having a through railway on Canadian territory, a British road as against an American road? What becomes of the question of relieving the country from the trouble, and sometimes the discreditable exigences of railway construction by the Government? That, of course, was not a well founded argument. We all know that neither contract nor offer will relieve the Government from responsibility or trouble in regard to railway construction. But the one does it just as effectually and completely as the other. But what becomes of the argument that this bargain limits the taxation and liability of Canada? Does not the second do it as effectu- and, if we are not merely to find the authority of the hon. ally as the first? What becomes of the statement that the gentlemen opposite, but to enquire where the policy of this running of this road, which is to cost so much, is secured country will be found recorded, we must refer to that Act to the country as well as the building of it? Does not the second proposal as completely secure that as the first? The running of the road is secured by reserving onefifth of the land grant. In this case the reservation is to the same extent. Then we were told that if we enter into this contract we shall sell our lands to better advantage, because a private company will fill up the country with immigrants. That argument applies with equal force to the new company. There is not a solitary argument that hon, gentlemen have for urging upon us or on the country the entering into the old contract that would not apply with equal or greater force to the new. But more than that. One of their great arguments in favor of the contract was that it was the cheapest and best ever submitted. The changes were rung on that point, beginning with the Minister of Railways when he introduced the resolutions. From the mouth of every one of the speakers, and in the columns of all their newspapers. was heard the statement that the contract which the Government had accepted was the cheapest and best for the How does the matter stand now? country. gentlemen have not ventured to say that the last offer was not the cheapest; it would be an insult to our common sense to say so. It is $3,000,000 in cash cheaper than the other; and it is cheaper by 3,000,000 of acres of land, estimated at various prices, but at whatever price they are calculated, whether at $1 or $5, there is a substantial and an enormous advantage to the country, in comparison with the other contract. Its other provisions are undeniably more advantageous to the country than those of the other Syndicate. It affords the settlers of the North-West territory a competing road; it affords to the Government and to Parliament more complete control over the matter of tolls; it dispenses with these odious exemptions from taxation, and these other immunities which are embodied in the contract; it does not repeal the revenue laws of the country in favor of the Company as the other offer proposes to do. Now, in all these respects the last offer is infinitely better than the other, and it is equally good in every respect in which hon. gentlemen opposite claim that the first offer is of advantage to the country, and ought to be accepted. Let us see what answer has been made to the arguments which have been advanced—and admittedly advanced with great power showing why, if we have to accept either offer we should accept the latter. We do not say that the second offer, is free from objection; we do not say that it meets the just requirements of the country to the full extent; we do not say that it contains no provisions which we would reject if we were negotiating a contract. But we say to our opponents, taking you on your own ground, looking at both offers as they are, no man can honestly contend that it is not the duty of us, who are merely the servants of the public, to accept the second offer. Some discussion has taken place with regard to the authority the Government had for entering into the contract, and it has been shown beyond all doubt that the hon. Minister of Railways and his colleagues have-I do not say intentionally-exceeded their powers. What they did was ultra vires—that seems now to be conceded by every one. The Act of 1874 is an Act empowering the Government to construct the Canadian Pacific Railway under the superintendence of the Department of Public Works, but it contains an alternative provision which permits the Governor in Council to give out the contracts to a private corporation for the construction of the road. It is expressly provided, however, that such latter power of the Governor in Council shall be subject to certain conditions. That Act is the law of the land yet, except so far as it has been amended by subsequent legislation. That Act supersedes all previous legislation; it expressly repeals the Act of 1872, and the subsequent Acts or resolutions of the House upon this subject. The Act of 1874 seems to have been passed almost with the unanimous consent of the House, for the discussions that took place upon it bear no relation to the questions now under consideration. This Statute has not been repealed or altered by hon. gentlemen opposite, although they have been in power between two and three years, and it has been virtually approved of by being amended as it was on two occasions in 1879. Now, in putting such a work in the hands of a private corporation, it is quite obvious that it would be the duty of Parliament to provide safeguards for the protection of the public interest. Common sense required that Parliament should do so. Our knowledge of the conditions deemed necessary in ordinary contracts required that; but above all, our knowledge of the difficulties which have arisen in connection with the evils of discriminations, of overcharges, and favoritism by railway companies, would demand that we should do something to guard the people's rights. We have heard a great deal during this discussion about how much we could depend upon the selfish interests of the Syndicate for the protection of the public interest. We are told that self-interest would lead them to manage the road and lands for the general good. That statement contains in itself its own refutation, because the interests of this railway, as of many others, do not agree, but clash with the interests of the public. When the question of the purchase of railways by the State was under consideration in England, Sir Rowland Hill, one of the Commissioners appointed to investigate the matter, said that railways were managed with exclusive reference to their own interests, and that they should be in the hands of those who would control the management of them with a view to the interests of the country at large; that is to say, in the hands of the What do we find has been said lately by Sir Henry Tyler, President of the Grand Trunk Railway, and his words were quoted in connection with a similar discussion to this in the English House of Commons. He said:

"If the Government do not manage the railways, the railways will soon

We have seen, from what has taken place in the earlier part of this discussion, how great an interest is taken in this subject in the United States. What efforts are being made there to put railway companies under some reasonable Now, for what purpose and what reasonable control? The control required in order that the interests of the general public may be protected against the selfish interests of the railway companies. Such control was necessary so that the evils which arise from monopolies of railway companies proceeding from their power to overcharge, to discriminate, to favor, should be cured. These things were not absent from the mind of Parliament, when it prescribed the terms and conditions on which this great work should be given to a private corporation. I have heard, during this discussion, a good deal said about the policy of the country being, to build this railway by means of a private corporation, rather than as a public work. To a certain extent, that is true, but it is not true stated in the unqualified and unconditional way in which it has been put. The policy of this country was rather to build it as a public work, unless a company could be got ready to undertake it upon such terms and conditions as Parliament thought sufficient to protect the rights of the public. That is clearly the policy of the Canadian Parliament. What we say is this, that the contract which the Minister of Railways undertook to make is not merely contrary to the letter of the Act of Parliament, but it is utterly opposed to the spirit, to the policy of the Act of Parliament, and to the best interests of the country. Now, what does that Act require, and what should we expect it to require? That Act requires that certain things should be done for the $10,000,000 in cash, precisely double of what the Act permits, Mr. Kirkpatrick.

regulated as to protect the interest of the country. further requires, with regard to the land grant, that twothirds of that grant should remain in the hands of the Goverument, and that the price at which it should be sold should be fixed by the Government. It further provides that the Government should have complete control over the question of rates for freight and passengers, and over the accommodation to be afforded to the public in the way of running trains. And lastly, it provides-and this is the clause that makes it plain, beyond any doubt, that this contract is not within the Act,-it provides, in section 10, that:

"In every contract for the construction of the railway or of any section or sub-section thereof, the Government of Canada shall reserve the right to purchase, under the authority of Parliament, the railway of such sections or sub-sections thereof on payment of a sum equal to the actual cost of the railway, section or sub-section, and 10 per cent. in addition thereto, the subsidies to be deducted."

So that express reservation of the right to purchase is by this section required to be made in any contract that purports to be made under this Act. Now, Sir, we have been told time and again, that the price to be paid under this contract is less than under the Mackenzie Act, and the hon. gentleman who spoke last, said that there was one of the recitals in the amendment of the hon. member for West Durham that was not correct, because it omitted to state that interest at a rate of 4 per cent. per annum, for 25 years, for each mile, should be payable to the contractors. What the amendment says is that the principal money was to be $10,000 a mile; what the Statute says is precisely the same thing. There is no contradiction between the resolution and the Statute. But it is said we are compelled to take the amount agreed to be paid to Mr. Foster, in connection with the contract for the Georgian Bay Branch, as a basis for calculating what the 4 per cent. would have amounted to all over the line. Now, I say that is a perfectly unfounded argument. There were difficulties in the construction of the Georgian Bay Branch that did not exist in other parts. We do not know what amounts the contractors would have required, we do not know what amount the Government would have had or would have agreed to give; all that we can say definitely, is that $10,000 a mile was to be granted as principal money. But, Sir. we find that the terms of this Act have been departed from in the making of this contract, in regard to the mode of payment in a very serious degree, and I may say that the same objection applies to the offer, but not to so great a degree as I shall show presently. The Statute provides that payment shall be made to contractors pro rata; that is, that as they proceed with their work they shall be paid upon the estimate of the Government Engineer a proportion of the contract price, that proportion being ascertained by taking the value of the work done and comparing it with the whole value of the work to be done under the centract. That is a provision which is usually made in contracts, the only difference being that the full amount of work done is not usually paid, but a smaller sum, and that provision is a valuable one, in order to prevent a contractor, as he would do under the contract and the offer before us, being paid in advance of the performance of the work. What is the position of the proposal for payment of the prairie part of the central section of this work compared with what it would have been under the Act of 1874? This portion of the central section is 900 miles, and the value per mile is about $12,000, or ten millions for the whole. The value of the entire work to be done by the Syndicate under the contract is about $50,000,000, the proportion being one-fifth. Now, Sir, one-fifth of the whole cash bonus would be $5,000,000. The amount they are entitled to draw under the contract is purpose of securing the best possible terms for the country. and what predence requires. Now, how is it with regard to It also requires that the payment of the price should be so the land grant? The whole land grant is 25,000,000 acres; take off one-fifth, to be retained by the Government as security, and we have 20,000,000 acres left, and the proportion again would be one-fifth for 900 acres of the central section. Now, the amount which the Syndicate will be entitled to draw under the contract for those 900 miles will he 8,640,000 acres. The proper proportion under the Statute would be only 4,000,000 acres; and there is, therefore, an excess in cash for those 900 miles over what the policy of the country as settled in 1874 allowed and what prudence declares, of $5,000,000 in money and 4,640,000 acres of land; and if the land be taken at the low estimate of $2 per acre, we find an overpayment, a payment in advance, or whatever you choose to call it; of $15,866 per mile, or over $14,000,000 for the 900 miles. I admit there is in the offer, as well as in the contract, an excessive payment for this portion of the road, but in the offer it is a great deal smaller. Estimating the lands at the same value, and taking the same 900 miles, the House will find that if the contract were given to the second Syndicate the country would retain in its hands $5,640,000 more in respect of the central section than under the contract approved by Ministers. The hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton) said that the mode of payment for the central section, in his opinion, required explanation. I think he said he would like to see it amended; he admitted that it was out of all proportion; he admitted that so far he had not heard any satisfactory reason for it; and I think he would admit now, were he speaking again, that no sufficient reason has been since afforded us. We are told by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) that the enormously excessive payment in respect to those 900 miles was given in order to enable the Company to build branch lines. If that be the true reason, how negligent the Minister of Railways must have been in not providing in the contract that the money shall be expended in that way, and in not compelling the Syndicate to do this work. But that is clearly an after thought, for we are told by another hon, gentleman that the object of this was not to build branch lines, but to induce the Company to build the several sections rapidly, so as to fill up the country. We are to pay something like $15,000,000 in advance, if we agree to the first offer to tempt this Company to build the prairie section rapidly. Now, Sir, the mere statement of this vast prepayment shows the absurdity of that reason. The Minister of Finance last night feeling the difficulty of giving the House and the country a satisfactory explanation of this extraordinary part of the contract, went into a calculation of his own; and although the First Minister told us the prairie section was to be built in three years, the Minister of Finance made the calculation upon a completion in four years, and he said, in effect:

"It is not true that the contractors may make a profit, an enormous profit, by building the central section, and then neglect or give up the rest, because I will show that they are to proceed vigorously with the eastern section, and if they do that in four years, I venture to say the a margin will be very small indeed."

Let us see how the matter will stand if we adopt in principle, the system adopted by the Finance Minister, taking three years, which we have the authority of the First Minister for doing, instead of four years. The matter would stand thus: The prairie section to be built in three years, at about $12,000 per mile, which is a liberal estimate, would cost $10,000,000. Supposing the Finance Minister of the Government had received offers for the construction of the road, and that under such offers the road would cost $10,000,000. Supposing the Finance Minister of the construction of the road, and that under such offers for the construction of the road, and that they were going home is correct,—I do not grant this, but I will admit it for the sake of argument—and that they build yearly 65 miles of the eastern section, in three years they will have built about 200 miles, the cost of that portion, say at $30,000 miles, the cost of that portion, say at $30,000 miles, which I believe is a high estimate, and is now reduced, will be $6,000,000, making for the 900 miles of the prairie section to be built in three years, and the 200 miles of the eastern section, which we are told the Company will be bound to build in the same period, a total outlay by the contractors of $16,000,000. What would they be entitled to receive during that time, and for that work? They would be entitled to receive 11,666,568 acres of land; that would be pretty much all that would be in the fertile belt along the 900 miles of railway. They would be entitled to receive in cash $9,000,000 for the central section of 900 miles, and $3,0 6,800 for the 200 miles of the eastern section. Taking the land as before at the very low price of $2 per acre, the matter would stand thus: They would receive in value of lands $23,333,120, and in cash $12,076,800, in all $35,409,920; and the total outlay, allowing the outside estimates, made by the contractors for the work, would not exceed $16,000,000. So they would have a clear profit, after allowing one-fifth of the land to be retained in the hands of the Government, and taking three years for the building of the central section and 200 miles of the eastern section, of $19,409,920. The calculation of the Finance Minister had an "if" in it, and his whole calculation falls to pieces if we dispose of his "if," He said, not taking the land at $2 per acre or $3 per acre, as the First Minister estimated, but calculating that the Company issue land grant bonds, the value of the land would then have to be taken at only 80 cents per acre, and adding an extra year he did not figure out excessive profits to the Company. But what if the Company do not issue land grant bonds? What if the 80 cents per acre does not arise? Then the calculation I have made cannot be refuted, that placing the best lands along the line of railway for 900 miles at the absurdly low price of $2 per acre, the Company would be enabled to draw about $20,000,000 over and above their cash outlay in the first three years, thus tempting them to throw up the rest and most difficult part of the

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. GUTHRIE. The Statute to which I referred settles the policy of the country. Among other respects it settled it in the matter of grades. It provided that the grades of the railway should be fixed by the Governor in Council. The importance of having low grades so as to reduce the working expenses of the railway has already been pointed out, and this contract and this offer are both alike in that respect, and contrary to the Act in providing that the grades shall be according to the standard of the Union Pacific Railway. By that law, also, any contract was to be let after tenders had been called for, and the hon. the Minister of Railways says he has complied with the law in that respect, because public tenders are not spoken of, and he says he has received private tenders, and that this is one of them. Sir, I think that explanation will not be accepted. It is open to the fatal objection that those capitalists who were likely to accept a contract were not informed of the willingness of the Government to receive tenders upon such terms as are now laid before Parliament. Driven out of that, the Minister of Railways, the First Minister, and the hon. member for Frontenac, all say that a speech was made at Bath which was an intimation to the public. What was that intimation? That the Government had received offers for the construction of the road, and that under such offers the road would cost the public nothing, but that they were going home to England to make, if possible, better terms. Now, what notice was conveyed in such a speech, even assuming that it came under the eyes of rich contractors or capitalists who would be likely to embark their money in such an enterprise? What notice did it convey to them that the Government were about to overturn the whole policy of the country on the matter of the conditions under which a private company entirely new conditions, conditions which would be exceedingly advantageous to the contractors? But the hon. member for Frontenac says that it was made known before the House met that the land grant would be 25.000.000 acres and the money grant $25,000,000. But it was not made known what the Government were to do besides. It was not made known that they were going to throw in the construction by Government of the line from Yale to Port Moody, that they were going to expend an enormous sum in finishing the line from Yale to Kamloops, and that the Government would give the invaluable concessions to which reference has been made. When the announcement was made that the Government had contracted on those terms, it was too late for anybody who may have had an idea of bidding, to do so. But, Sir, we are told that it was made known that Ministers were going to England for the purpose of receiving offers and making arrangements for the construction of the railway. Yes; word was sent that they had made arrangements in England, and, on their return, express notice was given to everybody that there was no necessity of considering the subject of tendering because the transaction was closed. A contract firm was alleged to be made, and the public were thrown off their guard. Now, will anyone say that the law which we do not support, simply because it is the law, but because it is the policy of the country, and a sound and wise policy—that the law which provides that no such contract shall be given out except by public tender has been complied with under these circumstances? I have spoken of the exceptional nature of the bargain for the payment for the 900 miles of the centre section. I have no more to say in regard to that except to again call attention to the fact that no explanation has been offered by any speaker upon the subject, of the extraordinary effect of the bargain in respect to the first 100 miles west of Red River, as pointed out by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake.) If there was nothing else to show the reckless character of the agreeexcept this single circumstance, that 100 of railway almost completed are to miles turned ever to this Company, and for taking it off the Government's hands they are to make $200,000 or $300,000 in cash and over 100,000 acres of land—the Government have to do the work and give an enormous amount in cash and land to the Syndicate, although they need not put a pick into the ground. Should we not pause before confirming the contract. We have heard very fully discussed in the House the subject of the value of the lands, and to-day the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) who instead of dealing with the subject from the proper standpoint, namely, in respect to what according to actual experience was the price received for similar lands, he repeats the style of argument adopted by other hon, gentlemen opposite, and says that on previous occasions and under different circumstances some gentlemen on this side placed a different value on the lands. That hon, gentleman says, and says truly, that it will not do to leave out of account, in estimating the lands to this Company, the cost of advertising and the cost of selling, and he says he believes that, instead of the lands costing them a $1 an acre, in twenty years, which he considers will be the average time at which the whole may be sold, they will cost, in advertisements, etc., $3 an acre. Well, probably that is not very far off the mark. But, Sir, what are the facts? The facts are, that some lands in the United States have in ten years increased in value 600 or 700 per cent.-lands belonging to the Central Pacific Railway, which, ten years ago were worth $2 an acre, have been sold for $6 and $8 an acre. The St. Paul and Manitoba Railway, also, has obtained an average price of $6.83 per acre for lands not one whit better than the lands in the fertile belt are. If we are to be guided by experience of the Illinois Contral Railway, and Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railway, both about twenty years old, we have every lreason why we should guard the public interest in every Mr. KIRKPATRICK.

reason to believe, in fact to feel confident, that the lands instead of being worth $3 an acre in twenty years, will be worth from $11 to $14 an acre. They will not be worth that at first; but if we take the prices obtained now for similar lands elsewhere if we take the prices at which the Minister of the Interior himself has been making salesevery practical test we have goes to show that the lands are now worth in cash, at the very lowest calculation, from $2 to $3 an acre. There are certain other respects in which the policy of this country regarding the endowment of a private company for the construction of this work has been set aside. One is in regard to the control which the Government reserved by Statute over the selling price of two-thirds of the land. What is complained of in regard to this land grant is largely this, that no matter which of these Syndicates obtain the land grant, it will constitute a large land monopoly. They may hold these lands until, by the settlement of the country and the labors of others, they will have increased enormously in value, and that instead of selling them to actual settlers and filling up the country, a company may be tempted, as other companies have been, to retard settlement by holding the lands for higher prices. To prevent that, Parliament adopted the policy of giving the Government control of the selling price of two-thirds of the lands. Under that system if the evils complained of would not be altogether removed, still, in regard to two-thirds of the land at all events they would be greatly mitigated. But my hon. friend from Frontenac says, in a sort of triumphant spirit, 'You will create as great a land monopoly by giving 22,000,000 acres to the new Syndicate as you will by giving 25,000,000 acres to the old Syndicate." Well, the only difference will be that the new Syndicate will have 3,000,000 acres less, and that is one of the respects in which I for one should not be disposed to approve of the new offer were the question entirely open. But when it becomes a question of choice, when we are narrowed down to a choice between the two offers, then I say decidedly that the one which places 3,000,000 acres less in the way of monopolists must be the best offer for us. No hon. gentleman on the other side has ventured to answer the arguments advanced on this side, as to the construction of the Act of 1874, in regard to the land grant. It was undoubtedly along the whole line of railway that the land was to be taken under that Act, and that would include, at any rate. lands in the territory called the Sea of Mountains in British Columbia. But there comes in another vital point of difference between the previous arrangements of this House, and this contract, namely, that the selection of the deficiency in lands was formerly entirely in the hands of the Governor in Council, while under both contract and offer, a large power of selection is given to the Company. The hon, the Minister of Finance told us, last night, and the hon, member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) repeated, that there was something in the nature of an argument in the Bill introduced in 1878, by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) while Minister of the Interior, in favor of the position of the Government on this question. I do not remember exactly what that Bill was, but I do remember that it came to nothing. This House never adopted that policy, and we are not committed to it in any way. Perhaps no part of the subject has engaged more earnest attention on both sides of the House than the question of the monopolies and immunities which this contract professes to grant to the Company. There is no doubt that some control is absolutely necessary over these railway companies to protect the public interest. So far from their self-interest affording a reason for the handing over without restrictions the control of the carrying trade of that vast territory, and our connections with it to the hands of a gigantic corporation, it affords the strongest way in our power, because self-interest, and self-interest alone, will govern this Company in their dealings with the public. They may be men of honor who, perhaps privately, would not take an unfair advantage of anybody, but we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that in every country where railways exist, it has been found absolutely necessary that they should be held tightly in hand by the Government and Legislature. It has been found that, wherever they had an opportunity, they even buy up competition. They will combine to raise rates so that, in some cases, it is almost impossible to get at them. There are infinite difficulties found to exist in the way of controlling them; and in making such an arrangement as this, so far from departing from the line of action laid down in 1874, we should strive to extend and to strengthen it by providing safeguards for the interests of our people. Now, let us see what our former policy was, because we have been told that this contract is in keeping with it; and let us see what protection this contract affords, and what protection the new offer affords for the public interest. Under the Act of 1874 it was well defended. Provision was made for its defence in four different ways. One was made for its defence in four different ways. One was by the express enactment that the Governor in Council should have, not once, but always, full control over rates for freight and passengers; and more than that, that they should have full control over the accommodation to be afforded to the public in regard to the number and description of trains to be run, Then the General Railway Act was incorporated in that Act; and the Railway Act gave at all times to the Governor in Council power to control rates, and so protect the public. Then there is this express power, to which I before referred, to purchase, at ten per cent. advance on cost, deducting subsidies. Therefore, if it was found that Parliament and Ministers could not control the railway company in the public interest, we could resort to the power of purchase. The hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick), found very little to admire in a clause in the latest offer, with regard to the power to purchase. He argues that the word "compensation" in that clause to be paid, would be the full value of everything, estimating it at about $116,000,000. I take it, that would not be the construction placed upon the word, that regard would be had to the circumstances under which the railway was acquired. Even if my hon. friend's construction of that clause is correct, it would be a decided advantage to have it, even if, as he says, Parliament possessed the ultimate power of forcing a sale without it. have been told that Parliament in England, in exercise of its supreme power, purchased the telegraph lines. I believe that was by private arrangement. And then a most unfortunate series of illustrations showing such power was brought before the House by the hon. member for Frontenac. He said that Parliament had to lay violent hands on the property of the Irish Church—was net that to relieve an oppressed people?—and then he went on to say that Parliament had, by force and at a large expenditure of money, forced the emancipation of the slaves in the West-Indies. May the time not come when this Parliament will have to emancipate the slaves to this railway monopoly in the North-West. The very thing we are striving against is to prevent that bondage to railway companies which exists elsewhere, and these gentlemen are busily forging the chains. And, Sir, the Act affords perfect freedom in the construction of competing lines, either by the settlers or by anybody else. If the Government does not own the railway, there are but two ways by which the public interest can be protected: one is by competition, and the other is by Government consequence, because the first Syndicate have laid it down control. This contract deprives us of both. The contract that without them they decline to contract; and their friends entered into with Messrs. Stephen & Co., on the one have told us that the Government had to submit to certain other hand prevents Parliament from asserting its power of interference. What does my hon, friend say when we complain of this monopoly clause? Why, he says: "There is a perfect power to build branch lines." There is a perfect power to build feeders to this main trunk line, but where is the power of creating competition to that Company? They have control of the gateways. What are the settlers to do? We are told, they may, at their own cost I suppose, construct, at a cost of $30,000,000 or $40,000,000, another line, on the north of Lake Superior, or they may get out by Hudson Bay. Now, then, how does the last offer compare with the first in these respects. It does not contain any prohibition of public enterprize, nor deprive men of the power and the right to help themselves if they are oppressed. It does not paralize the arm of Parliament. It does not prevent a company either from going to the United States themselves, if they wish, nor Americans from crossing into this country. Hon. gentlemen opposite pretend that they desire to prevent the traffic of the North-West going through the United States, and yet they throw themselves into the hands of an American railway company, whose interest it will be largely to carry the traffic away from this country, and who must do it for ten years at least. There is no other outlet allowed, and the result will be, until the construction of the Thunder Bay Branch, that the traffic will go to the United States. After its completion it may come that way, and down the Lakes, at least a considerable quantity of this traffic, in summer. But in the winter season, until navigation re-opens, we shall for ten years be subject to what hon, gentlemen all unite in describing as a horrible condition of affairs to the control of American Railway Companies; so that the very thing they say they are anxious to avoid, they are providing for if they adopt this contract. There was on the part of the Government last year, an appreciation of the position now taken by the Opposition. The Government, last year, acknowledged that the proper course to take was not to build a railway then, or now, or immediately, on the north shore of Lake Superior, but to finish the branch to Thunder Bay, and then provide an outlet by rail to Sault Ste. Marie. Why is that an unpatriotic policy to-day? Why should the loyalty cry be raised by the hon. gentlemen opposite, because we now say that the course they proposed to take last year is preferable to going on with an expenditure of $20,000,000 for the construction of their road on the north shore of Lake Superior in the meantime. Not only does the new offer not ask to prohibit public enterprize nor destroy rivalry nor healthy competition, but it does not deprive the Governor in Council, as the first offer seeks to do, of the power to interfere from time to time with the tolls of the railway. It is true that, under the first offer, power is taken to regulate the tolls in the first instance; but as has been unanswerably pointed out, when the road is new and the traffic small, those tolls will necessarily be high, and then, forsooth, the provision comes in that no powerneither the Parliament or Governor in Council-shall be permitted to interfere. Now, why should this be? If we are to depend upon those gentlemen's self-interest to do us justice, why should they go out of their way to destroy a provision that every railway company is subject to. This is one of those matters called minor details by hon. gentlemen opposite; and my hon friend from Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) quotes something that the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) once said, that these were unimportant matters. What we say is this: We have the the best reason to believe that they are of the utmost hand, prehibits the construction of rival lines, and on the things they did not like because they were insisted on by the Syndicate, and without making those concessions they could not have got the contract. If the Syndicate value them so highly, should not that very circumstance put this House on its guard? Then the new offer leaves Parliament full control, under the general Railway Act as we find it, and does not ask to put people in its power either by destroying competition, or by limiting and destroying the power of Government and Parliament. Then, again, there is an enormous difference between the two offers in respect to the powers of municipalities in imposing taxes. The member for Frontenae says the Globe had an article, which leads us to believe that if the new Syndicate were to obtain the contract, they would, by arranging with the new municipalities in the North-West, get exemptions. If there was any real expectation that they were likely to secure immunity from taxes, we should not find the Syndicate making it an important and indispensable condition of this contract that they should have this immunity. Why should we seek to deprive unformed Provinces of the rights the older universally have? Why should we do this? Is it because the member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert), with great ingenuity, chooses to make a partial estimate-to take one or two items that go to make up the whole, and say it is only $6,000 a year, a more bagatelle, when the Syndicate place such a large value upon it?

Mr. RYKERT. Show I am wrong if you can.

Mr. GUTHRIE. The hon. gentleman admitted that the Northern Railway Company paid taxes, I think $7,000 a year, in Toronto. Well, $7,000 in one city is a very considerable item. We find it stated that Toronto derives a large part of her revenue, $25,000 a year, from taxes on railway property within that municipality; and I venture to say the taxes paid in Ontario by the Grand Trunk and Great Western Railways come to a much larger amount than one would suppose from anything said in this House. We know that in the United States various railways, not so long as this will be, have paid from $170,000 to $500,000 a year in taxes. Whatever the amount is, I say it is a most unfair provision for the House to seek to insert in any railway charter a provision which will deprive a Province not yet formed of a right possessed by every other Province already formed. Then the immunity from the ordinary burdens of land owners -that exceptional provision that they shall be entitled to avail themselves of the benefit of other peoples' labor and improvements, that they shall have their lands enhanced in value by the outlay of adjoining proprietors, and that they themselves shall not be responsible at all—is sought to be defended in what way. Why, we are told that they could not raise money by mortgage if they had not this exemption. We know it is a fact that every day mortgage loans are negotiated on property that is notoriously liable to be sold for taxes—property that is subject to taxation. We have authority for saying that the want of such an exemption clause was not one of the difficulties in the way of Sir Hugh Allan. All he required to enable him, as he said, to float his bonds was an extension of time, and another provithis Company to sell their lands rapidly, and in order to support that I understood the hon. gentleman for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) to say that every acre of land broken up was worth $4 a year to the railway company. I suppose he meant by the carriage of goods. Well, if that is the profit from breaking up the land to an ordinary railway company, I would like to know what will be the profit of other words, the first Syndicate, considering the exorbitant rates they have hitherto been enabled to collect? Reforence has been made to the character of the security for the run- an appeal to the people should not be issued by way of Mr. GUTHRIE.

ning of the railway. We have been told by the hon, member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) who has followed the statements of other hon, gentlemen—that the running of the railway will involve an outlay of from six to eight millions of dollars every year, and that there will be a very serious loss on that account. That was not the statement of the hon. Minister of Railways last year.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. That was the statement of the hon, member for Lambton.

Mr. GUTHRIE. He only made that statement in 1879, but later than that, when there was further experience, when the trade of the North-West had developed; when the hon, the Minister of Railways had begun to get in returns from the Pembina Branch, at the rate of five, six, eight and ten thousand dollars per month, of net revenue; we had the authority of that hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) for believing that this road would not only pay running expenses, but would yield a return, by way of interest, on capital. But let us ask ourselves if the loss is to be so great as these hon. gentlemen profess to believe, for I suppose they would not quote the hon. member for Lambton without leading us to infer that they accept his statement, how thoroughly inadequate is the security which they demand from the contractors? All that we have is $5,000,000 of land grant bonds or 5,000,0000 acres of land, and you have only to state that the loss is to be from six to eight millions per year to see that we are certain in that event to have the road thrown back on our hands. There is no provision for holding the one million dollars deposit as security for running the road. The hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton) is so apprehensive on that point that as I understood him he would like to see that provision amended; and I think if there is to be such an alarming loss as was pictured by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) we would all like to see the security increased no matter which offer is accepted by the House. A challenge was thrown out by the hon. member for Frontenac. That is not the first challenge we have heard, for we had a knightly challenge too. I think that this sort of challenge is not particularly indicative of courage on either side. They come from men in particularly safe counties.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I would give up a safe county. Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Come to Centre Huron or to South Huron.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I will go to Kingston.

Mr. GUTHRIE. Our challenge is to test all the constituencies and not to pick one here and there where one side or the other is particularly strong. Let us have a contest all round—a general engagement. Let us all be sent to our masters and compelled to consult those whom we are supposed to represent. Now, it does not do to be too boastful, I do not intend to indulge in anything of that kind, although I do not know that I have anything to fear. But that is not the point. Let us have an appeal to the people. I do not say this by way of defiance, but I put it on this ground: I say that it is not true that this question sion which had no relation to the exemption of the land of building the road by a private corporation, without those from taxation. But we are told that self interest will lead safeguards which are necessary for the protection of the safeguards which are necessary for the protection of the public interest, has ever been submitted to the people. I say that the present proposal is in an entirely new form, and has never been pronounced upon by the constituencies. We find that when Parliament came fresh from the people in 1874, they settled on a policy which, I am bound to say, met with the substantial approval of all parties. When the next General Election was the St. Paul, Minneapolis and Manitoba Railway Company, in | held, that policy was not questioned, but by this measure you seek to reverse that policy without consulting the people. That is the position I take, and I say that the demand for defiance, but with an honest desire to take their opinion apon a question they have never yet had an opportunity of We have not now to decide the pronouncing upon. We have not now to decide the question as to how the ratification of this contract will affect the fortunes of any political party. It has been said that if the contract is ratified it will prove injurious to the Conservative party. Now, that is not the question before us at all. The real question is, in the public interest, which of these, the contract or the offer should be ratified, or should we ratify either? When an offer is laid upon the Table, which is a great deal better by millions of dollars and millions of acres of land; which contains fewer exceptional conditions; which confers no exceptional immunity; which seeks to deliver the carrying trade of that country from the hands of those who would engross it for their own private advantage—when we are called upon to reject such an offer and prefer the more onerous contract, we are entitled to ask why? Is it because the gentlemen who have signed the offer are less able or less willing to build the road than the others? Is it because these gentlemen are all Canadians? Is the party who obtained power upon the cry of Canada for the Canadians, to turn their backs upon a proposal which is suscribed by leading Canadians everywhere, and accept one that is subscribed by residents in the States, in England and in France? One Canadian resident, I think, is a suscriber, Mr. Stephen, the others may have been residents, but they are not now residents of Canada. We have shown, I think, that their homes and their interests are largely elsewhere. Is it because the profits that may be made will be kept in the country by the contractors under the second tender, and in the other be probably sent out of it? Hon. gentlemen say the offer comes too late. Why should it be too late if it is submitted for our decision, if we are the judges, if we have power to say which we will take, why is it too late? When could it have come before? How could it have come earlier? not that offer, considering the magnitude of the work, considering how the parties live at a distance from each other. considering the natural difficulty of getting men to consider a large enterprise, was not that offer presented to us with expedition? In what way, under the law of our country and under the circumstances, can it be fairly said that these men came too late? They have come as early as they could come, having knowledge of the conditions upon which the Government proposed to make a contract. We are told that it is not bond fide, that it is a political trick. Now, Sir, what is the evidence of that? Is it the mere desperate assertion of men who have no other reason to give? What ground do they urge for saying it? Ministers say that the offer contains a permission to the Government of the day to give up the construction of certain portions of the road, and they say that that is in accordance with the policy of the Opposition. Why, it is in accordance with the policy of the hon, gentlemen themselves, as announced last year. They are the gentlemen who inaugurated it, and who said that the Sault Ste. Marie line ought to be built, and not the line north of Lake Superior. Now I do not intend to bandy words about it, but the debates were read, time and again in this House during this discussion, in which the Minister of Railways was shown to have said here last April that he had changed his mind in regard to the construction of the Sault Ste. Marie line; and that when he had formerly opposed it, circumstances were different, it was before we had the Thunder Bay Branch, but now, he was in favor of its construction; and the leader of the Government in the Senate said that the survey of the Sault would be made and the work proceeded with. How is this offer not bond fide? What better proof of the earnestness, of the determination of men to go on with the work, could you have, than the paying of the money, $1,500,000 as security—money coming from all parts of the country, from Toronto, Kingston, Montreal, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick? The money much cheaper and on terms more advantageous to the

has come upon short notice, and more has come than was required in order that there might be abundance. Is it possible to have better evidence of the honesty of the men than is afforded by the circumstances of the instant raising and deposit of such an enormous sum of money? We are told that these men knew that the Government would not take their offer. Who knew that the Government would not take their offer until the First Minister told us so the night before last? These men made their offer before any such announcement was made. What reason had they to suppose the interests of the country were to be sacrificed by this House. What reason had Sir Wm. Howland and his associates to suppose that hon, gentlemen would reject an offer which would save to the country millions of money and millions of acres of land? Had they not rather reason to believe that a spirit of patriotism would prompt every hon. gentleman in this House to say: "This is decidedly a better proposal, we must prefer it if we are to regard our duty to our country." Then it is said that this offer is objectionable, because it does not provide for the construction of the road through British territory. Well, that objection has only to be stated and the terms of the proposal read to show that it is utterly without foundation in fact, and that it is just as binding an offer to construct the road through British territory as the other, and by men who are British subjects, and who, if there is anything in the loyalty cry, are more likely to carry the railway through our own territory than Frenchmen, or Germans, or Americans, or anybody else. It is finally said by Ministers that the acceptance of the second offer would necessitate the retirement of the Government. Well, the leader of the Opposition has declared that he does not so regard it; but, Sir, the Government have made changes before in their policy with regard to the construction of this road. Why cannot they make them again? In 1879 their policy was to construct it with Imperial aid. They did not succeed in obtaining that aid. Last year their policy was to construct it as a Government work, paying for it out of the lands, and 100,000,000 acres were set apart for that purpose. They have changed that policy, and they have not refired from office, but still enjoy the confidence of an enormous majority of the members of this House; and, I venture to say, that if in the public interest they were to accept the lower offer now, they would still enjoy that confidence. Nay, more, that nothing would increase the confidence of their supporters, in this House and out of it, in them more than if they should say: "we had supposed this was the best offer we could get; but we find it is not the best offer; what we did we did with an honest desire to promote the interests of the country, but we find ourselves mistaken, and we think it our duty to pocket any question regarding our own personal position in the matter, and to say that, in the interests of the country, we will take the lower offer." Governments before to-day have withdrawn great measures without retiring from office. We remember the occasion of Lord John Russell introducing a Reform Bill in, I think, 1854. It met with adverse criticism, and was so severely handled by the Opposition that he was compelled to withdraw it, and he was so much affected at this that, I believe he shed tears. But he did not retire. Later on we have a precedent which hon, gentlemen opposite will appreciate. We all remember the last Reform Bill in England, introduced in 1867 by Lord Beaconsfield, then Mr. Disraeli. That Bill was so criticised and altered in its progress through the House that it became an entirely new measure, and as it was finally passed by the House it reversed the policy of the Government altogether; yet the Conservatives in England did not consider it necessary that Mr. Disraeli should retire. No doubt the introduction of this measure and its subsequent withdrawal would do a certain amount of damage to the Government; but it does not prevent them from saying that, contrary to their honest belief, they have found Canadian capitalists who are willing to do the work country than those with whom they made this contract, and are therefore constrained to withdraw from the contract. and it may be to accept the other. Hon. gentlemen tell us we are free to reject this measure, but they talk at the same time of party ties and make partizan appeals How, then, are the members of this House free? Were not the supporters of the Government committed to this bargain on the morning of the day after it was laid on the Table of the House, and before they heard a discussion of its merits at all? Were not caucuses held since the late offer, under circumstances to indicate that these gentlemen opposite had not a full opportunity of hearing both sides of of the question? Reports of that kind are in circulation-I do not know whether they are true or not. But, whatever the fact may be regarding that, it is undeniable that a determination is shown by men, who are merely the agents of others, to disregard the rights of their principals, and to vote away an enormous sum of money, and to grant enormous exclusive privileges, contrary to the interests of those they represent who have to pay the money, and who have to suffer from the granting of the privileges. Can any hon, gentleman give one good, substantial roason for rejecting the new offer, except that the Government chose to commit—not the House or the country -but themselves, to an engagement that will prove more onerous, and more expensive than the one last submitted? I ask the House to consider that not one of the advantages claimed for the first offer is absent from the second. I say, further, that in every respect in which you can contrast the two offers, it is to the advantage of the country to accept the last offer. Shall it be said, as I have heard in the corridors has been said, that $3,000,000 is not much anyway. $3,000,000 is a sum that very few of us apprehend the quantity of. It is an enormous amount, and it is our bounden duty to save it, and at least twice as much more, to our country and our constituents if we can do so. It is our duty to preserve every foot and every acre of their territory if it is in our power to save. It is our bounden duty not to put shackles upon trade in and with the North-West; it is our bounden duty to take advantage of every offer we can. The corporation we are about to create, if we accept either of these offers, will be a power in the State. They will be proprietors of 3,000 miles of trunk line of railway, and it is said they will have a great many branch lines of railway. They will not only be enormous railway proprietors and magnates, but they will be a land corporation possessing an invaluable and vast estate. They have also the power to become a great telegraph company. They have not only the right to construct a telegraph line of their own, as a railway company, but they have the power to levy tolls and send messages. They have also the power to become steamboat proprietors, to do the carrying trade on the great rivers and lakes of that country. They will become, no matter which Company is incorporated, an extraordinary power in the State, a power which, perhaps, we will not be thereafter so well able to control; and it behoves us now, before we commit ourselves to this transaction, to see that we exercise the utmost vigilance to protect our constituents and the people in the matter of rates, and prevent the legalization of a powerful system resulting in that partiality, injustice and extortion so detrimental not only to the settlers in the North-West, but to the mercantile, manufacturing and other interests of the country at large.

Mr. SHAW. This question is of so important a nature to the country, it involves interests so great, that I do not desire to give a silent vote. I am much pleased that it has many young members in this House, and this question is of so important a nature, that unless it had been very largely discussed, they might possibly have been compelled to give a vote upon it without perfectly understanding it. They cannot do so now. This matter has been before the country for over ten years. Every Government, from the time of Confederation to this, has had the subject under consideration. And, now that it has come before the House in this tangible shape, every one must be delighted that it has received so full and such ample dis-There is no doubt, from the discussions that have taken place here, that ever since Confederation it has been the policy of every Government to try and construct the Canadian Pacific Railway. It is quite true, also, that during the administration of the hon. member for Lambton, there did appear to be a section of his followers who were not apparently so anxious to construct that road as he was. A suspicion that such was the case not only existed in the minds of many Reformers, but it also existed in the minds of many Conservatives. Particularly did this impress the minds of representatives from British Columbia and the North-West. The representatives from both these sections were of opinion that a section of the Reform party were not desirous to construct this road; or, at least, if not desirous, were lukewarm in regard to it. Now, we find that this section of the Reform party, who have been regarded as hostile to the construction of this road during last Session, and particularly this Session, have attained predominance in the party, and the policy of which we had a suspicion for a great number of years has now become developed. It has obtained significance. There is no concealment made by the advanced section of this party, and the other section which formerly advocated the scheme are now silent. Now we are to look on the Reform party as, in a manner, having abandoned the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway from ocean to ocean. I think there is no doubt about that. It may be said that this is not the case. I have heard the hon. leader of the Opposition, who, I am sorry, is not in his place, say he only desired to postpone it; but we observe by the very motion which he has placed in your hands, by the very contract which has been brought in here by what is called the new Syndicate-

An hon. MEMBER. Not a contract.

Mr. SHAW. It is not a contract, I admit, but the hon, member for Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) seemed to think that we had just as good option to adopt it as the resolution before the House. If we are wrong in calling it a contract in the one case, I suppose, according to hon, gentlemen opposite, we will be wrong in calling the other a contract. I will refer to the 20th, 21st, and 22nd sections of this offer. I would desire to point out what seems to be the view entertained by hon. gentlemen opposite, in regard to the construction of that road. The 21st section reads thus:

"In the event of the Government desiring to postpone or withdraw from the construction of the said railway extending from Kamloops to Port Moody, they shall be at liberty to do so," etc.

The 20th section contains a similar provision with reference to the eastern section, but only the word "withdraw" If it is the desire to postpone that section is used. of the railway, it must be admitted that it is not desirable to commence its construction at present. If it is not desirable to construct it at present, but only at some future time, they have not told us how they intend to construct it. If the Sault Ste. Marie road is constructed and a large number of emigrants settled at Thunder Bay been discussed so largely on every side, that the attitude of and the Sault Ste. Marie, their interests will, I think, have parties towards this measure, has been placed before the House in so ample a manner, that even the youngest member cannot but have an understanding of it. I, as one of the young members, am much pleased at this. There are a great be a long time before it will be diverted thence to a different route. If, however, a population were settled in the North-West, and lands sold there—if it is the intention of the Reform party to finally construct the section north of Lake Superior—they have not pointed out their plan of doing so. But supposing they intend to construct it out of the railway fund, which may be accumulated by the sale of lands in the North-West-a thing which I presume is very doubtful, if the opinions of hon, gentlemen opposite respecting the value of those lands be correct—it would be a long time before they could accumulate a fund sufficient for the purpose. But suppose the lands did sell for a very considerable amount, producing a sufficient sum to build the road north of Lake Superior, and it was proposed in this House to use it in that way, and that three or four Provinces then existed in the North-West, with a large population, also at Thunder Bay and the Sault, should we not be very likely to witness in Parliament a score similar to that of the Ontario Parliament, when it was proposed to distribute the railway fund? Some hon, gentleman would be very apt to move that the railway fund should be distributed among the different Provinces, according to population, or that a general division be made. No hon, gentleman could know what the member on his right or left hand wanted or would do, and a general scramble for that fund might be witnessed. It seems to me that unless the lands of the North-West are utilized at present for the construction of that road, in future we shall have very little chance of so employing them. Hon, gentlemen opposite say that this is not a political question, but should be looked upon simply as a commercial transaction. I doubt that view. am much more inclined to take the view of the member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) who said that this was not a common contract, or one that could be regarded like a contract for the building of a house or small branch railway. It cannot be denied that it has large political consequences, and must be looked upon in a political as well as a commercial aspect; and if it is meant that we are not to look upon it in a political aspect, if we are not to take a party view of it, or advocate it for the purpose of obtaining a party advantage, I agree with that view; but if it is meant that the political view of the situation is not to be considered as well as the commercial, I deny that proposition. I think that unless the Provinces be united by such a railway, the object we entertained at Confederation will not be These Provinces require to be linked accomplished. together in order to secure a lasting union, and if they be not so linked together by a friendly spirit and by such a railway, we shall not get the advantages of the National Policy inaugurated, nor the full advantage of Confederation. That certainly was the view of these patriotic gentlemen who united these Provinces. I do not know that any other view has ever been attempted to be advocated before the people; and I am quite sure that if any such attempt was made, the people would frown it down. We ought then to attempt to carry out this policy, and if we do not construct the Canadian Pacific Railway now we are never likely to do it in the future. We have heard it said that commerce knows no bounds; that we should not regard this scheme from a political point of view, and that the road is simply for commercial purposes. If we are to look at it simply as a commercial question, and to proceed with the construction of this road to the Sault, and thence into the United States, I think hon, gentlemen must go a step further and advocate the doing away with Custom-houses along the frontier. That seems to me to be the necessary consequence, and the course they should logically advocate. It appears to me that if we are now to advocate the construction of a road to Sault Ste. Marie, for commercial purposes only, it was a mistake to expend so much money in building the branch from Thunder Bay to Selkirk, with its fine grades and curves, and with the expressed intention that it should be made the great road to the North-West.

If we are now to abandon the construction of the Canadian Pacific road and expend $3,000,000 for the road to the Sault Ste. Marie, it was a great mistake to bother about the water stretches, about the Georgian Bay Branch, and the extensive and expensive surveys which we have been carrying on for years. The whole course of this Parliament for the last ten or twelve years, according to that view, must have been a mistake, and it is only after expending $14,000,000 on the Thunder Bay Branch, and $3,000,000 on surveys, that we have made the discovery. It may be argued, it has been argued, that the building of that road from Thunder Bay to Selkirk would enable our emigrants going into the country in summer, to get in without touching on American territory. Is that the object we had in view? Was this to be a mere immigration road, constructed for that purpose and no other? No; it was constructed as a branch of the Canadian Pacific Railway, intended for that originally, and the Conservative party intend it shall be such yet. It is all very well for Reformers to say that we are to be guided by present circumstances only—that we are not to look to the pastthat we may not be consistent—that the question is: what is best and cheapest for the country now! That is one view, but there is another view, and it is one which Conservatives, at all events, are likely to entertain. It is that which has been the policy of the country for a great number of years, which have been the views of the wisest and bost men, the best educated and most patriotic, for a considerable number of years, and which is entitled to very great respect. Such has been the opinion of hon. gentlemen opposite. It has been the opinion of Conservatives that a Canadian Pacific Railway should be constructed, and it is the opinion of Conservatives yet. We have respect for opinions, the views and the judgments of the past. We have respect for the think that a country must have some history, that there must be some continuity of legislation, that no country ever attained to any importance unless it had some fixed object in view, something to which it pointed the attention of its people as an object they had to attain to in the future. That is the view we have taken of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and, as Conservatives, we are bound, if possible, to carry out that view and build this road from ocean to ocean. I have no doubt that they will succeed, and that the proposition which has been laid on the Table eventually will carry. Now we have an amendment to this proposition. I am not experienced in the practice of Parliament, but when I examined this amendment, I was not exactly sure whether it was in order. I could not see that it was actually an amendment to the proposition laid on the Table, but as no one else took exception to it I did not feel that I should. It was argued by the hon, member for South Wollington (Mr. Guthrie) that we were free to accept either this proposition or the one which has since been laid on the Table of the House, but in the amendment we are not asked to accept the later offer. The leader of the Opposition does not seem to have confidence in the new Syndicate proposition himself, for he does not propose to substitute their offer for the other, and surely he might have had some confidence in it seeing that it emanates from his political friends. I think if the hon, gentleman had not been afraid of "putting his foot in it," he would have asked the House to accept the offer, instead of declaring as he has declared in his amendment simply that the contract should not be legalized. With regard to the second proposition, the hon. gentleman says it is an inconceivably better one. I deny that; or rather, I say if it is an inconceivably better proposition it is inconceivably better for the contractors and not for the country. The second Syndicate can abandon three sections of this road by the consent of the Government. It seems to be the desire of the hon. gentlemen opposite that the eastern section should be abandoned, but they do not attempt to show how it is to be constructed hereafter. Hon, gentlemen in their calculation of the land and money grant never have apparently taken into account the cost of running the road through what has been described as a wilderness, and what is certainly a poor, barren country, as we all know; those parts of the road will not pay for years and years to come. It is true we know what the country is giving for this road, but the contractors have great uncertainty as to what they will get for its construction. They know that they will get $25,000,000 in money and 25,000,000 acres of land, but the value of that land cannot be estimated at $1, $2 or even $5 an acre, as has been done by hon. gentlemen opposite. We do not know the value of that land. It may be considerable, but we must deduct from its value the cost of placing emigration there, the interest on the money expended for that purpose, the cost of running the road in the meantime, and the interest on the cost of the plant-all this will have to be deducted from the value of the land-so that the Company cannot know what they shall receive. But it is quite possible to say—if the eastern section be withdrawn, at the desire of the Government, and the Yale-Kamloops section be postponed—there is no uncertainty about the second contract. There will be money in that. If the opinion of the hon, gentlemen opposite be that these sections should be withdrawn, that they ought not to be built at present, then the second company will have an excellent bargain. I will not go into calculations because that has already been done so extensively. Now, as regards the contract itself. Whether it is a good contract or not, in the interest of the country, I think there can be no doubt that if we are to obtain the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway we must be prepared, as a people, to make some sacrifice. We have not to look upon it as a mere commercial transaction, but we are to look at its political necessity in binding together the Provinces of the Dominion. The objections taken to the details of the contract I look upon as captious. It is true that if hon. gentlemen opposite take the ground that it is not desirable to have a Canadian Pacific Railway, then I can easily understand their objections. If they take the view that it would be ruinous to this country to proceed with the eastern section or the western section, then it would be quite in order for them to give a factious opposition to the adoption of this scheme. It does seem to me that many of the views expressed by them, in regard to different portions of this contract, would indicate that. There was one objection taken by the hon. gentleman for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), which struck me when I read the contract first, and that was that when new Provinces are formed in the North-West, the Company being free from taxation on their road and plant, better terms would be required by these new Provinces. Now, it has been clearly shown that the amount of taxation upon the plant and railway of the Company would be very small. But even, were it larger than it will be, it is simply removing taxation from the older Provinces and placing it upon the new. It is simply making the North-West do some of that which hon. gentlemen opposite ask should be done by the older Provinces. But when we are obliged to pay so much for railway accommodation in this country, I see no reason why the North-West should not assume some portion of the burden. If this is an argument against taxation, it could be met by simply increasing the bounds of the new Provinces, by giving them a little more territory, and you would make up for the deficiency of taxable property. I think this is not a real difficulty. think it is a burden which they ought to assume. The hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) seems to think that this Syndicate will prevent lines of this, that we are to encourage competition in the construction of railway running south. I do not see any reason why he tion of railways? My own impression is, that there has should object to that. That would simply form a connecting been too much competition in the construction of railways link with the Sault Ste. Marie, and if it is not in the in Ontario already, and that a great deal of money has, in Mr. SHAW.

interest of the country to construct the road north of Lake Superior, but to postpone it indefinitely, I do not see any reason why he should object to that road being deflected in that direction. The hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron) also raises certain objections to this contract. He says it is inferior to the Allan contract, and that when the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) compared the Allan contract with the present one and pronounced the latter more favorable, the hon. member for South Huron complained that he did not compare the two in their details. There is no doubt he did not. The hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe only compared them in respect to the money and land grants. He was not then dealing with the details, and the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron) was simply exercising a little ingenuity when he said the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe did not deal with the details. He was comparing the two schemes in another way, and, in the way in which he did compare them, I think the present scheme compares very favorably with the Allan scheme. The hon, member for South Huron also took objection to this contract, because he said it was to be constructed according to the standard of the Union Pacific when first constructed. A great deal has been said on that point, and I perceive that the new Syndicate points to the year 1873 as a better time, as the period when that road was in good condition. Hon, gentlemen opposite in effect say: "when first constructed" may alude to a period anterior to that. I do not think that is a fair reading of that section, or that it would be so read by any impartial person. It admits of argument, no doubt; but suppose, for example, that an immigrant went to the North-West, erected the walls of a house, covered it in, and took his family into it; and after a time he completed his house. Would it be said that the house was constructed when he first went into it? No; it would be when the work was finished. I think the advantages are very much on the side of the Government in dealing with the Syndicate. In dealing with the Government, the Syndicate will be obliged to place something like a fair and honest construction on the terms of the contract. It will be in their interest to do so. It cannot be in the interest of the Syndicate to be at war with the Government of the country. Some hon, gentleman referred to a decision of a United States court, with regard to the time the Union Pacific Railway was constructed, that it was in the year 1869; but on referring to that case, one must perceive that the railway at that time, had obtained grants of land along the line of the railway, and that United States troops had been carried over the line, and hence neither party was in a position to say that the road had not been finished, because they had both been using it as a finished road. The last speaker told us that a great monopoly would be created in that country. It is very difficult to say what that really means. Every railway is a monopoly to some extent, and wherever there is a large amount of capital employed in the transaction of any business, it creates a monopoly to some extent. We have monopolies in Ontario and Quebec. Take, for example, the road in my own county. I recollect a printer there who had to send for his press to Liverpool, having to pay as much to have it carried from Guelph to Walkerton, a distance of about seventy miles, as he had to pay to have it carried from Liverpool to Guelph. To talk of monopolies in the North-West, when we have monopolies all over this country, seems to me absurd. A monopoly in railway matters exists everywhere, except at competing points, and nineteen places out of every twenty, in Ontario, are affected by monopoly. Now, do hon. gentlemen mean to argue from this way, been lost. It is, perhaps, the only way by which we can overcome a monopoly at the present time, but it is a very clumsy, awkward and expensive manner of doing so. and a better method, I have no doubt, will be found in the course of a few years. I have no doubt that, finally, railways will come under the direction of the Government: but is any hon, gentleman prepared to say that Canada is new in a position to deal with the question in that way? We had better do away with the monopolies in Ontario and Quebec before we deal with them in the North-West. Future expenditure in the construction of competing railways should be done away with, and we should have one general scheme. I do not think Canada is in a position to adopt that course. I do not think we have the money to do it, and even if we had, I question whether otherwise we would be capable of adopting that course. But, supposing we should try to adopt it in regard to the North-West, is the Government to cut and pair that Company down so as to render it as poor and weak as possible, so that it might not prove a monopoly capable to compete with the monopolies in the United States? I say no. It is not wise to take that course. Our course should be to grant power to that Company, which they would be fairly able to use in the interests of the country; and the Company will, in my opinion, have all they can do, even backed by the Government of the Dominion, to overcome the competition of the United States roads. I believe the assistance the Government of the Dominion will give them will be little enough to enable them to compete successfully with the United States roads. This is not a rich country in money. It has an immense acreage of fertile lands and fair prospects. It is the interest of Canada to deal as liberally with the Company as circumstances will permit. Now, I would refer to that matter of taxes again, because there seems to be a very strong point attempted to be made with regard to it The lands in the United States are said to be selling at $6 an acre. Now, we know that has been caused by the introduction of railways, by the granting of large sections of land to aid railway companies in opening up new settlements, and yet after these lands have been opened up and increased in value to this extent we are asked to put the same value on our lands. After they have largely accomplished what we are beginning to attempt to accomplish, we are asked, not to do as they do, but to do the very reverse; we are asked to assume control of railways which it is impossible for us to do and leave our lands barren and waste. There is no other way, in my opinion, to open up the North-West than that indicated in this arrangement on the Table. To attempt the other, would simply be abandoning the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway for all time to come. The adoption of the proposition will enable that road to be built, if not in the time mentioned, at least I hope very nearly within that time. I have no doubt every Conservative in this country, every one who wishes to see this country advance to an independent position, must desire to see that road built. I have no doubt that there will be no break in the Conservative ranks with regard to this proposition, and I am quite sure that everywhere it will meet with the approval of public opinion in the country. I know that public opinion has been attempted to be enlisted against it during the holidays: that parties have been active in trying to obtain an expression of public opinion against the construction of this road. But they met with entire failure. They came back from the country with very different feelings from those with which they set out. They went to the country enthusiastic, with heated imaginations. They thought they were going to wake up the country to opposition to this scheme. Their walk in the country did them a good deal of good. It cooled their ardor wonderfully, and when they came back, instead of opposing the

they would be very willing to have that contract ratified, provided the details were satisfactory-they, seeing the change in public opinion, brought down a contract of a very inferior description, very much more favorable to the contractors, and very much worse for the country than the Syndicate terms, and under which the Canadian Pacific Railway would never be built. We think that the Government of a country can further the country's interests—that this Government did further the interests of this country by its National Policy—and we still wish to promote that and to make this an independent country. When the country was in difficulties hon, gentlemen opposite held out their hands and said they were powerless to do any good, that they were mere flies on the wheel, and that times had simply to change and the country would eventually improve, and things come Well, I do not think the Canadian Pacific right again. Railway will be built in that way. Some action will require to be taken by the Government, and this contract is the proper action to be taken. It is quite true, there may be some things connected with this contract that one would rather see changed, but the same would occur in any contract. I have no doubt that there is not a contract anyone has made, in which he would not like to see some conditions changed or introduced; and, no doubt, in this case, our own interests make us alive to improvements in this contract. But we believe that the Conservative party will carry on this work-that the country will support them, and that it will not be in the interest of the country to change the old contract for a similar and inferior one and place it in the hands of hon, gentlemen opposite, to enable them to postpone or delay either of the sections. In that case an event would take place in the future, such as has taken place in the past—those flies would collect around the wheels of the political machine and clog them for the next ten years. We intend the political machine shall revolve freely, though it may occasion a little trouble to brush the flies away. We intend to carry on this railroad, and with this object I believe every Conservative will vote in a solid phalanx for the Government motion before the Chair.

Mr. BECHARD. Owing to illness since the beginning of this Session, I have not ventured to take part in this protracted debate, which is engaging the anxious attention of the Canadian people. However reluctant I may be to speak on this almost exhausted subject, at the risk of only repeating something that has been already said, I will endeavor to set, at least, briefly, before the country my opinions with regard to this question. The motion placed yesterday in your hands by the member for West Durham meets my hearty concurrence. Indeed I am prepared to go still further than he proposes in that motion; for not only do I consider it against the public interest to vote the resolutions which are now before the House, but in my humble judgment, the whole question should be immediately submitted to the people. I am aware that at the opening of this Session the right hon, leader of the Government expressed the opinion that the people, however intelligent they may be, are not competent to judge of the importance and bearing of a question of this magnitude. Notwithstanding the great respect which I profess for so high an authority as the right hon. gentleman, I remain convinced that the people, after all, constitute the supreme tribunal which pronounces final judgment upon all great political issues. No one in the House forgets, I presume, that so soon as Parliament is over, everyone of us will have to submit, to the judgment of the people, his course with regard to this, as well as all other questions acted upon in Parliament. Then the people, regardless of all that may have been said in this House to show their incompetency, will affirm their competency and different details of the contract, as they had before that pronounce a verdict by which every one of us will be bound to time done—because many hon. gentlemen opposite said abide. It has been suggested on both sides of the House, during this discussion, that this should not be made a party ques tion—that considering the great public interests involved in its solution, it should stand far above all party interests. I am glad to say that I am in warm sympathy with this patriotic feeling; but I must say that I know of no better way of reaching this object than an appeal to the people. For as soon as the people will know and pronounce upon our opinions, our course will be dictated by them, all party spirit will be hushed, and the question finally settled. It is quite true that this question has been before the Canadian people for a number of years, ever since 1872; but everyone remembers that from that time to this moment it has undergone great changes and modifications. It has assumed different forms, involving different schemes, upon which the people have not had an opportunity of pronouncing. During that lapse of years we have had no less than five or six different schemes submitted to Parliament for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. We had first the scheme of 1872, which provided that the railway should be constructed by a company which should receive a eash subsidy of $30,000,000, and a land grant of 50,000,000 acres. Then we had the scheme of 1874, and the Act of 1874, which embodied the main features of the Act of 1872, with provisions not to be found in the previous Act. In 1879 it was intimated to us that the work would be constructed as a Government work, with the assistance of the Imperial Government by means of a guarantee, and otherwise. În 1830 this plan was somewhat modified. We heard no longer of Imperial assistance; the railway was to be constructed with the proceeds of the sale of these 100,000,000 acres of land, and although this scheme was ratified by Parliament some months afterwards, we are called here before the usual time of the meeting of Parliament for the purpose of ratifying another scheme which is entirely different. The mention of these different schemes reminds me of the fact that during this debate a charge of inconsistency was made against the Liberal party by some of my friends from the Province of Quebec-I think my hon, friend from Rouville (Mr. Gigault) and my hon, friend from Portneuf (Mr. Vallée). Surely when those hon members made that charge, they forgot that their own political friends had changed their minds several times within the last few years. I do not intend to cast any blame on hon. gentlemen opposite for that, for I think it is only reasonable to suppose that dealing with a question of this magnitude, and respecting which we have been so long without sufficient information, public men will modify their opinions from time to time. But I would like to tell my hon friends from Quebec, who make the charge of inconsistency, that they should not forget that profitable lesson of wisdom, set out by the celebrated Molière, in the following lines :-

"Il faut s'examiner soi-même un fort longtemps Avant que de songer à condamner les gens; Il faut mettre le poids d'une vie exemplaire Dans les corrections qu'aux autres on veut faire."

I believe it to be of the utmost importance that this last scheme which is now before the House should be submitted to the people, and I consider it of equal importance that the people should have an opportunity of pronouncing upon the policy suggested last Session by my hon. friend from West Durham. Who can say, with certainty, in this House, that the people would not endorse that policy if they were consulted upon it. But I may be met by the statement that British Columbia is impatient, that a bargain has been made with her, and that we must stand by that bargain no matter how severe the terms. I do not believe that the people are bound to incur ruinous expenses for the purpose of remaining faithful to a ruinous bargain. I hold that the Mr. BECHARD.

become and terbulent and 10 flavilaten. noisy secession as she has already done, the people of this country have also the power to tell her that she may slide out of the Union if she wishes to do so. But there is another reason why this question should be submitted to the people, and that is that the contract has been let without tenders having been called for. We have heard it said over and over again, during this debate, that my hon. friend from Lambton, while Minister of Public Works, had called for tenders and had received none, and, Sir, if I am not mistaken, one hon gentleman said that his non-success in that particular was an evidence that the Liberals, when in power, could accomplish nothing great; nothing worthy of the consideration of the people. I could reply to that hon, member that his own friends have not always been successful. I could remind him of the fact that the Allan Company did not succeed in raising the money in England which they required for the construction of this road, although the attempt was made at a time when money was abundant. But when my hon. friend from Lambton called for tenders the circumstances were entirely different. The times were hard; we were in the midst of a severe commercial crisis which affected the whole world. Financial and commercial houses everywhere were shaken while others were broken down and the fragments of their capital scattered to the wind. Railway construction was suspended, everywhere capital stood uninvested, and I think, under such circumstances, that it will be a matter of no wonder. to a reasonable man, at all events, that my hon. friend did not succeed in receiving tenders—that no capitalists were found ready to place their money in the construction of the Pacific Railway. But at present things are different. Circumstances are a great deal more favorable, times are becoming good, prosperity is being restored to the world, capital is abundant and is seeking for investment. Under such circumstances, the Government could hardly pretend, at the beginning of the Session, that they had made the best possible bargain, and at all events that they are entirely precluded from that contention now since another offer has been made to construct the railway on conditions which however objectionable in some respects are certainly on the whole preferable to the contract now before the House. A great effort has been made in the course of the debate to show that of all plans which have been submitted to Parliament for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the present scheme is by far the best, that it is superior to the contract of 1872 and to the scheme of 1874. It is true that you find at first sight that the cash subsidy is less by $5,000,000 in the present scheme than was proposed in the scheme of 1872; it is also true that the land grant is one-half less in respect to the number of acres. But you discover that this advantage is only apparent and is more than balanced bythe other concessions which are made to the Company. Besides the cash which we are giving we are giving $28,000,000 worth of of railways completed and to be completed, besides $3,000,000 which have been expended on surveys. I understand that by this scheme we are giving only 25,000,000 acres of land, but there is a great difference in the manner in which the land is to be selected from that proposed in the previous contracts. We know that under the previous contracts, the land was to be selected from the Western boundary of Ontario, alongside the railway for its entire length, while under this scheme, the land is to be selected only on the fertile belt of the North-West, which affords more attraction and more immediate advantages to settlers, and where the lands would be worth five or six times more than it could be worth for a long time to come in the other parts of the country where the road passes. But I am not going to weary the House by going people have in their hands the power to mitigate the terms passes. But I am not going to weary the House by going of that bargain, and that having made reasonable into a discussion of the other concessions made to the proposals to British Columbia if she chooses to Company. I shall not, therefore, speak of the transfer to the commenced them, by suggesting that this whole question be sent to the people. We have had conflicting evidence of the opinion of public meetings that have been held in different parts of the country. Some meetings, we have been told, have been enthusiastically in favor of the contract, while others have just as strongly opposed it. Since recess we have seen every day petitions pouring into this House, praying that this contract should not become law; whilst, on the other hand, we have seen petitions praying that it should become law. In this perpleaing condition of things let the voice of the people be heard at the polls and let their will be our guide.

Company, of 5,000 tons of steel rails, at a price under their market value; nor to the concession which permits them to import all their materials free of duty; nor to the concession which permits them to keep their hands free from taxation for twenty years. But I cannot conclude my remarks without alluding for one moment to what I consider as the most objectionable feature of this contract. I wish to refer to the almost exclusive power given to the Company of building railways in that country for twenty years. In my humble judgment that concession will create a monopoly, the end of which no one in this House can hope to live long enough to see; for after the Company has made use of their power for twenty years, they will become so powerful that they will be in a position to annihilate all attempts at competition. If that concession is made and becomes law, we will see in all the North-West Territory the same state of things which has been witnessed in the Western States of America. But, Sir, the interest of the settlers alone is not concerned; it will also affect the commercial interest of the Dominion. On the one side will be the interest of the Company, and on the other side the interest of the people. For, while you give that Company absolute control over the whole carrying trade, it is clear that the concession will be productive of results most injurious to the general commercial interests of the people. I look upon all legislation covering a great monopoly by removing competition as injurious in its character. I consider that freedom of competition is an essential element of progress everywhere, and the absence of it as meaning either stagnation or oppression. Competition means liberty, whilst monopoly means oppression all over the world. I am quite ready to admit that this piece of policy is in accordance with the principle of commercial exclusion which was adopted two years ago. For my part I do not hesitate to say that I am unfriendly to any such legislation, and I intend to stand by those broad principles of free competition which have been taught to mankind, within the last half a century, by enlightened Englandthose principles which, I hope, will be prevailing in the whole world before another half century has elapsed. and which should, at all events, be prevailing on Canadian territory, and wherever the British flag waves over British soil. Now, Mr. Speaker, strong waves over British soil. Now, Mr. Speaker, strong objection has been made during this discussion, to the Sault Ste. Marie route, and some of my hon. friends from the Province of Quebec have strongly advocated the route north of Lake Superior, as offering some peculiar advantages to our Province. I must confess that I fail to see those advantages. What do the railways in Quebec and in all the other Provinces want? They want traffic. I consider that the soute by Sault Sto. Marie, whilst giving those railways the carrying trade of our western territory, would at the same time give them the carrying trade of a large portion of the American territory which lies in the northern part of the States of Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota and Dakota. We are told that the road will throw us into the arms of the Americans, and that American railways will get the carrying trade of our North-West. Sir, if it is true, as I believe it is, that the line of the Canadian Pacific Railroad is the shortest for the transportation of western products to the European markets, I fail to see how the route by the north of Lake Superior could offer superior advantages for that carrying trade. But admitting, for the sake of argument, that American railways could offer equal advantages with our own, I would see in that fact a protection, and the only protection left, against the exactions of this Syndicate, as it would bring their tolls down to a reasonable rate; whilst the route by the north of Lake Superior would secure still more to the Company their monopoly by placing them almost beyond the reach of all competition. Now, let me conclude my remarks as I amendment moved by the hon. member for West Durham 70

Mr. BOLDUC. Mr. Speaker, when, at the beginning of the Session, these resolutions for the construction of the railway were laid before us, the terms of the contract appeared so advantageous to hon. gentlemen opposite, that the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) hastened to ask for an adjournment of the debate, in order to be able to find some objections against the ratification of this contract. We had a right to expect that a contract so advantageous, especially for the Province of Quebec, would be supported by hon. members on the other side of the House, especially by hon. members of the left who represent the Province of Quebec. But, Sir, after the meeting of hon. gentlemen opposite, after their meeting in caucus, it was decided that it would be better to oppose the measure. They forgot the interests of the party to think only of the interests of their country; and although the Government did not grant the adjournment asked for, still they allowed a long debate, they allowed every member to say what he thought of the contract, so that it could not be claimed that the Government had tried to stifle debate. Thus we have seen, Sir, during the Christmas holidays, hon. members on the other side going through the Dominion and calling meetings, and, in order to be quite sure that only friends should assist at these meetings, only those were admitted who were worthy of receiving a ticket, who were worthy of applauding the Liberal speakers. It was known beforehand that, if free discussion were allowed, if the Conservative speakers were allowed to meet these gentlemen, the people would pronounce in favor of the ratification of the contract. Moreover, petitions were circulated in all parts of the Dominion asking that the contract be rejected, but, Sir, even in the Liberal strongholds, only a few signatures could be obtained. The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) who had recourse to the help of all the valiant defenders of the Liberal party in the Maritime Provinces, has succeeded in getting one petition signed; but we had the right to expect, after all the trouble he had taken, numerous petitions, if, as hon. members of the Opposition say, the people are indignant at the terms of the contract and determined to re-elect only those members who oppose its adoption. Yet in all the Maritime Provinces, the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) after having worked for more than a month, has succeeded in bringing down a petition signed by 4,400 electors only. Well, Sir, it must be admitted that after such hard work, on the part of these gentlemen, we had a right to expect petitions signed by a greater number of electors. I say, moreover, Sir, that we, the representatives of the Province of Quebec, have the right to be surprised at the conduct of hon. members on the left from our Province—for if there is a route to be followed, if there is a railway favorable to the Province of Quebec, it is certainly the route mentioned in the contract passed between the Government and the Syndicate; if there is a route favorable to the Province of Quebec, it is surely the route to the north of Lake Superior;

(Mr. Blake) it is not said, supposing that the Opposition should come into power, whether they would build this road or not. I will not inflict upon the House the amendment of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), for it would take me half an hour to read it. I will content myself with the conclusion of his amendment, which is as follows: -

"That it is not in the public interest to ratify the contract by which it is proposed to grant $25,000,000 and 25,000,000 acres of land:"

Do the hon members opposite oppose the ratification of the contract because the number of acres of land granted to the Syndicate is too large and because the sum of money is too heavy? The amendment of the hon, member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) would seem to indicate as much; yet hon. members on the other side, representing the Province of Quebec, who have addressed the House, strongly denounced the contract because, according to them, it was useless to build the railway in British Columbia and to the north of Lake Superior. But, Sir, in 1872, the party now in power had made a contract with Sir Hugh Allan for the construction of the Pacific Railway, and what was the amount to be paid to the Allan Company for the construction of this road? Sir Hugh Allan was to receive $20,000,000 in money and 54,500,000 acres of land. Now, by estimating these lands at a dollar an acre, we have a total amount of $84,500,000. Later on, when the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) came into power, instead of declaring himself opposed to the building of the Pacific Railway, he merely wanted to change the mode of construction. He wanted Government to undertake the building of the road, although it has been shown beyond all question that it is preferable that a railway should be built by a private company rather than by the Government. What is more, Sir, during the elections of 1872, and during those that followed, before the coming into power of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), instead of coming out squarely in favor of the building of the Pacific Railway, the Liberal speakers in the Province of Quebec always sought to frighten the people. They maintained that if the railway was built it would be the ruin of the Province of Quebec, of the Province of Ontario, and of the Maritime Provinces. All the Liberal speakers declared themselves strongly opposed to the building of the Pacific Railway. But as soon as the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) came into power, they changed their minds; instead of opposing the building of the road, they submitted to the command of their leader, who, in his famous speech pronounced at Aurora, had said: "The building of the road will not be given to a private company, but the Government will themselves undertake the construction of the Pacific Railway." few days later, however, the hon. member for Lambton, by an Act that he had passed during the Session of 1874, offered to any private company that would undertake the construction of the Pacific Railway 55,940,000 acres of land, which, estimated at one dollar an acre, form a sum of $55,940,000, He offered, moreover, $10,000 per mile, which made a total of $29,770,000; and besides that, he offered four per cent. on the surplus that would be required for the construction of the railway, representing $20,977,500, making a total sum of $106,687,500. Well, then, Sir, why had hon gentlemen so strongly opposed the Allan contract, which offered to build the road for $84,500,000; and why, in 1874, only two years later, did they offer a surplus of $22,000,000? What happened, Sir? It was naturally to be expected that capitalists desirous of investing their money in paying enterprises, in enterprises that were to give great profits, would have hastened to accept the offer made by the hon. member for Lambton. But, Sir, what confidence could they have in hon. gentlemen opposite, Mr. Bolduc.

these gentlemen had not ceased to repeat and proclaim in every possible manner that these lands of the North-West were worth nothing, that it was impossible to settle the North-West, because when a few strips of good land could be found they were ravaged by grasshoppers. What could be foreseen happened; capitalists having no confidence in the proposals of the hon. member for Lambton, refused this offer. Later on, Sir, in 1878, a law was passed, setting apart 100,000,000 acres of land for carrying on the construction of the Pacific Railway. When this law was passed, a considerable sum had already been expended for the building of the road. Now, by estimating these 100,000,000 acres of land at a dollar an acre, as I have done for the other land, we arrive at a total of $127,000,000 to be expended for the construction of the Pacific Railway. And, now, what is the price of the present contract? The sections finished, or to be finished, will cost $28,000,000. We pay a cash subsidy of $25,000,000, and we grant 25,000,000 acres of land, which, estimated at a dollar an acre, represent $25,000,000, making a total in all of $78,00,000. Well, Sir, this contract being the most advantageous, I think that no hon member of this House should hesitate to pronounce expressly in favor of its adoption. And by granting land in alternate blocks, instead of spending a considerable sum, I am of opinion that the Government will succeed in paying for the construction of the Pacific Railway without making the older Provinces pay a single farthing; for, Sir, if we deduct from the 250,000,000 acres of land that we possess in the North-West, the quantity granted to the Syndicate, we have 225,000,000 left. Now is it possible to sell a single acre of these lands if the Pacific Railway is not to be built; and will not the construction of this road increase the value of these lands at least ten times? I maintain, therefore, that the contract is highly advantageous, and I am surprised to find hon members opposing it. Now, Sir, it is said we have another contract; a new Syndicate has been formed, and we have now before the House an offer that is infinitely more advantageous than the one made by the first Syndicate. But how is it that these devoted capitalists, these patriotic gentlemen who are alarmed at the amount given to the first Syndicate; how is it that these gentlemen who were in the Dominion of Canada in 1874, when the hon, member for Lambton had his law passed for the granting of a far larger amount; how is it, I say, that these same gentlemen did not then offer to build the Pacific Railway, when at least $26,000,000 more was offered than the sum they are willing to accept? I think that an independent paper, published in this city, gives the reason of all this fine zeal. This is what that paper says in explanation of this fine zeal of the members of the new Syndicate. In looking over the list of the members of the new Syndicate we are surprised to find that the greater part of them are unfortunate candidates at the last elections:

H. H. Cook, Grit candidate, beaten in North S'mcoe. John Stuart, Grit candidate, beaten in North Norfolk. John Walker, Grit candidate, beaten in London.
D. Macfie, Grit candidate, beaten in East Middlesex.

H. Chisholm, Grit candidate, beaten in Halton-for the Ontario Legislature.

A. T. Wood. Grit candidate, beaten in Hamilton. C. A. Cox, Grit candidate, beaten in Peterborough. John Carruthers, Grit candidate, beaten in Kingston-

It is not surprising, Sir, that all these defeated candidates should bear spite against the Conservative party, and that they should have said: "We will try and deceive the people; we are very sure that the Government cannot accept the tender we are going to make; we are sure that the Government cannot cancel the contract they have signed with the former Syndicate to accept new tenders; but, in order to make people believe that the Government has refused to accept the lowest tender, we will make a when, since the purchase of the lands in the North-West, more advantageous offer, and we will succeed in hurting the Conservative party at the next elections." Well, Sir, I simple-minded than they really are, for electors understand perfectly well that when such an advantageous contract as the one now before us is passed, it only remains for us to ratify it. Hon. gentlemen opposite have spoken of the monopoly that is going to be exercised by this Company that is to receive a grant of 25,000,000 acres of land. How is it that these hon gentlemen have decided to accept the proposal of the new Syndicate which would also exercise a monopoly, because the only difference between the two proposals is 3,000,000 acres of land, and I do not believe that these 3,000,000 acres of land can make a great difference in the monopoly. I consider that of all the proposals made up to this time, the one now before us is the most advantageous that it was possible to obtain under the circumstances. For my part, I believe that the people of the Province of Quebec are ready to ratify this contract; consider it as advantageous, and will re-elect, at the next elections, all the members who will have voted for it. I do not wish to take up the time of this honorable House, and I will conclude by saying that I will give my most cordial support to the Government, because I believe that it was impossible to make a better arrangement. Mr. KAULBACH. The subject now under discussion by this House is fraught with more than ordinary importance to this Dominion, and requires much careful thought and calm deliberation. In dealing with it as the great national highway of this Dominion, I hope to assume such a position as to be able to view the contract and all its details from a higher standpoint than that of party, and trust that, apart from party bias and party feeling altogether, to be able to satisfy my mind in view of the interests, entrusted to my keeping, of my constituents, whose rights and privileges I hold most dear, and in view of the interests of this vast and important Dominion, that in the position I take in this matter of such magnitude and importance, I am acting wisely and well. The first thing that suggests itself to my mind, is the enquiry, "Are we compelled to enter into this gigantic undertaking and construct this contemplated Canadian Pacific Railway"? to which an answer is given in the fact that when the present Government assumed office, there was apparently no alternative or no course left open for them but to go on with the work, and have it finished with as little delay, and as early as practicable, in consequence of the late Government, under the Mackenzie regime, having pledged themselves, and the country being bound by the agreement to which the Home Government was made a party, to have the whole road finished and equipped by 1890. In addition to this vast sums of money have already been expended, not only in surveys over the whole line, but in actual construction, very much of which would be utterly wasted unless additional construc-tion were entered upon immediately. Both political parties have committed themselves to it by speeches, legislation, and work completed, and the question now remains as to how it is to be constructed. There is, and has been from the first, a strong feeling in the country in favor of having the work performed by private capitalists, or a Syndicate, and rot by a Government whereby the older Provinces would be taxed. Experience has demonstrated the fact that railways cannot be built as cheaply by Government as by private companies; this has been proven, I am sorry to have it to say very sadly to our injury in the Province to which I belong. This Dominion not being without its experience also. You will remember that just previous to the Intercolonial Railway being built, it was estimated to cost but $20,000,000. But what do we find.? We have now the statement from the hon. the Minister of Railways that to-day that work has cost the people of Canada no less than $45,526,000. Now let a Government build this Canadian Pacific Railway, maintain it, and run it, and we will have millions of dollars deficits rotled up every think that these gentlemen believe that the people are more year for the next twenty years. Now, upon the faith of the Canadian Pacific being built more cheaply by a company, the Government have negotiated with this Syndicate for the entire construction of this gigantic work from Nipissing in the East to Burrard Inlet or Port Moody on the waters of the Pacific. That the contract with the Syndicate in principle is a good one, few I think will attempt to question, but with reluctance I state that in my mind in detail some of the clauses are objectionable, and in order that I may not be misunderstood, I feel that I had better name them. The middle part of clause 10 of the contract reads thus:

"And the Government shall also permit the admission free of duty of all steel rails, fish plates and other fastenings, spikes, bolts and nuts, wire, timber and all material for bridges to be used in the original construction of the railway, and of a telegraph line in connection therewith, and all telegraphic apparatus required for the first equipment of such telegraph

I am aware that at present there is no duty on steel rails. To have the Syndicate have the steel rails and other equipments for the construction of this road free of duty to my mind, is an important concession, and inconsistent with the object this Government had in view when establishing a protective policy, and unfair to the manufacturing industries of Canada, more particularly Nova Scotia, where the coal and iron can be had in unlimited quantities, and where steel rails can be manufactured for all the railways of Canada. I should feel satisfied were the clause referred to, to read thus:

"And the Government shall permit the admission free of duty of all steel rails, fish plates and other fastenings, spikes, bolts and nuts, etc., so long as there are no manufactories of the same within the Dominion of

Which would then offer to Nova Scotia, or any of the Provinces of Canada, the chances to manufacture, if they thought proper to engage in the enterprise. To obviate the objections referred to, I am told that Canadian manufacturers will be placed with regard to nuts, bolts, fish-plates, etc., on a fair footing with that of steel rails, by a rebate of  $17\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. on all imported iron, and a bonus if Canadian iron is used. At the same time, I should prefer seeing that part of clause 10 referring to the importation of articles free of duty removed entirely, and thereby offer the inducement for all supplies to be purchased from our own manufacturers, and thus give employment to the working man. Another objection, and which appears to me a serious one, is parting with the Pembina Branch, so called, or that leading from Winnipeg to the American boundary at Emerson. I contend that we should have held this branch as a sort of key and not have parted with it, so as to have retained the controlling power in our own hands and thereby prevented the possibility of any diversion of traffic from the contemplated main Canadian Pacific Railway through American channels; this contemplated Canadian Pacific being intended as a feeder to the Intercolonial in the success of which latter the eastern or Maritime Provinces are deeply interested. The River St. Lawrence, the main artery of Canada, in its course runs nearly parallel with the direct line of the Atlantic sea coast and thereby geographically renders the American ports of Boston, New York, and Baltimore (the present great and principal grain and shipping ports of America) more accessible for the export of grain from the great North-West, than the ports of the Maritime Provinces. Beside, the Northern Pacific Railway Company, being an American one, it is said, are building their hopes upon the truffic they expect to derive from this contemplated Canadian Pacific, hence the greater necessity for the further restriction and greater protection of the main line of and greater protection of the main line of the Canadian Pacific from any and all rivalry, the danger, as I stated, of having it especially tapped on the borders for the purpose of deflecting the trade of the great North-West to American channels. It is for the future as well as the present that I wish to see precaution adopted. 1 certainly do think, and would recommend, that we should have a clause inserted in the contract leaving it optional with the Government to purchase and resume the road at the expiration of twenty years at costs and charges, if we deemed it wise in our interests to do so; at the same time, I entertain the idea that to get rid of all railroads, and thereby relieve the Government and the country of the embarrassment of building, keeping up, and running them, would be the best in the end. Another clause in the contract freeing the lands to the Syndicate from taxation, appeared to me very objectionable, but upon calm reflection, finding they are to be taxed as soon as patented, or occupied, seems reasonable and right, and relieves me of any impression of unfairness. very much to find the vacant chair of our respected friend, the ex-leader of the Opposition, as I shall be using a quotation or two of his on this subject and should prefer his being present. I can assure this House that it was with the greatest regret I learned by a paragraph in the newspaper this morning of his illness. He has, I am sure, the cordial sympathy of every member on this side the House, and the earnest wish that he may be speedily restored to health, and in a few days be seen in his accustomed seat. With regard to rates and tolls, of which so much mention has been made by hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of this House, I may say that I entertain no fears, whatever. as the Consolidated Railway Act, with an extension, settles the difficulty; the Governor in Council having the power of reducing the tolls down to a minimum consistent with a bare 10 per cent, profit to the Company. With regard to a land monopoly, as spoken of by hon. members opposite, I certainly cannot agree, for, if there is anything I admire in the contract, it is the allottment of the lands to the Company, the Government giving them every alternate mile, square blocks, and retaining the intermediate ones, so that, if the Syndicate lots become valuable, what the Government retains must nece sarily become quite as valuable also. Now, Mr. Speaker, having given my views regarding some of the details in this contract, I would offer a word or two regarding the wonderful powers of magic, possessed by our hon, friends on the opposite side of this House. It is well known to every hon. member of this House and the country, that the hon, members opposite advocated the construction of this road by private capitalists and considered it, to use their phrase, "a great national necessity"—and an enterprise to which the faith of the Dominion was pledged, and which the hon, the ex-Premier (Mr. Mackenzie) said, "We are morally, as well as legally bound to construct," and again he says:

"It will be necessary to complete our great national highway across the continent, and I think it will be the duty, as it will be the desire, of the Government to develop any plan by which these results can be accomplished."

We find that in 1874 he (the ex-Premier) proposed, and which was ratified in Parliament, to give $30,000,000 and 56,000,000 acres of land for the construction of the entire road. Under the Carnarvon terms he, the ex-Premier, agreed to expend $2,000,000 per annum in British Columbia in addition to the other outlays on the road, and to build this road from Nanaimo to Esquimalt on Vancouver Island. The hon, member for West Durham (Mr. Biake), now the leader of the Opposition, estimated at that time that the British Columbia end alone would cost $36,000,000. We find that in 1876 he, the ex-Premier and his party, offered $10,000, and 20,000 acres per mile, that is $27,000,000 and 54,000,000 acres of land for the construction of the entire road, with, mark you, four per cent. for 25 years, on the cost above the $10,000 permile; the work to be done by a Syndicate or Company. At that time he estimated the lands worth no more than $1 per acre; now the hon, members opposite place a higher estimate upon the lands.

valuable now, it is because of the anticipated completion of this railway. In any case the higher the value put upon the lands the worse stands the case in comparison cenzie Railway Act contract of 1880. of 1874, between the Mackenzie and the Syndicate How hon. friends in the Opposition can fairly now object to the principle of this contract I cannot understand, when they calculated to build the road from end to end in ten years out of the public revenue of the country, and have it completed by 1890, a proof of which we had by their going on with the construction, and even on the Pacific slope, carrying the rails from Victoria to Yale, and advertising for tenders for building that section of the road as late as 1878. Now, Mr. Speaker, I certainly must state that had the late Government not committed themselves to build the road over the Rocky Mountains to the Pacific Ocean, and to have it completed by 1890, and had this contract not been entered into with this Syndicate, I feel, in viewing the condition of the road as it at present exists, and finding that one of the most costly and difficult sections -that between Thunder Bay and Selkirk-a distance of 410 miles, is all but completed; and from Burrard Inlet to Yale, a distance of 90 miles, and from Yale to Kamloops, 127 miles, now under contract, and must be completed before being handed over by the Government to the Syndicate; that it would have been as well had the Government retained the matter in their own hands, and built the 1,000 miles by contract over the rolling prairie from Selkirk to Jasper Valley, at the base of the Rocky Mountains out of the sale of lands, which would in a short time more than have paid the outlay for construction. We would then have bad, by using the water stretch from Georgian Bay to Thunder Bay, or Fort William, over Lake Superior, a perfect connection with the great North-West for at least five months in the year, and have obtained access to the rich prairie lands of that country now comparatively a howling wilderness, but soon to become the happy and comfortable home of many families, and a perfect garden of richness and beauty; and we might have allowed the construction of the connection between Jasper Valley and Kamloops, a distance of 350 miles, and between Nipissing and Thunder Bay, a distance of 650 miles, to have been postponed for the present, and completed when the necessity of the times required, and we in a better position financially to proceed with the work. I certainly cannot feel satisfied to support the offer of the second Syndicate, feeling that the parties whose names are appended to the document are not serious, and that they have been induced by certain parties, in order to embarrass the Government, to bring forward a proposition of this kind. You will remember that for years we have expended a very large amount of money in paying emigration agents to attract settlers to our great North-West. Now compare the members of the first Syndicate with those of the second. Who are the first? Germans, French, English, Scotch, and men of other nationalities who will be as if emigration agents without salary, to assist in colonizing the North-West. Who are the members of the second Syndicate? Principally Canadians and Americans, who would not have the slightest influence with any foreign people in inducing them to migrate to this country. If you view the difference between the two, even at a hurried glance, you will find the advantages in favor of the former very considerable. The first Syndicate means, apparently, work. The second Syndicate anything but work, their object being to pull down and destroy everything tending to the growth and prosperity of this country. The first Syndicate, doubtless, will construct the whole road for the consideration named in the contract, and have money to spare; but when we consider the obligations they are under, not only to build and equip this road, but to maintain it and run it, If they are more I am led to believe that it will entail an outlay and loss to them, even under the most skillful management, of millions of dollars every year for the next twenty or twenty-five years perhaps longer. The second Syndicate, I believe, would repudiate the contract, if possible, after building the central or prairie section, or instead of complying with the conditions and building the more difficult sections as well, they would carry it over American territory, and thereby render it subsidiary to American Railways, more especially that of the Northern Pacific. When we consider the interest the first Syndicate must necessarily exercise to make it a success to themselves, combined with their immense influence, we must arrive at the natural conclusion that it will early tend to a large immigration, and a speedy settling of the great North-West, and ultimately relieve us of heavily paid servants now employed as emigration agents. Now, Mr. Speaker, with regard to the details as referred to, I certainly do hope that the Government and the Company may remove as far as they can the objectionable parts and agree upon certain amendments in the original contract, so as to satisfy all excepting those who offer captious opposition on political grounds, and consequently will not be satisfied. Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the speech of the hon, member from Lunenburg (Mr. Kaulbach), who has just resumed his seat, and I am pleased to know, Sir, that one gentleman has been impressed by speeches delivered by hon. gentlemen on this side. He has pointed out to this House almost as many objections as I can, and yet, Sir, I have no doubt he will vote for the contract. I listened with attention to the speech of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, delivered at the opening of this debate, and Sir, I dare say his friends in and out of Parliament look upon it as an able effort. Well, Sir, the only attempt at justification, on the part of the hon. member for the adoption of this bargain, was that it was better than the Allan contract, to which he himself was a party; or, the offers made by hon. member for Lambton, which have never formed the basis of a contract. Let me say here, Sir, before proceeding farther, that I also listened attentively to the other speech delivered by the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, when attempting to defend his and the Government's position in forcing this contract through this House without giving time for the House or country to consider it. If the hon. gentleman was now in his place, I should at once request him to do me the favor of sending as many copies of that last speech into my county as were sent of the former. I have no doubt, Sir, it would be an antidote to the first, and the effect would be all I could desire. I was pot surprised to find the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals defending the plea urged by the right hon. the First Minister, while attempting to force this contract through Parliament with indecent haste, in order to facilitate the interest of contractors by enabling them to secure ties. I have not forgotion, Sir, and the public have not forgotten, that a similar plea urged with reference to another contract on this same Canadian Pacific Railway, has cost the country some $214,000. And more, Sir, that in a few days or weeks the same contractors disposed of their interest for a consideration. We are now asked to vote away the same section for ever, giving the Syndicate ten years in which to complete the contract. I do not propose to take up the time of the House by instituting comparisons between present and former contracts or offers for this work. These offers are things of the past. This Parliament has now no opportunity of choosing between them. But we are now face to face with the newer propositions, and while I do not hold myself committed to either, I do say this, if we are compelled to choose either of two evils we ought to choose the least. It must appear to every hon, member of this House that this con-having supervision over the work to be let, to base his contract on tenders elicited by public advertisement; the Minister of Finance being specially charged to provide the funds wherewith to meet the liability incurred. But in this case, Sir, a secret bargain has been made and almost every department in the Government has been compelled to make its contribution to the Syndicate. First, Sir, we have the Minister of Finance coming down handsomely with $25,000,000 of the people's money; next, Sir, we find the Minister of the Interior pledging his department for 25,000,000 acres of land; the picked lands, the fertile lands of the North-West; and more, Sir, agreeing to extinguish the Indian titles to those lands. Still further, Sir, agreeing to exempt those lands from taxation for 20 years or till sold, also the road bed, rolling stock and other property for all time. Next, Sir, we find the Minister of Customs agreeing to insert a clause in this contract, by which the Syndicate are allowed to import, duty free, steel rails, fish plates and other fastenings, spikes, bolts, nuts, wire, timber and all material for bridges to be used in the original construction of the railway and branches forming part of the road, thereby contributing his $1,000,000 or more to this work. Then, Sir, we come to the Minister of Agriculture, who is charged with the work of promoting emigration to the North-West, and who has been credited by the Minister of Railways and Canals with a stroke of genius in his management. He has omitted in this contract to make an arrangement by which emigrants going to that country would be conveyed at fair and reasonable rates, leaving the gentlemen of the Syndicate masters of the situation. Should they deem it more desirable to settle first their own large areas of lands south of the boundary or in the North-West, by discriminating against the Government in settling their lands, they have the power to do so. Then, Sir, we find, contrary to precedent in dealing with American transcontinental lines, no provision has been made for the carriage of mails, either, free or at reasonable rate, leaving that an open question to be arranged with the Postmaster-General and the Syndicate at some future day. Then, Sir, we are told that this is to be a military road. But not one word do we find in it relating to the carriage of troops, ammunition or supplies. This, Sir, it seems to me is an omission on the part of the Minister of Militia which is not warranted. I quite understand, Sir, that the Consolidated Railway Act gives the Governor in Council power to arrange for this as well as the postal service of the country. This may, Sir, meet the case in dealing with ordinary railway lines built by private capital. But in a work of this kind, involving at least a hundred millions of the people's money, the whole of which may be now or may soon become the property of a foreign company, some provision should have been made for these services. Then, Sir, section 26 of the contract provides:

"The Company shall have power and authority to erect and maintain docks, dockyards, wharves, slips and piers at any point on or in connection with the said Canadian Pacific Railway, and at all the terminithereof on navigable water, for the convenience and accommodation of vessels and elevators; and also to acquire and work elevators, and to acquire, own, hold, charter, work, and run, steam and other vessels for cargo and passengers upon navigable water, which the Canadian Pacific Railway may reach or connect with."

It seems to me that this may be turned to account by the gentlemen of the Syndicate, so as to ensure a monopoly of the carrying trade on some, at least, of our inland waters: and in this way, Sir, the Minister of Marine, or the gentleman who succeeds him, may be able to contribute his quota to this work. It would be well, I think, Sir, for some gentlemen who are interested in the carrying trade by water to look carefully into this provision and estimate its value for all time to come, if they can. Then, Sir, the tract has some novel features in it. In ordinary contracts value for all time to come, if they can. Then, Sir, the with the Government it has been customary for the Minister hon. Minister of Justice, whose duty it is to guard against ambiguity of terms in this contract, has allowed provisions to be inserted which, to say the least, puzzle the lawyers to define them. I refer to the clause relating to the standard of construction, and another relating to the profit to which the Syndicate is entitled before Government can interfere with their rates of freight. If allowed to pass without amendment there is no doubt, Sir, there is millions in it for the Syndicate. Then, Sir, last but not least, the Minister of Railways and Canals is to proceed with the building of railways for the next ten years, at a cost to the people of this country of $28,000,000, including portions now under contract, and is to hand over, when completed, to the Syndicate, to be their property forever, 706 miles of road, costing, as I have said, $28,000,000, without including the three or four millions and over spent on surveys and the interest on this large sum, amounting to millions. In addition to this, Sir, the department over which the hon. gentleman presides, is to be kept in full blast for ten years, at a cost of $10,000 per year, making a sum of $400,000, a department which might be dispensed with. But, Sir, we are told that this is to be an Imperial work. I ask is it not, viewed in this light, very significant that the fourteenth member of the Cabinet, our High Commissioner in England, has been unable from his standpoint to assist in any way to swell the amount to be paid to the Syndicate. Has his mission failed? If so, Sir, his usefulness has gone. Had he not better be recalled and save to the people of this country the very large sum it costs to keep him at his post? Now, Mr. Speaker, I think I have shown that this contract differs materially from ordinary contracts. I am unable to point out what it will cost the people of this Dominion. Time alone will tell that. The new offer now on the Table has many objectionable features. many which I cannot sub cribe to, but is not deserving of the treatment accorded it by the Government. There is one thing quite plain, Sir, that a large number of the taxpayers of this Dominion have no direct interest in the North-West, and while, Sir, they, as citizens of this Dominion are willing to consent to anything that is reasonable, they cannot silently consent to the proposition of burdens which are entirely uncalled for. I say, Sir, in keeping faith with British Columbia and in the development of the North-West, they too have claims that ought to be considered. The Government have no right treat in the contemptible manner they have a proposition now before the House for the building of this road infinitely better than the contract which we are asked to assent to, an offer, Sir, that would save the people of this Dominion many millions of dollars, that would insure, if this Government wish it, the building of an all rail line on British territory; and yet, Sir, this offer is to be treated almost with silent contempt. The gentlemen who make it are told it is a put up job. Well, Sir, in one sense, it is a put up job. $1,400,000 have been put up, which is more than can be said of the other. I call to mind, Sir, another period in the history of this Dominion, a time of which I and those I represent have vivid and painful recollection. The Government of that day, which is the Government of to-day, were dealing with the construction of another great line of railway. Then as now, Sir, offers were submitted for the construction of that road which would have saved the Dominion some $13,000,000 in cash, enough to construct the Sault Ste. Marie Branch and also the 900 miles of road through the prairie country; would have given a good commercial line by the nearest route to a Canadian winter port; would have kept faith with a Province induced to enter the Confederacy with the understanding that a line by that route would be secured to her. But, Sir, then as new, the Government refused to consider these propositions to which I am referring. The result has been, Sir, many of the cost of construction, have been throw away,

Mr. King.

In the construction of the Intercolonial Railway to which I have been alluding, we were told that, in order to secure an Imperial guarantee, and for the purposes of a military line, it was desirable the line should be as far removed from the American frontier as possible. The same thing is repeated with regard to the roads north of Lake Superior; a road 650 miles long, through a barren, sterile, rocky country, uninhabited and uninhabitable for aught we know We are told, Sir, that it is absolutely necessary to build this road in order to perpetuate British institutions on this continent. Well, Sir, I, and those whom I have the honor to represent, yield to none in point of loyalty, and in a desire to see British institutions protected. But, Sir, that idea is exploded. Having once been deceived by it, we are not again to be caught if we can help it. We hope for a longer lease of power for these institutions than this contract assures us. Why, Sir, let us examine it; what does it provide? An Imperial highway? A road for trans-continental traffic? Nothing of the kind. It provides for a road of wooden bridges; a road of steep grades and sharp curves; a cheap road; a degraded road. And no security in the contract that even this is to be run for more than ten years after completion. And no power by which the Government can acquire it if it is found it is not managed in the interests of the people who are taxed to pay for it. Does this assure the perpetuation of British institutions on the continent? In my opinion permanency of British institutions will be better assured by practising a system of economy which will reduce taxation to which the people are subjected. Nothing canbe gained by a vain attempt to build up new Provinces in the west, by depleting older Provinces in the east. You may impose taxes but you cannot compel people to remain in the country. The alarming exodus which has already taken place in the older Provinces will go on increasing, if the burdens of the people are so increased yearly by expending millions in unproductive public works. The hon. Minister of Finance—and I regret that he is not in his seat—last night took occasion to refer to a meeting held in my county during the holidays. He said, Sir, that I too was trying to arouse public opinion. He was mistaken, Sir, public opinion in his native county, as he had a right to claim, was aroused. The secrecy with which the bargain had been made, the. attempt to conceal its objectionable features after it was made, and the attempt to force it upon the people without giving time to consider it was of itself sufficient to disturb the minds of the people. It was my good fortune, Sir, to secure an invitation to attend a meeting of the electors of my county, for the purpose of considering with them this bargain. I was anxious, Sir, I confess, to elicit their opinions on this question. I hope I shall never, Sir, think it beneath my dignity to consult their wishes and opinions on all public matters; and I am happy to tell the hone gentlemen, although the meeting was made up of his former friends and admirers, we were in perfect accord on the question. Well, Sir, the hon, gentleman says, I told the electors that the railway would impose upon New Brunswick a debt of five millions of dollars. Did the hon. gentley man deny it? No! Then, Sir, I think I shall not now take up the time of the House by establishing that fact. But he says I did not tell them that we had still 125,000,000 acres of land in the North-West and that would pay off all our debt. I did not, nor do I now, believe it. discussing this question I was dealing with facts and not: drawing upon my imagination. I hope, Sir, when I de-assume the role of the prophet I shall make a better record in that line than the hon. gentleman has Mr. Speaker, I have sat here night after night, listening to speeches from representative men from different Provinces discussing this question. I had hoped, Sir, when the Minister of Finance had spoken he would at least have millions of dellars on interest and in deficits, to say nothing pointed out some of the merits of this contract. But, Sir, in my humble opinion he has failed. It is true, Sir, he has told us faith must be kept with British Columbia. But, Sir, did he point out to us how faith was violated with his own Province, when British Columbia entered the Union. Did he point out to us how faith was violated in reducing New Brunswick representation in the Cabinet from two members to one. Did he point out to us how faith was violated with the Maritime Provinces in forcing a protective tariff upon them contrary to his own promises when they entered Confederation. And again, Sir, coming down to a later period, although not a believer in the hon. gentleman's National Policy, I would like to have some explanation why faith has not been kept with the manufacturers. Only two years ago we were told that the demand for iron consequent upon the construction of this great public highway, would be so great as to make a market for from two to three hundred thousand tons of that article. That iron and coal abounded in the Maritime Provinces, and that such an impetus would be given to this industry during the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, that it would be so firmly established, it would be able to hold its own again all comers in the future. And now, Sir, we find that that industry has been robbed of the promised protection, while the protectionist tariff still remains to its disadvantage. No, Sir, faith has not been kept with the Maritime Provinces. They were deluded and deceived in entering this Confederacy by gentlemen who had their confidence at the time. A great future was predicted for them, their taxation was not to be increased but rather reduced. They find themselves powerless to prevent the imposition of taxes that are odious and burdensome. They are told, Sir, that they get back dollar for dollar for what they contribute to the revenue. But what docs that avail when the money is ruthlessly squandered; when they find their Province is gradually sinking instead of rising in the scale; when they find, Sir, the debt of this Dominion, for which they and their posterity will be held responsible, is rapidly accumulating. Is it any wonder, Sir, that a feeling of discontent and discouragement pervades that Province? Is it any wonder, Sir, that they are fleeing from it in large numbers? Gentlemen who represent them in this Parliament, who have no interest in common with the people, can thus afford to treat this matter lightly. But I warn them, Sir, that those who confided their interests to their keeping will at the proper time hold them responsible.

Mr. BERGIN. Before addressing myself directly to the subject under discussion; I must congratulate you, Sir, and the House, and the country, that you have on your left a body of gentlemen so modest, so pure, so wise, so disinterested, and sc patriotic. Amongst all these the gentleman who combines in himself the greatest amount of all the virtues is the leader of the Opposition. I wish, Sir, whilst giving him credit for all these virtues, I could give him credit also for the tone and temper with which he has conducted this debate. I regret that I cannot do this; I regret it, not only because of the feeling it has created on this side of the House, but I regret it in the interest of the House and the country. It is not well that the leader of the Opposition should set the example which he has set for his followers. Yesterday he opened the debate with the most studied insults to gentlemen on this side of the House. He told us that there were amongst us, men so low as to vote for this contract. I do not think it was becoming a man in his position to hurl any epithet across the floor of the House to gentlemen who ventured to differ from him in opinion. Consider for a moment that the gentlemen opposite are but a very small band, and that on this side of the House there are men who at least are their peers—peers of the leader of the Opposition in everything, but his inordinate self-esteem and his great abilities which, in common with him, we admire so much. He told us, when we dared to controvert his opinions, that we were but curs, dogs, snarling at him as he passed through the with British Columbia, and because of the desire of the streets. Is this language becoming in the leader of a great party? I shall not fatigue the House by quoting the language which he used yesterday. But I shall take occasion, as I go on, to recur to the position which he occupies towards the House and the country, and to show that, with all his boasted patriotism, his course is most unpatriotic, and one calculated more than that of any other hon, gentleman in this House to damage the interests of this country. I regret exceedingly that the hon member for Lambton is not in his place. Through no fault of mine, through no fault of any hon. gentleman on this side of the House, is he not now in his place; and I could wish that he were here, because I shall be obliged, during the course of my remarks, to recall the attention of the House to words that have fallen from him during the past eight or ten years. Whilst speaking on this subject the other day the hon. member for Lambton said we had nothing whatever to do with the Allan contract or with the new proposition before the House which is the subject of laudation of hon. gentlemen opposite just now. What we had really to do with, he said, was the present contract submitted by the hon. Minister of Railways. From no man could this have come better than from the hon. member for Lambton. It suited him as well probably as any hon gentleman on the other side of the House to distract attention if possible from former contracts, and from the former treatment of this question by his Government. Let it not be forgotten that upon all o casions since the entrance of British Columbia into Confederation, hon, gentlemen opposite regulated their conduct on the subject of the Canadian Pacific Railway by their being When  $\mathbf{of}$ in or out office. in office were always ready to assure the country that it was quite capable of carrying on the work as they proposed to carry it on, without increasing the rate of taxation. When they said, year after year, with the quibbling of pettifoggers. that they were ready to build this Pacific Railway, provided it could be built without any increase of taxation, they knew they were committing a fraud upon the public; they knew in their hearts that it was impossible that a gigantic work, as the hon leader of the Opposition has described it, such as this, could be constructed without increase of taxation. Did these men, when in power, prosecute any part of that work without increase of taxation? On the contrary, almost the first act of the late Finance Minister—a gentleman who has not hesitated to use language which no gentleman should use, in the House or out of it—was to call for an increase of \$3,000,000 taxation. What for? To build this Pacific Railway? For no other purpose. He told us that if he were granted these \$3,000,000, certain obligations which this country was under would be relieved, and the \$3,000,000 could be devoted to the purpose of building this great Pacific Railway. I think it will be well for me to say a word or two as to whether there rests any obligation on this country to build this Pacific Railway. One of the conditions on which British Columbia entered the Union was that this road would be built. I may go further, because I say it was more than the dream of those who brought about the Confederation of these great provinces that this inter-oceanic, this inter-provincial. and this trans continental railway should be built; that on this continent there would be built up a great English speaking nation, founded upon monarchical principles which should last during all time, and which should overshadow the Republic to the south of us. This, Sir, was the dream of the authors of Confederation. I hear the hon, member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) sneer and laugh. Well, Sir, from his antecedents we would not expect anything else. Who, Sir, would credit him with the desire or idea of building up a great monarchical nation upon this continent? We were bound to build the railway in consequence of the union authors of Confederation to build up a great nation, as I have feebly attempted to describe. I will quote a few words drawn from the speeches of the hon gentlemen opposite, and it would be well that hon gentlemen would remember the speeches they made in those days, and that they would act up to them and carry out the work, as the leader of the Opposition said a year or two ago, when speaking on this great question, independent of party, regardless of party, and of the great difficulties that surround it, because they were bound in honor to construct the road. In looking over the record of the debates in 1872, one of the first speeches that attracted my attention was a short one made by Sir A. T. Galt, in which, though he disap-proved to a certain extent of the terms, and looked upon the contract as one of very great difficulty, and one, perhaps, too onerous for this country; yet, seeing that we have entered upon it, we ought to carry it out, and he believed, after all, the country was able to undertake the work. He thought it essential that the Government should run and control the line to a certain extent. The present leader of the Opposition (Mr. Blake), speaking upon this question, said, with respect to the first resolution, which simply affirmed the necessity of building the road according to the terms of the agreement with British Columbia:

"Those who hold that the good faith of the country should be observed could not object to the construction of the road. All the provisions were entirely consistent with the absolute necessity of carrying forward this work with the utmost expedition compatible with prosperity, in order that they might maintain the honor and good faith of the country."

I do not know, Sir, that any language that I or any member on this side of the House can use, could go further to show that the faith and honor of the country is pledged to the construction of this road. I may be told by gentlemen opposite that they are willing and preparing to construct this road; but when I call to mind their conduct, their speeches during the last five weeks, the difficulties they have thrown in the way, the obstructions they are still prepared to cast in the way, I cannot help feeling and saying that they have no desire whatever to construct this road, unless they can construct it as the party in power. He said on another occasion:

"That the broad features of that policy were, as he had p'ainly stated, anterior to the late general elections, and the verdict of the country was taken down upon it, and the result was a decided acceptance of it. He said it is not reversible by us, we have no mandate to reverse it, that he could not consider it would be wise for an instant to consider any such proposition."

And yet this gentleman who leads that band of monopolists opposite-for at all events they monopolize to themselves, if we may credit them, all the virtues I have mentioned to-night—asks us to assist him in throwing obstructions in the way of the Government-to prevent this Parliament, if possible, from carrying out this great work. Why, if it were stopped to-day—if this contract were not carried out by this Parliament-if we were to treat the leader of this Parliament and Government as men without honor and without character, we would take the advice of the hon, gentlemen opposite and vote down his contract. But because we look upon our leaders as men of honor, and believe that not only their honor, but that of Parliament and Canada is at stake, we refuse to be dragged through the mire by him; we refuse to besmirch ourselves and to take the advice of the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) "that to commit treason is no crime." He said he had committed it himself and was thought as much of as before by his party. But he was not thought as much of by the Globe, for almost the next day it branded him as a traitor. If we took his advice how should we be branded? I do not mean to ask how should we be branded by the newspapers of the country-because for their opinion every honest man may care little provided he does his duty to his country-but how should we be branded by all the capitalists of the world? Would they not say that the Conservative party was devoid of this contract. Mr. BERGIN.

honesty and truth. I shall only quote one extract from the speech of the member for Lambton as to our duty and obligation to build the road. He said on one occasion, in the House:

"That the late or preceding Administration, in entering into a contract for bringing British Columbia into the Confederation, had an express obligation as to the building a railway across the continent, from Lake Nipissing to the Pacific, with a specified number of years; and that when the present, or his Administration acceded to power, they felt that this, like all obligations, was one which imposed upon them certain duties which they had no right to neglect—that they were bound to carry it into effect to the extent he had indicated."

I do not think, although that hon. gentleman opposite who followed that able man so slavishly, will gainsay what he said—I do not think there is any hon. gentleman on this side who will attempt to gainsay it. So surely did they feel the force of the obligation, that in 1874 that hon, gentleman introduced an Act for the purpose of constructing the Canadian Pacific Railway; he laid before the country two plans which are embodied in that Act. One of these plans was to carry it out as a Government work provided it was found impossible to find a private company to undertake it. That Act, which I contend is sufficient authority, and for ang't I know, is the authority under which the Government entered into the present contract, he took advantage of to build a portion of the railway as a Government work. I know that gentlemen on the other side of the House told us that they would not build a mile of that railway or put an inch of it under contract until the most thorough surveys had been made. We have had that question enquired into by Committees of this House, and it has been shown beyond peradventure that the contractors were on the ground almost before the engineers, before the first step had been taken to secure anything like a knowledge of where it should start from or where it should go to. Thousands, I had almost said millions, of the money of this country were wasted in the attempt to construct that railway as a Government work. I believe that the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) did, to the utmost of his power, endeavor to construct that work economically. I believe that, whoever else may have been dishonest, he at all events tried to do his duty to his country. I do not say that he always did it wisely or that he always did it well. It is not an easy thing for a man who has imposed upon him a labor perhaps greater than three or four men ought to undertake, to do that which he would desire to do, particularly when he is surrounded by men hounding him every hour to do something for his fo!lowers. But I say, that with a view of the waste and extravagance which then took place, with the view of the extent to which he was hampered by his followers -I will not say his colleagues-with that example before us, knowing that as a Government work it would be almost impossible to prevent waste, extravagance and corruption - I think that the Government of this country ought to be congratulated that they had the wisdom and the courage to enter upon this contract, and to ask this Parliament to give it the sanction of law. I honor them for it, because I know that the very same attempt that was made years ago to obstruct and to prevent the construction of the Grand Trunk Railway, will be made now. I remember at that time, meetings were call d all over the country, that the same cry was raised that there hon gentlemen opposite have always raised when any thing is done that they have not the power to do as a Government, when they are in the cool shade of the Opposition-the cry was raised, ruin! ruin! And, Sir, they have cried ruin! ruin! so often that unless they are in the midst of it, I do not believe they are ever happy. No wonder that an hon. member on this side called them the other night the party of unin and decay. Ruined or not, they certainly will not have an opportunity, during this Parliament, of ruining the bright future of this young nationality by destroying this contract. The hon leader of the Opposition introduced his amendment yesterday, and although I am not a lawyer, and have not always at hand a cork block and razor to split hairs with, as he has, I am prepared to say that I do not look upon that amendment as in order. An amendment ought to affirm something, but that amendment affirms nothing. It is a more negative of a proposition before the House. I do not think negative of a proposition before the House. I do not think the point of order is worth urging, because there has been obstruction enough thrown in the way by the hon, gentlemen opposite without my taking up the time of the House to show that that hon, gentleman in this, as in all other legal questions which he brings before this House, is almost certainly wrong. We had an instance of it the other day when he said that the Courts could not enforce this contract. I believe the hon, gentleman was entirely wrong, and that the Courts will enforce this contract.

Mr. BLAKE. I did not make that statement.

Mr. BERGIN. The statement was substantially as I have stated.

Mr. BLAKE. No.

Mr. BERGIN. I cannot remember an occasion when a gentleman on this side of this House has quoted a statement of the hon. gentleman's, that he did not spring to his feet and say: "I did not make that statement," and he put it in some other way. Of course, I am bound to accept his statement. I am sure the hon member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) will come to his feet shortly and overhaul that hon, gentleman, and will show that upon this occasion, as upon the Oaths Bill and many other cases, he is entirely astray, and that he is not as great an authority upon law as he would wish us to believe. I said that the hon. member for Lambton took occasion, under the Act of 1874, to build this railway as a Government work. I gave you a brief intimation as to the consequences that were entailed by the construction of that work in that way, sufficient to show to the House that if we were to go on and build this railway in the same manner, not by a private company, as it is now proposed to do under this contract, that we should have these lobbies filled with contractors and people looking for work. We have now a proposition to do this work a little cheaper than the other, and expecting special advantages should the hon gentlemen opposite get into office again. But they will not go into office soon enough to enable them to hand over these 22,000,000 acres of land and these $22,000,000 to these gentlemen to build the prairie section. I think the experience of five years of hon. gentlemen opposite, in building this railway as a Government work, and the experience of the Minister of Railways, with all his energy, all his ability, all his determination to prevent contractors getting the advantage of him and the country, will show that it would be better for us to pay twice the sum we have agreed to pay than to have these corridors filled with these harpies who desire to feed upon the vitals of this country. I know that does not suit gentlemen opposite. I know, with all their professions of a desire to see this railway built by a private company, that they desire still more to have it in their own hands. Why, Sir, if through the commotion they are attempting to create it were possible for them to poison the minds of the people of this country so as to lead them to believe that this contract is a dishonest one, designed to put money into the hands of a Syndicate and take it out of the pockets of the people,—if they could do that, they would displace hon gentlemen on the Treasury benches, and when they went there I have no doubt they would carry out that part of the contract relating to the prairie section. But, Sir, they would carry out that other part of the contract, which would not only prevent the construction of a railway severe, and to stigmatize, as I think ought to be stigmatized, on our own soil north of Lake Superior and the such language towards gentlemen, who certainly ought to railway west of the Rocky Mountains, but carry out their have, if they have not, as much love of country as their policy of making this country part and parcel of the opponents. I would say that gentlemen opposite represent

United States. What other result could follow the acceptance of the propositions these hon. gentlemen have been making from day to day? Have they not been telling us hour after hour that we should only construct the prairie section, and that then, instead of constructing the remainder of the railway upon our own soil, we should ask the Americans to build a branch line from Sault Ste. Marie to Duluth in American territory to drain away everything from our own North-West through American channels to the seabcard, and destroy the prosperity of this country? If I for a moment believed this country could be so false to itself as to listen for one moment to the counsels of hen. gentlemen opposite, I should despair for its future. But I do not believe there is any American sympathy in the minds of the people of this country. We desire a railway from ocean to ocean upon our own soil, and we are not so blind or ignorant but that we can see that if the trade of this country were diverted for a little while through American channels, as the Globe predicted a few years ago, a hoatile neighbor would put down his foot upon the bonding system, and there would be no outlet for the productions of our North-West, either to the east or the west. All these productions would have to remain in the North-West. could not get them into Ontario or Quebec. We could not get them west through British Columbia to the sea. could not get them south through American territory to find their way to the seaboard. What would be the result? In self-defence the people of the North-West would break up this Confederation, so far as they were concerned. They would ask for union to the United States. The bonding system, aye, and more than that, the entire Customs would be The North-West would become part and swept away. parcel of the United States, and the millions of moncy we have expended to bring that North-West into Confederation, and make it the future happy home of a great, free, happy and glorious British people would be rendered useless. There would be no more of our nationality there. Selfdefence would draw them to the nationality south of the line, and the dream of the authors of Confederation, the ardent hopes of those of us who have no desire to have anything further than a friendly relation with the United States, would be blasted and we in Ontario, in Quebec and in the Maritime Provinces, who have been building so much upon the increase of wealth that will flow in from the great North-West, will be disappointed grievously. Our manufacturers will not have, as they expected to have, a home market in the North-West. On the contrary, they will be exposed to the most dreadful competition with the United States, because, under the influence of our fostering tariff, manufactures have sprung up to such an extent in Ontario, and will continue to spring up for some time to come, will prevent the getting an adequate home market in Ontario and Quebec or the Maritime Provinces, and if deprived, as they would be deprived if the policy of gentlemen opposite were adopted, of our prospective market in the North West, they will be obliged to compete in the United States markets. In the face of these evils, I do not think it is to be wondered at that hon, gentlemen on this side of the House should be united as one man in supporting the Government, that they will listen neither to the blandishments nor the threats of hon, gentlemen opposite, but will do their duty by the country—even although hon. gentlemen opposite possess, as they claim to possess, all the patriotism in this country. It is a sad day for Canada when fifty gentlemen will dare to stand up before the whole country and say they possess all the patriotism in the country, that the one hundred and fifty or so gentlemen who differ from them are not patriots but partisans. If I were inclined to be severe, and to stigmatize, as I think ought to be stigmatized, not a party but a faction. The hon, member for Lambion, having put up certain portions of the road to tender, advertised in this country and in Europe for tenders for the construction of the road, and he offered $10,000 in cash and 20,000 acres of land per mile for its construction by a company. He offered, in addition, four per cent. on such further sum as might be necessary for its construction. He desired to remove this railway, this great national work, out of the sphere of politics—to carry out, I am persuaded, honestly, the policy of the right hon. gentleman, his predecessor, as leader of the Government. He felt that it was the wisest course he could pursue in the interest of the country. But notwithstanding his desire, and the attempts he continued, I believe for two years, he was unable to get a single offer for the construction by a private company of this great Canadian Pacific Railway. Why? Hon. gentlemen oppo-site may say it was because of the difficulties of the money market—that it was tight, and money was dear. But the real reason, in my opinion, is that the capitalists of the world had no confidence in hon, gentlemen opposite. When we know and remember that the late Finance Minister of this country went to England, and exhibited to its capitalists a shield which was brazen on one side and silver upon another -that when he come back to this country, at a public meeting he had the audacity, the indecency, to boast of the trickery he had perpetrated on the capitalists of the money markets of the world-I am not astonished, and the country need not be, that no one could be found to enter into negotiations with the late Government for the construction of this great work. This is in my belief the true reason why the hon, gentleman was unable during his term of office to obtain any offer from any Syndicate or private company for the building of this road. The people of British Columbia, dissatisfied with the slow progress which this work was making, appealed to the Government of the member for Lambton. They put their grievances before him in the strongest possible terms; and failing to obtain as readily as they anticipated that meed of justice which they thought ought to be measured out to them, like loyal subjects they went to the fountain-head. I hope it will not be considered an Irish bull to say that going to the fountainhead they went to the foot of the throne; they appealed to Her Majesty, and as a result obtained what is commonly known as the Carnarvon terms. We know that the member for Lambton, desirous of meeting so far as he could, so far as he would be permitted by the band of patriots around him, the wishes of British Columbia, sent a missionary to their True that missionary was instructed by the present leader of the Opposition, if I am to accept his word, not to threaten the people of British Columbia, but to persuade them, if he could, to accept the terms which the hon, member for Lambton offered them. They did not accept those terms. Lord Carnarvon interposed his good offices. The recommendation of Lord Carnarvon was accepted by the Government, and they entered into a contract firm and sure, with the people of British Columbia, to spend $2,000,000 a year as soon as the surveys could be made until the completion of the road from ocean to ocean across our own territory by the year 1891. These surveys have long since been made, at all events sufficient to enable them to go on with the construction of the work in British Columbia. The hon. gentleman who then led the Government, before his fall advertised for tenders for the construction of the road from Yale to Kamloops. Nay, more, for the purpose, as he said, of showing that he was sincere and honest in his desire to carry out the agreement with British Columbia, he sent up there 5,000 tons of steel rails that there might be no delay. We were told since that he did not mean anything by this, that he was only humbugging the people of British Columbia; but I, for one, do not believe this. I scout the aspersion that has been attempted to be cast upon Mr. BERGIN.

him in that respect, and believe that he was sincere in his desire to carry out the bargain with British Columbia and the Imperial Government. This Government has carried out the proposition which he made then. The road from Yale to Kamloops is now under construction, and it will be finished, I believe, within the period assigned in the contract. But if he was sincere, how has it been with others. How has it been with the present leader of the Opposition? He opposed the construction of the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Road, but he was not then in the Government. Shortly afterwards he went into the Government, and the Globe spoke as follows:—

"Mr. Blake may have felt it his duty to oppose the Government, as, for instance. in the case of the Vancouver Railway. It was just one of those matters which a Government find it necessary to carry out, as a legacy of their predecessors, which some of its members might have liked to have seen modified in some of its particulars, but which, perhaps, only a Minister himself, informed on every point affecting it, was fully competent to decide. We rejoice to think that in this and other questions, Mr. Blake has accepted the responsibility, as he will also enjoy the advantage of sharing in the councils of his friends in the Government, without in the least fearing that his advice, valuable as it no doubt will be, will in the least degree lead to any measures affecting our good faith towards either the people of British Columbia or the Government of Great Britain."

Notwithstanding this, the member for Vancouver (Mr. Bunster) said the other day that the leader of the Opposition wished to throw over British Columbia. I know the hon gentleman explained that by saying something which amounted to the same thing and which itself required an explanation, but the member for Vancouver accepted it as a retraction.

Mr. McINNES. What he did say was that if British Columbia wanted to go she might go.

Mr. BERGIN. In a word, let her rip, I suppose. Now; whoever in this House or out of it doubted the sincerity of the member for Lambton on this question, certainly the present leader of the Opposition was not that man. He took occasion to say, in 1875, that the House must not forget that we were not at perfect liberty to determine whether we could make that expenditure or not. They had to keep faith with British Columbia, and he believed that the Premier (Mr. Mackenzie), and I believed it, would keep faith with that Province as he would keep faith in all the agreements he might enter into. I feel that I would be false to my constituents and to my country if I did not again draw attention to the manner in which Canada has been defamed by the man who believes himself to be. and who has great reason to believe it, one of the ablest of her sons. We know that in a discussion that took place a few short months ago, in this House, as to the value of the land in the North-West, everything that it was possible for human tongue to utter, in depreciation of our heritage there, came from the lips of that hon, gentleman. And, Sir, his defamatory speech was not confined to this House. It went to every hole and corner, nook and cranny of this Dominion. It went the wide world over, and there was not a foreign seaport on the other side of the Atlantic in which the speech of that hon. gentleman depreciating his own country and lauding Kansas to the skies, was not freely circulated. No emigrants left those shores, but there was placed in his hands a copy of that laudation of Kansas by that hon. gentleman, and hundreds and thousands of emigrants that were intending to seek a home on this continent and desiring to live under the British flag, were turned away from Canada and led to the United States. Canada has reason to be proud of the great ability of that hon. gentleman, but she would have far greater reason to be proud if he had devoted those abilities to the service of his country instead of to his party. I have in my hand the pamphlot of an American Emigration Agency containing the likeness of the hon, member for West Durham. I had an opportunity of holding it up before the people of Glengarry, at a meeting at which there were present between 2,500 and 3,000 of the most intelligent electors of that loyal old country, and there were men there who recognized the likeness, but I am bound to say that there was not one man of that vast assembly but looked upon that picture with regretand hung his head with shame that Canada had a son who could so defame and distonor her in the face of the world. And, Sir, I, the son of an Irishman, boasting, as I heard him boast two or three times within the last two years, of his Irish lineage-I feel, when he spoke of the United States as the only proper field for Irish emigration, that to me at least he was offering the greatest insult it was in his power to offer, because he was insinuating that in no Irish breast beat any love for monarchical principles. He told us in so many words that monarchical institutions were foreign to the genius of the Irish people, and that their love of any form of government was that they had for the republican. I hurl it back, and I say to him that Irish Catholica particularly—but Irish Protestants, like Irish Catholics, feel the insult—are as loyal as he. I do not know that when the country was in danger he ever shouldered a musket, but I do know that thousands and thousands of Irish Catholics did, and the history of the British Empire shows that where blood flowed freely in defence of the British fl. g, that the stream was not the smallest of Irish blood. Oceans of it have been shed in defence of the Empire and of the flag, and if Ireland had the same institutions as we have in Canada it would flow just as freely; and if the empire were dragged into war, all Ireland's wrongs, real or imaginary, all the difficulties under which she labors would be forgotten, and her sons would be foremost to bear the brunt of the battle in her defence. It is not the least of the great advantages of this contract which we are now discussing that the gentlemen who compose the Syndicate are not all Canadians. We want a railway stretching from ocean to ocean through our own country, but we want interested in that railway men belonging to the countries of Europe that are over-populated, men who will have an interest in bringing to this country Frenchmen, Germans, English, Scotch, and Irishmen, Austrians, Prussians, and Russians. We want to attract here members of all these great nationalities, and perhaps we will be able to carry out the idea, not very delicately or elegantly expressed, by a former local Minister of Agriculture, that all these races will in this northern country make the greatest nation that the world has ever seen, the wisest, the strongest, the ablest, the best. I believe I believe in this northern clime, when the country is filled up with people of different nationalities, when immigration has to a large extent ceased from the other side of the Atlantic, when the races have become merged,—we will have a nation with all the great qualities and virtues of all those other nations combined in one. And, Sir, that cannot fail to make us one of the greatest, as I believe we are to-day, one of the proudest peoples on the face of the globe. I said a while ago that I believed the Act of 1874 was sufficient authority for this Government to enter into this contract, and let me here call attention to the statement made within the last twenty-four hours by the leader of the Opposition. He spent three mortal hours to prove that that Act did not apply to this contract, and could not authorize it. Why, I should think that he, being a party to that Act—for he was a supporter of my hon. friend from Lambton at that time, if he was not a member of his Government—would, at all events, know what were the contents of that Act. During five weeks he has been discussing this question in ignorance, real or pretended, of the effect of this Act, and he only made known yesterday his opinion that we had no authority under it for this contract. I am not going to discuss whether we have or not; but I can tell him and hon, gentlemen opposite that, even if we have not, we have the power to sanction that contract and to and yet men, who act in this manner, will taunt us with make it the law of the land, Speaking of the Nanaimo and lacting as partizans,

Esquimalt Railway in connection with this Act, the hon, member for Lambton said:

"The Bill as proposed did not require that the contract should be submitted to Parliament. The Government must either let the contract without it being submitted to Parliament, or put off the work for another year. Rightly or wrongly, they had agreed with British Columbia to construct the road immediately, and the Bill was introduced accordingly."

The leader of the Opposition was at that time a follower of the hon, member for Lumbton, and one would suppose, it he were satisfied with the leadership of that hon. gentleman, that he would offer no objections to going on under that Act without the authority of Parliament, but he did. Somehow, I cannot tell by what means that Bill did not pass. And what was the consequence? That hon, gentleman himself, to utone for the non-construction of that railway, agreed to pay over a large sum in cash to the people of British Columbia. That was one consequence of not following the policy of his leader. said awhile ago that the hon. gentleman last year, while depreciating this country and extolling the United States, told us that our lands in the North-West were valueless. He did not mean to say that they were valueless to us because we were unable to sell them, but he said they would not bring $1 an acre in the market—he did not believe they were worth it. Well, I am willing, for the sake of argument, to admit that they are not worth $1 an acre to us just now, but I believe they are worth more than any of these gentlemen have stated, to those who will go into that country and settle upon them. I do not believe the lands are of any value unless the Pacific Railway be constructed, and constructed in the way which the Government proposes. And why, Sir, will these lands be worth so much money when this Government constructs this railway in this way? Let me ask the hon, member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). He is sometimes an authority on one side of a question, and sometimes an authority on the other side. I shall only ask his authority on one side just now. He said:

"In constructing this railway, under the Bill, the Government were providing for the growth of Canada as a nation; they were providing for peopling that vast region which now lay in a state of nature, and developing its resources."

In this barren waste, that these gentlemen spoke of in 1880, the hon, member for North Norfolk told us

"There were lands which would give sufficient sustenance for 15,000,000 or 20,000,000 people. Let them get inhabitants for it as soon as possible. If they could pour 50,000 a year into it, those settlers would pay into the coffers of this country, in the shape of Customs duty, $250,000 per annum, and the Government would derive a far greater revenue this way than from the sale of these lands."

"That the only policy to open up and develop these large tracts of country was a liberal railway policy, and that while it was proper to exercise due caution, it would not be a good policy to postpone the building of lines for the sake of saving a few hundred acres to the mile."

What a change has come over the spirit of his dream! Just make a calculation of the number of hundreds of acres to the mile that will be saved by this new Syndicate, there will be 3,000,000 of acres on 2,700 odd miles. It is dreadful to contemplate. Just think of what will be saved according to the member for North Norfolk, and yet he will come down to-morrow and tell us that the country is going to ruin; that we are destroying it; that we are making away with our heritage; that the people that go into the North-West will be so ground down by taxes, and oppressed by the legislation of this House, that it will be impossible to live in that region. Nay, more, he will tell the people in the United States who desire to come into this country, and the people in Great Britain, France and all over Europe, that they will do better not to come here, as we will so tax them that it will be impossible for them to make an honest living, and he will be cheered by the gentlemen about him;

Mr. RYKEKT. Have you not something for the member for Bothwell? Give the philosopher a pill!

Mr. BERGIN. I think I saw somewhere a similar speech from that hon, gentleman. On one occasion he told us

An hon. MEMBER. He was in office then.

Mr. BERGIN. Yes, he was in office then, brimming over with patriotism-

An hon. MEMBER. Getting $7,000 a year.

Mr. BERGIN. Yos, and $7,000 a year greatly influences the opinions of some of the hon. gentlemen opposite. On the occasion I speak of this hon, gentleman was dilating upon his favorite theme—the, to him, glorious prospects the States of Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, Arkansas, and—does the hon. member for West Durham hear me? it will surely be music to his ears—the State he loves so well—Kansas and Illinois. He said:

"Hon gentlemen wou'd see from these statistics that there was an intimate connection between the progress of rai/way construction and the progressive settlement of a country."

He went on to say :

"But it was money obtained from those who settled in the immediate vicinity of the railways; it was not money taken out of the pockets of the people at large, but it was paid by those people who had taken possession of the land, which had no value except for purposes of settlement. An opportunity was thereby given to immigrants to make those lands valuable, and at the same time shoulder their share of the general burdens of taxation. If railways could be built by the aid of public grants of land, or money obtained by the sale of that land, the country could not make a better use of the public lands than thus to oney them could not make a better use of the public lands than thus to open them up for settlement and to capitalists the opportunity of investing money there. It was large'y by the construction of railways that the lands of the North-West were to be made valuable; their value depended upon the north-west were to be made valuable; their value depended upon the facilities afforded for the transport of the products of the settlers. By constructing railways through the North-West, reaching to every fertile point where a colony could be established, we would largely contribute to increase the traffic and travel over that railroad, which must for many years to come, be a single line from Winnipeg eastward to Lake Superior."

Yet when we say today that we are prepared to construct the Canadian Pacific Railway upon a plan more favorable than ever offered before-and I venture to say which, if not carried out now, will never again be effered to the people. They throw every obstacle in the way and would persuade the people of the ekker provinces that they are to be ruined by taxation. It makes all the difference to gentlemen opposite upon which side of the House they sit. "Remember," he said, "it was money obtained for the lands sold in the immediate vicinity of the railway." Credat Judaeus! "It was not money taken out of the pockets of the people at large, but paid by those people who take possession of the land which had no value except for the purpose of settlement." hon. gentleman has thus proved my case, that until the land is settled it is worthless; and therefore I contend we are giving to the Syndicate only $25,000,000 for the construction of the road, and $28,000,000 in the shape of what has been constructed, making in all $53,000,000. What do they give us in return? I think I shall be able to demonstrate that they are giving us almost a heritage in return for those $53,000,000. I would ask the Minister of Agriculture how much it costs us for every immigrant landed at Winnipeg? Mr. POPE. $40.

Mr. BERGIN. The late Chief Engineer of the Canadian Pacific Railway, who has been highly spoken of we have the authority of the member for Lambton and of the Mini ter of Railways, that he is the ablest man in his profession in this country; so able, indeed, that the Imperial Government, at the time of the construction of the Intercolonial Railway, agreed without hesitation to, in fact I believe suggested, his appointment as engineer of that great work we have the authority of Mr. Fleming for saying that we necessary, before the twenty years are up, to put three millions of people into that country, at a cost of £8 per head, or at a total of £25,000,000, or $120,000,000 to them, which amount they give to us in return for $53,000,000, and the right to run the road for ever. The Government of the United States, who have the most accurate means of ascertaining the value of their immigrants which land on the shores of that Republic, have demonstrated that each immigrant is worth to them at least $1,000. Now, on that basis, just fancy: We will have the benefit of 1,000 times three million dollars in return for $53,000,000 which we give the Syndicate. Then we were told by the hon, member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) that 50,000,000 would be worth to this country $250,000 in Customs dues, and taking his estimate of $5 per head we would be advantaged by these three millions, of people to the extent of $15,000,000 a year. And further: it must be patent to everybody who gives the matter a moment's consideration that to bring these people into the country is to force the Syndicate to sell their lands, and if they do sell them there can be no monopoly—the only monopoly we will have will be the monopoly of purity, patriotwisdom by hon, gentlemen and If the Syndicate sell their lands, as they must sell them at $3 or $4 an acre, as the lands of the Western States were sold—and the leader of the Opposition himself said that if they were close to the railway they would bring at least as much as in Kansas, that is $5 per acre-I say it will be incalculable the amount of money we shall receive from these lands, and we are only compelled to give the Company onetenth of the lands of fair average quality in the North-West. I predict, Sir, that even in my lifetime -and I am approaching the sere and yellow leaf-we shall receive enough from the transaction and from the sale of the lands, not only to pay for the railway and the interest upon construction, but enough to pay all our debt from the beginning until this day. And yet, Sir, with a great future like this before us, these hon, gentlemen opposite, who know these things as well as we do. but who -I was going to say-are not blind, though extreme partizanship is apt to blind the eyes, insist not to assist, but to obstruct the measure before the House. We were told the other day by the leader of the Opposition that there were those who had ears and could not hear, who had eyes and could not see, and I may add that there are some who will sleep even when the greatest interests of their country are at stake. However that may be, I believe that we are on this side of the House all wide awake to the discreditable attempt that is being made by gentlemen opposite, to palm off upon this country a bogus proposition for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Why, Sir, so discreditable is it in the eyes of the people of this country, that even the Montreal Star, that for weeks had been teeming with the severest paragraphs against this Syndicate, comes out and says there can be no doubt that it smells of party and party corruption. Even the Montreal Witness tells us that this scheme contains the most objectionable features of the present contract—that is, the disposal of the lands in the same way that these resolu-tions propose to dispose of them. The cloven hoof sticks out, it is visible to everybody and cannot be concealed. You cannot repeat twice in a lifetime the Acts of 1873. It is impossible for the people to be aroused again by anything of that kind. They are sick of the Pacific Railway, and its construction by the Government as a Government work. They do not like to read every time they take up a newspaper during a Session of Parliament that there is a notice upon the paper calling for an enquiry into some rotten contract. They do not wish the lobbies of this House to be filled with people looking for favors from the Government in the shape of would require to have three millions of people in that contracts. For the credit of their country they beg and country before the railway could pay, and I believe that pray that there may be no more letters to my friend Moore. estimate to be correct. Now, this Syndicate will find it They pray that all this sort of thing may be swept away, and that to secure such a consummation this railway should be constructed by a private company, that the Government may have nothing to do with it except to draw the receipts that legitimately will accrue from that great Canadian Pacific Railway enterprise. I do not misrepresent the feelings of the people of this country. I say that they who insinuate that the gentlemen on this side of the House are bartering away the liberties and rights of this country, are themselves committing a great crime against this country. I believe that we have eyes and see, and ears and hear, as well as those gentlemen opposite. I believe we are just as capable of judging as to whether a contract is right or wrong, and that in addition to eyes and cars we have noses as keen to scent corruption, if any exists, as gentlemen opposite, and I venture to say that if we scented anything of that kind every man on this side of the House would vote against the Government, because we are, what these gentlemen claim to be, sincerely desirous of doing our whole duty to our country and nothing but our duty. Speaking for myself I have nothing to gain from the passage of these resolutions except the satisfaction that every Canadian feels who has done his whole duty on an occasion like this. I wish to draw attention to the dishonest attempt which has been made to impose upon the people of this country, the idea that we are giving away their birthright by exempting from taxation this railway in the North-West. My hon, friend from Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) made mincement of the attempt of hon. gentlemen opposite to humbug the people with the idea that $600,000 a year would be given away to this Syndicate in exemptions. He showed that this railway could not be exempted from taxation in Ontario, Manitoba or British Columbia, and that it could only be exempted by this Parliament in the North-West Territories. He also showed that about $1,000 a year was the outside amount of the exemptions, estimating the lands at $5 an acre, which is about the average assessed value of lands in many of the counties in Ontario Ask the people of Ontario whether they would choose between the Grand Trunk Railway, exempted from taxation, and no Grand Trunk Raifway, and how long would they hesitate before they gave us the railway. We would exempt it from taxation, and, if necessary, give a large sum to the Grand Trunk Railway, for the continuance of its operation. There is hardly any sum too great for this country to pay for that great through line, and the same experience will be found in the North-West. They cannot exempt it from taxation, for that, I may say, is already done; but they will offer them bonuses to move their line a little nearer to them, or to build them a station. Has it not been the policy of every Province in this country to exempt railways from taxation? Is not that the policy in the United States? Does not our Ontario Legislature, and do not our municipalities, every year grant bonuses to railway companies? Why, the hon. gentleman himself was charged the other evening with buying up the whole country with his railway schemes. It is idle to suppose that the exemption from taxation can possibly be at all injurious to the people of the North-West. It can do them no harm. But I will tell you that harm might accrue. I do not believe that this or any Syndicate that was sincere would accept any contract unless it were exempt from taxation. I know in my own person the consequence of being subject to taxation. I had, unfortunately, a little land, some 800 acres in a western county, and after I had paid taxes on it for a few years, I found I had paid more in that way than I originally paid for the land. Two years ago I dropped it. I was not as wise in my generation as a friend of mine who got snother man to buy his land in for the taxes. I did not know enough for that. But then, I am not a lawyer. If the railway company were left at the mercy of the men who will cettle the North-West, they would be taxed to death. They would be fleeced as in the United States. They would be obliged to build school-houses where there were no people, and certainly where there were no children. They would be obliged to build bridges where there was no ne-cessity for them. There would be no end to the exactions to which they would be obliged to submit. No company, sincere in its undertaking, and understanding what it was about, would undertake to build this railway unless it was exempted from taxation. There have been other objections made to this contract. There has been the monopoly objection, which, I think, I have disposed of. There can be no such thing as a monopoly, for the simple reason that the Syndicate, if they would make anything out of this contract, must sell the lands; and if the lands are sold and they only get the lands in blocks of a mile square, which prevents their holding any large sections anywhere there can be no such thing as a monopoly. But we are told that the people will be robbed by the railway in the rates of freights that will be imposed on the produce they send to market There can be no question that if this Company should dare to exact from the residents of that country a larger toll than they can afford to pay, it will be of no use for them to send their grain to market, because when it reaches there they will not get enough to pay for their labor and the freight When that comes, the people will cease to grow grain, or raise cattle. They will leave their lands and go to some other country, and the railway will be left without anything to support it. There will be no people to travel on it, and no grain or cattle to be carried to the seaports from that great North-West. Even although this Act of Parliament threw no protection around the settler, the Company must in their own interest exact only a fair rate. But if blind to their own interests, if forgetful of what is due to the people, they should impose these extravagant rates, then we have a paternal Government which has the power and the will to make the Company carry at reasonable rates the produce of the North-West to the ocean over our Canadian soil, and not through American territory. Is there any other objection of any valid kind that can be brought against this contract? I have read that almost interminable document-I was going to say, the seventh volume of the speech of the leader of the Opposition, but in that I may be making a trifling mistake, because his last speech but one was the sixth volume, and this is only, I suppose, an abstract of it on this railway question. I shall treat it, however, as an abstract proposition and as a recapitulation of all he has said before; and I shall take leave of it by saying that, in my opinion, I have heard nothing from gentlemen opposite from the commencement of the debate to this hour, that could induce me for one moment to believe that there is any danger threatening the people of this country, in consequence of the contract entered into between the Government and this Syndicate. So far from that, I have now greater hope for my country than ever before. I see for her a great future. I look to see in that great North-West, aye, and British Columbia, a happy, a free and powerful people; and without this great transcontinental railway, without the ability and courage that have been employed to bring about this contract, I believe it would be many a long year before we should be able to reach the shores of the Pacific. I know that but a few years ago the leader of the then Government told us that within two years we should be able to go, within four or five days, from Toronto to Fort Garry. It was but an idle dream. He had not behind him the men to strengthen him in his policy, and he failed because he was not honestly and effectually supported. I hope to live to see that railway completed within the time prescribed, by 1891; and if it should be completed and, please God, I have health and money enough to carry me across the continent, I shall go to see the terminus on the Pacific slope, and shall have the proud satisfaction of knowing that I have contributed my mite towards the great future of my country, in the success of this great work.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to; and (at 1:30 o'clock, a.m.,) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 20th January, 1881.

The SPEAKLR took the Chair at Three o'clock.

BILL INTRODUCED.

TARIFF OF PILOTAGE.

Mr. VALLEE enquired, Whether the Harbor Commissioners of Montreal have submitted to the Government, for its approval, a by-law having for its object a reduction in the tariff of pilotage between Montreal and Quebec; and if so, whether the Government intend to approve of the said by-law before having placed the pilots in a position to express their views on the subject?

Mr. POPE (Queen's). A request has been received by the Government from the Montreal Harbor Commissioners asking that some change be made with respect to the Pilotage Act. As it had not been considered, and until it had been considered, of course we cannot say what action will be taken.

FRENCH COPIES OF SECOND SYNDICATE OFFER.

In answer to Mr. Bourassa,

Mr. LANGEVIN said: It is not the intention of the Government to deprive the French members from having French copies of the new offer; on the contrary, we shall do with regard to the French copies what we have done with regard to the English copies, and the hon. gentleman may be sure that I will give my attention to the question.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Charles Tupper for the second reading of the resolutions reported from the Committee of the Whole on the 14th January instant, granting certain moneys and lands for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the motion of Mr. Blake in amendment thereto.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Mr. Speaker, I realize very fully the difficulty of addressing the House upon a subject of this kind, which has already occupied its attention for more than a month, and upon which so many hon. gentlemen have addressed it in terms very much better than I could pretend to do. I would very gladly have avoided saying anything upon the subject itself were it not that I feel that it is one of so great importance that every hon. member should be prepared to state on the floor of Parliament the reasons which induce him to adopt the course he intends to take. Never, perhaps, in the history of the country, was there a question upon the proper solution of which its future interests so largely depend, and never was there a question which appealed more strongly to the sense of responsibility that every hon. member must feel as to the manner in which he shall cast Mr. Bergin.

his vote upon it. Sir, at the very outset I may say that there is a wide line of distinction between the two political parties, and that on this account we, on this side of the House, have no difficulty in ranging ourselves under the policy which has been enunciated by the Administration of the day. The Conservative party of Canada, since Confederation, have always kept steadily in view the object of uniting all the Provinces, and all the portions of British America, under a great Confederation, and they have, with this object in view, incurred in the past, and are prepared to incur to-day very serious responsibilities, because they believe that upon the accomplishment of that object will depend greatly the future prosperity of this part of Her Majesty's dominions. The Conservative party, in relation to this particular question—if I may be permitted to speak in their name for a moment—hold that the honor of the country, as well as its material interests, require the construction of a Pacific Railway uniting the Pacific Ocean with the existing railways in Canada on Canadian Territory. That, Sir, was the policy of 1871. That has been the policy of both political parties in this country until last Session; and last Session, for the first time, in the history of this country, we had the declaration of hon. gentleman opposite that they were bound, neither by the obligations which the country had assumed, nor by the interests of the country, to build the Pacific Railway from the Pacific Ocean to the Canadian system of railways. And yet, Sir, if we look back to the discussions which took place during the time the hon. gentlemen opposite were in office, we will see how strong their conviction was on that question. They went on incurring very large liabilities, they went on making very large expenditures. Their apology to the electors when they met them, their apology in this House, for those large expenditures was, that they had inherited them from their predecessors and that they were obligations which they could not avoid. .If the statement which they now make, if the position which they now assume be true, that contention on their part was not warranted by the facts. If, Sir, to-day, we may abandon the idea of the Pacific Railway; if, to-day, we may postpone indefinitely the construction of any portion of that railway in British Columbia; if, to-day, we may abandon all idea of an all-rail route through British territory, connecting the Pacific Ocean with old Canada, we could have done that at any time during the last seven years, and hon. gentlemen opposite must therefore take this horn of the dilemma that all the expenditures which they made when in office were not the result of meeting the obligations which they had inherited from their prodecessors, but were their own deliberate policy, undertaken of their own free will and motion, and for which they are entirely and completely responsible. Parliament last year affirmed the principle, contrary to the views of those hon. gentlemen, that the Pacific Railway shall be built. On the vote which was taken in this House in relation to the British Columbia section, that affirmation was distinctly given. Parliament, by its vote, affirmed that the honor of the country, as well as its material interests, required that the Pacific Railway should be built through British Columbia. And, Sir, what has been the result since? What has been the decision of the people, the verdict of the people, in relation to that issue presented to Parliament last Session by hon. gentlemen opposite, and accepted by Parliament by an overwhelming majority. have had nine elections since; three in Ontario, five in Quebec, and one in Manitoba, and what has been the result? At all those elections it is to be presumed that this great question, upon which hon, gentlemen challenged the vote of Parliament last year, was submitted to the electors in those several constituencies, and yet we find not one single constituency, which before was represented by a friend of the Government, has gone to the Opposition; but, on the contrary, we find that whereas of those nine constituencies four were last year represented by hon. gentlemen who sit upon the other side of the House, now but two are so represented. So that we may fairly say that at the only test which we can have during the term of any Parliament, that of the by-elections, the people acquiesced in the decision which Parliament gave last year, to construct the Pacific Railway as a whole. I propose, therefore, in the remarks which I intend to address to the House-and I trust they will not be lengthy-to discuss the question from that standpoint; that is, from the standpoint of the obligation of this country to construct a railway to the Pacific coast, to connect with the Canadian system of railways in Canadian territory. Sir, there can be no doubt that in the statements I am about to make I must to some extent repeat what has already been made in this debate. Both parties in Canada were committed to the construction of the railway, and both parties were committed to its construction by means of a company, The resolution of Parliament in 1871 was to the effect that the railway should be constructed and worked by private enterprise and not by the Dominion Government, and that the public aid to be given to secure that undertaking should consist of such liberal grants of land and such subsidies of money or other aid, not increasing the present rate of taxation, as the Parliament of Canada might thereafter determine. To that an amendment was moved by the then leader of the Opposition substantially accepting that policy, but desiring to have included the words, that it should be done in that way "and not otherwise." Every member of the Opposition then sitting in Parliament voted for that amendment. When the policy of 1872 was introduced in accordance with that resolution, no opposition was offered to the subsidy of 50,000,000 acres of land and $30,000,000, together with certain other subsidies of land for the branches. There were but three amendments moved. One was moved by Mr. Macdonald, who represented the County of Glengarry, that the route of the railway should be submitted to Parliament before it was finally adopted; another was moved by Mr. Mackenzie, requiring that the contract to be made under the Act of Parliament should be submitted to Parliament before being confirmed, and another was moved by Mr. Young, then representing one of the ridings of Waterloo, that no centract should be made with the Company that would prevent Parliament from dealing with the alternate sections reserved by the Government, as Parliament considered from time to time in the interests of the country. These were the three amendments moved, and I congratulate hon. members opposite that in the contract now submitted, every one of these amendments are practically affirmed. have the route fixed as to its general points in that contract; we have the contract itself now before Parliament, ready to be accepted or rejected as the will of Parliament may determine; and the Government have themselves reserved in the contract the right to deal with the alternate sections of land in any way they may think proper-the right to give them away or to sell them at any price they may choose. There was but one railway by means of 50,000,000 acres of land and $30,000,000, and that was that the disposal of the grant should be in the hands of Parliament to be dealt with by an annual That amendment was moved by Mr. Wood, now Chief Justice of Manitoba, but it was so absurd on the face of it, that no division was taken upon it, hon. gentlemen opposite allowing it to be declared lost on division. That, then, was the policy of 1871 -to grant 50,000,000 acres of land, together with certain quantities for the branches, making in all 54,574,000 acres of land and fact, it failed to induce capitalists to invest. Sir Hugh Allan, who certainly occupied as high a position in the financial world as any man in Canada, as high as any of the Canadians who are connected with either of the Syndicates now before the country, went to England. He was known there; he was engaged in large shipping enterprises; he was engaged in business on the other side, and his name was as well known there as on this side as that of an enterprising, earnest, business man who was in the habit of turning into gold almost everything he touched; and yet, with all that prestige, with all that reputation, and with all these enormous subsidies, he failed to enlist foreign capitaltsts in the enterprise, and had to come back and give up the contract. Well, in 1874. hon. gentlemen opposite came into power. They might then, and they certainly ought —on the principle they now lay down that we may abandon this enterprise altogether without dishonor and without injury to the interests of the countryto have declared at once that this work was beyond the resources of the country. Did they do so? No, Sir. They introduced an Act of Parliament granting substantially the same subsidies as the Act of 1872, and adding that any person who might tender could say to what amount they wanted four per cent for 25 years in addition to the subsidies of land and money. Whatever that might be, whether little or much, and I am not going into a calculation on that point, it was at least in excess of the general subsidies granted by the Act of 1872; and yet it failed to induce capitalists to undertake the construction of this railway. The amount on which four per cent was guaranteed for 25 years under a similar arrangement with the Canada Central Railway was $7,500 a mile, and I think it ought at least to be remembered that the contractor who undertook the work at that price failed. and was obliged to give up this contract. That Act remained on the Statute-book until hon. gentlemen opposite left office. It is, in fact, on the Statute-book yet. Hon. gentlemen inserted an advertisement in the papers of England, the papers of the United States, and the papers of Canada, and they failed to induce any one, even to make a tender for the construction of this railway upon these large subsidies. Now, Sir, what is the comparison—and I am simply going to state it in general figures without dealing at any length with this branch of the subject-what is the comparison of these subsidies with the subsidies now proposed to be given? Hon, gentlemen opposite have done everything they possibly could to exaggerate the value of the lands in the North-West. Comparing their speeches of this year with those of last year, one marvels that the hon. gentlemen, who declared at that time that these lands were comparatively worthless as an asset for the purpose of building this railway, should be to-day so anxious to make it appear that they are immensely valuable. I confess I cannot understand why they should desire to increase the value of the lands. It seems to me that the higher the price they put on them, the greater the difference between their offer and the offer now before Parliament. If you take them at $3.18 an acre, other amendment to the policy, which was assented to by which is the figure they now appear to accept, although last Parliament with comparative unanimity, to construct the year, language was scarcely strong enough in which to express their dissent from the idea that anything like that much could be realized for them; the subsidies of 1872 amounted to $203,946,000, the subsidies of 1875 to $205,580,000, and that without counting the four per cent. additional upon such sum as might be asked for 25 years, while the subsidies now proposed amount to $132,500,000, or $70,000,000 less than the subsidies of either of the previous propositions. But we are told by hon. gentlemen opposite -and the hon, member for West Durham went into a very elaborate calculation on this subject—that 50,000,000 acres $30,000,000. That was not considered too much for the of land are not so valuable per acre as 25,000,000 would be construction of this railway in 1872. As a matter of We are told that the subsidy of 25,000,000 acres will involve the selection of the land in the better part of the country, nearer to the railway, either the branches or the main line, and, therefore, it is not fair to assume 50,000,000 acres as worth per acre what you assume 25,000,000 to be worth. I admit at once that there is something in that argument. I am perfectly satisfied to accept that view of the case, and to see how the matter then stands. The hon gentlemen will admit, I think, that as to 25,000,000 acres, the price ought to be the same in both cases.

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Mr. WHITE. I understand the hon gentleman's "hear, hear," and I quite appreciate that there may be something in the argument which he intends to suggest, that is, that the lands then were less valuable than the lands now, because of our greater knowledge of the country and the construction of railways leading into the country.

Mr. BLAKE. And also as to the choice.

Mr. WHITE. I will come to the choice presently. I am not dealing with that branch of the subject now. must know that what has caused the increase in the value of the land to-day has been the fact that railways have been constructed, and if that railway had been built under the terms of the Sir Hugh Allan contract, those lands would be infinitely more valuable than they are at this moment. So that there is really nothing in the argument the hon, gentleman appears to suggest. But if you assume the value of the second 25,000,000 acres of land to be $1.50, what is the position then? That, in 1872, the subsidies amounted to $154,000,000, in 1874 to $153,500,000—not counting the four per cent., which I have not included in any of my calculations -and, to-day, to $132,500,000. So that, even by that method of calculation, assuming the hon. gentleman's argument that you cannot regard 50,000,000 acres as equal in value per acre to 25,000,000, I say, taking one 25,000,000 at the price named by the hon. gentleman and the other 25,000,000 at half the price—which I think is not an unfair way of putting the case—the present proposition is upwards of $20,000,000 less than the proposition of 1872, or that of 1874, without counting the four per cent. guarantee at all. I think we may fairly assume that all the discussions that took place last Session as to the quantity of acres of land, and the amount of dollars in money, that were to be paid for the construction of this railway to a company, had relation to the Act of 1874. Well, what do we find? The hon. member for West Durham, in his speech referring to what had been done by the Government of which he was a member, said:

"But, meantime, further progress was made and to some euquiries the Government answered that it hoped to be able shortly to advertise for tenders for the whole work on the land and money basis, subject to the approval of Parliament. It was the policy of the Government, at the earliest moment at which the condition of the surveys would permit, to take that step and so to give a fair trial to the plan, the only plan by which the road could be constructed in any short time, without increasing the rate of taxation."

This is the statement of the hon, gentleman, that the granting of 50,000,000 acres of land, and about $30,000,000, and four per cent. on any sum which might be demanded in excess of this, would not increase the rate of taxation, that the road could be built with the subsidies without increasing the rate of taxation. But there is another view. The speech of the hon, member for West Durham, the night before last, shows what was the general view as to the probable expenditure that the railway would involve. The hon. gentleman, discussing the question of getting tenders for the construction of this railway, was complaining that the Government had not asked for tenders, and referring to the speech made by the hon. Minister of Railways, in which that hon. gentleman said that if tenders were asked for the section from Red River to Kamloops, capitalists would undoubtedly be obtained to undertake the work, said:

"That scheme was that it should be constructed as a Government work, leaving out for the present the eastern link. This was declared to Mr, White (Cardwell).

be; in their opinion, the true policy. It was justified by the proposition that the conditions had wholly changed, and that now the most proper and profitable thing to do was to proceed with the construction of this as a Government work. Was it that they said it would be difficult to obtain its construction by a company? Not so. They declared that if they now issued advertisements the response would be satisfactory and immediate; but although that was their opinion, they were determined to proceed with the construction as a Government work. In order to show the hone gentleman that I am speaking by the book, I will read from the speech of hon. Minister of Railways in laying the policy of the Government before the House last Session:

hon. Minister of Railways in laying the policy of the Government before the House last Session:

""Hon. gentlemen must not forget, as I said before, that the whole aspect of affairs in this country has entirely changed within a brief period; that that which would have been properly regarded as highly imaginative in relation to the development of the Canadian North-West, must now be looked upon with very different eyes indeed. My hon. predecessor need only recall to his mind the fact that he publicly advertised, in 1876, offering $10,000 a mile and $20,000 acres of land for the construction of the road, and asking how much more capital tenderers would require four per cent. upon for twenty-five years to induce them to undertake this work. And what was the response? Not a tender. So completely had the hon. gentlemen opposite succeeded in imbuing the minds of capitalists in this country and abroad with the hopelessness of this enterprise, that not one of them would undertake it as a commercial enterprise.

not one of them would undertake it as a commercial enterprise. "Then he proceeds with the statement of an offer he had at that time; so he was persuaded that by advertising for tenders in the term of the Act, he could secure the construction of the work, such as he was proposing to construct it, on more favorable terms, and that a response would be given by the first capitalists in the country to that advertisement.

It is somewhat to be regretted that the hon, gentleman stopped there. It is somewhat to be regretted that when he was quoting from that speech of the hon Minister of Railways he did not go on a little further. Had he done so, he would have shown this House and the country how very much better, how infinitely beyond anything which even so sanguine a Minister as the Minister of Railways anticipated last year, how much better than anything which this House even dreamt of last year, is the contract which is now submitted to Parliament. Here is the sentence from last year's speech of the Minister of Railways following the quotation made by the hon, gentleman:

"I have good reason to state that such an offer as that would secure the construction and operation of the whole line from Red River to Kamloops, with the operation and maintenance of all the road to the Pacific, at a cost not exceeding $13,000, or $10,000 per mile, from Red River to Kamloops, and 26,000,000 acres of land."

That was the best that even so sanguine a Minister as the hon. Minister of Railways ventured to hope for last year:

"In that case we would be in this position, as the hon gentleman would see, that the whole expenditure of an unknown quantity, proving a burden that could not be calculated, would be entirely removed, and we would be in a position of having this great national work accomplished within ten years, and on terms that would involve comparatively light expenditure from the people of this country, and that would be a thousand times recouped from the development of the North-West."

Now, what was that proposition? The price under the contract, taking the lands at $1 per acre—and as I said before, if you assume them to be worth more, the argument is all the stronger -is $25,000 a mile from Red River to Kamloops. Yet the estimate which the hon. Minister of Railways suggested last year as something so good that it would relieve the people of this country altogether from the burden hereafter of the construction of the road, was, taking the land grant at $i an acre and $10,000 per mile, $29,259 per mile, and at $13,000 per mile, $32,259 per mile, so that we have a contract laid on the Table which shows an actual saving of $7,259 per mile, as compared with the proposition made by the hon. Minister of Railways last year. The hon, gentleman, when he quoted from the speech of the hon. Minister of Railways, ought, in fairness, to have read the balance of the speech to show what it was that was proposed by it. What was the proposition then? If this was a question of building the railway from Red River westward, it would be folly country to put it in the hands of What is the proposition before us to day? It the a company. is the completion of the whole work, comprising that part north of Lake Superior, as well as that part west of Red River; and it is because we secure by the handing over of these subsidies to the Company, the construction of the ontire line, at a lower price for the whole 2000 miles than was, as to its western part from Red River, suggested as the best that could be dreamed of last year, that this Parliament should accept the proposition submitted to it. New, Sir, there are two questions which will naturally suggest themselves to hon. members. I believe the member for West Durham, in the speech delivered in Montreal the other day, put those two questions and answered them according to his views of the case. The first is, what are we to get from the Company which is to be chartered, and the second, what are we to give for that which we are to get? The Company undertakes to construct the railway from Lake Nipissing to Kamloops within ten years, and to operate it for all time, giving security for its operation for twenty years; that is the period of initial difficulties in connection with the railway. The Government undertakes to get Parliament to give the existing lines of railway in return, completing the contracts that are let, except those immediately west of Red River, and the extension to Port Moody, the cost of the whole being estimated at $28,000,000. The Government also promise to give 25,000,000 acres of land, and $25,000,000 in addition. What is the cost to the Company of doing what they have undertaken to do? According to the statement made by the member for West Durham—and I take his statement which I suppose will be accepted by hon. gentlemen opposite at any rate—the estimated cost of the railway which is to be constructed by this Company is $46,500,000, or, taking the higher estimate of last year, $5,500,000 more. It may, at any rate, be assumed, I think—and that will not be considered an exaggerated statement, because it is substantially within the statement made by the member for West Durham himself—that the amount of cash the Company would have to furnish, in addition to the cash subsidy, will be, at least, $25,000,000. What is the result? The immediate sale of 25,000,000 acros at $1 an acre, without one dollar of expense to the country for administration or sales in connection with this enormous tract. That is the first thing we get. But we get in addition to that the construction of the railway, which will undoubtedly largely enhance—every one will admit that—the value of the alternate sections retained by the Government. We secure the active co-operation of the railway company in the matter of immigration to this country; those who have listened to the debates in and this House during the last two or three Sessions will realize how generally accepted is the fact that these railway companies form the most important and valuable auxiliaries in the matter of immigration. We shall obtain large contributions to the revenue by the settlement of the lands which the construction of the railway will secure, a matter which I think ought not to be, and cannot be, overlooked in considering this question; and we get what is more important, if I may say so, than almost all the other benefits, an exact, or comparatively exact, knowledge of our liabilities connected with this great enterprise. During this debate hon. gentlemen opposite have attempted to minimize these liabilities, and the member for West Durham, in his opening speech on the Canadian Pacific Railway resolutions, asked what is the intermediate character of this business? and he answered the question by saying "it is that we do not know the cost of the construc-tion of the railway." Mr. Speaker, this is a most unfair way of stating the case. Last year the hon, gentleman said:

"The engineers, taking the Intercolonial Railway as a guide, have estimated the running expenses of working the 125 miles at $295,000. If there is headly any traffic it will not cost so much. But we cannot hope to escape altogether from running expenses, which will, of course, include renewals and repairs, though I fancy the item of renewals to rails will not be a heavy one. Our annual payments, therefore, in respect to that railway after construction will be considerable. The interest on the cost of construction at $10,000,000 will be an annual burden of $500,000, or if the line costs $12,000,000, $600,000, to which may be added a loss in running expenses of perhaps $150,000 a year, or more, making a total annual charge of from $750,000 to $850,000 a year. But that is not all nor the chief part of the burden, because this line is proposed to be constructed not as an isolated transaction—not as a complete thing in itself—not as the end of the expenditure in British Columbia, but only as the commencement. It is but a pledge. It is but a hostage for the many other millions to be expended there."

That was simply as to the British Columbia section. That was his idea of the indeterminate character of the liabilities which the Government were assuming last year as to this British Columbia section alone—that they would amount to from $750,000 to $850,000 a year, or, leaving out interest on the cost of construction, from $150,000 to $50,000 a year for mere running expenses. Then the hon, gentleman went on referring to the whole line as follows:—

"Now, besides this enormous expense to which I have referred, besides this aggregate of I do not know how many millions of dollars, the interest of which, according to the old estimates, will be $16,000,000 a year, we have got to consider the running expenses. These expenses Mr. Fleming estimated in former days at $8,000,000 a year; but my hon. friend from Lambton estimates them at a gross sum of $6,750,000 a year for the whole line, or $4,500,000 a year from Fort William to the Pacific. Of course, against this sum are to be set the receipts, which will be considerable, and will, in some sections of the road, perhaps, meet the expenses; but in the early days, and for a long time, the road as a whole will, I believe, be run at a loss. Thus, you have a charge for interest and expenses for this Pacific Railway which, if you add the cost of interest during construction, places it, according to any estimate you may form, wholly beyond the resources of this country to do the work in the way and at the rate that the hon. gentleman has suggested."

He said, last year, that to build the railway simply from Red River to the Pacific Ocean, leaving out the Lake Superior section altogether, was a burden so great as to be beyond the resources of this country, with all its revenue and all the lands thrown into the bargain. But I would like to ask the hon, gentleman, if, in view of this statement made last year, he thinks it is a fair way, an honest way, of dealing with a public question of this kind, that he should come down now and tell us that the indeterminate character of this enterprise involves nothing more than the mere question of the cost of its construction? By his own statement the running expenses alone involved a larger sum per annum than the interest on the entire cost of the railway. But not only was the question of running exponses an element of uncertainty. The question of the cost of the railway itself was an element of uncertainty. The hon. gentleman, last year, in making a statement as to the cost of the railway, fixed it as, at least, $120,000,000. That was his statement, based upon all the evidence and information he had at hand. I do not, of course, hold the hon. member responsible for these statements in their fullness, because he objects to be held responsible for statements which he made before. I do not desire for a single moment to forget the explanation he made in this House on this subject. I do not desire to misrepresent in the slightest the hon. gentleman. I am aware his statement is that he desires to escape responsibility for what he said before, because the conditions are changed now; but if that be the doctrine which may be laid down, then there is an end of all fair controversy on public questions. The conditions have undoubtedly changed. Hon, members on this side were proposing to go on with the work as a Government work, and it was necessary to adopt one line of argument; this year they propose to go on with the work by entering into a contract, and hon. gentlemen say that the conditions are changed, and that he must not be held responsible for what he said before. But not only was that the case, according to the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), but the hon. member for Lambton who, I may say, with no disrespect to the leader of the Opposition, is a better authority than he is on matters of

House with a long quotation from his speech, but I shall read a short extract:

"I am sure I am within the line in stating these figures, and that it will be impossible to construct anything that can be called a railway, nothing less than a mere tramway, for the amount now given, as the ben, gentleman says, by the Chief Engineer."

So that the hon, member for Lambton, with all his practical knowledge and practical experience with regard to this question, came to the conclusion that the railway could not be built for less than $120,000,000. Now, Sir, these hon. gentlemen may have been wro g last year in these statements, but they will surely admit that they may have been right; and if they were right, if there is any doubt whether they were right or wrong, we get rid of the indeterminate character of the liability connected with the construction of this railway by the arrangement which has now been made. But here is another authority as to the possible loss in the working expenses of this railway, and in citing it I may remark that it is an evidence of the extraordinary variation of argument which we have heard in connection with this question since it was first announced that the Government had arranged with a company of capitalists for the construction of this railway. Last fall the correspondent of the New York World, in this city, who, like all correspondents, was anxious to get all the news, thought he had discovered the whole details of this scheme, and he sent a statement to his paper giving the details of the Government proposal. Among the statements made by him was one to the effect that large subsidies were to be given for the construction of the road, and that after it was constructed it was to revert to the Government. Well. Sir. the Globe newspaper in the article which was referred to by my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick), yesterday, used the following language:

"Estimating the value of the road under construction at $30,000,000, and calculating the price to be obtained for the land at the rate of 2 an acre, the total subsidy amounts to $105,000,000, or $20,000,000 more than the estimated cost of constructing the whole line. Making allowance for a fair profit of say $10,000,000, the large sum of $10,000,000 would remain to the Syndicate. The engagement to pay so much was, of course, understood to imply that the Company would take the risk of running and maintaining the line for all time. Ten years after completion, in 1891, the road may possibly pay running expenses, and the large sum in excess of its cost would be given to the Company for risking a loss in the meantime."

Then, further on, the writer adds:

"The avowed object of negotiating with a Company for the completion of the work in ten years was, that the Government of Canada should escape all responsibility for the enterprise by making a definite payment. The people are perhaps not opposed to granting a subsidy in excess of the sum for which the line can be built, if by such grant the line can be finally But to pay $20,000,000 more than the estimated cost of the got rid of But to pay $20,000,000 more than the estimated cost of the railway, and after doing so assume the enormous responsibility of running and maintaining it, never occurred to any advocate of the Syndicate scheme. Such a plan would unite nearly all the evils of the contract system with all the evils of pushing forward the enterprise much more rapidly than could be done on that system. Absolutely nothing would be gained by it except that one set of contractors instead of several would undertake the construction of the road. Add to $20,000,000 the great sum which will be annually lost in running and maintaining a line 2 500 miles long during the years which must elapse after 1891 before a traffic enficient to pay running expenses can be created, and we have the unites long during the years which must elapse after 1891 before a traffic sufficient to pay running expenses can be created, and we have the amount which the country will be called on to pay in excess of the cost of building the railway as rapidly as the development of the North-West warrants."

That, Sir, is the statement made by the leading Liberal journal of this country, that the people would not be unwill ling to give $20,000,000 to get rid of the indeterminate liability of working the railway afterwards. gentlemen tell us, in their discussion of this question, that the only indeterminate feature connected with the business is the mere cost of construction. But the records of Parliament furnish another very remarkable illustration of what is held to be the cost of running and maintaining this railway. When the late Government advertised for tenders for the construction of the Georgian Bay Branch they included the plan of giving four per cent. upon such a sum Mr. WHITE (Cardwell).

25 years. There were a number of tenders received, among them one from Mr. English, a gentleman it is said of considerable ability and capacity, one who knew what he was about. The tenders asked for were for two classes of contracts: First, a contract to build the railway and hand it over to the Government, and, second, one to build the railway, work it, and own it themselves. One would imagine, from the statements made in this House as to the great gift we are giving the Syndicate in giving them the railway when it is built, that the amount asked upon the second proposition would be infinitely less than upon the first. Mr. English's tender, for the railway to be built and handed over to the Government after construction, was four per cent, or $100,000 for 25 years per mile; but if he was to work the railway, if he was to have the indeterminate liability of maintaining it after construction, he wanted the interest on $110,000 a mile—a difference amounting to the interest on $10,000 for 25 years, in the two schemes. Then, Sir, there is another doubt as to this matter, altogether apart from the question of the cost of construction, and that is as to the financial ability of this country to meet the obligations connected with the construction of the railway. Personally I have no donet, I never had any doubt, as to the ability of this country to meet these liabilities. There is no doubt whatever that the cost of running and maintaining this railway might be a serious cost at the outset, but I believe that from the development of the country, from the sale of public lands, from the revenues to be derived from the settlers coming in through the ordinary means by which the people of this country pay taxes to the Government; by all these means I believe we would be capable of accomplishing the work. But there was a doubt connected with the matter-a serious doubt. The hon member for Lambton, in relation to that point, laid down this view:

"I propose to consider the proposal to build this road by the sale of lands. If the consent of the House is obtained to the Government proposition upon the faith of its obtaining the entire cost of the road and a great deal more from the land sales, then hon members will be deceived. I believe it is impossible to obtain the means in that way."

* * "I have always held that whatever revenue is realized from the lands will be absorbed mainly in settlement and governmental expenses, and that the money must be contributed by the people of Canada for the building of

That was the view of the hon member for Lambton in relation to the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. He may have been wrong in that view, it is possible he was in error, but hon gentlemen opposite will admit that he may have been right, and if he was right then we get rid of that serious liability, that indeterminate liability, in connection with the construction of this railway by handing it over to a company in the manner in which it is proposed here. The hon, member for West Durham also dealt with this aspect of the question. I have a long quotation here which I will not trouble the House with reading, but I will give simply these three lines as showing in a few words the general character of the hon. gentleman's argument:

"I say that all the experience of all Governments with reference to the sales of public lan it, is that the settler is slow to pay."

That, Sir, is a statement made by him after he had elaborated an argument to show that the Government could not hope to get any money from the land which would enable them to construct this railway. There was another inde-terminate feature connected with this, namely, as to the population which might be obtained for that country. The success of the railway depends altogether on the success of the Company in sending immigrants into that country, and yet the hon, member for West Durham, last year, when he was endeavoring to excite the alarm of the people of this country because the Government proposed to go on slowly with the construction of the whole railway, fulfilling in the as might be asked over and above the regular subsidy, for meantime its obligations to British Columbia, he went on to say, referring to arguments which had been drawn from the experience of the western States:

"Let us compare our circumstances with theirs in these particulars: Let us compare our circumstances with theirs in these particulars:
—First of ail, we have at present no nucleus of population in the Morth-West worth mentioning. It is towards the end of the decade, for which we are calculating, that this factor will begin to exert an appreciable infinence. Next, look at that native recruiting ground, that constantly increasing population, first 20,000,000, running up to I know not how millions from which I have shown the Western States draw their main supply. How do we stand as to that? We stand 4,000,000 against their 30,000,000 or 40,000,000.

And again he said:

"I do not think that the only experience to which we can refer, having regard to the differences between the two countries, justifies us, how-ever sanguine or fervent our hopes may be, justifies us as business men dealing with a business transaction and calculating the cash returns we may count on from the North-West lands in the next few years, in concluding that there will be an emigrant population of 550,000 in that country at the end of eleven years, and in incurring, on the faith of that result, encrmous liabilities, which, if not met out of the lands, must be met otherwise.

Then we had a statement from the hon, member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) on this question. That hon. gentleman was the third person in that trinity which was formed last year for the purpose, as the hon. member for West Durham informed us, of presenting this question to the House. What did that hon gentleman say? He pointed out, according to his view, "the utter absurdity of the estimates of the Minister of the Interior, as to what might be derived from the lands." After an elaborate statement the hon. gentleman said:

"What does all this show as to the estimate of increased population? "What does all this show as to the estimate of increased population? I think it shows conclusively that the calculations made by the hon. gentlemen in the Treasury benches are extravagant. What does all this show, as to the question of the arable land? It shows that the estimate made by the hon. Minister of Railways, that we have 180.000,000 acres of arable land in the North-West, is exceedingly wide of the mark. He is deceiving himself and he is deceiving the country. He is guilty of a great wrong to the country, if he involves it in a great expenditure in the belief that the proceeds of land sales will repay the outlay. What does it show as to the prospective revenue from lands? It shows that in place of receiving an average of $7.00,000 a year from land sales for the next ten year, he is not likely to receive a net return of one-seventh of that amount. I think, Mr. S eaker, that I have shown that the various calculations made by the hon. gentlemen opposite are extravagant and visionary, and if this is the case, the fact. I think, should be held to cast much doubt upon the wisdom and ability to manage great public conmuch doubt upon the wisdom and ability to manage great public concerns, of those gentlemen who made the calculation.

Now, Sir, that was the statement of the hon. gentleman last year. All these were matters of doubt. The hon. member for North Norfolk may have been wrong. I doubt it very much. It is difficult to believe that he can always be wrong, for, like Mr. Vennor, the weather prophet, if he finds himself wrong in one speech, he can always put his finger upon another speech where he was right, and say that is what he referred to. But he may have been right, and if he was right, then we get rid by this contract of the indeterminate Hability connected with this enterprise, in so far as the sale of lands and the morey to be derived from lands, and the ability to put population into that country, are concerned. But we have not only settled that liability, we bave settled it within the amount fixed by hon. gentlemen opposite, when they were in office, as the amount which they were prepared to give annually for the construction of this railway. When they came in, they increased the taxation of this country by $3,000,000. If they had simply increased the taxation of the country, they might have said that it was on account of the construction of our canals, the completion of the Intercolonial and other public works, which required to be constructed, and which, therefore, involved a necessity for increased taxation. But that was not the state of the case." The statement made by the leader of the Government at that time, was to the effect that this $,000,000 additional taxation had been expressly raised for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. That statement was made, not on the floor of Parliament, not as a husting speech, but it was made in an official document for submission to the Imperial Government, a document in when he was in a doleful mood, that 550,000 people, at least, which, if anywhere, it seems to me a public man in this country ought to be exceedingly careful and accurate in the statements he ventures to make. It was made for the purpose of inducing the Imperial Government to acquiesce in the proposition that this Government were doing everything they could to implement the bargain with British Columbia. Here is one statement made in the report of the 23rd of July, 1874, being a minute of Council prepared, I venture to say, by the then First Minister himself:

"So anxious, however, were the present Government to remove any possible cause of complaint, that they did take means to increase the taxation very materially is order to place themselves in a position to make arrangements for the prosecution of the initial and d flicult portions of the line, as soon as it was possible to do so."

And then, in order that there might be no doubt as to the precise amount they had added to the taxation for this purpose, another minute of Council of 8th of July, 1874, used these words:

"In order to enable the Government to carry out the proposal, which it was hoped the British Columbia Government would have accepted, the average rate of taxation was raised at the last Session about fifteen per cent, and the excise duties on spirits and tobacco a corresponding rate, both involving additional taxation exceeding three millions of dollars on the transactions of the year."

Now, what is the obligation assumed under this? What is the fixed liability which we are asked to assume under this arrangement? The whole cash subsidy, including the works to be given as well as the cash subsidy to be paid, amounts to $53,000,000. We will be able, I have no doubt, to borrow at four per cent., but taking it at five per cent., in order that there may no cavil, and the whole annual expenditure of this country connected with the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway from end to end, will be $2,660,000, or $50,000 less than the hon. gentlemen opposite, in 1874. appropriated for the purpose. Now, Sir, I will ask you whether, having regard to the general character of this bargain, the general proposition that is submitted to us, I would ask you whether this is not a proposition which relieves us from all this indeterminate liability, which hon. gentlemen dwelt upon last year, which limits absolutely the liability of the country in respect to this great work, by the completion of which we vindicate the honor of this country and advance its material prosperity as we can do by no other possible means, when we are really able to do that for $350,000 less than the amount appropriated by hon. gentlemen for this purpose in 1874? That is our liability. I venture to hope, I venture to believe, that the surplus of this year will meet that liability, if we had to pay the whole of it this year. But we do not only secure by this bargian the completion of this great enterprise within the liability fixed by hon, gentlemen opposite six years ago, but we secure, by the construction of that railway, means and resources to this country, which will not only wipe that liability out as a tax on the country aftogether, but will actually give us enormous revenues to enable us to go on with other public works and enterprises in the country which we could not hope to obtain in any other way. I notice that the honorable and gallant knight from Westmoreland smiles at this. Does he mean to say that we shall not derive from the lands we reserve a very large amount of money? does, then I ask him, why all this talk about the enormous subsidies to be given to this Company? The whole basis of the objections of hon. gentlemen opposite to this bargain is that these lands are so valuable that the Company are going to realize large profits out of them. Does the hon gentle-man mean to tell us that we are not going to derive important revenues from the people who go into that country in consequence of the construction of this railway. What is the fact to-day? The contributions of the people of this country, in customs duties amount to somewhere about $4.50 per head. The hon, member for West Durham admitted last year, would go into that country within the next ten years. believe that 1,000,000 people will go in if this work goes on energetically, as I have no doubt it will, within the next ten years. Well, what will be the result? Taking $1.50 per head for the subsidies of the new Provinces to be established there, we shall have $3 a head, or upwards of $3,000,000 of contributions to the public revenue from the people of that country, irrespective of the lands altogether. So that, assuming that a million people will go into these North-West territories, we shall have a contribution from them, in consequence of the construction of this railway, sufficient to meet the entire liabilities connected with it. And yet hon gentlemen tell us that we are ruining the country, that we are imposing on the country obligations which it cannot meet. So much as to the general proposition before this House to give the subsidies of land and money to this Company. I come now to a part which I dare say hon, gentlemen opposite thought I should have come to earlier, that is the objections which have been ruised to this particular bargain. it is said that the attempt to build the whole railway is a folly; second, that we should for all time-because practically that is what the talk of hon. gentleman opposite postponing a portion of the railway amounts tofor all time, content ourselves with a connection with our own North-West Territories through a foreign country. That is the proposition made to us, and it is a wonderful illustration of the power of adaptibility of hon. gentlemen opposite. We have had discussions on this question of the Pacific Railway for a great number of years. When the contract was given to Sir Hugh Allan and his associates in 1872, that gentleman held a meeting in the town of Peterborough at which I had the pleasure of being present, among friends with whom I used to reside. Sir Hugh was then seeking a subsidy for the Ottawa and Toronto Railway. In that speech he dealt to some extent with the general question of the Pacific Railway, and said:

"He had also been promoting another railway from Carleton Place, at the south side of Ottaw, to Sault Ste. Marie, striking the Georgian Bay about the mouth of the French River. That line was of great importance, as it would take the entire trade of the West and North-West, by connecting with the Northern Pacific Railway. That would form nearly an air line, and a very considerable portion of the western trade must come down by it, for there was no other way to reach the seaboard so quickly."

That was the statement made by Sir Hugh Allan. It was not at that time proposed that the Government should give a subsidy to the Sault Ste. Marie road. It was not to be an additional burden on the people of this country beyond the subsidy given to the Canada Pacific Railway. I was then strongly in favor of the construction of that railway—not as a Government work to be in competition with the Canadian Pacific Railway proper, but as an important commercial work which I believed would bring a large portion of the trade of the Western States down to Montreal and Quebec. It was simply a proposition that Sir Hugh Allan and his company should out of their own means, as a part of their general railway enterprise, construct that piece of railway. And how was that proposition met? Why Sir, the Toronto Globe—and the Toronto Globe was not then a mere newspaper, but its statements were the statements of the acknowledged leader of the Liberal party—said of that scheme:

"Here was the scheme to suit Sir Hugh Allan exactly. He would by the assistance of the Canadian Government, gain access to the producing regions and lands awaiting settlement in the North-West, and by his further connection with the Northern Pacific, command the immigration and traffic of the West. True, the British Canadian road would be only constructing while its successful rival was already working; true, the immigrant seeking a home in British territory would be beset at êvery station by Minnesota land agents and touters of all descriptions; but the Allans would grow richer and the Allan ships be loaded to the water line."

There were other statements made. There was a control to respond for the House of Commens, made this clear versy going on between the Globe and the newspaper with statement as to his submission in the matter of leadership Mr. White (Cardwell).

which I was connected on that very subject. I defended at that time the proposal to construct the Sault Ste. Marie Branch as a private enterprise, not as a Government subsidized enterprise; and I have not since changed my opinion. I should be glad to see it constructed, and believe it would be of enormous advantage to this country, if constructed as a private enterprise, but not as a part of or a substitution for a part of the Canadian Pacific Railway. On the 27th December, 1872, the Globe said:

"Like Sir Hugh Allan, the Gazette displays an almost gushing fondness for the Northern Pacific. It points out that the Canada Central has taken powers to extend to Sault Bte. Marie; that having crossed the Sault by a bridge, it would then, by the aid the Northern Pacific is willing to afford, be united by a line to that at Duluth; that the said railway from Duluth to Pembina approaches completion; that a charter has been granted to the Central Pacific (Canadian) line which will connect Pembina with Fort Garry; and that it is then a simple business proposition that the read should be pushed forward from Fort Garry to the Rocky Mountains."

Then, after the quotation, the paper goes on to say——

An hon. MEMBER. What quotation?

Mr. WHITE. It is a quotation strongly in favor of the railway as a private enterprise, as likely to advance very largely the interests of the country.

"That is to say, the trade of our own North-West, to carry which the Canadian Pacific Railway is mainly to be built, and also the traffic of the States the Northern Pacific passes through, are to be brought to the Sault and thence by Canadian lines to Montreal. And yet Sir Hugh is all the time the trusted agent for building the Canadian Pacific through Canadian territory."

Then, on the 1st February, 1873, the Globe said:

"The Gazette does not, of course, honestly admit that the whole scheme of John A. has gone to smash. It pretends, notwithstanding its previous admissions, that the terms with British Columbia must be observed, and that the railway must pass through British territory. But what does it say next? Why, it goes into a glowing description—jnst as Sir Hugh Allan did at Peterboro'—of a railway, not through British territory, but a rival American line—in short, the Northenn Pacific from Duluth to Pembina—as the right and proper substitute for the grand undertaking that was to unite the railway system of Canada with the Pacific. The line, says the Gazette, from Duluth to Pembina is now built, and a short branch from the latter point to Fort Garty would afford immediate connection by rail with Manitoba. From Duluth no one can very well make out. But this is clear enough, John A. and his organs are not going to build the Canadian Pacific Railway."

These are statements in the Toronto Globe to prove that the construction of this railway meant the abandonment of the Canadian Pacific Railway; that the abandonment of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the construction of this railway, meant the handing over for all time the interests of this country to an American corporation, and the preventing of this country getting immigrants into the North-West, in conse quence of their having to pass over an American line.

"And what is the position this co-partnership with the Northern Pacific places us in? It is not merely the fact that the one line may prove appowerful competitor. By no means, but that at every stage the Canadian Pacific may be thwarted and embarrassed by men who have a great stake in the Northern Pacific, and must play their own game at all hazards. * * If this scheme is carried out, our national enterprise, instead of being the successful rival of the American company, competing for the Asiatic trade, which is now in its infancy and building up the Dominion, as no other undertaking will do, will simply be the Canadian bianch of the Northern Pacific Railroad, entirely under its control, and dictated to by it relentlessly."

These were the views of the Globe at that time. Now, I have said that the Toronto Globe then was not simply a newspaper. To quote from the opinions of a newspaper on a serious discussion of this kind, might not be a proper thing to do; but this quotation is not from the Toronto Globe as a newspaper, but it is a statement of the acknowledged leader of the Liberal party at that time. There was a dinner given in Toronto in the beginning of 1873, at the very time these articles were appearing in the Globe, and that meeting was presided over by the late Hon. George Brown. The hon, member for Lambton, who was called on to respond for the House of Commens, made this clear, statement as to his submission in the matter of leadership to the hon, gentleman who was the editor of the Globe, and who was responsible for the opinions I have just given:

"When he rose, being called upon first by the chairman of the meeting to address the audience, he did not do so in the character of one entitled to speak for the Commons of Canada further than an individual member. It was quite true that his hon. friend, Mr. Blake and himself, were obliged, under the circumstances of the case, in consequence of a slight accident that occurred in South Ontario in 1867, to take the front benches; but it was in no other position than as simple members of the Liberal party that they had taken these seats, and had endeavored, in the absence of their then leader, to maintain the position of their party, and to unite the scattered fragments after the disastrous election of 1867."

So that at the very time this position was being taken in relation to the Sault Ste. Marie, as a substitute or competitor in any sense of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the hon, member for Lambton, speaking for himself and the present hon. member for West Durham, declared that they sat on the front benches simply in consequence of an accident, and to keep the place warm for the leader of the party to whom they acknowledged allegiance at that time. But not only was this condemned at that time. We had only last year an appeal from the hon. member for West Durham, to the members from the Province of Quebec, in relation to this very question, of the abandonment of the Lake Superior section. The quotation is a long one, and I shall not detain the House by reading it, because I want to get through before six o'clock, But the statement made was to the effect that the people of Quebec had expended $11,000,000 on their railway as a part of the Canadian Pacific Railway, to connect with the eastern section, on the faith that that eastern section would be built, and the hon, gentleman asked members from the Province of Quebec to realize what would be their position if they permitted expenditures to be made in British Columbia to the detriment or postponement of the eastern section of the Canadian Pacific Railway. It was only last year that this appeal was made, yet the hon, gentleman now tells us we should reject this contract because for sooth, it includes the construction of that very portion of the railway. There is no doubt that the portion of this railway over the prairie section from Red River westward could be built very much more cheaply than the subsidy allotted to it in the contract, if it stood alone. But it does not stand alone. It stands as a part of the whole enterprise, and the subsidies given for the whole enterprise are not in excess of those which, according to the statements and calculations made by hon, gentlemen opposite last year, the construction of this railway would cost. But, Sir, on its merits, will you pretend to say that we ought not to build this railway through British Columbia, and north of Lake Superior? One of the most painful features connected with public discussions in this House has been the disposition to depreciate the country itself; but things have somewhat changed in this case as to one part of the country. Last year even the rich fields of the North-West were depreciated in character, depreciated in quantity and in value, because at that time it was necessary to appeal to the fears of the people in relation to the Canadian Pacific Railway. This year we have attacks made upon the other sections of the country through which this railway passes. We have had the same thing in reference to almost every public enterprise in Canada so far as I can remember. I remember years ago, when I lived in Peterboro', the late Sheriff Conger started a proposal to open up colonization roads into the back country, including the Bolcaygeon, Opeongo, Victoria and Hastings roads, and others of that kind, and how he was met by opposition and assertions that it would be constructing roads through an inhospitable country where there was nothing but rocks and swamps, and where nobody could live. The discussion on the point went on for some time; he got into Parliament meantime, and I remember that it was with great reluctance the Government that the member for West Durham gave it as his opinion, could be induced to bring down a vote for that purpose the other night, that the letter written to the Government what has been the result? In those very districts, in their soft no value as medifying, in any way, the contract. I rear of Ontario, then denounced as utterly unfit for settle ment, there are now new counties established, and along the line of the Bobcaygeon road, into which I saw the first . settler go, a district where it was held cruel to put a man, a new county now exists. I can remember as to the Hastings road, in rear of the constituency of the hon. the Minister of Customs, so far back as 1863, there was a township called Tudor; an election was going on at the time and the joke was, we had not heard from it, when there were but thirteen votes. But, to-day, upwards of 600 voters live in rear of that place in a district then considered utterly unsuitable for settlement. This habit of depreciation has marked the speeches of the Liberal party for years—the tone and tendency has been rather to favor an appeal to the fears than to the patriotism of the people. They prefer to dwell on the immediate present, or the possibilities of the immediate future, rather than the possibilities and the bright prospects of the greater future. They appear determined to prevent the success of great enterprises, because they involve some expenditure and challenge defence on the part of those who undertake to make them. The same thing was said, or the same course followed, in regard to the Central Pacific Railway, when it was started; and yet I see by the last addition of Poor's work, he uses the following words:-

"When the roads were opened, the whole extent of country traversed by them was a vast waste, almost wholly without people or industries. It has since been found that the sterility of the soil is amply compensated by the richness of the mineral deposits which are everywhere being discovered, and which, though we have hardly scratched the surface, have placed the United States in the foremost rank among the gold and silver producing countries of the world." • • • The whole Rocky Mountain in the product of the surface, when the surrection of the world." • • • The whole Rocky Mountain in the product of the world." • • • • The whole Rocky Mountain in the product of the world." tain range is now known to be surpassingly rich in the precious metals, and is being everywhere traversed by branch lines, built by means largely supplied by the Pacific railroads."

That was the experience and result of the construction of a railway through a country so sterile that no one would think of going into it—through a country which, measured by the only test hon, gentlemen opposite seem disposed to apply in dealing with a country, its grain producing character, was utterly worthless. Yet it has produced such large revenues, so great an enhancement of values and increase of population, that branch lines now permeate every part of that region in connection with the very Pacific Railway that was constructed under the subsidies granted for the purpose. Another objection made to this scheme is the distribution of the subsidy. We are told that too much money has been given to the central section, that it could be constructed for very much less. If it was a question of building only that central section, I would say the subsidy was too great. But in the very nature of things, hon, gentlemen opposite ought to see that the Syndicate cannot sell their lands immediately or people the country immediately. It will be a gradual process, and the object of giving a large subsidy to that section is to develop it most rapidly. The railway through it can be constructed with greater rapidity, and people should be sent into it in order that the revenue to be derived from the sale of lands may be used in the construction of the other sections. It is a matter of utter indifference how the subsidies are apportioned so long as there are guarantees for the construction of the whole line—that is the important part. The apportion of subsidies to the central section is simply such as will enable the Syndicate to construct the railway through it, and to derive a revenue from its development by means of this railway, which will enable them to go on with other parts of the road successfully and comparatively rapidly. Then we have another objection, and that is as to the standard of the railway. I fancy that objection has been pretty well disposed of. It is quite true that the member for Wost Durham gave it as his opinion, am bound to say there is no professional gentleman in Canada, for whose opinion the public at large, and I myself. would have greater respect if we were getting it from him, as a professional man, and in return for a fee, in any ordinary matter. But we have seen enough of the hon. gentleman here to know that his opinion, as a political man, as leader of the Opposition, is not very valuable, and such it was the other night in relation to the statement of the hon, member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert.) Will anyone pretend to tell us that the impression the hon. gentleman left on the mind of the House was not, that in his opinion, as a lawyer, the Courts could not enforce this contract.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. WHITE. I am not speaking of the precise words he used. What I mean to say is this: that when an hon. gentleman, holding the position in the profession that he holds, guards himself carefully, by the use of a certain form of words, from committing himself to opinions that may come back on him, who, in order to save himself from the imputation of giving a certain professional opinion, uses words of a nature to create an impression entirely different, and which may be variously construed—he is not entitled to the respect of the House in relation to any opinion he may give as a lawyer. It is all very well for hon, gentlemen opposite to say "oh, oh;" that is their only method of answering my remark. But I will add that no man, in my opinion, has sunk lower than the member for West Durham from the manner in which he draggled his great reputation through the mire in the interest of his party, by giving his opinion in such a way as to convey an impression entirely different from his real conviction, on the occasion. Suppose that the letter is of no value. What The Syndicate have to build this railway and work it. I venture to think, myself, that the statement of the contract, "as first constructed," means, as first completed, and, not, while in course of construction—that this must be taken to be the fair meaning of it. But, Sir, whether that be its meaning or not, the guarantee which the people of this country have, is that the road must be built and operated and maintained by this Syndicate. What has been the course all through this debate? We have fallen back to the excessively low estimate made by the Minister of Railways in relation to the possible first constructing cost of the railway as a colonization railway. What is meant by a colonization railway? What has been the history of railways all through the Western States? That whole country has been populated by means of what are called colonization railways—a cheap construction at first, but involving almost immediately the strengthening of the railway, the constant strengthening of the railway, until by the time it is six, eight or ten years in existence it is as strong, as well constructed, as sufficiently equipped in all respects, as those which cost in the first place $40,000, $50,000 or $100,000 a mile in other parts of the country. I have always been in favor of building the road across the prairies as a cheap colonization railway, not because it would ultimately save in the cost of constructing the railway, but because it would open a way by which to get the people into the country, because it would afford the means of getting traffic for the railway; and the means of strengthening and building up the railway by the gradual development of the resources of the country. And every dollar expended in strengthening the road afterwards is a dollar to be added to original capital account and practically to the original cost of construction. And when hon, gentleman take these low estimates of the Minister of Railways as to what could be done if we were building the railway for a colonization railway across Mr. WHITE (Cardwell).

that cost, before they could get it thoroughly equipped in a thorough condition of efficiency, as a result of people going in and affording traffic for the road, the cost of construction will be infinitely greater; and I venture to say that at the end of ten years, when the honest capital account expended in construction by the Syndicate comes to be enquired into, it will be found that although the price at first of building the road across the prairies was only $10,000 per mile, the ultimate cost will be $20,000 a mile, or more. There is no person who knows anything about the railways of the Western States, no person who has studied their history, but knows that they have been constructed in the way I have described. They have been built cheaply at first, and in consequence of that cheap construction the country and its resources have been developed, the traffic of the railway has been developed, and these companies have expended large sums in strengthening and perfecting their roads. objection which has been raised to the contract is that of the exemption from duty. Now, Sir, the exemptions from duty, whatever may be the amount (and it is not necessary here to enter into elaborate calculations which all know can only be estimates), but whether we take this amount to be the $100,000 mentioned by the Minister of Railways on the report of practical experts of his department, or the $1,000,000 mentioned by the member for West Durham on account of the additional bolts and spikes used in the construction of wooden bridges-whatever the amount may be—the exemption is after all but a concession to the Company, and in one sense an addition to the subsidy; but an addition which lessens, to the extent of it, be it greater or be it less, the cost of the railway, and lessens them for the amount which will have to be earned by the Company before the tolls can be reduced upon it. The exemption from duty of the few articles which will be used in the original construction practically therefore amounts to nothing.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. It applies to the branches. Mr. WHITE. To all the branches in the North-West? Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. It applies to them for ever.

Mr. WHITE. Not at all. The hon gentleman is mistaken. but I am not going to divert my argument to answer him on that point at present. Hon. gentlemen say that the Government should build the railway. That is their latest statement, though up to a recent period they held that it should be built by a company. But suppose it was built by the Government, would there be any duty on these articles? If it was built by the Government every locomotive, every car, every bit of equipment for all time would come into the country free of duty; but by giving the Company this exemption on the few articles used on the original construction of the railway, the Company getting the railway will find themselves afterwards compelled to pay the duty on ever single article of equipment, not only for the railway they build but for the pertions of the road handed over to them by the Government, which they will have to equip immediately. I know, Sir, that when the contract was first published, the newspapers did not hesitate to say that this exemption applied to everything, equipment and everything else, and there was undoubtedly a very serious feeling with regard to that supposed provision; but when it became understood that it applied only to a certain limited number of articles—for steel rails cannot possibly be included, for there can be no possibility of our having mills for the manufacture of steel rails for sometime to come-I say when this became known the feeling entirely changed. We have had an announcement from the Government that legislation will be introduced to protect the manufacturers from any injury on account of this provision, and I am satisfied when the contract is let, when the Company the prairies, and apply them to this Syndicate, we must begin the work of construction, when factories, under the remember that although they may build the railway at legislation which the hon. gentlemen will bring down, are busily at work furnishing bolts, spikes, etc., there will be no more talk about this exemption from duty, and every one will feel that in consequence of this arrangement, in consequence of the more rapid construction of the railway, and the greater amount of everything required to build it, ne injury but good has been done in connection with the conditions of the contract. But we are told further that the railway is to be exempted from taxation. That is quite true. It is to be exempted in those parts of the country where the Government at this moment have control. But in the Province of Ontario, which, if the hon gentlemen are right in their view of the boundary question, will extend near the Province of Manitoba, the exemption will not take place; it will not take place within the Province of Mani obs nor the Province of British Columbia, but only on about 1,000 miles across the prairie, which does not include one single important terminal point where there would be elevators or storehouses or any other thing of that kind necessary for working the railway. It includes simply that portion of the prairie section where there will be nothing but ordinary station houses along the line. Now, what does the exemption amount to? It is a subsidy—if you like which the people of that part of the country will give the railway when they go in. And how does that compare with the subsidies which have been given in other parts of the Dominion? Everyone knows the generous subsidies given by municipalities in Ontario towards the construction of railways. At first it was attempted to be shown that it was an exceptional state of things. I shall not take up the time of the House by quoting from the laws of the United States exempting railways of a similar class from the taxation from which they are here exempted. But the practical experience of, perhaps, the most practical people on the face of the world, is to the effect that it is not an unreasonable thing to give to their railways, that are going to open up and people the country, a small advantage in the way of exemption from taxation. Then we are told that there is to be exemption from the taxation of the land. That is quite true, so long as the lands are in the hands of the Company, during twenty years. But what would be the position if hon. gentlemen opposite had had their way, and had let a contract under the Act of 1874? Why, of the 50,000,000 acres of subsidy which it was proposed to give then, we would have had 36,000,000 acres retained in the hands of the Government to be sold by the Government, and the proceeds to be handed over to the Company, free from the cost of administration. Hon. gentlemen opposite actually proposed in that Act that, as to the 36,000,000 acres of subsidy, there should be absolute freedom from taxation, not for twenty years but for all time, or until they were sold and the proceeds of the sale handed over to the Company. But after all what does this question of exemption mean? Is it the taxation on the land and the taxation of the roadbed? If the Company had to pay these large sums of money—and the larger the amount the more the argument applies-would simply have been so much more added to the working expenses of the railway; and every one understands that the working expenses of a railway come out of the people who are served by that railway. There would have been, in that case, simply a larger sum of money to be deducted as working expenses, before there could be any question of a reduction of rates under the clauses in the charter by which that may take place under certain circumstances. So that one would imagine, reading the debates that have occurred in this House with reference to this matter of taxation, that it was the Syndicate who were going to pay this taxation out of their own pocket. They are going to pay it out of the taxation. It relieves the Company from what undoubtedly might be an embarrassment in the floating of their land bonds. If any one were to get up and say that these lands were subject to taxation, and that taxation might be so great as to impair the value of the lands to the person who had loaned money upon them as security, it might seriously have affected the success of the whole enterprise, while in reality it amounted to so little, as the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) pointed out the other night, as really to be an unappreciable quantity, and whatever it is, it is simply a question of the reduction of the running expenses of the railroad. Then another objection is that there is a monopoly of branches. Well, Sir, as far as the monopoly of branches is concerned, I fancy that no one in that country will ever object to this railway running a branch line from the main line into the country which it is going to serve. The more branches they build the better for the country. But there is no proposition in this contract that the Government shall give subsidies for the construction of these branches. It is simply a permission to these gentlemen, that, in order to make their leading enterprise pay; in order to make the main line of the railway a paying line, they may construct branches to it, in order to bring down the traffic of the country upon that railway. That is the whole proposition. Yet we find hon. gentlemen trying to arouse public alarm and indignation, because there is a provision made by Parliament that will enable the people, out of their own money, with their own means, to permeate the whole North-West with a gridiron of railways. I am bound to say that that is the most extraordinary argument that I ever heard. There is no monopoly of the branches. There is nothing in this Act to prevent the Government of this country from giving charters for branches in every part of that country, with one single exception. They may give charters wherever they please. This Parliament could next year, or even now, reintroduce the Act of the hon, member for Bothwell, of 1878, giving to any person who thought proper to come forward and deposit their plan, not only a right to build a branch railway. but in addition to give them a subsidy for the building of it. Parliament is in no way, restrained by this portion of the contract from granting charters for the building of these branches.

Mr. MILLS. Hear, hear.

Mr. WHITE. Does the hon, gentleman say we are restrained?

Mr. MILLS. Ye.

Mr. WHITE. We are restrained from giving a charter for branches to within fifteen miles of the boundary, south of the railway-only in a particular direction. But the charge hon gentleman make is that this railway is going to run too far south; they are making the charge against the Company, that they are going to deflect it to the south, so that the question of branches to the south will be of no consequence at all. It is the question of branches north of the railway that will be of consequence; and it is open to this Government next year or this year to reintroduce the Bill of the hon. gentleman for Bothwell to enable any person that chooses to go in there and build branches and give them subsidies to do it, if we think proper. But, Sir, will any one pretend to say that it is not infinitely better that the branch railway should be in the hands of the main line than in the hands of other companies? Every one understands that traffic arrangements, facilities for carrying passengers, and everything connected with the working of the railway, will be infinitely better when the branch lines are in the hands of the main line than when they are in proceeds of the railway, and these proceeds are going to be constant conflict with the main line. We all know that made up from the payments of people to the railway, and difficulties are constantly arising between railways under therefore it is simply a question of paying it in another way.

That is precisely the whole question of exemption from except as to that one point, and as to that one point what does it amount to? What was the policy of this Parliament only last Session? We determined in the Railway Committee—and the Railway Committee may be said to be Parliament as it includes at any rate one half the members of Parliament, and perhaps the most influential halt, if one part may be said to be more influential than another—in the Railway Committee we had an announcement by the Minister of Railways that the policy of the Government was not to give charters for railways unless they ran in a particular direction south of the main line. That policy was adopted. But, say hon. gentlemen, there was nothing in that policy to prevent their crossing the line. True, but the policy of this contract is -and it is a wise policy, as the future will prove-that the railway company going through that territory shall be able for the next twenty years, for the purpose of building up their own line and the opening up the country, to build branch lines as well to do efficiently the work of the people Why, no greater curse can befall a community than to have a poor, miserable, inefficient railway traversing it. What was the effect with regard to this very railway of which we have heard so much in this House, the St. Paul and Manitoba Railway? Until the gentlemen who have now possession of it took control of it, that railway had gone down from year to year until it was unable to do the work of the country through which it passed. In another year, probably, it would have stopped altogether. It was inefficient in every respect and unable to perform the work required of it. Those gentlemen got possession of it less than four years ago, a broken down railway 400 miles long. What have they done since? They have built 450 miles in branches and in extension of the main line. They have strengthened the railway and made it efficient, and although the charges upon that road are high—no one has said more than myself as to the charges upon that road being high-yet there is this to be said, they have used the high charges in creating an efficient railway, in extending it, both as to branches and as to the main line, and in developing largely the country through which that railway passes. That has been the history of that railway company. If you give a charter to a railway company to-day for the construction of a line over that prairie section, charged with the duty of developing that country and with building up traffic, and, at the same time, allowed railways to the south, which are hostile railways, and which have their own local traffic and traverse a country comparatively settled, to run their branches into the country and destroy the traffic of the prairie road, the result would be simply this: you must, in the nature of things, have a poor and inefficiently managed railway, a poor and inefficiently equipped railway, not an injury, because no railway can be an injury, but a serious inconvenience to the people whom it would serve. But we are told now that because of the fifteen miles there never can be any other railway into this country. To what does that apply? Simply to the territories over which the Dominion Parliament has control. There is nothing to prevent Manitoba now, if it thinks proper, granting a charter for a railway from Winnipeg to the boundary line. At this very moment there is a company in course of organization to build a railway from Winnipeg to West Lynn, on the boundary. And after this agreement is ratified, this provision does not take away from Manitoba a single right it possesses; in fact, this Parliament could not take away those rights. It has the same rights as the other Provinces for the incorporation of railway companies within the boundary of the Province itself, and there is nothing to prevent the Province of Manitoba from chartering a railway from Winnipeg to the boundary to connect with any southern railway. The only gnarantee which this Company has under the contract only gnarantee which this Company has under the contract Australia to take advantage of the present opportunity. Now was the is that their traffic shall not be tapped far west in the prairie time to people those fertile prairies so easily cultivated." Mr. WHITE (Cardwell).

section, thus diverting the traffic away from their line to a foreign line, but there is nothing to prevent a railway being built in Manitoba, within the Province, that would carry the traffic to any railway that may tap it from the American side. That is the position with respect to this matter. But what was the position of hon. gentlemen opposite in the Bill introduced by the hon, member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills)? What proposal did he make? It was this: When he introduced a Bill for branch lines—not branch lines to be built by the company having the main line, because he proposed at the very time that the Bill was introduced to subsidize a company for a main line with the subsidies to which I have already referred—when he proposed to grant large land subsidies to branch lines, what did he do? He actually inserted a clause in that Bill that no railways running parallel with the Pacific Railway should be subsidized or permitted to obtain a charter under that Bill, if it ran within forty miles of the railway, thus actually laying down the doctrine in that Railway Bill that the main line ought at least to have a fair assurance that the traffic of the country to be developed shall belong to it for a certain period of time. Sir, it is rather interesting to read the debates which occurred upon that branch Railway Bill of the hon. member for Bothwell. The hon, member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) said for instance:

"It was useless to think of opening up and settling this country without furnishing it with railways."

He referred to the wonderful results from the Illinois Central and railways in Iowa, and then said:

"Some of the railways had, perhaps, been subsidized more than was necessary, perhaps more land had been given than was advisable; but capitalists would not embark their money unless they had a prospect of a fair return, and it was folly to haggle with them about an unimportant difference when important interests were at stake."

That was the view of the hon. gentleman: it was useless, it would be folly to haggle with a company about the precise amount of the subsidy to be granted when important interests were at stake. Then the hon, gentleman on this same Bill and in relation to the importance of the same railway branches, referring to the value of land, said:

"Now in the North-West there were untold millions of acres of land.

But in its present shape, of what value was this great wild lone land to us?"

Again he said:

"The Government could never properly utilize that country, or get any adequate return for the money it had expended without adopting a policy of that kind. They had committed themselves to the building of a trunk line through that country. Were they going to do that and make no provision for feeders to bring traffic to that line?"

The hon, gentleman actually made it a charge against the Government, that they had made a proposition to build a trunk line, for which they offer a larger subsidy than is proposed by this contract, and then, they are going to leave it without feeders. The hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Trow), who is a good authority in respect to matters connected with the North-West-and I am bound to congratulate him for the patriotism which induced him at considerable inconvenience to make a run over the country in order to understand subjects connected with it-said:

"If the hon, gentleman took a walk to the Western Block of the buildings, and looked at the great map there, he would find that there were over 180,000,000 acres of arable land in the North-West territories. The railway companies would not absorb more than from 12,000,000 to 13,000,000 out of the 18,000,000 acres fit for cultivation. He knew of no country that required railway communication more than Manitoba and the North-West. Feeders were required in every direction to intersect the arable lands which extended for thousands of miles, and the moment that companies undertook to construct railways a tide of immigration would set in. Companies of that description had done more for the Western States of America than all the emigration agents the Government could have engaged. These railway companies agents the Government could have engaged. These railway companies had now thousand of agents in Europe, and it behaved the Government, if they wished to attract from Europe the surplus population going to

And then:

"No company or corporation would undertake to build a railroad in a country unless they had some encouragement, and no better encouragement could be given than grants of land which would increase in value the moment the railway was in running order."

The hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) had his say on this question. What did he say?

"If they referred to the policy of the United States, they would find that since 1852, 180,000,000 acres of land had been given by the American Government for the construction of the various railways, and the result of that was, perhaps, more largely than anything else, to develop and settle the United States. If they had stopped in 1820, and had not adopted this policy, instead of a population of 45,000,000 they would have had one under 30,000,000. Now we had the same opportunity as the Americans had possessed of disposing of our lands for the purpose of encouraging immigration, for the purpose of bringing into this country a consuming population that would add materially not only to its resources, but contribute to its revenue and give us that return to which we were entitled.

""What would be the effect of railways? What had been the effect of building railways in Ontario and the Western States? The green ridges of the Indiana line fetched $13.98; on the Burlington and Missouri, land sold for $11.70; on the Illinois Central, $11.40; the Chicago Rock Island and Pacific $7.53. The prices in the Western States varied from $4.15 to $13.98, the average price being $7.04 on the whole extent of land held by railway companies and the Government."

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. WHITE. Hon. gentlemen opposite say "hear, hear," in relation to those large prices; but at the very time the hon. gentleman made this speech there was an Act on the Statute-book and an advertisement in the newspapers asking tenders under the proposal to give 50,000,000 of acres of land for the main line, and, under the Bill of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), thirteen or fourteen millions more. Was there any question that because the lands in the United States had realized so much money, therefore we ought not to give so much land.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). In what year was that?

Mr. WHITE. In 1878. Another objection made to this contract is as to the rates that may be charged by this company. Well, Sir, I have asked a good many gentlemen-I have asked some railway men who ought to know some thing about this subject, whether they could give us any form of words which would enable us to regulate the rates differently from the way they are regulated in this contract, and I have failed to find any one who could. In fact, the new Syndicate have actually adopted substantially the same form relating to rates. If we had made a statutory statement that there should be only a certain rate charged per ton per mile, hon. gentlemen would say at once that that must be applied to the short mileage in the very nature of things; and in that case, applied to the long mileage, it would be an intolerable rate. There are three ways in this contract of limiting the rates: First, by a tariff fixed by the Government before any tolls could be collected at all; next, by a clause in a Statute, limiting the charges by a certain rate of profit realized on the money invested; last, and most effective of all, by the knowledge these people must have that they cannot make this railway a success if they oppress the people with intolerable rates. Sir, they have to fill up that country. They are not building a railway through a country where large interests have been established; they are building a railway through a country which is, to-day, practically uninhabited. They are building a railway for the purpose of bringing people in there, which they will have to do in competition with American companies which have lands to settle on the other side of the line. They will have to do that in the face of the statement of hon. gentlemen opposite, that they are oppressing the people of that country, which will be their strongest obstacle. But to say that these people will deliberately establish such rates as will put them out of competition altogether with the American companies that have lands to sell, and as will make it impossible for settlers to got !

in there, is to my mind to assume that they are not sane men. These men can only develop that country by making it in the interest of the people to go and live there, and they will only make it in the interest of the people to go and live there by such an arrangement of rates as will bear fair comparison with those of the railway system of the other side. Under these circumstances I venture to say that there is nothing to be feared in relation to this matter. The interest of the Company is in every respect the best guarantee that their rates will not be exhorbitant. Now, we have a new contract before us. I expressed my opinion about that the other night, and I have nothing to withdraw from what I said then I believe, from letters I have received since from all parts of the country, that that statement struck the popular heart. It is not often that this is the case, but I believe the people of this country realized that this offer is a political dodge. I am not going to do more with reference to that than allude to the statement which is made that the makers of that offer have put up $1,400,000. I have heard the story that two members of the Syndicate, both important members of it, undoubted men of wealth. stated on Monday last that they had been incited to this course, because of the few remarks I ventured to offer to the House, and that after I ventured to denounce the thing as a political dodge, they undertook to show in that way that it was not so. That, I believe, was the statement of Mr. Gibson and Mr. Maclaren; I do not hesitate to mention their names. That same night, the hon, member for Centre Huron undertook to say, incorrectly and though not untruthfully in the sense that he believed it to be untrue, yet untruthfully in fact, that I had been put up by the Government for the purpose of making that statement. If it were true that the Government took that view of the question—and I am glad to know that they have taken it since—there was no possibility of this contract having any chance in Parliament; and the moment that became apparent, these gentlemen rushed to the telegraph office, and telegraphed to the manager of the Bank of British North America to put up their deposit. and they both say that would not have been done but for that speech. But Sir, we have an amendment presented to us, and I am bound to say that a more extraordinary amendment never was submitted to this House or any other Parliament. If the amendment were true in fact, as to some of its propositions, it would not be so bad. But, how any hon, member of this House can deliberately record his name under some of the statements made in this amendment, I am at a loss to understand. In the first place, the amendment is a history as well as an amendment. It contains twenty-six paragraphs to prove that this contract has not been made under the Act of 1874. Well, I am not aware that it has been made under the Act of 1874. If it were, it would become law by lying on the Table of the House for a month; but, we are discussing it for the very purpose of making it law.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. The hon. the Minister of Railways said it was made under the Act of 1874.

He said he had the right to make it under the Act of 1874. But, if it was made under that Act it would be law now, and there would be no need of our discussing it. In, the first place here is one statement:

"By the contract the cash expenditure of the Government, as principal money of which the contractors received the benefit, is to be in cash and works to be handed over to the contractors, at least $53,000,000, apart from the cost of surveys which do not form part thereof."

Now, the hon. gentleman knows that the $1,600,000 for surveys do form a part.

Mr. BLAKE. These are for engineering expenses, not for surveys.

Mr. WHITE. Will the hon, gentleman pretend to say that he has deliberately put into the amendment submitted to Parliament a misleading statement of that kind? If anything could justify the remarks I made a while ago on that statement it is this: I ask whether any man reading that statement will not assume that it means the engineering expenses connected with the road.

Mr. BLAKE. No.

Mr. WHITE. It does not mean the cost of surveys for lands undoubtedly. What it means is that $1,600,000, the expense of engineering surveys, are not included in that amount.

Mr. BLAKE. No.

Mr. WHITE. Then we have the statement about the land grant. There are a number of such statements in it which are misleading, if not absolutely untrue. But I find, Mr. Speaker, that it approaches six o'clock, and I must forego further criticism of the amendment. The statement I have just pointed out every hon. member will say is, at least, misleading. It is intended to mean one thing, but, as I stated a moment ago, with regard to the legal opinions delivered in political interest by the hon, gentleman on the floor of Parliament, it is constructed in such a way as to enable them to get out of it when necessary. What is the position, then, in which we stand? We have this contract before us, which gives us the opportunity of carrying on the construction of this railway. The people have looked forward to its construction for years. Hon, gentlemen opposite varied their position in regard to this question almost every Session, at any rate since they went out of office, according as the exigencies of the political position required. But the people understand it all. They know well that this is the last struggle of hon. gentlemen opposite to get back to the Treasury benches. They understand that, for the last three years, having denounced the Government in relation to the National Policy-and in the newspapers only, however-and in relation to the administration of public affairs, they have now come to the conclusion that unless they can get some new lever, their chances of success are gone, and they have adopted this as their last resource. They will be deceived in this as they have been in everything else. What has been the effect of the late appeal to the people? What has been the result of the public meetings? The hon, member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), procured, when political exigencies required it, before the Government of 1873 went out, the presentation of infinitely more petitions in favor of a Maine liquor law than have been presented against this contract as the issue of the public appeals of hon. gentlemen opposite. And the very next year not a single petition was presented in favor of a Maine liquor law because political exigences no longer required it. Almost every independent organ of public opinion in this country-I use the word independent as distinguished from party organs—has pronounced in favor of this contract submitted by the Government, and those papers have struck the chord of popular sentiment on this subject. I know from letters I have personally received that the feeling in Canada is that it would be an enormous relief to get rid of the whole thing as a Government work, and that the new Syndicate, as it is called, is not acting in good faith, with a view to construct the railway, but has been simply got up to embarrass or upset the Government. Realizing my responsibility as a member of Parliament, I have no hesitation in saying that I shall vote against this amendment. It is a matter of comparatively little consequence whether the right hon. member for Victoria or the hon. member for West Durham is at the head of the Government or administering the ordinary affairs of the country; but the two parties represent distinct and separate policies on the two great questions of the day. On this side we represent Mr. WHITE (Cardwell).

American territory, which is to be subservient and tributary for all time to American railways, and would render our communications between the two portions of the Dominion subject to be cut off at any moment by the mere act of a foreign legislature; and they represent the policy of a one-sided free trade which would submit the interests of this country to a slaughtering process by foreign manufacturers. That is the distinction between the two parties. I have no hesitation in saying that I believe that the people will realize in the future, as they have realized in the immediate past, as well at the elections of 1874, that the true interests of the country will be found in sustaining the hon, gentlemen who have brought prosperity to this Dominion, who have set the machinery of its industries in motion, and who have accomplished the work that baffled public men in the past, the result of which will be to give us a highway from one end of the Dominion to the other, and build up a great British nationality on this North American continent.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. CASEY. If, at this late period of the debate, I choose to begin my remarks by following, to some extent only, the tracks of the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), who has just spoken, it is not with the wish to give any undue prominence to that gentleman's speech, or to indicate that I consider it an authoritative exposition of the policy of the Government, but simply because he has given a very fair resumé of nearly all that has been said by the leaders on his side of the House; and he has done so, no doubt, with the instinct of a clever journalist, picking out those particular points which he supposes to be most popular with the country. I did not hear all of that speech, but about the first point I caught was the statement that when the hon, member for West Durham was quoting from the speech of the Minister of Railways, of last Session, in regard to an offer which he said was made, or which he knew he could get for the building and maintenance of the road west of Red River, that the hon. gentleman had not quoted enough of it, that he should have quoted the figures—$10,000 a mile and 26,000,000 acres. The hon. gentleman went on to state that it was clear that the present contract was infinitely better than the one which the Minister of Railways was then sufficiently sensuring to hope for that it was better than the most sanguine to hope for—that it was better than the most sanguine expectations of the most sanguine Minister; for he wished to lead the House to believe that it would have cost more to build the road on those terms than on the terms now before the House. Let us test this statement in the light of correct calculations; $10,000 a mile for 1,350 miles, would be $13,500,000, and 26,000,000 acres, at $1 an acre, which I take for the purpose of comparison, and as being the price hon. gentlemen opposite now wish to put upon these lands, would raise that sum to $39,500,000, to be given in cash and land for building the road between Red River and the Rocky Mountains, and operating all the road west of Red River. Suppose they had gone on to complete the whole of the road, now proposed, on the estimates given last year by the Minister of Railways, it would have cost $9,000,000 to build the Yale and Kamloops Branch, and $3,500,000 that from Yale to Port Moody, and $19,500,000 to build the eastern section, thus making a total of $72,500,000. Under the terms now before the flouse we are to give $25,000,000, and 25,000,000 acres, which, at $1 an acre, makes a total of $50,000,000 in cash and land; we have also to give the completed sections of the road, estimated, last year, to cost $36,500,000, making a total of $86,500,000. This is $14,000,000 more than the road would have cost the policy of a national railway and a National Policy. On if the Ministerial anticipations of last year had been that side they represent the policy of a railway through realized, and if Government had been able to build

Winnipeg westward on the terms the road from they then expected. So this first point that I caught of the speech of the member for Cardwell utterly falls to the ground. Instead of this contract being infinitely better than that which the sanguine Minister hoped last year to obtain, it is worse to the extent of $14,000,000, which, in a country like this, will not be considered a small amount. The hon, gentleman went on to tell us that the Company would have to furnish, on the estimate of the hon. member for West Durham, $25,000,000 of their own capital for the construction of the road. I did not so understand it, either from the hon, gentleman's speech or from the contract. I think it is generally admitted that the grants of land and money are expected, both by the Government and the Company, to pay the whole cost of the construction of the road. It is admitted that they will ultimately receive three or four prices for the prairie section, and we cannot doubt that they will push it faster than the difficult sections. Then the hon, member for Cardwell came to a point extremely important, if true—that we now get a certainty as to what the road will cost—that we get rid of all suspicion, of corruption or jobbery, or accusations of this kind against the Ministry, which shall have control of this great work; that we get rid of all uncertainty, not only as to the cash price, but also as to the manner in which the road will be managed. That is most important if true. It would be a benefit almost sufficient itself to decide the country in favor of the contract; for, in reference to this affair, the strength of the Government lies in their weakness. Having regard to the past transactions in reference to this railway, and judging from the revelations made under the Commissioners of the present Government, who have been sitting for some time, the impression has gone abroad in the country, and I believe among both parties, that the present Ministers are likely to be expensive managers of Pacific Railway construction. Whether they are charged with anything worse than extravagance might depend to some extent, perhaps, on the party leanings of the individuals forming an opinion. But there appears to be a general opinion that the road in Ministerial hands will be very expensive. I have no doubt that the speech of the member for West Durham last Session, showing the extravagance already committed by the Government's undertaking unnecessary and extremely costly portions of that work, when we could have afforded to do without them, had considerable effect in creating this opinion throughout the country. Acting on this opinion, that it would be unsafe and unwise to leave this work in the hands of the present Ministry, they have undertaken to induce the country to accept the contract under the pretence-for it is nothing but pretence-that we shall thereby get finality as to the cost of the work. Do we get any such finality? I think the most hurried glance at the contract will show we do not. We get no finality, in the first place, as to what we are paying for the road. We know we are paying nominally $25,000,000 in cash for it, but we do not know even at what time we shall have to pay the different instalments. The contract provides that at any time when the contractors have built twenty miles they are to get a cash subsidy; again, when they choose to lay down a large quantity of steel rails and other materials of construction, the Government is to advance to the contractors 75 per cent of their cost. We thus do not know when tremendous drafts may be made on the Treasury for this purpose. We may remember à propos of this, a statement made by the Minister of Railways to a private contractor, who wished an advance on such materials, that he could not be the banker for the contractors. Now this scheme provides that the Government are to be the bankers for this huge corporate contractor, who is to build the Canadian Pacific Railway, and bankers on the most uncertain terms. We need not know unless when the computing the cost of the road, we should not consider Company chooses to inform us, when they might make these lands at their present value, but, they should rather be heavy sight drafts upon their bankers. Again, there is a proviso under that wonderful little sub-section D of the 9th clause, as to the issue of bonds, on which the Government are to guarantee interest for an uncertain time, at an unsettled rate. Under that clause I do not know what drafts may not be made on our resources, which we shall have to pay in addition to the $25,000,000. It appears certain, at all events, that we are not only to pay $25,000,000, but interest as if it were all due now. That is the only possible construction I can put on that clause which will enable us to arrive at any "actuarial estimate," such as the clause demands. So it seems we are actually uncertain as to what we are to pay in cash, though on the face of the contract it appears that the amount is $25,000,000. But when we come to the land grant, the uncertainty simply becomes huge. Any person who has heard the varying estimates put upon the value of the land in the course of this debate, must be certain that whether the land is valuable or not, members of this House, differ as to what figure should be put upon it by the acre. It has been valued all the way from $1 to $8 per acre. But we find that under the optional clause, the Company is absolutely empowered to take not only farming lands, but they may choose mineral lands-lands containing gold and silver, if such there be-and to take them outside the fertile belt if they cannot find them inside.

Mr. BOWELL. The contract does not say so.

Mr. CASEY. I shall read it and see what it does say:

"But should any of such sections consist in a material degree of land not fairly fit for settlement, the Company shall not be obliged to receive them as part of such grant, and the deficiency thereby caused and any further deficiency which may arise from the insufficient quantity of the land along the said portion of the railway, to complete the said 25,000,000 acres, or from the prevalence of lakes and water stretches in the sections granted (which lakes and water stretches shall not be computed in the acreage of such sections), shall be made up from other portions to be selected by the company in the tract known as the fertile belt, that is to say the land lying between parallels forty-nine and fifty-seven degrees of selected by the company in the tract known as the fertile belt, that is to say the land lying between parallels forty-nine and fifty-seven degrees of north latitude or elsewhere, at the option of the company, by the grant therein of similar alternate sections extending back twenty-four miles deep on each side of any branch line or lines of railway to be located by the company, and to be shown on a map or plan thereof deposited with the Minister of Railways; or of any common frontline or lines agreed upon between the Government and the Company, the conditions hereinbefore stated as to lands not fairly fit for 'settlement to be applicable to such additional grants. And the Company may, with the consent of the Government, select in the North-West Territories any tract or tracts of land not taken up as a means of supplying such deficiency. But such grants shall be made only from lands remaining vested in the Government."

The only limitation which is made is, that in the last resort some front line or lines are to be agreed upon between the Government and the Company, and I think it will be admitted that this clause leaves the selecting power just about as wide as it is possible to make it. Suppose that some of these gold and silver mines, upon which they might cast covetous eyes, should lie outside of the fertile belt, all they would have to do would be to locate a line not to build it—to these mineral lands, file a map with the Minister of Railways, and choose alternate blocks on each side of the located line, so that it is perfectly possible for them to get an absolute hold upon the most valuable resources of the country. Again, we have undertaken to extinguish the Indian title to all lands which the Company might select, and here again there is a huge uncertainty, for we have no idea of what that may cost. We have undertaken to give them free the land for their road-bed and the right of way, and we have no idea of that concession may cost us, for the Company may choose to locate their lines and secure the right of way through the valuable mineral lands to which I have referred. And. we must not forget that in giving away these lands we are just as truly paying out value as if we were giving the Company cash out of the Dominion Treasury. In considered at the price they would bring, when the road was completed, less what the Government would have to pay for building the line. I shall not enter into any calculations of the value of the land, additional to these which have been given, as my present object is simply to show that the cost of the road is vague and uncertain. But this is not the worst of it. The Government still undertakes the responsibility of constructing some of the most difficult parts of the road; and it is uncertain what they will cost. Again, the contract leaves frequent occasion for dispute between the Government and the Company as to the working of certain clauses, as for instance with regard to what is an "efficient operation" of the road. No tribunal is provided by which such a question may be settled-whether the number of trains which the Company may choose to run may be considered an efficient operation. Then there is the uncertainty so often pointed out with regard to the standard of construction. The hon, gentleman who is furnishing me with my text said on that subject that the question was settled by the letter which certain members of the Syndicate had sent in. He says that letter is merely an explanation of the words "when first constructed" and he points out that the Union Pacific was much improved after its first construction and that the words bind the Company to build such a road as the Union Pacific was when finally completed. It is perfectly plain that the Syndicate did not think so, because if they had they would have put in the words "when finally completed" or "as it is now," and it is perfectly plain they intended to draw a distinction between the two standards. As to this letter, with all due deference to the legal opinion of the member for Cardwell (Mr. White), I think the hon, member for West Durham is as good an authority as he is, and he has declared his opinion that the letter is not binding and does not constitute a part of the contract. It is reasonable enough to suppose that the letter is not part of the bargain, seeing that the contract had been laid on the Table of the House as a bargain which cannot be altered. If it is to be held as part of the contract both parties should formally assent to it and it should be embodied in the contract itself. It is absurd to suppose that a letter emanating from two or three members of that Syndicate should bind the Company as a whole to any amendment they choose to make in the charter. I need not go on to point out how many occasions for doubt and uncertainty there are in this contract. In clause 9 there is a provision for an arrangement between the Government and the Company as to certain terms; and in sub-section D of that clause there is a further matter of arrangement inserted, and the same is true of many other clauses. It offers constant opportunities for subsequent arrangement between the Government and the Syndicate. I ask what chance is there of any fair bargain being made between the Government and the Syndicate? The Government have taken care to make the Syndicate so powerful that it would be utterly impossible for them to treat with it on an independent footing. The Government would be placed more in the position of a weak dependency treating with another country, than in the position of a Government treating with an ordinary railway company. Then the hon, member for Cardwell went on to cite the Globe as an indicator of public opinion in regard to the building of the road at the time that some imaginary terms were announced from New York, those terms being that the Company was simply to build the road and then hand it over to the Government, with all the responsibility of running and maintaining it. He pointed out that the Globe objected to the responsibility of its maintenance being thrown on the Government when it appeared that the Company were actually being paid a larger price than the road would cost in order to induce them to maintain it. He considered that it was inconsistent for us, after that, to argue that there was any impropriety in handing the road over to the Com-lacesss to our own territory. He said what he advocated Mr. CASEY.

pany. Well, Sir, I think the objections urged by the Globe, at that time, are perfectly in point still. There is no inconus to paying the Company several prices for building the sistency between those objections and the objections made by road and then handing it over to them in perpetuity. was supposed at that time by the editor of the Globe, as by everybody else, was that the bargain would provide for building the road and operating it for ten years, for that was the hint given by the Premier in his first public utterance on his return to this country. It was thought not unreasonable to give to the Company something more than the cost of building the road to pay them for maintaining it during the first ten years, on account of the probable scarcity of traffic. But nobody imagined that the Company would be first paid for building the road, secondly paid for running it as long as it might be unprofitable, and, then, when it became profitable by reason of an increased population in that country, and became a paying road, that it should be handed over to the Company in fee simple forever. Then, Sir, after saying that he thought we had paid too much for the road, that we had got rid of a great liability, he said we were going to get returns in part for the money we had spent upon it, in the shape of Customs revenue from the settlers. He said the railway would bring in 1,000,000 settlers in a short time—I think he said ten years— each worth $3 a head as tax-payers, which, he said would be enough to liquidate our total liabilities in connection with the railway. A little while before he had been saying that it would cost to operate the road for the first ten years $6,000,000 a year over the revenue. This calculation he based upon some estimates of the hon. member for Lambton, which were probably correct at the time they were made. But supposing it did cost that much, if the Government had kept the road in their own hands they would only be at a loss of $3,000,000 a year, according to the hon. member's own calculations, for they would be getting in $3,000,000 a year from Customs revenue as against $6,000,000 a year to be paid for the working of the road, so that the reason for parting with the road on account of having to pay $6,000,000 a year for working expenses, is just half as strong as the hon. gentlemen wishes to make it; we would only lose half as much as he wished to make it appear we would lose. Then he comes to this much vexed question of building a branch to the Sault, and he quotes from the Globe again-for those hon. gentlemen are always sheltering themselves behind some quotation from the Globe-to show that it objected to the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway by Sir Hugh Allan in 18:2 by way of the Sault. As near as I could understand the quotation, the objection of the Globe was on the ground that Sir Hugh Allan was entrusted with building the Canadian Pacific Railway on Canadian territory, and that therefore he should not be allowed to build it by way of the Sault. I think that objection was sound. Sir Hugh Allan had at that time obtained a contract for building the Pacific Railway on a line north of Lake Superior, and the inference was that he intended to abandon that line entirely and build only to the Sault. I think, under those circumstances, when he was obtaining a certain price for building the road on a certain route, it would be absurd to absolve him from the condition of the contract. But my hon friend charged the party as well as the Globe with inconsistency because we now advocate the Sault Branch which the Globe at that time opposed; but shortly afterward he admitted that at the same time the Globe was attacking the Sault Branch, he and his newspaper were defending Sir Hugh Allan against the attacks of the Globe. If there was inconsistency on one side there was certainly inconsistency on the other. The hon. gentleman's inconsistency still continues, for I am informed that since the beginning of this month he has been urging the advisability of building a branch to the Sault, as a means of obtaining then was that this road could be built only by private enterprise, not by a company receiving a Government subsidy. I ask what difference it can make in the utility of that road whether it is built by a private company or as a Government enterprise? No matter whether it be built by a private company or by Government, it will give the people of the eastern Provinces access to our North-West, by a short all-rail route seven years sooner than if the road were built by the north of Lake Superior. I think the hon. member will have to admit that it will. I think he can scarcely claim to be acting in the interests of either his nominal constituents in Cardwell, or his real constituents in Montreal, when he urges us to reject any scheme which would secure the early building of that branch. But he goes on to give us a rehash of the usual bravado about having a line independent of the United States, their hosile intention, and all that sort of thing—about emigrants being entrapped by land speculators when passing through Michigan. You would imagine to hear the original of that rehash, and the rehash itself—that no gentleman on that side of the House ever thought of building the Sault route immediately and postponing indefinitely the route north of Lake Superior. It is worth while to read once again to this House the official opinion on that point of the Minister of Railways as given last year. The hon, gentleman admitted on that occasion that he had been previously hostile to this scheme, but that his opinions had since been totally changed. After speaking of the section of the line north of Lake Superior, he says:

the line north of Lake Superior, he says:

"It is now evident that the attention of the whole of this country is turned to the question of obtaining the shortest line of communication to our great North-West by Sault Ste. Marie. Hon. gentlemen opposite may remind us that, at one time, I entertained serious objections to going to Sault Ste. Marie, but the case is different to-day. " When I opposed the construction of the line to the Sault, it was at a time when we had no line under construction from Thunder Bay to Red River; but the moment the Government was committed to the building of that line, it was our duty to look for means by which we could make it productive What are those means? I have satisfied myself that the road, with its easy grade and cheap rate at which it will be able to bring down the products of the North-West, cannot possibly have a competitor. What would be the result of the extension of this road from Nipissing to the Sault Ste. Marie? The distance from Montreal to Winnipeg via Unicago is 1,741 miles. But, suppose a road were built to St. Paul along the south shore of Lake Superior, the distance by that route would be 1,563 miles. By Duluib, the shortest line to be obtained by way of the United States, would be 1,514 miles. From Montreal to Nipissing, and thence to Thunder Bay and on to Winnipeg, the distance would be 1,358 miles, while by the Sault Ste. Marie and water communication from Goulais Bay to Thunder Bay it would be only 1,288 miles."

He there puts the whole question in very concise and neat

He there puts the whole question in very concise and neat language; but his position there is certainly very strange after his official declaration this year that he is very much afraid of this route to the Sault. In explaining the language he formerly used, he, this year, said:

"The position I take is, that if the line was to be built by the Sault Ste. Marie—and I was ready and prepared to support the construction of that line—if it was the only means, for the next twenty years, of having communication with the North-West, when we believed we had it in our power to secure the construction of a through line of railway, I-opposed it because I wanted a national line. When the time came, I opposed it because I wanted a national line. When the time came, that, under the management of hon, gentlemen opposite, the conditions of this country became such that we could not hope to grapple with the work for a long time to come, we thought that if we were to be deprived of any railway communication with the North-West, if there was no other means for the next twenty years of filling up that fertile plain with a large and industrious population, we were willing to attempt the Sault Ste Marie line. But now we have the means in our grasp of constructing a national line on terms such as the most sanguine man in this country did not believe possible a few months ago, and it would be treason to our country not to earry out that national line which is required, even if the Sault Ste. Marie line were built to-morrow."

That was his explanation this year of his reasons for favoring the building of the Sault Ste. Marie line last year; but I say this explanation is contradicted by his statement of last year. It certainly seems to my mind almost scandalous, that hon. Ministers and their supporters who took such strong ground last year in favor of the construction of the line to the Sault, should now assert that there is the whole of that "gridiron" of railways by which the hon.

something disloyal in the proposal. If they convict us of disloyalty to Canada and of favoring the interests of the United States in this matter, they certainly convict themselves of the same. Again, when advocating the high price to be paid for this road, my hon, friend from Cardwell said that the Syndicate might perhaps build the road as cheaply as we said they would build it, namely, at the cost of what the hon member for Lambton described last year as a mere tramway; but that they would have to spend a large portion of their earnings to put it in good running order, and that therefore it was advisable for us now to pay them for a first class road—for first building it as a tramway and then finishing it as a first class road out of the earning of the tramway. If we want a tramway, it is well to pay the price of a tramway; but if we want a first-class road, we are willing to pay the price of a first-class road; but if we pay the price of a first-class road and only get a tramway, I think such a transaction is only to be described in language which would be unparliamentary. The additions made to the standard of the road would not be made out of the pockets of the capitalists who are supposed to be building the road, but will be made out of the earnings of the road, out of the contributions of the people through whose neighborhood it will run. The capitalists would have a road built for them at public expense, additions made to it out of its net carnings, and besides a large surplus of bonuses both in land and cash. come to the much vexed question of exemptions. The hon. gentleman ventured his legal opinions, as I think the hon. Premier ventured the other night, that the exemptions of the road and stations, etc., only applied to the main line and not to the branches. The hon. Premier will no doubt be gratified at having his opinion on these exemptions sustained by the hon member for Cardwell. Let us read what the contract and charter, taken together, for they are one bargain and must be read together, appear to say on this question. Section 16 of the contract, the exemption clause, is as follows :-

"The Canadian Pacific Railway, and all stations and station grounds, workshops, buildings, yards and other property, rolling stock and appurtenances required and used for the construction and working thereof, and the capital stock of the Company shall be forever free from taxation by the Dominion, or by any Province hereafter to be established or by any municipal corporation therein, and the lands of the Company, in the North-West Territories, until they are either sold or occupied, shall also be free from such taxation for twenty years after the grant thereof from the Crown.'

Section 15 of the charter defines what shall be understood by the term "Canadian Pacific Railway"

"The Company may lay out, construct, acquire, equip, maintain and work a continuous line of railway, of the gauge of four feet eight and one-half inches; which railway shall extend from the terminus of the Canada Central Railway near Lake Nivissing, known as Callendar Station, to Port Moody in the Province of British Columbia; and also, a beauth line of railway from some point on the main line of railway to branch line of railway from some point on the main line of railway to Fort William on Thunder Bay; and also the existing branch line of railway from Selkirk in the Province of Manitoba to Pembina in the said Province; and also other branches to be located by the Company from Province; and also other branches to be located by the Company from time to time as provided by the said contract; the said branches to be of the gauge aforesaid; and the said line of railway, and the said branch lines of railway, shall be commenced and completed as provided by the said contract; and together with such other branch lines as shall be hereafter constructed by the said Company, and any extension of the said main line of railway that shall hereafter be constructed or acquired by the Company, shall constitute the line of railway hereinafter called The Canadian Pacific Railway."

So that not only the branches the Company may build, but any continuation of the line they may hereafter construct or acquire, shall be held to form part of the Canadian Pacific Railway; and section 16 of the contract declares that the Canadian Pacific Railway shall be exempt from taxation forever, except, of course, in Provinces where we have no right to exempt them from taxation. Every line of railway this Company may hereafter build or acquire is a part of the system of railways; so that member said the North-West was to be "permeated" will be free of texation. I do not exactly understand how the North-West can be permeated with a gridiron, but I have no doubt that will be the case since the hon. member for Cardwell says so. Then he went on to deal with the exemption from Customs duties of steel rails and other supplies. He said there was no objection to the admission of steel rails, because there was no possibility of making steel rails in Canada. It is a very strong admission to make to begin with, that the great National Policy has not yet made it possible to make steel rails in Canada, when such a tremendous market for steel rails will be opened up by the construction of this road. The hon, gentleman has got Protection on the brain. He cannot see the slightest harm in letting anything into this country free, unless the free admission is going to hurt any manufacturer. Does he not see that the free admission is equivalent to a gift of cash on the part of the Government, that it must be considered as a part of the cash subsidy? He said, further, that any injury to the manufacturer that might arise from the free admission of bolts and spikes, would be made up by a rebate granted to the manufacturer on the raw material. This is another of the peculiar arguments which shows how the whole bent of a man's mind may be warped by the adoption of protectionist ideas. We are not speaking now of the injuries to individul manufacturers, but of the cost to the country; and he arges that while we are incurring loss of revenue through free admission of bolts, spikes, nuts, etc., we are to incur another loss of revenue to reimburse some individuals who might be aggrieved by the free admission of these articles. Then, with regard to the question of the exemption of lands, he says that is merely a subsidy to be given by the people of the country through which the railway will run, to the Company. Suppose we regard it in that light, what right have we to compel these new settlers to give a subsidy to the railway? Are we not supposed to be building that railway at the expense of the whole country for the benefit of those settlers? Why should we compel them to pay such a very considerable tax as will be imposed in the shape of subsidy to this railway? Of course, it is very hard to get at figures of what the total cost to settlers there will be; but I am informed by a Conservative friend of mine, who owns a great deal of land in Manitoba, that he is paying this year in taxes about 7½ cents per acre on every acre he holds. At the same rate, these new settlers would be taxed $7\frac{1}{2} a year per 100 acres or about $24 for an average holding for the benefit of this railway which we are told was to be built by the country at large for the benefit of struggling settlers. It is absolutely monstrous for us to impose further subsidy than that which they will pay in the shape of Customs duties like the rest of us. But that is not the worst form that the exemption clause takes. It is not merely the amount it takes out of the settlers hands that is going to injure the interests of the country, but the creation of large proprietors of lands, and large holdings. It will keep settlements sparse and compel the emigrant not only to improve his own land, but the blocks of railway land alongside of him. But my hon, and very legal-minded friend, the member for Cardwell, who has been so very prodigal of his legal opinions this afternoon, insists further, that it is very little matter to the settler whether he has to pay taxes on the railway land or not. He said that if the railway company had to pay taxes on their land they would form part of the working expenses of the road, and that the settlers would have to pay the same amount in freight as if there were an actual tax on their land. He is thinking, evidently, of the provision in the charter that the Company are to be allowed to exact 10 per cent, profit on the cost of constructing that road, over and above Mr. CASEY.

this is the only road known on which taxes are classed as part of the working expenses; so that this is not a normal state of things, but one specially created in favor of this road; and, further, this clause would have no effect at all, unless a reduction of tolls was being made under the terms of those two clauses. So that, until the receipts of the railway shall reach a figure, giving net profits over 10 per cent. on the total cost of constructing the road, the provision the hon, gentleman alludes to would have no effect—and an amount equivalent to the taxes would not be taken out of those who ship products over the railway. In either case, the railway company, whether exempted from taxes or not, will charge as much as they can get. They would be able to charge no more if they had to pay taxes, than they can charge though they are now exempt. Then he told us that there was no danger from the monopoly of traffic given this road; because, in the first place, Manitoba might charter a line running south from Winnipeg, and thereby tap the Pacific Railway at that point. Well, I think there would be very little chance, for a line running south from Winnipeg, when it could find on the other side of the line connections with no roads but those owned by the Syndicate. The only chance, an independent road would have to tap the Canadian Pacific Railway would be by striking it a considerable distance west and running south or to the eastward to reach some road not controlled by this Company. But I must point out here the beautiful inconsistency between the member for Cardwell and his leader on this subject; for his leader argued that there is no possibility of the Canadian Pacific Railway being tapped by American roads. He said it would never do, and that the Government would take great care to prevent such an arrangement; that it was the intention of the Government to prevent any such tapping of the Canadian Pacific Railway, or such competition as the hon gentleman thinks possible under the present arrangement. Then he went on to say that railway men had told him that there was no other way of regulating rates than that adopted in the present charter, namely, fixing a percentage at which they should stop, and that the Governor in Council must give his consent before any tolls could be charged, and that the railway could not be a success if the rates were too high. I quite agree with the hon gentleman that there is no other way of controlling the rates, by the charter, than by fixing a percentage. There is a very good way of controlling rates, without any provision as to tolls or charges, namely free competition. It is quite certain that in that country where railroad building would be so easy, you could prevent such over charges by this or any other company by allowing other roads to be constructed through the North-West. When the member for Cardwell says that a company could not make a road a success by over charging, he is talking perfect nonsense. He told us himself that the St. Paul and Manitoba Company had made their road a success, and that they had been charging too high rates. One of his statements thus conflicts with the other. Not only are their rates over charges, but they continue this policy and thus pay sixteen or eighteen per cent dividends on their shares; and they will continue to do so, not only over their American road, but over the whole gridiron, in the Canadian North-West, as the member for Cardwell described it, that will be broiling that country before long. I feel compelled to say a word or two in regard to his speech this afternoon, and I am sorry he is not present to hear it. He evidently thinks it a very good plan to single out high game when he wishes to make an effect, and this accounts for his attacking the leader of the Oppo-He thus hopes to gain a certain amount prominence. The hon, gentleman stated that the member for West Durham was in the habit of prostituting his legal all working expenses, and the other clause that includes lore for the benefit of his party—of giving opinions in the taxes among the working expenses of the road. I believe House for political reasons, which he did not believe to be true, and stating them in such language that he could afterwards shirk responsibility, by making it appear that he meant something else than the impression he had left on the House. The hon, gentleman tells us he got a certain impression from the remarks of the leader of the Opposition in regard to the power of the Courts in carrying out this contract; that he got the impression that the member for West Durham had said the Courts had no power to enforce it, and that now when the member for West Durham points out, that that was not what he said, and that it could not be taken to mean that—that he simply said the Court of Chancery could not order a specific performance of this contract, the member for Cardwell accuses him of trying to put a different meaning on his words. Neither the leader of the Opposition nor any one else can be held responsible for the impression created by his words in such a mind as that of the member for Cardwell. It is not to be expected that he should have very clear opinions on legal points. He forms his own opinion of what was said, and instantly stereotypes it in his mind as an infallibly correct impression, and the moment this interpretation is corrected by his opponents, he accuses them of quibbling and trying to puta false impression on their language. He accused the hon member for West Durham, of having dragged his reputation in the mire for political purposes. It is not very safe to begin these little recriminations. It is not very safe for hon, gentlemen on that side to talk of reputations being dragged in the mire, about pledges being given for political purposes, about assurances being made on a Minister's word of honor for political purposes. It is doubly unsafe for the member for Cardwell to indulge in these recriminations, for in his dual capacity of journalist and member of this House he is doubly vulnerable. It is not so long ago that that hon, gentleman gave it as his opinion that a party newspaper was frequently compelled by political exigencies not only to disguise and quibble about its opinions, but even to disguise and fritter away the truth, and even to make deliberate misrepresentations if that were required to accomplish political ends. That hon gentleman has made it a point since he entered the House, to be personal and aggressive in his attacks upon members on this side. During the first Session he sat here, he attacked men many years his senior, and that, too, with a bitterness evidently born of something more than a party spirit. He still continues that course, and no doubt by it he hopes to obtain that sort of notoriety for which he craves: but he will find that such a course will not elevate him in the opinion of those in the House or in the community who are not utterly hardened by party feeling. I intend to notice one or two points raised by even a greater light than the member for Cardwell, I mean the Minister of Railways himself. In beginning the discussion on this question, he sets out with a very laudable aspiration. He said that the railway should not be carried on as a political work, nor made the battle ground of political parties, but that it should be built like any other railway, by capitalists who should make a fair profit out of the enterprise. Now Sir, that is exactly what hon, members on this side would be very glad to do. They are now asking that it shall not be carried on as a political work, and that the decision of who shall build the road shall not be arrived at as a party question. This is an occasion on which, as has been said, party lines should be slackened. I know it is hard for a member of this House, who is a supporter of a particular Government, to give a vote against that Govern-ment, and especially when the Government have put down of the House looks up, as it is natural they should do, with directly against those whom he venerates and reveres. We should not have urged any such course upon hon, gentlemen opposite but for the declaration of the Prime Minister the other night. What we should have urged upon them-what has been urged and urged successfully in the country, is not that they should desert the party with which they have so long been connected, but to make their leaders feel that they were not the autocrats of the party, but that they were merely their leaders, in the sense of being at the head of the party, and that they should do what the rank and file of the party believed to be right. I am cortain that when this contract was first broached the great bulk of the Uonservative party were almost unanimous in the opinion that it should not be put through the House. I am certain that they were as absolutely taken by surprise by its conditions as we were; that they had no reason to expect any such terms from the leader of the Government, since they are directly opposed to his course last Session. Members of the Conservative party in the country, and members of that party in this House, in private conversation, have not been slack in expressing their surprise that their leader should have brought down such terms. And I say that the responsibility of saving the country from the consequences of this contract rests upon them; that if they had had the courage to say to their leader "we cannot support you in this matter if you push it to a vote," he would have been obliged for the safety of his party and with perfect fairness to the contractors to accede to their wishes. To the contractors he could have said that he found it impossible to carry this contract through Parliament in its present form, and that they would either have to submit to a modification of these terms or let the matter absolutely drop. If the Conservative party had chosen to act in that way they would have earned for themselves the undying gratitude of their countrymen. But they did not choose to do so, they were whipped in, and they came under that party discipline to which they always yield such ready obedience. Party discipline is a very fine thing, but it is intended for a certain purpose—to preserve the party intact—to make it a good fighting machine, and to carry party discipline beyond that point is to make the greatest imaginable blunder. I contend that the coercion of the independent members of the House on this question, was one of the greatest blunders which these hon. gentlemen could make, because they were laying the foundation for defeat at the next election, and for exclusion from office for a long time thereafter.

Mr. ROCHESTER. We are not asking your opinion.

Mr. CASEY. I know very well that the hon. member for Carleton has no independent opinion of his own, and when I address independent members I make no allusion to him. I said that this exercise of party discipline would lead to the defeat of the party. It will do more than that. It is a crying injustice to those men in that party, younger than the leader of the House, who have some worthy ambition at some future time to be leaders in Canadian politics, or to be members of the Government themselves. For the leader and his first lieutenant to insist upon carrying through, at all hazards, a contract which they themselves have made, for which they alone are responsible, against the convictions of so many of their supporters, is an injustice to every man of that party. Such men as the hon, member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) and many others I could name, who are prominent in the party, who have a future before them, certainly should have resisted, at all hazards, the policy which will inevitably their foot and said that this particular question is one on which they should stand or fall. It is hard for a man to do violence to the traditions of his life to such an extent as to go directly in the face of the leaders of his party, to go of the party, the First Minister and hon. Minister of Railways, were responsible for the conduct of the negotiations in this matter, and the whole affair was simply a proposal of policy on the part of the Government. A great deal has been said about its being a contract. We have been assured that the new Canadian Syndicate as I must call it in opposition to the St. Paul Syndicate, knew there was no chance that their offer could be considered because the contract was already made. there was no contract whatever entered into; that the paper laid on the Table of the House, which is called a "contract or agreement," is nothing in the world but an agreement between the two Ministers who drew it up and the other contracting parties as affording a basis on which they could ask power from Parliament to give a contract to them. The Minister of Railways tried to induce the House to believe that this contract was let under the terms of the Act of 1874, but that contention was completely knocked to pieces by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) and I will not attempt to go over the ground. At all events, it could not be a contract under that Act. Nor could it be a contract under the Public Works Act, because the Government cannot let a contract under that Act unless tenders were advertised for. It is thus a simple agreement of certain terms on which the Government proposed to let a contract to those individuals, and on the basis of which they proposed to ask power from the House to let a contract. I think the hon, member for Cardwell (Mr. White) said it was let under the Act of 1874, and therefore it became law if laid on the Table of the House. It could not become law, even in that case, without the assent of the House, and how much less can it be binding when the Government had no direct authority whatever to make it. I do not deny the Government can make any agreement they choose; but so can any private member. The Government can, with great authority, make an agreement with certain contractors to give out a contract on certain terms, and ask the House, as it is now doing, to pass a Bill giving them authority to let a contract on those terms. They can make any sort of terms they choose, but to assume that such an agreement in any way binds the faith of the country to adhere to those terms is to assume an absurdicy, - it is to assume an absurdity that was never dreamed of until the other offer had come in, and it was absolutely necessary to trump up some excuse for refusing to consider it. I must read what the Minister of Railways said when he endeavored to make the House believe that this document was really a contract. He told us that the Act of 1874 did not require that public tenders should be obtained, but that tenders might be obtained by private solicitation or in any way they chose, so long as tenders were obtained, and that on this occasion tenders were got The Minister of Railways said:

"The hon, gentleman may find it convenient to forget all this; his hon, leader may find it convenient to forget all this; but with that law standing on the Statute-book of the country he will not make the people of this country believe this Government had not authority to make the contract."

Referring to the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) the Minister of Railways said:

"The hon, gentleman knows that again and again, under the authority of this Act, both the former and the present Government accepted private tenders. There is nothing in this Act about public tenders, and if there was, I want to know whether an advertisement published in the papers of England and Canada for six months did not give authority for the granting of a contract to any one who was willing to construct the railway? The hon, leader of the Opposition goes back four years; but I will not permit him to go back four years to find his opinion on

Nor can we allow the Minister of Railways to go back four years for his advertisements. But supposing it were granted that private tenders would be a proper foundation for such a contract, did the Government receive any tenders at all on which the contract was based; was the contract let on any tender public or private? I think I can prove from therein stated that the Government were considering the Mr. CASEY.

statements of the leader of the Government that such was not the case, that the contract was not made on the basis of either one or twenty public or private tenders, but is simply a statement of terms agreed upon in private caucus between that hon, gentleman and those with whom he was dealing. I will read the hon, gentleman's own explanation of the matter. He said:

"Before we went to England there was a previsional offer made to the Government which was distinctly understood to be provisional." That was the offer referred to in his Bath speech. Was that

"We subsequently received a second offer, and the Government came to the conclusion, especially as we had an indirect intimation, verbally, that an offer would probably be made from New York and San Francisco, that we could not possibly settle up the matter here. We decided to inform silt the parties that we would attend to the reception of any applications, tenders, or proffers, in London. Thereupon the first party who made this provisional offer withdrew it and would not hold to it. The second party did not do so—this was an offer from England—and the party subsequently dropped their application. The communications that were made in England were principally, if not altogether, verbal. Gentlemen came over again and again from Paris and sat with us in the discussion of these matters. The first offer was withdrawn. The second one it would be unfair to disclose; as the hon. gentlemen opposite will see, there were persons in it, bankers and others of consi-The second one it would be unfair to disclose; as the hon, gettlemen opposite will see, there were persons in it, bankers and others of censiderable commercial standing, who were connected with that offer. They found they were not strong enough to press it. Their offer was made, of course, with the desire of coming in if they could, and be engaged in the construction of the road, and it would hardly be fair to them to use their names and to state that these persons failed in being strong enough to undertake the work. It would affect their position. But I would say this, that the present offer is the most favorable offer, both as to money and land, that the Government or delegates received. Arrangements were made; we sat de die in diem as a little committee, meeting different gentlemen again and again. They were all desirous of making an arrangement, money being plenty and enterprise ripe on the continent of Europe, especially in France and England. They were all anxious to connect themselves with such a great enterprise. Some were appalled by the largeness of the scheme; some were frightened by the eventual responsibility, and one after another withdrew from attempts to be concerned with the resilvay. As to the present parties we meet them every day, and the results are laid before this House. I cannot possibly bring down those papers; I think it would be an injury to the parties who have attempted to aid us by making offers." opposite will see, there were persons in it, bankers and others of consi-

So up to the time the Minister left England nothing had been done in the way of asking public or private tenders except occasional meetings in private between the leader of the Government and different gentlemen of Paris and London, and discussing what they might, could or would do. That was the explanation given by the First Minister on December 13. On December 15, on a motion of the hon, member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), the leader of the Government gave explanations as to how the contract came to be framed. He said:

"We had entered into negotiations with one firm after another, but one after another our efforts falled; and it was only with great difficulty that we made any arrangement at all. The hon, gentleman quotes from a speech of mine at Montreal. Well, I cannot vouch for the literal accuracy of the report, but it is substantially correct. but it is substantially correct. but it is substantially correct. but it has been between man and man; but the understanding was, of course, that they must be subject, in the first place, to the approval of the Governor General in Council. The details had to be written out de die is diem, and gentlemen came from England and New York for the purpose of settling all those terms. It would answer no good purpose, and it would answer a very bad purpose to bring down the discussions, the day and day negotiations, the statements on the one side and on the other side while these arrangements were pending; and it is contrary to all rule and "We had entered into negotiations with one firm after another, but one and the view arrangements were pending; and it is contrary to all rule and precedents that anything but the final result of the negotiations should be brought down. We, Sir, settled the main points of this arrangement in England—the amount to be paid as Canada's contribution, in the way of railway construction, money and land; but of course, they were all subject to the settlement of the terms under which, as a railway company, they could safely accept an Act of incorporation. I am happy to say, and the House knows now, that we have arrived at these results. We have laid before the House these results, and we decline to lay before the House any other papers.'

This contract is the result of the negotiations. It has been contended that the statement made by the First Minister at Bath, was equivalent to an advertisement for tenders; for it was propriety of accepting propositions. It was rather an advertisement for would-be tenderers to keep away, when it was stated there were two proposals before the Government, and that they were considering them. But we find from this incident that that was not an advertisement at all. It was not intended to be such. The hon. gentleman went away to London, and told these parties to come on and finish the matter there. We are told these parties all backed out, and that their negotiations in England merely amounted to settling with certain parties there, after a great deal of caucusing, the terms in land and money, and that all the details were worked out here after they came back:

"We settled on the main terms in England, as far as we could settle there between man and man. The details had to be worked out, and gentlemen came from England and New York for the purpose of settling upon the terms."

Now, he says this agreement has all the binding force of a contract. I say it is simply agreement roughed out in England after a great deal of caucusing between the hon. leader of the Government and the Minister of Railways on the one hand, and the contracting party on the other; it is simply an agreement of the terms on which the Company were willing to make the contract. It has not even the form of a contract about it. It has much more the appearance of being what the hon, gentleman said the offer of the new Syndicate was-a plot concocted to the left of the Speaker's chair. It appears, on his own statement, that the old Syndicate was a plot concocted to the right of the Speaker's chair between the Government and a few gentlemen who wished to get a job without at all notifying the world of what they were doing. I think I am justified of applying to it the language which he applies to the new offer. I think, in view of his own statement, we may much more properly call it a conspiracy. What constitutes a conspiracy? It is a banding together of a few men to concoct something which shall be to their own advantage, and, perhaps, to the disadvantage of others. Here was a number of men meeting in secret to concoct something to their own advantage, and which will be to the disadvantage of the country. At all events, the parties of this agreement conspired together in the most secret manner possible to make it. Having concocted that measure, the whole affair is made public, and when meetings throughout the country are asked to condemn it, a stereotyped resolution is offered, saying that it is the best bargain that could be made, and therefore we must accept it. Within five weeks after these terms are made public, an infinitely better bargain has been offered to the House and the country. If the former bargain was the best the hon, leader of the Government could make, after several months caucusing, it speaks very little for his business capacity. This new bargain has been offered without any caucusing between the leader of the Government and those who made it. Anything more likely to result in direct damage to the interest of the country, and in direct financial loss to the country than the bargain presented to us by the Government, I cannot possibly imagine. Now, the proper subject of debate on this occasion is the amendment offered by the hon. leader of the Opposition That amendment is what the hon. member for Cardwell called it, a most remarkable amendment. It states the whole case in connection with both the old and the new contracts in a manner so convincing to every person who reads it, that it has not only shaken the confidence of hon. members on the other side of the House, but it will shake the confidence of hundreds and thousands of their supporters throughout the country. The more it is studied by the people the more unanimous will be the verdict that the amendment was justified, and that the Government were distinctly sacrificing the interests of the country to their own personal prestige from these letters all of which are written by intelligent in refusing even to consider the new offer. We all know what a considerable defection there was from the ranks of the leader of the Government at the time of the last Pacific scandal. We all know that a great many of those who then left him have since come back. We all know he has had a wonderful chance to rehabilitate himself, such as has seldom been given to any who sinned as he did. When he laid this contract before the House he injured his political interest in the country far more than the National Policy has ever helped it. But when he goes farther and refuses to consider an infinitely better contract, I cannot help believing that he has not only undone all that he gained by the National Policy, but has put himself in an infinitely worse position before the people than he occupied after the disclosures of the Sir Hugh Allan transactions. Though there is no opportunity of making that known by a general election, I believe that opinion will gather strength in the country, and that the result, at the next election, will be crushing to the hon, gentleman opposite. The hon, member for Cardwell told me that if we really believed the adoption of this contract was going to hurt the Government, we would let it pass, and try and beat them afterwards. That is not our policy or our duty. It is our duty to oppose this measure to the utmost extent allowed by parliamentary usage. But it would appear that the Government do not expect that our opposition will result in the loss of many votes in the House. That may be very true, and I cannot say that I am extremely sorry for it. If a sufficient number deserted the Government, to prevent the adoption of this measure, I of course believe it would be a great gain to the country. But we are, at all events, perfectly certain that in the most influential parts of Ontario, both in the east and in the west, every man who votes for this contract, when there is such an infinitely better alternative before the House, is doomed. In a party sense, we can rejoice at our defeate; for the more overwhelming are our defeats now, the more overwhelming will be our victory in the next general election.

Mr. MUTTART. I will promise you, Mr. Speaker, at this stage of the debate not to attempt a long speech. But I feel it my duty not to give a silent vote on this great question; and in a few words I wish to give a reason for the hope that is in me. Last Session and the Session previous we had the same old cry of ruination and taxation. The subject then was the National Policy. As the National Policy is turning out so successfully, the Opposition have dropped this subject and now we are to have ruin and taxation from building the Pacific Railway. We are getting used to this sort of thing, and we are not the least alarmed at the threatened ruin which the Opposition now predict, as a result of the construction of the Pacific Railway by the Syndicate. A great deal has been said within the last few days as to the great "uprising" -if I may be allowed to borrow an expression from the hon. member for Shelburne—that is taking place throughout the country against ratifying the agreement with the Canadian Pacific Syndicate. At the early part of the Session a great flourish of trumpets was made by the Opposition press over a statement said to be communicated by the Island leader of the Opposition in this House—the hon. member for Prince—to the effect that the people of Prince Edward Island were exasperated over the terms about to be entered into by the Government with the Syndicate. Now, whether the hon. member for Prince gave such information or not, I am not prepared to say; but this I do say that the hon, member on that occasion had left home before the terms of the Syndicate agreement and contract were known on the Island. So much for this reported exasperation. Within the last day or two I have received numerous letters from my constituents, all, without a single exception. approving of the contract under consideration. It will not be out of place, I presume, to give this House a few extracts

"Senator Haythorne has returned to the Island with thousands of anti-"Senator Haythorne has returned to the Island with thousands of anti-Syndicate petitions and manifestos in a travelling bag. He is a wonderful man this Senator Haythorne for changing constitutions. We all remember when he and Laird shouldered Prince Edward Island in the dead hour of the night and started for Ottawa, but this his latest feat surpasses that by all odds.

"I suppose ere this petitions from the Island against the Pacific Railway have reached Ottawa. Some of these petitions bear the names of dead as well as living Grits. All the persuasive powers of English, Gaelic and dog Latin were used in certain localities without producing the slightest effect.'

Another correspondent says:

"In the Government's Pacific Railway policy I believe you will be carrying out the wishes of your constituents, by giving the Government your undiwided support. I am greatly mistaken if the people of this Dominion are again going back to the days of dark depression which pervaded the land during the regime of Mackenzie, Cartwright & Co."

Another correspondent save :

"Our Grit friends on the Island are laboring hard to create a feeling against the Government on account of the Pacific Railway ba gain. I suppose they found their conspiracies took so well before, they think this a fitting opportunity of playing the same cards over again, but it does not seem to work. They will find that many even of their former blind followers have received sight within the last six years &c."

Another writer savs:

"Grits are sending round petitions against the Pacific Railway and they are being signed by their friends. The meetings that have been held have most signally failed to affect public opinion in the slightest degree. Intelligent, reading and thinking men are of opinion that the Syndicate contract is the best thing for the country yet submitted for building the Pacific Railway."

Another correspondent says:

"The Grits are endeavoring to make all possible capital out of the Pacific Railway scheme. Petitions are being industriously carried about for signature, in the vain hope of defeating the measure. These petitions, will no doubt, when presented to Parliament, present a long array of names; but they will not by any means represent the sentiments of the great bulk of electors in this section of the country. All the level headed people, not politically prejudiced, that I have heard speaking on this subject, say that they don't care a cent if the whole North-West were appropriated to the building of this road, as long as the older Provinces are saved from the burthen of doing so. I strongly believe if the proposed measure passes through Parliament, it will affect the political attitude of your constituency towards the Government, more isoverably than otherwise."

Another correspondent writes:

"Our local Grits feel very sore b cause they cannot raise enough gullible matter to stir up the people. They tried their very best but it would not work worth a cent. Petitions were in circulation here, but I do not think that any respectable Grit even was seen out with them. On one petition which I saw there were names of mere children—boys hardly in their teens. People are laughing at the idea of such men as D. and C. and K. hawking round petitions calling on the House of Commons and the Senate to stop the Pacific Railway."

It will be seen by these few extracts that the people of Prince Edward Island are far from being "exasperated" at the terms of the Syndicate contract, and that the "uprising" of which we have heard so much exists only in the imaginations of the Opposition. I have simply given you those extracts, Mr. Speaker, as a sample of what a large majority of the free and independent electors of Prince Edward Island think of the situation. I believe they may be safely taken as a truer index to the state of public feeling in that Province than the big twice-signed petition just read to this House. I may say that I have looked over that petition, which is like all other petitions. It is by no means a genuine one, as it bears dozens of names evidently being written by the same hand. There are whole pages in the same handwriting, and I can point to names in that petition which have been signed twice. For my part I have listened attentively to the debate on this important subject, from day to day, and am free to confess that if I had any doubts at first as to the proper course to take, they would have all been removed by the discussion which has taken place in this Parliament and throughout the country during the recess. I am convinced Mr. MUTTABT.

that the bargain which has been made by the Government with the Pacific Railway Syndicate, and now about to be ratified by Parliament, is the very best ever offered for the consideration of this House, and I have not the least doubt but the large body of electors throughout the Dominionwill fully endorse the action taken on this question by the Government and their supporters in this Parliament. There are some points in which both great parties in this country are apparently agreed. Both parties admit that the road must be built. The hon, member for Quebec, who was the Minister of the Interior under the Mackenzie Administration, stated the other evening that he had yet to learn that any member of the Reform party had attempted to repudiate the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I was glad to hear this candid admission from so distinguished a member of the Opposition, for in certain sections which I might name the people are being told, in order to induce them to sign the petitions which are now being circulated by the Opposition, that the present Government and their supporters in Parliament are the only party in Canada in favor of building this great railway, when the truth is that the Reform party is the only party committed to the construction of this great and expensive undertaking as a Government work. The Province from which I come, had no act or part in settling the terms on which British Columbia entered the Union. When Prince Edward Island entered Confederation, the building of the Pacific Railway within a limited time was fully agreed upon in terms as binding as terms could possibly be made, no matter which political party might control the affairs of State. And when the Island threw in her lot with the other members of the Confederacy, she knew that the Pacific Railway had to be built. Both political parties in Prince Edward Island knew this, and both accepted Confederation with all its advantages and disadvantages, its responsibilities and obligations. Agreed as both great parties in this country appears to be, that this great public highway-the Canadian Pacific-must be constructed, and that there is no getting out of it, we must only accept the cheapest and best plan possible under the circumstances. For the sake of comparison let us look at the present proposition in the light of the Allan charter and the Mackenzie Act of 1874. I am aware that this comparison has been made already, but it will be no harm to allude to it again and again till the subject is so plain that those who run may read. Under the Allan charter we were to give 50,000,000 acres of land and $30,000,000 subsidy. Counting the land worth $2 an acre, the amount would stand as follows:-

> 50,000,000 acres of land at $2 per acre .... .$100,000,000 Cash subsidy ..... 30,000,000 Total ...... 130,000,000

Under the Mackenzie Act of 1874, Parliament agreed to give 55,940,000 acres of land along with a cash subsidy of $10,000 per mile, and interest at four per cent. for 25 years on whatever amount might be expended above that umount. Here is, therefore, how the Mackenzie offer stands according to the Act of 1874, which hon. gentlemen opposite endorsed and supported by their vote in Parliament:

55,440,900 acres of land at $2 per acre..... $111,880,000 Oash $10,000 per mile for 2,977 miles of railway ..... Government guarantee on $7,500 per mile at four per cent for 25 years...... 20,977,599 Total ..... 162,627,500.

Existing roads with contracts completed ...... $28,000,000

Thus it will be plainly seen that the present terms are $36,000,000 better than the Allan centract, and $59,627,500 better than the terms offered by the late Administration in the Act of 1874. With respect to branch lines, the present Company or Syndicate, if they build branch lines, will have to build them without any subsidy; while the Act of 1874, passed by the then leader of the Government and his supporters, provided for subsidizing branch lines by land bonuses of 6,400 acres per mile. The estimated quantities of land for the purpose was 12,000,000 acres, which at $2.00 per acre would amount to $24,000,000 additional. One of the great objections raised by the Opposition against the proposed arrangement, now under the consideration of this House, is with reference to the ownership of the road after it has been constructed. They appear to be very much troubled about the road being handed over to the Syndicate absolutely for ever, or, as a speaker at a meeting recently held in Prince Edward Island, stated: "for ever and ever, Amen." As an instance of what it costs the Government to run a railway, let us look how the account stands with reference to the Intercolonial Railway, for the years 1874, 1875, 1876, 1877 and 1878. In Mr. Brydges' report of the 18th August, 1874, he informed the Government that the gross expense for the year on the New Brunswick and Nova Scotia Railways amounted to $1,301,055.08. The hon, the Finance Minister of 1874 the present hon, member for South Huron—stated in his Budget Speech, page 29, that the deficit in connection with the Intercolonial Railway, for the year 1873-4, was $1,250,000. By reference to the Public Accounts for 1875 the expenses and revenue were as follows:-Expenses, $1,485,015.12; Revenue, $861,593.42; leaving a balance of $623,422.69. The total cost of the Intercolonial Railway, as stated in the Public Accounts, page 44, for this year, is put down at $20,593,914; Interest on this amount, at 5 per cent., $1,029,650; which added to the difference between expenditure and revenue makes a deficit of $1,653,071.

Or an average deficit of $1,539,923. It will, therefore, be seen that one of the very best features in the present agreement, especially in the interest of the older Provinces, is that the road when completed shall be equip ed and operated by the Syndicate and not by the Government. The bare expenses of running the Pacific Railway after it has been constructed, has been estimated by Mr. Sandford Fleming at $8,000,000 annually. In view of these facts, we ought certainly to congratulate ourselves upon the assurance that the road is not only to be built, but to be owned and operated by a private company. I believe that I am honestly acting in the interests of my constituents in supporting the proposition now before this House. I accept the bargain with the Syndicate as a whole—the details of the agreement do not directly affect the interests of the people of Prince Edward Island. There is one point, however, to which our opponents in that Province are endeavoring to give special prominence, and that is in reference to the question of land monopoly. This is a tender spot with Prince Edward Islanders, and they are being strongly appealed to on this head. From the fact that the people of that Province were subjected to a grinding system of landlordism for over a century, and from the contract on this head, in order to ascertain whether there is any grounds for fearing a land monopoly or not. On page 6, section 11, of the Syndicate contract and agreement, we read as follows:—

"The grant of land hereby agreed to be made to the Company, shall be so made in alternate sections of 640 acres each, extending back 24 miles deep, on each side of the railway, from Winnipeg to Jasper House, in so far as such lands shall be vested in the Government, the Company receiving the sections bearing uneven numbers—But should any of such sections consist in a material degree of land not fairly fit for Settlement, the Company shall not be obliged to receive them as part of such grant, and the deficiency thereby caused and any further deficiency which may arise from the insufficient quantity of land along the said portion of railway, to complete the said 25,000,060 acres, or from the prevalence of lakes and water stretches in the sections granted (which lakes and water stretches shall not be computed in the acreage of such sections), shall be made up from other portions to be selected by the Company in the tract known as the fertile belt, that is to say the land lying between parallels 49 and 57 degrees of north latitude or elsewhere at the option of the Company by the grant therein of similar alternate sections extending back 24 miles deep on each side of any branch line or lines of railway to be located by the Company, and to be shown on a map or plan thereof deposited with the Minister of Railways; or of any common frontline or lines agreed upon between Government and the Company may with the consent of the Government, select at the North-West Territories any tract or tracts of land not taken up as a means of supplying or partially supplying such deficiency. But such grants shall be made only from lands remaining vested in the Government."

Some of our opponents, in referring to this section, say that the Government may give all the land along the road, but that while it would be for the Company's interest not to select the Government's alternate blocks, preferring to leave these sections with the Government, for the simple reason that their settlement with emigrants will largely increase the value of the Company's sections, I cannot see how any language can be made plainer than the wording of this section. The Company are to hold every alternate block of land along the line of railway; and if a sufficient quantity cannot be found fairly fit for settlement within the fertile belt, then the Company are to take land elsewhere, in alternate blocks. Lawyers may raise quibbles as to the meaning of this section, but this is the plain English of it as far as I can understand it. In the face of this I cannot see how a land monopoly can exist, as after the Company get their 25,000,000 acres in alternate blocks, the Government will still hold seven-eighths of the land of the North-West. The hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Flynn), in figuring up the cost of building the Canadian Pacific Railway, endeavored to make it appear that the Maritime Provinces alone would have to pay millions and millions of dollars as their share towards the building of the road. By what course of reasoning the hon, gentleman arrived at his conclusions I am at a loss to understand. I can easily understand how it would have increased the burdens of taxpayers of the Lower Provinces if the late Government had remained in power and continued to build it as a Government work. The late Government spent over $18,000,000 in building two pieces of this roadleaving a gap between of 185 miles—required to be built in order to make the work of any use at all. It was all right in the eyes of the Opposition for the late Administration to spend millions in this great work, but now that an opportunity offers to transfer the responsibility and expense from the shoulders of the Government to that of a private company, a great hue and cry is raised—not in the interests of the taxpayers, but simply to advance the interests of party. Let us see how the hon. member for Richmond's opinion agrees with that of the Toronto Globe of not so very long ago.

ing system of landlordism for over a century, and from which they have been freed by means brought about under Confederation that never might have been successful if they had to depend upon Downing Street instead of Ottawa rule—it will be readily understood that this cry of monopoly is intended to rouse the prejudices of the people of that Province. Let us refer to the exact wording of the content of the said wording of the people of that Province. Let us refer to the exact wording of the content of the intended to convenience, but of national existence. It must be the convenience, but of national existence. It must be the convenience, but of national existence. It must be the convenience, but of national existence. It must be the convenience but of national existence in the convenience was pushed through not only without being a burden pecuniarily to Canada, but with an absolute profit in every point of view. Without such a line a great British North America would turn out an unsubstantial dream; with it, and with ordinary prudence and wisdom on the part of her statesmen, it will become a great, a glorious, and inevitable reality."

The land of the great North-West is comparatively valueless without a railway. With a railway the lands will prove more than sufficient to meet all the outlay that will be incurred, for after the Syndicate receives 25,000,000 acres there will be still left in the hands of the Government about 175,000,000 acres. This at even one dollar an acre will amount to $175,000,000, an amount sufficient to recoup the Government for every dollar expended in building the road, besides leaving a handsome surplus to the credit of the country. As I am therefore fully convinced that the building of the Pacific Railway will not increase the burdens of the people of Prince Edward Island one cent, I intend to support the proposition now before the House; and in doing so, I believe I am acting in accordance with the wishes of those electors at least whose votes gave me the honor of a neat in this Parliament.

Mr. DUGAS. Mr. Speaker, as I did not wish to cast a silent vote upon the question now submitted for our consideration, I will take the liberty of expressing my views with regard to this contract which should be discussed calmly and dispassionately; for, Sir, we are not here to labor in the interests of one political party or the other, but, on the contrary, actuated by a patriotic feeling and a desire to promote the public welfare, we should unite and work together, especially when, as in the present case, the material interests of the country are at stake. We all know that upon the ratification of this contract depends the future prosperity of the country; we all know that upon the execution of this undertaking depends likewise the rapid development of agricultural pursuits in the vast and fertile plains of the North-West, upon which our expectations for the future are grounded. Our wise statesmen, after having studied the position of the country, have become convinced that, however important other industries may be, agriculture is to-day and will be for a long time to come, Canada's principal industry, and consequently, all that is prejudicial to the numerous agricultural class is likewise prejudicial to the other classes that depend upon the agricultural class, and all that affects the latter affects the national welfare. That is why, Sir, these sagacious statesmen—after having inangurated a National Policy that has produced good results in the country, as even some Opposition organs have admitted, and in order to hasten the progress of colonization in the vast territories of the North-West—deemed it their duty to push forward, as quickly as possible, the execution of this work, in order to allow millions of persons, who are waiting for a favorable opportunity, to settle as soon as possible on these lands, to clear and cultivate them for the support of their families, thereby contributing to the general revenues of the country. Moreover, Sir, these wise statesmen, mindful of the promises made in their treaty with British Columbia, to accomplish of which the country's word of honor was pledged, have seen fit to submit this contract for our approval, asking us to ratify it, which no man having at heart the interests of the country can refuse to do. But Sir, I regret to see that members of the Opposition have not looked upon this question from a public standpoint, but, on the contrary, have merely labored in the interests of their party; and I also regret that these gentlemen have allowed themselves to make such unjust and malicious insinuations against the Government merely in order to raise popular prejudice. The policy of the Government upon this question is the same as that laid down in 1872 by the late Conservative Administration; it is also the same as the one adopted in 1874 by the former leader of the Liberal party (Mr. Mackenzie), among whose most zealous followers at the time were certain members on the other side, who have spoken against the contract. We are all agreed, Sir, upon the Mr. Murrar.

necessity of building this great railway; we are all satisfied that the greatest results will accrue to the country, from the realization of this undertaking; but what seems to alarm hon. gentlemen opposite, are the conditions of the contract which, I will not say appear onerous to them, but which they would fain make appear burdensome, in order to deceive public opinion and create political capital. The expedients to which they have resorted are sufficient to convince us that these gentlemen are not sincere; the reasons they bring against the contract should be scorned and rejected by this House and the country; they have endeavored to deceive the public by their speeches made before this House and outside of this House, but they have not succeeded; they have only been able to obtain against the passing of this contract the signatures of seven or eight thousand electors out of the 700.000 electors of the Dominion of Canada. Deceived in their expectations, they have resorted to another, and I hope, Sir, a last device; that of getting up a new Syndicate composed exclusively of Canadian capitalists, a Syndicate which, in my opinion, does not really exist, which only exists in a figurative sense, and which is, so to say, only the phantom of a Syndicate. Well, Sir, their aim in this again is merely to do mischief, and to prevent the carrying out of the negotiations entered into between the Government and the first Syndicate. It must not be forgotten, Sir, that the first wish of these gentlemen, at the opening of the Session, was to have a dissolution of Parliament, and an appeal to the people on this question. But, Sir, the party to which we belong and to which the people have entrusted the right of rendering a verdict upon all measures submitted to this House, is, in my opinion, the only competent tribunal, and the only one authorized to render a verdict upon this important question; and I will even say that no tribunal is loss competent to judge this question than the whole population of the country. However intelligent and well informed the people may be, after the sagacious remarks made by our Prime Minister upon this subject, after the remarks made by that skilful statesman, who has for so many years conducted the ship of state with so much wisdom and ability, and who, in 1878, when this ship, in the hands of the Liberal party, was on the point of sinking saved, it from an inevitable shipwreck, it would be contrary to the British constitution to submit a question of such importance for the approval and discussion of the entire people. But, Sir, how is it that in 1874, those hon. gentlemen, who so heartily endorsed the scheme of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), did not then see fit to submit to the popular verdict this scheme which, in the opinion of the House and of the entire people, contained conditions infinitely more onerous than those contained in the contract now before us? Sir, it is easy to answer that question: it is because these gentlemen, caring for the public interests and knowing that the completion of this great work would redound to the credit of the Conservative party, have constantly endeavored to prevent the passing of this contract. If, on the other hand, it is asked why the Conservative party in 1874 did not see fit to request the late leader of the Opposition to submit his scheme for public approval, the answer is equally easy: it is because the Conservative party, ever mindful of the public interests, and actuated by patriotic motives, has never, on any occasion, opposed the passing of a measure that was calculated to promote the interests of the country. Whence we must conclude, Sir, that the motto of the Liberal party is: "The interest of the party before everything," whilst that of the Conservative party is: "The interest of the country above all." Sir, although those gentlemen declared themselves tavorable to the scheme submitted to the House in 18/4 by their leader, since that time they have unceasingly made a great outcry before this House and before the country, against the building of the Pacific Railway, which, according to them, would lead the country into ruin and bankruptcy; and to day that the Government has found the means of building this great railroad without cost to the country, to-day that the Government has found the means of ridding us of a great responsibility that was imposed upon us by the construction and working of this road, they again cry out against the scheme, preventing thereby the development and prosperity of the country. Sir, I have not the intention of going into the details of the measure; I do not intend proving to this House that the conditions of the present contract are infinitely less onerous than the conditions of the two contracts previously submitted to our consideration. That is not my intention, for I am well aware that the question has been discussed thoroughly and at length by several hon. members, and it would be useless to repeat what has been said on this subject. The following verses of the celebrated poet Boileau could well be applied to the present occasion:

I think, Sir, that before long the Government will be sleeping on their laurels. Before concluding, may I be allowed to make one remark. Whilst regretting to see the position taken by the Liberal party upon this question; whilst regretting to see these hon, gentlemen actuated by partizan motives only, and striving against their own convictions, I nevertheless must rejoice to see this great question of the Pacific Railway, which in 1873 gave rise to that imaginary scandle which scandalized the Liberal party, that highly scrupulous party will be the means of immortalizing, in the annals of the political history of the country, the name of our leader and his colleagues who have so powerfully aided him in the realization of this scheme which, I am satisfied, will be crowned with complete success. In conclusion, I have a last remark to make, it is this: I hope, and am convinced, that the Government will not allow in this contract a clause that might affect the interests of one Province or of another; that they will not allow anything in this contract that may affect the interests of any railway company or another; but, on the contrary, they will see to it that the interests of each Province is protected, and that the interests of every railway company now existing are respected. With this hope and this conviction I declare myself favorable to the contract now submitted to our consideration.

Mr. SPROULE. The importance of this subject is the only excuse which I have for troubling the House at this late stage of the debate. The question is one of the utmost importance to the country from whatever point of view it is considered. If we consider the fact that the road will be a great commercial thoroughfare through a country that it is over 4,000 miles long, that it will carry the trade of an area of country that consists of over 250 millions of acres of land, we cannot fail to regard the subject as of surpassing interest to the people of this country. Viewed simply as a financial question it is also important. We have now a national debt of $147,000,000, and when we consider that the amount which will be expended in the undertaking before it is finished will equal if not exceed that amount, we must regard the question as one of great importance. In viewing this subject the question which naturally suggests itself to our minds is whether we are paying too much for the road under this contract or not—whether we will get an ample return for the expenditure. As a rule it is only by the comparison of work by work that we are able to determine whether a certain piece of work is too expensive. Now we have a road on this continent which, I think, by its similarity to this, by its passing through a section of country very similar to that through which this passes, by the fact that its condition at a certain period of its history has been selected as a standard for the building of this road, and by the fact that it was built by the same class of capitalists, affords us a very fair means of comparison. The Union Pacific is only 1,029 miles long not one-half as long as the Canadian Pacific Railway-and according to a return which was made to the Secretary of the Interior, that road cost $112,259,360, or an average of $113,110 a mile. The Central Pacific, which is also a road very much similar to ours, cost $114,388 per mile; and as we can ascertain very closely what the Canadian Pacific Railway will cost under the present scheme, we can very easily make a comparison with these two roads. We have another mode of arriving at a comparison. I find from a return given in Trout's "Railways of Canada," that the average cost of railways in the Dominion per mile is $56,5 12. The average in the United States is a little more, $60,425. I think when we make these comparisons we can easily see that we are getting a very good bargain for the country. If we take the lands at $2 per acre, which seems to be by general admission a fair valuation, we have $50,000,000 in lands; we have $25,000,000 in cash; we have $28,000,000 for the completed road, making in all $103,000,000. Now when we find that the Union Pacific, which is only 1,029 miles long, cost $112,000,000, and our road which is 2,700 miles long, costs only $103,000,000, I think it will be admitted we are getting good value for our money. The average cost of railways in the Dominion is $56,532 per mile; that of the Canadian Pacific Railway is only about $28,888, so that viewed in that light too, the result is the same. These are calculations which can be easily made; we know the amount of eash; we know the quantity of land and its value; we know what it cost to build those portions to be completed, so that we can consider, with reasonable certainty that we are not going to lose the large amount of money which the hon, members of the Opposition have predicted. Some hon, gentlemen claim that the views of the people have never been expressed upon this method of building the railway. It has been argued that the country has never endorsed this method of building the road. Speaking from my own part of the country that for the last two or three elections. especially after it was announced that the policy of building a through line had been abandoned, and that it had been decided to utilize the water stretches, this question was discussed before the electors. We might ask hon. members of this House who contend that the electors have never had a chance of pronouncing upon this question, what was the occasion of the great reversal of opinion that characterized the election of 1878. There is no doubt that the National Policy had a great deal to do with it, but I can assure the hon. gentlemen that in my section of the country the result was influenced by the expenditure that was being carried on by the late Government in reference to building the Canadian Pacific Railway. People did not believe that it was in the interest of the country that the railway should be built piecemeal, as the Government was then building it. I may ask those hon. gentlemen why, if that question was so forcibly laid upon the electors, did this policy of the We hear water stretches cease to be attractive? them to-day, supporter of nothing of them although there the old Government scarcely throughout the country in 1874 who was not prepared to defend that method of building the Canadian Pacific Railway. Moreover, the people became disgusted in reading the developments of waste and extravagance in the Foster contract, the Kaministiquia job, the Fort Francis Locks, when $100,000, $40,000 and $50, 00 were divided amongst contractors. The people finally concluded that the water stretches were only a sham. In every instance, when I have been able to take the sense of the people, I have invariably found that it was their desire to have the railway built by a company, and not by the Government. The history of the construction of all public works shows that they cost more when constructed by the Government than when constructed by private companies. Again the question will suggest itself, what do we gain by giving this contract to a private company? Several calculations have been made with reference to the cost of the Pacific Railway. I find that the average cost of the railway already built in the Dominion by the Government is $56,572 per mile. But we are getting the Canadian Pacific Railway built for $28,880, therefore we must save a great deal of money. If this road was built by the Government at the average price I have Government at the average price I have mentioned, it would cost $152,506,400. Taking from that the Government grant of land and money, $78,000,000, we find the difference is $74,536,400 which is saved to the country by letting the contract to a private company. In this estimate I value the land at $1 an acre. Here, I may say, that I think the valuation that has been put on that land by hon, gentleman is entirely erroneous. They quote from returns made with reference to railroads in the United States who have sold the lands after the railway is built, and after the land has been increased in value by the building of the road. Now the Ontario Government has found that the price of land is about $1.50 an acre, and that in a Province where there are railroads everywhere sequently land in the far west where there are no railways within hundreds or thousands of miles, cannot be worth as much as in Ontario. We cannot value the land after the railway is built, because land always advances in value. In my section of country the building of a railway has doubled the value of land, and it will be so in the North-West, consequently I say that $1 an acre is a fair value to put on the land of the North-West at the present time. The amount of money the Government will pay, together with the land at $1 an acre, and the $20,000,000 we will pay for finishing that part of the road to be given to the Company, will in all amount to $78,000,000. Taking this sum from the $152,000,000 that this railway will cost, if it costs as much as the Union Pacific Railway, which is to be the standard, you will find that there is a balance, as I said before, of $74,536,400. I say we absolutely gain that sum by giving this contract to a Syndicate. We gain this sum because I claim the Syndicate can never build the road for $78,000,000. The history of the building of railroads in the Dominion of Canada and the United States has told us in the most unmistakable language that it is impossible to build the road for that amount of money, and as a natural consequence they have to raise the money. Now, where will they get this money? They must bring it from Europe and other countries. Therefore, by giving this work to a private company, we not only occupy the North-West country with railroads, but we get the benefit of at least $74,536,000 which they will have to bring here and spend in the country. There is another substantial benefit which will accrue to the country by giving this work to a company, and that is with respect to immigration. In looking over the history of railroads, especially in the Western States, where railway companies have received large grants of land, and where these companies have found it to be to their advantage to get their lands settled as rapidly as possible, we find that they have adopted various schemes of immigration, and spent large amounts of money to get people to settle upon their lands and enhance their value, and to give them a return in the produce carried over their roads. It is estimated that these companies have spent about 75 cents an acre for these purposes. On the same calculation, the amount which this Company will spend, in order to get 25,000,000 acres settle | will be $18,750,000, and they will virtually aid the Government to that extent in promoting immigration in the interest of the country. tion and yet we only brought a few people to total of 2,149 miles, which is not equal to the length this country, and when we add to that the sum I of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and runs through a Mr. SPROULE.

have named, hon, gentlemen will see what a substantial benefit will accrue to the country by giving this contract to the Syndicate; without saying anything of the money brought into the country by the immigrants, and the amount they will contribute to the revenue of the country in the shape of Customs duties. It may be asked what are we saving by giving this road to a company? We are not only saving the difference between what this road will cost the country and the average cost of building railroads in the Dominion of Canada—in other words, the difference between $28,888 a mile, the cost of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and $112,113 a mile, the cost of the Union Pacific Railway-but we are saving the amount of money to be turned over by the Company to the gration system of We this country. have some little experience of running railroads in Canada, and we may ask if it cost us in one year $716,083 to run the Intercolonial Railway, a road 800 miles long, passing through three settled provinces where there is large trade, what must be the cost of running a road 2,700 miles long, and running for nearly its whole length through a country that is unsettled? Upon the basis of the cost of the Intercolonial, making no allowance for the difference of the countries through which the two railways run, the Pacific Railway would cost us $2,416,767 a year. If we remember that for the next ten years this road must be a non-paying road, and take half the cost of running the road, estimated by the hon, member for West Middlesex (Mr Ross), or $3,000,000 a year, we find that for the ten years before that road will become self supporting, it will cost to run it $30,000,000. If we add to that sum the $18,750,000 given to this country for the encouragement of immigration, it will amount to $48,000,000, nearly equal to the amount of land and money together given by the Government for the building of the road. Many hon, members ask if the Company will be likely to build and run the road provided this bargain is ratified. According to the calculation of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), the Company will derive profit of at least $75,000,000 by building the road, and if that is the case I think we shall have little difficulty of persuading the people of this country that the Syndicate will build the road and run it after it is built. The next question asked is, will the Company be likely to build the easier section of the road and then take the profits that accrue from that and leave the rest in the hands of the Government. Some hon gentlemen opposite have, in the same speech, tried to prove that the Company would make millions out of the road, and then, in the same speech, that they would only build the easier section and leave the rest in the hands of the Government. If I would offer advice to hon, gentlemen opposite, I would advise them to hold one more caucus and agree on some system of argument that would at least have the merit of consistency, and not have one section trying to prove with all the force, energy and eloquence they possess that the country will be ruined oy giving this Syndicate the building of the road, and and another with equal force, energy and eloquence arguing that they will build only one part and then abandon the rost of the work. I believe the conclusion the people will arrive at will be that their arguments are as equally fallacious and inconsistent on this subject as they have been on other great questions. Again the question arises: Are we giving too much land to the Company for building the road? Figures have been cited to show the amount is disproportionate to the grants given to United States rai roads. I fail to see where hon, gentlemen opposite got their figures. On referring to the United States returns, I find that the Union Pacific and Central Pacific got 35,00,000 acres of land. The length of the one Last year we spent about $183,000 in immigra- road is 1,029 miles, and that of the other 1,122 miles, a more populated country. Yet those roads get 35,000,000 acres, while ours only got 25,000,000. The Northern Pacific, which was not as hard to construct or as long as ours, got 47,000,000 acres of land grant; the Atlantic and Pacific received 42,000,000 acres; and we find that up to 1878 the United States granted, for the building of railways and canals, 224.056.718 acres of land. It is claimed that now a days too much land is given to railway companies. If we look at the unparalleled progress which has characterized the States that have lately come into the Union, these States which only a short time ago were a wilderness, the great advancement in material wealth which they exhibit is the best evidence we can have of the wisdom of the policy proposed, though we give proportionately a much smaller amount than was given by the United States. I believe in 1825, the first railway was built in the United States, and at present there are 96,000 miles of railway there. Do they regret that they have given over 224.000,000 acres of land for the building of railways? The history of that country is the best argument to the contrary. Now we have another proposed Syndicate before this House which has been sprung on us at a very late period, and which appears to have been sprung on us with the object of making some political capital for the next elections. There is evidently no sincerity in the new offer. If we look at the names, we find that most of those gentlemen have made money in this country, and the fact of men having made money is the best evidence that they are not ready to risk it without considerable enquiry beforehand. Is it to be supposed that men who are thousands of miles apart will agree to come together and amalgamate in a Syndicate to enter into an enterprise that must cost a large outlay? Knowing so little as these men must know about the undertaking, I would like to ask these hon, gentlemen who throw out this Syndicate as a hurt to the country, if one man of the proposed Syndicate has passed over the line of the proposed railway, or gone to the trouble of making any calculation as to its cost or as to what return it will give? There is no evidence at all to satisfy an intelligent public that they have given the question the consideration it would naturally demand considering the large investment of the money it would involve. The fact that they have proposed to put up so much money, but only after they were sure that their proposition could not be entertained, is the best evidence of their want of singerity. No company, would need to of their want of sincerity. No company would pretend to put their money in a concern without scrutinising it from every side so that they would see they would get a return for their money. No company would throw up their money hap-hazard and say: we are going to build the railway although we do not know what it will cost, or anything about it. The hon, member for Gloucester has spoken in eulogistic terms of the personnel of this proposed Syndieate; and says they are men whom to know is but to respect-men incapable of doing wrong. If I were in need of a character I would like to have that hon, gentleman as a friend. I think he would be very likely to give me a good one. Considering that we know some of the new Syndicate, and that their action in the past has been so questionable, and that very strong comments respecting one member at least have been made by one of the judges, we may assume that they are not men of integrity. When a judge remarked that he could as easily believe that a man dipped in a lake could be taken out dry, as that a certain member was not guilty of personal corruption, we must admit that the integrity of some of them is not what it is represented. If we judge those members who we do not know, by those whom we do, we must conclude that they are not the kind of men we should like to see building this road. Again, when we remember that the majority have been defeated in constituencies, it is pregumable that they are stewardship, as strong as we are to-day. Every argument only acting in concert to get up some scheme that they can use when they try again to get elected in the country. I believe the people see through their scheme. As some of the organs of the hon. gentlemen opposite have talked much of the great crowds of people brought together to discuss the Government policy, and of their resolutions of sensure, correct reports, however, have shown that some of the Opposition meetings have been thoroughly partizan and one-sided in discussion and action. In my constituency during the holidays I found the opinion prevalent among Conservatives, Independents, and able Reformers alike that it was in the interest of the country that the road should be handed over and built by a company. In that section two meetings were held, and it was represented that a requisition was handed in to the Mayor of Meaford, asking him to call a public meeting to discuss this question. I saw one of those requisitions; it contained the names of six of the most inveterate Grits to be found in the East Riding of Grey. I could not help suspecting the integrity of men who had spoken of a large requisition and the decision arrived at as an influential expression of public opinion; for they had only, at the first meeting, I am informed, about 50 people present, the speaking was all one-sided, and the resolutions previously prepared. On another occasion a meeting was held where the people had had more time. What was the result? The resolutions in favor of the Government policy were carried by over two to one. I believe that if the country registered its verdict the vote would be two to one in favor of the Government scheme. For this reason, and holding these views, I believe it my duty to vote against the amendment. I think that the advantage that would accrue to the country from the scheme of the first Syndicate, would be much greater than if the railway wore built as a Government work. Where, again, would the new Syndicate obtain the capital to build the road? We know they would require $75,000,000 over and above the Government grant, even provided they were able to sell their lands immediately. Could they go to Europe and raise money? No doubt their names are high sounding in the Dominion, and that they could raise a little money here; but I believe that in Europe their attempt to float the bonds or their own, would prove a sad spectacle to the country, that they would fail. I am convinced that the connection of the first Syndicate with Germany, France, England. and the United States, is another strong reason why they should get this contract. For years this country has felt a great want in reference to immigration from Germany, which we have never been able to attract, valuable as it would be to us. I am sure that if the scheme is carried out, a system of emigration would be organized that will secure masses of the best emigrants from Germany and France. Not only would the Syndicate be able to raise all the money wanted, but to apply in the working of our road their railway experience gained in the United States. They will use their influence to give this country the benefit of the railroads they own in the States. The argument of hon. gentlemen opposite, that they would make the Canadian Pacific Railway subservient to their road in the Western States, reminds me much of Lord Dundreary's idea of the tail wagging the dog. If men with only 3,000,000 acres will sink their interest in 25,000,000 for the advantage of the 3,000,000, and if men with 2,700 miles of road will sacrifice their interest in it for one of 100 miles long, they will act very unreasonably; indeed, all things considered we should be justified in voting down the amendment and carrying as speedily as possible the Government scheme. The member for West Middlesex said that if we supported it, on going back to our constituents we should meet with disappointment; but I am sure we should come back, after giving such an account of our

and epithet has been used to make the friends of the Government believe that its policy is going to ruin the country. We heard the same predictions as to the National Policy, and believe we shall have the same experience in regard to the present policy. Efforts have been made to delude the people, and induce them to believe that they are being robbed for nothing; but they can see through such statements. The member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) said that this was the most gigantic railway swindle of the nineteenth century, which makes me think of an anecdote of a celebrated mayor in the Southern States. It happened to be the custom of that county, if one was telling extravagant stories or attributing extraordinary virtues to some prominent man, to say that he was the greatest man in the county except the mayor. The custom became so prevalent, of thus honoring the mayor, that when it was neglected the offender was fined. A stranger came to that part of the country who did not understand the custom, and while illustrating the importance of a certain individual he said he was the greatest man in Tennessee. A gentleman present suggested, that he should except the mayor. The stranger replied that he made no exception. The consequence was that he was brought before a magistrate and fined $5, that official reminding him, at the same time, of the custom of making comparisons. The stranger replied: "All I have got to say is that you are the greatest fool in Tennessee—except the mayor." When the hon. gentleman said that the contract was the greatest railway swindle in the nineteenth century, I think he should have added—except the swindle of the new Syndicate.

Mr. TROW. I shall not discuss at any length a subject which has been debated with such great ability by hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House. I have listened with great attention to the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite, but I have failed to find a single argument advanced upon the merits of the Government scheme or Stephen's contract. The burden of their song has been that the member for West Durham and the hon member for Lambton had, in previous years, provided certain plans for the construction of the railway—that they had passed the Act of 1874, and that they were as anxious to build the road as the present Administration were. It seems to me that the real question before the House, is whether it is desirable in the interests of the country to accept the present offer, or whether we can obtain a more favorable one. Hon. gentlemen seem to evade the second offer altogether. For my part I am not favorable to either proposition; I think the railway could be constructed by the Government—much more cheaply—tor a less sum of money than it could be done by either of the two companies. We have access into the North-West now by the Pembina Branch, and I, for one, think we should have no hositation in availing ourselves of United States Railways, to reach our own territories, if we find it to our advantage to do so. The Americans have no such hesitation in crossing our country; in fact, they are in possession of the Canada Southern Railway, and a large proportion of American trade passes through our midst. If the construction of a through line by Sault Ste. Marie would have a tendency to divert American trade into this country, I think it would be an advantage to us to have such connection. Such a road would naturally attract the trade of northern Wisconsin, northern Michigan, a large portion of Daketa and the whole of Minnesota, which is now thickly inhabited and is rapidly increasing in wealth and population; and this trade would be of the greatest advantage to this country. The carrying trade of England has been a great source of wealth to that country; it has reached to such an extent that England now carries us is one of great importance, and I do not think the time taxation. We find throughout the country that there is no Mr. SPROULE.

that has been spent in discussing it heretofore has been lost, and if the debates were to last a few days or a few weeks longer it would be an advantage to the people by letting them know the enormous expense we are about to incur for the construction of the railway. It is true we are bound under arrangements with British Columbia to construct this line, but the question is one of time and increase of taxation. If our financial position would allow it, I would say, proceed with the work at once. But it is our object to construct the railway on the cheapest possible terms, and I know that the people outside—the electors of my own county, at all events-can see very clearly the difference between $25,000,000 and $22,000,000; or, between 25,000,000 acres of land and 22,000,000 acres. This discussion has done good in other ways. We find that the supporters of the Administration are not all united on this subject. I have noticed that there is some little dissension in the Ministerial camp. The member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) advised the Opposition to hold another caucus, in order to get united with regard to this subject; but I would suggest the same thing for his own friends for they seem to require some unanimity. I know that at the second caucus they held this contract was considered by many very objectionable—a bitter pill for the hon. gentlemen to swallow-that they were told there was no alternative. It is alleged that the leader of the Government persuaded them that they had either to go to their constituents or swallow the contract. Under these circumstances these hon, gentlemen were not prepared to go to the country. It is true that the member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) threw out a challenge to the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) for one particular riding, but we throw out a broader challenge: let the Conservative members throw all the constituences open.

Mr. BOWELL. Does the hon. gentleman say that he knows the leader of the Government said that.

Mr. TROW. No; I say there was a rumor to that effect. Mr. BOWELL. It is an imagination of your brain, I

Mr. TROW. We have heard it rumored that several hon. gentlemen would like to have alterations made in the contract, and some of them have said so in their speeches. My friend from South Norfolk (Mr. Wallace) advocates a different mode of construction in his paper-a very creditable journal, and one which I believe has a large circulation in his part of the country. I will read an extract from what he says:

what he says:

'As we are opposed to the road being controlled by a company, and have heard no reasons assigned to induce us to alter our opinion, we cannot give our approval to the contract. When it is ratified, as we suppose it will be, we can only hope that our fears of evil to the country from placing the road under the control of a company, will prove groundless. It is from no fractious spirit, from no desire for notoriety, from selfish or unworthy motive that we have acted in the past, and shall, in the future, act in reference to this question. If our course meets the approval of friends, we are pleased. If it does not, we regret it, but would not change it if we could, for we have done and will do, what we believe right in the matter. If we sacrificed our convictions to please our friends, we would despise ourselves, and would be deserving of the contempt of all honorable men."

Now, this is the writing and expresses the sentiments of the hon. member for South Norfolk, and I should judge from the tone of this article that he is not in accord with the Government, and is inclined to vote against it. We find the hon. member for Halton (Mr. McDougall), a thorough statesman whose opinion must be valued, saying that he is not prepared to accept this contract without considerable amendments. We find the hon. member for Dundas (Mr. Ross) has gone over it carefully, and he only takes exception to one word. but that word is a very important one, and has great significance, it is the word forever. He pointed out to the about 70 per cent. of the whole trade of the United States, Government that the term should be limited, and that five or to the great a lyantage of England. The question before ten years would be a sufficient time to exempt the road from Government that the term should be limited, and that five or unanimity of feeling in the Conservative party. The tone of the Conservative press is adverse to the scheme. We see articles daily in the Reading Room here opposing the ratifying of the contract before the House. Petitions are pouring in daily, signed by thousands. I was sorry to hear the hon. member for Kings, Prince Edward Island (Mr. Muttart) say that these petitions were unreliable. He says some were signed by dead men and others were repeaters. that is the case, I regret that such petitions have been presented. But that is a mere matter of veracity between hon gentlemen. I am satisfied the Senators that went down there and aided in getting up this petition would not do a dishonorable act; and as for the hon, member for Prince (Mr. Yeo), if he took any interest in the matter, we are all satisfied that he would not admit any signature to be placed on the petition that was not genuine. I do not wonder that the hon, gentleman feels uneasy when he finds that nearly one-fifth of the electorate of the Island have signed that petition. There are not over 25,000 electors on the Island, and the petition produced here was signed by nearly 5,000 names. The hon, gentleman read several letters, purporting to have been written him from the Island, alleging that the petitions are not reliable. I would like to see the original documents, and I would like to know what authority he had to produce them. The hon, member for Kings further said that as far as the Island is concerned the electorate was indifferent whether the Government gave away the whole North-West or not-at last he qualified his assertion by stating that they did not care if it would not increase taxation. I would advise my hon, friend to instruct his electors a little on that subject. If he informs them that it will cost about $15 a head of the population, he will find that they will form a different opinion entirely, and that they will not be prepared to give up Judging from the statement Finance last evening, I sho North West. the Minister of Finance last evening, I should say that the Islanders are a happy people. He considered that the Islanders, above all others of the Dominion, had no right to complain, because they had received since Confederation about $1,000,000 more than they had contributed to the revenue of this country. Now, I should say that after receiving that amount as a gift they ought to be happy indeed if they contribute nothing toward the expenditure. The hon, member for Kings made another unguarded statement—that the Mackenzie Administration had expended $18,000,000 in building both ends of the road and leaving a large gap in the middle, that is from Prince Arthur's Landing to Selkirk. Now, I presume he will credit the statement of the Minister of Railways, who says that the whole 406 miles from Fort William to Selkirk will cost without equipment only $14,000,000; the present Administration have constructed 183 miles of the gap in the centre, so that there is a great discrepancy between the figures of the hon, member for King's and those of the Minister of Railways, and I accept the authority of the Minister of Raiways in preference to that of the hon. member for King's. We find that the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) also makes some extraordinary statements. He concluded his remarks by saying that it would be absurd to think that the members of the Syndicate would divert emigration and trade from the Canadian road to the St. Paul and Manitoba road, and that the line of railway in Minnesota belonging to the Syndicate was only 100 miles in length, and that it would be absurd to imagine that they would lose the carriage of hundreds of miles for the purpose of conveying freight about 100 miles on the line in Minnesota. That hon, gentleman is not surely acquainted with the geography of that country, or he would know that this same Syndicate are in possession of nearly 600 miles of railway instead of 100. The hon, member for East Grey stated that the proposition of the new Syndicate must have been made up by interested gentlemen on the floor of this House—that my hand from the Board of Trade.

they have no knowledge of the geography of the country, or of the expense of the work, or of the engineering difficulties to be encountered, and consequently it was a hap-hazard offer made for a political purpose and not genuine. Now, I would like to know if these capitalists who have deposited $1,500,000 in the banks, while the others have deposited nothing, and who are composed of the best commercial men in the country, have not as much knowledge of the country and the road as the others. They have access to the reports of the engineers, as well as the others, and no doubt they know as much about the cost of railway construction. I am a little surprised that the personal character of any of these gentlemen should be called in question by hon, gentlemen on the floor of this House. I am personally acquainted with several of these gentlemen, and I think they will bear comparison with the first Syndicate, that is, if we take the statement of the First Minister in reference to one member, at any rate, of the Stephen's Syndicate. That hon. gentleman had no hesitation, on the floor of this House, of calling him everything but a gentleman. I do not think it is proper to say that these gentlemen are defeated Grits, consequently unworthy. I can see some hon. gentlemen be. fore me who have been defeated, and I do not think it is in any way disparaging to a man's character or reputation if the electors of a certain riding do not choose to elect him. I think Mr. Gladstone and Lord Beaconsfield have been defeated. The right hon, leader of the Government was defeated in Kingston; the hon. member for Cardwell, who brought up the matter to day, has, I think, been defeated three or four times, and I do not think our respect for him should be less on that account. The hon, member for Grev made a very amusing effort to disparage the meetings held in his section. At one meeting, he state I, there happened to be six Grits. He did not tell us how many Tories there were, but he acknowledged that the six Grits carried the meeting. I do not see that the Conservative party were debarred from holding meetings. They had the same number of holdays that we had. I would like to know how many of them held meetings in their own ridings. Not one that I know of, they were afraid to face the electors on this question. Why, I endeavored to the utmost of my ability to induce the hon. member for North Perth to hold a meeting in Stratford, where he resides, but he would not do so. I held meetings at four different places in my riding. One of these meetings the hon, member for North Perth attended. There were present several hundred electors, of whom I am satisfied from 50 to 200 were Conservatives, and only one in the audience voted against the resolution condemning the Government scheme. That one was the hon. member for North Perth. The ex-member for North Perth in the Local Legislature, Mr. Guest, a very respectable gentleman and an ultra-Conservative, sat beside my hon. friend from North Perth, who fully expected that he would stand up with him, but when my hon. friend stood up Mr. Guest kept his seat; and at the close of the meeting he went on the platform and expressed his astonishment that the Government would attempt to ratify a bargain so monstrous, against the interests of the country.

Mr. HESSON. Did Mr. Guest sign your petition?

Mr TROW. I have not looked over the petition, but I guarantee that the names on it are all genuine. We find that not merely is the Conservative press of the country opposed to the ratifying of this contract, but that the Boards of Trade and leading citizens of Toronto, Montreal and other towns, are opposed to it.

Mr. GAULT. The Montreal Board of Trade distinctly voted in favor of carrying out the contract.

Mr. TROW. We find in the Conservative press of Montreal, duily, articles condemning the contract.

Mr. GAULT. I would like to read you a letter I have in

Mr. RYAN. Name the Conservative press that has condemned the contract.

Mr. TROW. I can sympathize with the hon, members. I know that they are uneasy, there is scarcely an hon. gentleman on that side that goes willingly to the front, and that there is only one alternative that keeps them in place. If there is a body of men who should know the wants and wishes of the great North-West, it is the Legislative Council of Manitoba. That body, composed of Conservatives, strong supporters of the present Administration, with the exception of Mr. Hay, passed a unanimous vote condemning the contract, and calling on the Government to make quite a number of alterations in it. Were the desks of hon. gentlemen opposite examined, I have no doubt they would be found to contain extensive correspondence from leading men in their own constituencies, urging upon those hon. gentlemen not to ratify the contract. I have no doubt the hon, member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) has got scores of letters from citizens of Stratford and neighborhood, urging him strongly to oppose the contract.

Mr. HESSON. Not one. Let hon, gentlemen opposite examine their deeks.

Mr. TROW. These hon, gentlemen are determined to sacrifice their own convictions, because there is only one alternative, go to the polls, or swallow the dose. This question is of vital importance. It has to be treated seriously and I hope hon, gentlemen opposite will consider it seriously before it reaches its final stage. The policy of the Government in a great country like that should be distribution and not centralization. There has been to much centralization already. The settlers complain every hour against speculators.

Mr. RYAN. I would ask the hon, gentleman if he has not speculated in lands in that country, and quite right too?

Mr. TROW. I purchased 320 acres from the Government, and that is to be divided between two of my sons. If that is too much I will sell it to you. I question whether there is an hon. member of this House or a private individual in this country, who has had the opportunities I have had in the North-West to purchase lands, and who has bought as little as I have. I have been there on three different occasions and could have purchased lots, half-breed claims, 240 acres, for $40 or $50. 1 could have bought tens of thousands of acres at this rate, but I was determined that I for one would not speculate, because my desire was to keep down speculation to the best of my ability. The trouble in the North-West, more particularly Manitoba, is that there are so many reserves. The Hudson's Bay Company, that prize monopoly, obtained a charter over the whole country. Many leading statesmen, I think the hon, member for Halton among them, alleged they should not have their claim to the fee simple of the soil a knowledged, that it was animaginary right. Our Government, however, considered it advisable to purchase that claim for $1,460,000, giving them 50,000 acres of land, of which they could select the location. Instead of taking it in blocks, they selected 132 sites in that country. In Winnipeg, where they should have taken ten acres, they took 500 acres, which was worth to-day $1,500,000. The agreement made with the Company was one which should never have been entertained. They also received 1,280 acres in each township of six miles square. The half-breeds have 1,500,000 acres reserved in different parts of the little Province of Manitoba, that only contains 9,000,000 acres; some half million acres have been reserved for the Mennonites, and a large proportion of the balance is almost all in the hands of speculators. We find the settlers have removed to the North-West, and have settled along the various trails for 200 miles to the west. Wc find them at Prairie Portage, at Beautiful Plains, at Birdtail at the Little Saskatchewan, at Shoal Lake, and 400 miles Mr. Trow.

beyond, between the two Saskatchewans. They had to remove to so remote a district, to these unsettled portions of the country in consequence of the lands being in the hands of speculators, which would remain unsettled because they ask $10 to $12 an acre for lands that should be given to the honest settlers for $1 an acre. As I said before, distribution should be the order of the day and not centralization, which the Government are proposing under this scheme. If the locking up of one or two million acres in Manitoba has been so unsatisfactory to the settlers in that little Province, what will they think of the Government now about lecking up a territory three times the size of Manitoba? The objects and interests of the Company will be, of course, to allow the settlers to improve the country and enhance the value of their lands, if we can induce them to go in there. If the arrangement was to be every alternate block of 20 miles settlers could form school sections, improve the roads, and devise some systematic way of getting along in the settlements. But here you have long strips, 24 miles in length, and there is no probability of settlers progressing, improving, enriching and developing the country. Under such a division the great North-West apparently is doomed. After relieving the people from the clutches and bondage of the Hudson's Bay Company some twelve years ago, the Government are now going to bind the people over to an infinitely worse corporation, and which will be unquestionably more oppressive. The country is now partially developed, and lands are improving in value. True the Government made a false estimate, and the hon. gentlemen on their side taunt the Opposition with their estimate of their value and the cost of this railway. The Opposition have placed no value on the lands. If we say $2, $3 or $5 per acre, it is the value placed on the lands by the Government twelve months ago. If the Government are wrong, we are not to blame; they fixed the value when they marked out the different belts. British Columbia came into the Union, in my opinion, on a ruinous bargain. The Government of that day, including members of the present Ministry, were not familiar with that country; very few had explored it, and little was known about it. The agents of British Columbia who came to arrange the terms of the Union must have misrepresented it. It was stated that the lands were good, that millions of acres along the railway route could be settled. Those terms, entered into by the Government, when in extremis, were diametrically opposed to the interests of this great country.

We acquired a territory not adapted, from all the information we have received from our engineers and explorers—or very little of it—adapted for agricultural purposes or colonization. It is questioned, even should the road be constructed through that sea of mountains, as British Columbia has been called, that it would not for many years pay the expense of greasing the wheels of locomotives. I think it would be advisable for the Government to consult the electors on this great undertaking.

Mr. RYKERT. That will be done.

Mr. TROW. The hon member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) says this subject was discussed at the last general elections, but I never heard a word of it; in my county it was the N. P., or, as some call it, the National Humbug that was discussed then very thoroughly. True, the present Government carried the day all over the Dominion; but we hope confidently for better times. The people are somewhat enlightened now. At all events, in the rural districts the farmers are satisfied that they have been defrauded—that the Government policy has not been merely a hostile policy to their interests, but diametrically adverse to their interests. We were not elected to undertake a work of such magnitude as this. The people's representatives in Parliament have had very little to say in the matter. The scheme seems to have been finally arranged by the Executive, we having only the right to discuss its morits and demerits. Ministers have settled the matter, and we are only here to carry out the terms of their agreement. The railway will cost the Government at least $60,000,000; the branch from Thunder Bay to Selkirk is estimated to cost $18,000,000; from Kamploops te Yale $10,000,000; from Yale to Port Moedy, $3,500,000; survey, $3,500,000; these with the $25,000,000 given to the Syndicate makes $60,000,000, besides 25,000,000 acres. The bargain having been ratified before we met, we might as well have proceeded to the other business of the Session, as spend our time discussing this question from day to day, previously arranged and settled by the Government. True, we make some headway daily. My friend from Monck (Mr. McCallum) laughs; I think he is partially converted to our views. He made some acknowledgments and had decided objections to the contract the other day, but the party whip has been round him and he is brought to his proper position. The leader of the Government stated that it was beneath the dignity of Parliament to consult the people, that they had no right to be consulted. There is a time coming when they, the people, our masters, will have something to say in this matter. He further stated that it was a matter of indifference whether the House met in November or February, that the work would go on-that the Syndicate were on the road to Europe to arrange their emigration scheme and prepare for the construction of the work. The member for East Grey had to condemn the mode of constructing the line from. Thunder Bay to Selkirk, which he considered useless as there was a gap in the centre, the road there being incomplete. Any one who is acquainted with the geography of that country knows that there is no possibility of letting the central section without finishing one or other of the ends, or both ends, and I say, therefore, that the policy of the Mackenzie Administration, in postponing the construction of the central section until after the ends were built, and especially the eastern end, by which material could be carried up by an excellent system of water communication, was a wise and proper policy. At the earliest possible moment the member for Lambton made arrangements for the construction of the Pembina Branch which gives access to that country by an all-rail route. Some people might not think it patriotic to advise communication through United States territory, but I have no hesitation in saying that it would have been a good thing for this country if the Northern Pa cific bonds had been purchased by the Government a few years ago, when they could have been purchased for seven or ten cents on the dollar, and thus given us control of that line from Duluth to Glynden, and to have purchased the charter from the German bondholders of the line to Pembina into our own territory, and thus probably have realized on that short line from St. Paul to St. Vincent a profit of probably $15,000,000 or $20,000,000. Hon, gentlemen over-look the difficulties which the Mackenzie Administration had to contend with when they came into power. The member for Lambton had a legacy of indebtedness left him by his predecessor. He had to finish the Intercolonial Railway, to assume the Prince Edward Island Railway, to provide for the Mounted Police, as well as large expenses under various treaties with the Indians. A succession of bad crops, year after year, had a tendency to retard importations, and, in these respects, millions had to be taken into account which hon, gentlemen do not consider. The Government say they had a surplus now, but I say it is an easy matter for a Finance Minister, or for a corporate body in cities, towns, or municipalities, to get a surplus. All they have to do is to tax the people—to add one cent, or the fraction of a cent, to the rate. I deny the statement made by the supporters of the Government that the plan proposed by the Mackenzie Administration for the construction of the railway was more expensive than the present contract. Some allege that the 20,000 acres and the $10,000 per mile is to be calculated for the whole line, but the Government took power from Parliament to advertise for tenders. They never calculated to spend that amount of money on the whole line. Its construction was to be thrown open to the competition of the world. Some of the prairie sections west of Winnipeg can be finished for less than $9,000 per mile, and it would be absurd to say that the terms I have mentioned applied to the whole line of the road. And further, hon, gentlemen must consider that the land appropristed was to be taken all along the road from one end to the other, and that two-thirds of it would be taken up east and west of the prairie section in a rocky and inhospitable country, where they would be of little value. But this Syndicate has a roving commission over the prairies; they need not take an acre of land east of Selkirk, or west of Edmonton, the eastern slope of the Rocky Mountains. It is said that they will not make many selections in the Territories 200 miles west of Winnipeg, because the country there is partially settled. It is true that very few deeds or pre-emption rights have been given to the people of the North-West, and this fact may be a cause of trouble to the settlers who are located there now. It is to be hoped the Government will not interfere with these settlers, even those who are squatters. I know that under the arrangement with regard to settlement which has prevailed in that country for the last year, there is not a single settler located there during that period but fears that he will be turned out if the contract is ratified. I have received several letters making enquiries on that point. The portion of country settled extends about 200 miles from Winnipeg, or near to Fort Ellice. The Syndicate will then have some 700 miles of territory to choose from, and I presume any hon. gentleman can make the calculation of the breadth of land which will be included. I find that it will take a strip of land 112 miles wide to make up the 25,000,000 that is given to the Syndicate, and the alternate blocks which are retained by the Government.

Mr. ROCHESTER. How much would it take for 54,000,000?

Mr. TROW. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman can calculate, but I promise him that I can. I have travelled over a large portion of that 700 miles myself, and I know that there are water stretches and lakes, and arid lands, sandy and stony land, and it cannot be supposed for a moment that the Syndicate will take anything but firstclass land. The result will be that they will have control of an immense region where they will not choose any land in payment; because where the lands are not adapted for colonization, the settler cannot be expected to occupy them, and the result is that the Syndicate will have absolute control of a territory three times 25,000,000 of acres. There is something very remarkable about the disparity of cost in connection with the construction of this road. It is well known that the prairie section is not very expensive to construct, and yet they receive a larger bonus on the prairie section than either for the eastern or western sections where there are engineering difficulties of great ex-We have the estimate of the comtent to encounter. tractors, that of the first 100 miles of the prairie section 70 or 80 miles are already constructed. We find from their statements that for the next 100 miles, at least, the cost will not be over $9,000 per mile; why, then, does the Government give $10,000 a mile and 12,500 acres of land per mile on this part of the road? For the first 200 miles the Syndicate will make a clear profit of $200,000 and 2,500,000 acres of land worth at least $2 per acre. On the next 400 miles there are engineering difficulties. With the exception of one bridge over the Saskatchewan, the land is very level and the cost of construction cannot be much. We find that the choice land that will be taken by the Syndicate all along the road, will be interrupted by some very large lakes, and the result is that on account of these breakages they will control, in my estimation and in the distance I have travelled, more than 50,000,000 acres that never can be settled by the Government, but will be under the absolute control of the Syndicate. I have read a statement in the report of Professor Macoun of 1877, when that gentleman was employed by the Government to examine that section towards the Qu'Appelle district, and we find in his report that the extension of the great American Desert runs up to near the line of the telegraph, and there are in that region at least 5,000,000 acres not adapted for settlement. We find in that report that from the Elbow of the South Saskatchewan, to near the slope of the Rocky Mountains, is a large track of land where there is no rain-fall, treeless, and the result is that there will be no possibility of colonization. There are probably on that section about 7,000,000 acres that will not be accepted by the Syndicate. Where will they go to find the 25,000,000 acres? They have large limits to select from; they have from the 49th to the 57th degree of latitude; a track 400 to 500 miles in width, by 700 in breadth. The hon member for Dundas has objected to the word "forever"; I have myself decided objection to another little word—"elsewhere." the Syndicate are not satisfied with this great territory they can go elsewhere. What does that mean? I would interpret that it means the Peace River district. We find that the Government are to satisfy all Indian claims. There are no claims south of the North Saskatchewan unsettled, and there is no object in satisfying Indian claims if this Syndicate has no right to run north of the Saskatchewan to the Peace River section. It is evident to my mind that the Government and the Syndicate intended that they should select lands in Peace River, which is supposed to be very fertile, and which would be a portion of the 25,000,000 acres. It is not supposed for a moment that they are compelled to construct branch railways, but they can register a map with the Minister of Railways and make their selection to and fro from the boundaries up to the line proper and monopolize the best portion of that great country. There is also a possibility of this Syndicate monopolizing the coal region of that country. It is known that there are extensive coal deposits near Edmonton, and there is nothing to prevent them from embracing within their limits the whole of that region. I will now draw a comparison of that country that will be under the control of the Syndicate with some other countries. We find that they will have control of a country seven times as large as Saxony, with a population of 2,556,244; six times as large as Wurtemburg, with a population of 1,818,559; nearly double as Bavaria, with a population of 4,861,400; nearly double old Prussia, with a population of 3,137,460; over three times the size of Belgium, which had a population of 3,360,018 in 1871; nearly one-third larger than Ireland, with a population of 5,411,416; twice as large as Nova Scotia; one and one half times as large as New Brunswick; five times as large as Massachusetts; four times the size of New Hampshire; nearly four times the size of Vermont, and one and one-third times the size of Maine. The company will absolutely control a territory twice the size of Prussia with a population of 24,693,063; one and one-half as large as France, with a population of 36,102,921, twice the size of Great Britain and Ireland, with a population of 31,857,338; five times the size of New York State, with a population of 4,382,559; four times the size of the State of Michigan, and five times the State of Pennsylvania. When we consider the immense territory that will be under the control of this Syndicate, it is time we should take the matter into serious consideration and discuss it dispassionately with the object of coming to a right onclusion with regard to this important matter. The hon, is about $14,000,000 which that country has cost the Mr. TROW.

member for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) made a statement with regard to the assessment of the Province of Ontario which it would not be well for the Syndicate to allow to go abroad, when they will be under the necessity of going to Europe to borrow money. The hon. gentleman must certainly have erred when he said the land in the great Province of Ontario was assessed at only $5 an acre.

I stated that in nine counties in Ontario, including Carleton, Lanark, Russell and Simcoe, the assessment was only $5.10 an acre, and it has not increased in the last sixteen years over seventeen cents an acre.

Mr. TROW. I think the hon, gentleman must have reference to non-residents' lands, and non-productive lands in these counties.

Mr. RYKERT. I speak of the whole lands.

Mr. TROW. The only county I can speak of is the County of Perth, where I have resided for thirty years. I do not know that the soil of that county is superior to that of most other counties in Ontario, and I am sure that more than half the land in that county has been assessed for many years for $50 an acre. There is scarcely a muncipality in the country that is assessed at less than $30 an acre, and the assessment of the whole country will average at least $40 an acre. One hon, member complained that the extent of the road-bed of this railway was not very well defined. I think also that it would be advisable to limit it to 100 or 200 feet, and to limit the quantity of land the Company shall hold for station grounds, dockyards, &c., as we do not know how much land they may select for these purposes. I see no reason why they should have these lands free from taxation for ever—why we should interfere with the rights of municipalities in the North-West. Even now this question is under discussion in the Legislature of Manitoba, while they are contemplating an enlargement of the limits of that Province, so that there is some danger of it affecting that Province. Several hon. gentlemen have said that the railway companies in the United States do not pay taxes. As the hon, member for North Norfolk showed, enormous sums are paid by railway companies, especially in the Western States, either directly or indirectly. The Union Pacific Railway, 1,597 miles in length, paid, from 1869 to 1873, on their lands, $835,023, and on their road-bed $279,-158, or a total of $1,114,181. The Central Pacific Railway, 1,213 miles in length, paid, in 1879, $378,986; the Illinois Central, 1,100 miles in length, $395,000, and other roads in the same proportion. We should expect that some return would be received from the lands of that great country which would pay a portion, at all events, of the expenditure in the construction of this line of railway. Manitoba has cost this country very large sums already, and, under existing circumstances, there is very little prospect of receiving any return for that expenditure. This Government has paid, up to 1879:

For the Mounted Police	$1.935.022	75
Immigration purposes	1,542,743	63
Public Works	1,378,308	16
Dominion Lands survey
Indian treaties	1.534.735	69
Hudson Bay Company	1,460,000	00
Dawson route	920,496	00
Expedition force
Subsidy	698,366
Boundary survey	379,046
Relief to settlers	83,403

The hon. member for Monck may laugh, but the Administration of which he is now such a strong supporter, occasionally expended $330,000 of that money on the Dawson route.

Mr. McCALLUM. How much did you give Curpenter? Mr. TROW. $70,000 in one year. The sum total Dominion. True, we have received a trifle from Customs and Excise, but is only a trifle compared to the expenditure. We have received from Customs in Manitoba, $1,381,368.57; from Excise, $148,962; sale of lands, $139,459.97, considerably less than $2,000,000, so that the country is indebted to the Dominion $12,000,000 over and above the expenditure on the Canadian Pacific Railway. There is something very unsatisfactory and unaccountable in the manner in which the Government are compelled under this contract to construct their portion of the road. The previous Administration intended to construct a firstclass road. The report of Mr. Fleming was to that effect, and the Government adhered strictly to that policy. The present Syndicate compel the Government to make their portion a first-class road—the grades are to be light, curves short and few in number, and everything is to be firstclass, while the Syndicate are at liberty to make their portion of the line in a flimsy manner, similar to that of the Union Pacific when first constructed. I cannot conceive why one portion of the road should be first-class and the other portion of indifferent quality. This will lead to inconvenience in the transmission of produce, as an engine will probably be able to draw double the number of cars on the Government work to that on the Syndicate portion, so that it strikes me forcibly the Syndicate have the best of the bargain in that respect. In our present financial condition, it is a ruinous policy on the part of the Government to undertake works that will not be profitable. The eastern section, from the reports of engineers and surveyors, is the most inhospitable, barren, rocky country that there is in the whole Dominion. In not one report can be found any authority to bear out the statement of the hon, member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson) that there are good lands along the line of the road in that section. It is questionable whether any portion of that section would ever be settled, and it will be perfectly out of place to expend twenty millions of dollars there when we can get access to the country through a better route by the Sault Ste. Marie and by way of Duluth, for two or three million dollars, which, I understand, will suffice to build the line from Callander Station to Sault Ste. Marie. The American capitalists are prepared to construct the road, the lands are surveyed, and locations. laid for the connection of the Northern Pacific and other American lines to that point. By constructing the road through by the Sault, you would have at all events, connection with Manitoba and the North-West in two or three years. You would have connection by lake navigation from the Sault to Thunder Bay, and with the line of railway from Thunder Bay to Winnipeg or Selkirk, which will be completed in seventeen or eighteen months; you would have immediate connection from the interior with your own country. The reports of practical Captains that have navigated those waters for many years, given here before a Parliamentary Committee, state that the lakes are open for the carriage of freight for eight months in the year. If the Minister of Railways were in his place, I should ask him whether the Syndicate has the right to construct bridges over the navigable waters of the North-West, to impede navigation. I see no restriction in the charter in this case, although there would be in the case of all other charters. I remember the difficulty raised in connection with the Coteau Bridge. In the North-West the Syndicate can impede the navigation of rivers by bridges across navigable streams.

Mr. RYKERT. What does the Act of 1879 say?

Mr. TROW. So far as the Syndicate is concerned, it is null and void in many instances. It applies to all other charters, but not to this. I might also ask the Minister of Railways, in reference to the development of cities and towns in the North-West, whether the Syndicate will be town may spring up as if by magic, and in such case should the Syndicate have power to retain contiguous lands till the honest or industrious citizens improve the value of their lands, probably 1,600 per cent? We are not aware whether they are allowed to lease their property in the same way as the Canada Company did in Western Ontario. They had the right to lease their property for seven, ten or tifteen years; and thousands of dollars were thus taken from the poor and honest settlers after improving the lands and enhancing the value of their property; those leases matured, the prices were increased on the settler, and many had to leave. Will the Syndicate have a similar right? I think, moreover, that the amount of money given to the Syndicate is out of all proportion to the value of the work performed. In justice to our constituents we should accept, at all events, the lowest tender, providing we accept of any. Work should either be done by the Government or let by tender; a local council will not think of constructing a bridge worth $500 without calling for tenders; and here millions are to be appropriated without consulting the people or allowing their representatives to have much to say in the matter. Compare this case with the line recently chartered by the Ontario Government from Gravenhurst to Lake Nipissing: a very rocky, uninviting country, probably something like that north of Lake Superior. That Government are appropriating $3,000 a mile for that road, for which capitalists are prepared to build it. It will be the same grade and guage as the Canadian Pacific, and applying the same cost to the Canada Pacific line for the 2,705 miles, it would reach $21,648,000, or $31,252000 less than the Government are prepared to pay the Syndicate, to say nothing of the 25,000,000 acres. The member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) considers that the Syndicate will certainly settle up their own lands by bringing out large mass of emigrants, and will save the Emigration Department, I think he said $18,000,000. The Government have been rather parsimonious in their votes for immigration purposes. I do not know any investment that would make a more ample return than in a proper systom of immigration. If the contract be ratified, and the Syndicate bring out to the North-West the surplus population of the Old World, it must benefit the whole Dominion. But the Syndicate have two or three million acres in the United States on the route of the Pembina Branch, and it is not to be supposed they will neglect the chance of first settling those lands which are taxed before settling, those in the Dominion that are free from taxation for 25 years at least, probably for 30 years, before the railway is completed. I had intended to notice some of the clauses of the contract, but the hour is late, and I have no intention of wearying the House. I shall not attempt to do so. The Opposition have no desire to protract this discussion, but I think it is due to the hon. gentlemen opposite, who are so blind to the interest of our country and determined to support the contract, to show their constituents some justification for the course they are pursuing. We have heard no argument from them so far, but simply statements that the member for West Durham or the member for Lambton had offered more liberal terms; years gone by, when the circumstances of the case was entirely different, when the North-West was shut out from colonization. Mr. Speaker, I may embrace another opportunity of entering more fully into the more objectionable terms of the contract.

Mr. ROCHESTER. Mr. Speaker, I had made up my mind that I would not trouble the House with any remarks of mine on this important question, but a great change has taken place since the very full and, to my mind, satisfactory explanation given to this House by the hon. Minister of Railways, with reference to the contract with the Syndicate. Judging from the reports that we have had from the Chief Engineer, and others that have visited the allowed to reserve large blocks of land in their vicinity. A North-West, I am well pleased, and think the Government has made a good bargain for the Dominion of Canada. Now, this great Pacific Railroad has been the general topic of discussion, both in and out of this House, for the last seven or eight or ten years, and I am safe in saying that the almost universal opinion is that this great work should be done by a company, and not by the Government, because the fact is that any private individual or company can get work done much cheaper than any Government. The Government is a most inefficient executive of public works, being confined to fixed routine, and beyond which they cannot travel. Long before ralways were built in the United States, Congress, by a small majority, authorized the construction of a Turnpike Road through Kentucky and Tennessee, called the Mysville Road. The public condemnation of the scheme, which was undertaken as a Government work, was so great that the scheme had to be abandoned, and then it became the settled policy of that Government to leave everything to individual enterprise that could possibly be accomplished in that way. Hence the liberal land and money subsidies which have been granted in aid of railways. These grants have been largely instrumental in causing the construction of 78,960 miles of railway in that country, costing up to the 1st of June, 1879, $4,589,948,793. Reserving for the gross earnings in the year ending January 1st, 1874, $490,103,351, of which amount three quarters was for freight and one quarter for passenger service, the average cost of construction per mile of the 78,960 miles, a large part of which runs through prairie country, is $51,543, which hon. gentlemen opposite will please make a note of, for these most extravagant calculations, calculations worthy of the hon. members for North Norfolk and South Ontario, who see everything in regard to our railway plans through Grit double-magnifying glasses, put the cost of our Pacific Railway at $40,000 a mile. You know, Sir, that it is a very common expression that what is public is everybody's business, is nobody's business; but this is not the case with the private individual or with a company. They will place men at the head of the works that they know from past experience will push the work through, and if they are good, practical business men, they will see themselves that the work is done. It is very often the case in large works, that something turns up in the prosecution of the work which is not shown on the working plan and not found in the specifications. Now, in a case of this kind, they will place men in charge who are capable of making any change that is requisite, and the work will go steadily on. Now, what would be the course pursued if the Government were doing the work? Why, there would be the "walking boss," and at the place whose duty it would be to report to his "boss," and so on until it reached a gentleman sitting in a very easy chair, well cushioned. In due course he would report to the Chief Engineer, who, perhaps, would be in Ottawa at the time, or perhaps in England, but the work could not be proceeded with until the man who, perhaps, was thousands of miles distant from the place, sent his orders to go on and make the change. Now, in all probability those works might have been stopped for days or weeks, and perhaps for months, in the best part of the working season. Those are some of the reasons why the Government cannot get work done as cheap as a private individual or company; this is patent to every practical business man in the country. This was the reason why the opinion was so often expressed by members on both sides of this House, as well as the general opinion outside, that this great work should be done by a company. The hon. the First Minister, in 1874, advertized for tenders for this great work, and this offer remained open until the present Government went to England in July, 1880; and no offer was ever made to take the work up to that time. What a mighty revolution has come over the minds of our triends on the opposite side of this House since July, 1880. From Mr. Rochester.

1874 up to July, 1880, not a single offer was made by those patriots on the other side, who are so fearfully distressed at the utter ruin that this contract will entail on this country. The amount voted by this Parliament in 1872 for this work was $30,000,000 cash and 54,700,000 acres of land. This, at the former valuation of the leader of the Opposition, would be $54,700,000, making in land and each $84,700,000; this was the first vote. The next action was taken by the late Government in 1874. Parliament passed a vote which placed at the disposal of the late Government the sum of $18,947,500 in cash and 55,940,000 acres of land. This, at $1 per acre, would make with the cash, $104,887,500. The next is the present contract. In round numbers, the valuation of the land is the same as on the former, and we find that this great work can be completed for the sum of $78,000,000. Deduct this amount from $106,387,500 vote of the late Government, and we have a saving to the country of $28,387,500. This cost would be about $28,000 per mile. Only a few weeks ago, or at most two months, the hon. gentlemen opposite would have been willing to have sacrificed this twenty-eight millions of money, and would have thought that Canada had made a good bargain in losing this amount. The present Government, after a great deal of labor and anxiety, have made a bargain for a much less amount than was ever anticipated, and now the Government asks Parliament to ratify this agreement; but the hon. gentlemen opposite, true to their instinct, well know if the present Government carry out this work to completion that it will sound their death-knell. After all this work has been done and the Government come down to this House and asks it to ratify the best bargain that could be made for building the road and opening up of that North-West country, and of uniting the Atlantic with the Pacific Ocean, securing a through line on our own territory, this being a grand national work should not be made a political affair; if the present Government carry out this work to completion, it will be equal to giving them a lease of power for the next 15 or 20 years. Under all these circumstances is it any wonder hon, gentlemen opposite have formed themselves into missionary deputations and scoured the country from one end to the other, circulating petitions, begging and pleading for the people to send petitions to Parliament, asking it not to ratify the present agreement? Sir, if they could they would like to make us believe that a wonderful revolution had taken place in the minds of the people in a very short time. I do not believe there is any such revolution; it is only the last ray of glimmering hope. And is it any wonder that they, with their friends, grow desperate. They are driven to desperation; they cannot endure the thought of having to stay so long in the cold shades of Opposition. But that is the place that the country has assigned them, and they will have to content themselves with their present position. Where have those gentlemen been for the last seven or eight years? Have they all been away from this country, that they did not know that this contract had been going a begging for that period? No one wanted it; no, not even those patriotic friends of the hon. gentlemen opposite ever once spoke of it. But, Sir, what a change has come o'er the spirit of their dreams. So soon as they know that a bargain is made with a company to complete the whole line from Callander Station at Nipissing to Port Moody on the Pacific, then, Sir, we find that there are any number who would like to be in it, at least so they pretend. The whole thing, in my opinion, is a putup job by the Opposition and some of their particular friends, and that they have so far succeeded in hoodwinking some gentlemen whose names are on that paper—who I know would not lend themselves to anything but a bond fide transaction if thing-that is, if they could only succeed in getting up another Pacific Scandal cry, in the hope that they might be able to overthrow the present Government as they did before. I would say to those hon gentlemen, that a burnt child dreads the fire. The people of this country were fooled by them at that time, but it is of too recent a date for the people to have forgotten what they had to pass through during the five years that these hon gentlemen misruled and mis-governed this country. Yes, Mr. Speaker, the people of Canada will remember the five years that those gentlemen held the reins of power. It will remain vivid in the minds and in the recollections of every man in Canada while he lives. At the same time I do not wish to blame them for all the depression in business that this country passed through during that five years. I do blame them for not trying to do something to alleviate the suffering and distress that there was during that five years. When they were asked to try and do something, what was their reply? The Government could do nothing. This was literally true, for they were not able to do anything utterly incompetent—to fill the positions they held; and Mr. Speaker, I will say here that I think it is quite impossible for any one man to fill the chairs in all the different Departments of the Government, no matter how clever he may be. One of the first acts of the late Finance Minister was to put an additional duty on barley. When the present Government came into power one of their first acts was to pass a law to protect the manufacturer and farmer of this country; and now we have the producer and consumer going hand in hand together, and the country was never in a more prosperous condition than at the present time-

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. Perhaps the hon. member will confine himself to the question before the House.

Mr. ROCHESTER. I will come to that, Mr. Speaker. I think I have a right, when other hon, gentlemen wandered over all creation; and if touching upon the misrule of the late Administration happens to pinch a little close, I still think I ought to be permitted to go on. I do not think I ought to be cut short when other hon, gentlemen have wandered all over creation, and not one of them has been restricted in any way. I think I have a right to show what the country was during the reign of the late Administration, and what it is now, the difference between the men who hold the reins of Government to-day, and the men who misgoverned this country for five years, and left it in misery. If hon, gentlemen opposite think it pinches a little too hard, they must just try and bear it.

Mr. SPEAKER. I will admit that I have been a little remiss. I may have allowed the discussion in some cases to wander a little too far from the question; but as there is a commencement to everything, I may as well commence now. I am sorry for the hon, member, but I hope he will be kind enough to avoid such digressions in the future.

Mr. ROCHESTER. Do I understand, Mr. Speaker, that I may go on? Well, I will go on a little further, and show the difference between the state of the country five years ago, and its condition now. Now, Sir, the farmers to-day can sell their rye for ninety or ninety-five cents per bushel.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member will have to desist.
Mr. ROCHESTER. Well, Mr. Speaker, I will give it up if you say so. I would like very much to have finished, but my remarks seem to have pinched hon. gentlemen opposite rather hard. All I can say to them now is that they will hear it all before the Session is over. Now, with regard to the Syndicate. This bargain is the best that could possibly be made; but the offer that was laid before this House a few days ago is, I have no hesitation in saying, a put-up job. I make an exception in the case of some of the gentlemen with whom I am acquainted and whose names are attached to that offer, for I do not believe they would put their names to anything but a bona fide transaction if they knew it. In conclusion, let me say that it is a great blessing that this country is in such a prosperous condition, and that in place of a deficit we will have a surplus. Hon, gentlemen have been trying to frighten the people that there would have to be increased taxation, and that the amount of Ontario's share for the building of the Pacific Railroad would be from 40 to 60 millions. Why, the building of this road and the amount of emigration into that country would so increase the revenue of this country, and the sale of the public lands, that the Exchequer of the Dominion would very soon be recouped for any outlay in that quarter four or five times over.

Mr. FLEMING moved the adjournment of the debute.

Motion agreed to; and (at 1:50 o'clock, a.m.,) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 21st January, 1881.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (No. 35) to incorporate the Silver Plume Mining Company.—(Mr. Ouimet.)

MANITOBA SCHOOL LAND.

Mr. FARROW enquired, Is it the intention of the Government to put the school lands in Manitoba into market; if so, when and at what price?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The school lands in Manitoba will be put on the market from time to time as it shall be considered most advantageous for the school fund. The trustees will endeavor to get the largest price possible in order to form an educational fund for the whole Province.

SALT BAGS.

Mr. FARROW enquired, Are the bags containing English salt brought into this country admitted duty free, and is the same article of which our bags are made containing Canadian salt charged a duty?

Mr. BOWELL. The salt imported from the United Kingdom being free, the packages in which it is brought into this country are free under the fourth section of the Tariff Act. Bags containing dutiable salt are charged according to the weight of such salt for duty. All materials for bags coming into the country are dutiable, but if the bags containing salt are exported, a drawback is made equal to the amount of duty paid.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Mr. COURSOL. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I hope I may be allowed to call the attention of the Minister of Customs to an advertisement which has been published in nearly all the leading papers of the Province of Quebec. I refer to the advertisement of the Canadian Cooperative Company Association, capital $150,000. Among the names of the Board of Provisional Directors which has been appointed, I find the name of Mr. W. B Simpson, Collector of Customs, Montreal. As Mr. Simpson proposes to be a director of that company, which is going into all kinds of trading operations, I wish to ask the Minister of Customs whether an officer in that position will not find his official duties conflicting with the interests he may have in that company.

Mr. BOWELL. My attention was called to the advertisement in the Montreal Gazette some days ago, and immediately upon reading it, I directed the Commissioner to send Mr. Simpson a copy of it and ask for an explanation, his attention being at the same time called to the fact that no collector was permitted to enter into any business connected with the importation of goods. I have not yet received his explanation. As soon as I do so I shall be very glad to bring it down. I may state, for the information of the House, that under the regulations of the department no collector is permitted to enter into any such business.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

House again resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Charles Tupper for the second reading of the Resolutions reported from the Committee of the Whole on the 14th January instant, granting certain moneys and lands for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the motion of Mr. Blake in amendment thereto.

Mr. FLEMING. I heartily endorse the statement which has been repeated over and over again by hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, that the subject under consideration is one of the most important that has ever been submitted to Parliament. It is important, inasmuch as it relates to a very large subject, to a large amount of money, which will have to come out of the pockets of the taxpayers of this Dominion, and to a large quantity of land, the heritage of the people of this country. But, although it is important in these respects to the present generation, I apprehend the greatest importance, connected with the subject before us, rests in the fact that it will affect, very materially the future inhabitants of this country. In dealing with this question and discussing it fairly, it will be well to consider what are the opinions held in common by both sides of the House. Now, I think it may be fairly admitted, even by hon. gentlemen opposite, if they will give us credit for that much, that we desire the construction of an all rail route between the Eastern Provinces and British Columbia. The only difference is really a question of time and a question of mode. 1 do not know that even there is any great difference between us on the question of time. The chief difference rests on the question of mode,—the proper mode of procedure. Hon gentlemen in beginning their remarks, usually introduce a few historical facts, beginning with the admission of British Columbia, and going onwards. I think it well to take a retrospective glance at a chapter or two even previous to that. What was it that led to the admission of British Columbia into the Union? We find, in looking over the discussions that took place at that time, that the circumstances were remarkably similar to those connected with the present subject before the House. On the present occasion we have not been favored with much information on the subject under discussion; we have not been supplied with information respecting any other offer made for the construction of this railway. It was the same at the time of the admission of British Columbia. The information supplied was very meagre indeed; and there is also a remarkable resemblance in the manner in which it was submitted to the House at that time, with the mode in which this contract has been submitted to the present Parliament. The right hon leader of the Government submitted a contract and practically said: "There is no help for it. You must take it just as it is." Well, if we look at the debates, in 1871, we find that the Government of that day as represented by Sir George Cartier in Mr. Coursol.

March 28th, 1871, in moving the House into Committee to consider a series of resolutions respecting the admission of British Columbia:

"The Government did not intend to restrict in any way a discussion on any of the items, but he would say that the terms entered into between this Dominion and British Columbia were of the nature of a treaty, and an amendment to any item would defeat the whole project. The Government would not accept any terms but those now submitted to the House."

There is also a remarkable resemblance in the unusual haste with which the present measure is being pressed, notice having been given for proceeding day after day with the subject until a conclusion was reached. There was also very great haste displayed at the time of the admission of British Columbia. The resolutions were introduced on March 28th, and were passed on April 1st; there having been only three days to consider them. It is somewhat remarkable, too, that trifling excuses were given for haste in both cases. The right hon. leader of the Government now says there is great urgency because the contractors were under an obligation to get out ties. Sir George Cartier at that time was also in very great haste, for a representative of British Columbia was about to go to Europe. The Opposition on that occasion protested against the haste displayed, and moved resolution after resolution with the object of staying proceedings, but all in vain, for the Government were bound to carry it through regardless of consequences. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), the leader of the Opposition, moved an amendment to those resolutions. stating that, in the opinion of the House Canada should not be obliged to do more than to proceed with the necessary surveys, and after the route is determined to prosecute the work at as early a period as the state of the finances will But it was voted down. Hon, members giving an independent support to the Government at that day warned it against the proceedings adopted. We find that the loyalty cry was raised. We find that, on that occasion, the present hon. Minister of Finance said:

"Situated as this colony of British Columbia was, if the Parliament of Canada refused to ratify the policy of the Government, the people of that colony might turn their eyes in another direction."

That was the menace held out. Hon, gentlemen, who took an independent stand at the time, warned the Government of their course. Sir Alexander Galt warned the Government of the danger of the course they were about to pursue. He said:

"The Government had assured the House that the building of the The Government and assured the House that the outding of the railway would not involve any additional taxation, but that statement was hardly compatible with the fact that these arrangements were in the nature of a treaty, and that they compelled this country to complete the line within ten years. * * How could this Government deliberately propose to put us under obligations to build this road in ten years, when the parties themselves did not ask for it."

The hon, member for West Durham also made an appeal to the Parliament of that day. He said:

"While the House have yet time, and while the amendment of the hon member for Lambtou was before it, he ventured to call on every man to consider this matter, not as a supporter or an opponent of the Government, but to consider whether it was representing or betraying the interests of his constituents when dealing with this question.

It was not fair to say that the amendment was adverse to the union with British Columbia. It simply declared that they should not be called on to pledge the faith of this country to any further extent than to agree to prosecute the work as rapidly as the resources of the Dominion would allow. He could not conceive how any lover of his country could vote against such a proposition."

But these appeals were made in vain. experience of ten years, is it not the candid opinion of every hon, member that it would have been better for this country if greater time had been taken for consideration, instead of agreeing hastily to these terms made by the Government voluntarily and not asked for by British Columbia? Would it not have been better to have taken time to the absence of the right hon. gentleman opposite, stated on consult the people, and thus have avoided all the agitation, heart burning and bitter feeling which this hasty legislation has occasioned? Leaving the past, we come now to discuss the present. Let us consider what we are arguing about. We are not now discussing whether this should be a Government work or not. There the contract do not oppose it because the work is to be done by a company, but because the conditions contained in it are injurious to the best interests of the country. Looking at this question from a business standpoint, the first question that arises is: were the individuals representing the country in the best position possible to make a bargain? A great deal depends on the way in which a man approaches another to make a bargain. Did the Government give due notice to the capitalists of the world that such a work as this would be let? I am very much surprised that no advertisements for tenders were published, especially as it appears, from the speech of the hon. Minister of Railways, last year, that it was his intention to advertise for tenders. The hon. Minister has changed his mind, he said, in London the other day:

"We did not put out an advertisement to show that we could not get any one to construct the Canadian Pacific Railway. They said to me the other day: "Why didn't you publish an advertisement?" I said "You published one for six months before and never got a response from

Yet we were told since this House met that a great change in circumstances had occurred since the late Government issued these advertisements. The hon, the Minister of Railways said:

" I will frankly state to the House that one of the causes which led to the great change in the public sentiment in relation to the value of land in the North-West, and of railway enterprise in the North-West, was the marked and wonderful success that was published to the warld as having resulted from the Syndicate who had purchased the St. Paul Minneapolis and Manitoba Railway, and became proprietor of that line.'

That was a good reason why he should, at such a favorable time, have advertised for tenders. The right hon. Premier said this Session that when he was over in England, capitalists were appalled at the magnitude of this undertaking. Why, then, was it not divided into sections? If this were the private affair of individuals, they might, if they chose, have contracted privately for the construction of this work, but the Government are the trustees of the people, and it was their bounden duty to do the best they could in the interests of the people. In Ontario there is not a township council, if it had a hill to cut down or a bridge to build, that would not advertise for tenders. The people would call a meeting to consider its conduct, if it did not do its duty in this respect. Much time had been taken up in contrasting this contract with the Allan contract, and with the terms under the Act of 1874. But I maintain these have nothing to do with the question before us. If a farmer has a load of wheat to sell, he does not search out the prices five or six years ago, but looks to the latest paper, and decides by it whether to sell or not. If we wanted the very best offer for this work, we should have found out who would undertake it on the easiest conditions for the country. There is a changed condition of circumstances, of which we ought to take advantage. Another reason why the Government were not in a good position to make a good bargain was, that they had no confidence in themselves. They have been throwing the blame of their poor bargain on the Opposition. But is it not the captain who is held responsible for the sailing of the ship? The Government will be held responsible by the people, as they had complete control of the matter. I think it was the President of the Council who said at a Montreal meeting, the Government were very modest, and only valued the lands at a dollar an acre. I think it is not good to be so modest as not to ask what a allowed a glimpse of this contract, would have put himself thing is worth. Another reason why the bargain is so in the position of the three tailors of Tooley street, by saying indifferent was, that the Government were in difficult that "on behalf of the whole Dominion" he thanked his ties when they made it, judging by the statement of the Minister of Public Works, he said we had to consider the exigencies of the case. Now, I cannot see where the exigencies come in; there was no sign of them last Session when everything looked flourishing. The may be various opinions about that, but those who oprose teader of the Government made a speech at Bath last summer, in which he gave the first indication that something was in the wind with regard to the fetting or construction of this Canadian Pacific Railway. He told his audionee, and called on the Finance Minister to corroborate his statement, that certain persons who knew that there were fortunes to be made out of this work, were asking that it should be handed over to them, and the Government Well, some people had their offer under consideration. are unkind enough to think that the Government simply acted with a view to enable certain parties to make money out of this railway. I do not believe that. I have more confidence in the right hon, gentleman than to think that, but I do not believe that the contract now before the House was the offer made him in June last. I have more faith and confidence in him than to imagine that, I judge of him from his statements made in 1878. In April, 1874, the member for Lambton introduced a Bill in reference to leasing the working of the Pembina Branch of the Canadian Pacific Railway. There was some conversation across the floor on that occasion. Sir John A. Macdonald asked Mr. Mackenzie some questions, and this is his answer:

Mr. MACKENZIE. I stated two weeks ago in the House that we were in communication with Mr. Stephens, of Montreal, as the representative of the St. Paul and Northern Pacific Railway Company.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Will the lease contain any clause in case of other American railways connecting with our railway, and running up to the frontier?

Mr. MACKENZIE It will contain simply a provision that there must be accommodation for the exchange of traffic, and trains loaded at Winnipeg or Selkirk with goods will have to go solely by the line with which traffic arrangements are made. Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he hoped that precautions would be

Sir JOHN 4. MACDONALD said he hoped that precautions would be taken. The hon, gentleman must be aware, from the press, that a good deal of uneaciness was felt on this subject in the North-West. lest the Company a luded to in which Mr. Stephens and other gentlemen had an interest, would have a monopoly of our road.

Mr. May KENZIE. No doubt.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. For ten years; and lest, if any other line should lead up from the United States to the frontier, it would be prevented from going to Winnipeg over this line, by this lease, thus granting a monopoly to one line. He did not know much about the subject, but he knew that this feeling and a sensitiveness regarding this subject, existed—lest a monopoly, controlling the whole of the traffic between the United States and Winnipeg should be created. Ten years was rather a long term. In a young country it equalled 25 years in an older country. He thought that the hon, gentleman ought not, without very grave reasons, lock up the line from Winnipeg to Duluth for ten long years. long years.

I thought, after the statement of the right hon. gentleman, in 1878, that he would not have entertained a proposal like that before the House, with all its privileges and immunities. I fancy I see him casting a look of horror and indignation at any gentleman that would have made such a proposal to him, then, and saying: "No, Sir, we will have nothing of that kind here." It appears that the right hon. gentleman and two of his colleagues went to England. I am somewhat surprised at this, especially after the statement we had from the Minister of Railways not long ago. He said:

"If we have made the contract with the strongest body of capitalists that could be found in the city of London what would you have had? We would have had the first thing an English engineer with extravagant ideas, totally ignorant of the work and construction of railways through such a country, and we would have had at no distant day, no matter what the resources might be, a perfect failure in their hands."

At all events the hon, gentlemen went to England, and they returned, and the right hon, gentleman made his oft-quoted and rather singular speech at Hochelaga. I think the hon. member for Montreal West (Mr. Gault), if he had been

Whatever may have been the result of the negotiations of these hon. gentlemen, we have no documents to show their nature except the contract, which, wherever or whenever made, is now before us to be judged upon its merits. While I do not say that there was anything suspicious about the refusal of the Government to bring down any other offers they received, I say that such a refusal was not in accordance with the usual practice of Parliament. The late Mr. Oliver, member for North Oxford, according to the journals of 1868, moved for copies of any offers which might have been made to the Government in relation to the building of the Intercolonial Railway. It does not appear that any objection was taken to bring down the different offers which were made. I find in the Sessional Papers of 1868, the names of several prominent gentlemen, such as Sir Hugh Allan and Mr. George Stephens who had made offers for that work. These gentlemen did not appear to have any delicacy in allowing their names to be brought before the public as unsuccessful competitors. I think, therefore, that it is somewhat singular that so much hesitation should be shown in trusting us with the names of those who tendered for this contract. A great many hon, gentlemen have taken many and various objections to the contract to which I shall not at present refer; but, on the other hand, some hon. members have indulged in the most laudatory expressions while speaking of the bargain. No hon, member, to the best of my recollection, spoke of it in more eulogistic terms than the hon, member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb). That hon. gentleman said:

"We are to accept this proposition, which I believe to be a perfectly fair one; which is, Sir, exactly what any man, if he had the power to make a bargain tor himself on his own side without any body else on the opposite side to interfere with him, would have made."

This is a high eulogy, but it does not agree with the speech of the hon. Minister of Public Works, who said that the matter was one of bargain, and the Government could not expect to have it all their own way, but had to give and take. The hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) said we were to consider this subject with all the wisdom, common sense, and the highest patriotism we could apply to it. In the course of his speech he proceeds to give us an example of his wisdom and common sense, by saying that "This contract is precisely similar to the proposal that was made in 1874 in the provision that the lands taken by the railway Company shall be lands of fair average quality for settlement. Now, Sir, I am not aware that this contract specifies that the lands are to be of fair average quality for settlement.

Mr. McLENNAN. Will the hon. gentleman be fair enough to quote what is said in the Act of 1874?

Mr. FLEMING. I am now speaking of what the hon. gentleman himself said—I am quoting his words. The hon member for Annapolis (Mr. Longley) said that the Syndicate were to have lands of fair average quality. They were not to run about and take a section here and there wherever they pleased. It seemed to him, be said, that those who had made statements to the contrary must have known better. He adds:

"If they did not, they did not take the trouble to read the contract or, having read the contract, were not able to properly interpret it. The contract says that the Syndicate are to have 640 acres in a block and we are to have 640 acres alongside of them, and so on. They are to have lands in the North-West Territories, but they are only to have fair average quality of lands."

I scarcely think the hon, gentleman would make that statement at this stage of the debate, for he must know better now if he did not then. Mr. FLEMING.

tract of land there we ought not to make the best of it just the same as we would in our private affairs. I do not see the necessity of giving away a large block of land there merely because we have a large quantity of it. It is true the railway will increase the value of the land, and if we pay for the railway we ought to benefit by the rise in the value of the land. To make the matter more plain, suppose a farmer has ten acres of waste land that is comparatively worthless, not worth $5 an acre; he engages a man to drain it, and enters into a contract with him to pay $150 for draining these ten acres of land; he finds at the end of that time that this land is worth $20 an acre, and he makes up his mind, after he has paid the man for draining the land, to make him a present of an acre of land-I would ask, what is the value of the present the farmer is making to the laborer? Is it $5 or $20? It is certainly $20. It is the value of the land after he has paid his own money for the improvement. It is the same with the railway. We pay for building the railway through the prairie section; there can be no doubt of that. We give money enough without the land to pay for building the railway through the prairie section, consequently we are entitled to the value of the land after the railway is built. Much has been said as to the cost of building the railway through the prairie section. On this point we find in the Engineer's Report last year the following:-

"The estimates now submitted are based on the new conditions, and the data to which you refer, viz: On contracts recently let for four sections in British Columbia, and the reduction to be made thereon; on the contract for the first 100 mile section west of Red Rivar; and on the assurance made by the engineer who conducted the surveys in the prairie region, that there will be no more costly 100 miles section between Manitoba and the Rocky Mountains than the second 100 miles west of Red River; that hence this section may be taken to be representative of the whole work to the base of the mountains.'

Now, then, if we can find out what this second 100 miles will cost, we can find out what 900 miles will cost. The engineer estimates that the work of grading, bridging, track-laying and half ballasting will cost $483,914. We find that the station building on the first 100 miles will cost $31,500. Then add the cost of 9,000 tens of steel rails, at $25 a ton, $225,000; and 360 tons of fish plates at $25 a ton, $9,000; carriage of rails, $195,250, making a total of $899,664. The cash bonus is $1,000,000, so here is an overplus of $100,336. At this rate we can make a pretty fair estimate of the cost of this 900 miles. Now the Syndicate is to get $9,000,000 for building that 900 miles, with 12,500 acres of land per mile in addition. Now, if you value the land at $2 an acre it will make $22,500,000; at $3 an acre $33,750,000; at $5 an acre, $56,250,000. If you take the 900 miles it will cost, at the rate I have given, $8,096,976. The cash bonus is $9,000,000 which gives an overplus of $903,024. Now, then, it is clear that the 900 miles can be built for the cash subsidy alone that we are going to The hon. Minister of Railways said you can give. get a thousand Syndicates to build the prairie section to the Rocky Mountains. The First Minister himself said it was as easy as rolling off a log to run railways across the prairies and work them. Now, the contention of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House is not against building an all rail route to British Columbia; the difference is as to time and mode. Now, take either of the plans, building this road as a Government work or getting it done by a Syndicate, and what will be the state of the country at the end of three years? What would be the position of the country at the end of three years, provided the Government, either themselves. or by means of another Syndicate, build the prairie section? We should have to pay for the 900 miles, its length, $9,000, 00. What should we have in return? We should I hope we shall be able to recoup all the money we have own the road over the prairie; we should own the Pembina spent in this railway, I should be glad, indeed, if that is Branch; we should own the Thunder Bay Branch; we should the case, but I do not see why, because we have a large have an estate of 13,124,925 acres, which, at $1 an acre, would be worth $13,124,925, or, at $2 an acre, would be worth $26,249,850. Now, what will be the position of the country at the end of three years if this contract is ratified? We shall have the prairie section built, for which we give a cash subsidy of $9,000,000; we shall have, according to the rate of progress estimated by the Finance Minister, sixty-five miles a year, 195 miles of the eastern section built, for which we give a cash subsidy of $15,384.80 per mile, or about $3,000,000; altogether we shall have to pay $12,000,000. Besides that, we shall have given away of the public domain, for the prairie section, 11,250,000 acres, and for the eastern section, 1,874,925 acres, or a total of 13.124,925 acres. We shall also have handed over to the Company the Pembina Branch, worth $1,750,000, and the Thunder Bay Branch, worth $16,600,000. What do we receive in return? It is true, we have a road through the prairies, but it does not belong to us; we have constructed a road from Thunder Bay to Selkirk, but it is no longer ours; we have built the Pembina Branch, which has given us a handsome yearly revenue, but the money no longer flows into the Treasury; we have paid for the building of 195 miles of the eastern section, but we have received no benefit from it. It may be that there are several thousand people in the North-West more than there were before, but I contend that we pay too much for these people, and that we could get them into the country at much less cost than the millions we are paying to this Syndicate. Now, if we confined ourselves to the construction of the prairie section we should be in a better position, at the end of three years, to build the rest of the road in the remaining seven years. But supposing that we had to undertake the construction of the whole road now, hon. gentlemen have a choice, even if it is a choice of evils. There are two proposals before them. They may ridicule one of them and say it is bogus; but the fact is apparent to the people of this country that they, having placed a large sum of money to the credit of the Government are in earnest in this matter; and the offer before us, objectionable though it be, is certainly much less objection. able than the contract, and why should it be refused. It will gain nothing for hon, gentlemen to abuse the individuals who made that offer. The individuals who made this first offer, when they become an incorporated company, will lose their individuality, and cannot be treated as individuals. Then why should we attack individuals who come forward and make another offer? We must deal with them only as business men, without regard to their private character. If their offer is a bogus one the fact can soon be discovered; for if you give them the contract and they fail to carry it out, their deposit can be confiscated for the benefit of the country. Hon, gentlemen cannot get out of this matter by excuses of that kind. One of the most serious objections to this contract is the exemption from taxation it confers on the Company. There might be some reason in it if they had invested their own money in the railway; but as it is built by public money why should not some part of the earnings of the Company come back to the public treasury in return for the benefits they receive? The exemption from customs duties has been frequently pointed out as contrary to the policy which

Railroad, charge excessive rates of toll, having no competition. Is it not reasonable to suppose they will be actuated by the same principle when the road is built, and charge the highest rates possible without killing trade altogether? It may be laid down as an axiom that, except at points touched by rival companies, railway companies are practically monopolies. They discriminate against places where there is no competition, as is the case in all the Provinces to-day. The interests of railway corporations are not identical with those of the public. We find that to be the case on the other side of the line, and it will be so here to a degree, if this contract is ratified, of which we can form no conception. I think it was the hon member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson) who said:

"The Grand Trunk Railway Company are held by the farmers and traders of Ontario to have made discriminating charges against them, and the farmers of Western Ontario, far from being under their influence, have sought to punish them by contributing to the building of the Credit Valley Railway."

I would like to ask what chance will the farmers in the North-West have to build a Credit Valley Railway to punish the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, when the latter will have a complete monoply of the North-West for twenty years. I believe it was said by Daniel O'Connell, that corporations have no souls, you cannot reach them. Somewhat over three years ago the corporation of Hastings, in England, complained to the Railway Commission that the station accommodation provided for their borough, by the South Eastern Railway Company, was defective and insufficient. The Railway Commission took the town councillors view of the case, and directed the company to comply with what they considered a just and reasonable demand. The South Eastern Railway Company refused to do so. The matter was thrown into the courts, and a decision was given that the Commission had exceeded the authority conferred on them, in requiring the company to make structural changes. This will give us an idea of what we may expect, should we endeavor to compel the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to adopt any course in the interests of the people to which they objected. I will read to the House a series of questions addressed by the New York Chamber of Commerce, to prominent men in the United States, and the answer given by ex-Judge Black to those questions:

"The New York Chamber of Commerce in August last addressed to prominent men in various parts of the country a circular asking their opinions on some of the chief points involved in the problem of railroad transportation. A series of questions were asked, among which were these: How can the prevailing discriminations against individuals and communities be prevented? Is it safe to allow railroad managers to follow their new theory of charging "all the traffic will bear?" Ought not the companies to be supervised in the public interest, as banks and insurance companies are, and for more pressing reasons? What do you think of companies and managers contributing large sums of money to election expenses or to influence legislation?"

exemption from taxation it confers on the Company. There might be some reason in it if they had invested their own money in the railway; but as it is built by public money why should not some part of the earnings of the Company come back to the public treasury in return for the benefits they receive? The exemption from customs duties has been frequently pointed out as contrary to the policy which has been strenuously advocated by hon, gentlemen opposite. Other serious objections are that the Company to taxation, that they have a monopoly, not only in the main line, but also in the construction of branch lines. They have a monopoly of the water navigation of the North-West; they may build an inferior road and may charge excessive rates of toll. Hon, gentlemen opposite said it would be to their interest to charge cheap rates. It is very singular it is not their interest to do so now. The very same company, the St. Paul, Minneapolis and Manitoba strictly within the scope of that authority when it makes a law forbidding carriers through the State to injure, impede or destroy the general trade of the country by extravagant and discriminating charges? If that be not a regulation of inter-state commerce what would be? The power being conceded, an effectual mode of righting the wrongs complained of can easily be devised.

Oubtless you are right in the belief that public opinion will be in favor of your movement. Reflecting men cannot deny its justice. But the influence of these great corporations can hardly be calculated. They have methods of defense and offense which make them almost invincible. You have referred to portions of their history which proved this. Some of the State Governments are literally subjugated by them now. It will require a strong organization and much labor to reduce them. Undisciplined militia in the open field make a poor fight against regulars intrenched. What are corn-staks against cannon? Such is truth against money."

This statement ought to commend itself to the attention of The experience of the people of the this House. United States ought to be a lesson to us. It seems we should take up the castsomewhat singular people across off garments of the the But the people of the United States see now that there are very great evils connected with that system, and I believe that for the last ten years there has been no land grant by the general government to railways, the people being now adverse to that mode of assistance. Will not the experience of our neighbours be a guide and warning to us? We are laying the foundations of a great country in the North-West, and we should establish them well and durably. Another objection to this contract is the Government's action in regard to the steel rails bought in 1879. Last Session the Minister of Railways stated that Government had purchased 50,000 tons of steel rails at $1,500,000 less than they could have been bought for since. Freights also were then fortunately low. Certainly that was an excellent bargain; but it is rather sad for the country that the benefits of that bargain are passed over to the Company. The advocates of the contract claim that the Syndicate is going to prove a great agency for the promotion of immigration in our North-West—that thus immense numbers will be settled in that region. One hon, gentleman trusted that $18,000,000 would in this way be saved to Canada. It seems singular that we should have another department of public affairs created. We have the genius of the Minister of Agriculture applied to this work as also the talents of Sir A. Galt, and which should be sufficient without a new agency. He said in his speech at Montreal last year:

"The duties he would have to perform may be classed under those heads, finance, immigration and diplomacy. * * * With reference to the subject of immigration it is perhaps the most important that we have or likely to have for many years to consider."

With a Minister of Immigration here, and another in London, we have no need of another agency. The subject of immigration is not mentioned in the contract. I am aware of no stipulation as to the number of emigrants they are to bring in, nor as to their keeping them in this country. Is it right to give them more than the value of the railway and then ask them to do unpaid agency work in regard to immigration. This must have been a private arrangement with the Syudicate, and a similar arrangement could be made with the second Syndicate. Hon. gentlemen opposite have spoken rather slightingly with regard to the suggestion of the leader of the Opposition, with regard to the Sault Ste. Marie road, but they have not been able to offer any objection to it-none that would weigh against their own statements on previous occasions, and certainly it seems a necessity to get this road, to be enabled to compete with the St. Panl and Manitoha Railway in regard to merchandise coming eastwards. I need only quote some of the speeches made by the hon gentlemen opposite when in power. The Minister of Railways, in a speech made by him in 1878, said:

"The Northern Pacific Railway had their road to Red River and a branch to 55 miles of the border. It would have been better to build that fifty-five miles upon the territory with Canadian money, and make that connection, so that, by the existing road from Duluth, immediate travel Mr, Fleming, and traffic would have been created from and to the North-West, and not construct a road in the wild, impassable and unfertile country between the shores of Lake Superior and the Red River, on the line in which they were now carrying the railway. That policy would have been sound. But it was altogether a different one from building 228 miles, and then leaving an intervening portion, which prevented them from using a single mile of, the road they had constructed. The policy which Senator Macpherson had propounded, was one which would commend itself to a great many of the people of this country; that, in the position in which the Government found themselves, the difficulty of obtaining money, it would have been wise to husband their rescources, and having built the road from Duluth to Pembina, then to push the road across the prairie, where every mile constructed would be opening the country, and doing that which must be done as the very basis of the Canadian Pacific Railway, namely, filling up the country with settlers and emigrants."

That is exactly the policy which is propounded from this side of the House. I wish to say a word or two with regard to the policy of the Government building this railway. While, as I said before, I would prefer that the road were built by a company, yet if we cannot get fair and reasonable terms from a company, then by all means let it be built by the Government. Railways have been built and operated successfully by the Governments of other countries and I do not see why they should not in this. The objection that if it were so built we would have trouble with the contracts and with contract brokers is one which need not arise under a proper system of management. - The member for Lambton told me himself that when persons came to him with improper proposals he gave them such an answer that they did not trouble him again. The great evils which arise from an abuse of patronage would be obviated if civil servants were appointed according to their fitness and not as a matter of political favor. In Belgium, the State is the proprietor of many of the railways, and they are an important source of revenue. In that country 1,010 miles are operated by the State and 1,268 by private companies, and those owned by the State are far more remunerative than the others, as the following figures will show. The gross receipts of the State railways in 1877 were $18,061,900; the expenditure, $11,104 660, leaving as net receipts $6,957,280. The gross receipts from private lines was $7,623,460; the expenditure $4,545,675 leaving as net receipts $3,077,585. In the colony of Victoria 1,078 miles of railway are in the hands of companies, while nearly 1,000 miles are owned by the Government. I think, therefore, that the construction and operation of the Canadian Pacific Railway by the Government might safely be considered as an alternative. if we cannot get a company to do the work on fair and reasonable terms. I think, therefore, that it was a wise thing on the part of the hon member for Lambton to provide, as he did in the Act of 1874, that if he could not get the railway built by a company the Government should have power to build it as a Government work, and if he had not taken that power we would not now have had the benefit of those portions of the road which have been built. A great deal has been said against our utilizing any portion of the American railway system in carrying on traffic, and we have had the cry of loyalty and patriotism repeated with regard to that question. Now, while we on this side side claim to be just as loyal and as patriotic as hon, gentlemen opposite, we feel something like a certain good Christian who said he had no religion to brag of. This is not an occasion when we are required to take the field in defence of our country, but simply a commercial matter; and I, for one, do not see the advisability of spending millions of dollars merely for the sake of having a railway on our own territory, when we can get the same or better accommodation for less money by using the railways of a neighboring country. We meet many Americans travelling on the Great Western Railway, or the Canada Southern, and I do not think that they feel that they demean themselves, or compromise their allegiance to their own country by travelling over Canadian lines. I am opposed to the contract because it puts altogether too much power into the hands of a corporation who will very soon, if this power be granted, get entirely beyond our control. They are a company who in effect may do as they please. A few months ago a great walking fever spread over the country, and we heard a good deal about "going as you please." I think we might very correctly apply that phrase to the Syndicate, for they are allowed to go as they please and do as they please. They may build an inforior road if they please, they may place the track where they please, and they may shorten the line if they please; and, by the way, I notice there is a difference of 15 miles in the length as stated in the contract from that reputed by the engineer. They may run as often or as seldom as they please. Now, I do not think we should grant all these privileges in return for a railway which runs from ocean to ocean through our own territory, and which, after all, we shall not own, for it will be ong to the Company. It will not put bread into the mouths of the hungry, or assuage the sorrows of the afflicted, to be told that we have an all-rail route over Canadian territory. I wish to point out, further, that however objectionable the new offer may be, it is far superior to the contract before the House. The offer before the House proposes to accept $3,000,000 and 3,000,000 acres less, and perform the same work. The offer provides for a higher, standard of road. The offer provides for a more equal distribution of the land and cash subsidy. No exemption from payment of Custom duties. No monopoly or special privilege with regard to branch lines. No exemption from taxation, municipal or Provincial. By the offer the Government may, if they please, acquire the road. By the offer the rates are to be regulated according to the general Railway Act. The new company provide for the opening of stock books in the principal cities in the various Provinces of the Dominion. I am opposed to the contract because it is not made in the interests of the country. I decline to be a party to the bargain because I have proof before my eyes that a better one can be made. I refuse to sanction a measure which will entail unnecessary burdens on the people. I will not be a party to giving a mortgage to a Syndicate upon all the lands in the North-West that may be brought under cultivation during the next twenty years. I refuse to hand over to a few individuals an enormous territory without sufficient consideration in return. I am opposed to this contract because it lays the foundation of a huge monopoly, which will tax to the utmost the energies of future generations to overthrow. I will not endorse this measure because it grants privileges and immunities to a corporation which are inconsistent with the progressive tendencies of the age. For these reasons, which to my mind are sufficient, I will, when opportunity offers, record my vote against it.

Mr. McLENNAN. In the first stage of this debate, when the House was in Committee, I took occasion to state my views upon the general question, and I do not intend to repeat them now. I find myself called upon to deal with some questions that have come up since that time, and, in the first place, with some statements of the leader of the Opposition, with reference to a portion of my remarks at that time. That gentleman said that I had minimized the important question of the tolls, as it would affect the profits of the settler in the new country. I certainly did not mean to do so, and if there was any appearance of my doing so it resulted from the habit that I practice, of doing one thing at a time. Our business now is to discuss the charter of a railway company. I think the guarantee for the rates of toll are pretty well provided for in the General Railway Act, as I stated at the time. I also stated that there was a further guarantee through competition, and still another one in the natural law of commerce, which, perhaps, the hon leader of the Opposition may never have learned in a Chancery Court, but it is well known to men of business, and that is the law of compensation. I can better illustrate it by a parallel with the practice of another calling. I dare say hon.

gentlemen in this House remember an old legend illustrated in the works of Hogarth, or somebody else, in which two men are pictured who went to law. The one who gained his suit is in tattors; the one who lost it is naked. That is not the practice in commerce. As far as I know anything of the practice of commercial life it is based upon a law of mutual interest and advantage of the parties concerned, and upon no other basis do I know of any development having taken place in the great material interests of the world. I think this law will sufficiently apply to the development of the North-West, and it may be sunamarized in the well known maxim of small profits and quick returns, of which the opposite principle is illustrated by another adage of killing the goose that lays the golden egg. If there is any danger of high rates upon the railway, it is necessarily, in the beginning of its operations, when the quantity of frieght to be carried is small. To guard against any mistake of that kind, it is provided that the first tariff shall be made with the approval of the Government. If the principle to which I have adverted has application, it will provide for equalization in the future growth of the commerce of that country. The hon. gentleman referred, also, in connection with another mode of redress that I pointed out, to the possible decay that might overtake the port of Montreal, and the ruin that would befall the traffic of the St. Lawrence in such a case. Sir, I expect to see Hudson's Bay navigated, and the great North-West reached by that route. At the same time I have some interest in the port of Montreal and in the conveying trade of the St. Lawrence Montreal and in the carrying trade of the St. Lawrence, and I do not tremble at all for the results. Now, Sir, with regard to this whole question, we on this side have maintained that the Government are acting in their right and their duty in making this contract. The Government of 1874 recorded their intention to have the railway built by private enterprise, and that determination was generally accepted at the time. Perhaps, they cannot have intended that another Government should build it in the same way, but if the question was not open for the last six years, there can be no doubt that it has been open for the last six months. I think it was known to every member of this House that before Parliament rose in the month of May last, parties were enquiring with the view of making just such a contract as the one now before us. The announcement was made publicly during the last six months, and no objection was made to the right of the Government to make such a contract during most of that time. We certainly did read in the organs of the Opposition press opinions that Government could not find anybody willing to undertake such a contract; but it is a new discovery that there is any impropriety in the Government making such a contract. Well, we are told now that the country has not been heard from. Why, the country has been heard from as long as we have heard anything from the country at all with regard to the business of this Parliament. On the first occasion when I went before the country, in 1876, I recollect very well that this railway proved a subject of discussion on every public platform. We are told that we have not called public meetings to approve of this contract. When we disapproved of the trade policy of the Government from 1876 to 1878. the Government did not call meetings to show the people they were right and we were wrong. It is true we have some petitions from the country, but I think they are very few. I know there is a gentleman paying considerable attention to my own county, who was once a colleague of hon. gentlemen opposite, who evidently does not consider that he ended his political career when he became Lieutenant-Governor, but who, I hear, has been making midnight visits to the country to take charge of the municipal elections. That funny old Liberal, Thomas Carlyle, has said that the world is peopled by something like a thousand million people, mostly fools. If a Tory had said so, I am afraid we should have heard a great deal about the impropriety of it; but I believe the four million people of this country are not mostly fools on the question of the National Policy and the Pacific Railway. They have been pretty well trained in the school of adversity, and after having suffered nearly six years of the misrule of hon. gentlemen opposite, if they found themselves very badly pinched, they would likely cry aloud; but they have not done so. The agitation has failed to produce any response from the country. We have had some petitions; and when we go before the country next summer we shall probably learn how many voters' names are on them and under what influences these names were obtained. In the meantime, I think we may possess our souls in patience. But, if the agitation did not produce a response from the country, it did produce some sort of response from a body of Canadian capitalists, who, we are told, came forward spontaneously to relieve this suffering country from the great incubus of the railway contract. If one-half we hear is true, I think we may come to the conclusion that the action of some of the capitalists whose names are appended to that contract, was not spontaneous; indeed, those whose action was spontaneous, I do not think we have any reason to regard as capitalists, whilst those who are capitalists were not spontaneous. I think that is a very important distinction. I do not think it is fair on our part here to discuss the names of a long list of Canadian capitalists whose names are attached to this wretched paper, as I venture to call it, with the view of discussing their possible resources. If the inventors of this offer had had a little more ingenuity, I wonder they did not offer to build the road for half the money, seeing there was no possibility of the offer being accepted. But what is the work to be undertaken by this company. It is the work of bringing a great mass of people from the old world to this new country; it is the very arduous labor to be performed for a series of years in constructing this railway so as to make the lands and the road profitable. The Government were quite right when endeavoring to find parties who would undertake this work, in making sure that the gentlemen who offered to undertake it knew the extent and nature of the work, and could command the resources necessary to prosecute it. The hon, leader of the Opposition said he did not know of any French bankers with German names. Has the hon. gentle man never heard of the firm of Rothschild, the leading bankers in Paris. On the Bourse at Vienna, probably the largest Bourse in the world, there is an entirely forgetfulness of nationality. Men with names from every country in the world are to be met there, and I think it is safe to say that money knows no nationality. But supposing this new offer is in good faith. What have we? Why, the gist of the whole matter is that we are to go to the United States. We are told by the leader of the Opposition, that we should make a connection at Sault Ste. Marie. He did not tell us what connection. We can make a connection with Thunder Bay, without going to Sault Ste. Marie, from Collingwood or from Midland, by the route of Georgian Bay and through Lake Superior. If we built a railway to the Sault we should simply build it to save a part of that water voyage. What should we connect with at Sault Ste. Marie? There is not a foot of railway making connection with the western States for 410 miles from there, and when we had that road we would only get into the wilds of Michigan. In the latest published American atlas, by the Commissioner of Statistics, the land in Northern Michigan for two degrees south of the 49th parallel is described as an uninhabited country, possessing pine timber and volcanic rock. There is a small settlement at Marquette, where iron and copper mining is carried on, and to which a branch of the Chicago and North-Western Railway runs, but there is not a mile of railway from the cause received the sacrifice of the intellect of a Cavour and. Mr. McLennan.

Sault Ste. Marie to Duluth. So far from anything being accomplished by getting to the Sault, we should be simply giving ourselves away. When we get to Duluth we should simply make a connection with the Northern Pacific Railway. We should not get into that garden of the North-West about which we hear so Pacific much; that is about 150 miles further off at St. Paul, to which place there is no direct railway, nothing but a long angular line following the Northern Pacific and making a direct turn southward to St. Paul, making a distance of about 250 miles. The only case in which that offer would come to be of any use—that is, if hon. gentlemen opposite had it in their hands - we should have the alternative of building or waiting until the Americans built. I have great respect for the Americans. I have had business relations with them, and think that they are very respectable, enterprising and, above all, very acute people. think if we should build 290 miles of railway to the Sault, they would say: "Well, gentlemen, we are always glad to see you. We are free-traders, and if you come 550 miles further we will allow you to purchase out of our great storehouse of wheat; "—and, so far as my knowledge goes, that is a privilege of trade they have always extended. We have taken advantage if it. We have profited by the great route of the St Lawrence by the purchase and transportation of their wheat by this route. I think it proves that a small people should have a great deal of enterprise. The utter folly of a road to the Sault will be apparent when I state, that it is proposed to us that, in order to reach the garden of the Western States we should build 290 miles to the Sault, 410 to Duluth, and 150 miles to St. Paul, in all 850 miles, in preference to building 650 miles on our own side of Lake Superior, in order to make a connection with the North-West. The hon, gentleman who spoke last, said that we ought to build that line, in order to compete with the St. Paul and Manitoba Railway. That is very much like saying that we should make a road into the lions den, in order to compete with the lion. I will call the attention of the House to another factor of the situation. We have the sound of a great epic in our ears, and we think we hear, in the language of a great critic, the majestic tread and planetary solemnity of the hon, leader of the Opposition. But we are mistaken, it is but a stage play, a king of shreds and patches. He told us the other day that he occupied his present important and imposing position very much against his will. Well, is there any hon. gentleman in this House who "oversteps the modesty of nature" so far as to come here to please himself? Have we not all been urged by every possible consideration to throw ourselves into this breach, at the call-as the hon. gentleman said, and as I have no doubt he meant-of honor and duty? Is there any gentleman in this House so craven as to say that he is here for any other motive? It is true we may not all have made so great sacrifices as the hon. gentleman. We are not so great as he, and the virtue of self-sacrifice is, like the quality of mercy, "mightiest in the mighty." I do not dispute the good faith of the hon. gentleman whon he makes that statement. I am merely pointing out that he stands not in that singular and exalted position that one would imagine from his words, and that there are possibilities of some other mistakes revealed in that explanation which he so graciously accorded us. I think that that hon, gentleman desires to be not merely a representative in the councils of his country but a leader, a ruler if he has the power, and I daresay it is a legitimate object of ambition; but in the case before us there are wanting the elements of the heroic, except the stage heroic. The sacrifices of great patriotism, of a martyr patriot, require some great factors. There must be a country suffering under some great evil to be remedied, or some great wrong to be avenged. Such a the passion of a Garibaldi. Some years ago a man named John Brown went down to Virginia and sacrificed his life for a suffering people. The hon. gentleman will probably think of some cases in the history of a country with which he is more nearly related, where the folly and mistakes of men, who honestly meant to do something for their country, was redeemed by ardent, passionate, burning love for their country. This we take to be the first element in a case of this kind. But the business before us is of a different character. We are here with a new country to be developed and requiring the application of much plain, practical common sense. I believe these are qualifications possessed by my hon. friends on the Treasury benches. I do not believe that they ever posed in the attitude of heroes, to carry on the business of this country, because it was quite unnecessary. But there is another alternative to account for the course of hon. gentlemen opposite This little and lowly band affect to have some affinity with the great Liberal party of England—though I do not know on what ground. We know that some English statesmen, of moderate degree, and some of great degree, have done something for their country in its international relations. We know that so plain and practical a man as Mr. Cobden went to France, a few years ago, and made a treaty of commerce with the French under which Great Britain exchanged her valuable coal and iron at moderate rates of duty for light French wines. We know that he invested some money in American railways, and it was held that he had done some good international service by that step, though, as my hon. friend from Niagara (Mr. Plumb) suggests, this investment came near ruining him. John Bright, by his sympathy and his eloquence, won the hearts of the American people in the crisis of their nation's history. The great Hellenist who is now at the head of affairs in England went to the Ionian Islands and by giving away a little British patronage succeeded in consolidating the Greek nation. I think it is a fair and laudable ambition for any hon. genlemen to desire these distinguished men in these to emulate spects, and I believe the hon. gentleman tried his hand in that direction; but, to use a vulgar phrase, he did it in rather a lopsided way. We know that he has given his assistance, directly or indirectly, to a party of American land speculators; we saw the hon. gentleman's counterfeit presentment the other day, in a certain pamphlet, and to-day I find upon my desk a yellow covered prospectus of a journal which it is proposed to start in the national interests of young Canada, and by the superscription I infer it comes from the United States. I suppose that if ever that paper comes to be published, and if we should have to accept this new offer to build a road by way of St. Paul, I have no doubt that the handsome face of the hon, gentleman will appear in the new journal as a frontispiece. What does the hon, gentleman now propose as an act of reciprocity? I am desirous of seeing a reciprocity in natural productions with the United States; I believe that such a reciprocity was of great advantage to us when we had it before, and I hope we will live to see it again. I believe, however, that we shall only obtain that reciprocity by firmly maintaining our own rights, and that we shall not be making a step in that direction by giving ourselves away to the Americans, and delivering ourselves into their hands at the rapids of Sault Ste. Marie and the wilds of northern Michigan. In the course of this debate we have had along with a great deal of rather tiresome repetition, a good deal of advice from the other side of the House. Hon. gentlemen opposite are kind enough to take considerable interest in us as a party. We can quite understand their interest in the country, but their interest in our party is almost I think ex gratia; but I read recently, and which is doing service in its proper of the Opposition has not shown that he possesses the elements of a great patriot, nor of a great administrator, nor even of a very moderate negotiator, and I think I might venture to suggest to hen. gentlemen opposite something which is not entirely new. They should hold another caucus such as they are said to have hold last year. They might not find it very easy to elect a new leader this time, because there are some men who do not forget themselves. Gentlemen who have paid some little attention to the æsthetics of art know that great actors are a class who do not often forget themselves. As I have said, there might be some difficulty in selecting a new leader, but I make them a suggestion simply on the ground that, as we have often been told, advice is cheap, and I suppose that is the reason why we have had so much of it from the other side of the House. I think, perhaps, that the young gentleman from West Elgin (Mr. Casey) might prefer his pretentions to come to a front desk. I do not see why the hon, member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) should not be brought to the front. If we are to be entertained in our lighter hours, that hon, gentleman possesses a breezy good humor which is rather pleasant to encounter across the House. His rhetoric and, I might add, his histrionic powers, are pretty well developed, and he has a pretty good mastery of the English language. So, as I said, if we are to be entertained, I would recommend him for a leader. In such a contingency we should be relieved from another difficulty. It was said by Charles Fox that it would be impossible for any man to be so wise as Lord Thurlow looks; and in our entertainment we should like to have on the front benches a leader who could smile and look pleasant once in a while. But while these arrangements are going on on the other side, I believe that the path of duty on this side is very clear. I believe that the project which has been brought down by the Government is a good one for the construction of the railway and the settlement of the North-West. But when the member for Brant takes his place as leader, I will point out to him that we do not propose to vote here because we are "a pack of yelping curs" following on at the heels of the Government. We do not think so much of the Government. I do not wish to flatter these hon, gentlemen, and in point of fact, they do not always do as we want them to do. We sometimes ask them for a contract or an appointment for a friend which they refuse; we may sometimes ask for even a Lieutenant-Governorship or a portfolio for ourselves, which we do not get. I may say that I have never asked for anything of this kind myself, but if I did I should hate abominably to be refused. I believe, Sir, that it is of vital importance, not alone for a party, but for the country, that the construction of the railway should be proceeded with without further delay. And I believe that the path of duty and honor-if I may be allowed to borrow from the hon. leader of the Opposition, whose language I admire, though I cannot concede much else-will lead this House to vote down this voluminous amendment, this amendment in two volumes - and to vote for the contract, the whole contract, and nothing but the contract..

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. KILLAM. Although this subject has been discussed so ably upon both sides of the House, and perhaps hon. members are getting rather weary of the debate, yet I feel it my duty to make some few remarks, believing, as I do -and I think I am quoting the words of a local paper which after all it is a kindly feeling—a Christian feeling as the hon, member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) says—and it ought to be encouraged. I have tried to show that the hon, leader although many things have been said showing the impropriety of entering into it at the time, and in the way it was done, yet we find every day, every hour, and almost every minute the subject is examined, that something showing the gross impropriety of the conduct of the Government in making this contract, is demonstrated more clearly. I may be excused, Sir, perhaps, if I treat the subject from a local stand point. Of course, we speak about the Canadian Pacific Railway as a great Dominion enterprise. So it is. It is a great Dominion enterprise, so far as its extension to the Rocky Mountains is concerned, but from what I have heard on this subject, hon. members seemed to think that, so far as British Columbia is concerned, it was principally a local matter. We have heard hon members conveying the idea here during the debate that if the Carnarvon terms had been assented to British Columbia would have been comparatively satisfied. It seems to me that the idea which British Columbia members have conveyed to us since 1871, since we have had the pleasure of sitting here with those hon. gentlemen, is that the principal object to be gained was the expenditure of money in British Columbia on these works. I believe, Sir, and I did believe when I voted for the railway between Esquimalt and Nanaimo, that if the money could have been expended there, it would have hushed the complaints of those hon, gentlemen a good deal, and they would not be so anxious to-day to press the Dominion to involve itself so heavily in debt to construct the railway in that Province. I realize as well as anybody the obligations the Dominion is under to complete the Pacific Railway, but, Sir, I am one of those who abide by the resolutions of this House so often passed that this public work should only be carried on as fast as the resources of the country would warrant, and that, Sir, is one of my principal objections to this contract, and I may say, also, to the offer made by the new Syndicate. Of course, as between the two, if it came to a question to decide between them, I prefer the new Syndicate offer, but I believe the proper course for the Government to pursue in this case would be to reconsider what they have already done, and if they are to make a bargain with either one of those companies, to retain the control of matters in their own hands in such a way that proper restrictions could be placed upon the expenditure of the public moneys. If the control of the work had been kept in the hands of the Government, the expenditure could have been limited. If we found that the settlement of the North-West did not proceed as rapidly as we should desire, and as we all do desire, we could at any time have stopped the expenditure of money upon the work, or limited it. If at any time the revenues, derived principally from the Eastern Provinces -although I am aware that British Columbia is paying a large proportion for such a small population to the revenue should diminish, the expenditure could have been controlled; but under this contract the Government binds itself to increase the public debt of the Dominion, within ten years, by $50,000,000 for construction purposes of this railway alone. all the obligations and responsibilities of establishing new governments, extinguishing Indian titles. and doing everything necessary to open up a new country like the North-West; and I believe, if this work is to be carried out as the hon, gentlemen on the Treasury benches profess to believe it will be carried out, the debt of the Dominion will be increased in those ten years by at least $75,000,000. I do not wish to be considered as speaking on this occasion, in any manner, to look like throwing obstruction in the way of public business. That is not the idea, but I believe that considering the way this contract was brought forth, the way in which it has been laid before Parliament, the short time we have had this immense country, extending believe that they should be permitted more time to study it, and that it is the duty of every hon, member in this House to discuss the matter line by line and to give the people sufficient time to consider the subject the roughly and to be well informed upon its details. I give, Sir, for that authority from two sources—from a good Liberal authority and from a good Conservative authority. I will read a few times from an article in the Quarterly Review for October, an article entitled "Six months of Liberal Government." Hon, gentlemen will remember that the Marquis of Parliament, some members were endeavoring to obstruct business. Upon that this journal quotes Mr. Gladstone, using the following words:—

"No doubt Mr. Gladstone remembered the time when he had availed himself of the principles laid down in the foregoing passage. When opposing, with a rare combination of vigor, conscientionsness and ability, the passing of the Divorce Act, the right hon genileman, then a priva e member, employed, in addressing Lord Palmerston, the following uncompromising language :-

"His noble friend had had an affirmation of his Bill by a decisive majority, and no doubt the minority ought to bow to the fairly expressed will of the majority, and if his noble friend chose to persevere with the measure they must struggle on at whatever personal inconvenience, and maturely discuss the provisions of the Bill. Still, it could not be maintained that the Bill was of a nature particularly urgent to be passed in the present Session. He would also remind his noble friend that the same duty which bound the minority to comply with the declared opinion of the majority on the principle of the Bill did not absolve them from the obligations of watching, discussing, modifying and altering the provisions of the measure. As an opponent to the Bill, it might answer his purpose to retire from the Committee altogether and depart into the country, allowing the Bill to pass with all its blemishes; but such a course he held to be contrary to his duty, and he conceived it was incumbent on those who objected to the Bill to attend there night after night and week after week, to debate, line by line and word by word, if necessary, the details of a bill of such great importance."

The Tory journal comments upon it in this way:

"In one sense an Administration has a right to sacrifice its character for modest usefulness to the ambition of being deemed earnest and enterprising; and this sacrifice has been made, not in the least to our surprise, by the leaders of party whose 'ble in future will apparently be to acquire power by destructive criticism, and to retain it by destructive legislation. But no Administration has a right, in the pursuit of this selfish purpose, to damage the position of Parliament in the eyes of the nation; and this injury is effected when Parliament is compelled to vote for measures which it is denied the time to consider."

Now, Sir, that would be my excuse, that the country requires proper time for considering those measures; that it has been and is denied them, and that the Opposition should take any course which in this case they may consider advisable, to give the country ample time to consider the particulars of this Bill. To come back to the point from which I started when I spoke of this question as a measure partly local and partly Dominion. I wish to refer to the state of the taxation of the country since Confederation, bearing on the public debt. I will give the figures very briefly, because, of course, they are in possession of hon. gentlemen. During the fiscal year ending 30th of June, 1808, the goods entered for consumption in the Dominion of Canada amounted to $.0,895,000, the duties collected were $8,819,000, or an average It more than that binds itself to incur of 12½ per cent. In 1875, that is after the change obligations and responsibilities of establishing in the tariff made in 1874, the goods entered for consumption were of the value of $119,618,000, and duties collected $15,361,000, or an average rate of 13 per cent. For the year ending 30th of June, 1879, with diminished trade and business, the goods entered for consumption were of the value of $80,541,000, the duties levied on them amounting to $12,939,000, or 16 per cent. Still worse was the year ending 30th June last, and during the last three months of 1880 the goods imported reached $21,604,000, the duty collected being $4,295,000, or 20 per cent. December shows the same result. I want simply to call the attention of hon. gentlemen to the bearing of these figures on the public debt of the country. Before Confederation Nova Scotia had an_ 4,000 miles from the Atlantic to the Pacific, the people have average rate of duty upon free and dutiable goods of about not had proper time for the consideration of it, and I | 8\frac{1}{2} per cent. The first year after Confederation or Mr. Killam.

at Confederation the national debt of Canada was $75,795,000. In 1875 the amount was $117,068,600. On 30th Jane, 1880, it reached $156,942,000. The debt about doubled in those thirteen years; the taxation more than doubled so far as the Province is concerned, and about doubled as far as the Dominion as a whole is concerned. I ask hon. gentlemen to consider what is likely to be the effect on taxation if $75,000,000 are to be added to the public debt during the next ten years. Hon, gentleman on the Treasury bonches assume immense ability in conducting public affairs, and seek to prove that the country will not have a single cent to pay for the Pacific Railway; but the exact contrary has been the case since the North-West has been opened up. Although we have been promised great returns from the sale of lands we have seen year after year immense sums drawn from the public treasury for the administration of Government, settling difficulties, appointing officials of the Government, and persons whom it was necessary to console; and instead of deriving revenue from the country we have been constantly losing. Under these circumstances, I believe it behoves us to proceed with caution and deliberation, and keep the faith which Parliament has pledged time and again that the work of building the Pacific Railway should not proceed faster than the resources of the country will permit. I was surprised to hear the hon, member for Lunenberg (Mr. Kaulbach) offer the other night more objections to the contract than I could possibly make, while the hon member for Annapolis (Mr. Longley) lauded it in every possible way, both of them taking few exceptions to it and simply saying it required a few modifications. We do not, however, expect anything better from them, of course. Perhaps, if they were to come to our party under present circumstances they would not be accepted on returning home by the Liberals of their own counties, and the Conservatives would not have anything to do with them, and, therefore, the hon. gentlemen resumed their seats with remark that if the modifications were made, they were prepared to swallow the contract—as the hon. leader of the Government informed them they were to do-pretty much as the cassowary swallowed the missionary, skin and bones, and hymn-book too. It would be very much better if those hon gentlemen instead of registering their votes on every occasion when he told them, would pay more attention to the rates of taxation and the duties levied on the fishermen, lumbermen and laboringmen, who, although they are now struggling under the burden, but keeping their heads above water, may, if they are weighted with other burdens, may be unable to remain int he part of the country to which they now belong, and be compelled to join those parties now leaving the Dominion for the United States. The hon, member for King's, P.E.I. (Mr. Muttart), made a speech in favor of the contract the other night. He had some objections to it, but he was prepared to vote for it. All his reasons for voting in its favor, besides the dictum of the First Minister, was the fact that Senator Haythorne was opposed to it. Well, I am not astonished at the hon member for King's. He is one of the people who helped the people of Prince Edward Island to give themselves away, to surrender their rights and privileges. There was a time when the Island stood in a better position than it does to-day; and I know there are sufficient independent electors, if they are appealed to on this question, to show those hon, gentlemen they have been somewhat mistaken in the views they have taken. I hold in my hand a text, a halfpenny, from which a very fair sermon might be preached, not only to the Island but to the whole Dominion. It is dated 1857, and on the obverse side are the words: "Prince Edward Island. Self Government and Free Trade." The hon, gentlemen from Prince Edward Island were some of those who relinquished the first of those privileges on the for the purpose of finding fault, as for the purpose of occasion when they sent the hon. Minister of Marine up here to negotiate for Confederation; and they relinquished the other privilege, that of free trade, which was the most important privilege that they could have, when they assisted the hon. Finance Minister in passing his iniquitous Tariff of 1878. I have not a word to say against the personal character of those gentlemen. Of course, while I was speaking of them in the way I have done, I was referring to these hon, gentlemen in the most pleasing way imaginable. I respect most of them personally, many of them are my friends, but their public conduct I cannot, of course, approve of. I might include the hon. gentleman from Halifax in that catalogue. He is one of those, who is ready to vote against the interests of the electors of his city at a nod of the hon. the Minister of Railways. Why are those hon gentlemen so silent on this great question? They have good reason for silence. They know that they cannot get up in their places and defend the contract, without ruining themselves in their constituencies. The increase of the public debt has a certain local bearing, which I refer to, and which was called to my mind by the hon. member for King's. I under stood him to quote somebody's statement, that a very large amount would be added to the indebtednes of each particular county. The remark struck me as being appropriate, but, the hon. gentleman could not believe in it. I suppose, if $75,000,000 are added to the Dominion by the construction of this railway, that, allowing for all probable increase in population, and allowing for all probable increase by the establishing of new Provinces in the North-West and the sale of lands; allowing that $25,000,000 will derived from these sources, for the sake of illustration, still $50,000,000 would remain as a burden on the other constituencies in the older Provinces $250,000 for each constituency, and for Prince Edward Island $1,500,000-or more than half what the Island Railway had cost when it was handed over to the Government. Well, Sir, that may be nothing. The right hon. Minister said that $25,000,000 was nothing. He said he was going to give $25,0 0,00) in cash towards the construction of the road, and he told us that is nothing. Last year he told us he was going to get it out of the lands, but he is now going to grant the money and give away the land, out of which he was going to get the $25.000,000, for nothing. But the people of my county consider $25,000,000 to be a good deal, and the people of Prince Edward Island consider $25,000,000 to be a good deal, and they complain of the burden of taxation that it will impose on them. I have told the people of my county that they will have to pay towards the construction of the Pacine Railway, $500,000. The burden caused by this Pacific Railway contract upon each constituency of 200 in this Dominion, must be somewhere in the neighborhood of $500,000. people of this country consider that no-Do not hon, gentlemen suppose that the Do the thing? electors of these constituencies consider it something, and will consider it something? . It is the duty of hon. members to proceed in this matter with all caption, and, while prepared to recognize all reasonable obligations to British Coumbia, they should hesitate before going into such a contract as this, and throw all the expenditure out of the control of the Government, and into the hands of the speculators. Without desiring to weary the House, I will proceed to make a few remarks on certain clauses of the contract. I will not go over any point which I have heard particularly brought out, because I am sure that hon. members may be somewhat tired of it; especially hon. members on that side of the House who have had those points brought out, elaborated, and laid before them in a way that has been disadvantageous to themselves. I wish to call attention to some of the options in the contract. I do this, not so much getting information. When the Minister of Finance spoke on this subject I thought that he was going to explain, in some way, the bearings of the sub-section of clause 9, and show us what were the powers of the Company to issue securities; when and in what way this road would probably be done; and what the probable annual charge would be, in case the Company accepted the option of sub-section d, of taking a guarantee, instead of the $25,000,000 in cash. I find, Sir, that all the options in this contract are in favor of the Syndicate, and against the Government. Section b says:

"Upon the construction of any portion of the railway hereby contracted "Upon the construction of any portion of the railway hereby contracted for, not less than 20 miles in length and the completion thereof so as to admit of the running of regular trains thereon, together with such equipment thereof as shall be required for the traffic thereon, the Government shall pay and grant to the Company the money and land subsidies applicable thereto, according to the division and appropriation thereof made, as hereinbefore provided; the Company having the option of receiving in lieu_of cash, terminable bonds of the Government, bearing such rate of interest for such period and nominal amount as may be arranged, and which may be equivalent according to actuarial calculation to the corresponding cash payment, the Government allowing four per cent. interest on monys denosited with them." cent. interest on monys deposited with them.'

Now, Sir, I think that is an option which should have been with the Government instead of with the Company. Perhaps it is not a matter of very great importance, and the Government may be able to control it. But I do not see how they can. Suppose to-day for the construction of twenty miles $200,000 in cash is due to the Company, they would be quite able to come to the Government, and theu have the question of actuarial mode as to what amount of lands should be given to them instead, or then take a very much larger amount of bonds than the cash payment they would be entitled to; but at any rate, after having the calculation made, if the market price were such that it would be to the advantage of the Syndicate to take bonds instead of cash, of course the Syndicate would take the bonds. Well, it may not be a large matter, but I quote it as one of the instances, that wherever an option is given in the contract it is given in favor of the Syndicate, and has not been retained by the Government. Sub-section d is rather an intricate one. Of course I would not like to call upon the Finance Minister to explain it now, as he might not have the figures with him, and would not be able to explain it in such a way as would be understood, but I think some one on that side of the House should be able to give a more lucid explanation of it than we have got. I want to call attention to the powers given by those clauses, and the corresponding section of the proposed Act to issue securities on this line of road. We find, leaving lands out altogether, that the Company have a bonus to receive of $25,000,000, that they are able to issue bonds upon whole line of railway to the the $20,000 per mile, over 2,700 miles of railway, equal to $54,000,000; that they have the power to issue $25,000,000 of capital—ordinary stock—and that besides that they have the power to issue $10,000 per mile on $27,000,000 of preferred stock. By no estimate that I have seen is the cost of the portion to be constructed by the Company likely to cost more than $48,500,000. Is it right for this Parliament to give such immense borrowing powers to the extent of $131,000,000, to enable this Company to build a piece of road to cost $48,500,000. I will venture to say that we have never done anything of the kind before to any company that have applied for like privileges. The Government made one reservation in this contract which may be of benefit to them, though I doubt it. There is an excuse for the Syndicate stopping work at any time if they should be prevented by the Act of God, the Queen's enemies, floods, or other causes beyond the control of the Company. The Tory writer to whom I referred, states with reference to this that "The act of God is a solemn phrase, but it loses something of its sacredness substitute for the recklessness of man." The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Royal), speaking the other night about an alternative of route, said that no monopoly could exist in the North-West, because, although the trade eastward, under the charter, might at first be compelled to flow to the St. Paul and Manitoba Railway, yet there are two charters to the Hudson's Bay which will be competing lines. The hon. Minister of Railways, in his speech at London referred to the same thing, speaking, perhaps in a jocular way, but doubtless in earnest, with reference to the Hudson Bay outlet. Now, I would like to call the attention of the hon. members for Halifax What becomes of the winter port scheme for Halifax if the grain trade of the North-West, instead of going down to Halifax, is either to go down by the St. Paul and Manitoba Railway to New York and Baltimore, or out through the Hudson's Bay? I think when this subject is brought before the people of Halifax they will say that the hon. member has not been very attentive to his duty in that matter. I would call attention to the system of granting lands proposed in this contract. We have been told time and again that the lands will be granted only in alternate blocks. Now any person who reads clause 11 of the contract must see that is not the case:

"The Company may, with the consent of the Government, select in the North-West Territories any tract or tracts of land not taken up as a means of supplying, or partially supplying, such deficiency, but such grants shall be made only from land remaining vested in the Government." Hon. gentlemen may say that this clause prevents anything of the sort. I believe that up to the time of the correspondence laid on the Table between Col. Dennis and Mr. Brassey, it was the intention of the Government to grant lands only in alternate blocks. But Mr. Brassey, when he wrote this letter on the 3rd of September, did not understand this Syndicate business. He was not aware how the Syndicate could manage these matters with the Government, and that if anybody wanted to get 100,000 acres of land in a block it could easily be done. All that is required is for the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury Benches to give their consent, and after they have given their consent so readily to other requests of the Syndicate, they will, no doubt, be able to make a small concession like this. If Mr. Brassey had only gone to the Syndicate and asked them to arrange to procure him a hundred square miles of land, the Syndicate could very easily have made arrangements with the Government for as much land as he wished. I hear that some hon gentlemen, well known to most of us, are desirous of getting large farms in that country, much larger than some of us think should be given to anybody. All they have got to do is to make a little arrangement with the Syndicate, and the Syndicate makes a little arrangement with the Government, and thus large tracks are shut up from settlement. Sheep farms may be made of 100 miles in length and 20 miles in breadth. I do not see anything in this contract to prevent such a Government as this from granting tracts-100 miles in length and 24 miles in width, each side of the railway, at any point the Syndicate may wish. It might be under certain circumstances to the advantage of the Syndicate, and to the advantage of the Government to do that, but certainly not to the advantage of the country. I have considered it my duty to call attention to these points, and to express most unqualifiedly my opposition to this contract, and I may say, in an unqualified way, my opposition to the Government who have been guilty of making this contract. Between the contract and the offer the difference in my opinion is immense. I believe, so far as I know the gentleman connected with the offer, it was made in good faith. I believe the duty of the Government is to submit the question to the country, and Iwhen examination shows it to be only a convenient believe the verdict of the country will be unhesitatingly.

that the matter should have been left open to public tender, and that the best offer which could be got should be received. Mr. ARKELL. It is not my intention to occupy much of the time of this House. But I feel that I am called upon to make a few remarks on this important measure. I do not intend to make a speech of two or three hours length. I think we have already had read to us about three-fourths of the Hansord for the last six or seven years in the speeches that have been delivered. I consider the question one of the most important, probably the most important, that has ever been brought before this House. It is only necessary to look back a few years to see how anxious the people of this country have been to secure the accomplishment of this great measure of building the Canadian Pacific Railway. Even since Confederation the people of this country have been looking forward to the time when this railway should be built from the Atlantic to the Pacific through Canadian territory. In 1872 the contract with Sig Hugh Allan was entered into, and it was a great loss to this country that Sir Hugh Allan was not able to carry out that great scheme owing to the excitement raised by hon. gentlemen opposite, not only in this country, but in England. The result was, that the Government of that time were forced to resign, and I believe it was a good thing they did resign. The Conservatives had been in power for a number of years, and the people were promised that if the Reformers once got in power, we should have a millenium in this country, we should have everything we wanted, and everybody should become rich. Well, we had five years experiences of the rule of hon. members opposite, and the majority of the people of this country came to the conclusion that it was a complete failure. For five years they frittered away their time, so far as the Pacific Railway was concerned. They never grasped the subject as statesmen should have grasped it. It has been said that the National Policy carried the election of 1878, but I believe it was not only the National Policy, but this great question of the Pacific Railway. I was surprised to hear the long speeches made during the Sessions of 1879 and 1880 by hon. gentlemen opposite, in condemnation of the National Policy. One hon. gentleman, the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) I think, said it was a legalized robbery. That is not the verdict the people of this country will pronounce upon it That policy has proved a great success, and the majority of the people of this Dominion to-day are perfectly satisfied with its working. So soon as the present Government got in power, they commenced at once to carry out their scheme of constructing the Pacific Railway. In the first place they took up the incomplete work begun by the late Government. But they were also awake to the necessity of finding capitalists who would relieve the Government of this great work, and I must say it is a great relief to the country to-day to know that they have been able to carry the desire of the people to so successful an issue. When Parliament is called together to carry out the views of the Government, we find every obstacle put in their way by hon. gentlemen opposite, who, if they had the interests of the country at heart, instead of pursuing the unpatriotic course they are pursuing, would come forward and help the Government to carry out this great scheme. The House met on the 5th of December, and the debate continues to the 23rd of December, two weeks of vacation took place, and those gentlemen, instead of going home to enjoy themselves with their families, began to agitate this question all over the country. I can only say that in my part of the country, when the people heard that this Syndicate had been formed, both Conservatives and Reformers were satisfied with it, not a single objection being raised against it. The got for $1.25 an acre, probably lands fully as good if not member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey), however, came up better than those in the North-West. No doubt there is

were very thinly attended; he could not get more then fifteen or twenty or twenty-five people together in his own riding to hear him condemn this measure. I will read an extract from a speech he delivered at Dutton. On the night the meeting was called for nobody came out to meet him; but it fortunately happened for him that there was a teameeting held there on the same night, and they made the hon, gentleman the chairman of the meeting, and about ten o'clock, after the ladies had retired, they gave him a chance to speak, and to present resolutions which he brought with him in his pocket. As reported, he said:

"He would now draw the attention of the meeting to the cost of the railway, and proceeded to give an array of figures which we present in tabular form, the cash bonus to the Syndicate being $35,000,000, or $6.25 per head for every man, woman, and child of the 4,000,000 in Canada.

showing that we would have to pay in this county, as our proportion of the cash bonus alone, $50,000 more than we gave to the Canada Southern Railway which passes through our very midst. But including the land bonus of 25,000,000 acres, valued by the Government, not long ago, as being worth, at least $3.18 per acre, and a total of $36,500.000 expended on the line by the Government and handed over to the Syndicate, the figures would stand as follows:—

Now this is from the St. Thomas journal, the advocate of the Grit party in Elgin. The hon, gentleman thought he would hold a meeting in the riding I have the honor to represent. He called a meeting in the Opera House of St. Thomas, and invited me to attend. About 800 people were present, and I assure you the resolutions he brought from Ottawa remained in his pocket, as he did not dare propose them. Had there been a vote taken he would not have found 100 men in the town willing to uphold his resolutions. The hon, gentleman was advised by his political friends that he had better not come, but he did come on his own responsibility and suffered the consequence. He shot as wide of the mark on that occasion as he did when he shot at a crow and killed a cow. The hon. gentlemen stated yesterday there was division among the Conservatives in reference to this question. I can only speak for my section. I know there is not a single Conservative to-day in Elgin who would oppose this great measure, and I know there are a great many Reformers there in its favor. In fact, it is only the extreme men who are opposed to it, and they oppose it purely through factiousness. Last night we had a speech from the hon. member for South Perth. It appears that hon, gentlemen went to the North-West on three different occasions. I remember when that gentleman, before the Committee on Emigration and Colonization, did not speak very favorably of lands in the North-West; but now hon gentlemen opposite place all kinds of values on these lands. I think they are making a great mistake. I am satisfied the lands are not worth anything without railway communication. we can get men to come forward and invest their money in the North-West, they are entitled to good compensation for their expenditure. The Syndicate get 25,000,000 acres and $25,000,000, and the expenditure by the country on contracts completed and unfinished will amount to $28,000,000. I wish the Government had made arrangements to hand the whole work over to the Syndicate and give them 50,000,000 instead of 25,000,000 acres, and no subsidy in money. This would, I believe, meet with the approval of the people. talk about $3, $4 and $5 an acre is absurd, when there are millions of acres of public lands in the United States to be there and called three meetings in his own riding. They great prosperity in store for those who go to our North-West, but it will take years before the country will be settled. If the Government could only realize sufficient to pay for the amount they have and will yet have to invest there, viz., $53,000,000, it would be good policy to give settlers every acre free. When the agreement was first published in the Mail, I read it very carefully, and I could not take the views taken by hon. gentlemen opposite, nor do I endorse the objections raised by hon, members on this side. I feel satisfied the Government have got the best of the bargain. I feel satisfied, from information I have obtained, the work may never be built at the amount estimated, and after the road is completed it will take millions of dollars to equip it, and after it has been completely equipped it will take many years before it will pay. It would be a great misfortune, should that great undertaking fall into the hands of a Syndicate who were not able to carry it out. The more they make, the stronger the Company will be, and the more resources they will have to build branch lines to connect with the main line. I only hope that the right hon. leader of the Government, who I think has looked forward, since Confederation, to the accomplishment of this great work will live and remain in power long enough to take a Pullman car in Ottawa and ride over the Canadian Pacific Railway to visit his constituents in British Columbia. It has been said that this contract is going to kill the Conservative party. I believe that party is quite willing to take the risk, and that the Opposition will have all they can manage at the next elections to defend their course in reference to the National Policy, not to speak of this railway at all. I hope that we shall then have a large amount of work done not merely on the prairie but on the Lake Superior and British Columbia sections, and that the people will say, as I think they will, we shall not entrust to the hands of the Opposition the completion of this great work but leave it to the party which originated it; and that we intend it shall be carried to a successful issue by the Conservative party which we placed in power. I have no hesitation in supporting these resolutions, which I know are popular with the country, and am satisfied that no supporter of the Government in the House on this occasion will have trouble in securing his reelection. The leader of the Opposition had the credit of upsetting a Government in 1871. I believe he found a traitor in it however. But I do not think he will find any traitors in this Government or among its supporters. If hon, gentlemen opposite wish to keep up this debate a month or even two months longer we are quite willing to stay to listen. Though we have had a re hash of the whole thing night after night for some time, we can stand it a while longer if hon, gentleman opposite think proper. In conclusion, I will say that it will afford me the greatest pleasure to record my vote in favor of the resolutions on the Table.

Mr. BOULTBEE. The last speaker on the Opposition side (Mr. Killam) I think made an apology, near the end of his speech, for having occupied the time of the House so long in making, or trying to make, as he said, some points which he believed had not been brought forward by any other hon, gentleman in the House. Well, I followed him carefully, as I intended to speak after him if I got the opportunity, and I tried to see those points, but I failed to see them. I fancy every one in the House failed to see them after he had made them, therefore it was not altogether remarkable that they had not been seen before. This rather shows a disposition on the part of hon. members in Opposition to carry on this debate in a mere spirit of factiousness, as in fact it was all talk without argument. Now I do not intend to take up the time of the House at any great length tonight because this debate has been drawn out to perhaps an unreasonable length. But I do not like to let this vote go, without taking notice of certain points that have also occurred to me, like the member for Yarmouth, on this in a few years, five times that population, and that Mr. ABKELL.

occasion, though I hope they may may be more distinctly seen by everyone in this House. I think that never have we had in this country a question of so great importance as this treated in the same way by the Opposition, unless it be that in regard to the re-arrangement of our commercial affairs. It seems to me that they have treated this question with a considerable degree of factiousness. I do not think that as the debate has gone on, the Opposition have made any points entitling them to protract the debate to its present unreasonable length, or able men as they are, to warrant them delaying the legislation and business of the country to the extent we have noticed. Since this subject has been treated at all, or discussed in this country, the whole people, I think, have recognised not only the national but the commercial necessities involved in this great scheme. I need not dilate now upon a subject already discussed at such length, or reiterate well-known arguments to show how necessary it is to a country situated geographically as this is, that it should extend from ocean to ocean, and be connected by a great chain of railways such as is contemplated at present. I think I understand the question fully, and I may say that I go farther than our leader or the other gentlemen who have spoken on this occasion as to the political necessities of the case. I think not only is it necessary that this great line of communication should be created through the country, for keeping Manitoba and the North-West and British Columbia, but I go farther and affirm this principle, which I believe will be borne out by the views of the people of this country generally, that it is absolutely and completely necessary to construct this railway to prevent the disintegration altogether of this great Dominion. I do not believe for a moment, if this factions and disloyal policy was sustained and put into operation, that we could retain British Columbia within the bounds of Canada; nor do I believe, were we to let the North-West be cut off from us by means like those suggested in this new scheme, that we should be able to retain the North-West after we had lost British Columbia. I do not think that, under these circumstances, we should be able to retain the North-West with us. Stripped of British Columbia, and the fair and fertile belts of the North-West, and of the good we hope to accomplish by close commercial and national relations with that country, I do not believe Ontario and the other Provinces would be able to maintain their autonomy. I believe that this scheme is a necessity of the hour; one which we are bound by the inexorable logic of facts and national necessities to carry out, and I do not think we should take our stand on mere party politics and allow great questions like this to be injuriously delayed. The necessities of this measure, after it has been so long discussed, have impressed themselves, not only on the minds of statesmen and politicians, but of the people at large. The present Government, favored as I think by a happy conjunction of circumstances, have been able, with as much ordinary human wisdom and sagacity as is often shown by men to lay before this House and this country a scheme which seems to me to be satisfactory in every particular. It is a scheme which will enable us to have, within a few years, without increasing our burdens, this great road stretching from one end of our country to the other. I say without increasing our burdens, for though I am speaking without having looked into the exact statistics, I recollect seeing that some time ago the small Province of Manitoba and the continuous territory of the North-West, with a population of something like 70,000 people, are now paying in excise and customs something like $450,000 into our revenues. It is no dream of a visionary to say that when this great scheme is placed on a proper footing, when it is pushed forward by the energy of skilled men, backed by liberal capital, we shall have, we shall draw from the resources of that countryresources which could not be developed if we do not implement this great scheme—all that we have to pay towards the building of that road, irrespective of the immense advantages which will flow to Ontario and the other Provinces from being in close commercial relations with the population of that country, who will draw from us the very necessaries of life. The scheme is one which, to say the least, is as well conceived, and is besides far more reasonable in its terms than the scheme of the late Government. I wish to refer briefly to the manner in which this scheme has been treated. Speaking gravely and reasonably of a scheme, the most important which has been debated in this House for many years, and the most important probably which will be discussed in any Legislature in Canada for many years to come, I say the Opposition have factiously endeavored to prevent this scheme from becoming law. I say that in doing this they have completely turned their backs on themselves. They have, Sir, swallowed every argument they made use of twelve months ago in this House. One hon, member has argued in one way, and another another way. We had the late Finance Minister indignantly pointing out that the national result of the scheme would be that our trade would be diverted from the United States. We have had the leader of the Opposition, on the other hand, endeavoring to carry out what his late and present colleague deprecated so strongly. But they have gone further. They, a very small minority, have used expressions towards the large majority who are supporting a very strong Government that were scarcely courteous in debate. They have characterized us as men of little intelligence—as the servile followers of a tyrannical and corrupt Government, and there is no epithet of abuse which can be employed in a debate which they have not used against us. But their efforts produced no effect upon those who represent the sentiments of the country, and it became apparent to them that they had to try other means. They did what I think—though I am not so well read in constitutional law as the leader of the Opposition—was utterly unconstitutional and improper, mainly to endeavor to stir up the country in the midst of a Session, we have gone through the turmoil of a general election; we represent the country and are here to carry out its behests, and I say it was less the act of a statesman than the act of a demagogue to go to the country in the midst of a Session and endeavor to stir up an agitation against the scheme of the Government. But what has been the result of their meetings—of all their agitation throughout the country—of the petitions which they circulated in every hole and corner? They have failed in every respect in arousing the indignation of the people. I say that this debate should have been carried on with all the quiet gravity, all that consideration, all that carelessness of exterior circumstances which should characterize an important debate of this kind, but such a spirit was impossible when these hon, gentlemen were making frantic appeals to the country while Parliament was sitting. But even when they did go before the people they did not try to have a fair discussion of the subject. That was not the end they sought; but they endeavored, by packed meetings, and by preventing the other side being heard, to carry resolutions condemning the Government. I have been at meetings myself where attempts were made to debate the long strings of resolutions that were made up, and where it was impossible to say anything in defence of the Government. I have been present on such occasions in the city of Toronto, with a member of the Senate in the chair; with a number of people on the platform who were not exactly members of Parliament, but who had tried to become such. There were men there of high intelligence, who ought to have had some sense of justice, some principles of fairness, but they showed simply a desire to burk discussion. I should like to ask the leader of the Opposition, if he were in his place, as I see he is not, if he stood before a bar charged with some serious crime, for instance the abduction of a local Minister from a local Cabinet, and if, after able council had stated the case against him, and the jury had heard the evidence against him; when his counsel got up to defend him, and the judge said: "No, stop; that is not the way we are going to conduct this trial. We believe this man to be guilty and bad. If you go trial. We believe this man to be guilty and bad. If you go into a perplexing trial, and get up a discussion in his defence, you will puzzle the minds of the jury, and we cannot get a condemnation; let us convict him and I will condenm him, and after that you may say what you like"—I ask the hon gentleman what he would say to that? Yet that is the way that the hon gentlemen opposite submit the question to the people. Sir, I say they have carried out their agitation in that unfair and factious way. We have had their petitions hawked from one end of the country to the other. I have seen men to-day who have arrived in this city from Western Canada and from the east, and I asked them what was going on. and from the east, and I asked them what was going on. Well, they said, everything is quiet; there is nothing going on at all. We understand this thing is going through in good shape in spite of the opposition of these men, and that will be the end of it and the country will be well satisfied. But this discussion, such as it is, seems to have produced some sort of effect. Now, if there is one man more than another who pretends that the country is alarmed and excited on this question, it is the hon, member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin). He is deeply moved on this subject himself, and he has stated that the country is boiling with indignation at the bargain, that there will be a rebellion, that the indignant people will rise and stamp out this House if we attempt to give effect to this measure. Well, Sir, somehow that hon, gentleman does not seem to represent very correctly the feelings of those amongst whom he lives. I hold in my hand a telegram containing a resolution passed by the county council that hon, gentleman represents.

Mr. ANGLIN. Hear, hear.

Mr. BOULTBEE. If I mistake not I heard that hone gentleman say that he wished he could support this scheme. There are four others said the same thing, and if they are honest and truthful, why do they persist in their opposition? The hone member for Gloucester, patriot as he is, and so largely imbued with the opinion of the men of his county, when he hears this resolution passed by the County Council of Gloucester, will be able to carry out his wish and to support this scheme.

Mr. ANGLIN. I know all about it.

Mr. BOULTBEE. I do not know whether you know all about it or not, but I intend the House shall know all about it. Here is the resolution, dated to day:

"Gloucester County Council to-day passed the following resolutions: Whereas we consider that the people of this Province are interested to a certain extent in common with those of all other parts of the Dominion, in the construction and speedy completion of the Canadian Pacific Railway through British territory as a work eminently calculated to promote the growth wealth and prosperity of the country at large, and we rejoice to learn that Ministers have succeeded in contracting with capitalists for the prompt construction of the work on more favorable terms, which was laid before Parliament in December and deserves general support: Therefore, resolved, that we view the contract entered into by the Dominion Government for the construction of the railway as a just and favorable one, and at a lower cost to the Dominion that would have been readily accepted by their predecessors in office. That the proposition, or offer, by what is termed the new Syndicate, has the appearance of a political dodge employed at the eleventh hour to embarrass the Government and delay the construction and completion of this important work. Further resolved that we consider it behoves every honest loyal lover of his country to give his earnest support to the Government in this matter, and frustrate the abject and factious opponents who are only trifling with the hest interests of the country."

The following seem to be the names of those who voted in favor of the resolution; Councillors Young, Lebreton, Barry,

Hache, Sewell, Alexander, Degrace, Hornibrook, Landry, Chalmers, Hube; O'Brien and Metanson declined voting. The Secretary-Treasurer was directed to send copies to Senator Ferguson and Mr. Anglin. This resolution, Mr. Speaker, is well worded, it seems sensible, it seems to express the opinion of a great majority of that county. The only doubt in my mind is this—I have got a horrible doubt on this matter—whether these men in Gloucester are men of good judgment or not. The external evidence in this House of their judgment is against thom. If they are men capable of passing a resolution like this, I do not know how we can account for the presence of the hon, member for Gloucester here. If these men be honest and capable of appreciating a great question like this, then I think the hon. gentleman will have to vote for the scheme. His position, of course, is a painful one, and we must all feel great sympathy for him, though that sympathy is somewhat mitigated when we remember how he has carried himself on other oecasions, when we have seen him in unpleasant circumstances. We hope the hon. member for Gloucester will get comfortably through that thing. Well, that is one of the resolutions that this agitation has called forth. We see that in attempting to stir up the people against this great scheme, which is going to realize all our hopes in relation to the Canadian Pacific Railway, the country rises against them, and there are arriving at this House now, letters from every portion of the country, letters from men whose intelligence is undoubted, urging us by all means to press this thing through as fast as a factious Opposition will allow, because they consider the future of the country is at stake. Well, Sir, all this failed. Did these gentlemen stop then? They had given us factious opposition in the House; we had faction and conspiracy in the country. Did they stop then? Oh, no, their resources were not exhausted. We have next what is called the new Syndicate. Well, this new Syndicate has got into about the same trouble as the member for Gloucester. Its position is an ambiguous one, and it is tainted with considerable stain and suspicion. It is a very curious thing that it is very difficult to put up a job. Whenever you try to put up a job, it is characterized with a certain perverse ingenuity which invariably divests it of those circumstances which surround a natural transaction. I will give you an instance. Two stores are burned down in the same neighborhood. The owner of one has the sympathy of all his neighbors; very likely subscriptions are raised for him, the insurance company pays him, and he gets on very well. To the other fire everybody points at as a fraud. Somebody said a long while ago that truth is mighty and will prevail. Well, this Syndicate affair is not an ordinary fire; it is an incendiary. It is a scheme that bears the stamp of having been conceived in fraud, and brought forth in iniquity. It bears upon its face the marks of its iniquitous paternity. It was conceived without honesty and, like most of such measures. without common sense. Throughout this country there is but one opinion with reference to it, and that is that it is a fraud. Who are the men connected with it? The head and front of this affair, the great financier who is to manage the whole thing, is Sir Wm. P. Howland. Well, perhaps, from certain relations which exist between him and the leader of the present Government, he had better have kept his hand out of this nasty thing. He had been well repaid for what he did, and should have been satisfied. But when men put a scheme like this before the people on a matter so important they must be subject to criticism. Is Sir Wm. P. Howland a man of such financial ability as to be able to carry out a scheme like this? To my memory, the only marked instance we have of his financial talent was when he was treasurer of the Macdonald-Sicotte Government, when, in one year, he got the affairs of the country in such a mess that the Government burst up altogether. But it is said there are great railway men in the new Syndicate, great contractors who have carried out works of enormous importance, and are able to carry out this work better than the Stephen Syndicate or any one else. Well, who are these men? Among them are Hendrie, Proctor & Wood, of Hamilton. These men, claiming that the Northern Railway Company were likely to impose onerous rates on freight and passengers, determined to get up another road to compete with it—the Hamilton and North Western Railway—and they went through the country, and succeeded in getting very large bonuses from the municipalities through which it passed, on the ground that it would be a competing line with the Northern Railway. In this way they got bonuses enough to build about half the road, and they got a clause put in their Act of incorporation allowing them to be contractors also. About the time they got the road completed, they found that they had made a horrible mess of it. What did these men do? They went to work, and in front of the men from whom they had got the bonuses, made that road over to the Northern Railway, which they were bonused to compete against. We might, of course, say, and with ordinary justice, that men who carried out a scheme like that are not honest men and should not be trusted with such an undertaking as this; but I want to go further than that, and show that whether honest or not honest, they would be unable to carry it out. It was found out when they handed the Hamilton and North Western Railway over to the Northern Railway Company, they were about to be prosecuted for fraud by the City of Hamilton, from which they had obtained a bonus of $200,000. And what did these great railway men do? They crawled all around Hamilton on their stomachs and said that they and their families would be ruined, that their furniture would be sold by auction, that they would have to work hard for their honest living. So they got these proceedings stopped, on the ground that they would be ruined if they were not. Well, I say on that ground, they are not fit to be trusted with a great transaction like this. I need not discuss Major Walker; he has been discussed already. It is enough to mention the names of Major Walker and Herman Cook, and to point to their public acts or their financial position to show that they would bring no strength to a scheme like this. The same remark applies to the man named Larkin, of St. Catherines, who is well known to be not worth a cent in the world. Mr. Norris belongs to it also, who has no more means than is necessary with hard work to carry on his own business. Is it right we should have a thing like this flaunted in our What is the result when this great gun is fired, and when the sober common sense of the people become able to appreciate it at its true value? We find those gentlemen, so soon as they learn the true feeling of the people, abandon their bantling before it was weaned, leaving it to starve. I may be talking harshly; I may be so very biassed by my political proclivities that I cannot deal with it fairly, but it seems to me when a thing like this, marked with so many features that indicate it to be a foolish fraud from beginning to end, on which the very men from whom it emanated turn their backs, I am fairly born out in charging these men with not dealing fairly with the House and country in the course they have adopted. The Government have brought down a measure that seems to give a solution of the problem that has been vexing the minds of statesmen both here and in the mother land. On the one hand, no greater problem has engaged the attention of the statesmen of England than that of providing an outlet for their overcrowded population, and on the other the great question which our statesmen have had to consider for years past is the speedy filling up of our North-West with the people from other lands. In the scheme now before the House, we have a complete solution of that problem. We can, with the aid of the mother land, remove her surplus population, energetic men anxious to provide homes for themselves and families, to our immense regions of land as fertile as any to be found in the world. Yet, when a scheme such as this is submitted, a small band of men, politically speaking, outcast of the earth and reprobate of Heaven, raise their voices and say: "We are going to stamp out this thing; you know nothing, you are only curs, imbeciles, and slaves; we are the wise men, the men who know how to do this thing; entrust the Government to us and every thing will prosper; the land will bloom with happiness; we will have no more taxation; we will have railways without going to the ordinary means of building them, and every thing will be rosy." The only way I can account for their course is that their Grit mind is, for practical business purposes, a badly constituted intellect, of no use to themselves or to anybody else. When in Opposition their teeming brains are full of visionary fancies; and once in power, their scrupulosity, and honesty of purpose, and practical common sense do not all keep pace with their theories when out of office. We have seen what an improvement has become manifest in the commercial affairs of our country through the remedial legislation introduced by the Government; and if the scheme now under consideration were not as wise and perfect as it is, I hold that in the grave issues before us any man who would refuse to support the Government, and would vote to bring these men back to power, would be acting against the best interests of his country. What, from their utterance, would be the result were in power? We cannot shut if they eyes to the fact that they have deliberately, for years past, set themselves in determined opposition and the will of the people. They care nothing for the expressed view of the people. They only wish to carry out their own ideas. When defeated at the polls by an overwhelming majority, they simply said: "Oh! the people are all fools; we are the wise men." I said, when I began to speak, I would detain the House but for a short time, I have given hasty expression to the views and opinions that have crowded themselves on my mind as the debate goes on, and I resume my seat with a renewed appeal, to accept this measure which is going to bind our people together, increase our population and national prosperity, and consequently add to the greatness and strength of the Dominion.

Mr. BORDEN. I think that the hon. member for Yarmouth ought to feel flattered, for he has been able to bring to his feet the acknowledged fighting man of the Government party in this House. That gentleman complained very much of the discourteous language used upon the floor of the House by gentlemen of the Opposition towards gentlemen on the Government side, and he began himself by most discourteous allusions to the speech of the member for Yarmouth (Mr. Killam). He saw fit to sneer at certain points which the member for Yarmouth said he intended to make, and which I believe the majority of the House will concede he succeeded in establishing. I think if there is any hon. gentleman who is able to place his points clearly before the country it is the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Killam). The hon. member for East York (Mr. Boultbee), for the second time during this Session, treated us to a description of a meeting that took place during the vacation in Toronto, at which he has told us, in almost the same words, that the leader of the Opposition was afraid to meet him. In view of that the hon, member for Yarmouth should feel deeply flattered that a gentleman of his immense ability should consider him worthy of his steel, I do not intend to follow that hon. gentleman through his rambling speech, but there are one or two points that have attracted my notice. The hon, gentleman said he took a national view of this question, that he was in advance of his leader. Why, we know that every age produces men who a wider range of discussion than they did before; and I can are in advance of it. History tells us of such men. We read of men of science who have been put to death for holding views in advance of their times, who have been martyrs. I have no doubt the hon. member for East York (Mr. Boultbee) will find he is a martyr also for his advanced opinions when he comes to meet the people of this country at the polls. The hon. gentleman thought fit to accuse the Opposition of factiousness. I want to know which side of the House has occupied most time in this discussion; but I do not think any speech can be pointed to as indicating factiousness, and I do not think a speech has been made by an hon. member but that he thought it was his duty to make it on this important question. The hon member for East York treated the House to a telegram which he said he had received, or had handed to him from the county of Gloucester, represented so ably by an hon. gentleman in this House. I do not propose to deal with that, inasmuch as the hon. member for that constituency rose in his place, and no doubt, he would be able, in due time, to attend to the matter. But I also have a telegram from the Province of Nova Scotia, one in which the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Wade) will be interested. It is from a constituency represented in this House by a supporter of the Government, and it runs as follows:

"Resolutions, protesting against the Government bargain with the Syndicate and favoring Blake's policy, of only building the road as fast as the resources of the country will admit, passed unanimously by the County Council to-day.

J. W. Longstaff.' County Council to-day.

Mr. WADE. When I rise as member for Digby, and make my observations as to the course I will take on this measure, it will be found that I will take the course I have always taken in the past. I know very well where that telegram comes from and the party who sent it. Digby will take care of itself.

· Mr. BORDEN. I do not wonder the hon. gentleman is very much excited. He has had bitter experience of the results of taking a vote of the kind which his party leader will require from him in a short time. On a certain occasion, not very many years ago, the scheme of Confederation was passed in Nova Scotia. A motion was introduced by the Opposition in the Provincial Legislature, asking that the question might be submitted to the people at the polls. The present member for Digby (Mr. Wade) was a member of the House, and he voted against it.

Mr. ROCHESTER. I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman is not speaking to the question before the House.

Mr. WADE. Allow the hon. member to proceed.

Will the hon, gentleman be kind-Mr. SPEAKER. enough to repeat what he has said.

Mr. BORDEN. I was reminding the hou. member for Digby of an event in the history of Nova Scotia somewhat similar to the present one, and that the hon. gentleman was called upon by his party leader to give a vote which relegated him to private life for quite a number of years. I do not wonder that this telegram makes him sensitive, remembering, as he must, the result of the course he followed on that occasion, which, I regret to say, he intends to take upon this. It is not my intention at this late period of the debate, after the question has been so thoroughly discussed by both sides of the House, to enter into the general question of the Pacific Railway; nor do I think it necessary or proper to do so, because I think the question is much narrowed by the recent offer made to the Government for the construction for much less sum in land and money than the offer which the Government have laid on the Table. Hon. gentlemen supporting the Government have seen fit, since the new offer was made and laid on the Table, to take rightly understand it, because their object was to distract the attention of the House and the country from the new offer. They have sought to fasten the minds of the people upon every possible and conceivable subject, except the fact that two offers are in the hands of the Government, and that one is immensely more favorable to the people than the other. Now, it seems to me the question before the House is, which of these offers should be accepted? If it were not limited to these two, as I understand it is, if the question were open, I should advocate the Government asking tenders from the whole world, to see whether we have yet got the lowest tender that could be given. But as the Government do not see their way clear to that, and have a very much better offer than the first submitted, I say it is unquestionably their duty to accept it. Now, several speakers have raised certain objections to the new offer, one being that it comes too late. I would like to ask how it could have come before. means did the Government take to get offers of any kind? Did they not couduct their business in secret? Did they invite tenders, or advertise for tenders for the construction of the road? Have they not, on the contrary, taken every possible means to conceal this offer from the House and the people? We have heard a great deal about the dignity of Parliament, before Parliament assembled, that it would be undignified for the Ministry to announce the nature of this bargain. When we came here, however, it was not undignified of them to deny Parliament the facts that would show us whether they had come to a wise conclusion or not, and most important papers, without which it was impossible for the House to arrive at an intelligent conclusion as to the course the Government have pursued; and, to-day, I presume they will see that it will be contrary to the dignity of Parliament for it to ratify anything but this contract. It seems to me, under the circumstances, that it would be most undignified for Parliament to ratify this bargain. Has Parliament relegated to this Ministry the exclusive right of doing its business? What do we meet here for? Is Parliament a farce? Do we come to receive from the Administration instructions as to what we are to do, or have we come here as independent men to review their conduct, and decide whether they have acted rightly or wrongly? One thing is certain—the people will review our conduct, we cannot deny them that privilege, although we do not give it to them now. I think the Government will be acting wisely to give it to them, but if they will not the people will have the opportunity before very long. A second objection taken by the member for Lunenberg (Mr. Kaulbach) to this second offer was, that it was not serious. -To judge from that hon. gentleman's speech, and the tone of his remarks, I think he considers it very serious, and that he will find it exceedingly serious before he gets through with it. If I had wanted a list of arguments against this scheme of the Government, and arguments favoring the new offer, I could not do better than take his speech. While he was making it, I wondered whether he hoped the people would read his speech and forget his vote, because his speech is exactly opposite to what I am afraid his vote will be. With regard to the seriousness of this offer, does it seem likely that gentlemen of such high business standing, would deposit one and half million dollars, if they were not serious and did not mean business. The hon, gentleman from Cardwell made a very extraordinary statement the other night: he said that the money would never have been put up if he had not denounced the new scheme as bogus. He takes the whole credit for the result. He said that those gentlemen believing that he had been put up to give expression to the sentiments of the Government, and feeling perfectly safe as to the result, had seen fit to deposit their money. A more disingenuous statement, a more unworthy imputation could not have been made against the character of those gentlemen who submitted the new offer. Another objection was that this was done to embarrass the Government. Well, I Mr- Borden, want to know why it should embarrass the Government? What are the Government of this country for? To serve the best interests of the people. That should be their chief aim. and if they were anxious to do the best by the people of this country, this offer could not possibly embarrass them. Another objection made is, that its adoption would involve the giving up of the eastern end of the road. Why? The new offer certainly provides for the construction of the whole road. Well, they say again: "Oh, but it involves a change of Government." The policy of the Opposition is to throw over the eastern section. Why should it involve a change of Government? Are Ministers bound to accept this offer? Why did they bring it here at all? What have we got to do with it? We have heard a great deal about monopolies. Has this Syndicate a monopoly already? What binds this Government so that it cannot receive any other offer, and how is it that the acceptance of a lower offer would be equivalent to turning the Government out, and putting the Opposition in power? Another objection made is that the new offer is purely Canadian; that the ends of immigration, which are very important to this country, would not be so well served by the second as by the Government plan, because, forsooth, the Government Syndicate is composed of various nationalities, Frenchmen. Germans, and Americans. Hon, gentlemen opposite get up here and air their views, and tell us that the Opposition are disloyal-that they are super-loyal; believe in building up a great country, and want this railroad run all through Canadian territory; and yet they are unwilling it should be constructed, owned and worked by a purely Canadian company. There are a great many objections to the Government scheme, which have been ably dealt with already—there is the exemption from duty which the member for Lunenberg turned his especial attention to. He said, in Nova Scotia we have coal and iron-we are prepared to make rails for all the railways in Canada, and when he was making that statement I thought of the promise rade to us previous to Confederation, that Nova Scotia would be the workshop of the whole Dominion. I also thought of the promises made to us previous to the adoption of the National Policy, and I scarcely could conceive how gentlemen who had made those promises could frame this contract as they did. Now, I desire to advert to two or three important differences between the two offers. And first we have a saving of $3,000,000 and 3,000,000 acres of land. An hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island, who spoke last night, said the people approved of the principle of giving this work into the hands of a company, and that they were not much interested in the details; but it seems to me that this money and these lands are details in which they will be interested and which they will appreciate. I might point to the fact that these $3,000,000 would complete a line of railway in the county of the hon. member for Lunenberg (Mr. Kaulbach), and make the constitutents of that hon. gentleman happy. It would also complete the link between Digby and Annapolis. With regard to the value of the land it appears that there is one important consideration which has not been referred to, and that is that the Syndicate will get enough money to build the central section without using an acre of land, so that we have to consider the value of the lands after the road is constructed. If those lands will not be worth $2 an acre after the road is built, then I think the sooner we give up the whole country to those gentlemen the better. We find that in the scheme proposed by the Minister of Railways in 1879, that hon, gentleman proposed to build the road by the sale of lands, and he estimated the lands at a minimum of $2 an acre previous to the construction of the road. The hon. member for Lunenberg (Mr. Kaulbach), said he approved of the principle of building the road by a company, as a company could build the road more cheaply than a Government, but surely there is room for comparison between the two companies. We have two com panies before us, the offer of one being much more favorable than that of the other, and we will see which one the hon. gentlemen will vote for. A good deal has been said here about public opinion, and hon. gentlemen supporting the Government are endeavoring to delude themselves into the belief that public opinion is in their favor. I believe that their better convictions tell these hon. gentlemen that public opinion is decidedly against them. I know that, so far as Pobserved—and I had good opportunity for observation when I went home during the holidays - that public opinion is very much exercised on this subject and that it is opposed to the Government scheme. I had the pleasure of being present at a meeting in Halifax which was attended by 800 or 1,000 electors, and was one of the most earnest meetings lever attended. The hon member for Gloucester delivered a most able speech, and notwithstanding that invitations were repeatedly extended to any person present to address the meeting for or against the Government scheme, resolutions adverse to the contract were passed almost unanimous, there being not more than one or two voices raised against them. Some remarks have been made about the petitions which are being presented to this House in opposition to the contract; vain attempts were made to get up counter petitions, but the latter have been so few and the number of signatures so small, that I think it would have been better for the hon. gentleman opposite, if the attempt had not been made, as it has only strengthened our position. An hon, gentleman referred last night o the monster petition which was presented from Prince Edward Island, and by taking various exceptions to it he made out that there was about 100 of the signature, which could be objected to. Well, as the petition had some 4.500 signatures, even if we take off 100, we have still left 4,400 names. A very respectable petition. He said this petition was signed by the dead as well as the living, but I was not much surprised at that, for I should think if there was anything which would bring the dead from their graves it would be the enormity of the the scheme which is before the House. He said he had received some letters-of which he read extracts without, however, giving us the names of the writers-and he said he thought these letters would be a better indication of the feeling in Prince Edward Island than the petitions presented to the House. He may think so, but I do not think any body else will agree with him. We have heard a good deal during the debate about loyalty, and we had a lecture on that subject from the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Longley) who always enters earnestly into any subject he may discuss. Hon. gentlemen opposite are in the habit of arrogating to themselves all the loyalty of this country—they are the super-loyal party. But it occurred to me that the interests of the people could be better secured by acts of loyalty than by high-toned expressions of loyalty in the House, and that loyalty like charity had better begin at home. That hon, gentleman knows that his own Province and county are heavily taxed by the National Policy of this Government; that it bears very severely on the people living by the sea. The hon. gentleman I think would serve his people better by voting to save them this $3,000,000 and 3,000,000 acres of land—which means $6,000,000 more than by treating us to lectures on sentimental loyalty. There is one thing about him and about those who agree with him in Nova Scotia, and that is their loyalty to their party. I admire a man who sticks to his party, but there is such a thing as carrying that feeling too far. When loyalty to his party comes in conflict with loyalty to the best interests of his country then I think loyalty to his party should give way to the interests of his country.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I have abstained until the present moment from taking part in this debate on the am here for the purpose of heafing your views, of ascermain question before this House, because I felt, as taining the political pulse, so to speak, upon this subject, an old member of Parliament, and an ex-member of the Government, and one who has in his official capacity had to do with questions closely connected with this, it would be proper for me to hear the views and opinions of hon. members, some of whom became members of this House only at the last election, and to observe, as well as I could, the progress of the agitation which has taken place in the country for the purpose of exciting-I will not say for that purpose alone—opposition to this scheme which the Government has submitted to Parliament with respect to the Pacific Railway. I am one of those who have a very strong faith in the sober second thought of the people. From the beginning of my political life, now many years ago, that has been my guiding star. I have endeavored to ascertain first, what, according to my judgment, was in the interests of my country, and then, as journalist and member of Parliament, to bring the question in that light before the people of the country, and to be guided in my political action, at all events in my representative action, by the result at which I arrived as to the true opin on of the people of the country, irrespective of party. I have belonged to Governments which have had to depend, for their support in Parliament, upon the suffrages of a political party. I admit, as the gentleman who has just taken his seat remarked, that there are occasions in the history of political conflicts when it becomes the duty of every member of Parliament to consider whether his allegiance to his party or his allegiance to his country should prevail. Now, Sir, if I felt that in the present case anything I could say, or any influence I could use with the Government or upon hon. members of this House, or upon the public, would prevent the success of a scheme which has been submitted to Parliament, I should hesitate very much before attempting to exercise that influence. I should feel myself bound to consider the broad question whether this scheme, with all its defects, with all the objections that an honest man and a man of experience, in matters of this sort, could urge against it, is not upon the whole a measure which ought to command a majority of this House. I have had an opportunity, as I remarked on a former occasion, of consulting my constituents. The constituency I have the honor to represent is. I believe, without making any unfair reflection upon other constituencies, one of the most intelligent in the Province of Ontario. It lies between two considerable cities. Toronto and Hamilton. It is crossed by four railways, one in the rear of the county, another in the front, another from front to rear, and another recently con-tructed through the centre. There are several villages, and there is great activity of political discussion in that constituency. They have had, for many years, close contests, sometimes bitter contests. Newspapers circulate there freely—the city papers both of Hamilton and Toronto, as well as those from more distant points. Therefore, I thought it was a very suitable tribunal to decide upon the main features of a case like this. On the occasion to which I refer, I had the pleasure and the advantage of having present the prominent men, the most intelligent mon of every township of that constituency and of both political parties. I endeavored, assuming for the time a judicial tone and temper, to lay this matter before them in that sense—avoiding a partizan position, either on behalf of the scheme of the Government or on behalf of the Opposition. I pointed out, as I thought it my duty to do, what its merits seemed to be, and what was contemplated by the Government in submitting it. I called attention to some features which seemed to be defects, some of them serious defects. I asked them to express their opinion for my guidance. I was asked by some who were active in the Conservative interest, whether I would support this scheme in Parliament if a majority of my constituents instructed me to do so. I said at once, I can make no such promise; I am here for the purpose of heafing your views, of ascer-

of Halton; not of the Conservative party only, because I told them after my election that I would hold myself responsible to the constituency at large, that in dealing with great questions in which all their interests were or might be affected, it would be my duty to regard, not the political party who chiefly gave me their support, but the views, opinions, and interests of the whole body of the electors. I said that I wished to have the opinion not merely of Conservatives, but of those who belonged to the Opposition. On the other hand, I was asked by prominent gentlemen, personal friends of mine, belonging to the Liberal party, whether, if the measure was condemned by a vote of my constituents, I would go back to Parliament and condemn the measure by my vote. I said, as in the other case, that I would make no such promise, that it would be my duty, in their interest, as well as in the interests of the country at large, to consider this question from both points of view, of its merits and its defects, and to arrive, if possible, at a conclusion, when the vote was taken, what course it would be my duty to take. Well, Sir, the conclusion at which I did arrive, after a pretty full discussion, after various propositions had been submitted to the meeting by leaders of the Liberal party as well as by prominent Conservatives, was that the public opinion of that constituency, so expressed, was favorable to the proposition submitted by the Government to Parliament. It was favorable to it on this view: in the first place it seemed to be the unanimons opinion that it was desirable, if it could be accomplished, to take the construction of the Pacific Railway out of the hands of the Government and the officers of the Government and to place it in the hands of the Company of capitalists, a commercial company, who would construct, operate, and own it as a commercial speculation. They seemed to be of opinion that it would be preferable, in the interests of the country, that that course should be taken, if it could be accomplished without making the burden too heavy for the people to bear. Then, as to the amount of subsidy. It was a very simple question-$25,000,000 in cash, and 25,000,000 acres of land to be appropriated, in alternate sections, so that the Government would retain everywhere adjacent to a section belonging to the Company a section of its own, to be dealt with as the Government of the day, instructed by Parliament, might deem proper. If our policy should in the future be to give away all the lands, to induce settlers to go into the country, it would be quite competent for Parliament to pursue that course with respect to the alternate sections. I do not think any intelligent man of either party, objected to the amount of land and money proposed to be given for the completion of this railway. Objections were made—and on the face of the contract were naturally and justly made—to some features in it. I was able to tell them, with reference to the standard of construction, that the Syndicate had consented by one of its members, who had a power of attorney to act for his colleagues, that the Union Pacific Railway, as delivered to the Government in 1873, should be the standard, the approximate character of which would guide in the construction of this railway. Then I was able to say that, before leaving Ottawa, I was assured by those who had it in their power to assure me, that, with respect to the exemption from duty of a certain portion of the materials required for the railway, an arrangeturers in the country of railway materials should have no just ground of complaint against the Government, as this respect to the objection raised here, as to the roadway, rolling stock, and property of the Company along the line being exempted from taxation, it did not engage my attention as an insignificant objection, inasmuch as if the railway were constructed as a public road, the roadway and its equipment would be exempted. It has been the custom throughout these Provinces to encourage the construction of railways, by exempting them from taxation in some cases, and by bonuses in other cases. It did not, therefore, strike me that that was a matter worth speaking of. But as to exemption of the lands from taxation for twenty years, it did strike most people, I confess, as a pretty serious objection. But it was explained to them that this exemption of lands from taxation was only operative in the case of municipalities being organized along the line of railway by the settlers, and that the time when this question would arise would be somewhat remote, over the greater portion of the line. The question does not arise in Ontario or Manitoba; because, I apprehend, it is well understood that the Government of the Dominion does not assume to contract with this Company to exempt their property in the Provinces of Ontario or Mani-

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Or British Columbia.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. Or British Columbia; so that the exemption of both road-bed and lands could only come into operation when we pass the western boundary of Manitoba up to the eastern boundary of British Columbia. It did, therefore, seem to the gentlemen with whom that subject was discussed, that that was not a very serious matter, or one which would justify me as their representative in opposing the scheme. The last question that was discussed at that time-because I went there honestly and sincerely to ascertain the real views of the people, and endeavored to raise every material point for their consideration, and to elicit their opinion upon it—was the question of monopoly: first, in regard to the prohibition against other railways crossing their line, or the international boundary, making in fact a neutral territory within fifteen miles of the boundary; and, second, with respect to the power of the Company to impose such rates and tolls as they pleased, subject, of course, in the first instance, to the approval of the Government as in the case of other railways; and subject, in the next place, to that condition which, on the face of it reading the contract in its ordinary, literal, grammatical sense—seems to require that there should be an earning of profit over 10 per cent. upon all the capital expended in the construction of the work, which, in my judgment necessarily, and as a matter of law, according to the decisions of the American courts, includes all the land, money and property which the work represents, and which may then belong to the corporation. That, I think, is the construction which the courts of law will put upon this contract. Of course we are supreme; our law must prevail if we choose to make it, for they are subject to us, and we may choose to overlook the terms of this contract if we will. But most hon, members of this House, and most honest people out of it, will say that we should be guided by a sense of justice, that we should respect our contract, and see that justice be done in any change that may become necessary. But, reading that clause, it seemed to me and the gentlemen present on the occasion I refer to-some of whom were legal gentlementhat it meant that there should be a profit earned by the Company, on the whole expenditure made by the Government on the Thunder Bay section, on the Yale-Kamloops section, and on the Pembina section, as well as on the ment would be made which would meet objections $25,000,000 and the lands to be given to the Company for with respect to that; that, in other words, those manufacthe construction of the railway-a total sum which would certainly be found in the neighborhood of $80,000,000. If that is the construction of the contract, if that is the matter was entirely in the hands of the Government. With position in which the country will be placed, if the people will not be able to revise, through the action of the Government, the tolls, the charges, the rates which may be imposed by this Company, we know what will be the result. We or the attention of those present very much; it was regarded know how railway boards act in matters of this kind. We have had, in questions that have arisen in England, as well as in the Uvited States, a frank exposition by railway managers of the principle upon which they impose rates and charges. They hold that their shareholders are their constituents, that they are trustees for the shareholders, that they have nothing to do with the public except to get profits out of them, and that it is their duty to impose as high rates on traffic as, under the circumstances of each particular case, the traffic will bear. I presume this Company, or any company, will act on that principle. If they have the right so far as the law, should this Bill become law, is concerned, to levy ten per cent. profit upon the amount of capital contributed by the Government as well as their own capital, none of us who are alive to-day or our children will see the time when that interference of the Government for the reduction of tolls can be accomplished. It has been whispered about that this is not the construction to be placed on the clause. I believe the First Minister the other night said something to this effect, but I did not catch his sentence, and in looking over the Hansard report I did not observe any distinct statement on his part that that particular construction which I have attempted to describe was, or was not the true one. However, I suppose before the Bill has passed through its various stages, the construction to be placed on that particular section will be elicited. It seems to me the Company ought to be willing to trust to the equity, honesty and judgment of Parliament in the future management of the road. They are receiving great aid and great privileges on the face of this contract, and it does seem to me that in developing that new country, in which they will have so large an interest by reason of the quantity of land allotted to them, they ought to act generously and in concert with the Government in dealing with a question of this kind. I have said before, though not in this House, that if any attempt be made by any company whatever in that North-West country, to impose extortionate rates on the people who go there, neither the Government of Canada nor any Local Government will be able to enforce obedience to that state of things. We cannot, in this British American Confederation, govern any Province against the will or determination of a large majority of its inhabitants. Our only influence, our only power of control is in the confidence which the people may repose in our justice and honesty of We can govern, in other words, only by moral influence. We have no physical power adequate to the suppression of any large movement among the people in any Province, more especially in the North-West. We must hold these people by reason of the feeling that we are honestly and fairly with them, and that it is their advantage to remain part and parcel of the Confederation. If we put in the hands of this company the power to oppress them, and they exercise that power, a feeling of resentment will spring up in that country which no force we can use will subdue. Therefore I say that no great injury can result from this clause, because it is impossible for the Company to put in force. Those who insist on it, in the hope it will be profitable to them, as well as those who represent the people here, ought to see that there must be a revision of these terms. The people must feel that they are not at the mercy of a soulless corporation but are under the protection and control and have the assistance of the Government. That provision, in my mind, is a most important one. It includes or excludes many of the objections that have been pointed out by hon. gentlemen opposite. The Government is now, as Governments in the future will be, subject to parliamentary control in this matter. It is true we have sometimes seen votes that did not indicate a very great amount of independent action on the part of supporters of the Government. I sat occasionally, by permission, on the floor of this House, during the regime of the Liberal party. The hon member for Lambton, who was for many years a personal and politi- per cent, on the $80,000,000 over and above the capi-cal friend of mine, was at the head of affairs, and the hon. gentleman who now leads the Opposition—and leads it with such distinguished ability, leads it so far as parliamentary knowledge, legal skill, and oratorical power can aid him, perhaps with more distinction, with more success than any leader of that party in my time—was in his Administration. I remember when the hor gentleman first took the political stump. I, though not pretending to his ability, didnot regard him as a very formidable antagonist before the people, but I would so regard him now because I see he has made progress in all those arts which enable a public man to conciliate the prejudices and secure the confidence of the mul-When in the House on that occasion, I observed the tyranny of the Government. The power of the Executive to impress its views upon and control the action of members of Parliament was more pronounced, and exercised a greater influence than at any time since 1853 when I first entered Parliament. There was a feeling among the Opposition that there was a power in the Government which was inexorable. I saw it in all the actions of Parliament and was amazed; as an old Liberal, I was offended; I said to myself: "Do these men represent the sentiments, the broad liberal views of government, which in my earlier days I learnt from the lips of Robert Baldwin, and other distinguished men of the time, who fought and struggled with the right hon, gentleman—at all events with his political party—to secure for the people the right to have their well understood wishes expressed in Parliament; is it possible that these men, the pupils of that political school, have so misunderstood its lessons that they have resorted to the means familiar to despotism in the conduct of the country's affairs?" Perhaps I was mistaken, perhaps some little irritation of feeling, personally—for I seemed to be a special object of hostility-influenced my judgment. I may have been mistaken; but they learnt a lesson. They found that the arbitrary system of government, that that dictatorial system that prevailed during the regime of Mr. Mackenzie —that personal government—which he practically exercised over this whole country and his colleagues, was unpalatable to the people. I found men who in their Provinces had held some position of prominence previously, unwilling to express an opinion upon a moot question that might occupy the attention of the Government, till they had consulted their chief-not even in the privacy of their bed rooms or their offices. But that has passed away so far as the Liberal party is concerned; different ideas prevail to-day; and I am glad to notice, because I am observant in regard to such matters, that in this House and among the members of the Opposition there is a different feeling prevalent. I think that the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition now, must consult his friends and ascertain their feelings before he undertakes to act. I think that lesson at all events has been learnt. I must say with regard to the hon, gentlemen who lead House and govern this country, whatever difference may have existed between myself and them—and differences have existed, and exist to-day-I have always found them amenable to reason; they will argue—they can be approached. You can speak your views to them, and sometimes I have thought they listened to the views expressed by their political friends, not merely in matters of patronage or administration, but in matters of legislation and government. This little excursion into the history of the past, with reference to the two political parties, may help to explain my position. When I learned from hon. gentlemen closely connected with the Government, that there is to be no such construction as I have described, with reference to the contract—that is to say, that the Company when organized and operating the road, will not be able to hold that they have a right to impose such tolls as they please until we can show they have earned the ten tal they may have contributed, and over and above their stock-I was disposed to regard with less disfavor the contract as it stands, than when I visited my constituents at Halton. I told them that I had a strong belief that with respect to these two matters, the question of taxation and of Government control over this railway, changes would be made; or, at all events, explanations that would remove existing doubts. I have no authority to announce it here-because I do not know how it is to be done—but all I can say is, that unless that be done, not only my vote but, perhaps, the votes of some other members, might be recorded against the scheme. That might not amount to much, as the Government possesses a large majority-too large a majority, I think-for we would be able to discuss some of the questions that come before us with better prospects of success to the minority, if the majority were not so large-

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I may inform the hon gentleman that the construction he fears is not the construction the Government puts upon the contract; it is not the construction the Syndicate puts upon it; and to prevent the possibility of any doubt on the question there will be a clause inserted in the Consolidated Railway Act, which is to be introduced by the Minister of Railways, defining and limiting, in the sense the hon gentleman would desire, the extent to which the 10 per cent: profit goes,

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I am delighted to hear that statement by the leader of the Government. It removes one of the most serious objections in the minds of some hon. members on this side of the House, as well as in the minds of intelligent thinking people outside, with respect to this contract. Now, what has happened since the submission of the Government scheme to Parliament. Some gentlemen in Toronto, Hamilton, London, and other parts of the Dominion, have been induced to tender for this contract with certain modifications, at a certain lesser amount in money and in land; they claim that it is in the public interest, and my hon friend—I will call him so politically, although I am sorry we are not in the habit of communicating with one another; I do not think the fault is mine -my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, and many members on that side urge that this Government should withdraw from the arrangement which they have conditionally entered into with the first Syndicate, because it would save to the country $3,000,000 and 3,000,000 acres of land worth a dollar an acre. It might seem to the country that it is desirable to save $6,000,000 by placing this contact in the hands of a new company equally able with the other to carry out the contract.

That does impress me as a very serious question for members of Parliament to consider. It is a substantial sum, an amount which, I believe, will impress most of the voters to whom we will have to appeal, after a couple of Sessions, with a notion that it would have been well to have saved it. I should like to see my way to an honorable course, provided the Government can take such a courseby which the conditions could be improved in this respect. But I think it would be unfair for a member of Parliament, and especially any one on the Ministerial side, to ask the Government as the organ or committee of Parliament, to take a course with respect to a transaction of this kind, that he should not himself be willing to take if he were a member of that Government. We must put ourselves in their place. We must not ask Ministers to do an act which our own minds would revolt against if we were clothed with the responsibilities of office. Can they retreat from the position they occupy? I do not say anything about the circumstances which preceded this contract. That has been fully reviewed on both sides. It has been contended with great skill by the leader 1874, when he was introducing the resolutions upon which of the Opposition, that under the Act of 1874, the Govern- to found his Bill of that year. He referred to the circum. Mr. Magdougall.

ment had no authority to do what they have done; that the law did not authorize them to enter into a contract of this character, that therefore they are not acting within the terms of that Act. I am much of that opinion. I think the arguments of the leader of the Opposition were clear and conclusive on that point, but as I understand it the Government do not assume, they do not come here claiming that this contract is made pursuant to, or under the authority of the Act of 1874.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. The Minister of Railways said so. Mr. MACDOUGALL. I do not so understand it, and the very fact that the contract is before us to-day; that we have to pass an Act of incorporation, ab initio, proves, I think, that this contract is not within the Act of 1874 though the purpose which it is intended to serve may be the purpose indicated in that Act. It is an action of the Government outside of the Act of 1874, but within the spirit of it, within the motive and the intention of that Act. This is a proposition to hand over the construction of the remainder of the Canadian Pacific Railway to a Company, and that was an alternative contained in the Act of 1874. I think, however, that when the Government of that day, the Government of the hon, member for Lambton, adopted the other alternative, it necessarily excluded this. You have exhausted the power which is given in that Act, by adopting one of these alternatives; therefore, I do not agree with those hon, gentlemen on this side of the House, who say that Parliament and the country have expressed their desire to make this railway by or through a private company, for Mr. Mackenzie, in his Act of 1874, provided for the construction of the work by or through the Government. He began the construction of the railway as a Government work, he contracted with British Columbia-at least that was the aspect of the question at the time the Carnarvon contract was entered into, to build it as a Government railway, and the work was proceeding when the general election took place, upon that basis. After this Government came into power, they advertised for contracts, they let some contracts, and the work is in course of execution to-day, under the authority of that Act. I was elected knowing that the Pacific Railway would continue as a Government work, under the right hon leader of the Government, it he came into power. It proceeded for a certain time in that way, and therefore, I think that in the discussions which have taken place as to whether this contract was strictly within the Act of 1874, or a departure from that Act is beside the question, because we have here the fact that the Government has taken the responsibility of proposing to this Parliament that they shall cease its construction as a Government work, except in certain portions, and shall hand over 2,000 miles of the Pacific Railway to be constructed by a company. Now, 2,000 miles of railway, 650 miles of it being in the rear of, or to the north of Lake Superior, and 450 miles more in the Rocky Mountain region, is a pretty large work to undertake. Valuing the lands at $1 an acre, the amount we are asked to pay for these 2,000 miles of railway is $50,000,000. It is true that an apparently disproportionate amount has been allotted to the middle or easy section, but I look at the proposition, and I think Parliament should look at it as an entire contract; and although the arrangement I have mentioned, may have been made in order to enable the Company to improve their finances, and although a larger amount of public money has been thereby contributed to their capital account at the outset, still the question for us is whether upon the whole contract the Company is being overpaid. I will read you upon this point two or three extracts from the able speech delivered by the hon, member for Lambton in stances under which the Intercolonial Railway has been built, and proceeded:

"The Intercolonial Railway will cost about $45,000 per mile, traversing on the whole a very favorable country, and possessing the most ample means of access at various points on its course, and with the additional advantage of having procured the iron structures and the rails at a time advantage of having procured the iron structures and the rails at a time when there was a very great depression in the prices of iron."

"The Northern Pacific has cost, so far as it has been carried—that is to Red River—$47,000 or 48.000 per mile in round numbers. Well. Sir, that road traverses, almost wholly, a prairie region, easily accessible, and where materials were easily found, and is altogether quite as favorable as the most favorable spot of any part of our territories, with this advantage that it was much nearer to the producers of supplies than any portion of our lines except that on the immediate frontier of the takes."

"But, judging from the cost of our own railways we have no reason to suppose that it will be possible to construct this line from end to end at a less price than $40,000 per mile. and it may exceed that by several thousands of dollars. Parts of it will of course exceed that very much, though in the whole of the sections east of the Rocky Mountains something in the neighborhood of that figure will cover the outlay."

Now, you will observe that we have 2,000 miles of railway to construct, of which about 1,100 miles may be said to be quite as difficult as large portions of the Intercolonial, and according to Mr. Mackenzie's calculations, the cost would be $40,000 per mile. Well, Sir, 1,000 miles of that difficult country, if you give $40,000 per mile, comes to $40,000,000. The other 1,000 miles, is a section including a large portion in the neighborhood of the Rocky Mountains, beyond the Pembina River, and, according to Mr. Smith and other engineers, is not by any means a facile country, and being removed so far from supplies there are many difficulties, the base of such as Mr. Mackenzie indicated, to interfere with the success of the contractors in that region. If you put it at $10,000 a mile there will not be any profit to be made by a Company who construct the road for that sum, so that counting land at $1 an acre over and above expenses of management, and over and above the cost of emigration which this Company must support, if they are to receive any valuable result from the construction of the road, there will not be much margin for profit left. The matter of cost in promoting emigration is a point I have not heard much discussed hitherto in connection with this question. I have had an opportunity to know something of the manner in which the Northern Pacific Railway managed its emigration business. When I was in London in 1873 I visited frequently the offices of the Northern Pacific Railway. There was a regular propaganda established there. There were maps of every description, there were pamphlets and books prepared with elegant illustrations describing the country-most expensive books circulated by thousands. The gentleman who had charge of that establishment was an old newspaper man, an intimate friend of mine, Mr. George Sheppard, a very able man, who I believe is in their service again, and who was receiving $10,000 a year as a salary for superintending those offices and managing the subordinates under him. They had agencies on the continent, they distributed their literature everywhere over England, Ireland and Scotland, and they made arrangements with the steamers for bringing out emigrants intending to settle on their lands. I have no doubt that all this. machinery cost them more than $1 per acre for all the land which they sold to immigrants. Now, Sir, if this Company undertake to settle their alternate sections of land so as to produce a traffic for their railway when it is built, and they will have little traffic for it unless they do so, it will cost them hundreds of thousands of dollars to secure the immigration they will need. Therefore, it will not be all profit. The calculations that have been made, the speeches that have been recorded in Hansard and in the newspapers, all omit, overlook, ignore that important element in ascertaining the value of the land which this Company is to receive. I say, then, assuming that this Company will not upon the same principle and be guided by the same motives of profit by which some of its members are already suided in Minnesota, that they will endeavor to secure settlers in order to produce something for the railroad to carry. If the Company adopt that principle, I think $1 an acre, above all these charges, is quite as large a sum as this House ought to place upon it in this discussion. Therefore, supposing that 1,000 miles, or one half the distance, is a difficult country which will cost, according to Mr. Mackenzie's estimate, $40,000 a mile, and that the rost will cost $10,000 a mile, they will require to get $1 per acre for every acre of land they own, before they will realize enough to meet the charges and expenses they have incurred. I do not think it ought to be the policy of this country to hand over the construction of this road to a private company, if we regard such a proposal as an extravagant one. It seems to me that subsidy is only adequate on the face of it. But, as I said a little while ago, certain gentlemen holding a very respectable position in the community, have tendered at a lower figure. My old colleague and friend, Sir William Howland, is at the head of them, and he is as shrewd a man, as careful a man in any matter which involves expenditure of money, as any one with whom I have made acquaintance in my political l fe, and I therefore believe that he must have calculated very closely in this matter if the proposal was a serious one. I know that Sir William Howland, a Privy Councillor, an ex-member of the Government, is as sensitive concerning the honor of a Privy Councillor, and the honor of a Government of which he is a member, in their dealings with other persons, as any man I have known. Therefore, I say that if he believed the Government could and would, with their majority of eighty in this House, abandon the contract which they had deliberately entered into with this Syndicate, for the difference between these propositions and hand the contract over to him, if he believed that, I think he must have expected to make a very small profit in the share he takes in the Syndicate. I know these are not his ways in dealing with questions of this kind. He wants a larger margin generally in operations in which he is engaged. But if we regard it as a movement for the purpose of bringing concussion upon the Government, if it is intended to strengthen the hands of hon, gentlemen opposite as a political minority in the country, as I said before too small a minority for the good government of the country-I wish it was somewhat larger—we can understand the lower tender. I think if the policy of the Government is no worse in other matters than in this, they will find votes enough to defend their policy. But, Sir, the question comes to this: ought we, as supporting this Government, to vote for the new Syndicate? I have always qualified my support. I need not repeat that in this House, I am sure the members of the Government will do me the justice to say that in the first place I have not asked anything from them for myself, and that in the second place I express my views to them on public matters as freely as if I was a colleague of theirs, and they will not, I think, question my sincerity if I vote against them, should the interests of the public, in my view, require it. At the same time I am standing here responsible for my action to my own conscience and to my country, and I will not join in a cry or a movement which seems to be made with a desire to embarrass the Government as a Government, and to put it in a position of doubt and suspicion with respect to its supporters in the country upon a great public measure of this kind. But a Government requires to be upheld. Powerful as this Government is in its support in this House, in two years hence, if this measure shall be disapproved by a majority of the people, it will disappear like snow before the sun—it will disapper as another strong Government in our recollection disappeared at the polls. Therefore I say that though its support may be powerful here, yet it is the duty of those who support it and who desire that it shall continue and work out the policy for which it was elected, to strengthen the hands of even this strong Government and not join in those movements or efforts made by persons who have a political object in view. Their political object may be combined with a public object; that is the business of an Opposition; it is the duty of an Opposition to seize upon those measures in which the Government have not come up to the mark, as they say, and to expose them, to point out to the country that they have not done as well as they ought to have done, that they have not been so economical as they ought, that they have not made a choice of public servants from the class that they ought, and so on. On all these points it is legitimate, proper and u eful to the country that the Opposition should attack and compel defence. But, Sir, when we are dealing with a question of the magnitude of this one, which is unparalleled, except by the great scheme of Confederation itself—affecting important interests far reaching in its influence over that great country which is to be, in my opinion, the chief seat of empire upon this North American continent-I say, that in dealing with such a question, I appeal to this House as I appealed to my constituents, for the sake of their country, to put aside their party feelings for the moment, and deal with this matter upon its merits—not to mistake partizanship for patriotism, or positivity for truth, but to treat this momentous question honestly, and if possible ascertain what course we, as representatives, ought to pursue. In that spirit, and with a desire to support the Government in carrying out their policy, I am disposed to overlook small points, and to disregard words unless they are significant words, in this contract; and I think one may be justified in taking this ground, because when the Government of a country have adopted a policy which no party objects to, which hon gentlemen opposite do not object to-of constructing this railway by means of a private company—when the Government have entered into a contract with capitalists at home and abroad, when they felt justified in leaving their colleagues behind them and visited Europe and made explanations to, and placed facts and figures before the powerful men on the Bourses of Eurepe, as I presume they had to do, to secure their co-operation—I say, when they did that, dealing with a country, the future of which we are now settling—a country which has a cultivatable area of 150,000,000 acres of land, at least -a matter of two or three millions, more or less, in the construction of a railway 2,000 miles long, is a very small matter. Suppose that, under the pressure of this political exigency, and out of sympathy with Ministers, the first Syndicate should come down, as they might easily do, and say: "You have entered into a written contract with us; we have made certain expenditures on the assumption that a Government, with such a support in Parliament as yours, would implement the agreement; but if it is going to embarrass you, we will come down in the price." What would be the result? They would take the difference out of the railway. They would make such a road as they could make a profit upon at a lower sum. I do not think, Sir, that in so gigantic an undertaking as this, for this small consideration, small as compared with the large amount involved, it is worth while to force Ministers into the repudiation of the solemn agreement which they made in the light of all the information available to them at the time with parties competent to undertake this contract—that has not been denied. If the new Syndicate embraces gentlemen of large means and large experiencethere are some, it is stated, who have not very large means. No doubt they are quite capable of undertaking a large enterprise of this kind with the backing of capitalists who have confidence in their undertaking and can influence the markets of the world. None of them have the means of building the Lake Superior section or the section from Jasper House to Kamloops on their own credit. All the millions say "no" to the resolution, nothing more. I see no purpose, Mr. MACDOUGALL, these men together could produce would not begin to be sufficient for a work of that kind, if they were not able to go into the markets of the world and show that they have an undertaking that will yield them a reasonable amount of profit. Therefore I think the fact of the second offer should not weigh with us very much. Is this a practical scheme with a large amount of money and land to be given, which will commend itself of the confidence of capitalists—of men who lend their money expecting to get it back after a while-of men who expect to get interest upon it during the time the work is going on? I used to say, in discussing public questions at our pic-nics before the last general elections: "You Conservatives need not listen to me; I am not addressing myself to you, I know you will support your chief at any rate; I wish to address myself to those who are not so well affected towards the political leader with whom I am at this moment acting, and to endeavor to persuade them that in supporting that hon. gentleman and his friends they will have a National Policy which will restore their prosperity and give health and progress to the industries of the country; and now that I have alluded to that point, I believe the fact corresponds with the prediction. Those persons like myself, who were not the political supporters, but rather the political allies of that hon. gentleman, persons looking with a friendly eye upon gentlemen who had vindicated their right to be considered statesmen by a long course of useful public life, and by adopting some good reforms which they had in their early days resisted, considered them deserving of credit, because they were like English statesmen of whom it is said they abandoned the prejudices of their youth and adopted the views which were found at last to prevail. I believe there are a good many people in this country who believe in the maxim of Lord Beaconsfield, that a statesman must pay attention to the spirit of the age; and I believe that class of politicans are those who are likely to succeed in this country. Returning to this new proposition, I admit it is embarrassing. It is a weapon which will no doubt be effective in the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite and their friends outside. At the same time if this House confirm that contract, if they pass the Bill which gives authority to the Company to proceed under it, if the Company push on the work rapidly, if they organize machinery at home and abroad to bring out emigrants and relieve the Government pro tanto, I believe, when another election takes place—provided hon gentlemen do not make greater mistakes in other matters, and provided hon, gentlemen opposite do not induce the people to forget their mistakes—those who have supported this arrangement will stand a very fair chance of again finding their places, if they wish to get them, on the floor of this House. I feel, after the way in which the question has been considered from every possible point of view, from every possible point of legal scrutiny, after the manner in which its objectionable features have been magnified and presented in their most repulsive form by the skill and ingenuity of hon, gentlemen opposite, if all the hon. gentleman can do is to move an amendment which affirms nothing, which is a mere recital of what I suppose by courtesy we may say are facts, so far as the analysis of the Act of 1874 and the analysis of the contract, are concerned, he will accomplish nothing. I think it is a remarkably able paper. It will make a capital manifesto, far superior to the manifesto which appeared modestly in the newspapers a few weeks ago; but at the same time, like many things which I have observed in the course of my political experience that emanated from that hon, gentleman, it ends it nothing. It affirms nothing; it is a negative. I think if your attention, Mr. Speaker, had been called to it at an earlier stage, precedent might have been found for rejecting the amendment altogether, because it is merely a negative of the resolution. Looking at the last clause, it seems to me to offer nothing to the House. If you say "yea" to that clause, you merely except a political one, in having such statements entered in the Journals of this House. I think that any person who was patriotic in his intentions and who desired to impress on the country and upon the House, the desirability of adopting the second proposition, would not have undertaken to embarrass the Government, to place the Government and its supporters in so many false positions as they are placed in apparently by the long recital and by the figures and calculations which amount simply to a declaration that it is not expedient to legalize the contract. That was all it was necessary to say. The amendment was like a famous one proposed on the occasion of the English Reform Bill, by an hon, member who wished to record all his objections to that revolutionary Bill, as he considered it, and it was ruled that he had the right to place those reasons in the form of a resolution. That was the precedent on which the hon. gentleman was enabled to set forth in his amendment, all the objections to the present contract, by showing how it differed from the Act of 1874, and the offer made by his political friends. I believe the question will be-I see evidence of it on this, and I think on the other side of the House—is not this amendment at the bottom, in its inspiration and in its motives and throughout, a political movement; and in that sense it is not surprising that supporters of the Government in this House should resent, resist and oppose it. For my part I would be very glad to save three million dollars and three million of acres of land, but I do not see how it can be done. If the Government were forced to abandon the contract with the Syndicate, believing it to be the best that could be made, they, as honorable men and as men with a fine sense of propriety in the positions they hold, would be compelled to abandon their places. You force them, you drive them to give up the position they hold, and transfer to any one who may succeed them the carrying out of this work. It would not be expected if hon gentlemen opposite were in power. When they were in power, does any one suppose an Opposition amendment, inspired as this has been, containing such propositions as this contains, so obviously aimed at the destruction of the Government as a Government, so obviously prepared for the purpose of elevating the Opposition in the estimation of the country, would have been accepteddoes any one suppose they would have hesitated to vote it down. How many cases can be cited if we look at the Journals, where questions not involving, it is true, such large interests, except the Act of 1874, were voted down without the least hesitation; and every political party under our system of Government will do the same. I have, therefore, with these observations upon the general question, to say that having been elected at the last general election as a supporter of the policy of the hon gentlemen on the Treasury benches, having been elected by a majority of their political . supporters, although I fancy I would not have been here if I had not been supported by a good many voters who are not Conservatives, having found that the policy which we were all pledged to secure at their hands, has, in respect to the Tariff, been carried out, and proved successful, I cannot support the amendment. Taking a large, an unprejudiced view, and not a critical or hostile view, not allowing personal feeling to intervene, I must support the Government. I might perhaps, in consequence of things I see in the newspapers and hear in the lobbies and elsewhere, allow my personal resentment to influence my conduct, yet I have never done so as a public man, and will not do so now. It is impossible for either the triends or opponents of this Government, no matter what they may think, or say, or write in the newspapers, or omit from their newspapers, to drive me from according an honest and fair support to its policy, so long as that policy is in the interests of the country. I decline to support the amendment, which means nothing, which is only an historical narrative of certain facts, and I will support the proposition of the Government to grant $25,000,000 and 25,000,000 acres of land, with proper provisions to carry out what I now understand to be the intention of the Government.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). I do not risc, Mr. Speaker, to address the House at this late period of the debate, with the fond hope that I can for one moment say anything new or present any fact not already stated in some way, and probably much better than I can do so. It would be prosumptuous on my part, and an unwarranted reflection upon the ability, industry and eloquence of the many hon. gentlemen who have addressed the House at such length, as they have addressed it on the question now before the Chair, were I to assume I can add one argument, that I can adduce any statistics to throw new light on the question before the House; but the magnitude of the matter is so great, the importance of the question under consideration is so vital to the interests of the country, that I feel it is only right and proper that every hon. member who desires to do so should have a fair opportunity of stating his views to the House, and in that way of justifying to his constituents the vote he feels necessary to give. I feel, in my particular case, it is the more necessary and proper I should do so. I would not have availed myself of the opportunity, were it not that in the leading organ of hon. gentlemen opposite, it has been stated that I am one of the supporters of the Government who thinks one way but intends to vote another. I am not aware that while I have been in this House I have ever done so; I am not aware that any hon, gentleman can point to any inconsistency in my public conduct, or to contradiction between my expressed opinions and the votes which I have thought it necessary and proper to give. But slander coming from that source, anyone on this side of the House will pay but little attention to it. It will be waste of time now to begin to discuss, nor do I think it is very relevant to the proper discussion of this question, whether hom gentlemen on the other side of the House have been guilty of inconsistency in the utterances they have made during this discussion, when compared with what they said on various occasions, nor is it of very great value to discuss whether this newspaper or that has always said the same thing on the question now before us. What we have to consider is this—and it is the point which the country wants to know-whether this proposal now before the House for consideration is the best thing to be done in respect to the gigantic question we have to decide. That is the real, substantial, vital point for our consideration. The people do not care to hear the recollection of hon. gentlemen as to what has been said or done in the past. What they want is to have the Pacific Railway question fairly discussed from its public and broad standpoint, in respect to the best interesis of the country. I take it that so far as the policy of hon. gentlemen, in regard to the construction of this road, and the subsequent ownership and operation of it by a private company, is concerned, both political parties are committed to that view; and not only both parties, but Parliament is committed to it by legislation, not once, but more than once. The question now is, that being the case, is it better for the interests of the country to hand over the construction of the work and its operation hereafter to a company, or whether it is better for the Government to continue to prosecute the building of the road? I confess on that point I desire to speak with no uncertain sound. I have no doubt in my own mind that it is in the best interests of the country that the Government should cease, provided they can do so on reasonable and favorable terms, any longer to continue the construction of that great work, or after its construction continue to work it. I feel it is incompatible with the due carrying out of the business of the Government, that it should be embarrassed with the duty of building a railroad such as this or working it after it is built. It seems to me it is not within the proper functions of the Government, constituted such as ours, and that there will flow nothing but recriminations from one side of the House to the other, in respect to the construction and management of the work. We have seen that in the past. We have seen each side assailing the other about so much of the work as is already constructed. We have seen each side assail the other as to the management of that great Government railroad which is still carried on by the Government, the Intercolonial Railway. We have seen the proper administration of the road and the proper construction of this Pacific Railway seriously interfered with by the atterances of party conflict; and I think beyond that objection to the Government carrying on this work there is also the practical objection that the Government is incapable, from its constitution, to satisfactorily work the road after it is built. A private company can construct it much more cheaply and satisfactorily as a commercial undertaking, and work it much more profitably and in the public interest after construction, than any Government can. There is thus no reason not to approve of the general policy that this work should be handed over to a company. The question then is whether the arrangement ought to meet with approval, whether the Government have been justified in entering into that preliminary arrangement. The general principle being concurred in, I believe the Government were justified in entering into this contract subject to the approval of Parliament. Two-thirds of the amendment of the leader of the Opposition went to prove that the contract was not in accordance with the terms of the Act of 1874. The Act of 1874 sanctions the general principle that the work should be constructed by a company, and it is quite immaterial whether the details of the proposed contract agrees with the Act or not. As the hon, leader of the Opposition said the other day, this contract has no vitality or existence until Parliament solemnly sanctions it and makes it law. It is unnecessary to discuss whether it is according to a former law or not, because this Parliament must make the law, must declare these provisions are for the benefit of the country and indicate the necessary legislation to carry it out. In viewing past legislation, in view of the declared policy of both political parties, the Government were perfectly justified in entering into and earrying on the negotiations which led to the completion of this contract, so far as it has been completed, subject to the ratification of Parliament. I go further—I say that the Government having been so justified, Parliament is bound in good faith to ratify this contract, unless there is something in it radically wrong and contrary to the best interests of the country. I quite agree with the hon. member for Halton that we should not examine with microscopic accuracy the details of the contract, and say because we would like this or that little detail altered we will condemn it altogether. The Government are bound in good faith towards the gentlemen with whom they have negotiated to use every reasonable exertion to have this contract ratified. If this Parliament should refuse to ratify it, it involves a condemnation of the the whole road. It was well known throughout England, Government. Are we prepared to condemn the Government, to say they should not have entered into this contract, that it is detrimental to the interests of the Dominion, that we should refuse to sanction it, when we know the effect of that will be the defeat of the Government? No other constitutional result can follow. For my part, I am not prepared to accept the responsibility of such a resolution. The hon member for Gloucester, the other day, inferred, as one of the advantages that would flow from a refusal of this contract, that there might be a

if I saw greater objections to the contract than I do, I should feel it my duty as a member of this House and of the Conservative party, as one having the best interest of the country at heart, to vote for the ratification of this contract, because I know that the result of a refusal to ratify it would be a reversal of that fiscal policy which, in my opinion, has been most beneficial to the best interests of this country. Among other disastrous results which would flow from a refusal to ratify this contract would be the injurious effect it would have on our moneyed institutions. A very intelligent and eminent banker told me, within the last week or two, that a refusal to ratify this contract would, in his opinion, result in a fall of at least 20 per cent. in the value of stocks of all the banks of the Dominion. This depreciation would, of course, affect every other joint-stock company and there would be a general upsetting of all that commercial prosperity which at present prevails. The general consequences of a refusal to ratify this contract would be so injurious beyond the special ones arising from the change in our fiscal policy that it would require very grave reasons to induce me to vote against this contract at the present time. We have been told that a strong reason why we should vote against it is that a better offer has been made, and that if the Government and Parliament chose to accept the one that has been made by the first Syndicate, they would be violating their duty to the country.

Mr. MILLS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CAMERON. The hon member for Bothwell says "hear, hear," as if I correctly expressed his views. The first answer I would make to that is that the Government are bound in good faith to these gentlemen with whom they entered into this provisional contract to use their exertions to have it ratified. The Government were not in a position, when this last proposition was made to them, to deal with the gentlemen who made it-they must have known that that was the position of the Government. It is said, however, by members on the Opposition side: "Oh! you dealt with the first Syndicate behind the backs of the country, behind the backs of moneyed men who would have likely entered into such an arrangement." I deny that statementaltogether, notwithstanding the emphatic 'hear, hear," of the member for Gloucester. I say that even before last Session it was well known that proposals of this kind had been made to the Government; that shortly after the close of last Session, and before Ministers went to England, the Premier openly and publicly, in his speech delivered at Bath, annunced that such offers had been received, not only one offer but two, not only from Canadian but from English capitalists, and that speech was published in every newspaper. It was commented upon at great length by the organs of hon. gentlemen opposite, and especially by the Globe. It was well known that Ministers went to England for that very purpose of negotiating with various parties, who wished and intended to make proposals or tenders for the whole construction of the work, for the formation of a company with that object, and the subsequent working of Canada, Europe and the United States, and publicly commented upon by the journals of those countries, and it is idle now to say that the capitalists and railway men of the world were ignorant during the whole time of those negotiations that this business was in contemplation. Members of the Government remained in England some two months before a preliminary contract was made, during which time articles constantly appeared in all the leading newspapers in London and in England, announcing what the business of the Government was. The probabilichange of Government, and that such change would save the business of their success were openly discussed in the us from the hideous enormity of the national policy. The Times and other journals, and almost every English paper very fact that he alluded to is one strong and material contained almost daily references to the subject, including reason, and I have no hesitation in saying that even the probability of a large demand being made upon the money market of the world by the new company to be formed to build and own the Canadian Pacific Railway. It was announced to the whole world that the Canadian Government were open to offers for the construction of this work. and the formation of a company as then proposed. To say that these gentlemen who have come forward with such new-born zeal in the public interest, were ignorant of the affair and did not know they would be dealt with by the Canadian Government, is a statement that carries its own conviction on its face. They knew all about it, both when the Government was negotiating and after its return, and that although a preliminary arrangement was made, it was not consummated, and that there were details about which discussions were going on, as the leader of the Opposition says, for seven weeks before the contract was completed. Did those gentlemen make any sign during that time? Did the Howlands or McMasters or other Canadian capitalists suggest for an instant that the desire to enter into negotiations with the Government would lead to an offer of this kind? No: not until the contract was laid on the Table of this House, and until they could use it as an engine of political opposition to the Government, did they begin to have hopes that if they could make a little better offer they could defeat the Government, even if they could not get the contract, nor were those proposals brought forward. It is all very well and very easy for any one to get a better offer after he has closed with the first offer. If he propose to build a house, or do any particular work, and have made a contract at a certain price, somebody is sure to come forward afterwards and say, I would have done it a great deal cheaper. That is just the position of these gentlemen; they held back when they knew the Government could accept their offer, and then they made an offer which could not be accepted, and which I should properly stigmatize as a bogus offer. I do not mean to say it is bogus in the sense that these gentlemen are not responsible, or cannot raise the money to go on with the work—though whether they could complete it I very much doubt—but I mean by the term bogus, that the offer is made in collusion with hon, gentlemen opposite, and for the purpose of embarrassing and defeating the Government. Is it not a circumstance deserving of consideration that the leader of the Opposition told us when the matter was first mentioned, and when he asked the Minister of Railways if he had the new offer, that he had a copy in his own possession, before the Government ever saw it? Did not its terms appear in the Globe, the day before it was presented to the hon. the Minister of Railways. Are we not then justified in saying that it was concocted in collusion with hon. gentlemen opposite? If we believe that, it will be the duty of every hon. member in the House, supporting the Government, to refuse to entertain it for a moment I think I am justified in saying it is an unworthy party trick, designed to embarrass us, and stultity us if possible before our constituents, and for that reason we are perfeetly justified in saying we shall have nothing to do with it. There is another point to be considered. What, I ask, would be the effect upon the credit and character of Canada in the money markets of the world, if the Government should now entertain this offer? Supposing that the Government after entering on this preliminary contract by the authority of Parliament, but subject to the ratification of Parliament, after this had been known all over the world that we had entered into this contract with some of the leading moneyed men of England and the continent, that Government should say: "Since we have done all this, we have had a little better offer, and one by the acceptance of which we will save a few million of dollars and a few million acres land, and we have therefore to throw overboard the responsibility on the contract before the country and before Parliaments in if this Government or any succeeding Government should after that go to England or to Europe to borrow money, or to enter into any negotiations or arrangements, they would be told by the moneyed men of Europe: We want none of you; we have no confidence in your Government or your public men; we have no faith that you will carry out the arrangements which you may enter into. or that you will not stultify yourselves by getting rid of any responsibility which you may assume." I say that the acceptance of the new proposal would have a most injurious and destructive effect in the money markets of the world upon the credit and the reputation of Canada. It would bring disgrace upon the country if, under the circumstances which now exist, we should entertain what I cannot help calling this bogus offer. It is said that the second offer is very much better than the first. I totally dissent from that proposition. In the first place, if we consider the personnel of the two Syndicates, having no predilections for the members of the first Syndicate, not having any particular reason for favoring them, never having had any business relations with them or any of them, and having nothing but the merest personal acquaintance with them, and knowing by reputation and personally the members of the second Syndicate, I have no hesitation in saying that I have far more confidence in the ability, experience and capacity to carry on the work successfully possessed by the members of the first Syndicate than that possessed by the members of the second Syndicate. However much I may object to the political complexion of the first Syndicate, I believe it contains within itself the elements likely to ensure success for this work. The first thing we have to consider in relation to these two offers is, which of these two companies is the more likely to accomplish successfully the great undertaking we are entering upon. A mere saving of $3,000.000 or 3,000,000 acres of land would be of no importance if it would endanger the success of the whole scheme. What we require is the company that will be in a position to carry out successfully this great work, and compared with that object the saving of that amount as represents the difference between these two offers absolutely amounts to nothing. Members of the first Syndicate have had large experience of work of this kind. They have had large experience in bringing out emigrants, and in the sale and settlement of lands, and they have had larger experience and are certainly better known than the members of the second Syndicate in such negotiations as have necessarily to be taken to ensure the confidence of capitalists so as to raise the money necessary in carrying out such a work. I shall not go into any personal consideration of the wealth or means of the gentlemen who respectively comprise these two companies. This is not the proper place to discuss such a question as that, and it is due to these gentlemen themselves that we should not discuss their personal standing or wealth when they come before this House in a public capacity. I will at once concede that either of these Syndicates has money enough to make the advance necessary before the funds requisite for the completion of the work is required. but I do not think any of them can raise money enough out of their own resources. It is said that this new Syndicate will raise all the money which they will require, in Canada and out of their own resources. I should be sorry to think that they should be required to do so, for I believe it would be disastrous to the best interests of the country. I think that the introduction of foreign capital for the purpose of constructing the railway would be infinitely more beneficial to us, than that our banks and money institutions should be drained of their resources for the purpose of constructing this railway. Further, I do not believe that this second we Syndicate, after what has occurred in reference to this second contract which we solemnly entered into, which we Syndicate, after what has occurred in reference to this second called Parliament to ratify, although we staked our Syndicate, would be able to raise a pound of money if they went to England. But perhaps the most serious objection to the second offer is, that it carries on its face a deliberate intention of constructing only the central or prairie section, and leaving the two ends to look out for themselves. In fact it involves the destruction of the great scheme to which Parliament is committed, which Parliament has been struggling to carry out this eight or nine years—that is, the Pacific Railway constructed throughout on Canadian soil, and stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific of our mighty Dominion. For that reason alone, if for no other, I will feel bound to oppose this second offer. We have been endeavoring to build up a mighty Confederation—a great Dominion—and it has been solemnly and rightly considered by Parliament that a Pacific Railway, built from the Atlantic to the Pacific on Canadian soil, is an essential alike for political, patriotic and commercial purposes. Now, we are asked at this late day, the ninth year after the scheme was first propounded to Parliament, to cast aside the whole of our past, to declare that we do not want the Canadian Pacific Railway on Canadian soil, that we want in fact a route built through the prairies as fast as we can get people to go in there, and that we do not care what becomes of British Columbia, whether the eastern Provinces should be brought into communication with the west by a route going through our own territory; all we want is to build a railway in the North-West and leave the rest of the scheme to look out for itself. That such is their intention I think this new proposal carries the proof on the face of it. From that point of view I have no doubt they can make money in the scheme. No doubt they would like nothing better than to be allowed to go on and build from Winnipeg to the Rocky Mountains and stop then, if by doing that they could get the money and land subsidies they ask for, and the Pembina Branch and the road from Winnipeg to Thunder Bay given them into the bargain. That, I believe, is what this new proposition contemplates and nothing else. It may be said that these conditions apply only in case the Government desire to withdraw from the construction of this, that and the other part. But what will be the effect of the adoption of this new proposal and the rejection of the other? Why, the change of the Government and the putting in of the friends of this new Syndicate-for it happens there is only one Conservative among the whole twenty-one members, Mr. Hendrie, of Hamilton-when these gentlemen who have by this proposal succeeded in putting another Government into power, could go to the new Government and say: "We put you where you are, we put you on the Treasury benches, you are our servants, our slaves, we feel that in gratitude at least you ought to do what we want; now withdraw from the construction of the ends and we will be perfectly satisfied, and everything will be harmonious." Are we not justified in assuming that this will be the policy of the Government after hearing the declaration of hon. gentleman opposite, after hearing the leader of the Opposition avowing his opposition to building the road through British Columbia, avowing that the Lake Superior section from Nipissing to connect with the road near Thunder Bay should be indefinitely postponed, and that instead we should build the Sault Ste. Marie line? When we have heard these utterances officially made on the floor of Parliament, are we not justified in coming to the conclusion that if that hon. gentleman and his friends took office, as would be the result of the adoption of this new proposal, the new Syndicate would have no difficulty in getting those terms granted to them simply for building the prairie section for the cash and land subsides, with the Pembina and Thunder Bay Branch thrown in?

Mr. MILLS. We would have to go to the country and be sustained.

Mr. CAMERON. I am very glad to hear the hon. gentleman say that, because it shows that he has a vivid recol-Mr. CAMERON (Victoria).

lection of the effect of going to the country, and that he has present to his mind, that if they attempted to do anything so monstrous as I have pointed out, the people would rise and would say: "You have conspired with these contractors and we will not sanction your accession to office." I do not mean to say that there are not some details in the original proposal which I would prefer not to see there, but it must be borne in mind that this contract is not a one-sided bargain, not one dictated by the Government, that there were two parties to it, that it was a matter of give and take. We must also bear in mind that it was not for the interest of the country that the Government should try to subject these capitalists to such stringent conditions as would render their project a failure, that if they did not give them fair advantages and every reasonable consideration in the terms of the contract, the probability was that their efforts to raise the necessary money would be a failure. The Government were undoubtedly justified in showing every consideration, consistent with the public interest, to the request of these gentlemen as to the conditions that were sought to be imposed. Objection has been urged in reference to exemption from taxation, but I do not take much stock in it, to use a vulgar expression. I do not think it amounts to much if anything. The exemption from duties, I would have prefered not to see there. Possibly, it may have been considered unavoidable, and I think that when, as I have reason to believe is the case, the manufacturing interests of the country learn that their interests will be looked after, that a counterpoise will be provided, an equivalent will be allowed to them, which will prevent their being injured by this clause, I think the objection to it will be substantially removed. The monopoly of branch lines, about which so much has been said, I do not look upon as a serious objection. I can readily understand it was a condition on which the Syndicate, in common prudence to themselves, would necessarily have insisted. But it is only a limited monopoly, it is only a monopoly in so far as it would prevent competition ruinous to the main line of the through Canadian Pacific Railway, and if that be the object and the result of it I do not think Parliament ought to complain. Unlimited power is given to any company to build railroads in every direction except in the direction covered by the exception, and that I think it was proper for them to ask, it was essential for their safety to have it, so that no evil result is likely to follow from it. A good deal has been said in favor of the advantage to the country from the insertion of an option to the Government of assuming the property and all the assets of the Company at a valuation. I do not think that is important, for this reason: we are deliberately adopting the policy that it is not desirable that the Government should own and carry on this work, and I do not see any occasion therefore for stipulating at the outset that we want to buy back the property and the assets of the Company with all the mortgages for all unpaid purchase money and everything else they happen to possess. Moreover, it seems to me that if the Parliament deliberately chooses at any time to say that it is in the interests of the public to buy this railway, or any other railway, or any other public work, Parliament would have that power; it is within the paramount power of Parliament to assume on such terms as it thinks fit this railway at any time, just as the Parliament in England bought all the telegraph lines. This power is inherent in Parliament of buying this road at any period it may deem fit in the public interest. Of course Parliament would only exercise the power on fair and reasonable terms.

Mr. MILLS. The Parliament in England reserves the power to buy the telegraph lines and also the railroads.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Incorporation Act gives our Government the same power.

Mr. CAMERON. The part of this contract, looked at from a purely Ontario standpoint that seems most deserving consideration, is the traffic arrangements and the rates of tell which the Company will be authorized to charge. When I speak of traffic arrangements and of rates of toil, I mean that it is our duty, as representatives from Ontario, to see that Ontario is not placed in a position of disadvantage, and that our local railroads, the Ontario and Pacific Junction, and any other roads that connect with the Canadian Pacific, should have proper facilities for making connections with, and getting traffic from, or delivered to, the Canadian Pacific Railway as any other railroad; and that Toronto and Hamilton, and Ontario generally, should not be placed at a disadvantage as compared with Montreal and the Lower Provinces. I can readily understand that, if unlimited power were given to the railroad as to fixing rates, they might, by discriminating rates, virtually drive off the trade of the Province of Ontario and concentrate it all in Montreal. The 24th section of the proposed Act was, undoubledly, intended to prevent that. I have some doubt whether that section goes far enough; but the Toronto Board of Trade have had a committee thoroughly considering this question and consulting railway men upon it, and that Board, in concurrence with the Hamilton Board of Trade, have put in writing certain suggestions on that point, which, I have reason to believe, the gentlemen composing the first Syndicate are not unwilling to accept. At any rate, I believe we may reasonably leave that matter in the hands of the Toronto Board of Trade, and trust that the Government will see, and that the good sense and fairness of the Syndicate will suggest, that what was undoubtedly the intention of the 24th section of the Act will be so regulated as to prevent the possibility of any discrimination against Toronto or Hamilton, or the Ontario railroads, in reference to traffic over the Canadian Pacific Railway. For these reasons I have no hesitation in saying that I consider it my duty to vote in favor of the original resolutions and against the amendment of the hon, member for West Durham, notwithstanding the warning of that hon. gentleman, couched in most emphatic terms, that the action of the Government and its supporters in this matter was going to bring ruin upon the country first and the party afterwards. I confess that the hon. gentleman and his friends appear to be competent, from experience, to predict what will bring ruin on the country first and the party afterwards. During five years of misrule they did their best, and very nearly succeeded in accomplishing the ruin of their country, and they found that the result was unquestionably the ruin of their party. I therefore admit his experience, while I deny altogether that the result he predicts in that lugubrious manner is likely to follow the adoption of the resolution now before the House. If I thought for one moment that that was likely to be the result, I should rather see the Government defeated, although, for the reasons I have stated, that would be a public disaster. I have sufficient confidence in the successful result of this arrangement to be convinced that it will produce not the ruin but the rapid development and the increased prosperity of the country at large, and that a grateful people will show that their confidence in the Conservative party has been vastly increased in their wisdom in carrying through the important matter now before the House.

Mr. ANGLIN. Before proceeding to deal with the more important points raised in the speeches of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, I may, perhaps, be permitted to refer to a matter somewhat personal to myself. The hon. member for East York (Mr. Boultbee), some time ago, read in his place a telegram relating to the passing of a resolution in the County Council of Gloncester—the county I represent. He might as well That petition comes from a most respectable source. have told us that that telegram was put into his presented it in good faith, and I am satisfied it is as respectable hand by the hon, the Finance Minister, and he might as well have read the name at the foot of it. It so happened that a few minutes before the hon. gentleman read that telegram, I received one myself from the county relating to the same subject. I was glad the hon. gentleman read the names of the parties who voted for that resolution, because it enables me to tell the House that so far as I can recollect not one of those gentlemen ever voted for me at any election, but that every one of them, so far as I know, opposed me at every election; opposed me when my majority was nearly 1,200, and did their best to prevent my election, and I think if I recognize one of the names, it is the name of a gentleman whe opposed me as a candidate and who received either three or four votes. This telegram impugns the character of the County Council and speaks of their election and of other things which I do not care to dwell upon. They form a Council of the county, legally or illegally, and I have no objection that their opinion should go for what it is worth. But it should be known that several of those gentlemen have been members of that Council for a long time, and that others have rather drifted into the Council than been elected. I have not the slighttest doubt that I shall have their earnest opposition at the next election, as I have had it in previous elections, and that notwithstanding all their opposition I shall have as large a majority at least as I had at the last election. There is another matter of a somewhat personal character to which I desire to refer. I was not in the House last evening when an hon, member from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Muttart) stated that a petition which I had the honor to present was of a somewhat bogus character—that some person had said that there were names upon it of dead men. When an hon. gentleman makes a statement of that kind he should be prepared with some proof.

Mr. PLUMB. He cannot have a coroner's inquest.

Mr. ANGLIN. No. Sir; but when the respectability of a document of that kind is attacked some evidence ought to be furnished in support of the statements made against it. Another statement is that several of the names are in the same handwriting. Not having examined the petition I cannot say whether that is so or not, but I think it is not at all improbable. Anyone who knows anything about the getting up of petitions must be aware that when persons carry petitions around for the purpose of obtaining signatures, those to whom they apply often authorize the applicants to sign their names, and names so attached are properly attached. The great document signed at Runnymede would have been of very little importance indeed if the fact that some of those whose signatures were attached to it were unable to write their names could destroy the value of the document. I heard of this petition only a few moments before I presented it. I received a note from Senator Haythorne and afterwards received the following letter:-

"CHARLOTTETOWN, 13th January, 1881. "Hon. Senator Haythorne:

"Hon. Senator Haythorne:

"PRAR MR. HAYTHORNE,—I have this day forwarded you the petition. There are 4,465 signatures to it. Owing to the snow storms and the short time for getting signatures the petition is not so large as it otherwise would have been. It is probable that there will be more coming in, but I could not wait any longer, although at least one-third of the Island has not yet been heard from. The Association would like, if it is not too late, to have the petition presented in the Commons, and if too late for the Commons in the Senate. Mr. Yeo is still here, so if he does not get up in time it will be necessary to get someone else to present it. The people here will not trust any of the other five members, so if Mr. Yeo is not back we would like to entrust it to either Mr. Anglin or Mr. Cameron, the former preferred because of his being from the Maritime Provinces. I will probably send some supplementary petitions hereafter, but it might be as well not to mention them until they are received. With kind regards, well not to mention them until they are received. With kind regards,

"I remain,
"Yours very sincerely,
"A. B. WARBURTON."

a petition as any ever presented to this House. If hon. gentlemen choose to impugn its character they can have a committee appointed to enquire into the whole matter. Two things have become very evident in this debate. One is that all or very nearly all the hon, members who support the Government have made up their minds to ratify this contract. The right hon, leader of the Government presented the case to the House in the most specious form in which it was possible to clothe it, and yet he failed entirely to prove that the bargain is one which should be ratified. Other hon, gentlemen who followed him repeated his sophistries and fallacies-some of them of the most flinsy character. The hon. member for Halton gave us this evening an exhibition of what might be called political teetering of a most remarkable character. He was now on the one side and again on the other. It was rather remarkable that the objections to which he attached the most importance, which, if one may judge from what he said, would have made it impossible for him to vote against the amendment, were apparently removed so that he could not find any insuperable difficulty in coming to the conclusion that after all he should vote with the Government; but what it was that finally inclined him I cannot discover in his speech. I do not wish to attribute to him improper motives which he seemed to anticipate, would be attributed to him. I am quite prepared to regard him as a man of powerful intellect, who, in endeavoring to decide which side he would take on this question, was entirely at a loss to find any reasonable grounds for voting against this amendment, but resolved to vote against it because he found that under all the circumstances he was bound to vote for the Government. In trying to defend that course he repeated a great many of the sophistries of the First Minister; but knowing the powerful intellect which the hon. member possesses, I would hesitate to suppose that those fallacies were accepted by him as overwhelming arguments. The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Cameron) in his turn, repeated many of the fallacies of the First Minister and pretended to attach great importance to them. But, waxing warm towards the close, he forgot his prudence and declared that his great object was to sustain the Government in order to sustain the National Policy. The relevancy of the National Policy to the subject under discussion is not apparent to me, but those gentlemen find it very convenient to laud the National Policy in connection with this question, because they find that when they proclaim the success of the National Policy they are much more heartily applieded than when they attempt to defend the terms of the contract now on the Table. The member for Victoria (Mr. Cameron) I think must have misunderstood what I said, when he imagined that I anticipated the possible result of the debate and vote on this motion to be the defeat of the Government. I am not aware that I ever expressed that opinion. My opinion all through has been that, for all we know, there is no reason why the Government should resign if this contract be not ratified, except only their declaration that they are determined so to do. It is unfortunate for them, and it will always be unfortunate, that they did not lay all the documents connected with this matter before Parliament. We then should have been able to judge for ourselves why they say they are bound in honor to stand by this contract to any greater extent than reason and common sense would dictate. We might then be able to judge what they did to obtain the best possible terms, and what efforts they made to induce capitalists to undertake this great work. All that is deliberately, wilfully, persistently withheld from us. The only information they condescend to impart to Parliament is that they approached some capitalists, that others approached them, and that of all the terms proposed by any who approached them, or any that they approached, the terms in this contract are the very best. Ministers Motion went to England on this business without any express adjourned. Mr. Anglin.

authority of Parliament. The Minister of Railways and, I think, the Minister of Finance attempted to argue that the Act of 1874 gave them the authority to enter into negotiations and make such a bargain as this. That position is gotiations and make such a bargain as this. That position is utterly untenable. That Act is explicit in its terms. It gave to that Government of the day and the present authority to enter into a contract only within its precise terms and limits; it gave no other authority. I do not say that the Government ought not without the direct authority of Parliament to enter into negotiations even in a case like this. Circumstances might require them to assume such responsibility, and Parliament may subsequently justify their course. I am sorry, and I think all the real friends of the Government must be sorry, that they have made no effort to satisfy Parliament or the country that that was the course they took. They have preferred concealment, secreey, to the broad, open, frank, constitutional manner of dealing with the people and Parliament of Canada. The member for Victoria, carrying the statements on the Ministerial side very much further than any who preceded him, said that, before the close of last Session, members were informed that offers of this kind were made to the Government, and entertained by it. As a member of Parliament who attends to his duties as closely as most others, I must declare that I never heard anything of such offers having been made, nor did, I think, any of my friends around me. But I heard the Government declare that its deliberately adopted policy was to build this road as a public work, and the leader of the Government submitted to the House official statements and elaborate calculations to prove that if the road were built as a Government work, money enough could be obtained from the lands in the North-West, within the ten years fixed for its construction, to pay its whole cost, to leave a large balance still due from those who purchase the lands, and a much larger portion of those lands still in possession of the Government. Though I knew that hon gentlemen opposite changed their views year after year, and that all their boasting had proved vain and futile, and all their assurances had been belied by subsequent events, still I felt quite satisfied that that was really their policy, and that they would pursue it honestly and fairly till, at all events, Parliament assembled again.

DEATH OF MR. KEELER.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I move the adjournment of the House, but, before doing so, I desire to express, on my own part, and on the part of my hon. friends, and, I have no doubt, on the part of every member of the House, the deep sorrow and regret with which we learn the very sudden and unexpected demise of the bon. member for East Northumberland. All those who knew him personally, as I have had the gratification of knowing him for so many years, must have been well acquainted with his high character—his estimable character in every possible relation of life. A man of unblemished honor, whose word was as good as his bond, respected and liked by all his neighbors, and by every one who knew him, and respected also in this House for the straightforward manner he performed his duties. I am quite sure I speak the sentiments of hon, gentlemen on this side of the House, as well of hon, gentlemen opposite—especially of those who have sat in Parliament for some time-I may say I speak the contiments of everybody, in stating that this House feels and will entertain the greatest respect for the memory of the departed, and will deeply regret the loss of so valuable a member

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, 24th January, 1881.

THE CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. CURRIER enquired, Is it the intention of the Government to lay before the House, during the present Session, a report of the Commission appointed to enquire into matters relating to the Civil Service?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Commission has not yet reported. It is now sitting de die in diem, and is sottling its final report, which I expect to obtain very shortly.

Mr. CURRIER enquired, Is it the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill, during the present Session, to amend the Civil Service Act of 1868, or to take any action towards the amelioration of the condition of the Service?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I cannot well answer the question until we have seen the report of the Commission. The Commission was appointed for the purpose of enquiring into the whole subject, and we hope the report will be such as to enable us to base a report upon it.

LIGHTHOUSE FOR PORT STANLEY.

Mr. ARKELL enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to erect the lighthouse at Port Stanley, for which an appropriation of $1,000 was made last Session, and when it is intended that the work shall be proceeded

Mr. POPE (Queen's). It appears the pier at that place is in charge of the Great Western Railway Company. Last year it was in a condition unfit to place a light upon it. If it should be put in proper repair a light would be placed upon it; as the matter now stands it cannot be done.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Charles Tupper for the second reading of the resolutions reported from the Committee of the Whole on the 14th January instant, granting certain moneys and lands for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the motion of Mr. Blake in amendment thereto.

Mr. ANGLIN. Mr. Speaker, I have said that in the many speeches delivered by members of the Government and its supporters in defence of the proposal that this contract be now ratified, no single good reason for such ratification has been assigned. If we took from those speeches the attacks made upon the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) the charge that he, while Premier of the Province of Ontario, was guilty of maladministration, the charge that he has been guilty in this House, and on this very subject, of inconsistency; the charge made against the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright); the personal attack made upon the hon member for Westmoreland (Sir A. J. Smith); the charges made against the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton)entirely unprovoked and unjustifiable as the charges wereif we take away the attacks made upon the members of the new Syndicate, individually and collectively, and if we deduct new Syndicate, individually and collectively, and if we deduct also the attempt made to prove that the terms of this confirst are essentially better than the terms of any confirst that might have been made within the terms of the Act of 1874—I think we would have very little left. If from that little we again deducted the apologies of several hon, gentlemen on the other side of the House, who had not one word to say in favor of any part of the contract, but admitted they were compelled to object to very many of its terms, I think we would find that the residuum would occupy but a very small portion of our Hansard. It will be well, perhaps, briefly to notice the charge of inconsistency; I think it is entirely unfounded in fact. The mere circumstance that the hon member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) entertained at one time one origin with respect to Blake) entertained at one time, one opinion with respect to the value of the lands in the North-West, and several years afterwards formed another opinion. When the circumstances had changed, when the country was to a great extent opened up, when order had been restored, when all fear of Indian troubles had been almost removed, when railway communication had been established, with the present railway system of the United States, and when our railway from Thunder Bay to Selkirk, through our own territory, has been almost completed,—a change of opinion under those circumstances cannot reasonably or properly be held to be inconsistency. We find every day that in the sworn assessments of the value of property, circumstances have so changed as to compel a change of value even though made by the same mon acting on the same principles.

Mr. PLUMB. A change of 300 per cent.

Mr. ANGLIN. I know that in a very few years property even in some of the older cities has grown in value 300 per cent.; but that expression scarcely conveys a fair idea of any change of opinion with respect to the value of the North-West lands. I do not recollect hearing that the hon, member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) on any occasion expressed a positive opinion as to the precise value of those lands. He did, I think, argue on one occasion that the estimate set on them by hon. gentlemen opposite was excessive; and I think, if I have followed the debate correctly, the chief reason why the hon. gentleman is now accused of inconsistency on this point, is the fact that he has chosen to take the official statements of hon, gentlemen opposite as the basis of the calculations he made this year. There is also another and a more serious charge of inconsistency brought against hon, members on this side of the House. It is that their whole policy with respect to this great railway work differs essentially from the policy they accepted and endeavored to enforce on previous occasions. I was sorry to find the right hon, gentleman at the head of the Government, in order to give perhaps the more force and point to this charge, make an ungenerous and cruel attack upon the hon, member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), when that gentleman was lying prostrated on a bed of sickness, because of his zeal and devotion to the best interests of the people of this country. Those who know that hon, gentleman and how he worked while in office to promote the best interests of the Dominion, by the sacrifice of his own comfort and strength, are well aware of the true reasons why, to-day, he is so weak and prostrate as we regret to say he is. The hon. First Minister expressed sympathy for him in that condition, and regret that he was physically disabled from taking his seat, and yet in the very next breath he proceeded to make against him the charge which he knew would wound the feelings of the hon, member most deeply. He charged him, unnecessarily, wantonly, ungenerously, and cruelly with having been driven from his own convictions, with having been whipped into submission by the present leader of the Liberal party. The right hon, gentleman

Now, if there is one charge more than another to which the hon, memler for Lambton is not fairly amenable, if there is one charge more than another which the people, irrespective of party, will refuse to believe, it is the charge that he could be forced by any power on earth to belie his own convictions, or eat his own words, or vote or speak that which he did not in his soul believe to be exact truth. It was not necessary in order to sustain the charge of inconsistency, so far as it could be sustained, that this attack should have been made; and the charge is entirely unfounded. The right hon. gentleman, in the course of his speech, admitted that the hon. member for Lambton did show a sincere desire to carry out the policy of the country as determined by Act of Parliament, and that he did honestly and zealously endeavor to push the construction of the railway towards British Columbia Such an admission I never heard made by those hon. gentlemen when they occupied seats on this side of the House. When the hon. member for Lambton, as First Minister, was pushing forward the work with all the energy and zeal that man could display, they did not acknowledge then that he was acting faithfully and honestly in the discharge of his duty; but he was accused, day after day and night after night, by those hon. gentlemen, then in Opposition, with being those hon, gentlemen, then in Opposition, with being faithless to his own pledges, and with misconceiving the policy of the country. His policy of utilizing the water stretches was laughed at; his whole policy was scouted and denounced, and yet we find that hon, gentlemen opposite, since they have returned to power, have been compelled to adopt, one after another, every point of policy which the hon. member for Lambton elaborated, and which they denounced so strongly while in Opposition. The policy on this side of the House has always been the same. We in Opposition opposed the terms under which British Columbia came into the Union; we did everything in our power to prove that the terms were unreasonable, that it was impossible that Canada could fulfil the obligations; we implored the Government to modify the terms; we begged them to bring them within the limits of reason and common sense; but they were deaf to our entreaties and remonstrances, disregarded our arguments, and insisted that the resolutions must pass as submitted to Parliament. They were passed; and that became the unalterable policy of this Dominion of Canada; and all parties, whether they approved or disapproved it, were bound by law, not merely by the Act of the Canadian Parliament, but by the Imperial Statute, to build the Pacific Railway as far as the means and resources of the country would permit, without so oppressing the people of the older Provinces as to cause them any serious financial embar-rassment. I believe the hon, member for Lambton honestly endeavored to carry out that point. How far he ever came to approve of building this road within the terms specified, I am not prepared to say; but he immediately set his surveyors to work, and as soon as it was possible to let sections from Thunder Bay to Selkirk he let those portions of the work. Indeed, as it proved afterwards, the surveys were even then insufficient, though there was every reason to suppose them sufficient, when those portions of the road were let. He pushed the road forward as rapidly as possible with due regard to the best interests of the country, and continued to do so up to the day he retired from office. When the people of British Columbia complained that his Government did not intend to carry out the original bargain in its literal acceptation, and applied to Lord Carnarvon, and those negotiations commenced, he took the very proper ground, which I think the whole people of the country approved of, that it was impossible that Canada should fulfil that bargain literally and absolutely; and it is said that because he then agreed, so far as he and his Government were concerned—for he had no more authority than the present Government to bind the people of this country to Mr. Anglin.

any mere unauthorized act of theirs—to build that portion of the road between Lake Superior and the Pacific Ocean before 1891: because he assumed to undertake what was reasonable within the means of this country, and made that undertaking in good faith. Members of the Government and their supporters pretend that he increased the weight and burden of the terms of the original bargain. I have heard it alleged again and again by hon. gentlemen on the Ministerial side, that those Carnarvon terms were onerous—that in agreeing to them the member for Lambton undertook more than Canada had been previously bound to do. But it is simply absurd to allege that to undertake to do within a longer period a portion of the work in question, was more onerous than the original pledge, to do the whole work within a shorter time. Hon. gentlemen opposite bound this country. so far as they could by words, Act of Parliament and Impenial Proclamation, to commence that whole road within two years and finish it within ten. The Carnarvon terms bound the Government, as far as they could, to finish, not the whole of the road, but that portion from Lake Superior to the Pacific, within a very much longer period. It is sometimes said that the obligation to expend $2,000,000 per annum in British Columbia was a condition far more onerous than any implied in the original terms. But even that is a very great mistake. My own impression is that the hon, member for Lambton, in agreeing to that condition, committed a serious error. do not believe he should have bound even himself, though he considered he was acting within the original terms of the bargain, to any such expenditure; but it was not adding to the burden of the original terms even to agree to spend $2,000,000 per annum within British Columbia, for a smaller expenditure in that vast mountainous region could not possibly have brought the works to completion within a shorter time than the time specified. We thought it well to adhere as closely as possible to that declaration—for it was little more, after all, than that made by this Parliament immediately after the bargain with British Columbia was concluded, that the road should be so built as not to add materially to the weight of our taxation. That was the guiding principle, I think, that controlled the the whole action of the late Government; and when year after year we saw-notwithstanding all the efforts made by the Government of that day to economize notwithstanding that they imposed an increased rate of taxation. which, if the business of the country had not diminished, must have increased the revenue by $3,000,000—yet revenues actually decreasing, because of the world-wide depression prevailing; when we saw a deficit, notwithstanding those efforts and sacrifices—not so large as the hon. Minister of Railways loves to speak of, but a real deficit year after year; when we perceived the expectations of the whole world were disappointed with regard to the return of prosperity-it surely became the duty of the Government, who had the welfare of this country sincerely at heart, to consider whether, under the circumstances then existing, it was their duty to proceed more rapidly with that work. The right hon. gentleman said: "Are we to suppose that tenders were invited for the construction of that work in the Rocky Mountains, merely for the purpose of ascertaining what it would cost? Are we to suppose that intending contractors were invited to send their engineers to make borings in various parts, and to incur a vast amount of labor and expense, merely in order that the First Minister might ascertain what the road would cost one day or other?" do not think any Minister would be justified in taking such a course. But from the day those advertisements were published, up to the day the late Government left office, and for many a day after, the depression continued to grow. greater and deeper. The difficulties of the country became greater day by day, the revenue diminished daily, duty of the Government to pause, to incur no great additional expenditure or liabilities until we saw some signs of recuperation in the business of the country. It suits hon. gentlemen opposite to pretend, as they have pretended rather successfully, that the depression was caused by the misgovernment of the country, by the neglect of the late Government to introduce that financial system, such as they themselves never endeavored to introduce during their whole previous occupation of office. However far they succeeded in deluding the people on this point, I think that delusion is pretty well dispelled to-day, and that the country understands thoroughly that the depression was not caused by any existing laws of Canada, or the want of any laws; that it was the result of laws operating over the whole civilized world, and which we could not control in any way. We acted then upon that principle, and we act to-day upon the same principle. We oppose the passage of these resolutions to-day because we do not believe that the circumstances of Canada either require or justify such an expenditure as is now proposed. We believe that there is no necessity for the immediate construction of the portion of the railway lying to the North of Lake Superior - a work which is surrounded by the greatest difficulties, a work which must add enormously to the burdens of the people of this country. We do not believe that it is in the interests of British Columbia itself that the whole of the work through the Rocky Mountains from Jasper House to Port Moody should be now pressed rapidly to completion. We believe it would be more prudent, more wise, to postpone the work on those ends for a time, until we have built the railroad across the prairie, until we have ascertained how far we may calculate upon a great influx of people into the great North West, into that portion of the country said to be so fertile, said to be intrinsically of such enormous value. We believe that if we press forward the railway into the fertile belt, if we build the railway across the prairie as rapidly as the interests of settlement demand, keeping not merely abreast of settlement, but pushing considerably ahead of settlement, and so going on until we have reached the Rocky Mountains, and have placed in that country a large population who will not be burdened by any excessive taxation, or borne down by any exacting monopoly-by doing this we believe we will be doing the best for the whole Dominion, including even British Columbia which has expected, with perhaps not unnatural impatience, to see the terms of the original bargain carried out. But I wish to say that our views have been grossly misrepresented by hon, gentlemen opposite. They say that we are entirely opposed to the construction of an all through line of railway through British territory. They say we would not merely postpone, but postpone indefinitelyput aside for all time—the construction of the railway north of Lake Superior, and that portion across the Rocky Mountains and through British Columbia. Nothing that has been said on this side of the House forms anything like a justification for this assertion. We have fully as deep an interest in the welfare of Canada as those hon. gentlemen; we, I think are desirous of promoting, as fully as they can, the future growth, the future greatness and independence of our country. We all of us share that national sentiment; we are as desirous of seeing these Provinces—now that they are united in one Confederation—welded together by this great railway; but we think it is in the interests of the country of the new Provinces as well as the old—that the work should not be done prematurely, that it should not be done too hastily. We believe that by deferring for the present the construction of the eastern section, and of that through British Columbia, we do not thereby unnecessarily delay the final completion of the whole road; but we believe, rather, that the work would, by that means, be rendered more easy for the people of this country, and would sooner be brought | Finance, who undertook to prove, as he thought, 'beyond and we all thought it had become evident that it was the to completion. It is not true that we do not desire to see an all-rail route through Canada. It is not true that we do not desire to see these Provinces brought together as closely as possible by the easiest and best method of communication, but we believe that the whole work should not be undertaken at once. The right hon, leader of the Government, and many of those who followed him, said that if this railway were not built to the north of Lake Superior the consequence would be that all the trade of the great North-West would be directed into the United States, and carried to the Atlantic seaboard through that country. In that, too, the right hon. gentleman was widely astray. In the first place he does not propose to bind this Syndicate, or those who may succeed them, to build the railway north of Lake Superior in less than ten years, and yet he hands the only railway which now connects the North-West with the outer world-the Pembina Branch—over to the absolute control of a company which is not a Canadian company, which is not a British company, but an American company, owning a great American railway, that is to-day worked on the principle of a great monopoly. The very moment this contract goes into effect, the Syndicate become the masters of the Pembina Branch, and that moment they divert the whole trade of the North Worth divert the whole trade of the North-West, not to Montreal or the Atlantic seaboard, but to Chicago and New York, and this will continue for a period of ten years. It is true they will have the chance of sending a great deal of produce of the North-West over the line of Thunder Bay when that is finished, and finished it may be, perhaps, in two or three years; but they will have no object in doing anything of the kind, for it will pay them much better to divert the traffic over their own line and over the American system of railways. So that instead of this contract being one which will secure the trade of Canada for the Canadians, as hon. gentlemen so loudly assert is their object, it is one which will have the immediate effect of diverting the trade of the North-West through the American system of railways to the Atlantic The charge of inconsistency, however, even seaboard. if it were absolutely well founded, would not afford the slightest justification for the ratification of the contract now upon the Table of the House. Another assertion made by hon. gentlemen is that under this contract the railway will cost a great deal less than any railway would have cost built within the terms of the Act of 1874, or built according to the plans and specifications propared by the late Government. I am rather astonished at hearing that argument revived at this stage of the debate, after we had shown its fallacy over and over againafter we had shown that there was no room for comparison. between the kind of railway which the hon, member for Lambton proposed to build and the kind of railway which the Syndicate will be bound to build under the terms of the contract. It would be just as absurd to compare a handsome commodious modern dwelling, having all the modern improvements, with a barn of the roughest and rudest kind. as to compare the railway which the hon. member for Lambton proposed to build with such a road as the Union Pacific was when first constructed, or, I may add, such as the Union Pacific was in 1873. But, Sir, we find that towards the close of the debate this same fallacy has been revived—revived, I was astonished to hear, by the hon, member for Halton (Mr. Macdongall), who, usually clear-headed and quick-sighted, would, I should suppose, have perceived that between the two kinds of railroads there was a great difference. Yet, in his strange argument, if argument it may be called, he endeavored to satisfy himself and the public that the cost in the one case was greatly to exceed the cost in the other, the road being the same in both instances. But a more extraordinary effort in this line was that of the hon, the Minister of

Act of 1874 would be enormously higher than any expenditure now contemplated. I think he stated it to break down his statement or show where it was with figures when it was so utterly impossible to make out what he was driving at, and I have since looked into the Hansard for the purpose of endeavoring to ascertain howthe hon, gentleman arrived at such an extraordinary result. I find that he took a very short cut to it after all. Although there was a great mass of figures, he arrived at the result by a very summary mode. He assumed that the 52,000,000 acres of land under the Act of 1874—although the Act says expressly that those lands are to be in blocks along the whole line of railway. that they are to be only of a fair average quality, which we must reasonably assume to be of the fair average quality of the whole country through which the road is to run, he coolly calculated that all these lands were to be in the fertile belt. and that if you say that the 25,000,000 acres of land lying close along the line of railway in the fertile belt, which the Syndicate are to get under the terms of this contract, are worth at least $2 an acre, why, then, you must also calculate that the whole 52,000,000 acres to be given under the terms of the former Act are also worth $2 an acre. Now, this is a point where it is scarcely worth while to deal in argument. Any man of common sense who has ever heard anything with regard to the country through which that road runs, who knows that for nearly 1,000 miles from Lake Nipissing to Selkirk the land is scarcely of any value whatever, who knows that through the Rocky Mountains the land is scarcely of any value whatever, must be satisfied that the 25,000,000 acres of land, 11,000,000 of which will lie along the line of railway, and the other 14,000,000 will be selected in the fertile belt, or wherever else the Syndicate may choose to make the selection, are of higher market value than the 52,000,000 acres of land which the late Government proposed to grant, and that the 25,000,000 acres are worth not merely more, acre for acre, but that they are worth a great deal more, as a whole, than the whole quantity to be given under the old Act. The Finance Minister, pretending to regard the land as of the same value, acre for acre in both cases, said that if you choose to say that the land selected in the fertile belt and near the railroad is worth $2 an acre, then the late Government would have been giving $104,000,000 worth of land; and, if it is worth $3 an acre, they would have been giving $156,000,000, and in that way the hon. gentleman coolly piled up an enormous amount as the amount to have been paid by this country, under the terms of the Act of 1874. Not satisfied with that, he coolly assumed, also, that because Mr. Foster was to obtain four per cent. on $7,500 per mile, for twenty five years, for the construction of the Georgian Bay Branch, through a country so exceedingly difficult that for a long time there were serious doubts as to whether a road could be built there at

Mr. ANGLIN. If the hon, gentleman looks into the Blue-books he will find such to be the literal fact.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). What was the opinion of the hon. member for Lambton in relation to that route?

Mr. ANGLIN. He always thought it was an exceedingly difficult route, but he believed it, no doubt, to be practicable. He had the report of a gentleman, who was regarded as a very eminent engineer, who had passed through the country and reported it practicable; it was let, because it was supposed to be practicable, otherwise it would not have been let at all, but it was regarded as an exceedingly difficult section. Mr. Anglin.

all doubt, that the expenditure of the country under the It is assumed that because at the time of that contract it was bargained with Mr. Foster that he should receive some $300 a year per mile in the shape of interest for would be at least $20,000,000 more, and he defied any one 25 years, therefore it was intended, under the Act of 1874, to have given to any contractor who chose to make the fallacious. I confess that I never listened to him dealing proposal, a similar amount in addition to the $10,000 per mile to be paid in cash. That, Sir, is a most unwarrantable assumption. Then the hon. gentleman calculated that the total amount so paid would be, I think he said, equal to $12,400.-000, and he added that to the enormous amount reached by calculating that the whole 52,000,#00 acres were worth as much as the 25,090,000 acres in the fertile belt. That was not all. He added still to that the cost of the Georgian Bay Branch, which he assumed was a portion of the Pacific Railroad under the terms of the Act; and he added also to that the subsidy paid to the Canada Central Railroad. Not satisfied even with that, he coolly assumed that the whole 50,000,00) acres were to be in the fertile belt, and that the Bill introduced by the hon, member for Bothwell, for the purpose of encouraging the construction of branch railr a is through that country, was really a bill intended to encourage the construction of branch railroads through the lands to be given to the contractors under the terms of that Act, and that 10,000 acres of land or $10,000 per mile would be paid on a great many miles of those branch railroads to be constructed for the benefit of the contractors. This amount could be calculated to nearly two millions. He added all that sum to the total amount before arrived at, and so, piling Pelion on Ossa, he piled up the whole amount until he reached a very extravagant sum, and then he declared triumphantly: "Just see what this thing would have cost had the terms of the Act of 1874 been carried out, and see what we propose now to give and the difference between the two, and then observe what we are saving to the country, and give us all the great thanks that are due to us for our extraordinary superiority in judgment and administrative ability." Now, we have to repeat what has already been said with regard to that portion of their argument, if argument it is. In truth, Mr. Speaker, even if they succeeded in proving that the terms of the Actof 1874 are far more disadvantageous to the country than the terms of this contract, they still would not prove that this contract ought to be ratified. We know more of the country to day than we did in 1874. When that Act was passed in 1874 the old Administration had gone out and the new one had come in but a few short months before, and the surveys and explorations that have since been made had not then been made; we knew almost nothing aboutthat country. To-day we really know little more; but we are told that in all the Rocky Mountain district there is not fertile land of greater extent than an ordinary county in the Province of Ontario, or the Province of New Brunswick. I believe that such an Act would not have been proposed or thought of if it was known then, as it is now, what the real character of that part of the country was. We say that the 54,000,000 acres of land, which were about the same in character and quantity as that which Sir Hugh Allan was to receive under the terms of his contract, were not worth—cannot by any reasonable man who has heard or read anything of that country be regarded as worth—as much as the 25,000,000 acres which the Syndicate are to receive. And, Sir, out of the $10,000 a mile, or a total of $27,000,000 which was then to be paid in cash, it was distinctly stipulated should be deducted the cost of any portion of the road constructed or in course of construction by the Government, together with the cost of the surveys, which, as we know, has amounted to $3,000,000. The hon. Finance Minister thought he made a wonderful discovery when he asserted that, by the Act of 1874, the lands to be assigned to the contractors as a subsidy were to be exempt from taxation. He knew nothing more than that two-thirds of the land would be exempt from taxation. He said he was not in the House when that matter was discussed, but he was in the House when the Sir Hugh Allan contract was under consideration. He must remember that one of the strongest objections taken on this side of the House to that contract, was that it placed absolutely at the disposal of Sir Hugh Allan so large a quantity of the lands of this country as 50,000,000 acres, the Government not retaining any control over them, not requiring that they should be settled or attempted to be settled, and binding themselves to sell the lands they held at not less than $2.50 an acre, unless with the permission of the contractors. Remembering that, the hon. gentleman might have known that it was for that reason that such care was taken in the Act of 1874 that the contractors should not have control over lands covering such a vast area of this country. He might have known that the Government, while proposing to set apart those lands for the construction of the railway, took care that the lands should not be held without settlement, but that settlement should be promoted as rapidly as possible, and therefore reserved control of two-thirds of the lands. Under the present bargain the Company can hold the lands, hold them without taxation, hold them for twenty years, or as long as it is their interest to hold them, while the Government are filling up the alternate blocks, and so adding enormously to the value of the lands of the Syndicate. I do not know whether, in point of law, the lands given under the Act of 1874 would have been exempt from taxation, because these lands, although retained by the Government for settlement, nevertheless ceased to be the property of the Government as soon as the terms of the Act were complied with. Without recourse to such a mass of figures as the hon, gentleman used to sustain his case, I think any gentleman can understand, and make anyone else understand, the wide, broad, marked difference between the Act of 1874 and the contract now on the Table in this respect. In another part of his speech, the hon. gentleman chose to argue that the late Government were derelict in their duty because they did not impose additional taxation on the people. He attempted to prove, when we alleged that, owing to the great depression in business, the revenues had fallen off, the outlook had become gloomy, and that it was not politic or proper to proceed very rapidly with the construction of this work, we were taking a ground which we could not hold, because, forsooth, at that time of depression the rate of taxation per head was somewhat smaller than it had been one or two years before. Herefers, with some exultation, to the fact that the late Finance Minister proposed the imposition of increased taxation, that the taxation on general imports was increased from fifteen to seventeen and a half per cent, and that other increases were imposed which would have yielded an additional reverue of $3,000,000, if there had been no falling off in imports. As he put it, the taxation had been increased $3,000,000, and yet, notwithstanding that increase, the revenue fell year by year until the rate per head, allowing for the estimated increase of population, had fallen from $5.31 to $150. That he chose to regard as the mode of determining the rate of taxation within the meaning of the resolution, which declares that the taxation of the people of Canada should not be increased for the purpose of building this railway. He coolly alleged—he, a Finance Minister, he who has been for years in public life—that the rate of taxation within the meaning of that resolution should be determined, not by the rate of duties imposed, but by the amount per capita of revenue collected by means of

of food, and fuel, and clothing, that hon. gentleman tells us that the Finance Minister would not only have been justified in adding to the taxation, but that it was his absolute duty to add to the taxation when the people were poor and impoverished. He boasted that he had now raised the rate to $5.50 per head. How? By taxing the poor man's flour, meal and fuel; by taxing to extent of from 50 to 70 per cent. his flannels; blankets, and coarse clothing. I do not think the poor oppressed people of Canada will join in the hon. gentleman's self-gratulations. The sophistries and fallacies of his leader repeated by the hon gentleman in rather clames. leader, repeated by the hon. gentleman in rather clumsy fashion, received no additional weight from his thunder tones and random rhetoric. The hon, leader of the Government said, and many others who followed him repeated, that the new projosal was concected on the left of the Speaker's Chair, that it is a bogus proposal, a disreputable political trick. When it is asserted that this offer emanated from the Opposition, hon. gentlemen opposite give us more credit then we are entitled to. We would be proud of having induced respectable capitalists such as those to undertake the work at a saving, if permitted to go on with it, of $3,000,000 cash and 3,000,000 acres of the best land in the fertile belt, for the people of Canada. In saying this document was prepared on this side of the House, hon. gentlemen chose to deal in assertions, the value of which they perhaps did not care themselves to enquire into. The hon. member for Frontenac said the whole or a great part of this contract is a plagiarism of the first contract. So it is, and that only proves that the leading men on this side had nothing to do with drawing it up. Had even the rough draft of agreement been left to them, the offer would have been different from what it is, and much more favorable to the people. We had nothing to do with the drawing up of that offer. We saw it, it is true, as hon, gentlemen opposite also did, before it was laid on the Table, because copies of it had previously been distributed. Another objection to the new offer is, that of those who signed it a very large proportion belong to the Liberal party, and no less than seven were Reform candidates defeated at the last general elections. That, if true, and perhaps it is, simply proves that in the Reform party are men of large means and respectability willing to undertake this great work. As the hon, member for West Durham remarked, hon, gentlemen opposite have forgotten that of the Canadian gentlemen who are in the Syndicate, and those who are supposed to belong to it, though their names are not there, the large majority are members of the Reform party, and the most influential of the wlo'e of them is the last Liberal candidate defeated at any election. We are told that the gentlemen who signed the new offer never meant that it should be accepted. That will not be believed. The people who know Sir William Howland and the Messrs. McMaster, and the other gentlemen from Toronto and Hamilton; Mr. Gilmour and Mr. McLaren, of Ottawa; and Mr. Alexander Gibson, who came all the way from New Brunswick with his $500,000 in his pocket to prove his sincerity, will not believe they would lend themselves to a party trick. But it was also said that this is essentially a faulty and a bad offer; and the right hon. Premier proceeded to quibble on some of the words used in that contract. He, or somebody else, made the wonderful discovery that the word "will" in one place had been substituted for the word "shall," and he chose to a sert that it was substituted for a deliberate purpose, because "will" would not bind, as the word "shall" would, the contractors to carry out what they stipulated to do. I thought that was very unworthy of the position of the right hon. gentleman. If those were exactly the terms of the contract there might have been some ground for an objection of that kind. But these duties; because the people had all these years become poorer and poorer, because they had been unable to purchase dutiable articles in as large quantities as they had previously purchased, because they were suffering for want and whether "shall" or "will" is used in that connection seems to matter very little. If we derive very little other benefit from that argument of the hon. gentleman, we, perhaps, may be induced to think somewhat more critically of the proper use of the auxiliary verbs. we were told that the alternative clauses in that Bill were formed expressly for the purpose of relieving the new Syndicate from the obligation of building the ends of the road. If hon, gentlemen on the other side themselves believed that the offer was a mere bogus offer, a mere paltry, contemptible, political trick, there was no necessity for argument about it, or for trying to prove that certain clauses were framed for the purpose of relieving the parties from the obligations they proposed to undertake. The alternative proposals are to the effect: that if the Government at any time choose to postpone or abandon the eastern or western end, or both, they shall have the right to do so without incurring any liability to the contractors for compensation. "Oh, but," says the right hon. gentleman, "they know that the present Government cannot accept this offer, that the good faith of the Government is pledged to this contract by which they must stand or fall, and that if the House does not ratify it, the Ministry must resign, they also know that their political friends, in a new Government, would relieve them from the responsibility of building those two expensive and difficult ends of the great work, and leave them the enormous amount to be received for the mere construction of the central portion." The right hon, gentleman has never yet shown to the House any reason why the Government must resign if the contract be not ratified. Looking at the matter in a common sense point of view, hon, members opposite must have supposed that the contract was submitted to them for their consideration, and that they were not merely called for the purpose of registering the decrees of gentlemen who are only a Committee of this House. He has chosen to say that if this contract be not ratified and the Government fall, the Opposition will be called upon to form another. He forgot to add that the new Government would have to appeal to the people, and on this very question, as they could not expect support in such a House as the present; and if the people could be persuaded that this contract was the very best bargain obtainable, then they would declare that they had no confidence in the new Government, but approved of the policy of the men who had gone out. I do not know whether that declaration was made by the right hon. gentleman with a view to sustaining this preposterous proposition, or with a view of preparing his supporters for the caucus which was held the following morning. We could see that a great number of those gentlemen were dissatisfied with the contract, as indeed appeared from their declarations in the House. Even the Minister of Public Works declared that he would like to see a great deal in it left out, and the member for Halton, who spoke last Friday evening, declared there was very much in it to which he was still opposed. I cannot, at this moment, remember a single term of this contract of which that hon, gentleman expressed an unqualified approval. Many other hon, gentlemen have said they did not like the contract. So, behind Ministers are gentlemen very unwilling indeed to sacrifice their opinions and convictions upon the altar of party, but who, or fall with the Government. I suppose they are pre-pared to stand by it. So far as relates to the proposal before the House, the offer made by the new Syndicate, it is simply a basis of agreement. The right hon, gentleman and the Finance Minister argued that under the present contract the Syndicate are absolutely bound to build and run the two extreme ends of the road. We bound to build and run the two extreme ends of the road. We contend they are not, and that if the contract is to become law, they should be so bound. The right hon gentleman section at $1 an acre, and that everybody must admit is absurdly low says that they are bound, under those terms, to commence Mr. MILLS. Hear, hear. Mr. Anglin.

work on the eastern section on the 1st of July, and to proceed with that work at such a rate as to complete the whole within ten years, and that if they did not carry out that portion of the contract in good faith, when they came for their money and land subsidy, for such portions of the road as they had built on the prairies, the Government would refuse to pay them a dollar in money or an acre of land till they had given substantial proof of their good faith in the construction of the other portions of the road. The hon. member told us more than once that the prairie section would be built in three years; the Finance Minister did not think that statement would be a convenient one, and he made the period four years. The difference between the two statements is this: Under the statement of the leader of the Government the Syndicate would have been bound to build—supposing they carried out the contract up to that time strictly according to its letter-within three years, three-tenths of the whole road. Under the Finance Minister's calculation they would be bound to build two fifths of the road. Now, Sir, I think I know something about railways-I have given them a good deal of attention in my life—but I cannot see how the standard of the Union Pacific can be made to apply to that portion of the road running through a country, as it will, which has no parallel in the Union Pacific, and where the curves and grades have not been determined. If at the end of three years the Syndicate do not think that it is to their interest to build, run and work the two ends, they will cease the prosecution of the work. They will have built but 190 miles, of which 60 or 70 will be common to the Canadian Pacific and the Sault Ste. Marie roads, and for the whole they will have received $15,500 per mile in cash and 10,000 acres per mile, according to the contract. The Government will have no remedy or resource against them, if they simply abandon the $1,000,000 in the hands of the Government. There is no lien to be created on any other portion of the road, and the Company will have the right either to hold it themselves or transfer it in fee simple, as they build every twenty mile section, for there is no obligation upon them to complete such portions of the road except the forfeiture of their deposit and of any balance due them on account of any portion of the eastern section they build. I cannot see what great danger there was in the alternative proposition implied in the new offer, which gave the Government the right absolutely to suspend the work; a right which I believe the Company virtually possess under the terms of the contract. But even if the alternative proposal were objectionable, I really do not think that it afforded any justification or ground for the assertion that the object of the proposal, the intention of those who made it, was that the end sections should never be built; or that how gentlemen on this side, who do not say the new offer is one we should accept, but only that it is incomparably better than the other, are in favor of postponing the construction of those sections indefinitely or beyond a reasonable time. There is equally little foundation for the charge which these hon, gentlemen make, that we are engaged in plotting and conspiring for the purpose of preventing the connection of the great Provinces of this Dominion by rail, and to throw the trade for the sake of their leaders, will sacrifice their own political and the population of this country into the hands of future, because they are told that they must now stand the United States. We scorn and repudiate any such charge, and we challenge hon. gentlemen to the proof. But the right hon. gentleman proved a great deal too much for his own case. He proved that the amount to be given under the offer for the central section would be enormously disproportionate to the actual work to be one. Here is what he said:

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes, it is absurdly low for the land laying twenty-four miles on each side of the prairie section; it must be worth more when the railway is built than a dollar an acre."

It will be observed that the hon, gentleman says the estimate of $1 per acre is absurdly low, while the hon, Minister of Railways says that their whole scheme is based upon the very figure which the Premier says is absurdly low. I wish also to point out that when we mentioned $2 an acre as a possible price for the land, lying within the twenty-four-mile limit, hon. gentlemen opposite immediately proceeded to calculate the value of the 150,000,000 acres of land, which they suppose we have in that country at $2 an acre—taking all the land up to Hudson's Bay and almost to the mouth of the Mackenzie River at that figure. The right hon, gentleman proceeded to say:

"The cash subsidy, 900 miles at $733 33 per mile will be $6,000,000, and the land grant. 10,000 acres per mile for 900 miles at $1 per acre, will be $9,000,000, making in all, for building the prairie section, at $1 per acre, *15,600,000. If you take the land at $2 an acre, and that is far too low by the estimates of the hon. gentleman opposite, the cash subsidy of the land grant at $2 an acre will make in all *24,600,000. Value the land at $3.18 an acre and it will be worth $28,620,000, making in all, cash and land, $35,220,000, so that for building the prairie section, the cheap section, the easy section, the section which can be run at a profit—at $1 an acre, they will get $17,333 33 per mile; at $2 an acre, they will get $27,333.33 a mile, and at $3.18 an acre they will get $39,133 a mile. And this price would be given by hon. gentlemen opposite who say that this section can be built at $8,110 per mile."

Well, Sir, if this proposal were ours, or if we were free to-day to make any proposal whatever, the hon. gentleman on this side of the House would accept no such proposal as that. But when the right hon, gentleman proves that the price to be paid to those gentlemen under the terms of that offer would be so enormously out of proportion to the actual cost of the road to be built, could he have forgotton that, under the terms of his own contract, the price to be paid is about one-third higher in cash and one-third higher in land? Why, throughout this whole proceeding I have failed to discover in the arguments of hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House any motive or reason whatever less discreditable than that of absolute infatuation. The hon. gentleman must have been infatuated when he quoted those figures to prove that one-third less than his own terms would give to those gentlemen an extravagant price, and throughout this whole matter he must have been laboring under some hallucination or infatuation for which, unhappily, the people of Canada must suffer for many years to come. But he alleges that there is a reason why this large profit should be given to the Syndicate, a reason why they should be paid enormously more than the cost of the work they do. He told the people at Hochelaga, if I remember aright, that he had made a contract with a company composed of English, French, Germans and Americans, whose means were so ample that it would give them no trouble to build five such railways. Now, he tells us in this House that he proposes to give these men land and money two or three times the value of the work they are to do in this 900 miles, for the purpose of enabling them to establish a basis of credit, so that they may be enabled to float bonds or raise money in the money market. Where, then, are the great capitalists? Where the abundant capital? Where are the vast rescources which we were told these gentlemen could command? right hon, gentleman in this case proved that his whole position was a false position which he should not occupy a moment longer; proved that it was a position in which hon. gentlemen in this House, who look into this question carefully and desire to do their duty, not to their leader, not to their party, but to their country, and their consciences, ought not to sustain him. But it is said: "Well, the whole thing may be very objectionable, this new offer may be very much better, but it comes too late." When could it have come scoper? When could it have been made by any men, who, have known and must have known what the nature of the honest and well meaning themselves, believed that the leader of the Government of this country was honest also? The enly Act we have upon our Statute-book, providing for the construction of this railway, is the Act of 1874. There is no resolution on our books authorizing the Government to make any contract or enter into any negotiation on the subject; there are no terms stated which may be regarded as a basis of negotiations between the Government and any contractors, except only this, that last year, a few short weeks before the hon gentlemen actually entered into this secret negotiation, they declared in this House that their fixed and determined policy was to build this road as a Government work and to pay for it out of the proceeds of the lands of the North-West. The right hon. leader of the Government says: "Contractors and the public generally had notice enough of our intention and our purpose, and when I said at that picnic in Bath, that certain proposals had been made to us and were under consideration, and that we would probably go to England in a short time and look further into the matter, that was sufficient notice to anyone who desired to tender for the contract." If I remember aright, the hon gentleman in that same speech at Bath, assured his audience and the country that the Government would take care that this railroad should not cost the people a dollar. That read to me at the time as an endorsation and repetition of the declaration made in this House, that it was the intention of the Government to build this read directly and immediately out of the proceeds of the land of the North-West. There was no reason why capitalists throughout the country should otherwise regard it. There was certainly nothing to lead any man in this country-outside the charmed circle of which the Premier was the centre and in which the Minister of Railways and Minister of Agriculture, moved conspicuously but enwrapped in the cloud with which the gods sometimes do surround themselves when they condescend to visit this earth-there was nothing to induce any one outside that charmed circle to imagine for a moment that any terms such as those embraced in the contract, or the offer now made to the House, would have been entertained for a moment by the right hon. gentlemen. The public had no intimation that it was the intention of the Government to open up the whole matter; they had no reason to suspect that it was their intention to depart from their own solemnly avowed policy. In 1879 we heard the hon, the Minister of Railways, in that series of bombastic resolutions, proclaiming that with the help of the Imperial Government, and by voting 100,000,000 of acres of land to be set aside for that purpose, we were to construct the Pacific Railway, and fill our whole country with a population drawn from Great Britain and Ireland. We were not only to build the railroad, but we were also to fill up the country. In 1880, after the previous policy had failed, those hon, gentlemen came home again, and when they came back they announced that they had entirely succeeded. In the city of Ottawa a banquet was given them to congratulate them and repay them for their success, and at the banquet declarations were again made that they were succeeding, but by-and-bye, we found that they had utterly failed. Shortly after that they came forward with another declaration that the whole Canadian Pacific Railway was to be constructed out of the proceeds of the land of the North-West. Nor had we any right to suspect the contrary, nor had we any reason to believe that anything else than that would be the policy of the Government; thus were the Government pledged, and they were without any authority from this Parliament to enter into anything like what they have called a "firm" contract. After the hon. gentlemen went to England, we know what the English leading papers said of their mission and the mode in which they were conducting it. But hon. gentlemen contend that during all that time every one in this country ought to negotiations really was from what the papers told us. All I remember the papers telling us, was that the hon. gentlemen on the other side talked of millions of dollars and millions of acres of land, as if they were the merest trifles, and that was confirmed a few evenings ago by the Minister of Railways when he asserted that $25,000,000 was a paltry sum and 25,000,000 acres of land a paltry quantity. But we never did hear anything of the basis upon which these negotiations were proceeding; we never had any reason to suspect, never indeed did suspect, until the contract was laid on the Table, that any Government in this country would entertain for a moment terms so utterly monstrous. But, argued one gentleman after the Ministers came back to this country, there was still time enough; the papers all stated that the details were still under consideration, and these gentlemen should then have approached the Government. Hon. gentlemen who argue in that way do not probably perceive that they ask us to assume that the business men of this country should rather have believed mere newspapers rumors than the solemn public declaration of the Prime Minister of Canada. At Hochelaga that hon. gentleman told the country that he and his colleagues had made a contract firm, and any subsequent negotiations were supposed to have reference only to minor details. So that there was no other time than the time taken by these other capitalists to put in their offer. It is not right to say that the Government of this country have the power to bind Parliament and the country by anything they choose to do. That authority the Government of this country does not and ought not possess. I have been rather astonished that so many leading men of various Provinces could in so short a time take counsel together and agree upon such an offer as has been submitted to the House. I believe that offer was made as soon as it was possible for them to make it. No doubt they had no intention of making any proposal until they saw what exceedingly extravagant terms the Government were disposed to grant, and then, knowing that they had a right to tender, knowing that they had a right to expect that the majority of the people's representatives in this House would make every effort to save the people's money, they came here. They met with reproach. contumely and abuse, from gentlemen from whom they had a right to expect better treatment. The hon. First Minister told us that Sir Wm. Howland was a man who never invested $50 anywhere without being sure of a return. A stronger argument for the bona fide character of the offer could not be given. All the gentlemen connected with the second offer proved their earnestness when it was questioned by depositing within forty-eight hours in the banks at Ottawa, not in securities, but in actual solid cash, nearly a million and a-half of dollars. Hon. gentlemen profess to regard that not as a proof of their earnestness in the effort to obtain this contract, but as a further proof that they were resorting to sham and fraud. I could never understand how bon. gentlemen could see in that action a political dodge or device. If they succeed in persuading themselves of the correctness of that idea, they will not succeed in so persuading the people of this country, who will regard this as an evidence that these gentlemen are in earnest, and would have carried out the contract faithfully and to the letter. The only argument, if argument it may be called, in favor of the position of the majority, is one that was rather pithily put in the earliest stage of this debate by the hon. member for Niagara, who does pretty often say pithy things and good things. That hon, gentleman said that the whole matter simply came to this, that the Government were bound in honor to sustain the contract, and the party were bound in honor to sustain the Government. As I have already said, except the declaration of the Prime Minister, there is nothing whatever to show the House and the country that the Government was bound in honor to sustain this contract.

Mr. Anglin.

We may quite understand that these hon. gentlemen, not knowing last Session—although one of their supporters told us that they did know—that such offers were to be made, allowed the Session to pass without asking for authority to do that which they had no intention to do. Supposing that it would be possible to make what they thought was a good bargain, and to relieve the country of anxiety on account of this great undertaking, they were, I think, quite justified in entering into negotiations. But I do not believe they were quite justified, in binding themselves, as a Government, solemnly to stand by this bargain. They might have made the best bargain they could at the time, and that bargain they might have submitted fairly and honestly to Parliament, and left Parliament to determine whether the bargain was so good that we ought to accept it. But that they should rest their existence, as a Government and a party, on that contract, is something that cannot be understood, unless some further explanations are given. What do they owe to the gentlemen of the Syndicate? Why should they be bound in honor to the gentlemen of the Syndicate to sustain that bargain? If they had asked the authority of Parliament to negotiate a contract on certain terms and within certain limits, if, after having obtained that authority, they had openly and in a proper manner invited tenders for the whole work; and if, after having examined all the tenders received, they came to the conclusion that a particular tender was, on the whole, the best, accepted it, and entered into a contract, then, indeed, they might have fairly said that they were bound in honor to stand by the contract so made. But instead, they proceeded secretly; they allowed themselves to be approached by those persons, who, somehow or other learned that they were approachable and entertained tenders, the substance of which was utterly unknown to the public at large. They proceeded to London, put themselves in correspondence with capitalists there, but not in the open way always followed by Governments. secrecy of the whole negotiations left room for regarding as but too probable the numberless discreditable street rumors heard to-day at every street corner. Now, they say they are bound in honor to stand by the contract—in honor or in dishonor they have bound themselves They call on their party to sustain them in their course, for no other reason than that the party existence in office depends on that support. They rely on a decision which, if given, will be but that of a mere faction, though composed of a large majority. It will not be the decision of Parliament, a decision based on reason and common sense, on any sense of what is due to the welfare and interests of the country. This bargain, every man in this House knows to-day, takes $3,000,000 cash and 3,000,000 acres of the best land in Canada from the people. Every man believes that if this work were put up to public competition a very much larger sum than $3,000,000 and a larger area than 3,000,000 acres would be saved the people. No man out-ide the ranks of that party can imagine in what conceivable possible sense it is honorable that he should assist in depriving the people of that enormous sum of money and that vast area of fertile

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier). Mr. Speaker, feeling that this is the most important question which has been brought before the Canadian Parliament, not since Confederation, as stated by many hon. members, but since the admission of British Columbia into the Union; anticipating now that as the National Policy may be considered settled, the Canadian Pacific Railway will be the leading political topic for twenty or twenty-five years to come, perhaps till the time will come to discuss the advisability of changing the political situation of this Dominion either for legislative union, a system of federation less expensive, or, not to be unjust to the hon. leader of the Opposition, federation of the British Empire; being aware that I represent a county where the Liberal party has a strong element, many educated supporters, and even eloquent speakers, who on former occasions had opposed me on the hustings in a very formidable manner; knowing, finally, that my county, situated as it is in close proximity to the city of Montreal, and in daily contact with its population, composed of intelligent electors, who generally read and write and receive newspapers, was able to form a fair opinion as to the merits and demerits of the contractfor all these reasons I made up my mind to employ the Christmas adjournment in paying a visit to my constituents at the door of the church of each parish after mass, as is customary in the Province of Quebec after a Session or at election time. At five of these public meetings I exposed the policy of the Government, the terms of the contract, the formation of their Syndicate and the objections made against the same. I told them that the country was bound to build this railway within the next ten years from the Pacific Ocean to the system of Canadian railways, even at the risk of increasing the rate of taxation upon the people. I am surprised, Mr. Speaker, to see this proposition denied in a most positive manner by the hon. gentlemen opposite, and I believe I owe it to my constituents to establish it beyond doubt on the floor of this House. I am aware that in 1871 the House of Commons passed a resolution restricting its obligation to build the railway. I know that the policy laid down in that resolution was to the effect that the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway was to be prosecuted so as not to increase the rate of taxation upon the people. This was then the policy of this country. It was reaffirmed in the Statute-book of 1872 and 1874. I know all that. But did British Columbia ever assent to this serious restriction? Was it inserted in the terms of the Union? No, Sir, and I venture the hon. members will not contradict me in this respect. Ey the terms of the British North America Act of 1867, it was provided that British Columbia could enter Confederation upon such terms and conditions as will be expressed in the addresses of British Columbia on the one part and Canada on the other. Now let us see what these addresses provide about the construction of this railway:

"The Government of the Dominion undertake to secure the commencement simultaneously, within two years from the date of the Union of the construction of a railway from the Pacific towards the Ro ky Mountains, and from such point as may be selected east of the Rocky Mountains, towards the Pacific, to connect the seaboard of British Columbia with the railway system of Canada; and, further, to secure the comple ion of such railway within ten years from the date of the Union."

Not a word is to be found about the rate of taxation which the construction of the railway might produce. Canada has undertaken, unconditionally, to build the railway within ten years. And has British Columbia ever since given her consent to any change of those terms, at least in this particular? No, Sir, by the Carnarvon treaty she has consented to an extension of time, but not to the resolution of the House of Commons in 1871. To-day, as before, we are bound to build this railway within the next ten years. If we desire to meet our engagement, if we care for the honor and credit of this country, the railway must be complete in 1891 without regard to its cost nor to the increase of taxation which it will necessarily involve. Seeing this positive and clear obligation on the part of Canada, Mr. Speaker was greatly surprised, I was amazed, to hear the other evening the hon, leader of the Opposition declare here solemnly to this House and to the country that if British Columbia did not wish to be reasonable, we should let her go. What would the hon. gentleman say to a solvent client who would ask his advice as to whether he should pay his promissory note for $100 in full or only in part? Would be advise him to offer only $25 and recommend him to let his creditor go if he was not willing to accept this and thus be reasonable. The position of British Columbia is just the same. She is our creditor; she insists upon the fulfilment of look and carefully examine this new offer. I do not agree and, Sir, we cannot refuse our engagements, demand repudiating our obligation without bringing dishonor and disgrace upon our country. But we shall not follow the advice of the hon, gentlemen. We shall keep good faith with British Columbia. build the road in the manner and within the time fixed by the agreement. Mr. Speaker, I also told the electors of Jucques Cartier that both political parties, ever since 1871, had made repeated efforts to form a company to build the whole railway; that the Mackenzie Government had passed a Statute authorizing the grant of $10,000 per mile in cash, and 20,000,000 acres of land, besides four per cent interest for twenty-five years on any sum of money which might be stated in the contract, and that all these advantages had been deemed insufficient to induce capitalists to make any offer, although for months and years advertisements inviting tenders have been published in the newspapers of both continents. I also represented to my constituents that in 1879, Parliament had voted 100,000,000 acres of land to be vested in Commissioners to be appointed in England. When I read these railway resolutions, I cannot conceive how the hon leader of the Opposition can affirm and repeat in every speech that the Canadian Pacific Railway Act of 1874 is still in force at least as far as the plan and policy of building the said railway is concerned. The intention of the Canadian Pacific Railway Act seemed to have been of building the railway by sections and subsections as Government works, and of course tenders had to be called. But the declared policy of this Government and of this Parliament has been to build the whole railway, not by tenders under the supervision and control of the Government, but by the agency of a private company and as a commercial enterprise, and for that reason the provisions of the Canadian Pacific Railway Act cannot apply to the contract under discussion. They have been superseded, abandoned, and given up as affording in-ufficient means for the construction of this great work. But suppose the Railway Act to be still in force, suppose the tender of the Syndicate is not called, nor made, nor accepted, as provided by that A.t, cannot Parliament change that Act, in fact repeal it, and ratify the contract and make it legal? In my humble opinion, the objection is so futile that I cannot understand how the hon, leader of the Opposition, with his great legal mind, could have thought of raising it. To return to my visit to Jacques Cartier, I also told my constituents how much we were to give to the Syndicate, $25,000,000 of cash, 25,000,000 acres of land and sections already built and to be completed by the Government, equivalent to some $28,000,000 or $30,000,000 more. I explained to them the so-called monopoly clauses, providing for exemption from taxation, duties, privileges as to the building of branch lines and prohibition to build roads south of the Canadian Pacific or within tifteen miles of the American boundary. The Government policy was endorsed unanimously. there was not a dissenting voice. No, Sir, I am making a slight mistake. Yes; there was a gentleman from Montreal present who remarked we were giving too much land, as it was worth $2 per acre. An elector immediately replied that if it was worth $2 for the Syndicate, the sections of the Government would be worth that much. But, remarked another elector, when will that land be worth that much? Without the railway it is very much like the land in the moon. Everywhere the contract was approved, even in such a Liberal stronghold as Point Claire, where out of 350 electors I only polled fifty-three at the last election. It was endorsed by reason of certainty as to construction, cost, time and route. A new feature in the controversy has sprung up since my visit to my county—I am referring to the second Syndicate and the offer they have made—and it is this new feature which has induced me to to rise and offer a few remarks. I believe it is the duty of every member of this House to

with the hon, gentlemen who contend that the Government is bound by the contract. Suppose some great firms of European capitalists would offer to-day to do the same work for half the money or consideration, I believe it would be the duty of the Government to withdraw their acceptance of the contract—a thing they can do so long as it is not finally ratified by Parliament—and accept the offer of these capitalists. But let us see if the second offer is better than the first one. What are the differences between the two. The second offer is couched word for word in the terms of the contract, with the exception of a few clauses I shall point out presently. It was evidently prepared without that close attention and care which commercial men generally give before signing a document of such a vast importance. I have no doubt in my mind that many have signed it without reading it. It was done in so great a hurry that few sections, for instance sections d., 15 and 16, no longer correspond with previous clauses altered. The offer is to build the railway for $22,000,000 of cash and 22,000,000 acres of land, and yet power was asked to issue bonds to the amount of $25,000,000 as in the contract. The first clause was changed but the subsequent ones were not, and as the offer stands, we can infer that the offer is virtually for $25,000,000 instead of $22.000.000. The differences, at least the leading ones between the two tenders, are $22,000,000 instead of $25,000,000 in cash and land. Sections 15 and 16 of contract is abandoned as to exemption from taxes and payment of duties on certain imported articles. Frohibition on the part of the Dominion and future Provinces not to charter railways south of the Canadian Pacific Railway, or within 15 miles of the American boundary, is also abandoned. These are the better terms, and there is no doubt that in these particulars the second offer is better than the first one. But still these advantages must not be exaggerated. The only items really worthy of attention are the reduction in the price, the exemption forever from taxation of the road. In a country unsettled like the North-West, the exemption from taxation of lands for twenty years is of little value, and we all know that it does not affect Ontario, Manitoba nor British Columbia. In fact, in the Province of Quebec, by the general law of the land, and I think it is the same all over the Dominion, railway companies subsidized by the Government are exempt from taxation to all intents and purposes, not only for twenty years but so long as they receive the subsidies. But there is more, and I am referring here to the exemption from taxes for ever of the road, stations, etc. Can this Parliament prohibit future Provinces from imposing taxes which the British North America Act will give them the power to impose? Can we create Provinces upon different principles and with different powers from those of the Provinces already existing? There is no doubt that the future Provinces will be a portion of Confederation and will be governed by the British North America Act. These new Provinces will, therefore, have the power of putting an end to the regulations we are now making. Of course, they will be bound by the agreements which this Parliament is now making for them, and could not terminate them without some indemnity; but, Sir, owing their existence to this railway, they will find little difficulty or reluctance to provide for this indemnity out of their own resources without making any appeal to the people of the Dominion. However, I need not add that I would prefer to see this exemption struck off, or at least of no effect after a certain number of years, say forty or fifty years. I know that the Government, being only one party to the contract, cannot amend it without the consent of the Syndicate; I know that this contract must be accepted as a compact; I know that the rejection of one clause would break and put an end to the whole arrangement; that the Company will, therenpon, be free and at liberty to withdraw. For this reason I Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier).

simply make the remark; I throw it out as a suggestion, which the Syndicate, if wise and reasonable, should accept. This exemption from taxes forever is contrary to the spirit of modern legislation, which would not even permit municipalities to grant it for the encouragement of manufactures for a longer period than twenty-five years. The value of the exemption from duties has been greatly exaggerated. It will be no hardship to the manufacturers; they will not be in a worse position, the Government paying no duties on anything they import. I hope, however, that the Government will make such regulations in the allowance of drawback or otherwise, so as to permit Canadians to compete with foreign manufacturers in the supply of the material the Syndicate will require to build the road. The prohibition to charter railways south of the Pacific or within fifteen miles of the boundary for twenty years cannot be seriously felt. It does not apply to Manitoba which has already granted, and may in the future grant, as many charters as she pleases. Section 92 of the British North America Act says:

"In each Province the Legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated, that is to say:

"Local works and undertakings other than such as are of the following classes:—

"a. Lines of steam or other ships railways, canals, telegraphs, and other works and undertakings connecting the Province with any other or others of the Provinces, or extending beyond the limits of the Province.",

Under that clause Manitoba has evidently the power of granting railway charters within the Province, extending to the boundary line, but not beyond its limits. Of course, this local legislation is subject to the veto power of the Dominion. But if the Pacific Railway proves to be tyrannical in its charges and regulations, the Dominion Government will be very careful not to interfere, and not only can this be done, but this Parliament can charter a rival line north of the present Pacific Railway. But to come back to the second Syndicate, granting that their offer contains better terms than the contract, and there is no doubt that it does present some advantages, let us see its disadvantages. Above all, it leaves to uncertainty the construction and running of the entire road, the very thing which was causing so much alarm and anxiety in the mind of the people of this country. The Government may or may not proceed with the western and eastern sections or both. The hon, member for Gloucester, who preceded me, has challenged us to show that under the contract there was any guarantee that the eastern section would be built. I find this guarantee in clause 7 of the contract, and clause 28 of the Act of incorporation. Clause 7 says:

"And upon the completion of the eastern and central sections, the Government shall convey to the Company, with a suitable number of station buildings, and with the water service (but without equipment), those portions of the Canadian Pacific Railway constructed or to be constructed by the Government which shall then be completed."

Clause 28 says:

"And provided also that such mortgage and privilege shall not attach upon any property which the Company are hereby, or by the said contract, authorized to acquire or receive from the Government of Canada, until the same shall have been conveyed by the Government to the Company; but shall attach upon such property, if so declared in such deed, as soon as the same shall be conveyed to the Company."

It is clear that under these clauses the Syndicate shall not acquire the Government sections, nor even validly mortgage the same till the eastern section be completed. For my part I do not want a better security. Mr. Speaker, I may immediately declare that if the contract did contain the uncertainly of the second offer, if it was subject to the same reservation or discretion with the Government, to build or not build the eastern section, I, as a member of the Province of Quebec, as a representative of the people of this Dominion, highly interested to know the cost of the entire road, and to secure its efficient operation within the terms of the Carnarvon treaty, interested to free the political atmosphere from the impurity or impurities which the construction and working of this immense enterprise by Government would necessarily produce, I would not hesitate to vote against the resolution of the hon. Minister of Railways. It is because there is no uncertainty as to all these points, and for these considerations, that the Province of Quebec en masse is in favor of the contract and against the second Syndicate. This fact is so apparent that hardly one anti-petition has come from that portion of the country. The Corn Exchange of Montreal has not even deemed it necessary to present a memorial embodying their resolutions. In this wealthy city, where so many enterprising men are to be found, no one was willing to join the second Syndicate with the exception of an office seeker, however respectable and competent he may be to manage a railway department. The names of prominent Liberals of Montreal and Quebec were at first mentioned, but at the supreme moment they were not forthcoming and even repudiated any connection with the scheme. The fact is that this second offer was got up by extreme partizans of our friends opposite, assisted by a few disappointed importers of Ontario, for the sole purpose of raising a sectional cry against the Government. When we hear such language as the following fall from the lips of a leading member of the Ontario Government, we are not surprised to hear of anti-petitions coming from a few ridings of the same Province, and a counter-offer coming from the same quarter. Here is the language as quoted by the Globe:

"Toronto and Ontario merchants may be placed in a position that they will be compelled to transact nearly all their business with the North-West from Montreal. It is essentially a Montreal scheme, concocted and controlled by Montreal men to the prejudice of Toronto and Ontario generally. It means, I fear, not only a Syndicate monopoly, but a Montreal monopoly too."

I do not for one moment suppose that this is the language of the majority of the population of Ontario. We all know that is the language of a few importers of Hamilton and Toronto, a fact which is also apparent from the allegations set forth in the petition of the Board of Trade of the latter city, where it is alleged:

"That the acquisition of such railways by the Syndicate would destroy the neutral character of the eastern terminus of the National Railway, and would practically transfer its terminus to Montreal."

I know, and we are all too well acquainted with the intelligence and patriotism of the people of Ontario generally, to believe, for one moment, that they would endorse such a selfish statement or argument. We all know that by nature Montreal and Quebec have been placed at the head of the oceanic trade of this Dominion, and Halifax St. John at the head of its winter trade, and will so remain, no matter whether the traffic of the great West will go down or up by the Sault Ste. Marie route or by way of the Canadian Pacific north of Lake Superior. Ontario has many natural advantages over her sister Provinces of the east. These Provinces are not jealous if she occupies the most prominent position in this Confederation, and we feel confident, and the vote given the other evening and the other votes which I have no doubt will follow, will show that the same liberal and national spirit prevails there.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier). Finally, Mr. Speaker, I submit that we ought to give our preference to the first Syndicate over the second one by reason of the circumstances which brought the formation of both of them. The first originated calmly, away from the political field, when there was no party interests at stake. It cannot be supposed that a Government having a majority of eighty at its back, had any other object in view but to serve the best interests of the country, and the members of the Syndicate cannot be suspected of aiding any political purpose. They are only known as business men, the political color of only one of them being known, and being a Liberal, he cannot be supposed of ever having had any intention of favoring the party in power. The second Syndicate, on the contrary, bears upon its face the features of a political movement made to embarrass the Government. It has been conceived and born by politicians, to create political excitement for party purposes. If accepted, it would be nothing else but a political machine in the service of that party. This is so very plain, that the clause of their proposed Act of incorporation, which permits the opening of stock books in the principal cities of the Dominion, provides that the provisional directors, that is the promoters of this political scheme, shall have the right to reject any subscription they may deem inexpedient to accept. There is another reason still more important to induce us to reject this second offer, and that is the personnel of the two Syndicates. I do not wish to pass the slightest imputation upon the business or financial standing of members of either of the companies-both have men of large means and financial character. But I notice in the composition of the second Syndicate, the absence of the foreign element, which, in my humble opinion. would be fatal to its ultimate success. In 1872, Sir Hugh Allan, in the name of a company just as powerful as this Syndicate is, having personally, on the London markets, undoubtedly more prestige than any member of this second Syndicate, and perhaps as much as the whole of these put together, failed in his mission of raising the necessary funds. for the want of interested parties on the London Stock Exchange. The Stephen Syndicate possesses this immense advantage. By the firm of Mr. Kennedy in New York, they have the financial market of that city open to them, and we all know what successful operators they have been in the past. The firm of Morton, Rose & Company places them in immediate contact with the London and Liverpool Stock Exchanges. and by the firm of Kohn, Reinach & Company, unknown perhaps to many of us, but perfectly well known to any one acquainted with the financial world of Europe, a firm capable alone of floating ten millions of dollars of the bonds of the Company, they have access to the Bourses of Paris, Vienna, Amsterdam, Berlin and of the whole continental Europe. It was the want of this foreign element which caused the collapse of the Allan Company and would inevitably cause the utter failure of the second Syndicate. Without these financial agents, without the active co-operation of these interested bankers, stock brokers or jobbers, it matters very little by what name they are to be styled, Mesers. Gilmour, McLaren, Carruthers and others, will find themselves like those tourists who undertake to visit the catacombs of Rome, without the assistance of a guide; they will be lost for ever. This consideration seems to me to be far more important than all the alleged advantages of the second offer. What the country wants is not only a few millions less promised on paper, the country wants the road built beyond a doubt, and this is more certain, in fact is only surely to be obtained except by the agency of the first Syndicate For all these reasons I feel that I am in duty bound to record my vote against the amendment of the hon. leader of the Opposition and in favor of the railway resolutions. I hope that the gentlemen who are undertaking this gigantic work will make fortunes out of their contract. country will have no reason to envy them, for their profits will be so many savings to the public treasury. pluck and courage deserve reward, and if I had any doubt in my mind, which I have not, as to the superiority of their terms, I would not hositate to give them the benefit of that doubt. The far Nor-West is, as every one admits and no one can deny, of immense value, but perhaps not so will need patience, courage, large means and pecuniary resources, before they can realize profits, but they are sure of getting them in the end. The policy pursued by the Opposition will even help them to obtain this result, for instead of persisting in their course of depreciating this young and unknown country, I was, we were all, pleased to see our friends opposite adopt the more patriotic platform of representing Canada as worthy of the attention of Europe and of its surplus of money and population. Mr. Speaker, I feel that I cannot take my seat without thanking the Government and especially the energetic and able Minister who is at the head of the Department of Railways upon the ultimate success of their efforts. Our children and great grandchildren will alone be able to realize the magnitude of the services they are rendering the country on the present occasion. And of the right hon, leader of the Government, who to day sees his hopes and expectations of 1872 realized to their fullest extent, history will say that, the Confedera-tion scheme being excepted, the Pacific contract is the greatest act of a great political career.

Mr. DOULL. As the question before the House has assumed a new aspect since first introduced by the new proposition which has lately been offered to it, I desire to say a few words upon it. I do not purpose prolonging the debate by any lengthened remarks, for, had I greater ability than I pretend to possess, I do not think I could offer any new views to the House. I am sure the subject before the House has already been so ably discussed that I think the arguments on both sides have been fully exhausted, and I am sure the House must be tire! and weary with the repetition of arguments that have been made time and again on this subject. But in justice to myself and the constituents I have the honor to represent, I feel that under the new aspect of this question 1 could not give a silent vote on so important a subject affecting as it does not only the present but the future of this great Dominion. On the developement and settlement of the great North-West-largely depend the future greatness and general prosperity of this country. It is by settlement alone that we can expect to increase the population, and in a great extent this cannot be accomplished without the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway that will connect the Pacific coast with the system of Canadian railways and thus make railway communication from the Atlantic to the Pacific. It has been admitted, I think on all sides, that this is too great a work for the Dominion to undertake as a Government work, and all have agreed that it should be built if possible by a company. Now that we have the opportunity of getting it built as all are agreed it should be built, it is opposed in this House, by the party who have opposed every measure that has been submitted in the interests of the country since Confederation, and, as I believe, on factious grounds. By the new aspect which the subject has assumed since the new offer was made, the question virtually before the House is : shall we ratify the contract or shall we accept the new offer. I think that by the discussion in this House and out of it, it has been most clearly proven that the terms of the contract now before the House are better and more in the interests of the country than either the terms of the Allan contract or the terms that were offered in the Act of 1874 by the Mackenzie Government. It has been stated by hon, gentlemen opposite that circumstances have changed within the last year or so as to enhance the value of the lands in the North-West. I think they have, and that the Government of the day have, acted wisely and prudently in giving less land and more money for the construction of the road. Under the Allan contract the Government of that day agreed on $30,000,000 and 55,000,000 acres of land, that is including the two branches. If we take the land at the valuation which the Opposition now set upon it—that is $3.18 per head—not that I would hesitate to vote to overthrow the acre, we will have the money value given under the Allan present or any other Government if I considered Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier).

contract equal to $204,900,000. If we consider the land and money grants under the Mackenzie Act of 1874, we will have $10,000 per mile on 2,797 miles, making $27,970,000. To this we add the interest that might be asked by the company tendering, four per cent., upon the Minister of Railways' estimate of what would actually have to be paid, $7,500 per mile, and we have $20,977,500, making a cash subsidy, under the Mackenzie arrangement. of $48,947,50 J. Add to that the 56,000,000 acres of land that was to be given under the Act of 1874 to a company for building this road, $178,080,000. Add that to the $48,947,500, and we have an actual money value, given Mackenzie contract, of $227,027,500. Under the present contract all that is given is $25,000,000 cash, the road that is built and being built equal to $28,000,000 in cash, both these sums amounting to $53,000,000 in cash. Taking the land at the same valuation it would amount to $79,500,000, making in all $132,500,000 that we give under the present arrangement, a difference in favor of this arrangement of $72,000,000 as compared with the Allan contract, and $94,000,000 as compared with the terms offered under the Mackenzie Act. That the country is fully convinced that the terms of the present contract are better than either of the two arrangements I have mentioned, we want no further proof than the fact the Opposition have failed by their agitation to call forth any general expression of feeling against it. Hence the necessity for something else than the terms of the contract to influence public sentiment in their favor, and hence this new proposition. If this new proposition is a bona fide one, the question might naturally be asked, why was it not made before? Why was it not made when the leader of the late Government offered better terms than is proposed to be given by this Bill? Why was it not made months ago, when it was known that the members of the Government were going to England to make arrangements for the construction of the road? Why not made when it was known that these gentlemen had returned and were arranging the terms of the present Bill? Why was it only made when the Bill had passed through Committee? Why, I ask, was not this new proposition made before if it is made in good fuith, and not as a trap or share to each votes from this side of the House, and, if possible, to overthrow the Government? The hon, member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin), in the speech he made to-day, stated that the defeat of this contract need not of necessity cause the overthrow of the Government. I am not a constitutional lawyer, nor yet am I as well acquainted with parliamentary usage as the hon. gentleman, but it appears to me that if this Bill is rejected by this House the Government will have no alternative but to resign. They have entered into a selemn connative but to resign. They have entered into a solemn contract, they have bound themselves to this contract, and they have called upon this House to ratify this contract. If this house refuses to ratify that contract, we condemn the Act of the Government, and thereby express a want of confidence in the Government, and, as a matter of course, it appears to me they must resign. But it is not the only object the Opposition have in concocting this political scheme, for I consider it nothing else. Failing to overthrow the Government, they think this would be an excellent card for the next general election. I am inclined to think they have overreached themselves, and as they will certainly fail in the first, so they will as certainly fail in the other. I will endeavor, succinctly as possible, to give my reasons for opposing the new resolutions and for supporting the contract. First, because by accepting the new proposition and refusing to ratify the contract we establish the necessity of overthrowing the present Government to be followed by a Government with the hon. leader of the Opposition at its

that the interests of the country required it. In the second place, by rejecting the contract we not only defeat the Government, but we defeat the object we have all so much at heart, the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway, so as to give us railway communication from the Atlantic to the Pacific through Canadian territory. I do not agree with the hon. Premier and others on this side of the House, that this offer is a bogus one, but that it is a political dodge I have no doubt. If, however, it succeeded in overthrowing the present Govornment and placing in power the leader of the Opposition, that portion of it which is in accordance with the views of that hon, gentleman I have no doubt would be carried out to the letter, and would prove a much more remunerative undertaking than the one under the contract. This House and the country are well aware of the policy of that gentleman with respect to the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway. He has declared time and again against building that portion of the road from the foot of the Rocky Mountains, on the east, to the Pacific and that portion north of Lake Superior, and in favor of building only that portion from Lake Superior to the foot of the Rocky Mountains, and making connection with the American roads via Sault Ste. Marie. Can anyone read the new proposition without seeing that it is made to meet his views in this respect, and that if it succeeded in bringing him into power, only that portion of it necessary to carry out his policy would be adopted, as all the rest is made optional with the Government of the day. Accept this proposition and reject the contract and you will have a road from the Rocky Mountains to Lake Superior, connecting with the American roads via Sault Ste. Marie, and you will postpone indefinitely if not forever the construction of a Canadian Pacific Railway on Canadian territory, connecting the Atlantic with the Pacific; for what company will ever undertake the construction of the other portion of it, which, in the nature of things, can never be made to pay when the only paying part is in the hands of another company? No; it appears to me that the thing is too transparent, and will not deceive any member of this House, and when thoroughly understood will not deceive the country, but will recoil upon the heads of those who concocted so transparent a political The great outcry and the greatest objection to the contract was that it was going to create a grinding monopoly that would seriously interfere with the development and settlement of the North-West Territory. This objection I think answers itself; for, as it would interfere with the development and settlement of that country, so it would interfere with and prevent the enterprise from being a paying and profitable one. No, Sir, the Syndicate, in order to make the enterprise a profitable one, must do all in their power to develop and settle the country, and with all they and the Government can do in that direction. It appears to me it will not be during this generation that they will take out of it the money they put into it. But if the contract creates a monopoly so does the offer, for, according to it the new Syndicate are to get and hold their lands in precisely the same way as under the contract, except that they are not free from taxation, and I do not think that amounts to much, for it will be very little of them that will be taxed during the first twenty years. So that I look upon that objection as a very frivolous one; and as to their holding their lands and not selling them at a fair price I think is sheer nonsense. It will be to their interest to sell their lands as soon as possible, for the profit they would make by holding them would not equal the profit they would make by the traffic they would create by selling them as soon as possible. The hon, member for Gloucester, this afternoon, and other members of the Opposition argued as if we were not going to have a first-class road under the contract, on account of the standard selected. This is mere assumption. The Union Pacific Railway, when completed in 1873, was pronounced a first-class road, and it

months after it was opened. Even then the road-bed was a good one, but there were many temporary bridges and station houses which were afterwards replaced by more substantial structures. It was then an incomplete and unfinished road, and could not be the standard referred to in the contract. In this respect, therefore, the offer and the contract are the same. With respect to tolls, I think that difficulty or objection is set aside by the statement of the hon. First Minister, that a clause will be inserted in the Consolidated Railway Act fixing the extent to which the ten per cent. profit goes. There is one objection taken by the Opposition to the contract, which, to my mind, has some weight, although inconsistent with their principles of free trade, and which the offer does not contain; that is, the admission of materials for the construction of the road free of duty. I think this is inconsistent with and opposed to the principle approved of by the country and attempted to be carried out by our National Policy. It strikes at the very root of the principle of Protection. If exemptions are to be made in this instance, how are they to be refused in others? If we have not the manufactories in operation to produce what is required for the construction of railways, we have at hand all that is necessary to put them into operation in a very short time, and I am pleased to see by the papers, that a company has been formed at Montreal to develop our iron mines and to manufacture steel rails and other appliances necessary for the construction of railroads. We have in the county I have the honor to represent, iron mines of the best quality in the world, and of unlimited extent, lying in close proximity to immense coal fields and lime beds, and all that is required to develop them is capital. From the information I have I believe they can be worked more cheaply than any mines on this continent, and from their natural position iron works can be carried on more cheaply in their neighborhood than at any mines in the world. They are situated alongside of the Intercolonial Railway, from Pictou to Truro, and only twenty-four miles from Pictou Harbor, one of the best in the Dominion. I therefore consider this section of the contract objectionable, but as the Government are going to give a bonus to manufacturers equal to what they grant to the Syndicate by this section, I am prepared to accept it with the rest, although I would prefer it was not there. Some hon gentlemen opposite have endeavored to show what an immense burden this contract was going to entail on this Dominion, and the hon, member for Yarmouth (Mr. Killam) endeavored to show how much it was going to injure the Province he and I have the honor to come from. But I think his calculations, like a good many of his statements, were not well founded. I think these calculations are deduced from that fertile imagination of his, and do not rest upon true data. He thought he would have a fling at some of the members from Nova Scotia, and directed his artillery at the members from Halifax by endeavoring to show that the railway which was going to be built to Hudson's Bay, as an outlet for the North-West, would seriously interfere with Halifax as a winter port, ignoring the fact that while Halifax was open all the year round, Hudson's Bay was ice bound during the winter. The hon member for Gloucester said the lands, under the Mackenzie Act of 1574, were in blocks along the whole line, and were to be taken along the whole line of fair average quality. If I understand the geography aright, the Province of Ontario extends up to the west of Lake Superior; all the lands north of Lake Superior must belong to that Province, and therefore cannot be given under any contract made with the Government of the Dominion. The lands from Jasper House to Kamloops cannot be pretended to be of fair average value, for the nature of the country is such it must be land totally unfit for cultivation. Therefore no lands could be taken out of those two was not completed till then. I went over it in 1869, three sections. Kamloops, I take it for granted, is in the Province of British Columbia, and no land can be taken in that

Mr. DOULL. If I am wrong I beg to be corrected. The lands would therefore, under the Mackenzie Act, have to be taken out of the prairie section where they were found of fair average value. In this respect, therefore, the present contract is preferable to the terms of the Mackenzie Act. The hon, member for Gloucester went out of his way to attack the National Policy. I thought the question of the price of flour, which he stated had been raised by the National Policy, had been fully settled before, and that no member in this House would contend that any duty we could place on flour would raise its price. With respect to the price of coal, I do not know how the duty has affected the price in Ontario, but I have a statement compiled by a gentleman well acquainted in the coal business, showing the prices of coal in Quebec during the past three years imported from Great Britain, Nova Scotia and the United States. In 1878 we received for the coal we shipped to the Province of Quebec $3.60 per ton, in 1879 $3.50 per ton, and this was the year in which the duty of 50 cents per ton was imposed. In 1880, we got $3.35, showing in 1880 we got for Nova Scotia coal 15 cents less than in 1879 and 25 cents less than in 1878.

Mr. MILLS. Why not repeal the duty?

Mr. DOULL. With respect to the burden that is going to be entailed for the building of this Pacific Railway, I am perfectly satisfied that the country will, in a very short period of time, be recouped for all the money that it is giving under the contract if not by the sale of lands by the increased population that will be added to the Dominion. Had it not been for the means used by the Opposition to defeat the Allan contract. I believe that the road would not only now be built, but the increased population caused by it would now be sufficient to pay the annual interest on the money subsidy by their proportion of the taxes they would have to bear, and so, under the present contract, ten years hence the increased population caused by the building of this road will nearly if not altogether pay the interest of the money we are paying for its construction, and ultimately we will be recouped by the sale of lands, not only for the money we are paying but much more. By the contract we are saved the cost of upholding and running the road, which for many years to come is admitted would be a very heavy loss, at least on the portions of the road that would not be built under the new offer estimated at five or six millions. For these and other reasons I will vote for the ratification of the contract.

Mr. BUNSTER. It has been stated in this House that British Columbia has not been heard from. True, she has not been heard from much; she has been smarting under the injustice done her. The opposition to this Government scheme is designed to defeat the policy of building a national highway across the continent. But, reversing the case, would not the Opposition be right glad to lay such a proposition before the House were they again in power, and take pride and pleasure from the act. I venture to think they would. They had seven years to bring in a similar proposition, during which time the country suffered and the people were dissatisfied, not knowing whether to remain in it or not. Many only remained because they could not dispose of their property. To day, however, they are beginning to feel a sort of confidence that Canada will yet come out all right from the benefits of the National Policy, and the prospect of this Canadian Pacific Railway through the Syndicate that has been formed. However, I do not Mr. DOULL.

Vancouver Island in the scheme. Why the leader of the Government and Minister of Railways should have left out that Island is more than I can account for, when they have paid so much attent on to Manitoba, not one of the Ministers visiting it last season, though four visited Manitoba. The abuse that has been lavishly so heaped on British Columbia has Jone it and Canada no good. Emigrants reading the praises of Kansas and other States, in the speeches of Opposition members, have their thoughts directed towards the States. You never hear Americans saying the lands of the United States are good for nothing, and praising the lands of their neighbors. It has been stated that British Columbia has not been heard from in this matter, but she has taken an active interest in the Syndicate, and at a meeting held in one of the principal cities in Vancouver Island, Nanaimo, this motion was passed: "That this meeting accords the highest praise for the energetic manner in which they have commenced the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway on the main land, and would respectfully urge upon the Dominion Government the obligation and expediency of immediately proceeding with the Island Railway from Nanaimo to Esquimalt, in fulfillment of the Carnarvon terms of 1:74, that construction should not, in justice to this Province, be deferred beyond the spring of 1881; further, that the said railway should be built as a Dominion work, and the public lands should not be given into the possession of a private railway company." The object of this petition is the retention by the Government of the lands which are valuable enough to pay for three Island railways. The American Government capitalists or speculators would build a road all round and through it for the sake of the beds of coal on it. While we talk about building a railroad. the Americans would go in and build it. Though it was agreed ten years ago, when we entered the Confederation, that the railroad should be commenced immediately, it has scarcely yet begun in good faith, according to the terms. How much would the Americans give for British Columbia, for which the Canadians had only given a paltry promise? The Opposition would try to break this bargain for political purposes, but I do not believe that an honest Canadian who cares for his word would do so. If we have men in our Province smart enough to make a fair bargain, and you have not men in the other Provinces honorable enough to carry out that bargain, where does the blame lie? I claim it lies in Canada, where political tricksters who would like to ascend to the Treasury benches, and hoodwink the people at the expense of British Columbia, are to be found. I was proud enough to hear the leader of the Government state that that party respected the country's obligation, but what have we been told in and out of the House? In Montreal, not many weeks ago, I went to a meeting which I suppose was held on consecrated ground, because we were only admitted by tickets, and they rouge or bleu. The intention was to have hole and corner meetings and hoodwink the people. It was there said that British Columbia was an incubus on the Dominion. I was astonished that the member for West Durham should have stated that, but I think that before the Dominion gets through with him, it will find him a greater incubus, because he is deceiving it. He is not using his solid judgment, his great learning and statesmanship, in the right way. He has been doing not only the Dominion a great injustice, but British Columbia, by keeping people out of the country that would have made happy homes in it. Now, I desire to say that British Columbia has suffered more by joining Canada than would be paid for by all that she has ever received from it. Of course her lands have been locked up from settlement, and actual fully endorse the present scheme, because, in my opinion, it does not go far enough. A great injustice has been done British Columbia and Canada in not including shores, when we are branded in the newspapers of the world as being an incubus on the Dominion, as being an inhospitable country and "a sea of mountains," have we not a right to complain. Like Othello, we in British Columbia value our good name, and are entitled to compensation for the aspersions cast on us. Some few evenings ago when I was addressing this House the hon member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) denied that he had made statements which I charged him with making. I will read an extract from that hon gentleman's celebrated Aurora speech to prove my assertion, as I do not say anything in this House which I cannot substantiate. Here is what the hon gentleman said:

"You will have observed that when the Government of which I was then a member undertook to deal with that question, their policy was enunciated in distinct terms to the electors before the late appeal, and that policy was most unequivocally approved, first at the polls and subsequently in Parliament. I see that a deputation has been sent to England; that the people of British Columbia—no, not the people of British Columbia, for I do not believe they as a body sympathize with these extreme views—that the Government of British Columbia has sent a deputation to England urging that some measure should be taken to force the Government and people of this country to do more than has been proposed with reference to that railway. We, last Session, took the unpleasant step of very largely increasing the rate of your taxation in order to provide funds towards the fulfilment, as far as practicable, of this and other obligations imposed on you by the late Government. ** I think the chief advantage the British Columbians will derive from the enterprise will consist in the circulation of money, and the profits of mercantile operations attendant on the construction, and that Canada will be a frightful loser by the affair. Now, even under these circumstances, the fact that the population of British Columbia is only some 10,000 altogether, repre enting, perhaps, not so many householders as the audience I now see before me, ought not to disentitle them to say—'You shall fulfil your bargain or release us from our bonds.' It is their right to take such a course, if they think fit, but I deny that this is any reason why we should plunge this country into ruin by the attempt. I have some reason to believe that these people are sufficiently sensible and reasonable to recognize and act on the truth of the matter, unless, indeed, they are sustained by agitators in this country, who are willing for the sake of creating an embarrassment to the Government, to excite false and delusive hopes among them. The temper of Parliament you may judg

I think, Sir, that that proves the statement I made on the floor of this House, and if the hon gentleman has no more respect for treaty obligations than to say: "Let us break our solemnly-made compact and let British Columbia go; the treaty is not worth the paper it is written upon," he may expect the people of British Columbia to be surprised and grieved at the treatment she receives from the public men of Canada. If that should be the feeling of our public men generally with regard to the Province of British Columbia, the people of that Province would feel that they would rather be out of the Union; but I have confidence that the present Dominion Government will carry out their pledges to the Pacific Province. It has been stated in this House, but stated erroneously, that the country is going to give $50,000,000 to the Syndicate. Is there any gentleman in this Chamber or in this country who would pay even $1 per acre for the lands if the railway was not to be built? It is the railway which will give value to the lands and by the enhanced value of the lands and the increase of settlement will be more than recouped for the expenditure they are called upon to make.

An hon. MEMBER. Settle the lands with Chinese.

Mr. BUNSTER. I think I know more of the Chinese than the hon. gentleman, and I can assure him that the Salubrity and healthfulness of its climate. Now, Mr. Speaker, Chinese question will be the next great question to be considered in this country. The lands will be enhanced in value, so that the Government will in the long run be the gainers; for instead of the lands lying dormant and inhabited only by the buffalo, the elk and the savage, they will be populated with settlers. We should endeavor to develope our country as the Americans have, for their railway has crossed a desert country which has been settled and developed, while our fands are of a far better character. But here is the policy of the leader of the Opposition as proposed in an amendment last Session:

"That all the words after 'That,' to the end of the question, be left out, and the words 'the public interests require that the work of constructing the Pacific Railway in British Columbia should be postponed,' inserted instead thereof."

Mr. BLAKE. Hear hear.

Mr. BUNSTER. That shows the good feeling which the hon, gentleman bears towards British Columbia, and I am not surprised that he now says "hear hear." I have frequently invited the hon, gentleman to come to our Province and see for himself, instead of keeping up a hostile feeling towards it. The hon. Minister of Railways stated at Montreal that the hor. member for West Durham had offered a bait, $750,000 to British Columbia, and I was astonished that the hon. gentleman has not denied it. It seems to me that the American people have too much to say in the management of our affairs. If we would manage our own affairs instead of letting them get the start affairs instead of letting them get the start of us, as they did with regard to the Northern Pacific Railway, it would be much better for us. I wish to point out, however, the effect of the report that the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway was to kill off the Northern Pacific for a time. When the President and Directors of the latter road went to London to float their bonds, the capitalists said: "No; the road will not pay and we are going to support our own." The result was at that time that they were not able to float a dollar of their bonds. But in 1873, when the pre-ent Government was thrown from power, then, through hostility toward the Canadian Pacific Railway by the Government which succeeded them, the Northern Pacific began to pick up again, and they are now prosecuting work vigorously. If our road had been gone on with in 1873, the Northern Pacific would not have been built for twenty years, and we would have had all the carrying trade from the Pacific to the east. The advantage we have in the carrying trade between Asia and Liverpool is something like two days and nine hours, and by reason of this advantage British merchants would patronize our roads rather than the American roads. I will now exhibit to the House a small globe for the purpose of explaining the advantage I have referred to. Hon. gentlemen may laugh as much as they please, but I want to demonstrate to them the advantage British Columbia holds over the other parts of the world. Here we are right in the middle of the world, as far as commerce is concerned. You can stirt here from Vancouver's Island and go to any part of the world you please. You go to England, and you go to one side of the world; you go to Asia, and you go to another side of the world, but at Vancouver Island you are just in the centre of the world. Now the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) never took the trouble to inform himself upon the geography of Vancouver Island, otherwise he would not be so severe towards it. The hon. gentleman thinks that country is very inhospitable. I want to show him one of our little cities that does not look very inhospitable [The hon. gentleman exhibits a plan of the city of Victoria.] You will find just as happy homes in that city as in any other place in the civilized world. I dony that it is an inhospitable country. On the contrary, it is a country of great and varied resources—and a perfect paradise so far as regards the beauty of its scenery and the salubrity and healthfulness of its climate. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is a serious matter for us on Vancouver Island to be left out of the scheme under consideration. I have a resolution on the paper which I intend to move as a substantive motion; I do not intend to move it as an amendment because I would have the Government against it. But I hope when the proper time they have done to Vancouver Island. I cannot see why the Government should have left out that Island in their arrangements with the Syndicate. They evidently do not know the value of the land of that Island, where the most people live, where the largest amount of capital is invested, and where there is the greatest amount of industry of any part of the Province. It is not fair that it should be left out, particularly when it possesses the best harbors on the Pacific coast north of San Francisco, and where Her Majesty's naval authorities have seen fit to make it their head station. It is certainly not to be despised on that account. No place is to be despised where the flag of Britain floats. Her Majesty's squadron anchors in Esquimalt harbor because it is the best harbor on the coast. The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. DeCosmos) has exhibited a map corroborating the contention that the Government is bound to respect the route laid down on that map, and bound to respect the Carnarvon Award which makes Esquimalt the terminus. The late Government, I believe, intended to carry out the Carnarvon Award for the first year or two, until they were badly advised. The hor, member for Lambton transported 5,000 tons of steel rails to our shores with the intention of having that road built. He sent his Finance Minister to England to dispose of Canadian bonds, and mortgaged our country, and mortgaged British Columbia too. And what is the consequence? Some $35,000,000 of bonds were sold at 92 cents on the dollar, and to-day they are worth 104 cents, making a loss to the Dominion of $5,000,000, which would have built two railroads from Nanaimo to Esquimalt, and which would have made up all the difference between the new Syndicate and the old Syndicate. British Columbia would be bad enough off under either Syndicate, but a great deal worse under the new one. If some enterprising and enlightened individual proposed a Syndicate to build a road on Vancouver Island, and if he believed it genuine, I should be inclined to favor it, but there is nothing said about Vancouver Island. Neither have the Government said what they intend to do with the lands on Vancouver Island, which they have reserved and kept in their possession for railway purposes for the last ten years. They have kept back that Province when Manitoba has been going ahead, and hereafter some person may rise in this House and ask how it is that Manitoba is going ahead so fast when British Columbia is falling behind. My answer would be that it was because the lands in our Province had been reserved by the Government They have made no provision for the disposal of the land. They have land agents there, but if a settler applies to the land office he can get no satisfaction whatever. been stated erroneously that we have no good land in British Columbia. I deny it—we have more land in British Columbia than would be required to build the railway. But let them build it where they please, and eventuelly they will build the reilway where the good lands are, from the nature of our climate immigrants will pour into British Columbia. Our cattle winter out without shelter, as they cannot do in Ontario, and that will be a great inducement to the immigrants to go there and raise cattle. Last season we exported more lumber than in any previous year. There are two mills at Burrard Inlet capable of cutting 500,000 feet a day; there is one large mill at Victoria, besides there mils throughout the Province. Then last, but not least, we have our own coal mines, which produce about a thousand tons of coal per day, and when we take into consideration that you have not provided for the construction of the Island railway and thus connecting the Mainland with the Island, we see that you have done a great injustice to the road in supplying the iron horse with fuel. Allow me to tell the Government that they cannot ignore the Carnarvon terms. The Carnarvon terms are in black and white, and when the Local Legislature meet I shall be surprised if they do not pass a resolution and send a delegate te England to see that the terms are carried out Mr. Bunster. But let them build it where they please, and eventually they in their entirety. The Carnarvon terms and the Island Railway are not to be trifled with or sneered at. We know that we have a treaty obligation, and we are bound to stick to it. I will read a little of what Lord Dufferin stated about our country when he visited our shores. I believe three Canadian statesmen have visited British Columbia, and reported upon it, but always adversely to British Columbia; thinking that British Columbia had the best of the bargain, they never took into consideration the fact that the Dominion never paid one dollar for British Columbia. We know that the senior member for Victoria bought British Columbia with the promise to build the railway. I would ask him if he has built that railway? I believed if he had remained in power in 1873, through the fertility of his brain he would have succeeded in building the railway; and since the right hon, gentleman has ascended the throne again, I would like him to explain why he has so neglected his constituency as to leave Vancouver Island out of this contract. When the Dominion left him without his seat, Victoria paid him the handsomest tribute it could by electing him. Has he paid Victoria a handsome tribute by building the road to the Island? I claim that he has not done us justice, but I live in hopes that he will do us justice still. I would like him to explain why the Vancouver Island road was left out of the contract, when the Syndicate people would have had the best of the bargain by undertaking it, as they would have got to the coal beds and the good lands, as well as secured a good harbor? Suppose we adopted the doctrine of the hon. member for West Durham, and built the road to the Rocky Mountains, of what use would it be? What national commerce would it command? What Canadian would feel proud for having broken a solemn contract with British Columbia? On the contrary, every patriotic Canadian will feel proud when the states-men of our country will vindicate the credit of the country by providing for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway from Winnipeg to Esquimalt. A great deal of the hard feeling in British Columbia was owing to what is called the "Pacific Scandal." We resented the bad faith exhibited by the late Government and the abuse we received from some members of that Government, who called our country an inhospitable country, a sea of mountains, and an incubus on this great Dominion. We sent to England and got the Carnarvon award in 1874. But the late Government did not carry it out. Hence they sent the Governor General out there. To do what? To hoodwink and soft-soap us; but they could not do that. Of the speech delivered by Lord Dufferin at Victoria I will read a few extracts:

"His Excellency has intimated, before proceeding on his voyage to the North from Victoria, that on his return he would meet the various committees who had attended him with addresses, and convey the impressions formed in his mind by the tour through the Province. As it was generally expected he would speak fully on the railway matter, and dint of considerable exertion, I have traversed the entire coast of British Columbia from its southern extremity to Alaska. I have penetrated to the head of Bute Inlet. I have examined the Seymour Narrows, and the other channels which intervene between the head of Bute Inlet and Vancouver Island."

I will not detain the House by reading the whole of the speech. I merely want to show the hon. member for West Durham that our country is not so inhospitable as it is reported to be:

"Of course, I well understand that the gravamen of the charge agains the Canadian Government is that it has failed to fulfil its treaty engagements. Those engagements were embodied in a solemn agreement which the Canadian Government is that it has failed to runn us weary engagements. Those engagements were embodied in a solemn agreement which was ratified by the respective legislatures of the contracting parties, who were at the time perfectly independent of each other, and I admit they thus acquired all the characteristics of an international treaty. The terms of that treaty were (to omit the minor items) that Canada undertook to secure, within two years from the date of Union, the simultaneous commencement at either end of a railway which was to connect the seaboard of British Columbia with the railway system of the Dominion, and that such railway should be completed within ten years from the date of Union in 1871. We are now in 1876, five years have elapsed, and the work of construction even at one end can be said to have only just begun. Undoubtedly, under these circumstances, every one must allow that Canada has failed to fulfil her treaty obligations towards this province, but unfortunately Canada has been accused not only of failing to accomplish her undertakings, but of what is a very different thing—a wilful breach of faith in having neglected to do so."

He then goes on to describe the treatment we have received at the hands of Canada:

"It is quite true, in what I must admit to be a most generous spirit, you intimated in various ways that you did not desire to hold Canada too strictly to the letter of her engagements as to time. Your expectations in this respect were by your late Lieutenant-Governor, Mr. Trutch, very fairly and explicitly, though a very unfair use has been made of his words, and I have no doubt that if unforseen circumstances had not intervened fairly and explicitly, though a very unfair use has been made of his words, and I have no doubt that if unforseen circumstances had not intervened you would have exhibited as much patience as could have been expected of you. But a serious crisis supervened in the political career of Canada. Sir John A. Macdonald resigned office, and Mr. Mackenzie acceded to power, and to all the responsibilities incurred by Canada in respect to you and your Province. Now it is asserted, and I imagine with truth, that Mr. Mackenzie and his political friends had always been opposed to many portions of Canada's bargain with British Columbia. It therefore came to be considered in this Province that the new Government was an enemy to the Pacific Railway. But I believe this to have been, and to be, a complete misapprehension. I believe the Pacific Railway has no better friend in Canada than Mr. Mackenzie, and that he was only opposed to the time terms in the bargain, because he believed them impossible of accomplishment, and that a conscientious endeavor to fulfil them would unnecessarily ruinously increase the financial expenditure of the country, and in both these opinions Mr. Mackenzie was undoubtedly right. With the experience we now possess, and of course it is easy to be wise after the event, no one would dream of saying that the railway could have been surveyed, located, and built within the period named, or that a company who might undertake to build the line within that period would not have required double and treble the bonus that would have been sufficient had construction been arranged for at a more leisurely rate; but surely it would be both ungenerous and unreasonable for British Columbia to extention are hostile feelings towards. Mr. Mackenzie nave been sumelent had construction been arranged for at a more leisurely rate; but surely it would be both ungenerous and unreasonable for British Columbia to entertain any hostile feelings towards Mr. Mackenzie on this account, nor is he to be blamed, in my opinion, if on entering office in so unexpected a manner he took time to consider the course which he would pursue in regard to his mode of dealing with a question of such enormous importance."

These hon, gentlemen sent out Mr. Edgar to buy us off for $750,000. We do not make contracts to compromise them afterwards. Some of our miners have taken that much gold out of some of the "seas of mountains" that have been spoken of and carried it back to Ontario. Lord Dufferin continued:

"The Province agreed to the Pacific Railway being completed in sixteen years from 1874, and to its being begun 'as soon as the surveys shall have been completed, instead of a fixed date, while the Dominion Government undertook to construct at once a railway from Esquimalt to Nanaimo, to hurry forward the surveys with the utmost possible despatch and as soon as construction should have begun, to spend two millions a year in the prosecution of the work. I find that in this part of the world these arrangements have come to be known as the 'Carnarvon Terms.' It is a very convenient designation, and I am quite content to adopt it on condition, namely, that Lord Carnarvon is not to be sæddled with any original responsibility."

Was Lord Carnarvon not to be saddled with the original responsibility? He certainly undertook it, and was very glad to try and adjust the differences, which were carried to the foot of the Throne. He saw plainly we had a good case, or he would not have undertaken the arbitration. Our people and the Canadian Government accepted his award.

but the latter did not carry it out. They said: British Columbia go, rather than we shall carry it out." That was not treating British Columbia properly. British Columbia, as I said before, was not in the Union, what would Canada be to-day? She would be nothing. There is a future before her now. Seven or eight years ago Manitoba was not thought much of, but last year I find that four Ministers were only too glad to visit that Province on a tour of inspection and observation. They never thought, however, of coming to British Columbia. I am satisfied if they had they would have quite a different impression of the country from what they have to-day. We have only had the pleasure of receiving one Minister, the Minister of Public Works—that was in 1871, I think—but he is slow about returning. There are several public works there that require his attention; and if he were to pay us a visit, I am satisfied the Vancouver Island Railway would receive more attention than it does at present. If the Leader of the Government had forced this matter through the House instead of waiting for weeks, hon, members would have been able to have returned home much sooner.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am afraid I would have been so hospitably treated I would never have got back again.

Mr. BUNSTER. If the right hon, gentleman thinks he would be inhospitably treated, he is laboring under a great error.

Sir OHN A. MACDONALD. Idid not say inhospitably, said hospitably.

Mr. BUNSTER. I apologize; the word "inhospitable" is so often sounded in my cars that I cannot forget it. If the leader of the Opposition does justice to Vancouver Island I am satisfied he will be hospitably received. There are other petitions from Vancouver Island, principally from my constituents, endorsing the resolutions passed in Victoria. These were passed because the people felt an injustice had been done to the Island; and for fear that I might be accused of not having done justice to the whole of the resolutions, I will read the resolutions pas ed at a public meeting at Victoria:

"That while several of the eastern Provinces of the Dominion have obtained better terms than those under which they confederated, the western Province of British Columbia, under the Carnarvon settlement (in the language of Lord Carnarvon) 'will receive considerably less than was promised to her as the condition of entering the Dominion."

"The first conditions of the said settlement, made in 1874, was the construction of the railway from Esquimalt to Nanamio.

"That al hough the people of this Province were justified in expecting the commencement of the Esquimalt-Nanamion Railway in 1875, their generous recognition of the embarrassed condition of the Dominion induced them for years to refrain from emphatically insisting upon the immediate construction of the railway.

"That Lord Dufferin, in his official capacity of Governor General of the construction of the railway.

"That Lord Dufferin, in his official capacity of Governor General of the Dominion of Canada, in his speech delivered at Government House, Victoria, September 20th, 1876, pledged his word for the good faith of the Dominion to British Columbia, in the following impressive language: 'I would sooner,' said his Lordship, 'cut my right hand off than utter a single word that I do not know to be absolute truth.

* Every single item of the Carnarvon terms is at this moment in the course of fulfillment."

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BUNSTER. Hon. members say, "hear, hear;" but those terms have not been carried out, either by the late or the present Government. The resolution proceeds:

"That after five years of patient waiting, the only ac's of the Dominion in 1880 at all bearing upon the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway, have been the application to the Provincial Government for the conveyance to the Dominion of an additional twenty-mile belt of land between Esquimalt and Nanaimo, and the removal of the steel rails purchased for the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway from Nanaimo to near Yale, on the Fraser River, for the use of the Emory Par and Savona Ferry section of the Canadian Pacific Railway on the mainland."

I question very much if the Government of the day have given that serious attention which they should have done in respect to the twenty-mile belt which has been reserved since 1873 at their request, some of which are worth $1,000

There is no poor land between Esquimalt and Nanaimo which would not be useful for pastoral purposes, and which was not worth more than $1 per acro, or more than the prairie lands, because the railway would soon bring them into the market. It goes on:

"That it is believed throughout the Dominion that arrangements have been recently made with a Syndicate of capitalists for the construction of the Canadian Pacific railroad by 1890, which includes about 500 miles of railway known as the Lake Superior section, and includes the 70 miles of railway between Esquimalt and Nanaimo.

"That under the Carnavon settlement the first portion of railway to be built was the Esquimalt and Nanaimo railway and the last the Lake Superior section, which was postponed indefinitely until after the completion by 1890 of the railway between the Pacific seaboard and Lake

That it is evident that the Dominion of Canada has not kept faith with British Colambia in carrying out its railway obligations.

"That the inducement to British Columbia to confederate with the Dominion of Canada was the railway agreement which held out the prospect of rapidly opening up, settling and developing different portions of this Province.

"That, in consequence of the default of the Dominion, Confederation has inflicted irreparable injury upon Vancouver Island, a most important portion of British Columbia. So far from inducing settlement it has prevented it. From the 7th June, 1873 until now a belt of land along the east coast of Vancouver Island, over 180 miles in length by 20 miles in breadth, has been kept locked up by the Dominion, so that thousands who intended to settle in this valuable portion of the Province have been forced across the boundary into Washington Territory which, in consequence, has largely increased in population since last census greatly at the expense of British Columbia.

"That although under the terms of Union British Columbia was allowed to retain her own tariff until the date fixed for the completion of the Can-That, in consequence of the default of the Dominion, Confederation has to retain her own tariff until the date fixed for the completion of the Canto retain her own tariff until the date fixed for the completion of the Canadian Pacific Railway, she believing in the good faith of the Dominion as regards its railway obligations, accepted the Dominion Tariff. By this generous act the amount of revenue paid by British Columbia to the Dominion in British Columbia much of which has been of no benefit to this Province), so that British Columbia has been a financial aid and not a burden to the Dominion.

"That in 1874, when the Carnarvon settlement was made, the customs duties collected in British Columbia amounted to 305,436 whilst in 1879 $517,261 were collected, although the railway construction had not been commenced in the Province.

"That since Confederation over $50,000,000 have been borrowed by the

"That since Confederation over $50,000,000 have been borrowed by the Dominion for public works and other purposes, and although British Columbia has been made to pay more in proportion than her fair share of interest thereon, no portion of the $50,000,000 has been expended by the Dominion in British Colombia in carrying out the Carnarvon terms.

"That the Dominion tariff, however beneficial it may be to the Eastern Provinces, is an injury to British Columbia, as it weighs heavily on the great producing interests of the Province and has destroyed the large trade previously done by Victoria in British goods with the adjoining States and territories of the United States, and has failed to create or encourage any new industry.

"That the only compensation possible for the many drawbacks of Confederation is, railway construction by the Dominion under the conditions of the Carnarvon settlement, and unless the Dominion is prepared to carry out the railway obligations with British Columbia. the Province would benefit largely by being placed in the same position to the British Crown as Newfoundland now occupies, having full control of her own resources and developments.

The whole position has been reversed. The road from Esquimalt to Nanaimo, which was to be built first, is not even included in the Pacific Railway contract. Some very bad advice has been given to the Government about the Esquimalt and Nausimo road. If the Government had announced they were not going to build it, and had adopted the declaration of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake): "Let Vancouver Island go," and had said they would repay damage done, cur people would probably have taken it into consideration. But we have such faith in the Government that we believe they will do us justice. These resolutions I have read were adopted by the people of that section, because they believed injustice had been done them. Both Victoria and Nanaimo, the two principal cities of the Island, had adopted them, and they had also been passed by Sandwich and Cowichan, all of which were entrusted to me to represent to the Government. And I hope the Government will give their favorable consideration, and place the road in such a shape that it can be pushed to completion. I have seen a statement of facts and figures from a responsible engineer in the Dominion, showing the difference between the proposition made by the late Government to build the road-I mean the road across the continentand that of the present Government. The proposal of the Mackenzie Government was for $104,000,000, that of the present Government for $78,000,000, showing a saving of $26,000,000, a very small portion of which would build the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway. I have some opinions here of the press, copied into our own papers, and setting forth the injustice done to Vancouver Island. Far different is the tone of the Montreal Gazette and the Toronto Mail. The first-named journal says:

"The resolutions (of the Victoria meeting) undoubtedly make out a very strong case, and they appeal, therefore, with much force to the honor and good faith of the Dominion at large. They afford another illustration of the unfortunate legacy which Mr. Mackenzie's bungling has brought upon the country. The Carnarvon terms are what are insisted upon. These terms were agreed to by Mr. Mackenzie, and when; owing to the vote in the Senate, he was unable to carry out that portion of them involving the construction of the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway, he offered three-quarters of a million dollars as compensation to the Island for its disappointment, thus acknowledging in the most formal the Island for its disappointment, thus acknowledging in the most formal manner, the claim which the island had to the construction of the railway.

My hon, friend beside me asks what the Island is good for? The Island is good for a great deal more than he has any idea of; but we have treaty obligations with the Government to appeal to. But taking it for granted that the Island is good for nothing, and that the railroad would not pay, is that any reason why the railroad should not be built? No. Why is it that British statesmen have always got on so, much better than any others, and that England is to-day the "pawn-shop" of the world? Because she has always carried out her obligations. That is why she commands the commerce of the world. There is no reason why Canada should not similarly carry out her obligations with British Columbia. I will read the instructions that Mr. Mackenzie gave Mr. Edgar when he sent him as agent to British Columbia:

" Mr. Mackenzie to Mr. Edgar.

"My Dear Sir,—In your conversations with leading men in and out of the Government. in Columbia, it will be well to let them understand that in proposing to take longer time than is provided in constructing the railway, we are actuated solely by an urgent necessity. That we are as anxious as possible to reach the object sought by all—the early construction of the possible to reach the object sought by all—the early construction of the possible to reach the object sought by all—the early construction of the object sought by all the object sought tion of the road.

"It will he well not to confine yourself to the vicinity of the Government offices or Victoria, but to cross to the mainland to meet with the people at Westminster and other towns and villages on the lower reaches of the Fraser.

"It may be that you will find there is a disposition manifested to negotiate at Ottawa, in which case you will advise us of the existence of such a desire.

"You will take special care not to admit in any way that we are bound to build the railway to Esquimalt, or any other place on the Island; and while you do 1 ot at all threaten not to build there, to let them understand that this is wholly and purely a concession, and that its construction must be contingent on a reasonable course being pursued regarding other parts of the scheme.'

I question very much if he should have given any such instruction to that agent, or have offered $750,000 to that Province for the surrender of her rights. He had no authority from Parliament to tamper with treaty obligations and offer that amount to escape them. I will read some remarks upon the Union Pacific Railroad from Crofatt's "New Overland Tourist," as follows: —

"Though but little faith was at first felt in the successful completion of this great railway, no one, at the present day, can fail to appreciate the enterprise which characterized the progress and final completion of this road , its immense value to the Government, our own people, and the

"By the Act of 1862, the time for the completion of the road was specified. The utmost limit was July 1, 1870.

specified. The utmost limit was July 1, 187o.

"The first contract for construction was made in August, 1863, but various conflicting interests connected with the location of the line delayed its progress, and it was not until the 5th day of November, 1865, that the ceremony of breaking ground was enacted at a point on the Missouri kiver, near Omaha, Neb.

"the enthusiast, Mr. Irain, in his speech on the occasion of breaking ground, said the road would be completed in five years. Old Fogy could not yet understand Young America, and, as usual, he was ridiculed for the remark, classed as a dreamer and visionary enthusiast; the greater portion of the people believing that the limited time would find the road unfinished. But it was completed in three years, six months, and ten days."

Now let us hope the same energy and spirit of progress will be manifested by the people of Canada in building our road across the continent in half the time fixed for it. The same authority goes on to say:

"Most Americans are familiar with the history of the road, yet but few are aware of the vast amount of labor performed in obtaining the material with which to construct the first portion. There was no rail-road nearer Omaha than 150 miles eastward, and over this space all the road nearer Omana than 100 miles eastward, and over this space all the material purchased in the eastern cities had to be transported by freight-teams at ruinous prices. The laborers were, in most cases, transported to the railroad by the same route and means. Even the engine, of 70 horse power, which drives the machinery at the company's works at Omana, was conveyed in wagons from Des Moines, lowa, that being the

Omana, was conveyed in wagons from Des Moines, lowa, that being the only available means of transportation at the time.

"For five hundred miles west of Omaha, the country was bare ef lumber save a limited supply of cottonwood on the islands in and along the Platte River, wholly unfit for railroad purposes. East of the river, the same aspect was presented, so that the company were compelled to purchase ties cut in Michigan, Pennsylvania and New York, which cost, delivered at Omaha, $2,50 per tie."

Now the ties upon our road, instead of costing $250 per tie will cost not more than 25 cents a tie-121 cents as the original cost, and the balance for transportation. This, I maintain, is a most important element in the construction of a road through a "sea of mountains" as it has been called. When you consider the great natural advantages which our road will have over the American road in this and other respects, I think you will come to the conclusion, that instead of one road burdening the country, it will be the means of making it the great country it is destined to be. Already an impetus has been given to trade in this country by the construction of the road, and in the long run the increase in trade will more than pay for building it. The Government will never feel that they have paid out a dollar, for the $25,000,000 will roll into the Custom House over and over again, in the shape of duties, before the road is completed. Under the National Policy which the hon. Finance Minister has brought down, every man who buys a barrel of sugar will have to pay so much into the Public Treasury, so with every man who buys a blanket, so with every man who buys a gallon of spirits, notwithstanding the predilections of the hon. Finance Minister. All this which we have heard about the $25,000,000 and the 25,000,000 acres of land is more political buncombe, contrary to the spirit of the statesmen and the young Canadians of the day. Every young Canadian will feel proud of what the right hon. member for Victoria (Sir John A Macdonald) has done for the country. Of course he left Victoria out in the cold, but if he is not going to bring her in the people have their remedy, and they will make their appeal with success if their wants are not attended to on the floor of this House. They will say to their representatives: "Unless you do your duty in this matter, you cannot come back." There is another matter to which I shall advert briefly. Some years ago I brought up a resolution before this House to debar Chinamen from participating in the benefits of constructing this road across the continent. If we had known when we joined the Union that these people were to receive such benefits from the building of this railway we would have had a clause inserted in the articles of Confederation excluding them from any benefits arising from the construction of the road and that for more reasons than one. The principal reason is that they are not settlers on the soil; that they do not populate our country, and that white labor deteriorates by working alongside Chinamen. I hope therefore the Government will see to it that they will be prohibited from working on the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. They will thus be able to sell the lands for a great deal more money. The question of the Chinese ever getting hold of portions of our domain will yet be a serious one, if the evil is not promptly our domain will yet be a serious one, if the evil is not promptly "Provided always that the President of the Company and a majority repressed at its inception, and one may yet contemplate the of the Directors reside in Canada and are subjects of Her Majesty."

sight of Chinamen working as servants for whitemen. I see that a new treaty has been made between the United States and China, by which China gives to the American Government the right to exclude these people from United States territory, and I think our Government should imitate the example of their neighbors in that respect, and thus do justice to British Columbia and the Dominion. Having a rather friendly feeling towards my co-representative from British Columbia, the member for Victoria (Sir John A. Macdonald) I would hope that that hon, gentleman would do us justice in respect to the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Branch. If he does not I fear I shall have to tell his constituents when I return to British Columbia.

Mr. FISET. At this advanced stage of the discussion, I admit that it is fatiguing for this honorable House to be obliged to listen to more speeches, especially when those speeches are not to throw any new light on the contract and the amendment now submitted. But some of our hon. opponents, especially from the Province of Quebec, represent us under such false colors, with ideas so far removed from those we really entertain; that we are obliged to defend ourselves, unless we are willing to admit by our silence that what they said is true. Thus, from the fact that we demand that the offers of the new Syndicate should be taken into consideration, these gentlemen conclude that we are opposed to the construction of the entire line of the Pacific Railway, that we want to favor American commerce at the expense of Canadian commerce, that we are wanting in patriotism, and all that because the new company offers to construct either the Sault Ste. Marie Branch or the line to the north of Lake Superior, at the option of the Government. Can they thus act towards us in good faith? It is more than doubtful. It is true that we are in favor of the Sault Ste. Marie Branch. Why? Because, by means of this branch, in three years we will have direct communication with the North-West by availing ourselves of the navigation on Lake Superior; because in three years we will be able to divert to the Canadian roads, the commerce of the western States; because in three years our immigrants could go to the fertile plains of the west by an all-Canadian route, seei g that the immigrants only arrive during the season of navigation. Such are the principal reasons that induce us to ask for the immediate construction of the Sault Ste. Marie Branch. Is it thence to be concluded that we are opposed to the building of the line to the north of Lake Superior? No; but seeing that the building of this line will take ten years, it is whilet it is being built that we want the Sault Ste. Marie Branch. And which of the two political parties is now wanting in patriotism? Is it the party that wishes to draw American commerce here in three years, or is it the party that wants to allow the Americans to control the trade of the Canadian North-West during ten years? Evidently on this occasion we are more patriotic than our opponents; and that is not all. In the preamble of the Bill passed on the 14th of June, 1872, to incorporate the Intercolonial Railway Company of Canada, we read as follows: - 👡

"And whereas it is highly expedient that a great national inter-oceanic railway, aided and subsidized by Parliament, should be managed, controlled and worked in the interest of the Dominion, and as far as possible by persons who are residents of Canada and subjects of Her Majesty."

A little further on, at clause 17, we again read:

"The election of Directors shall be by ballot, and the persons so elected shall form the Board of Directors; provided that the President of the Company and a majority of the Directors shall reside in Canada and be subjects of Her Majesty."

Moreover, in the Act of incorporation of the Canada Pacific Railway Company, assented to on the 14th June, 1872, we find the same words:

What do we see to day? On the one hand there is a Syndicate composed of honorable men, I have no doubt, but where are they from? Who are they? Are they persons residing in Canada? Are they subjects of Her Majesty? Some are Canadians, some are Americans, others are English, others French, and the rest? Others could not be found; but if Germans, Italians, Spanish, Russians, Chinese had presented themselves, provided they had funds, they would have been accepted. This Syndicate is the Government's Syndicate: it is the Syndicate of the same men who, in the month of June, 1872, said: "That this inter-ocean railway should be managed, controlled and worked as much as possible by persons residing in Canada and subjects of Her Majesty, the President of which Company and a majority of the Directors should reside in Canada and be subjects of Her Majesty.' On the other hand, here is a new Syndicate, composed like the first, of honorable men; but on examining it closer, we are inclined to ask whether it is not the Syndicate that the Government wanted in 1872. Indeed, all the members of this second Syndicate reside in Canada and are subjects of Her Why then refuse to take their offer into consideration? That is what we will look into further on. But we see that the patriotism of hon. Ministers in 1872 is quite different from the patriotism of to-day. In 1872 this road was only to be built by a Canadian company; to-day they want men of all nations, and the Syndicate is to have the preference over an exclusively Canadian company, the members of which are subjects of Her Majesty. Evidently, Sir, if we take the same ground that our opponents take, it is they who are wanting in patriotism and not us, who are fighting for the true interest of the people. Why, then, do they endeavor to represent us as enemies of the public welfare, I will not say of the Church, although our opponents have found the means of bringing in the New Brunswick School question into this debate. Why do they try to make the country believe that we are in favor of American interests, rather than in favor of tnose of Canada, when the contrary is the case? We admire the Americans, as do all the nations of the world, but not to the extent of adopting their policy, as our opponents have done, and calling it "national." I have just stated, Sir, that the Government refuses to take the offer of the new Syndicate into consideration; and what is the reason of this refusal? Hon. members opposite pretend that this offer comes too late; that it should have been made at the time that the former Syndicate's offer was made; that, coming so late, it cannot be serious; that it is in order to embarrass the Government, &c. Let us see whether these objections are well grounded. The offer of the new Syndicate comes too late. Could it come sooner? Three hon. Ministers went to England; before they started did they make known the object of their voyage? Did they ask for tenders for the construction of part or the whole of the Canadian Pacific Railway? No. If the Government wanted to have tenders for the construction of the road, was it not their duty to ask for them before going to England? And can we believe, for instance, that in the call for tenders it had been stated that the Government would undertake to build the portions of the road under contract, and that no duties would be levied on the materials entering into the construc. Before everything they are business men; they have not tion of the road; can we believe, I say, that the Government undertaken to carry out this contract merely to please the would not have received tenders more advantageous, Government, but in order to make money. Finding a than the terms entered into with the Syndicate? my part, I have no doubt about the matter, and the new company that has just been formed is, for me, the strongest proof of it. After that, it is difficult to pity those who come and tell us: "We would have preferred not to see such and such clauses in the contract, but we were not the only contracting parties." be because they expect to realize even greater profits, and But, far from asking for tenders, the Government endeavor in the space of a few hours, of a few days, the Government

Mr. FISET.

We learn that the contract has been given for $25,000,000 and 25,000,000 acres of land, and until the 10th December, 1880, we are entirely ignorant of the sixty-three clauses that the contract contains, and which, besides the $25,000,000 and 25,000,000 acres of land, grant to the Syndicate $28,000,000 in work, without mentioning the extraordinary privileges that are given to the Company. Why this silence, why this secrecy? If the contract was good, you should not have feared to make it known; it was, therefore, because it was bad that you kept it secret. And it is after having arranged everything in the dark, after having prevented by this means any other company from making any offer whatever, what do they tell us: It is too late to receive this new tender, when Parliament has not yet come to a decision, and they add that, being so late, it cannot be relious. On hearing hon. gentlemen opposite speak thus, I asked myself whether these hon. members could be serious themselves in putting forth such an opinion, and I humbly admit that with respect to this question I have doubts as to their sincerity. What! here is a company that deposits $1,300,000 as security for their tender, and hon, gentlemen pretend to say that this tender is not serious? The respectability of these persons, their pecuniary resources, all that is admitted; their respectability is unquestionable, their pecuniary means exceed those of the first Syndicate. What more is required? No, it is not the tender that is not serious, but those who pretend that it is not are not serious. It is said that this offer is made merely to embarrass the Government. I admit that such a tender, so much better than the first Syndicate's offer, made in good faith by honorable and wealthy men capable of carrying out the undertaking-I admit that such a tender is not calculated to put the Government on a bed of roses, especially since the Government has so awkwardly committed themselves by accepting the extraordinary contract that we have been discussing since the beginning of the Session. It is not now, however, that the Government will find themselves the most embarrassed; their followers are well trained and they will go where their leader takes them. I do not say that as a reproach; we have not the right to reproach them with their conduct; everybody is free, thanks to our constitution; everybody is free to quote as he pleases; but we can say that on our side that partizanship never prevailed over the interests of the country. I very much doubt whether, on the present occasion, our hon. opponents can say as much. is when an account will have to be rendered to the country for the fifteen or twenty millions that the Government will have squandered, millions that they might have saved, but which they preferred to sacrifice as a free gift to their Syndicate—it is then that the embarrassment will be at its height, and that hon. gentleman will have to go farther than British Columbia to get elected. Yes, Sir; by refusing to take into consideration the offer of the new Syndicate, the Government refuse thereby to save the country a sum of at least fifteen millions. And in what a singular position will the Government find themselves if, on the day following the vote ratifying the contract passed with the first Syndicate, the latter were to accept from the second Syndicate the offer that the Government now refuses. perfectly responsible company ready to take the contract, by leaving them a net profit of over $15,000,000, and that without their having done a stroke of work, is it not natural to suppose that the first Syndicate will accept the new company's offer? There is nothing in the contract to prevent them from doing it. If they do not accept it it will to keep the transaction in the profoundest secrecy. Hon. will have run the risk of making the country lose this Ministers come back, and what news do they bring us? enormous amount, and of seeing the Company whose offer was refused taking possession of the contract entered into with the first Syndicate. As I said in the beginning, I will not discuss at length the question now before us. I admit that this honorable House must be tired of the long speeches that have been made upon this subject, which I consider exhausted. For my part, I will content myself with these few remarks, and I resume my seat saying that I will vote for the amendment moved by the hon. leader of the Opposition.

Mr. McINNES. Mr. Speaker, I look upon the question before the House as one of the greatest importance to this Dominion that has occupied the attention of Parliament for the last ten years, or that is likely to engage the attention of Parliament or the people of this country for many years to come. The people have pronounced upon it in the general elections of 1872, 1874 and 1878, and upon each of those occasions the verdict has been in favor of the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The Bill now before the House providing for the construction of this road by a Syndicate has been already so exhaustively discussed that I shall not dwell upon it, for there is scarcely a school-boy throughout the country who is not more or less familiar with this question. I shall confine myself chiefly to an endeavor to show the House and the country that British Columbia is not the inhospitable country, the incubus and the excrescence that gentlemen on the Opposition benches in this House have described it. I shall endeavor to show that British Columbia has contributed more to the revenue of Canada then she has drawn from it. I shall not draw upon my imagination but shall gives figures from the Public Accounts and the report of the Customs Department. In order to make the comparison I desire, I shall have to make an estimate of the existing population of the several Provinces. I will give Ontario a population of 2,000,000, Quebec 1,500,000, Nova Scotia 400,000, New Brunswick 350,000, Prince Edward Island 125,000, Manitoba 60,000, and British Columbia 25,000, making in all 4,460,000, and I believe have every reason to  $_{ m the}$ forthcoming census will show our population to exceed that number. You will observe that I credit British Columbia with a population double that which the hon, leader of the Opposition estimated it in that extraordinary speech that he delivered here last year; extraordinary for its length; extraordinary for its special pleading, from beginning to end; and extraordinary for its lack of patriotism. He only gave us 10,000, or 12,000 of population, but I will estimate it at double that number, in order to make his case better, and mine worse. I will take the Customs returns as shown in the report of 1879. I am sorry I have not a later one, because it would show a much larger increase in the revenue of British Columbia. In that year Ontario imported \$34,260,205 worth of goods free and dutiable, upon which she paid \$4,955,476. British Columbia, with her population of 25,000, imported free and dutiable goods to the amount of \$2,476,933, upon which she paid Customs duty to the amount of \$516,216, I may here remark that for the year ending 30th of June, 1880, she paid \$521,000; and for the year ending 30th of last month, she paid \$554,773. I find that last December alone the port of Victoria collected no less than \$50,317.57, or \$20,000 more than the corresponding month of 1879. It will, therefore, be seen that Ontario, with her population eighty times that of British Columbia, imported not quite fourteen times more dutiable and free goods than British Columbia, and paid only nine and one-half times more than British Columbia in revenues; or, to put it in another form, British Columbia paid in Custom duties one dollar for every \$9.75 that Ontario paid. I find that the Province of Quebe: imported the same year \$29,172,722 worth of goods, upon which she paid duties to the amount \$4,733,2.9. She imported not quite the eleven and onehalf time as British Columbia, and paid only nine times as much revenue as British Columbia; or to be strictly accurate for every dollar that British Columbia paid Quebec only paid \$9.55. Nova Scotia with her population of 400,000, sixteen times that of British Columbia, imported merchandizes to the amount of \$6,828,733, upon which she paid duties to the amount of \$1,183,492, or not quite three times as much as British Columbia imported, and paid only \$2.75 for every dollar that British Columbia paid into the Treasury of Canada. New Brunswick, with a population of 350,000, or fourteen times greater than British Columbia, imported to the amount of \$5,370,022, upon which she paid duties to the amount of \$,044,807. She imported only twice as much as British Columbia and paid only \$2.03 for every dollar paid by British Columbia. Prince Edward Island, with a population of 125,000, or five times greater than that of British Columbia imported goods to the mount of \$910,987, upon which she paid duty to the amount of \$206,445. She imported only a little over one-third as much as British Columbia with a population of only 25,000, and only paid one dollar for every \$2.50 that British Columbia paid into the Treasury of Canada. With a population of 60,000 or 70,000, three times greater than that of British Columbia, Manitoba imported in the same year \$1,126,334 worth of goods, or considerably less than one-half of the amount imported by British Columbia, and only paid \$274,235 in Customs duties. British Columbia it will be seen, imported nearly double the amount of goods and paid more than twice the amount of revenue paid by Manitoba and Prince Edward Island together, with a combined population of nearly 200,000. Some hon, gentlemen may wonder at these statements, but if they turn to the Public Accounts or the Trade Returns. they will find that they are strictly correct. It will, therefore, be seen that of the \$80,345,608 worth of goods imported into Canada during the year, British Columbia imported \$2,476,900 worth or within a fraction of  $\frac{1}{84}$ th of the whole; of the \$12,939,540 in Customs duties collected in the ontire Dominion, British Columbia paid within a fraction of  $\frac{1}{26}$ th of the whole. British Columbia, with her 25,000 people, or  $\frac{1}{126}$  of the entire population of Canada, paid \$1 for every \$26 paid by the entire Dominion. The people of British Columbia pay per capita no less than \$20, whereas the balance of the country pays only a little over \$3 per capita. Or, to put it in a different form, one British Columbian is worth to the Dominion exchequer six Prince Edward Islanders, six Nova Scotians, six Quebecers, or six Ontarians—on the average six taxpayers in any of the Eastern Provinces. It such is the case, with a population of only 25.000, how much more might we not reasonably expect to pay into the treasury of Canada with the Canadian Pacific Railway to attract a large population to develope the untold resources of that Province. The Pacific Province with a population of 100,000,—which I do not think is an extravagant estimate of the population we are likely to have by 1891, when the Pacific Railway is built, -British Columbia will pay, even if she does not pay at a ratio equal to what she does now, at least from \$1,000,000 and \$1,250,000 of customs and excise duties a year. I shall carry this illustration a little further, and give the total amount of goods that have been imported and the duties paid thereon since 1871, when British Columbia became part of the Dominion:

66	1873	2,076,476	302.147
"	1874		336,494
44	1875		413,991
"	1876	2,914,975	483,384
	1877	2,166,793	40 ,520
46	1878	2,276,073	426,125
"	1879	2,476,903	516,261
44	1880	3,172,000	521,076
	Total	$21,132,217	$3,749,394

Although this appears to show our imports to be very large, our exports from 1858, when the country was first settled, have exceeded our exports by from a quarter to a half million. In 1879 British Columbia imported six times more per capita than Prince Edward Island, above three times per capita more than Ontario, Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, and considerably above twice per capita more then Quebec or Manitoba. Let us see what our exports have been as compared to the other Provinces. they were five times more per capita than those of Ontario or Manitoba, and more than three times those of Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. As far as the excise duties are concerned, it is true we do not pay in the same proportion, yet we paid more in 1879 than either Nova Scotia or Prince Edward Island. Hon. gentlemen say, and very naturally, while you have paid into the Dominion Treasury nearly $4,000,000, or over $4,000,000, including this last year, you have extracted from it a good deal more than that. I am at a loss to know in what way British Columbia has taken within 50 per cent. of the amount she has paid into the Treasury out of it -unless you charge the surveys of the Canadian Pacific her-and certainly I do not think there is an hon. gentleman who would be so unfair as to make that charge solely against British Columbia I do not wish to boast of the vast resources and the great interest to the Dominion of British Columbia being a part of it, as some others that preceded me have done, but it will be admitted that the Dominion can never be a perfect and consolidated nation unless it has an outlet and an inlet on the Pacific as well as on the Atlantic. contend, therefore, that the $2,000,000 for surveys in British Columbia are certainly not a just and fair charge to be made against that Province, and when you leave that out, there is nothing but a few public buildings to represent the expenditure of the Dominion there. When British Columbia became part of the Dominion in 1871, our tariff was only 12½ per cent. In the agreement with British Columbia it was left conditional with her to retain this tariff or adopt that of Canada. The Legislature of British Columbia, having confidence in the faith, integrity and ability of Canada to fulfil her obligations and to show her willingness to bear a share of the extra taxation necessary, went to work and adopted the Canadian tariff. In the Sessional Papers of 1871, the liabilities of Canada was $115,492,000 which increased in nine years-1880 - to $183,774,753, an increase of not less than $68,482,000, and the net debt from $77,706,517 in 1871, to $147,484,070 in 1879. Now it must be remembered that one of the principal clauses in the terms of Union with British Columbia was that the road should be built within ten years and commenced within two years, and that the construction should commence simultaneously at both ends. Subsequently, it is true the late Administration passed a resolution providing that the Canadian Pacific Railway should not be constructed any faster than the resources of the country would permit, and that the British Columbia section in particular should not be commenced if it necessitated increase of taxation. During these seven years, not only the national debt but the taxation materially increased, yet the Government took shelter behind this resolution to deprive British Columbia of what she was justly entitled to, the commencement of railway construction there some years ago. In this connection, the hon, member for West Durham said the other day that the statement, that he was in favor of abandoning British Columbia, was not true; that he had never wanted anything more than that British Columbia should be reasonable in her demands, that she should not demand that the ruinous terms be carried out to the letter, but should be content in having the railway built in a reasonable time. I would like to know what he considers a reasonable delay. I would like to know if the people of British Columbia have Mr. McInnes.

not been reasonable. I believe there is not a community that would have so patiently borne with the insults heaped upon her by the provoking policy pursued by the member for West Durham and his former leader, during their five years' tenure of office. Yet we are asked to be reasonable I think there is not a Province in our demands. in the Dominion but would have taken a different course from that of British Columbia, had it been dealt with in the same manner. I speak for the district I have the honor to represent, and the main land, as a whole, in saying that from the time it entered the Dominion till the present not an annexation sentiment has been mooted, or a resolution passed, not a meeting has been called for that purpose of embarrassing the previous or present Governments. If it was not that British Columbia was a remarkably healthy, strong, vigorous child, the life would have been crushed out of her long ago by the treatment of the member for West Durham. If it had not been for her great recuperative powers, she would have been crushed to death, and the member for West Durham would have been placed on his trial not only for assault and battery, but for infanticide. I will refer here to a few remarks made by the member for Charlton two Sessions ago. When the National Policy was under discussion he made use of the following, in my humble opinion, unparliamentary and unjustifiable language:

"Who undertook the Prince Edward Island Railway, which involved a large expenditure, and entailed an obligation against the Dominion of Canada? No one but the hon. gentleman and his associates. Who undertook the Nova Scotia and New Brunswick Railways, and also increased the financial obligation of this country? Who undertook the enlargement of the St. Lawrence Canals, but his hon. friend and his associates? Who undertook the Welland Canal, but those hon. gentlemen? Who undertook the public works at Ottawa, and the public buildings of the Dominion, but his hon. friend and his associates? Who undertook the building of the Pacific Railway, the most destructive and the most ruinous of all? Who undertook to fix upon this Dominion that incubus of British Columbia, that cancer, financially, of British Columbia, that was eating into our vitals and entailing a heavy financial burden upon the country for all time to come? Who undertook that, but the hon. Finance Minister and his associates?"

I appeal to the House if that is the language we ought to expect from an hon, gentleman hailing from a different Province. What would be said of hon, gentlemen from British Columbia if they used such vile language as that towards the other Provinces? I hope that such language as that towards a sister Province will never be heard in this House again. I believe we are here to legislate for the whole Dominion and not for our own particular constituencies or Provinces. We are here to build up a great nation, and unless the Canadian Pacific Railway is built, and I believe it will be constructed, we can never expect to have that great nation we so fondly look forward to, or to build up a great British power on this continent, and such without British Columbia would be incomplete. A few evenings ago I was very much amazed to hear some remarks that fell from the member for Central Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright). In order to show how much the late Government did to save the tax payers of the Dominion, he referred to its abandoning the Bute Inlet route and adopting that of Burrard Inlet, the one selected by the present Government. Now, instead of such being the case, up to 1877 the hon. gentleman and his colleagues were strongly in favor of the Bute Inlet route, that was to cost $20,000,000 extra, and we find that the member for Lambton, in the Session of 1879, admitted it to the hon. Minister of Railways. He used the following language, to be found on page 1904 of the Hansard for 1879, as follows:—

"From the head of Bute Inlet to Frederic Harbour is 51 miles, from which point to Vancouver Island is 15 miles, over which an expensive ferry would have to maintained. Now. Mr. Marcus Smith admitted himself in his reports that from Waddington Harbour to Esquimalt would take $27,000,000, including bridging, and we know it could not take less than from $15,900,000 to $20,000,000 to construct the remainder of the route, including bridging. These reasons seemed to me so conclusive against the Bute Inlet route that we could not for a moment hesitate, and

I will say this to the House that up to two years ago my mind was wholly biassed in favour of Bute Inlet.

• • • If the hon. gentleman is proceeding on the hypothesis that in Canada alone is there any land available, he will find himself greatly mistaken. We have found it very difficult indeed in Canada to promote settlement, even where the land was given away by the Government. It is still more difficult to send settlers to the far-off western country, where they have the initial difficulties of a new country to contend with, not less in amount, though different in kind, than the settlers of our own wooden districts. They have a long winter, absence of lumber and building materials and difficulties of transportation. We number and building materials and difficulties of transportation. We mast, therefore, make up our minds, if we are to settle that country, that it will be be done only at the expenditure of a large amount of money to aid settlers in going in and giving them land free after they get in. That is my conviction."

It was not until the late Governor General, Earl Dufferin, honored us with a visit in 1876, that the late Government turned their attention seriously in making surveys in the Fraser Valley. Notwithstanding that my predecessor, and the late member for Yale, on many occasions brought the attention of this matter before the House, they lent a deaf ear to it; and it was not till the exercise of influence of the late Governor General that the late Government thought fit to order a survey of the Fraser Valley. The following year a surveying force was placed there, and it was found beyond a question that that route was the best in every sense of the word. So that the late Government need not take to themselves any credit in that respect, for any credit that was due was due to the late Governor General of Canada. There is another subject of a local nature to which I now wish to call the attention of the Minister of Railways, and that is, that there is no fixed time given other than 1891 for the construction of the Emory and Burrard Inlet section. I believe that the Government will find it necessary to put that section under contract at as early a day as possible, and certainly not later than a year from next summer.

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Mr. McINNES. That "hear, hear" is I believe uttered by an hon, gentleman who wished the work postponed until he gets a seat on the Treasury Benches, but it is to be hoped, in the interests of British Columbia, as well as of the Dominion at large, that the hon gentlemen will long remain on the benches he adorns so well and ably fills. My reasons for urging that the section to which I refer should be promptly put under contract is, that it will be impossible to get supplies into the mountainous section of the road between Jasper House and Kamloops, unless the road is extended to the seaboard. Some hon, gentlemen may have the idea that the entire road can be constructed from the east end. I entirely disagree with that opinion, because it would be utterly impossible for the Syndicate to take their supplies from the Atlantic up to the Rocky Mountains, anything like as cheaply as from the Pacific. The cost would be more than treble what it would be if they were landed at Burrard Inlet and sent out by rail into the region of construction. The Onderdonk contract is to be completed, I believe, in 1:85. I therefore say it would be the duty of the Government to place the section I refer to under contract in 1882, certainly not later than 1883, so that it might be completed by the time of the completion of the Onderdonk contract, so that the Syndicate would be able to get in their supplies from the Pacific to the Rocky Mountain section. There is another reason for the early construction of that section. A great many have the idea that that section of the road will never pay. I have no hesitation in saying, after considering the matter very carefully, that that section of the road will pay almost equally with the prairie section, for the following reasons: In the first place, without the construction of that section, we can never command the Asiatic trade. In the second place, the trade for a distance of 1,000 or 1,200 miles east of the Pacific Ocean-in fact right into the centre of the prairies of the North-West-that beautiful wheat growing country will find its way down to the Pacific and not to the Atlantic. The cars which carry this produce would have for return freights, our beautiful and result would be that the Dominion would be dismembered valuable timber and lumber, our coal, fi-h, and mineral products. I believe that a large interprovincial trade will arise between the North-West and our Province in this way. The hon. Member for Vancouver (Mr. Bunster) referred to the resolutions which were passed at a mass meeting held in Victoria in December last. The 15th resolution reads:

"That the only compensation possible for the many drawbacks of Confederation is railway construction by the Dominion under conditions of the Carnavon settlement, and unless the Dominion is prepared to carry out the railway obligations with British Columbia, the Province would benefit largely by being placed in the same position to the British Crown as Newfoundland now occupies, having full control of her own resources and developments."

I have only to say that the people of Victoria have no right to speak for the people of British Columbia as a whole, and certainly not for the mainland of the Province. They certainly have no authority to do so. The mainland, as I have already stated, never held a meeting consuring the late Government even in those dark and gloomy days, when everything appeared in confusion, when it was semiofficially announced in the Globe in 1876 that the Bute Inlet route was adopted. Even in those days we did not pass resolutions that could be construed as meaning secession or annexation, or anything approaching either of these constitutional changes. When the people of the mainland have a grievance, they will doubtless make it known, but they have no sympathy whatever with the resolutions passed at the Victoria meeting. I believe, however, that the people of the Island have a strong claim on the Dominion Government for the construction of their road, and I have no doubt that if they exercise patience as we did, they will get the road. Now, Sir, I will just call the attention of the House to a couple of clauses in the political Syndicate, that was presented to the House a few days ago, the bogus Syndicate, the counterfeit Syndicate—the political Syndicate, I think, is perhaps the best name I can give it. I find that in the 21st clause it states that:

"In the event of the Government deciding to postpone or withdraw from the construction of the western section of the said Pacific Railway extending from Kamloops to Port Moody, they shall be at liberty to do so, and in that event, the Government shall not be bound to complete and hand over to the Company the said western section under the 6th and 7th clauses hereof."

Then again, I find in the 22nd clause:

In the event of the Government desiring to postpone or withdraw In the event of the Government desiring to postpone or withdraw from construction by the Company hereunder the westerly portion of the central section of said railway, being the westerly 450 miles thereof, as mentioned in the 9th clause of this proposal, the Company offers to reduce the subsidy in money and land by the amount apportioned to the said westerly 450 miles of the central section under the said 9th clause thereof—that is to say $5,400,000 and 6,750,000 acres of land."

Now, Sir, if that means anything, it means that if the present Government and the present House were foolish enough to abandon the bargain they have made with the bona fide Syndicate and accept the spurious one, the Government would have no alternative but to place their resignation in the hands of the Governor General, and the hon. member for West Durham would then ascend the political throne of Canada. He would go, no doubt, to the Governor General and say: "I have not a majority in this House, consequently I advise you to dissolve the House and appeal to the country." hon, gentleman would hope through representations and misrepresentations to attain to the Treasury benches. If he and his friends were successful, what would be the result? The hon. gentleman would say to this new Syndicate: "We release you from that western section; we release you from this 450 miles through the Rocky Mountains; we release you from the British Columbia section"-the very course that the hon, gentleman recommended last year, that is, trying to insert the thin end of the wedge between the different Provinces of this Dominion which has already cost us so much to consolidate, and the

and fall back into the state in which it was in 1866. I consider that if the hon, gentlemen who occupy the Treasury benches to-day yielded for one moment to the sophistries of the hon. member for West Durham, they would not be worthy to occupy the place they now hold. I have only to say, in conclusion, that I hope the hon member for West Durham will live long enough to go over the Canadian Pacific Railway on British territory from here to the Pacific, and I can assure him that, whatever else we may refuse him, we will give him a welcome and a hospitality equal to anything he would find in any other part of the Dominion. extend to that hon, gentleman the right hand of fellowship, and I am fully convinced that when he makes that visit he will confess that his opposition to the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway was the greatest political blunder of his life. But until he learns to treat every Province of this Dominion with even-handed justice, and rise above party, looking only to the interest of the whole country, I hope he will long remain, Mr. Speaker, to occupy a seat on your left.

Mr. GILLMOR. Before I enter upon the question under discussion I wish to correct an error I made in a few remarks I delivered a few nights ago. I said then that two papers published in New Brunswick, in the Conservative interest, had published the great speech of the Minister of Railways, but they had not published the contract. Since then I have learned that one of those papers did publish the contract on the 23rd of December. I take this first opportunity to correct the error I then made. It was a mistake I regret to have made. I would like also to refer for a moment to the manner in which this question has been discussed. You have given, Mr. Speaker, a good deal of latitude to this discussion. I do not object to that at all, but the epithets which have been applied to the members of the Opposition have been, some of them, very offensive. I took notes of the speeches, and I find these epithets thrown tock notes of the speeches, and I and these epithets thrown across the House: "guilty traitors," "factious demagogues," "quibbling pettifoggers," "proud of the audacity of their trickery," "they hang their heads in shame because their leader has so degraded the country," "unpatriotic and disloyal," "a put up job," "an incendiary fire," "conceived without honor or honesty," "a fraud," "a villainous fraud," "outcast," "not fit for heaven." This is evidence rather of a weak case. It occurs to me that hon, gentlemen having so good a cause as they profess might discuss it without descending to such language as this. On Friday evening the hon. and venerable member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) undertook to read the Opposition a lecture and to indulge in a little sarcasm. I thought he was going to attempt to reply to the hon. member for North Brant (Mr. Flemming), and he did give a little attention to that hon. member, while he devoted the rest of his remarks to advising the Liberal party as to the qualifications of their leaders. We cannot expect perfection in any human institution; but I would like to inform that hon. gentleman that one of the most important qualifications we require in our leaders is purity of heart and life, and no man, however exalted his talents or position, can aspire to lead the Liberal party unless he has those qualifications in a very high degree. With regard to the powers of intellect or the ability of our leaders—and I am not here to flatter them—the members of the Reform party will not follow. any man blindly. They cannot lead the Reform party unless the Reform party believes their policy to be beneficial to the country. It is an evidence of the weakness of their cause that hon, gentlemen opposite have taken up most of their time by rehearsing the speeches made by the hon. member for Norfolk, the hon. member for Lambton and the hon, and learned leader of the Opposition. This plan was adopted in the first instance by the hon. Minister of Railways. On looking over his speech I find that he quoted fifty-seven paragraphs from those speeches. Those speeches Mr. McInnes.

have not been perused for the purpose of admiring their logic, their eloquence, or their argument. They have been criticised for the purpose of finding out defects and blemishes. They have been read with the instinct of birds of prey, who are above the earth and look down on the green fields and flowery meads, and all the heauty of the landscape below, but are not attracted by anything beautiful there. They have no taste for the beautiful. But if a vulture can see a dead horse, if he can get his eye on carrion of any kind, or on something that is corrupt, he will pounce immediately to the earth and stick his bill in it. I wish to make no comparisons, but if hon. gentlemen on the other side want to find corruption they need not go far from home. I was glad to hear my hon friend the Finance Minister speaking on this question. He ought to speak on this question. He is the sole representative of New Brnnswick in the Government. He has been placed there by the suffrage of the people. He is the arbiter of the destinies of New Brunswick at present. He has not, it is true, any more of a following now than he had when he led the people of his Province into the adoption of the great Pacific Railway scheme. It is true he does not represent the majority of the people, or the opinions or wishes of the people of New Brunswick. Yet I had fain hope to hear him undertake to prove that, in addition to all the other burdens he had heaped upon the people, this burden would be to their advantage; that this additional debt of five or six millions that is to be heaped on them is going to produce some sort of compensation. He failed, in my opinion, to show anything of the kind. I hope my hon, friend will give a reason why he should not save to the people of New Brunswick at least a million dollars between the two offers now before us. I took some notes of the hon, gentleman's speech. First, he

"We are bound to carry out the conditions entered into with British Columbia."

Mr. Speaker, I have never heard a member of the Reform party dissent from that proposition. There was no necessity of dealing with that question. It is a settled fact that the Dominion of Canada have entered into an obliga-tion to build the Pacific Railway. The only question is as to the time and the abilities of the Dominion to undertake that work. That obligation is accepted by the leader and all the members of the Opposition, and I have never heard any intimation on this side of the House of a desire or intention to repudiate it, because, however earnestly they may have reasoned against that obligation, yet they regard it as imposed upon this country by the gentlemen now on the Treasury Benches. When they were defeated, and the Reform party came in power, did the Reform party undertake to repudiate that obligation? take to repudiate that obligation? As much as they disapproved of it, they never expressed a sentiment that could be construed into a repudiation of it. The question they asked themselves was, how soon can we, with the resources of this country, carry out in good faith our obligations with British Columbia? Did not the hon member for Lambton do as much in the five years of his administration as hon. gentlemen opposite would have done if they had been in his place? And have they not approved for the most part of the manner in which he did his work during that time? The nearest approach to repudiation I have seen was made by the hon. Minister of Railways in a speech, a small portion of which I will take the liberty of reading. In a speech made by that hon gentleman in the Session of 1880, he said:

"Now, I think, we must all admit that successive Governments must pay great deference to, and must hold themselves to a large extent responsible for carrying out the policy of their predecessors. I am satisfied we all agree in the opinion that it is only under the gravest circums ances that a new Administration is in a position to repudiate if I may so speak, the engagements in relation to a great public question, to which their predecessors have committed the country under the authority of Parliament. But I quite admit it was in the power of the hon. gentleman, who was then called upon to form an Administration, to say that since, in Parliament, he has opposed the policy of attempting to construct the candian Pacific Railway, that he believed this country could not engage in a work of such gigantic magnitude without seriously injuring the financial position of the country - that, under those circumstances, he must decline to hold himself responsible for the engagement into which his predecessors had entered. The hon. gentleman had that course open to him, because, Parliament, having declared that the work should only be constructed, provided a company could be found, aided to the extent before stated, to accomplish it as a private undertaking, and the effort to obtain the construction of the work under the terms -anctioned by Parliament having failed, it was open to him, I say, frankly to state to the House, that he was unable to carry out the policy to which his predecessors had committed the country. The hon, gentleman did not adopt that course."

I do not mean to say that that speech implies repudiation, but it implied that under certain circumstances we might repudiate the bargain. That was not the opinion of the then Government. The Reform party, notwithstanding their strong Opposition to the ruinous scheme, have done all that British Columbia could reasonably expect, all that our resources could justify. If they have erred in one thing it has been going beyond the resources of the country; they increased the public debt to an enormous extent, and burdened the people by going on with the work, yet I do not know how they could honorably or reasonably have avoided it. The Finance Minister said: "It is very strange that gentlemen included in this new Syndicate, who were known to be opposed to the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway. are now willing to become parties to the contract." I know of no reason why gentlemen having the disposition and the ability to become parties to a contract to build the Canadian Pacific Railway should not do so, notwith-standing in their opinion, the work in the public in-terest should not be gone on with. He says: "The Reform Government should have gone on with the work in 1875, 1876 and 1877, during the great depression of trade, and thus have prevented the depression and ushered in good times." I am not surprised to hear this from the Finance Minister, whose political policy it is to bring about good times, by getting the country into debt, by undertaking a large amount of unproductive work and increasing taxation. He says: "Leading Liberal papers were "Leading Liberal papers were encouraged to prejudice the case previous to the meeting of Parliament, and before the contract was made known.' That is not my experience. I believe that leading Liberal papers, in the Lower Provinces at least, were very careful of what they said in reference to this contract before the meeting of Parliament. They knew nothing of the details and were nowhere prejudiced against the contract. He said: "The new Syndicate had no intention of building any but the central section." If the hon, gentleman read the offer and interpreted it correctly, he would see that the Syndicate agreed to build the whole section from end to The alternative rests with the Government. end. to whom is this proposition made? But is not made to the Reform Government, but to the gentlemen now in power, who, under that new offer, have power to compel the parties to build the road from end to end, as in the contract under discussion. He says: "The country finds great relief, now that it knows the extent of its liabilities." There is uncertainty under this contract, with regard to the extent of our liabilities. The Government have become contractors with the Syndicate to build 706 miles of railways, and the Syndicate have contracted with the Government to build the balance of the road. The country knows what they agreed to give the Syndicate, but does not know what it will have to pay for the road to be built by the Government. He pretends that tenders had been asked by the Government, that the country were notified, and tenders could have been received if presented. He gave as his reason for stating that they were prepared to receive tenders, that the leader of the Government had given notice to this effect in his Railways, to appropriate 100,000,000 acres for the complespeech at Bath. Whoever heard of a notice being given to the country in that way, when great public works were about to be let? That is not the way in which a Government should proceed. If a lighthouse, or a post office, or any public work is to be let, public notice is to be given and tenders are not solicited in that way. I am sure the country were entirely ignorant of the intention of the Government to let the work in this manner. He said: "The old Syndicate could not abandon the eastern and western section, but the new one could." The hon. gentleman knows very well the new Syndicate could not abandon the eastern or western section. He said: "Any proposal that falls short of building from ocean to ocean, I would not support." The new Syndicate does not propose to do less than that. Those lands, one-third to be granted under the Act of 1874, were taken possession of by the Government for the purpose of preventing their being held and being disposed of by a monopoly. They desired to dispose of them as rapidly as possible, to prevent a company from holding them at the expense of the settlers, and of the Government lands. With regard to the building of this great, and expensive, and gigantic undertaking, I will state, not the policy and opinion of the Reform Party, but simply my own. I think the Dominion has done enough and been liberal with regard to their expenditure of the Pacific Railway, in the opening up and making accessible lands for settlement in the North-West, and that they have gone to the extreme of their abilities in this matter. When they have completed the sections of the railway under construction, they will have spent for the railway $35,000,000; purchase of Hudson's Bay Territory, $1,500,000; compensation to the Indians, $600,000 per annum, which, if capitalized, makes the sum equal to $15,000,000; expenditure on Dominion lands, Surveys, Mounted Police, Indian payments, Red River expedition, and minor items, $11,183,000—Total $62,683,000. This the people will have to expend to open up the North-West, for those who are there, and those who may be induced to go there in the future. I contend that that enormous sum is more than we could have been properly called upon to expend for this object—that we have done our whole duty to the North West in this respect. I would not, if I had the power, build more than 50 or 100 miles a year of this road, just enough to keep in advance of the settlements in the North-West. This is all we should do, or are able to do without grinding down the energies of the people who have to furnish this money. The road from Thunder Bay to Selkirk will be completed in a year or two. when those who are too loyal to cross American territory to get to our North-West will have seven months in the year for the journey by a Canadian route; in addition we have the Pembina Branch, and those who want to go to the North-West, and are not so doubtful about their loyalty, or are afraid to be weaned from it by travelling over American soil. can go through the States and use that branch. I do not think that the interests of the North-Westor the Dominion require our proceeding faster with this work. We ought not to forget the people who are struggling hard for a living throughout the Dominion, the large majority of whom though not in want are comparatively poor; these millions have little to expend over and above the payments for their necessary wants. With regard to this great work there have been five distinct proposals. First, the Allan contract, which, with all its defects, was preferable to the arrangement on the Table; next, came the famous Mackenzie Act of 1874, under which no offers were made or contracts given. The Government had the alternative in that case of going on with the work themselves, and they did go on with it slowly, but as fast as the interests of the country demanded, and its resources were ju-tified, completing certain portions before they left office. The next proposition was that of the present Minister of a great speech introducing it. We were led to believe Government would succeed; they were going to make a co-partnership with the British Government, and persuade them it was for our mutual advantage, and that our Government could find homes for their surplus population of the Mother Country in the North-West; our Ministers went home and did their best but did not succeed, on their coming back we found the whole scheme had collapsed. The Government then undertook this railway as a Government work, and we were told that tenders had been received for the construction of 127 miles in the Rocky Mountains, proving the Government had decided to proceed with it. That proposal was met by a motion of the leader of the Opposition, which was defeated, and the Government went on with the construction of the road as a Government work. The next, last and worst proposition that has been made is the one now before Parliament. With regard to this last and worst proposal ever made to Parliament, we knew little about it until we came here on the 10th of December. All that we knew before Parliament met was that $25,000,000 and 25,000,000 acres of land were to be given to build the Pacific Railway. I freely admit that that proposal struck me favorably, and I so expressed myself to my constituents. I consulted some of those best qualified to give me advice on this matter, and they told me I could form no opinion about it until I had seen the terms and conditions, as everything depended on them. I came to Parliament impressed with the idea that if they suited me, if I considered that they embodied the best means of building the road, I would vote for them honestly and independently. They were laid on the Table of Parliament on the 10th December, for, of course, they could not be placed before us before that date, according to the opinion of one of the best parliamentarians in the Dominion, the leader of the Government. The dignity of Parliament, he told us, prevented him from making known to the people the terms of the contract. Of course, I did not know much about this question of the dignity of Parliament, but I could not see how it could be offended in the least degree by taking the people into the confidence of the Government and letting them know what terms and obligations the Government was imposing upon those who are the masters of Parliament and the Government, those at whose will the members of the Government and of the House hold their seats. The contract was placed before Parliament on the 10th of December, and I know I am expressing the opinion of every intelligent man on both sides who read the contract, when I say that one and all condemned it. I think I am some judge of countenance, and can tell by a man's face when he is pleased and when he is displeased—when he is satisfied and when he is disappointed. The first impression of every man when he read the contract was against it, and as is generally the case, in matters of right or wrong, the first impressions were the best. And if the friends of the Government had stuck to their first impressions, if they had only been true to their honest conviction, they would have saved themselves many a sorrowful moment, and would have saved their country from burdens which this contract will lay on it—burdens which will crush all down the ages to its ruin and destruction. I think my hon, triend from Niagara (Mr. Plumb) was about the only bright particular star-his face the only one which did not immediately go under a cloud. Nothing the Government could do, could change the smiling face of the hon. member for Niagara who seems always anointed with the oil of gladness. But I knew by the faces of other hon. gentlemen how they felt; and I knew by the faces of the Government that they, too, were blue. And what was the remedy for the terrible shock which hon, gentlemen received? A caucus was summoned and the whips were told to give the order: "To-morrow we are to Act of 1874 that was then upon the Statute-book, because

tion of this railway. That was a great scheme, and he made | hold a caucus and see what is to pay?" The deuce was to pay, and no pitch hot. And next day, let us look at them. Young men in the vigor of youth, and grey hairs of age, with their heals bowed like bulrushes; they passed through these doors, they trailed along the corridors, through the lobbies and up the stairs like slaves chained to their dungeons, cursing the man who led them to their fate. They may tell me that they approved of the contract; but I know better. They marched into room No. 29 to the tune of the "Dead March" in Saul. Much as they esteem their gallant leader they would rather have followed him to his grave than to that caucus. Do you think they went to glorify and laud and magnify the leader of the Government on that occasion. By no means; it took them a good while before they began to magnify and glorify him. He had to pass the magic wand a great many times over their heads before they were reconciled. I can imagine the hon. Minister of Railways being there to examine them before they went out. He said, "Show me your tongue" and he said to them: "Of course you are not dangerously ill; if you only hold your tongue—keep quiet and be very careful, you will pull through." To another: "Let me feel your pulse; you are certainly a little feverish, but you will be all right." So they went out, and they have since been recovering, until now nearly the last man has made up his mind to bow the knee to Baal and let the country go to the dogs. The Minister of Railways said that the line north of Lake Superior was necessary to the maintenance of British institutions in this country. That is a poser; when they come to that, there is no meeting that argument. That hon gentleman seems to be superloyal. I do not know much about him personally; but I fancy he is not much more loyal than other people, or that he is much more attached to British institutions. He is remarkably attached to British institutions, when it suits his purpose and political exigencies require it. I warn my friends from Quebec to watch the hon. gentleman. He is so loyal, I would not be surprised if he introduced a resolution declaring that only Anglo-Saxon should be spoken here. He is very loyal, when it may effect his own purposes. He now wants to adopt British institutions, and he is so remarkably loyal that he wishes people to travel round the north shore of Lake Superior to reach the North-West. How did these hon, gentlemen deal with the question of loyalty and love of British institutions formerly? They condemned one set of British institutions formerly? They condemned one set of British institutions. They were not loyal with regard to free trade. They did not desire to adopt British institutions in that particular, and give the people cheap bread. It was Canada for the Canadians then, and they almost insulted Britain and British statesmen. They did not want to follow Britain's good example and adopt their trade relies. good example and adopt their trade policy—the best part of their institutions, that policy which would give the people cheap food and clothing—but they wanted to adopt that part of British policy which has been fixed upon the British constitution in ages past, and which was now shaking Britain to its very centre. They desired to adopt that part of the constitution which the best minds in Britain are trying to remove; they wanted to tack that part of the British constitution on the constitution of this country. It suits the policy of hon. gentlemen now to point out British institutions which we should adopt; but last year, on introducing the National Policy, they pointed us to the United States for our institutions and invited us to follow them. I have no patience with that kind of sentiment; it does not amount to anything; it is folly to talk about it. With respect to this contract, I can say in all seriousness that it was in the public interest that tenders should have been asked for the construction of the Central Pacific Railway. The Government owed that to the tax-payers who will have to meet the expenses. It was their duty under the an Act passed by Parliament should not be violated by the Government, for it was placed there for a purpose, to have called for tenders under that Act. I think they failed very much in their duty in not having observed the law and asked for tenders, so that the public and capitalists might have known not only that the Government wanted tenders. but that they were to make concessions such as they have made, secretly and clandestinely to this Syndicate, so that all contractors might intelligently have sent in tenders. Now, what are these enormous concessions made to the Company? The contractors have to select the choicest lands. The line is to be free from taxation for twenty years or until settled. All the lands required for stations and docks are a free gift in addition to the land subsidy. The material for the construction of the road is to be admitted duty free. Should the Company choose Indian lands, the Government have to extinguish the title. The Company may to some extent change the route of the road, taking it even further down to that terrible parallel, forty-nine. The right of way and road-bed are given free to the Company. The railway and all property of the Company will be free from taxallon for ever. The Company have the right to construct all branch lines, and the Government must give the road-bed and all lands required by the Syndicate for building ground, yard, etc. For twenty years the Government shall not charter companies to construct its lines within fifteen miles of the boundary line, except such lines as shall run south-west or west of south. This is a very objectionable feature in the contract. I cannot conceive why the people of the North-West should be prohibited from associating with the people on the south side of the boundary line. Who are they? Are they Hottentots, savages, or cannibals, a race with whom it would be dangerous associate. No; they are English, Irish, Scotch, French and Canadians, of the same flesh and blood, and speaking the same language as ourselves. If it is to the interest of the people of the North-West to associate with those across the line, why should we prevent them by law? If it is to their interest to build a railway south of the point specified, why should we legislate that for 20 years no such road shall be built, except by the Syndicate. No other line should go there, according to the Government's proposal, however much the commercial condition requires it. The Government had inaugurated a policy which cannot succeed. You may make laws to that effect, but you cannot overturn the laws of commerce, and of nature, and the laws of God. You venture upon a policy that, instead of perpetuating British institutions in Canada, will have the effect of making the people dissatisfied, driving them from the country, and producing confusion and anarchy in the future. You played upon the loyalty of the people, you played upon their prejudices, till you carried out your purposes. I am astonished that in this enlightened age, among people so intelligent as ours, you should have ventured in this nineteenth century to enter into such a policy as you now propose. It will be a signal failure, and the dissatisfaction and evil that will follow will not tend to make the people loyal. The policy of the present Government has been to prevent us from doing that which it was our interest to do. They have undertaken to do away with all natural law, to make us go the longest way round, to make us travel as far as they can to get to any part of the Dominion, to make us trade with people that it is contrary to our interest to trade with, and they tax us if we go where it is our interest to trade. They are acting contrary to all reason, to all common sense, and contrary to sound political principle. Coming back to this Syndicate bargain, I find that the 11th clause provides that the property of the Company, the road and lands, are to be freed from municipal, provincial, and Dominion taxation for ever. I need not comment upon that, it speaks for itself. It is the most absurd thing that could have been imagined. In fact, none of these propositions could have been thought of by the Government; they must have been suggested one and all by the Syndicate, and the Government did not resist them. For some reasons of which I cannot conceive the Government yielded all these concessions: the Government must construct the line from Thunder Bay to Selkirk, from Kamloops to Yale, from Yale to Port Moody, more than 700 miles of the hardest part of the line, and hand it over to this Syndicate for ever. That is getting this Pacific Railway built with a vengennce. That is giving the road to a Company by contract with a vengeance. The Government have got ten years to do it in, and the people that were to be delivered from corruption by the Government giving the work to a Company have got to suffer for ten years longer. If it is expensive for the Government to build the railways, the people have got to bear that expense for ten years longer. As long as the Syndicate works at it the Government work at it. They are in partnership. They have entered into partnership, not only to build the Pacific Railway, but to take charge of this country in the future. What the Government cannot do the Syndicate will help them to do, and what the Syndicate wants the Government can help them to it. This superloval Government-what have they done now? They have allowed the Company to fix their head offices either in the Dominion of Canada or in the United States. That is Canada for the Canadians! The whole length of this road I find to be 2,689 miles. The Government are to build 704 miles at an estimated cost of $35,369,000. The Company are to build 1,985 miles which, according to Mr. Floming's estimate. will cost $48,500,000. The Government subsidy to this Company is $25,000,000 in cash, $25,000,000 acres of land, and it is certainly not an over-estimate to call the land worth $2 an acre. The land and cash subsidy, then, would make $75,000,000 which the Government propose to give to the Syndicate to build a road which their own engineer estimated would cost $48,500,000. Take $18,500,000 from $75,000,000 and it leaves $26,500,000 that you propose to give the Syndicate more than the Government engineer estimated this work would cost. I have never heard the Government explain, nor any of their supporters explain. how they can justify giving the Company $26,500,000 more than their Engineer has estimated that that 1.985 miles were going to cost. I do not know how they are going to satisfy the people. They go back and tell us that the Act of 1874 would have given more under the Allan contract. We have nothing to do with what is passed. No one ever undertook to build the road under that Act. But how did the hon, gentlemen opposite reconcile with their duty the fact of giving so much more for the construction of this road than the estimated cost of it? Of course they will hand this all over in ten years to the Syndicate to be theirs in fee simple forever. But the most remarkable thing in this whole contract is the 5th clause. That is more unaccountable than any other feature of it. It refers to the 100 mile section west of Winnipeg. This 100 mile section west of Selkirk was commenced as a Government work, and the contract was for $6,000 a mile. exclusive of rails, making the cost $600,000; the rails would cost $300,000; so that if the Government had gone on and constructed that 100 miles as a Government work, its total cost would have been $900,000. Why did they not go on and construct that, as they did the British Columbia and Thunder Bay sections, and hand it over to the Syndicate? Why did they adopt another plan with regard to this particular 100 miles? That section, I believe, is now completed for some 60 or 70 miles, and the whole could be completed very early next season. The Government not only propose words, they give the Company $7,250,000, and they take back $900,000 for what they expended on the road, leaving a clear balance in favor of the Syndicate of $6,250,000. This is, to my mind, one of the most remarkable features of this contract, and one which I have never heard explained by the Government. I think the Dominion of Canada has contributed very liberally towards the interests of the settlers in the North-West. When we consider the trials and hardships endured by the pioneer settlers of the older Provinces, we must. I think, conclude that the Dominion has done all for the North-West they are entitled to do. We are spending all we can grind out of the people for this North-West, and I hope the people of the North-West will repay the Dominion to some extent for what it has done. But if this contract is passed, they will be crippled, burdened and oppressed—they will be unable to support themselves, to say nothing of making any return for the millions we have expended in order to help them. Our debt has been in order to help them. Our debt has been increasing enormously. It has increased from $77,500,000 in 1871 to $147,000,000, 1879, nearly double. We are dealing in such large figures that it is almost impossible to realize their full import. With regard to this idea of millions, I will read a short article from one of our papers published in St.

"The Conservative press treat the giving away of 25,000,000 acres of land in the North-West as a very small matter; they have grown so accustomed to talk in millions that their sense of proportion has become quite lost. They do not realize what 25,000,000 acres of selected land really means. That is a larger piece of territory than the cultivated area of England. After two thousand years of illage the whole cultivated area of England is but 24,596,266 acres, including lands in pasture as well as under crop, or more than 400,000 acres less than the Syndicate are to receive.

under crop, or more than 200,000 acres less than the enormous land grant which the Syndicate are to receive for building permanent pasture, is but 15,337,856 acres, or nearly 10,000,000 acres less than the enormous land grant which the Syndicate are to receive for building the Pacific Railway.

"The whole cultivated area of Scotland is 4,738,127 acres, or less than one-fifth of the Syndicate's land grant. In fact, the whole area of Scotland, including islands, rocks, mountains and moors, is 5,500,000 acres less than the Syndicate's land grant.

"According to the last census the total area of improved land in Canada was as follows:—

	Acres.
Ontario	. 8,833,626
Quebec	5,703,944
New Brunswick	. 1,171,157
Nova Scotia	. 1,627,091
P. E. Island	445,103

"The Syndicate's land grant will therefore be upwards of 7,000,000 acres larger than the whole cultivated area of the Dominion in 1871, and even, after making a large allowance for increase since the last census, much larger than its present cultivated area; and yet Sir Charles thinks that any one who objects to him giving away to railway monopolists a territory fifteen times as large as all the cultivated land in his native Province, is only inducing in paste heard indirection.

"To carry the comparison a little further: in 1870, the last census of which we have complete returns the acreage of improved land in the six New England States was as follows :-

	Acres.
Maine	2.917.793
New Hampshire	2,334,487
Vermont	3,073,257
Massachusetts	1,736,221
Connecticut
Rhode Island	289,030

"It will be seen from the above statement that the improved area of the It will be seen from the above statement that the improved area of the six New England States combined is considerably less than one-half the size of the Syndicate's enormous land grant. As a matter of fact there is not a State in the Union with as large an area of improved land as the Syndicate's land grant. The improved acreage of the six largest States in the Union was as follows at the last census:—

11,997,540

,	Acres.
Illinois	19.319,952
New York	15.627.206
Ohio Pennsylvania	14,469,133
Pennsylvania	11,515,965
Indiana	10,104,279
Mr Gill war

"It follows then from the above that the Syndicate's land grant is more than twice as large as the improved acreage of either Pennsylvania, Indiana, or Iowa, nearly 10,000,000 acres larger than the improved area of the great State of New York, and upwards of 5,000,000 acres in excess of the area of the first agricultural state in the Union, Illinois. These are figures worth pondering over by all true Canadians, notwithstanding Sir Charles' sneers and Sir John's eager haste to hand over to private parties and place beyond the reach of taxation a tract of fertile territory larger than the cultivated area of his native country and his adopted country combined,"

The Government purpose to take over $100,000,000 for the benefit of no class of the people, but solely for the benefit of the Syndicate. We are expending these vast sums for a people who do not now exist. If emigration does not come in any more rapidly than at present we are making an expenditure far in advance of our resources. Now I would just say, that the Opposition are not responsible for this new offer. It is not made to the Opposition, but made to the Government, although hon. gentlemen opposite take it for granted that if we were to go to the country the new documents would be placed before a Reform Government after the elections. Why suppose that if we went to the country that a Liberal Government must of necessity come in. If you have the people with you what need you fear. You admit by that argument if you go to the country you are sure of defeat. If it is a choice between those two offers there is no comparison between them. believe the gentlemen of the second Syndicate are unworthy of the political motive attributed to them. I have it from the lips of an important member of that Syndicate, from my own Province, that he knew nothing about the matter until he took up the paper. He telegraphed at once to Sir Wm. Howland to count him in. He could, he said, build the prairie section for less than $8,000 a mile. He believed a road could be built on the prairie for $8,000 a mile. was aware a road was nearly completed from St. John to St. Stephen in New Brunswick, through a difficult country, which would not cost more than $.0,000 a mile. That gentleman told me also he would have no hesitation in making a road very much cheaper than that proposed by the last offer. Had he been present he would have undertaken to build the road for $20,000,000 and 20,000,000 acres of land. This contract was made entirely without the authority of the law. The only Act under which this work could be done was that of 1874; but it gave no authority to the Government to bind this country to complete 706 miles of road in ten years, which would cost the country nearly $53,000,000, and hand it over to the Syndicate. The Act of 1874 only authorized the Government to give a company $10,000 a mile, or $27,000,000, without making any exemptions from duty or taxation, or giving of the concessions which make this contract so ruinous to the country. That Act did not prevent other companies from building railways wherever and whenever they please. The result at present is a foregone conclusion. The hon. gentlemen opposite have one after another fallen into line. They have made up their minds to sacrifice this country and to stifle their convictions. I cannot understand, how in this free country with its religious and educational advantages, and freedom of thought and action, hon. gentlemen could, in this age of the world, make up their minds to adopt this contract. I can understand how the heathen in in his blindness bows down to wood and stone, and how the swarthy Hindoos, in order to appease their imaginary gods and satisfy a guilty conscience, can cast their infants to the cruel jaws of the monsters of the deep. I can understand how the heathen can prostrate themselves before the car of Juggernaut; but I cannot understand how men in Canada, this free land, can sacrifice not only their convictions, not only their judgments, but can sacrifice the millions of the people in this Dominion, and the interest of the country, to support a Government that has illegally brought before the country a contract ruinous to the best interest of the people, and which will in the end ruin the men who adopt it.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, the subject now under discussion by this House is admitted to be, by both political parties, of the utmost importance to the welfare and prosperity of this Dominion. It is a subject the vast importance of which cannot be estimated, hence the necessity for the most careful consideration is apparent to every one of us. Now, this great work—the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway—being as it is a great national work, and one of which the hon the ex-Premier very properly said: "The Government is morally as well as legally bound to construct," should be viewed apart altogether from mere party feeling. If this work is necessary to the building up and consolidating this wide Dominion of ours—and it is admitted to be such by hon. members on each side—then no matter which party submits a measure for performing and carrying out the same, it should have the cordial and hearty support of all hon. members, in so far as the same is consistent, and in the interests of the country at large. It has long been a recognized fact, that the building of this road is a necessity which cannot be gainsaied. Here we have a vast Dominion, made up of a confederation of different Provinces, reaching from ocean to ocean, a distance of 4,000 miles, and the only means of communication at present between the eastern and western portions is for the most part through a foreign country. If we wish to bring into use the vast extent of rich and fertile lands situated in the North-West, and to give them a real instead of a mere nominal value, the only way to do so is by building this or some such confemplated railway, and so supply a means of advancing settlement. The only question, therefore, is the course to be pursued in the construction of such a road, whether it shall be done by the Government or by a private company. Now, I think all hon members will agree with me, without question, when I say that it has been demonstrated, time and again. that a private company can construct a railway far cheaper than can be done by a Government; therefore the course adopted for building this great Canadian highway by the present Government should meet with the approbation of every hon, member who has the good of the country at heart, and not only that of party. The Government, in giving the construction of this line to a Syndicate, relieved itself of vast responsibilities, yet retains to itself the controlling influence, and is only following in principle that course which it proposed in 1873, and which was unsuccessfully proposed by the late Government under hon. Mr. Mackenzie in 1876. In 1873, the then Government under Sir John Macdonald, proposed to build the line through a company, of which Sir Hugh Allan was the President, by paying a cash subsidy of $30,000,000 and 50,000,000 acres of land. This scheme unfortunately fell through. I say unfortunately, because had such scheme been carried on, we should by this time, according to the charter, have had the road nearly complete! In 1876 the ex-Premier, under the Railway Act of 1874, advertised for a company to build the road, proposing to pay $10,000 cash, and 20,000 acres of land per mile, making approximately $27,000,000 cash and 54,000,000 acres of land; and in addition, to pay four per cent for 25 years on the cost above $10,000 per mile. To this proposal no company was found willing to concede. In 1879 Parliament passed an Act setting aside 100,000,000 acres of land; from the proceeds of the sale of which the present Government was to have construction performed. From this Act the present proposed contract now before the House originated.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I rise to a point of order. I see that some hon gentlemen are indulging in the habit of throwing papers in the House. That is a custom which must be put down. In England, if such conduct were carried on in the presence of the Speaker, not only would the offending member be compelled to remove from the House, but he would be named by the Speaker, and would likely be fined £100.

Mr. ManDONNELL (Inverness). I wish to point out that while an hon, member on this side of the House was speaking there was not a single remonstrance from the hon, gentleman when some hon, members were acting in the same way.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not allude to hon. members on either side. I do not care who they are who indulge in the habit; it is a most reprehensible one.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Now, Mr. Speaker, before going into the details of this contract, I would like to briefly contrast the present scheme with those before proposed, but in order to arrive at any satisfactory conclusion it is necessary to say a few words in respect to the value to be placed on the lands. It has been very variously estimated to be worth from nil to $4 and $5 per acre; indeed, it has been argued by members in the Opposition, that the money realized from the sale would hardly cover the expense of settling; and further still, that they could not be given away; yet now what do we find? Hon, members opposite placing them from $2.00 to $4.00 per acre. What, may I ask, has given them the incentive, and caused them during the last few years to suddenly spring up from nothing to the higher value? Certainly nothing performed by my hon friends opposite; it must be, therefore, the contemplated construction of the road by the present company; for certainly the lands in 1878, without a road, were worth just as much as the same lands without a road are in 1881. If such be not the case, I can only account for the increased value put upon them in the fact that hon. members in Opposition are beginning to awaken to the knowledge that the "bright side of the shield" has at last been turned upon them. Now, the higher the value placed upon them (and we must recollect that the hon members opposite have not shown us that they are more valuable now than under their administration) the greater will the contrast be between the contract now before the House, and that proposed by the Mackenzie Government. Now, let us take in thus contracting, the value put upon them by the ex-Premier in 1878; viz., $1 per acre. This will make the proposal in 1873 to equal:

Cash Subsidy	$	30,000,000 50,000,000
,	$	80,000,000
he proposed scheme of ex-Premier Mackenzi	ė	:
Cash Subsidy 54,000,000 acres at $1 per acre	æ.	27,000,000 54,000,000 40,000,000
•	$	121,000,000
he proposed contract now under discussion:
Cash Subsidy		25,000,000 25,000,000 28,000,000

Now, by viewing the totals we see that the present contract is $2,000,000 better at least than the Allan Company undertook to build it for, and $43,000,000 better than the sum which Mr. Mackenzie proposed to pay. But my hon. friends in Opposition will say, there are other privileges to be granted the Company which will bring up the total; of that I will speak presently. Now, Sir, having thus briefly spoken on the contract before the House as a whole, allow me further to make a few remarks on the details, to some of which objections have been raised by hon. members opposite. In the first place, the ', Sir, I would remark upon the great stress that has been placed upon the words in clause 9; section B: "So as to admit of the running of regular trains." Our friends in the Opposition argus from this that the Company will merely bring the completion of the line to this point in order to be able to claim the subsidy in land and money allotted to that 20-mile section. Now, Sir, I take this to mean that we should consider the words to mean what is expressed in clause 7, and again in clause 8. To my mind one clause cannot be properly understood unless it corresponds with what is gone before; and in clause 7 and clause 8 we find that directly any completed section comes into the hands of the Company, they shall "efficiently maintain, work and run it;" and again clause 8, they "shall thereafter maintain, and efficiently operate the same." Efficiently operate—this is to be done by them as soon as any section is completed, and they cannot claim any subsidy in land or money until the section claimed for is completed; consequently, I draw the conclusion that the Company must efficiently operate any completed section as soon as the subsidy for that section is paid over to them. Now, Sir, the only thing to decide is what will constitute "efficiently operating," and "regular trains." One hon. gentleman the other night raised the objection that the Company might please themselves as to what the term "regular" might mean; he said they might run one train a week, or one a month, or one a year. Now, it is quite true they might run that one train efficiently, but would that hon. member, or would any hon. members say that that would be "running and operating the line efficiently?" Another objection raised, and a great deal has been said about it, although in my opinion the thing is simple and amounts to but little, is, that all the best lands will be locked up in the hands of the Syndicate, and so create an immense land monopoly; and that the Syndicate will continue to hold them until they rise to a very high value, thus netting to themselves immense profits, and that the advancement and settlement of the country will be retarded instead of being fostered and encouraged. Well. Sir, I do not intend to take up much of the time of this House on this point; but may I ask, is it reasonable to suppose that the land which forms the principal part of the price paid for the construction of the road will be thus treated by the Company? Is it to be supposed that any company, undertaking to build and operate such a road as the one we are considering, in order to develop the resources of the country it passes through, will counteract such development by locking up, as it were, the lands from settlers. We must also remember that every alternate section of land is in the possession of the Government, and this alone, in my opinion, would in a great measure prevent such a system from being followed. It is said, Sir, that a second "Canada Company" will thus be formed, by giving this Syndicate control of so vast an area. Mr. Speaker, did these same hon, members think about a second "Canada Company" when they were ready to support the Mackenzie proposition of 1876, when the company would have had control of more than double the area now given, had such a company been found. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, considering the financial success of this contemplated road depends altogether upon the rapid development of the country, the company will do all they possibly can do to assist in pouring rapidly into that vast country that class of settlers upon whose labor the resources alone can be developed. Still another point I would say a few words on, Mr. Speaker. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that "every dollar of duty taken off articles imported for the construction of the road, is so much added to the burdens of the people;" and yet these same hon. gentlemen, the other night, repreached the Government for not continuing the construction as a Government work. How, I ask, can these two be reconciled? Now, suppose that the Government had continued the construction, how much duty would have been paid on imported articles used? Would that then be adding burdens upon the people? Having thus offered these few remarks on the proposed contract, I would, in conclusion, like to say, that in my opinion the who has the slightest spark of patriotism about him to make Mr. ELLIOTT.

contract now before us is by far the best that has yet been before this House. In such a great work as this, where the difficulties, at first sight, appears almost insurmountable, it will be found utterly impossible to conceive of a plan for executing it which will not in some points have objectionable features; but the objections against this Syndicate contract which hon, members opposite urge, are most, I fear, raised more on account of party bias than for the general welfare of the country. The greater part of the criticisms offered by the opposing party, recall to my mind the words of Earl Beaconsfield respecting critics: "those who make them are generally those who have failed as authors themselves." And so I think respecting the opposing party of this contract, those that talk most against it are those who have failed in proposing a better one. The same gentlemen would oppose any scheme, however advantageous, if it were presented to this House by the present Government. they not, Mr. Speaker, oppose the hon. Minister of Railways when he made the proposal to build the line from the sale of the lands in the North-West? Did they not oppose the Allan contract? And yet the same Oppositionists supported the proposed Mackenzie contract, which contrasts unfavorably with either that they opposed by many millions of dollars. Mr. Speaker, the reason why is not far to seek, and so long as these hon, members place party before country, so long will they continue to strenuously oppose any proposition emanating from this side of the

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I certainly did not wish to address the House at this late hour of the evening, and a few days ago I had no intent on of doing so during this my first Session in the Dominion Parliament. But a few circumstances which have taken place during the past few weeks make it necessary for me to offer a few observations. As a young member of the House, I naturally feel a certain diffidence in addressing those who are old soldiers in the camp, who have served their country well and truly on both sides of the House. My attention was directed to a little paragraph in the telegraphic correspondence of the Toronto Globe, dated the 13th of January, as follows:-

"Mr. Scott, of Manitoba, neglected to vote yea, and then tried to leave the Chamber before the nays on his row were recorded, but was prevented by boisterous cries of order."

I feel that I would not be serving either myself or those who sent me here if I should ever attempt to shirk a vote. It does not form a part of the Irish character to shirk a responsibility. As a representative of Manitoba, a Province more directly interested in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Ruilway than perhaps any other Province of the Dominion, I feel that it is my duty to give my views on the contract now under discussion; and I must crave the indulgence of hon. members while I give my unbiased, my unprejudiced opinions in reference to the contract and in reference to the second Syndicate offer put forward by the leader of the Opposition. In 1869, when the gentlemen now on the Treasury benches were in power, it was thought advisable that the North-West country should be made a portion of the Dominion. It was felt that the surplus population of Ontario and Quebec, who were going to the Western States, should be encouraged to migrate to our own prairie country. Previous to that time the country was comparatively unknown, not only on this side of the Atlantic but also on the other side. The country was purchased for $1,500,000, 1,400,000 acres of land being set aside to extinguish the Indian titles. Since then a very large amount of money has been expended in exploring the country and in surveying the various projected lines of railway. Now that we have secured possession of the country, it is the duty of every loyal man, it is the duty of every statesman, it is the duty of every man it truly a British possession, and to build up a country which we know will, within the next fifty years at least, vie with that of our neighbors south of us in its wealth, its population, its industry, and its loyalty to the flag to which it owes allogiance. Some ten years ago the Government of the day thought it was necessary to construct a line of road from the Eastern Provinces to the West. Unfortunately the gentlemen who then formed the Government did not succeed. They were defeated through the force of circumstances. An election, brought about by a little deflection of a few members, was the cause of the right hon, gentleman who now leads the Government, resigning. A general election ensued, and the Reform party was returned by an overwhelming majority. During the five years they were in power, they did little if anything to develop the fairest and best portion of the Dominion. The Reform party again lost office at the general election of 1878, and the right hon. member for Victoria was again called on to lead the Government. He has submitted a contract to this House which, he believes, when properly carried out, will be sufficient to justify all his endeavors during the past ten years. The hon, gentleman is now approaching the close of his brilliant and useful career, and I believe is most anxious, before he is compelled to terminate his labors, to see that great highway completed from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Many objections have been made to this contract. The first is the exemption from taxation of the road-bed, station buildings, &c. We know that the municipalities in the Province of Ontario and other sections of the Dominion, are only too glad to exempt the road-beds of railways, and give bonuses to them provided they shall build stations at different projective points in the various municipalities. That is a wise practice, founded on the simple fact that gentlemen who invest their money in a public enterprise for the public benefit are entitled to public assistance in carrying it out. The little city of Winnipeg, which I call my native town, has given a bridge to this road which will cost about a quarter of a million of dollars, and offered this Syndicate a few weeks before I left a grant of thirty acres of land, free from taxation, for all time to come; and thirty acres of land in Winnipeg means a larger amount than it would in this little Province of Ontario see any objection whatever in exempting the road-bed from taxation. Objection has been raised to the exemption of lands. On the line every second section is reserved to the Government, and the lands to day are worth nothing outside the limits of actual settlement. I cannot see any reason why this objection should be raised seeing that the railway Company can settle the lands much more rapidly than any Government can do, and the lands of the Company will be sold rapidly as they want to secure traffic. The cost and the land grants are said to be excessive. The second Syndicate which was formed a few days ago, proposed to build the road for $3,000,000 and 3,000,000 acres less than the first one. With regard to the cash and land grants, allow me to read an extract from the Manitoba Free Press, the Globe of the North-West:

"When the details of the Syndicate bargain were first made public we expressed the belief that, in consideration of the amount and nature of the work imposed upon the Company by the Government, the bonus of $25,000,000 and 25,000,000 acres was not excessive. $23,000,000 and 23,000,000 acres was not excessive. We decide the details of the present bargain might be advantageously modified, the Syndicate were perfectly justified, under the circumstances, in requiring a money and land bonus as large as that to which Parliament is now asked to give its assent."

I am glad to know gentlemen on the Opposition benches value the lands of the North-West so high. I am rejoiced to know that our lands are worth $3 an acre. I trust it may be so, and that we shall meet people prepared to invest their wealth in those lands at that price. I believe that the lands in the country will be worth more; but that outside the limits of actual settlements, they have really not advanced and any country that is to become filled up with people, property will advance to a certain extent; but Manitoba forms only a very small portion of the North-West, the lands outside of that Province have not increased in value during the past four years. Another objection has been taken as to the selection of the Company's land anywhere. Now, only some ten or twelve million acres can be taken in the fertile belt from Red River to Jasper House; the balance of the 25,00,000 must be taken back the twenty-four miles limit on the railroad line. I fail to see any objection in this, or why the Company should not be allowed, outside of the alternate sections, to select their lands wherever they pleased; and in the selection of lands now ly ng useless they must construct branch lines that would be feeders to the main line, along which branch lines the Government lands, now worthless, will be rendered of considerable value. As I understand the contract for the branch lines, the Government does not promise to give the Syndicate either a dollar or one acre for a mile of the road to be constructed. I understand it is to be constructed entirely at the cost of the Company, and that all the Government promises is the right of way. With regard to the freight rates, the people of my section felt that they would be placed at some little disadvantage. They have been suffering from a monopoly for several years, which included some members of the present Syndicate, and a very warm feeling existed in consequence; and they feared that the clause preventing any other company from running a road south-east of the main line for twenty years would place them at the mercy of this Company for that time. I am now aware the Governor in Council has the power of fixing the rates of freight.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hear, hear.

Mr. SCOTT. I know the present Ministers have the best interests of the country at heart, and I am perfectly willing to leave the matter in their hands. I will now read the remarks of a Grit paper in Manitoba, the Free Press, on this subject:

"Neither do we attach any importance to the dread entertained by some that such freight rates would be charged under the management of Messrs. Stephen, Hill and Angus as would operate prejudicially to the interests of the settlers in the North-West. Their advantage would necessarily lie in encouraging the settler to produce as much grain as possible. Grinding rates would not conduce to that result, and, as has been shown on the St. Paul and Manitoba Railway, these men are too shrewd to sacrifice the future to the present."

That is the opinion of the Grit organ, and if the editor of that journal is satisfied, I see very little reason to be dissatisfied with the clause in question. I have no doubt that a few weeks ago many hon. members, and perhaps I might be numbered among them, was a little disposed to raise objections to the first Syndicate; but when the Opposition with great eclat submitted their second proposition, which bears anything but honesty on its face, had I been disposed to oppose the first, I certainly could not support the second. I notice that the eastern and western sections were to be expunged; the North-West was to be an isolated community; the new Syndicate were going to take advantage of the American system of railways; that we in the North-West had no interest in common with the people of the Dominion, although we are all Canadians in the North-West. When I noticed these facts I made up my mind at once how I would cast my vote and use my influence hereafter. I regret that hon members for the east-ern portions of the Dominion, who no doubt have the interest of the country at heart—but they have a strange way of showing it-should be so anxious to utilize the American system of railways. Why did they do so? Why, because there are 650 miles of country which would not supply sufficient local traffic to maintain the road, should the people of the North-West be shut off in value during the last four years. True, in Manitoba, from buying goods in Ontario and Quebec. Why do you wish us to submit to the obnoxious and expensive bonding system of the United States, to which we have been compelled to submit for ten years? When the present Government inaugura ed the National Policy it was felt, I have no doubt, by many persons in the east, that the country would suffer. In Manitoba it was believed it would ruin the country, for the simple reason that we were importers, and had to bring all our manufactured goods from the east; but, strange to say, very soon after that policy was inaugurated, the merchants of Manitoba opened up new channels of trade. Where d'd they find them? In Ontario and Quebec. Hundreds of thousands of dollars, which were formerly sent to the United States, have since been passed over to our Grit friends in Ontario and Quebec. And stranger still, the price of goods has not advanced; rather they have been reduced. An hon, member on the Opposition side claimed that the road from Thunder Bay to Lake Nipissing will be an expensive road to construct, and that it will be a most expensive road torun. I admit that. The country is a rough one; there is very little to assist in paying expenses across that line of road, but I look upon it in this way: that it is necessary if we are to maintain the integrity of the Dominion to have a line running through Canadian territory; that we should not allow ourselves to be placed at the mercy of certain gentlemen at Washington, who should have it in their power to say whether an article should go over their road or not. We all know that in 1870 a little difficulty took place in the Red River territory, and it was necessary to send a force to that country. And what was the result of not having a line of road through our own territory? The result was in the first place two months' delay, with all the accompanying expenses amount ing to $2,000,000, chiefly incurred by unloading vessels at Sault Ste. Marie, by carrying the articles on wagons over the Portage, then two miles on the lake, and loading them again on steamers. Then, in 1871, we had a Fenian Raid, when a few wild Irishmen like myself-though I had the honor of commanding a company against them—invaded the country, and when, if we had had our men in uniform, we would not have been allowed to go through the Sault, and could not, therefore, have reached Fort Garry that full. I for one hope the day may never come when we shall have trouble with the people south of the line; but if you look back to the Trent affair, you will remember that at that time we slept in security; we thought we were living alongside an honest and inoffensive people; we thought they would not interfere with us. At that time the regular force from England had to march over 300 miles of snow from Halifax to Quebec. This went to show our leading men that the first thing to be done was to build the Intercolonial Railway. That road was not built in the first place as a commercial enterprise because—if my Eastern friends will forgive me for saying so-it goes through a country that, in a speculative point of view, was a very poor one. But it was necessary for political and national purposes that the road should be built. The North-West is worth more than all you have in the east, and why should we object to spend a few millions of money for the purpose of building a road to run through our own territory and to our own people in the North-West? Now, a comparison has been drawn between the personnel of the first Syndicate and the second Syndicate. The second Syndicate was formed in a hurry and sprung upon the House at the moment least expected; but, at the same time, I believe that the majority of the members of that Syndicate are well known to members of the House. I happen to railroad men who have made money by building railways across the prairie and in making money they have benefitted the country tenfold through which the roads pass. I am also Mr. Scott.

interest in settling their lands by European emigrants. know that English capitalists own three-fourths of the rail-ways in the Western States, and they have encouraged immigration in their own interests. Nine-tenths of the English immigrants in this country have settled through their influence in the Western States during the past 20 years. With regard to this first Syndicate, I must again read from the great organ of the North-West, the Free "To the people of the North-West there is one consideration which weighs more heavily than the number of dollars and acres given for the construction of the railway. Our interests are completely bound up with the progress and development of immigration and settlement. The the progress and development of immigration and settlement. The company or system most likely to prosecute that great work with vigor and success is obviously the one which, miaris paibus, should be preferred. We regard the presence of the St. Paul and Manitoba Railway proprietors on the Syndicate as an excellent guarantee for the speedy settlement of the North-West lands upon liberal terms. They have experience, knowledge, intimate acquaintance with the country and with the methods best adapted to further colonization. We question if, in all Canada, any set of men could be found as well qualified to undertake the vast work of populating our fertile prairies. We have seen no names mentioned in connection with any rival scheme which inspire us with the same confidence on this most important point. The question then arises mentioned in connection with any rival scheme which inspire us with the same confidence on this most important point. The question then arises whether, keeping in mind the proposed postponement of the Lake Superior section, there is any such difference between the two propositions as would counterbalance the absolutely certain difference in colonization which must result, for some years at least, from inexperienced and untrained management. There is no graver point involved in the whole matter, so far as the people of the North-West are concerned. A few thousand settlers more or less each year will have a greater effect upon the future of the North-West than the granting of a few million dollars or acres more or less to a Syndicate."

That is the opinion of a man who is one of the most pronounced men on the opposite side. Now, during the recess, a great number of meetings were held, particularly through the Province of Ontario. I have had the pleasure of reading the addresses delivered at those meetings by some of the leading members of the Opposition. I noticed, among other things, that it was frequently stated that this arrangement would cost the country an immense sum of money—that each county would have to pay its hundreds of thousands, and so forth, for the construction of this railway. I must take exception to that statement; for I do not believe that in the end that road will cost this country one cent. I hold that the value of the land, when increased by the construction of the railway, will be sufficient in itself to pay all that the Dominion of Canada has expended or will expend in the construction of that railway, and I do not care, as a Western man, to hear it stated that we of the west are looking for assistance from the east. Within ten years we shall see the Eastern people looking to the North-West for assistance. We will endeavor to build them up, as we have done in giving employmentthanks to the National Policy-to thousands in supplying us with agricultural implements, which hitherto had been imported from the United States. Now, it is, in my opinion, almost unanimously felt throughout the Dominion, that we should have a line of railway from the of railway from the Atlantic to the Pacific through Canadian territory. If the contract which the Government have entered into will do this, it is the duty of every lover of his country to support the scheme, and the statesmen who have submitted it. I believe it will redound to the best interests of the country, and that the very gentlemen who are now opposed to it, are not really opposed to it in heart and spirit, but simply because it is necessary they should give it a certain opposition, with a view of making political capital and using it at the elections two years hence. Had the Government three months ago made their scheme public, the opposition to it would have been infinitely less than it is, as know some of the members of the first Syndicate who sition to it would have been infinitely less than it is, as reside on this side of the Atlantic They are experienced it required time for people to form a decided opinion. In Ontario and Manitoba to-day all opposition to the contract is fast dying out, and the only place in which we hear any opposition is that tight little Island which has sent here a aware that there are a number of European capitalists on this Syndicate. What we most want in the North-West is sasy to get up petitions. People will sign petitions without immigration, and these European capitalists will have a direct knowing correctly what they are signing. Hon. gentlemen of the Opposition benches will find, in prolonging this debate, they are playing the worst card they can possibly play. They are doing their best to maintain, in his present exalted position, the right hon, gentleman whose life has been spent in promoting the material advancement of Canada, and who is destined to add this achievement to the many which have contributed so largely to our national prosperity.

Mr. HOUDE moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to; and (at 2:05 o'clock, a.m.,) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 25th January, 1881.

The SPEAKEI took the Chair at Three o'clock.

BILL INTRODUCED.

The following Bill was introduced and read the first time:-

Bill (No. 36) further to amend the Act incorporating the Canada Guarantee Company and to change the name of the said Company to "The International Guarantee Association."—(Mr. Gault.)

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

The House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Charles Tupper for the second reading of the resolutions reported from the Committee of the Whole on the 14th January instant, granting certain moneys and lands for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Kailway, and the motion of Mr. Blake in amendment thereto.

Mr. HOUDE. Mr. Speaker, after the able and exhaustive speeches made by hon members on this side of the House, in defence of the contract submitted for our ratification, I had not intended to address the House on this question, especially as I did not feel well; but having read in the local organ of the Opposition, the Ottawa Free Press, an editorial evidently showing an intention on the part of its author to prejudice public opinion in general, and this Parliament in particular, against the French-Canadian Conservative party, of which I have the honor to be a humble member, I cannot help asking the kind indulgence of the House for a few minutes, in order to show how unfair are the strictures passed on us by that paper. The Free Press calls itself a Liberal and Reform journal; but its dealings prove that, if it be Liberal it is only so in diffusing what is the antipodes of truth, and if it be Reform at all, it should first reform itself from the bad habit of misrepresenting others, and doing unto them what it would not like others to do unto itself. In order to show the spirit which pervades the utterances of that organ, I shall read the following puragraph which appeared in last evening's edition:

"The St. Paul Syndicate have, it is said, spent nearly $500, 00 at Ottawa, and consider the money well invested."

Those connected with the editorial staff of the Free Press, or its inspirers, are, perhaps, amiable gentlemen—I suppose they are but I must say when they allow themselves to be carried away so far from the sense of dignity, as they too often do, while speaking of their opponents, that they do not reflect much credit upon the party whose interests they pretend thereby to serve. It seems impossible for them to believe that their political opponents can be actuated by honest metives. How is that? Perhaps it is because they judge others by what they see when they look into the Premier. We helped him when we could, and we shall be mirror of their own consciences. At all events, they remind me of a famous personage mentioned in the Scriptures, who was found in the temple of Jerusalem proclaiming himself much better than one of his neighbors. He modestly attributed to himself all possible virtues, and charitably charged his neighbor, who happened to be behind him, with all kinds of vices; but, in spite of all the great qualities he boasted of, I am sure he had not the faculty of forseeing that in the distant future, in the northern part of a continent then unknown, there would live some of his direct descendants so worthy of their ancestor. Among all the organs of the Opposition the Free Press is the most unfair towards the Conservative party, and it is especially so towards the French-Canadian Conservatives. When it has exhausted all imaginary charges against Conservatives in general, its hatred still furnishes it with pretences to misrepresent the French-Canadian Conservatives in particular. Why is this, Mr. Speaker? I can see no other reason than the origin of my fellow countrymen, and this is a fact to which I dare call the attention of my hon. friends opposite of the same race as myself. In support of what I have just said, I shall read another extract from the editorial columns of the Free Press. It says:

"Sir John Macdonald was quite aware that he would have to reckon with his Quebec supporters, and though in reality they had no claim on the Federa. Treasury, he was not unwilling to secure their wavering allegiance by promises to assist the Provincial Government out of its difficulties. It was consequently agreed in caucus before the Christmas adjournment, that provided the Dominion Government purchased the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental Railway, the Quebec contingent should vote for the Syndicate. While faith was strong in this compact, the Premier made another effort to force the resolutions through Committee and obtain a vote in concurrence, but he was foiled by the superior tactics of the Opposition. Soon it transpired that, with his usual trickiness, Sir John was only playing with his Bieu friends to get their vote first and settle the local question afterwards. Then Mr. Chapleau appeared on the scene and remained at Ottawa some days endeavoring to bring the hieftain to a proper sense of his obligations. Meantime Ministerial orators who had been held in leash were allowed to spout to their heart's content. With the chance of a French Conservative bolt the Government were now as anxious to stave off the division as before they were eager to bring it on. Finally, Mr. Chapleau left Ottawa grumbling and dissatisfied; then his organ, Lu Minerue, came out with a four-column attack on the Syndicate terms, and urging the Dominion Government to modify them in several important particulars. Such is the present situation. The sticking point, we believe is the amount asked for the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental Railway. Mr. Chapleau says it cost twelve and is worth fourteen million dollars, but Sir John, acting for the Minnesota Syndicate, can only offer seven and a half."

This editorial reminds me of an anecdote clated by the right

This editorial reminds me of an anecdote elated by the right hon, leader of the present Government after the battle of the 17th September, 1878. A political friend of the Free Press went to his barber to be shaved and was charged double the ordinary price for the reason that his face had become twice as long as usual. The extract I have just read leads me to believe that the gentlemen of the Free Press have not ceased yet paying that double price to their burbers. And it strikes me also, Sir, that such an extraordinary development of the outside of their thinking portion, seems to have been detrimental to the inside of it, if we are to judge by their still increased narrow-mindedness. No fair-minded person will see anything extraordinary in the fact that the hon. Premier of Quebec has made a visit to Ottawa. That gentleman and his colleagues are devoted to the welfare of their Province with whose administration they are charged, and they saw at once that the interest of the great provincial railway which they administer would perhaps be affected by the contract which we are now discussing, and they came here, not with the intention of doing what the Free Press gratuitously insinuates, but legitimately and wisely to look after the interests of their Province. So far from their having sought to influence hon. members from the Province of Quebec, never have they been so long in Ottawa when we have seen so little of them. The Conservatives in this House from the Province of Quebec are all friends of the local glad to do it again when occasion offers. But if it were true, as pretended, that that hon gentleman and his colleagues came here to dictate to us what line of conduct we should follow on this question, which affects the whole Dominion, he would find a decided opposition to submit to his dictation. We are quite able to do alone the business for which we have been The charge that the Premier of Quebec is elected. attempting to dictate to the members from that Province, is utterly groundless and absurd. That hon, gentleman respects us too much, as we respect him, for him to attempt to play such a rôle. As I said a moment ago, he has come here to look after the interests of the railway of his own Province. I do not know whether his fears, or whether the fears of the Minerve, so ably edited by the hon. and distinguished member for Ottawa, were well founded, but they were legitimate. They thought, as several hon members of this House thought, that some of the clauses in this contract were not clear enough, and the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall) took the same view in reference to one clause especially, namely, that relating to the tolls which the Syndicate could charge. I think that the Minerve would be the last paper to oppose the policy of this Government. It had fears, perhaps legitimate, and perhaps unfounded, lest the Syndicate might charge such rates as they pleased in connection with our Provincial railways, and so jeopardize the interests of the Province of Quebec. The declaration of the right hon. First Minister the other night must have dissipated these fears. I am not ashamed to avow that I had some fears in this direction; but now, after the explanation of the right hon. gentleman that a clause will be put in the general Railway Act to remove all doubt on that point, I am glad to be able to say that those fears were not founded in fact. I ask all fair-minded members—even our hon. colleagues from the Province of Ontario-why they should regard with jealousy the presence of the Premier of Quebec in Ottawa to guard the interests of the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental Railway? That railway is destined soon to carry through freight to the Intercolonial Railway and through the Maritime Provinces; consequently, the interests of the Lower Provinces are identical with those of Quebec. I ask hon. gentlemen from the Province of Ontario, themselves, what interest they can have contrary to the interests of the Province of Quebec on this question. They have none. They may speak of the interests of Toronto; but the freight destined for the markets of Europe cannot stay at Toronto; it cannot be put on board the Atlantic steamers there. Consequently we, from the Province of Quebec, have not any cause of jealousy towards Toronto. We see that great commercial centre prospering more and more; we wish to see her derive her share of the benefit from the great enterprise of the Pacific Railway; and we have no doubt she will have it, and having it, she will contribute at the same time to our prosperity, because the freight from there must come to the Ports of Montreal, Quebec, Halifax and St. John. I believe, therefore, that it is very impolitic on the part of journalists to try to excite sectional feelings and prejudices on a question like this, on which we should rather all unite for the good of our country. Sir, the Conservatives of the Province of Quebec need not be bought to support this contract. If there is a wing in the Conservative party which has always been strongly in favor of that great enterprise, it is the Quebec wing. All the principal points we asked in the past we find te-day in the contract so carefully drawn; and I must tell the editors of the Free Press that they are very unjust to the Conservatives of the Province of Quebec. Whether in power or in Opposition, we have for many years formed the great majority of the right hon. leader of the Government, and I ask them and the members of this House if they can point to a single instance where the French-Canadian Conservatives Mr. Houde.

grant to their other fellow-countrymen of whatever origin or creed they might be. Sir, while we have always been loval to our leaders, we never sacrificed our principles, or what we thought to be the public interest, to that attachment. The best proof that I can give of our sincerity and honesty in supporting the measure now submitted by the Government for our ratification, is the fact that the Conservatives have already supported a policy much less advantageous to the country, and that policy was offered by our opponents. After having helped their opponents to pass the Act of 1874, a measure certainly less advantageous to the country than the present contract, they must be believed to be sincere and honest when they give their support to that contract. With the kind permission of the House, I will continue for a few moments, in order to answer certain parts of the speeches of my hon. friends, the Liberals of the Province of Quebec I will now speak in French, as that language comes easier to me, and because I desire to be as short as possible. I listened yesterday, with much interest to the speech of my hon friend from Rimouski (Mr. Fiset) as I had listened before to the other Liberal members. Since the beginning of this debate I have also read attentively the articles published by the organs of the Opposition, in order to form a fair and impartial opinion upon this great question.

After mature reflection, Mr. Speaker, I have come to the conclusion that the objections raised by hon. gentlemen opposite are either groundless or greatly exaggerated, and at all events they ought not to prevent Parliament from ratifying the contract in the interest of the country. The principal objection raised by our hon. friends from the Province of Quebec-by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) and the hon. member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard)—is that we have failed in our duty towards the people in not appealing to their judgment on this question; in not submitting the question to them. I will remark to my hon. friends that if, and during the general election that we have had since 1872, they have failed to discuss this matter before the people they have failed to do that which they ought to have done, and at all events they have failed to do that which we, on this side of the House, have done. It was in 1872, it was in 1874, it was in 1878, that we ought to have discussed, before the people, this great question of the Pacific Railway. It was the principal question of the hour in 1872, it was the principal question of the hour in 1874, it was the second question of the hour in 1878. For one, I am nowise embarrassed in endorsing the policy of the Government upon this question, for, after the National Policy, the policy of protection, the question of the building of the Pacific Railway is the one that I discussed at the greatest length and in the most detailed manner with my electors in 1878. I desired a change of Government, and I thought that it would be in the interest of the country, but I did not know that hon, gentlemen opposite would have power; nevertheless, I promised my electors to support, with regard to this question, a policy such as we have to-day; even had the present contract been brought down by hon. gentlemen opposite, I could not but vote in favor of it. So much the more so when it is brought down by my own hon. friends ought I to give it my hearty support, and that is what I am going to do. I admit with hon gentlemen opposite that this question is of the highest importance, of capital importance, and that the people had the right to be consulted upon the cost of the road and as to the principal features of the question. But, Sir, that is what we have done; and if some, through negligence, have not done so, that is not a reason for reversing the judgment of a majority of the electors of this I maintain that the people, in three different elections, have approved of the building of the Pacific Railway. Now, there are some details that were not foreseen, it is true, but so it is with all matters of legislation. It is impossible to foresee, during an election, what will be the details asked a privilege or a law which they were not prepared to of all the questions that are to come before Parliament. We can come to an understanding upon general principles, upon the great outlines of a policy, but we can go no farther. By asking to return to the country, hon, gentlemen are trying to introduce an impossible system into the country; it might as well be said that at every stage of the legislation, the electors should be consulted, which would be an impossibility; and moreover it could not be properly done, and the people would not have the benefit of an enlightened discussion; they would render judgments less favorable to their interests, than we, who are here to take the place of the people, can do for their own advantage. Indeed, why are we here, 206 members instead of the whole people of Canada, to legislate in their name and in their interest. It is because it is impossible to get the people to pronounce upon all the details of a policy, upon all the details of legislation. It is for that reason that the representative system was invented, a system that hon. gentlemen opposite would not wish to put aside for an impracticable one. It is true, Sir, that the Act of 1872 was never directly submitted to the people, but I maintain that the principal features of that law were known beforehand and were discussed. I very well remember having met at Montreal my hon. friends opposite, and having heard them reproach Sir George Etienne Cartier with not giving a guarantee that the eastern terminus would be located so as to protect the interests of the Province of Quebec. On one occassion I left Quebec for Montreal on purpose to be present at a great public meeting held on St. James' Square; Sir George Cartier had brought Sir Hugh Allan, the future president of the company that was then being formed, so that he might declare that it was the intention of the Company to locate the terminus of the railway near Lake Nipissing; and I heard the Liberals say then that the people were being deceived. They said: "Give us the proof, show us the charter, and we will believe you if you; do not, we will not believe you. And I am of opinion that if hon, gentlemen would refer to the National of the 12th, or 13th or 15th of August 1872, they would find the proof of what I state; they would find that the proof that the paper I speak of reported the words of Sir George E. Cartier and of Sir Hugh Allan, stating that the terminus of the railway would be near Lake Nipissing, and the Liberals said: It is all very fine and all very well if we were only certain of it." Well, my hon. friends have the proof now that we are not endeavoring to deceive them; they have the proof that this road secures to our Province, as well as to the other Provinces, a fair and advantageous terminus, and that the terminus is near Lake Nipissing. Are they satisfied to-day in the possession of that which they demanded in 1872, and for which they defeated Sir George in Montreal East? No, Sir; now that they have this terminus they do not want it; they laugh at the section north of Lake Superior; they want a line partly built on American territory. Our hon. friends opposite endeavor to make us contradict ourselves, but they cannot do so, for they contradict themselves on this very point; they connot dony that they do not repudiate what they asked for in 1872. The building of the road is not only advantageous to the Province of Quebec, but it is indispensable to its prosperity, and it is in accordance with the fairness with which they wished to see all the Provinces, and their own among others, treated with regard to the construction of the Pacific Railway. For my part, I am not opposed to the construction of the Sault Ste. Marie Branch when the time comes. I believe that this line will be built, and it is going to carry only a fifth part of the trade that the hon leader of the Opposition foresees in the near future. I say that we have no need of troubling ourselves about it, for it is indispensable to the Company of the Northern Paeific Railway, and this Company will build it without having to spend a cent. I think, indeed, that this branch is destined to bring in a part of the trade of the American North-West, but if we do not take the precaution of building although my experience is not long, that the United States.

the section to the north of Lake Superior, these advantages would soon be taken away by the disadvantages that we would experience by the abandonment of the Lake Superior section. I remember—the fact has been mentioned before, but it cannot be too often repeated—that in 1870, when, unfortunately, in a territory lately annexed to the Dominion. trouble arose, the Americans prevented our Government from sending arms, munitions, and soldiers through the Sault Ste. Marie Canal. I heard the hon, member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) say that the first American Pacific railway was built at the beginning of the Civil War because the people felt the immediate and argent necessity of uniting the Pacific States with the Central States. Well, Sir, I hope and trust that the same painful circumstances will not again present themselves in our country, yet it is better to prevent the evil than to remedy it. If, in a few years, and it is not impossible after all, the Mother Country should be involved in war with that umbrageous and hostile power. Russia-and it is well known that not long since the relations between these two countries were on the breaking point, a part of the Russian fleet having made suspicious movements off the coast of our Pacific Province-if we could not send help to this Province, or if trouble were to arise in the North-West, and if we were obliged to send by land troops, munitions, and arms, and were the Americans to refuse to allow munitions of war and soldiers to pass over their territory, in what an awkward position we would find ourselves. That is why it is our duty, imposed upon us by patriotism, without mentioning our material interests, to construct the section to the north of Lake Superior, so as to have an iron band uniting all the Provinces from one end of the Dominion to the other. And this section to the north of Lake Superior is advantageous to all the Provinces; it is advantageous to the Province of Manitoba, it is advantageous to the future Provinces of the west, in ordert hat immigrants who in future will go to the North-West should not be obliged to pass over American territory, and there be exposed to the solicitations of railway and American land companies' agents, who keep up such a disastrous and hurtful competition with respect to immigration. It will also be advantageous to the Province of Ontario, for this section will be built on the territory of Ontario. At the same time it is advantageous to the Province of Quebec and the Maritime Provinces, and also to the Province of Ontario in this new respect, because it saves us from the danger of seeing a part of our trade diverted from our ports to the benefit of American ports. Sir, I would be the last man in this House to entertain hostile feelingsfeelings of hatred toward our Ame ican neighbors. They are a great people that I esteem, and whose great practical qualities and intelligence I admire. But they are a selfish people; and when I heard an honorable member going into ecstacies over the American people who seemed to be so dear to him, even dearer than the Mother Country, when I heard him say that they are the most amiable people in the world. I must say that they are not very amiable, at least, towards the Mother Country. If ever England has experienced and does yet experience the bad will of a nation it is that of the United States, however astonishing that may seem. believe that the American people will always have the good sense to understand that it is not their interest, nor would it redound to their glory, to pick unjust and useless quarrels with us. Yet often a Government obliges the people to do that which they fain would not do. We have before now seen nations plunged into war by the fault of their Governments. Once the fault committed, national pride prevents from going back. It is, therefore, possible that evil-disposed politicians may some day endeavor to persuade the American people to make war on Canada and England. Now, one of the means of avoiding that is to make ourselves as independent as possible from our neighbors. I very well remember.

about ten years ago, came near going to war with England, and threatened to invade Canada in a fortnight and take it in a month. When we saw the powerful Senator Sumner, when we saw General Butler and Senator Chandler, three prominent men of the Republican party, endeavor to get their country into a war with England on account of the Alabama claims, I say, and everybody knows, that we came very near to a breaking off of friendly relations between England and the United States, and that there is one man who prevented this evil from happening, and that man was President Grant. He had in all likelihood seen enough horrors during the Civil War; he was satisfied with that, and he understood that a nation that wages a bloody war is always the loser even though she be victorious in the end; and I am not at all surprised that General Grant should have been so well received when he went to England, for he had rendered service not only to his own country, but he had also, at the same time, rendered a great service to humanity. Sir, the hon, members of the Opposition have endeavored to make the people believe that we are supporting a policy that will be the ruin of the country, amusing themselves with increasing, by fancy calculations, the value of the lands that the Government is granting to the Syndicate. On hearing them, this year, estimating these lands at three, four, and even five dollars an acre, I said to myself that it was much to be regretted that these hon, gentlemen had not praised our lands in the North-West sooner, for, if they had done so, these lands would have had more value in the eyes of strangers than they have to day. Last year they did not think that with 100,000,000 acres of land we would be able to build the Pacific Railway, because they did not consider these lands worth enough for that, and this year they increase the value of them in a wonderful manner. But these hon. gentlemen do not observe that by thus running up the price of the land, they are placing them: selves in a very awkward position, for they show that the bargain they had made, and that they could not carry out, but which they would fain have carried out, was a great deal more disadvantageous than the one we are now going to carry through. For, Sir, if we estimate the lands at $2 an acre we find that the bargain proposed by hon. gentlemen opposite, in 1874, when they were in power, would have cost over $50,000,000 more than the present contract. Now, if our hon. friends put the price up to $3 an acre, the difference is still greater; if they raise the price to $4 or $5 an acre, the difference increases by $28,000,000 or $29,000,000 with each dollar that they add to the value of the land per acre; so that they place themselves in an illogical position and in direct contradiction with their past statements. I will not dwell at length on this subject, which has already been discussed. I only wish to draw attention to the contradiction in which our hon, friends place themselves; and it is certainly not for them to reproach us with giving too much for the construction of the road, when, according to their own calculations, they were willing to give some $00,000,000 more than we are giving by the present contract. The greater part of the objections they have raised against the first contract are to be found in the second contract that they have themselves hatched, and which contains all the ideas they have put forth during the debate on this question. Now that they see the child is not legitimate in the eyes of the public, now that they see that it is not well received by the public, they do not want to own it. But, Sir, the paternity of this child belongs to them; it is they who have hatched this second Syndicate; it is their ideas that we find in that contract. It is what we, on this side of the House, could have most wished to happen, in order to answer hon, gentlemen concerning the objections they raise and the reproaches we receive from them. There are, Sir, in the contract centain clauses that I would have liked not to see there, and that devotedness of his followers from the Province of Quebec. Mr. Houde.

clude in it, but in every contract, as it has already been remarked, there are two parties, and the whole may be advantageous, although some details are not as pleasing as others. The principal objection that I had, and that some of my colleagues perhaps had against this contract, was the doubt that seems to exist as to the meaning of the words "capital expended" before the Government can interfere in order to reduce the Company's rates, if these rates are exorbitant and unreasonable, when the Company has realized a net profit, working expenses being paid, of ten per cent. I read in the amendment moved by the leader of the Opposition that the new Syndicate will be content in this respect with the General Railway Act. But, Sir, the Railway Act protects much less the public interests and protects much more the interests of the Company than the clause that the Government has had inserted in the first contract, for, according to the General Railway Act, the Company will have the right to realize fifteen per cent. of net profits, whilst according to the contract it would only have the right of realizing ten per cent.; and yet we see the hon, leader of the Opposition, contradicting himself in a manner which surprises me, and compares the two Acts, whilst this c mparison is altogether unfavorable to the pretension and to the ideas that he wishes should prevail. It is about the same thing with all the objections raised by these hon, gentlemen. This contract is to be taken as a whole, and it is thus by considering it as a whole that I can support the Government measure, for I consider it as highly advantageous to the interests of the country. As to the exemption from taxation, it is a trifle as has already been remarked. I have heard it stated by hon members opposite that we were ruining the older Provinces for the benefit of the future inhabitants of the North-West Territories. Well, do not hon, gentlemen understand that this exemption from taxation that we are imposing on the people of the North-West is a slight contribution that we are obliging them to pay for the construction of the Pacific Railway. Is it exorbitant, Sir? Certainly not. Other parts of the country would have been only too happy to have their territory crossed by railways at such a trifling expense. Now, I am willing to believe that if hon, gentlemen opposite had been in power and had had to negotiate with the Syndicate, that they would have sought to obtain better terms. I give them enough patriotism for that; but is it taxing their impartiality too much to ask them to suppose that our friends have endeavored to obtain the same thing, that they endeavored to obtain better terms than those that we have. although they are very advantageous for the country. And, Sir, I do think that the Government could have obtained better terms for the country had it not been for the imprudent, not to say unpatriotic, policy of our opponents. If these hon, gentlemen had not tried by every means to belittle the resources of the North-West, to belittle the value of our public lands, to make the world believe that this railway for twenty, twenty-five or fifty years to come would not earn enough by the freight it would have to carry to pay for the wheel-grease, I think, indeed, that hon. Ministers would have been able to obtain better terms. But whose fault is it? If we have not better terms it is the fault of hon, gentlemen opposite. They ought not therefore to cast blame on the Government, but they should rather say: mea culpa. Now, I do not wish to be too long, and I will conclude, because I understand that it is the desire of the House to reach the vote to-night, and I wish so myself. But I must add, since the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) has made a special appeal to the Conservatives of Quebec in favor of his views on this question, that if I had more authority to speak in the names of my hon. colleagues from the Province of Quebec, that it would rather be for us to appeal to his patriotism and to the hon. Ministers, I am sure, would have preferred not to in, and to ask them to support the Government on this question, seeing that the Ministerial policy is more to the advantage of the country than the scheme brought down by hon gentlemen opposite when they were in power. I regret, Sir, to see, on this great question, as on many other kindred questions, our hon, friends of the Liberal party in the Province of Quebec trying to prevent us from carrying out this undertaking, as they opposed the building of the Grand Trunk and nearly all the undertakings initiated by the Conservative party. I say to my hon, friend from Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) and his followers, that I exceedingly regret to see them entering into a future that is too like the line of conduct followed by their party in the past, and which prevented that party from ever doing anything in the interest of the country. I regret to see my hon. friends still persistently identifying themselves with a party that should be dead—a party between which and themselves they should have drawn a sharp line of demarcation. They should have begun this Parliament with a new policy—they who should be the men of the future of the Liberal party in the Province of Quebec, and who persist in being the men of a past who have been so often and so justly condemned by the great majority of the people in the Province of Quebec. Sir, there are a great many reasons to be given in favor of latifying the Government policy, considering the circumstances in which not only this country, but also the neighboring country is placed The United States are making such efforts to keep the lead in the way of national progress—in the way of railroads especially—that we should, as far as we are able, endeavor to imitate them. if we do not wish to remain in a position quite with regard to the European counare going to send to America a unfavorable tries that large number of emigrants, who. if they come here, will enable us to build up an important nation in this part of the American continent. We must strive to draw to our territory European immigration, composed of Irish, English, French, Scotch, and Germans, and prevent them from taking the direction of the United States. Those are particular circumstances which we should take into consideration now that we have to decide such a question. Sir, I have often met, and quite lately, during the election of my hon. friend from Joliette (Mr. McConville)-I have met Liberal speakers from the Province of Quebec, who reproached us with working against the interest of our Province and of our race by our Pacific Railway policy, by our policy in favor of European immigration. I will not state, Sir, that the speaker I met in the county of Joliette, although he is one of the best speakers of the Liberal party, represented exactly the feelings of my hon. friends who are sitting on the other side of the House. I will be generous enough towards them not to hold them responsible for the narrow ideas of this Radical to whom I have just alluded, yet this example, with many others that I could mention, goes to show that certain papers, such as the Witness and the Free Press, &c., are wrong in trying to make the people believe that the more a French Canadian is an advanced Liberal, a Radical, the more his views are large and favorable to the progress of the country. The advanced Liberals in this country have ideas and principles as hostile to the harmony and good understanding that should exist in our midst as the Radical with which they sympathize, and which is now bringing humiliation and grief on France, our former mother-country. For my part, I have no objection to having Irish, French, English, Germans, and Scotch brought here to help us to build up a great nation on this continent. When we look upon the condition of France to-day we have the proof of the truth of what I state. Can a country be found that is more homogeneous than France? And yet is there a people more unhappily divided among themselves than the French people? That proves, Sir, that the same language does not suffice to form a united people, a people of brothers. What is wanted is a communion of ideas, of principles and aspirations. We had the proof of it in France when those unhappy Alsatians, who for the greater part did not speak French, were being killed for the protection of France, whilst a great number of Parisians who pretend to be the most French of all, were tearing their mother's bosom instead of marching against the enemy. Well, Sir, I say that in this country one can be of Irish extraction, of English extraction, of German extraction, or of French extraction, and yet form a project and yet form a united people, a people of brothers, understanding one another and treating one another well though speaking different la guages. It is sufficient that there should be between us a communion of ideas, of social principles, of aspirations that we should all tend towards the same object, that we should all have in view the aggrandizement and the prosperity of our common country. I shall not probably see that myself although I am yet young, but perhaps others will see in twenty or thirty years honce, French Canadians representing in this House the provinces of the West, together with their colleagues of other nationalities. It is from this liberal standpoint that I look upon the question, and it is for these reasons that I shall support the Government measure. This Government has given us the National Policy for our national industries, and I expect trom them another kind of protection against the prejudices, against the narrow ideas, against the mean ideas, and the divisions that the Free Press and other badly inspired papers are endeavoring to propagate amongst us. I trust that not only in our party but also in the party opposite there will be found men of large enough minds to batter down these unhappy prejudices so that we may form a united people of brothers, having in view the common good, the prosperity and aggrandizement of this Canada of ours.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne). Since I have had the honor of a seat in Parliament, I have been called on to give two votes in connection with the question of constructing the Canadian Pacific Railway. In 1879, I placed on record my vote against the policy brought down by the hon. Minister of Railways, and last Session I felt it my duty to vote in favor of the amendment of the hon. member for West Durham, opposing the present construction of the road in British Columbia. Ten years ago, when the Province of British Columbia was admitted to the Union, the terms on which it was admitted were altogether to its advantage, and when the Liberal Government came into power, they found themselves bound hand and foot to build the road across the continent in ten years. The leader of the Conservative party seems to be carried away by the national sentiment of building a road across the continent, utterly regardless of cost. This appears to me to be Canadian jingoism, akin to the jingo policy of the Conservative party in Great Britain, which aimed at making her great by annexing territories and carrying on foreign wars at no matter what cost. During recess, I watched with considerable interest the steps taken by the Government for securing the building of this railway by a company. The announcement made by the right hon. Premier at Hochelaga, that he had succeeded in securing a company to build the line for $25,000,000 and 25,000,000 acres, was received with joy by all political parties. The First Minister then took good care to conceal the objectionable features of the contract from the public. We were told when the House opened that the contract must be passed at once, but although they have a large majority at their back, the Government failed to force it through, and the Opposition may congratulate themselves that they not only obtained time to consider the contract, but secured two important modifications one being a more stringent definition of the character of the road to be built by the company, and the other the amend ment premised by the hon. the First Minister, in answer to the hon, member for Halton last night, in order to cover freight rates. One of the reasons why I am opposed to this contract, is that we are called on to contribute too largely in the shape of subsidies to the Syndicate. Not only do we give $25,000,000 and 25,000,000 acres, but we bind ourselves to complete the most difficult portions of the road and to build an additional section in British Columbia, besides giving other important concessions. Hon. gentlemen opposite have laid great stress on the assumption that the lands are only worth $1 an acre; but no later than last year the hon. Premier estimated them as ranging in value as high as $4, and averaging $3.18 per acre, and I can see no reason why that statement should not be accepted now, especially by hon, gentlemen opposite, in estimating the amount of subsidy given to the Syndicate. I have no objection to the Government proceeding with the prairie section, as that would open up that country; and when a population has settled there, sufficient to warrant the continuance of the work through British Columbia, we can then complete the road from the Atlantic to the Pacific through Canadian territory. We have had an example of the evil of too great dread of the United States, in the-locating of the Intercolonial, at an enormous cost, along the north shore of New Brunswick lest it should be too near the American border. The consequence is, that that portion of the road, instead of being profitable, will entail a serious loss to the country for all time to come. I opposed last year the building of the road through the mountains of British Columbia, because I saw no necessity for that road-while there is no population in the North-West, and when the cost of running must necessarily be very heavy. Last year the hon. Minister of Railways advocated the building of the line to Sault Ste. Marie, which he now denounces as an unpatriotic idea, although this road would give us, at a comparatively small expenditure, connections in a year or two with the north-western States and our North-West Territories, and enable us to defer the great expenditure which the section north of Lake Superior will entail. The hon, member for Annapolis expressed himself, the other night, prepared to swallow the contract. He took particular pains to point out that it was the best ever submitted to the country, and quoted a number of figures, and made calculations, to prove the correctness of his statement. The people of Nova Scotia, and even the gentlemen on the Treasury bonches, have hitherto placed but little dependence in that hon, gentleman's calculations I find that the hon, gentleman, in 1869, he being then Commissioner of Government Railways in Nova Scotia, furnished statistics and estimates for the management of that road, which afterwards proved strangely incorrect. I also find in the public records that these statistics submitted by him to the Government led by the present First Minister were so incorrect that the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall) then Minister of Public Works appointed a Commission to enquire into the cause of the incorrect statistics, and upon the recommenda-tion of that hon. gentleman removed him (Mr. Longley) from that position. The hon. member for Lunenberg (Mr. Kaulbach) during his speech raised many objections to the contract. He objects to the admission of steel rails free of duty; to the transfer of the Pembina Branch; he thought the Government should have the power to purchase and assume control of the road when built; he was opposed to the provisions exempting the lands from taxation; but on "calm reflection" he changed his mind on these points. Another of his objections was allayed by the announcement of the First Minister that the Government would introduce an amendment to the General Railway Act-we are yet in the dark as to what it is—but it was sufficient to satisfy the hon. member. Those are objections which should deter any hon. member from voting in favor of the contract, but I was satisfied that no matter what his objections were, he was prepared to support the Government. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Doull) last night adduced very serious objections prepared to support the Government. The hon, member for Pictou (Mr. Doull) last night adduced very serious objections at great length upon this question, I am not distorted to the contract. He pointed out how the coal and iron interests of Pictou would be seriously affected, but it seems the Minister of Finance has given him an assurance that the manufacturers of steel and the coal interests will be pro-He referred to the statement made by the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Killam) and attributed to him the possession of a "fertile imagination," because he had said there might possibly be a port on Hudson's Bay by which the grain which it was expected would be brought down to Halifax for shipment might be exported to Europe. If he had paid particular attention to the debates, or to speeches delivered outside of the House, he would be aware, that that suggestion originated in the fertile brain of the Minister of Railways. The other evening, in the course of the discussion, the hon. member for East York (Mr. Boultbee), who has been styled "the fighting man" of the Government party, rose with a burst of triumph and read a telegram addressed to the Minister of Finance, pointing out that the Municipal Council of Gloucester, represented in this House by a member of the Opposition, had passed a resolution condoning the Syndicate agreement, and hon. gentlemen opposite thereupon asked the hon, gentleman to support the contract. There is a county in Nova Scotia represented in this House by an hon. gentleman occupying a high position in the Ministry—a Conservative stronghold where the Liberals are hardly able to secure a majority in any polling section—I refer to the county of Cumberland represented by the Minister of Railways—which has passed a resolution condemning the Syndicate bargain. It is hardly worth while to read the resolutions which have been placed in my hands, as I do not wish to deprive the Minister of Railways the pleasure of doing so. A copy has been forwarded to him, and no doubt he will submit them to the House and act on the wishes of his constituents. I do not think I can add anything to what has already been said in opposition to the contract now on the Table, and I will simply state my objections to it, and the reasons why I feel called upon to support the amendment of the hon, member for West Durham. One objection is this: That the Government have another offer in their hand from responsible capitalists, by the acceptance of which the whole road may be built for many millions less than it will cost under the Syndicate bargain. Hon, gentlemen on the Government side of the House do not believe that this is a genuine offer, but when we look at the names attached to it, and recognize the fact that those gentlemen have placed in the hands of the Government upwards of $1,000,000 surety for carrying out the whole of the contract, either for the completion of the road or any portion of it, it will be difficult for them to make the people believe that the second Syndicate are not in earnest. Another objection I have to the contract is, that the subsidies proposed to be granted are altogether too large, and that the monopoly which would be created is not in the interest of the country. Another objection is, that the completion of the Lake Superior section will not be required for ten or fifteen years, at the end of which time the people in the North West may be in a posi-tion to contribute themselves towards the building of the road. Another objection is, that the expense of carrying out the terms of the contract, at the present time, will be borne only by the older Provinces, because there is no population in the North-West Territories to contribute to it. From the action of hon. gentlemen opposite, we must assume that this contract will be ratified by Parliament. I believe that in expressing the views I have placed before the House, and in giving the vote I propose to give, I am acting in the interest of the Province of Nova Scotia and of the constituents I represent, and for the Dominion at large, and for that reason I feel compelled to support the amendment moved by the hon. member for West Durham.

Minister of Finance has given him an assurance that the that have cropped up during the debate, and correct some Mr. Robertson (Shelburne).

mis-statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite. I find that almost immediately after I had spoken, and had dealt with the question of taxation, the organ of the Reform party altogether ignored what I adduced before the House at that time, and placed the question of taxation in an entirely different light before the people. Several hon. gentlemen, who, in debate, are accustomed to take their inspiration from the Globe, have followed in the same wake; others have, upon the floor of the House, exaggerated the charges that were made respecting exemption from taxation. The member for South Perth (Mr. Trow) a few nights ago, after complimenting me upon my industry in the House, said I had not properly discussed this question; but I notice that neither he nor any other hon. member on that side have answered my statements with reference to the amount of taxation which this Company will save as regards the road. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) placed the amount of exemption on account of the road at $21,000,000; the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron) placed the amount at $15,000,000, while the Globe, the organ of these hon. gentlemen, makes the amount $6,978,950. I think it would be a very fortunate thing if these hon, gentlemen and their organ could come at least a little nearer reconciling their estimates, but for my part I am prepared to show that these exemptions so far from amounting to the least of these estimates, will amount to a little more than $6,000. My hon. friend from South Perth (Mr. Trow) was quite mistaken as to the assessed value of property in his own county when he said it was valued at $50 per acre. I have before me the assessment for last year, and the other night I quoted from the assessment of 1874. I find that the assessed value of property in Perth last year was $27, and in 1872 only $13 per acre. I took the year 1874 in my former estimate, because I thought when we considered how long Ontario had been settled it was but right and fuir to take what might be considered a medium amount, and I, therefore, took the year 1874. In order to satisfy the hon. gentleman, I shall take the assessment of ten counties in the Province of Ontario, embracing the richest and some of the poorest, and I find that their average is $12.14 an acre. I shall take the following counties in making the calculation: Grey, Lanark, Middlesex, Norfolk, Perth, Prescott and Russell, Renfrew, Simcoe, Stormont and Dundas and Glengary, and the very old county of Welland. I find that there are 6,740,000 acres in those ten counties, and that they are assessed at $81,945,000 or $12.14 per acre. Now, at the very most there are not more than 1,000 miles of railway in the North-West which we can exempt from taxation. I believe there are only 854 miles, but I wish to give the hon. gentlemen the benefit of every doubt. Taking 1,000 miles at 12 acres to the mile, we have 12,000 acres, and allowing one fourth for the sidings we have 3,000 acres more, or 15,000 acres altogether. If we assess that at $12.14 per acre, we get $182,100. Taking 100 stations at $1,500 each, which I think is a very liberal estimate, we have $150,000 more. I will place the workshops at $100,000, though we heard from the hon, member for Selkirk (Mr. Scott) last night that the city of Winnipeg was willing to give no less than 30 acres of land and perpetual exemption from taxation if kind in his Manual. workshops were located in that city; but I will forego that Mr. RYKERT. exemption so as to give the hon gentleman every possible advantage in the calculation. This would make a total assessment of $432,100. When I say that I will take the rate of assessment at 11 cents on the dollar, I think the hon. gentleman will admit, that I am stretching the point amazingly in his favor, for the average rate of assessment in Ontario is little beyond a of a cent. I venture to say that the assessment of this city, or of almost value of the property, I find that the total exemption amounts to just $6,481.50, instead of the large and conflicting estimates made by the leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron), and their organ the Globe, respectively. I think I am, therefore, justified in saying that my statements the other evening cannot be contradicted by hon. gentlemen opposite, and I am quite certain if they had been able to contradict them they would have done so long ago. I think, however, they ought to have candor enough to admit that they were mistaken. There is another bubble which I wish to prick for hon. gentlemen opposite. We have been told repeatedly, and with a great flourish of trumpets, that the amount of the exemption on the lands, if a comparison were made with the Union Pacific, would amount to an enormous sum of money. We have had the statement repeated over and over again that the amount of that taxation on account of the lands was, annually, $835,023. I will read to these hon. gentlemen what their organ says, in order that the public may see how determined they are to exaggerate the figures and treat the question unfairly. When I first heard it stated by the Opposition that the hon. the Minister of Railways had deliberately thrown away $23,000,000 of our money to the Syndicate, in the way of exemption, I felt it my duty to examine into the question. I heard hom gentlemen say that the Union Pacific had paid $835,023 last year in taxes, but I knew that was incorrect. However, I took the trouble to write the Secretary-Treasurer of that Companyand I also addressed a letter to Mr. Poor, the gentleman who is so celebrated in railway matters and whose works have been so frequently quoted during this discussion. I will read the replies which I received-

Mr. TROW. I wish to say in reply to what has been stated by the hon. gentleman, that I took a period of ten years, from 1869 to 1879.

Mr. RYKERT. The hon. member for Huron ought to correct the organ of his party. That is what I wish to correct before I get through. The amount stated, viz.: $825.023, was the whole amount paid in seventeen years by the Company. The Globe said a few days ago it was only one year. I have a letter from Mr. Poor, the gentleman who wrote that Manual, and he says:

"New York, 19th January, 1881.

"Dear Sir,—I have yours of the 17th, I send herewith a copy of the last report of the Union Pacific Railway Company. The taxes $835,023 are for the whole period of the grant. The amount of taxes the past year was $108,437.

"H. V. Poor," (Signed)

That is confirmed again by the following letter:-

"Boston, 19th January, 1881.

"Dear Sir,—The sum of taxes paid in lands which you quote from Poor's Manual, is the total of taxes in land from the beginning.

(Signed) "H. McFarland,
"Secretary-Treasurer, Union Pacific Railway."

Mr. CAMERON (South Huron). Is that taxes on land? Mr. RYKERT. Yes.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. Poor does not say anything of the

Mr. RYKERT. Mr. Poor gives a summary of the expenses of the Land Commission, and he gives a summary of the taxes on land. If the hon, gentleman will turn to the last number of Poor's Manual he will find that the land grant altogether was 12,085,227 acres. Up to December, 1879, they had sold 1,508,433 acres, leaving unsold on the 1st January, 1880, 10,514,789 acres. The expenses of the land department, the taxes on the land, expenses of town lots, and the discount and commission amounted altogether any other city in the Dominion, does not exceed to $1,889,877 from the commencement of the land opera-one and a half cents. But taking the figure which I named, and taking also the very liberal allowance I made for the last year was $835,023. Now, we will go to a higher authority - to their political creator, the man that makes and unmakes them. We will take the Globe of December 15th, 1880, and hear what it says:

"Still more light can be thrown upon the vastness of this gift by adducing the amount of taxation paid by the Union Pacific Road. In one year, 1879, the Union Pacific paid taxes on 1,597 miles of road, amounting to $279,158; and in the same year the same Company paid taxes on its land grant amounting to $835,023."

Mr. CAMERON. I never stated that the Union Pacific paid last year $835.023. If my hon, friend will turn to the report he will find that I said four years, and so Mr. Poor laid it down in his Manual of this year.

Mr. RYKERT. I notice that the hon. gentleman has summarized the amount at $835,023 a year for four years. They could not have paid that large amount, because the land they had on hand in December 1879, was 10,500,000 acres. I do not suppose the speeches of hon. gentlemen are much read throughout the country, but their organ is, and I am quoting from that, and I want to show the public what a political humbug they have to direct the opinion of the hon, gentlemen opposite:

Now, Sir, the Company has had this land for seventeen years—I call it twelve years, making an average of $69,585 a year-if we take the 20,000,000 acres which we gave to the Company, having retained 5,000,000 acres for security, and estimate the taxes at the same rate as the Union Pacific, it would make an annual payment of $139,170. Multiply that by 20, assuming that not an acre of land is sold for 20 years, and we find that the total of taxes paid by the Syndicate would be $2,783,400, or a difference between the Globe's calculation and mine upon the land alone of $13,917,060. Now, I go still further. I will give them the benefit of last year's taxation. Mr. Poor says that the taxes last year were $10,437. I will double that, which will make $216,874 a year, multiply that by 20, allowing one-third off for sales only, and I find the total amount would be $2,891,654, or a difference of $13,808,806. It does seem to me that the hon. gentlemen ought certainly to withdraw that statement upon the floor of this House or admit that the organ was incorrect or misinformed. It is an unfortunate thing that these statements should go about the country in order to mislead the public mind with a view of getting a snap verdict against the hon, gentlemen on this side of the House.

Mr. TROW. If the hon gentleman will refer to the Hansard of Thursday last, and read my remarks, he will see that I put it at ten years.

Mr. RYKERT. I find you reported in the Hansard as stating the taxes commenced in 1859. The Company was not incorporated at that time, it had not an acre of land then, so the hon. gentleman is mistaken, though I accept the explanation that he means ten years. The hon. member for South Huron says four years, while the organ of the party says it is $835,023 a year, so that there was only a trifling mistake of over $13,000,000 on that point alone as regards the land, and a mistake of $6,000,000 as regards the taxation of the road bed. I also want to discuss the question which arose in the early eastern section of this road. I have taken the trouble to hunt up the authorities on that point, knowing that I was right; during the twenty years I have been in Parliament, I have always made it a point never to advance a statement in the House that I could not corroborate. I then stated that no company could perform a portion of a contract and abandon the balance, as it would be contrary to the principles of law and equity. The section to which I referred is very plain and distinct, and its meaning admits of no doubt. Section 4 of the contract says:

"The work of construction shall be commenced at the eastern extremity of the eastern section not later than the first day of July next, and the work upon the central section shall be commenced by the Company at such point towards the eastern end thereof on the portion of the line now under construction as shall be found convenient and as shall be approved by the Government, at a date not later than the first May next. and the work upon the eastern and central sections shall be vigorously and continuously carried on at such rate of annual progress on each section as shall enable the Company to complete and equip the same and each of them, in running order, on or before the first day of May, 1891."

I-then stated that if the Company choose to abandon the eastern section, this Government could invoke the power of the Court of Chancery, and compel them to carry out their contract in its entirety, and I say that is the law to-day, in spite of the opinion of the leader of the Opposition. That hon. gentleman, in that modest, kind, genial manner to which he is so addicted in this House, said: "No such thing, there is no such law." Well, standing in the presence of the recognized leader of the Chancery Bar, I hesitated to say that he was wrong; but I thought I would hunt up the authorities. When I found a distinguished lawyer in this House quoting a case, and refusing to give the name of the case, or to state where the case is to be found, I suspected that that hon. gentleman was not stating the law correctly. When in a court of law a learned gentleman states that such and such is the law of the land, and the judge asks him to say where the case is to be found, and he cannot, he is told quietly to sit down and mind his own business. Well, the hon. gentleman chose to take me to book, and cited the case of the South Wales Railway Company vs. Wythes, which I found after a little trouble reported in I. K. and J. Chancery. Reports, 186. I am prepared to show that that case has not been cited but once for twenty-four years, and then only to be commented on by the Court as a case which, from the fragmentary nature of the contract, the relief asked could not be granted. My contention is that no individual or body of men can take advantage of a portion of a contract and abandon the balance—that such an act would be contrary to all the principles of law and equity; and what I complain of the hon, gentleman is, that he, a lawyer, should have cited a case twenty-four or twenty-five years old, when he has only to turn to his own docket and find two cases argued by his own firm within the last two years, to confirm my view of the law. The following case, which was carried to the Court of Appeal and affirmed there, supports my contention:-

EDWARDS vs. GRAND JUNCTI'N RAILWAY CO.—7 SIMMONS, 337, and MYINE & CRAIG, 650—"Case decided on the principle that the Court would not allow them to exercise powers acquired by means of such contract without carrying it into full effect: and in the absence of any adoption of the contract of such a party by the incorporated company, or of any attempt to exercise the powers thereby acquired, or of any part performance, the Court might refuse to enforce specific performance of such a contract against the incorporated company: but if they adopt or avail themselves of the contract, or exercise the powers acquired by its means, the Court will, in that case, not only negatively but, nositively interpose the Court will, in that case, not only negatively but positively interpose and compel the performance by them of every portion of the contract."

I do not accuse the hon, gentleman of being so ignorant of the law as not to know where he can find the law, but I never knew a lawyer to cite a case of twenty-five years ago without searching for subsequent cases to see if it was still recognized as an authority. That is what the hon, gentleman would do if his opinions and actions were not warped by political bias. The hon, gentleman cites a case to show that part of this debate as to the new Syndicate abandoning the the Court cannot compel a party to carry out a contract when the other party can get adequate damages at law. I deny that is the law; but there is a class of cases where, from the nature of the agreement, the Court of Chancery will not allow its machinery to be used from time to time to carry on expensive works. But I will come to a later case, the case of Greene vs. West Cheshire Railway Co., reported in 13 Equity Reports, page forty-four, which was tried in 1871, seventeen years after the case referred to by my hon. friend the other night:

"Greens vs. West Chesines Railway Company, where it was decided:
"The Court will not refuse to decree specific performance of an agreement, although the plaintiff may have a concurrent remedy in damages, or may have entered into a negotiation for a money compensation which has failed. The facts of this case were as follows:—An agreement was entered into between a railway company and a land-owner, part of whose entered into between a railway company and a land-owner, part of whose land had been, under another agreement, taken by the company, whereby in consideration of the previous withdrawal by the land-owner of a petition to Parliament against the company's Bill, the company agreed to construct and for ever maintain at their expense, as siding of specified length alongside the line upon land belonging to the land-owner, and to be provided by him for that purpose for the u e and to the reasonable satisfaction of the owner."

Sir James Bacon, V.C., in giving judgment, says:

Sir James Bacon, V.C., in giving judgment, says:

"I wholly disclaim the notion that a railway company is to be dealt with by this Court upon any other principles than those which would and ought to be applied to individuals. Their contracts are to be considered just as any other contracts; their rights and their obligations are in all respects the same as those of any members of the community. They possess certain privileges different from, and in some respects beyond those of individuals; but while it is the duty of the Court to respect and to secure the enjoyment of those privileges, it is no less an imperative duty to take care that the powers with which the Legislature has entrusted them, and which are inherent in their constitution, are not so exercised as to protect them in doing wrong, or in escaping from the ful-filment of their lawful engagements.

"A more direct, wilful, and determined violation of a plain contract cannot be suggested. No excuse is offered for it, but what they say is, that the plaintiff may, by an action at law, recover against them in money such amount of damages as a jury may think he has sustained by their wilful breach of their contract, and that therefore a Court of Equity will not entertain the complaint. I do not understand that the law as administered in this Court, countenances any such defence.

"It would be a total departure from all principles by which the administration of this branch of the law has hitherto been guided, to hold that it is at the option of a man who has persuaded another to part with his rights upon a specific condition to say: 'I can, but I will not perform the obligations I have entered into; and instead of keening faith and honestly fulfilling my promise, I will leave you to take the chances of an action for damages, and to reserve to myself the power of endeavoring to defeat your claim; and instead of acknowledging your just rights, will compel you to receive, instead of them, such a sum as I may be able to persuade a jury will compensate yu for the

The Court recognized this fact, that when a man undertakes to perform a contract he cannot say: "I will do a part of it and let the rest go." We have the case of Wallace against the Great Western Railway, reported in our Courts. This company had agreed to build a certain station house and certain sidings; but built only an insufficient station house, fit for a second class station, and refused to build the sidings. What was the judgment in that case? Mr. Chancellor Spragge, a well recognized authority in our Court, said, (page 97, 25 Grant):

"In Lord Lindsey's case the Vice-Chancellor refers to another case in which Lord Cottenham, referring to Edwards vs. The Grand Junction Railway Company says: 'I did not put it precisely on the contract; but what I did put it on was this: that if a party enters into an agreement, by the means and operation of which a body is afterwards incorporated and brought into existence, and acquires powers, I will not allow that company to exercise powers acquired through the medium of that previous contract and arrangement, without carrying that contract and arrangement in full effect? ment into full effect.

That is the vory case we have here. The Company undertake to build the central and eastern sections. the Courts compel them to do in the event of the Company undertaking to build the centre and abandoning the castern section? It is quite clear the Company will be compelled to carry out their whole agreement. This case to which I have just referred was argued by the firm of Blake, Kerr, Cassells and Boyd on behalf of the Great Western Railway Company. Then the case was carried to appeal where Messrs. Boyd & Cassels argued it. Chief Justice Moss tells them that having taken advantage of that contract, they must be compelled to carry it to completion. The judgment is as follows:

"They also submit that the agreement is not of such a character as to be susceptible of specific performance. The last objection is completely met by the case of Hood vs. North Eastern Railway Company, L. R. 8 Eq. 666. There is no difficulty in determining whether acts of the company fairly and reasonably amount to the maintaining of a freight and passenger station at a given point. In the case referred to the Court was not deterred from granting relief by the same argument being used with regard to an agreement for a first-class station. This case is entirely distinguishable from one in which the Court refuses to undertake the superintendence of the execution of works. No reasonable man can doubt that this Company understand perfectly well what would be a fair and honest discharge of the obligation to maintain such a station at Gowanstown.

* Upon the whole it seems to us to be beyond doubt that the appellants are bound to perform the agreement in question, and that they deliberately attempted to break it, because its continued fulfilment was not profitable."

I have cited enough cases in our own Courts and those of England, to show that my position the other night was a perfectly tenable one. I will cite Storer against the Great Western Railway Company, 2 Y. and C.C.C., 48, in which

"Sir J. L. Knight Bruce, V.C., made an order that the defendants, the Company, were bound to construct and for ever thereafter to maintain one neat archway sufficient to permit a loaded carriage of hay to pass under the railway."

The Company said they had built a proper one. The plaintiff thought it was not, and the company had to carry out their agreement in its entirety. In the case of Wilson vs. the Furness Railway Company, 9 Eq. 28, the Court held:

"That the Company having obtained the benefit of the agreement by being thereby released from an onerous obligation, and allowed to substitute something more easy of performance, the Company would not be allowed to evade the agreement."

I hope the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron) will look at those cases. I believe he recognised the other night that his chief was wrong. Since that question was up the hon member for West Durham actually denied what he had said the other night. In fact the hon, gentleman has a habit of denying, and going back upon, his previous utterances. The hon member for Cornwall said: "I believe the hon, member for West Durham said the Courts could not enforce this contract;" to which the hon member for West Durham replied: "I did not make any such statement." I will read from Hansard, what I said during the debate on this point, and I will also read the answer made by the member for West Durham. I said:

"I apprehend, and I think no one will refute my proposition, that if the Company do not advance vigorously and continuously with the work to the satisfaction of the Government, the Government can invoke the machinery of the Court of Chancery, which no one knows better than the hon, member for West Durban, to compel them to do what their contract says they shall do."

Is that right?

Mr. ANGLIN. It is.

Mr. RYKERT. But your leader says it is wrong. He said: "If I know anything about it, I deny that proposition."

Mr. ANGLIN. What proposition?

Mr. RYKERT. The one I have just quoted.

Mr. MILLS. The hon gentleman's question related to the jurisdiction of the Courts of Chancery. The contention of the hon, member for Cornwall related to the jurisdiction of the Courts generally.

Mr. RYKERT. It is quite plain that I referred to the Court of Chancery. I said the Court of Chancery would invoke their machinery to enforce a contract similar to the one before the House. The hon, gentleman agrees with me; but his hon. leader said if he knew anything about it, he denied that proposition. What I do object to is: that on every occasion on which hon. members on this side advance a proposition, they are sneered at by the hon. member for West Durham. We have the record of the hon. gentleman, I am sorry he has left his seat. I gave his political history a few nights ago; I could also give his legal history in Parliament, which consists of a long series of blundering. As an instance of his constitutional blundering, I may refer to the memorial to the Queen, which he introduced in the Ontario Legislature, asking her to take such initiative steps in the way of legislation as would prevent this Dominion from interfering with the subsidies to the several Provinces. I opposed the resolutions on the ground that it was none of our business in that Legislature to present such a memorial. The memorial went to England, and Lord Granville sent it back, with the advice to the Ontario Legislature to mind its own business. That is the purport of it. On every great constitutional question, the hon. gentleman has signally failed. I hope that in future, when he addresses the House, he will be a little more choice in his language. I do not care whether he calls us a pack of dogs, as he did the other night, or whether he charges us with sinking so low as to support the Government proposition, that is a mere matter of taste. I am prepared to follow the hon. leaders on this side of the House, but to use his own language, I am not prepared to stoop so low as to do reverence to the hon. leader of the Opposition. He seems to be dissatisfied and soured with everything, and of him I may say:

> How doth the little busy bee, Improve each shining hour, Gathering Buncombe all the day, From everything that's sour.

Mr. CASGRAIN. As I do not concur in the resolutions which are now to be read the second time, I desire to offer a few observations, in order to state the conclusion at which I have arrived. Before doing so, I would take the opportunity of complimenting the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Scott) on his able speech delivered yesterday. In attempting to address the House in the English language, the excuse I have to offer is that hon. members have not as yet been provided with French copies of the offer of the second Syndicate. As I desire to be brief, I will reduce the question at issue to two simple propositions, viz.: First, Is the House to allow the Government to change the policy settled last Session? Second, Is the Syndicate bargain now before the House, under the circumstances, such a good bargain as Parliament ought to adopt? What was the policy of the Government before they went to England? They had a fixed, settled policy, approved by Parliament, and what reasons have there been to change it? What has happened in the meantime? Nothing that we know of. Those hon. gentlemen left the country and went to Europe, and, if we are to believe them, they carried over two offers in their pockets. While there they received some other offers. They said that they had made a contract on the other side which was binding. As regards these offers, however, Parliament is still in the dark; and I ask this House and the country if we are obliged to ratify this contract, simply because hon gentlemen sitting on the Treasury benches tell us it is the best that could be made? If I could persuade myself that this contract is the very best that could be made, I would, to a certain extent and with let us know what they had been doing in the dark. They certain amendments, adopt part of it at all events, because I should prefer that this enterprise should be carried out by a private company rather than see the Government exposed, as they have been exposed, and as every Government will be exposed, to enormous difficulties—to bribery and corruption. That is a question which is now before the public. If those hon, gentlemen ask us to believe them when they say: "You hon. gentlemen of the Opposition must rely on our word, we have made the best possible bargain; " I, for my part, will reply that I cannot accept their word, and that for one good reason-

Mr. PLUMB. I rise to a question of order. gentleman has made two statements—one insinuating that bribery has been used, and the other that the Government has made false statements.

Mr. SPEAKER. Perhaps the hon, member will explain what he said.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I desired to say this, and I think I said this, that the Government ought to be above suspicion; that is to say, that the carrying out of work by the Government should be avoided, that a private company should be entrusted with this enterprise, in order to avoid for the future any misunderstanding, bribery or corruption. That is what I meant to say. I think I said that.

Mr. PLUMB. That is not what the hon. gentleman stated.

Mr. CASGRAIN. If I did not say it, that was what I intended to say. The people at large, at the present moment, entertain great suspicion with respect to this contract that has been made in the dark; and that a number of citizens say so, I assert. Hon gentlemen opposite are misled by flatterers. The whole truth is not told them, and the unpleasant side is not placed before them, but is hidden from them. There is one question about which the public have been in doubt for five or six years. I do not desire to be at all offensive to members of the Government, but I must take in the fact as it is, and allow the people to draw their conclusions therefrom. I say the people are asking to day whether Sir Hugh Allan has been recouped for $360,000 which he paid? If so, by whom, when and how? If he has not, the people have their own suspicions; I have my own suspicions which I cannot disregard. The interest on this money has been accruing ever since, and the total sum to-day must amount to about half a million dollars. We do not know everything that has been passing behind the scenes in respect to this contract, but we know that, in August last, when hon. gentlemen opposite were on the other side of the Atlantic, they had not then made the contract now spoken of, and, if my information be correct—because walls will speak—a contract or a tender or something of that kind, but not with the details in the present contract, was sent from Montreal across the Atlantic with such extravagant terms in it that it was not expected to be accepted.

Some. hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I will say more. I can give my source of information to the Prime Minister, and the names personally to himself. I have information which I believe to be true, that when those negotiations were going on in England the first signed contract was sent from Montreal there. I venture to say more, that in England when these hon. gentlemen completely failed in their transactions, or in their attempted transactions, with English capitalists, there was a sudden recoil of our negotiations, though by what means it was produced I am not able to explain; but over the immense cloud which is getting darker and darker every day there may yet come a flash of lightning which will tear asunder the cloud and show us the bright daylight behind it. These hon, gentlemen voluntarily put themselves in this position, because they will not show us any papers or documents, or have laid themselves open to suspicion—though it was their own fault-and I for one regret it deeply, because, for the honor of our country, Ministers should be, like the Roman's wife, above suspicion.

AFTER RECESS.

I do not think that the people Mr. CASGRAIN. of this country will believe that there have been better terms offered before this last proposal was laid on the Table of the House. Hon. gen tlemen opposite ask us to accept their judgment, without letting us know upon what grounds they base that decision. I cannot come to the conclusion which they have arrived at, and, to use a favorite expression of the hon. Minister of Railways, I do not see how any intelligent or impartial man can come to that conclusion. The Minister of Railways has been hurling at this side of the House the fact that deficits had to be announced in the budgets of the late Government. I do not admit that they amounted to anything like the figures—$6,000,000 or $7,000,000—which the hon. gentleman named, and I say, further, that whatever their amount, they were due to causes which were beyond the control of the late Administration—due to the depression which prevailed all over the world. But speaking of these deficits, what is the hon. gentleman now trying to do? By the mere stroke of his pen and the seal of his office he is about to sacrifice at least $12,300,000, as appears on the face of the two offers which are now before the House. The people of this country, if they are intelligent men, will see clearly the difference between a deficit of $7,000,000 and the throwing away of $12,250,000, or, according to my calculations, $16,000,000 to $18,000,000, for I can see that much difference between the two offers. The problem is not a very difficult one to solve; on the contrary, it will be seen as clearly as day light. The Prime Minister, in order to show that the people had confidence in him, said that he had been put on his trial, and the result was his restoration to power, and, therefore, he argued he had been completely whitewashed. I do not view the matter in that light, I accept the verdict of the people in a qualified manner. That verdict was due to the commercial depression of which I spoke. The same causes produce same effects everywhere. The same cause not long ago defeated an Administration in England. Well, Sir, that was the principal cause the National Policy, which has been so much talked of, was a good flag to bring forward on that occasion, and it has produced the expected effect. The right hon gentleman said that he had his trial. I do not believe he has had his trial fairly, as we understand, under constitutional government. That trial ought to have taken place before this Parliament by impeachment, and then, if those hon. gentlemen had been absolved, we would have rejoiced that the honor of our country remained unsullied. If, on the other hand, they had been found guilty under impeachment, they would have been obliged to abandon not only their portfolion. but would nave met with due punishment. There was another mode in which those hon, gentlemen tried to wash what we may call their dirty linen—they appointed a Royal Commission to do the work for them. We may judge, by what happened afterwards, how that Commission did its work. I admit there was one honorable name on that Commission, Mr. Justice Day, who served as a figure-head; but I must say that the same degree of confidence did not attach to, at least, one of the members of that Commission. In order to show how much confidence may be put upon the verdict of that Commission, I will re-call a fact which has already been made public. One of Court was composed of three Judges, of whom this ex-Commissioner was one. The three Judges had agreed upon what verdict to render, and when they came upon the Bench to render their judgment, this ex Commissioner, to the utter astonishment of his colleagues, proceeded to render a judyment entirely opposed to the one agreed upon in chambers by the whole Court, and his two colleagues were obliged to give the real judgment of the Court. I do not suppose another scandal of that description ever occurred before, in which a Royal Commissioner was the chief actor. The judgment he gave on that occasion, contrary to the one agreed upon, was to unseat a Liberal member and to annul the election. I will not give the name of this Royal Commissioner; it is well known; and I am ashamed to give it, because it is a French-Canadian name. We have now another Royal Commission sitting, and it would have been well if it had reported so that we could have had the report before as during the debate. We are still in the dark upon that subject, as we are in the dark upon many other points. So much for these Royal Commissions, present, past, and, perhaps, future. Now, Sir, the hon. Minister of Railways has great fluency of language, but sometimes it is dangerous to talk too fast and to talk too much. Like a Spanish bravado he told us that he had nailed his colors to the mast, or, in other terms, if I understand the metaphor, he meant to abide by the first contract at all hazards. Two minutes before that he told us that he had not even looked into the new proposal. I suppose that if the new proposal had offered to do the work for nothing, he would still have rejected it. I think, under the circumstances, the position of that hon. gentleman is not very tenable before the country. It has been said, by supporters of the first Syndicate, that the new proposal was conceived in sin and born in iniquity. If either of these contracts deserve the qualification I am sure it is not the second one. I am sure that the first one is open to suspicion, and it is looked upon with suspicion throughout the country. The hon, leader of the Opposition says that, until the new offer was laid upon the Table, he knew nothing at all about it. For my own part I can say that until I saw it on the Table I knew nothing of it, and when I say this from my seat in this House I hope I shall be believed. I think the hon, leader of the Opposition ought to be believed in his statement, and he should not be taunted with being a party to a political plot unless hon gentlemen opposite are prepared to make a formal and precise charge. I like to receive the word of another gentleman and to believe it when that is possible. When the gallant knight from St. John (Sir Leonard Tilley) assured the late Governor General, Lord Dufferin, that he knew nothing in the first instance about the transaction called the Pacific Scandal, I believe that he was sincere and told the truth, because at that time he was not in a position to know more about it. I can also believe that the hon, the Minister of Railways spoke the truth when he said he knew nothing at all about it, though both he and the Finance Minister afterwards espoused the cause of their colleagues, and showed, perhaps, more courage than prudence in doing it. I wish I could say the same of all the other members of that Cabinet. There is an old proverb which says: "If you deceive me once it is your fault, if you deceive me twice it is my fault." I do not desire to be deceived the second time if I can help it. When hon, gentlemen opposite are at a loss for an argument, they fall back on the National Policy. I am at a loss to understand what possible influence the National Policy can have on either the contract or the offer. Hon. gentlemen say: "Oh! you want to break the terms with British Columbia." I say the Government are, in fact, breaking faith with British Columbia. Our agreement with British Columbia, according to the Carnarvon terms, was to build the railway from these Commissioners-was, about nine months ago, called Nanaimo to Esquimalt. Why was that not included in this upon to decide an election case in the city of Quebec. The contract with the Syndicate? As to the second proposal, I believe sincerely that it is better than the one that preceded it, and that by accepting it the country will benefit by an enormous sum of money, as well as by the removal of the great privileges and monopolies which are granted by the first contract. The fate of this country depends on the vote we are going to give to-night; and if by any possible power I could induce hon, gentlemen on the opposite side to view this matter in another light, I would attempt to my utmost to do so. But, Sir, I am afraid, from what I have seen and heard, that the vote is a foregone conclusion. If I had at this moment that command of the English language, and could use that Irish eloquence which is so common among Irishmen, I would appeal to the Irish people to regard the miseries their fe'low countrymen have been suffering for centuries, and ask them whether they would invite their friends on the other side of the Atlantic to come to this country to undergo the same treatment in the North-West. I am very much afraid the immense power the Syndicate are going to exercise will have a direful influence on that country. On the other hand, if the Syndicate are going to inaugurate an immense system of immigration, we ought to see what kind of people they will bring to the North-West. We ought not to bring people there who are going to be disaffected towards the English Crown, or strangers who have not common interests with us. A very narrow limit will separate them from the United States. There are many Fenian organizations in the United States, which may at some time exercise a certain influence upon disaffected settlers in the North-West. I think, therefore, that the Government ought to have reserved to themselves a direct supervision over the immigration scheme in which this Syndicate are going to engage. If I could also make an appeal to the French members from the Province of Quebec, sitting on the other side, I would ask them-many of them young men of talent, who are likely to be of great benefit to their country—if they are going to sacrifice, by their vote to-night, all the influence they would otherwise possess. The Government have adopted a most extraordinary method in carrying this matter through the House. They began by acting in the very teeth of the law, and when they brought this measure before the House they wanted to hurry it through without giving time for discussion. We have Rules in this House, which have not been made for nothing; but hon, gentlemen have seen fit to suspend them. What is the importance of suspending the Rules of the House to sanction a contract which does not come into force for four months, and while we are going to remain for ten years without connection with the North-West except through American territory? This contract is open to suspicion. In the Bill appended to it, the second clause is a most extraordinary one, one by which the contractors of this Company are allowed to value services rendered and to pay for them, thus leaving an immense margin for suspicion. The clause is as follows :-

"The capital stock of the Company shall be twenty-five million dollars, divided into shares of one hundred dollars each, which shares shall be transferable in such manner and upon such conditions as shall be provided by the by-laws of the Company; and such shares, or any part thereof, may be granted and issued as paid up shares for value bond fide received by the Company, either in money at par or at such price and upon such conditions as the board of directors may fix."

Mr. DOMVILLE. Is not that in the second Syndicate's

Mr. CASGRAIN. I do not know. I am not now discussing that offer; but if it is, two wrongs do not make a right. leave the interpretation of this clause to the country. The right hon. Premier used very strong language with reference to this Syndicate. He told his followers, the Government must sink or float according to their vote. That is what I He appealed to the call an argumentum ad hominem affection of his party, to his weakening years and long record of service, to carry the contract through, and were it Mr. CASGRAIN.

not for the affection they bore him they would not support the Government in this course. Not one of the other thirteen Ministers could have persuaded them to cast that During the holidays I took occasion to tell my constituents my reasons for opposing the ratification of this contract, and as I am not ashamed of what I have done I will, for the benefit of this House and the country, read my address to them:

"Aux libres et in lépendants électeurs du Comté de l'Islet.-–Messieurs, vous vous rappelez le premier contrat du Pacifique avec Sir Hugh Allan.

"Voici un second contrat fait par 1 s mêmes ministres. Aussitôt, et autant que je l'ai pu, je l'ai fait distribuer dans le comté afin que le peuple entier en prenne connaissance.

"A Pous d'en juste. A vous d'en juger.

"Je vous soumets le résumé des raisons qui m'empêchent de sanctionner un tel contrat.

"1. Parce que le prix et les avantages accordés sont exorbitants.

"2. Parce que le gouvernement a refusé de produire toutes les autres soumissions, offres ou correspondances pour la construction du chemis.

soumissions, offres ou correspondances pour la construction du chemia.

"3. Parce que le gouvernement a tenu caché jusqu'au dernier moment le contenu du contrat et a laissé, dans l'intervalle, induire le public en erreur en donnant à entendre que le chemin serait construit sans qu'il en coûtât un seul cent de plus à l'Etat.

"4. Parce que le gouvernement, pressé par le syndicat a avancé la Session du Parlement et a poussé en toute hâte l'adoption de cette nesure, dans le but de terminer en plus vite le discussion en Chambus et diore.

dans le but de terminer au plus vite la discussion en Chambre et d'em-pêcher le peuple de connaître ce contrat avant qu'il fût sanctionné.

"5. Parce que la garantie pour l'exécution du contrat est tout-à-fait insuffisante.

"6. Parce que la garantie pour l'exploitation du chemin pendant 20 ans est également insuffisante.

''7. Parce que le public sera livré à la merci des propriétaires du chemin, le gouvernement n'ayant réservé aucun contrôle pratique sur le min, le gouvernement n'ayant reserve aucun controle planque la tarif du chemin.

"8. Parce que la construction de la partie du chemin au nord du lac Supérieur est prématurée, et ne sera ouverte que dans dix ans; que cette région de 200 lieues est inhabitée et non cultivable.

"9. Parce que, en faisant la correspondance au Sault Sainte-Marie, du chemin du Pacifique avec les lignes américaines en voie d'y arriver, on évite une énorme dépense, et on aurait sous peu une communication avec le Nord-Ouest amplement suffisante pour tous les besoins.

"10. Parce que tous les Parlements élus depuis la Confédération ont affirmé en principe que la construction du chemin de fer du Pacifique me

le peuple.

"11. Parce que l'exemption en faveur des constructeurs de toutes t xes à toujours sur le chemin, de tous droits sur les importations pour construire le chemin,—et de toutes taxes pendant 20 ans sur les terres don-ruire le chemin,—et des priviléges exorbitants, en vue du fait que reure le chemin,—et de toutes taxes pendant 20 ans sur les terres données en paiement,—sont des priviléges exorbitants, en vue du fait que le reste du peuple va être taxé en sus pour le prix du contrat et pour continuer à enrichir des contracteurs devenus millionnaires à ses dépens. Et parce que les dix ans accordés pour relier le chemin du Pacifique par le nord du lac Supérieur, aux chemins de fir de 'Intario et Québec est un trop long délai : attendu que ces provinces qui supportent la plus grande partie du fardeau du coût du chemin se trouvent par là les plus grande partie du fardeau du coût du chemin se trouvent par là les plus mal servies.

"12. Parc eque. «vant d'adopter finalement ce contrat, il est dans l'in-térêt public de voir à obtenir d'autres soumissions plus favorables "13. l'arce que, le Ministère s'est mis par sa faute à la merci des con-tracteurs qui lui ont imposé les termes les plus extreants.

"14. Parce que, en sus du prix énorme du contrat et plus que suffisant pour construire le chemin, les contracteurs reçoivent de plus le chemin en présent du gouvernement.

"15. Parce que le gouvernement aurait dû stipuler qu'après un certain laps de temps, plus ou moins reculé, la propriété du chemin retournerait à l'Etat.

"16. Parce que les termes du contrat n'assurent que la construction d'un chemin d'une qualite inférieure, vague, indéterminée, et hors de proportion avec le prix.

"17. Parce que le Gouvernement, malgré les avantages extraordinaires accordés à la compagnie, se charge n'anmoins de la construction des parties les plus difficiles et les plus coûteuses du chemin.

"18. Parce que, en sus du coût de l'arpentage des 25,000,00 d'acres, le gouvernement est exposé à payer des dommages pour ne pouvoir livrer à demande ces terres non encore arpentées.

"19. Parce que le privilège exclusif accordé pour 20 con de cause.

" 19. Parce que le privilège exclusif accordé pour 20 ans, de construire et d'opérer des chemins de fer dans le Nord-Ouest crée un monopole tellement exorbitant qu'il doit être rejeté non seulement par les habitants du lieu, qui s'y opposent unanimement, mais par tous ceux du pays.

"20. Parce que la création d'une compagnie proprietaire des vastes étendues des meilleures terres du Nord-Ouest à son choix, formera un pouvoir tellement puissant et étendu qu'il sera un danger pour l'Etat et un monopole crasant qu'il faudra racheter "21. Parce que les terres donn es en paiement sont toutes prises dans le Nord-Ouest et dans le Manitoba, sans que la Colombie Britannique qui force la construction immédiate du chemin, en fournisse un seul acre.

"22. Parce que, il y avait aucune réserve dans ce contrat permettant de l'amender en aucune manière, il n'y a pas d'autre alternative que de le rejeter en entier.

23. Parce que, sur les circonstances actuelles d'un second contrat fin chemin du Pacifique par les mêmes hommes qui ent fait le premier avec

Sir Hugh Allan, le peuple a une raison légitime de défiance, et doit être mis sur ses gardes; et qu'il est prémature de sanctionner ce contrat avant de concaître le rapport de la Commission Royale qui siège présentement et qui est chargé de s'enquérir des affaires et des contrats du Pacifique.

"Si vous êtes d'avis, Messieurs, comme un grand nombre de vos compatriotes, d'opposer cette mesure du Ministère, pétitionnes au plustôt le Gouverneur-Général et les Chambres pour éviter les suites d'un contrat qui, une fois sanctionné, seront irréparables.

"P. B. CASGRAIN,

" Député du comté de l'Islet.

I have mentioned the name of Sir Hugh Allan. I am credibly informed, I have every reason to believe, and I do sincerely believe, that Sir Hugh Allan followed on the track of the hon. Minister when they went across. I shall not go so far as to say that he had any communication with them; my information does not go so far, but I do know that Sir Hugh Allan spoke of this contract, and I know that when these negotiations were abruptly terminated, the merchant princes on the other side of the Atlantic showed great discontent. What occurred I do not know. I do not know whether it was because the terms were too high or too low, but I know these hon, gentlemen did not succeed with English capitalists. While they were in England they found that they could get a contract in Canada, and they came back and accepted it, and that is the "firm" contract which is said to have been made in England. I shall vote in favor of the amendment and against the contract.

Mr. WADE. I desire only for a short time to occupy the attention of the House. By the manner in which the debate has drawn its slow length along, I was reminded of a remark I once made to a member of our Local Legislature. He said to me "I have a charge to make against the reporters." I asked what was the nature of the charge. He said: "Why I spoke for a long time; the House was nearly empty, and when I came to look in the papers the report of my speech was not so long as my three fingers." I asked him if he knew exactly what he had said in the House. He said he was not quite sure, but he had certainly spoken for a long time. I replied "Perhaps you said the same thing over and over again, and the reporters in pity of you condensed your speech." I do not relate this incident with the desire of being offensive to the House for I am too young a member to lecture hon. gentlemen upon what is right and proper. I do think, however, that long speeches in debates are getting to be the order of the day in this House. I wish now to refer to another matter which can scarcely be called foreign to the debate, though it has no immediate connection with the question before the House. Some remarks were made by an hon. member with regard to the county which I have the honor to represent in this House. When the insinuation was thrown across the floor, I rose at the moment, and though, perhaps, I should not have done so, I felt that for the honor of my county and my Province I could not avoid rising to my feet. When that insinuation was made, I felt and was quite sure that there was something else behind. that the hon. gentleman held that meeting in Halifax for no other purpose than to cut off the heads of the two hon. gentlemen who sit behind me. That hon, gentleman appeared for a purpose. Whether he was authorised by that meeting to come here and take advantage of the matter I am not able to state. I am not the man to flinch in the hour of need. I can point to my public record—I do not wish to advertise myself—and if that record had not been such as it is, I would not have been in Parliament to-day as the representative of the county of Digby. member for King's (Mr. Borden) said:

"I was reminding the hon. member for Digby of an event in the history of Neva Scotia, somewhat similar to the present one, and that the hongentleman was called upon by his party leader to give a vote which relegated him to private life for quite a number of years. I do not wonder that this telegram makes him sensitive, remembering, as he must, the result of the course he followed on that occasion, which, I regret to say, he intends to take upon this."

Did King's county, the garden of Nova Scotia, call upon the hon, gentleman to attend the public meeting at Halifax? Why, when I first had the honor of a seat in the Legislative Assembly of Nova Scotia, that hon, gentleman was a boy in jacket and trowsers; yet now he comes here as a delegate from that great meeting at Halifax, from which I believe the very telegram brought here emanated. There is a name appended to that telegram, but I was quite ignorant there was a gentleman of that name in the county, because he had lately come there. I knew there were Longstaffs, who were men of character, in the county, and I asked an hon. member to tell me who this J. D. Longstaff was. Now I understand it; he is the wandering Jew of the county of Digby, who has become a resident there. We know what the effect is of rubbing steel against steel, and we want men of the true Grit stamp to come there. But is it true that the county of Digby passed the resolution that the telegram shadows forth? I do not believe it to be true. Who compose that council? There are men on it whom I respect; but the warden and many members of the county are politically opposed to me, and I admire a fair and honest opponent. I believe they never authorized that telegram to be sent, and that, therefore, it must have come from Woodstock. Perhaps, however, it did not, as I should not like to judge anyone wrongly; nevertheless, I can only judge by the facts as they appear. If it was thought that the expression of opinion contained in that telegram would deter me from the course and position I was about to take upon this important question, they were mistaken on account of the reference made by the hon. member for King's that I was "relegated back to private life for many years." I am obliged to speak of my public life, although I do not desire to refer to it. I did my duty to my country in the position I then filled, though, perhaps, unworthily, and that position was that of Speaker of the House of Nova Scotia. With these remarks I think I have answered the hon, gentleman. I am sorry to have taken the time of the House, but I felt I should be wanting in duty to myself and to my friends if I had not endeavored to set myself right before the House. I do not intend to discuss, at any length, the question before the The question of the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway has been before the country a number of years. The position which it has now reached requires vigorous treatment at our hands. I feel that nothing I could say would add any weight to the arguments that have already been laid before the House in favor of the ratification of this contract. Therefore, not to take up any more time, I shall simply content myself with saying that I believe it is a duty I owe to the county, whose representative I am, to support these resolutions, and that duty I intend to discharge.

Mr. GLEN. Mr. Speaker, although a new member of the House, I cannot allow this discussion to close without entering my protest against the confirmation of the contract for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, now upon the Table, believing, as I do, that its confirmation will seriously impede the development and settlement of the North-West Territories, and that the contract grants privileges and exemptions which will tend to destroy the peace, well being and prosperity of those who may settle in that vast region. I assume, Sir, that the statements made by the hon. Minister of Railways, and the right hon. leader of the Government, as to the character and quantity of the agricultural lands of the North-West, are correct. assume that the right hon. leader of the Government was justified in giving his official sanction to the land regulations issued during the year 1879, fixing the price of the lands lying near the line of the proposed railway at $5 per acre.

If the right hon, gentleman was justified in demanding from new settlers $5 an acre for the lands, prior to the construction of the railway, it is the highest possible evidence we can have that these lands are of very great value for agricultural purposes, or, in other words, agricultural lands of a very high order, and of very great commercial value, provided the produce of these lands can be transported to market upon such terms as to secure to producers a fair and just reward for their labor and capital. The cost of railway transportation is of vital importance to those who intend to settle in the North-West Territories. The commercial value of the land for settlement is wholly and entirely dependent upon the cost of transporting agricultural products from the North-West to Liverpool, which is the ultimate market for the surplus of this continent. If the cost of transporting a bushel of wheat from Winnipeg to Liverpool had been as much in 1880 as it was in 1873, wheat could not have been profitably grown in the North-West Territories, and, therefore, the commercial value of the land in 1880 would not have been greater than in 1873. Since 1873, however, a great revolution has taken place in the cost of building railways, the cost of maintaining the road-bed, the cost of operating railways, and in the value of money. Such a reduction has been made, that, commercially speaking, so far as distance is concerned, Winnipeg is nearer to Liverpool to-day than Chicago was in 1873. In 1873, the average cost for moving a ton of freight 100 miles by the Boston and Albany, New York Central, New York and Erie, Pennsylvania Central, Pittsburgh, Port Wayne and Chicago, Lake Shore and Michigan Southern, Michigan Central, Chicago and Alton, Chicago, Burlington and Quincy, Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul, Chicago and North-Western, Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific and Illinois Central Railways was $1.77; whereas, in 1879, the average cost of moving a ton of freight for 100 miles over these roads was only $1.02, or, in other words, in 1879 a ton of freight could be moved 1,777 miles for the cost of moving the same freight, in 1873, 1,002 miles. The railways I have mentioned represent the leading lines running from Minnesota, Nebraska, Kansas and Missouri, to the Atlantic seaboard. Returns from a number of these same railways, for the year 1880, show a marked decrease in the rate charged for transportation as compared with the year 1879, and I feel justified in asserting that for the year 1880 freight was transported over these roads, a distance of 2,000 miles, as cheaply as the same freight was carried in 1873 1,000 miles. I have a letter from the best railway authority in the United States—Mr. Henry V. Poor—expressing the opinion that the average rate of freight charged by the various railways competing for the trade between Chicago and the seaboard has not exceeded five mills per ton, per mile, and wheat and flour have been carried at rates much below the average, but at this rate wheat can be transported from a point one thousand miles west of Thunder Bay to Montreal for 33 cents per bushel, whereas the St. Paul and Manitoba Railway Company charge for carrying it from Emerson to St. Paul, a distance of 390 miles, from 30 to 33 cents per bushel. If wheat can be carried at even five mills per ton per mile, or 33 cents per bushel for 2,000 miles, and it is worth to-day in Toronto $1.15, it would be worth, 600 miles west of Winnipeg, 82 cents—provided there was a surplus over and above the local requirements. This price would yield the producer a fair return for his labor, and would give a high commercial value to lands fairly fit for settlement. If wheat was worth only one dollar in Toronto If wheat was worth only one dollar in Toronto it would still be worth 67 cents, 600 miles west of Winnipeg; but at the present rate of freight charged by the St. Paul, Minneapolis and Manitoba Railway Company, wheat at $1.15 per bushel in Toronto, grown 600 miles west of Winnipeg, would not return to the producer the bare cost of production, let alone giving him any return for his own labor and capital, and $1.15 per bushel is much above the Mr. Glen.

average price of wheat in Toronto for the past fifteen years. The great reduction in the cost of railway transportation which has taken place since 1873 is one of the commercial wonders of the age. It is largely this astounding fact which has overcome the commercial depression which existed in the United States during the years 1873-4-5 and 1876, increasing the exportation of agricultural products by more than 100 per cent. It is this fact that is threatening to create a revolution in the relations existing between landlord and tenant in England, Ireland and Scotland. It is this fact which has of the west to raise cat enabled the farmers cattle upon the of Texas, and, while securing to themselves a fair return for their labor and capital, undersell the English farmer in his own market. It is this fact which had secured to the farmers of the Western States a fair return for their labor and capital, and enabled them to become large consumers of the manufactures of the Eastern States. It is this fact, and not the protective policy of the United States, which has caused a revival in the manufacturing industries of that country. It is this fact chiefly, which has restored the credit of the United States and enabled them to borrow money in the European market as cheaply as any other nation in the world! And it is this fact, largely, which is now attracting a greater number of emigrants to the United States than at any other time in the history of that country. It is this fact which has changed the balance of trade, which for the past half century has been almost continually against the United States, to a large balance in their favor, the exports having exceeded the imports during the past three years by more than $600,000,000. It is this fact which has enabled the people of the United States not only to retain the gold and silver they produce, but to draw gold from other countries. Whereas, since the discovery of gold in California, the United States have been constant exporters of gold. It is this fact that has so enormously increased the population of the extreme Western States during the past few years as compared with the older States. Whereas the average increase in population during the past 10 years in the United States has been 30 per cent the increase in Minnesota has been eighty per cent. The increase in Dakota nearly 900 per cent, Kansas 160 per cent, Nebraska 400 per cent, Texas nearly 100 per cent, and I am quite safe in asserting that the greater part of this increase has taken place within the past three years. It is this fact, chiefly, which has, within the past few years, entirely changed the commercial aspect of the American continent as compared to England, Ireland and Scotland, and the continent of Europe—increasing to an enormous extent the commercial value of American securities of all kinds, and attracted European capital to this continent to an extent hitherto unknown for investment. It is this fact, largely, which enabled the American Government to resume special payment in 1879. It is this fact, which has made the United States the most prosperous nation in the world to-day. The wheat crop of the United States, for the year 1880, is estimated at 400,000,000 bushels. As the foreign market for wheat controls the price in the home market, if one cent per bushel is saved in the cost of transportation, it ensures the farmers of the United States $44,000,000 increase in the profit upon their wheat crop alone, and, consequently, if 5 cents per bushel is saved in the cost of transportation, it is a clear gain to the producers of wheat in the United States, of $20,000,090 for a single year. Now, if we expect to people our North-West Territories-if we expect that our public lands will have any commercial value, we must show to intending emigrants that the products of our farms can be, and will be, transported

American railway emigrant agents will point out the fact to intending emigrants, and surely divert them from coming to this country. The American emigrant agent will require no better argument against the advisability of settling in Canada, than a copy of the contract with the Act of incorporation now upon the Table. And I have no doubt but that if we confirm this contract, tens of thousands of copies will be printed in various languages, and sent broadcast throughout Europe by the agents of American railway companies, and I can conceive of no better argument which they can possibly have to induce emigrants to settle in the United States, in preference to settling in the Dominion of Canada. If we confirm this contract we shall place in the hands of the American emigration agent reasons sanctioned by the Canadian Parliament, for attracting to a greater extent than ever before the immigration from England, Ireland, Scotland, and European countries, to the United States rather than to Canada. The American emigration agent will certainly point out to intending emigrants the clause preventing the construction of any railway for twenty years, which can in the slightest degree create competition in railway freights. And they will also point out the fact to intending emigrants that the Government of Canada have voluntarily relinquished their right to regulate the tolls of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company until after the net profits upon the cost of construction exceed 10 per cent. per annum They will also point out the clause exempting the lands of the railway company from taxation for twenty years after the grant from the Crown; they will likewise point out the clause exempting the railway depots, workshops, yards, elevators, harbors, telegraphs, telephones and rolling stock from taxation forever, casting upon the settler the burden, not only of opening roads and building school houses, but of protecting the Company's property towards which the Company will not contribute one farthing. They will also point out to the intending emigrant the fact that the Canadian Government have provided for the construction of only 1,000 miles of for the construction of only 1,000 miles of railway in the fertile belt, containing, as they declare, 250,000,000 acres of land, fairly fit for settlement, and have granted such privileges and exemptions to the Canadian Pacific Railway as will practically give them a monopoly of railway building throughout that vast region for ever. They will also point out to intending emigrants that the three north-western American States, with an area of less than one-half of the number of acres of land fairly fit for settlement in the North-West Territories, have already 10,683 miles of railway, and that railways are now being constructed in those same States more rapidly than ever before; that upon the same basis we should have in the territory lying between the western boundary of Manitoba and the Rocky Mountains, not less than 24,000 miles of railway within the next twenty-four years, if the farmers of that country are to be enabled to compete with farmers in the north-western States in shipping their grain to the European market. The contract contains within itself elements which will destroy any and every emigration policy which can be proposed or adopted. On the contrary, the offer made by Sir William P. Howland and his associates does not contain a single clause which can be used by American emigration agents to defeat the emigration policy of this country. And, finally, the American emigration agent will point out to intending emigrants the statement of the hon. Minister of Railways that the only possible relief from the monopoly created by this contract, if confirmed, will be a railway to Hudson's Bay and an outlet for three or four months during the year through the icebergs of the north to Liverpool. Assuming that Thunder Bay is as near tide water as Chicago, can be moved at the rates paid to leading American railways in 1880, from a point 1,000 miles west of Thunder Bay, or Chicago, as cheaply as the same freight could have been moved from Thunder Bay or Chicago to the seaboard in 1873. Taking into consideration that there has been marked reduction in terminal charges in seaboard cities, and, also, a reduction in ocean freights, that the risks of transportation have been materially lessened, and the length of the time required to transport freight from the interior of the continent to Liverpool very much shortened—I am more than justified in asserting that Winnipeg, so far as the actual cost of transportation is concerned, is commercially nearer Liverpool to-day than Chicago was in 1873. And there is reason to believe that, within the next ten years, such further reduction will be made in the cost of transporting freight on railways and by steamships as will, commercially speaking, bring the productions of the territory at the western end of the central section of the Canadian Pacific Railway as near Liverpool as Chicago was in 1873. If this statement is correct, and I challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to prove that it is not correct, if the right hon. leader of the Government was justified in issuing his regulations for the sale of public lands in the North-West Territories—prior to the construction of the road—the lands between Manitoba and the Rocky Mountains are of as great commercial value as the wild lands of Illinois, Missouri, Iowa, Kansas, Wisconsin, and Minnesota, provided the people who settle in the North-West Territories are left free to secure such competition in the transportation of freight, as will compel railway companies to carry the freight for a just and reasonable profit upon the actual cost of transportation. As I have said, the cost of building railways, the cost of maintaining the road-bed, the cost of operating railways, and the value of money, has been very much reduced since 1873, and these causes have made it possible for railway companies to enormously reduce the cost of transporting freight. But had there not been a great struggle among railway companies to secure business, had there not been great competition among railway companies for freights, the reduced cost of transportation would have simply increased the profits of the railway companies and not the profits of the farmer. Competition among railway companies has been the means of securing to the producers and consumers of the Western States a share of the profits growing out of the reduction in the cost of transportation, and, therefore, the reduction in the cost of building, maintaining and operating railways, is not of any commercial value to the producers and consumers unless they are left free to compel the railway companies by constructing competing lines to accept for the services they render, a fair and reasonable profit upon the cost of such services; and unless the people who may settle in the North-West are left free to secure for themselves competition among railways for carrying their surplus products to market, the great reduction in the cost of building, maintaining and operating railways, the reduction in the value of money, and the reduction in the cost of ocean transportation will have no effect upon the commercial value of the 250,000,000 acres of lands fairly fit for settlement—it is said by the hon. Minister of Railways, by the hon. Minister of Public Works, and by the right hon. leader of the Government, we have in the North-West Territories, lying between Manitoba and the Rocky Mountains, 250,000.000 acres of lands fairly fit for settlement, may not be of any commercial value for the simple reason that it may be so located as that the products of the soil cannot be transported to market at such a cost as will secure to the producer a fair and just return for his labor and capital. The same lands, provided with the means for transporting the produce to market at such a cost as will secure to the railway companies only a just and fair reward for the or, in other words, that these two points, each of them, are services they render, may be worth in their wild state five about one thousand miles from the seaboard, a ton of freight dollars per acre or a difference in their commercial value of $1,250,000,000 We are, therefore, called upon to decide whether we will create such a railway monopoly as will practically destroy the commercial value of the lands of the North-West, or whether we should refuse to grant to a private irresponsible corporation absolute control over the commercial value of our public lands. The contract now upon the Table of the House creates just such a railway monopoly as I have described, for twenty years completely ties the hands of the people who may settle in the country, and prevents them from securing to themselves and their children a just reward for their labor. The offer which has been made by Sir William P. Howland and his associates for the construction of the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway does not create such a monopoly, but leaves the people free to develop competition in the carrying trade, thereby securing to themselves the benefits of the reduced cost of building, maintaining, and operating railways; thus increasing the present commercial value of the lands of that vast region; also leaving people free to secure to themselves all the benefits of a further reduction in the cost of transportation, which must, and will, take place during the next twenty years; which will still further increase the commercial value of the lands occupied by settlers, as well as lands held by the Government. Had the railway companies of the United States charged the same rates in 1879 as they charged in 1873, it would have increased the cost of transportation to the producers and consumers of the United States by $550,000,000 for a single year, or by enough to have paid their entire national debt with interest in four years—an amount equal to nearly double the entire revenue of the Government, or equal to an annual charge of eleven dollars per head for the entire population; or for the Dominion of Canada $44,000,000 annually, assuming the population to be 4,000,000. You will readily see, Mr. Speaker, that there is no form of direct or indirect taxation so important, or so oppressive, to the producers and consumers of the country as the cost of railway transportation, and there is no influence, no power, so potent to regulate and reduce the cost of transportation as the construction of competing lines. The three States, Iowa, Wisconsin, and Minnesota, have an area of 122,000,000 acres of land, including lakes, rivers, and waste lands, or a little less than one-half of the number of acres of land fairly fit for settlement in the North-West territories between the western boundary of Manitoba and the Rocky Mountains, according to the statement of the hon. Minister of Railways, the hon. Minister of Public Works, and the right hon. leader of the Government. In 1850 the population of Iowa was 191,881; of Wisconsin, 304,756; Minnesota, 6,038, or a total population for the three States of 502,675. In 1870, Iowa had a population of 1,188,207; Wisconsin, 1,051,351; Minnesota, 438,257, or a population for the three States of 2,677,815, so that in 20 years, the population of these three States increased 2,175,240. In 1850, the three States just named produced 21,686,216 bushels of grain. In 1860, they produced 99,566,000 bushels of grain. In 1870, they produced 219,000,000 bushels of grain. Now, Sir, if my statement is correct, that Winnipeg-so far as the cost of transportation is concerned—is as near Liverpool as Chicago was in 1873, and if our lands are as valuable for agricultural purposesif they are as productive as the lands of Wisconsin, Minnesota and Iowa—there is no reason why the settlement and agricultural development of that region should not be as great and as rapid as it has been in the States named. In 1855 Wisconsin had 187 miles of railway; Minnesota, not any Iowa, 68—or a total for the three States of 255 miles of rail way. In 1863, Wisconsin had 905 miles of railway; Minnesota, 31; Iowa, 792-or a total for the three States of 1,728 miles of railway. In 1870, Wisconsin had 1,525; Minnesota, 1,092; Iowa, 2,683—or a total of 5,300 miles of railway for struction of only 12,000 miles of railway, would give us the three States. In 1879, Wisconsin had 2,896; Minnesota, magnificent sum of $28,000,000; enough to pay not only Mr. GLEN.

3,008; Iowa, 4,779—or a total of 10,683 miles of railway for the three States. Or, in twenty-four years, the increased mileage of railway in these three States (with a total area equal to less than one-half of the land fairly fit for settlement, contained in the district lying between Manitoba and the Rocky Mountains) is 10,428 miles. If we desire that our territories should develope as rapidly as these three States have developed, we must provide for the construction of at least an equal number of miles of railway in proportion to the area, or at least 24,000 miles within the next twenty-four years. To secure the construction of such a number of miles of railway we must not put any stumbling blocks in the way of the building of railways by private enterprise, assisted by municipal or provincial subsidies. There are quite difficulties enough to overcome to prevent the opening up of the country by railways, without the Dominion Government interfering, and, by law, declaring that no railways shall be constructed for twenty years, except by and with the consent of an irresponsible corporation whose interests are opposed to the construction of competing lines. I have said that to insure the rapid settlement of the North-West Territories, it will be necessary to construct at least as many miles of railway, per square mile of area, as has already been constructed in the States of Iowa, Wisconsin, and Minnesota. This means—as I have said—the construction within the next 24 years, of at least 24,000 miles of railway. And the construction of this enormous number of miles of railway will still leave us at a disadvantage as compared to the three States named. But, supposing that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, under the contract now upon the Table, constructs one-half of the amount, or 12,000 miles of railway, during the next twenty-four years-and even this large amount will not secure the rapid settlement of that country—let us estimate the value of the clauseexempting the company from duty upon steel rails and all material used in the construction of the main lines and branches, telegraph lines, telephone lines, etc. Twelve thousand miles of railway means,—including the average number of miles of switches reported by the railways of the United States, -at least 14,000 miles of single track. Estimating rails, fish plates, spikes, bolts and nuts at 200 tons per mile, it will require 2,800,000 tons of iron and steel to construct the road bed alone—not including iron for bridges, which, at an average price of $40 per ton, gives a value of $112,000,000. A duty of ten per cent. on this amount is equal to $11,200,000, which is the value of the clause "exempting the Company from duty upon steel rails, fish plates, spikes, bolts and nuts" alone, even if they only construct one-half as many miles of railway per square mile as has already been constructed in the three north western States during the past twenty-four years. If, on the other hand Sir, they do construct as many miles of railway in the North-West, in proportion to the area, as have already been constructed in the three States named, the exemption from duty upon the steel rails, fish plates, spikes, bolts and nuts alone, would be worth $22,400,000. Supposing only 12,000 miles of railway is constructed under the contract now upon the Table, exemption from duty upon steel rails, fish plates, spikes, bolts, nuts, wire, material for bridges, telegraphic apparatus, etc., will be worth at least $12,500,000. I cannot help calling the attention of the House to the fact that, if it be true that the producer pays the duty, we are losing a splendid opportunity of making the producers of iron and steel in the United States and England pay at least the enormous cash bonus we are, under this contract, giving the Syndicate for the construction of this road. A duty of 25 per cent.—and farmers are compelled to pay a duty of 30 per cent. upon the implements they require togather their crops—upon $112,000,000, which is the value of the iron and steel which will be required in the con-

the cash benus we are giving the Syndicate under this contract, but also a sufficient sum to secure the construction of the Sault Ste. Marie Branch. If, on the other hand, it be true that the consumers pay the duty, what a monstrous fraud the National Policy is upon the consumers of this country. I desire to call the attention of the House to the grand opportunity which the Government has to secure, by a protective duty upon steel and iron, the early and rapid development of the iron mines of this country. Here is a sure market, including the iron required for the construction of cars, locomotives, bridges, etc., for not less than 4,000,000 tons of iron within the next twenty-four years. Adding to this the amount required for railways in the older Provinces and the amount used in the ordinary business of the country, namely, about 200,000 tons per annum, and we shall have a home market for 10,000,000 tons of iron and steel, the average value of which may be safely estimated at $40 per ton, or a total of $400,000,000, which immense sum must otherwise be sent abroad, to the great grief of hon. gentlemen opposite, to employ English and American capital and labor. The development of the iron industry in Canada would give employment to tens of thousands of skilled workmen, enlarging the home market for our various manufacturing industries, and creating a demand for a very large number of emigrants. Compared with this, the construction of one or more sugar refineries, or cotton mills, or woollen mills, which has been such a source of gratification to hon. gentlemen opposite, fades into utter insignificance. If this opportunity to secure the development of our iron industry is lost, I fear that it will be many, many years before we shall do little more than export our iron ores to other countries, taking in return for it manufactured iron and steel. It may be said that we shall not require 12,000 miles of railway to develope the territory lying between the western boundary of Manitoba and the Rocky Mountains, but let us see what has been our experience in the Province of Ontario. - At the close of 1879 we had in actual operation, south of the Georgian Bay and the city of Ottawa, 4,000 miles of railway, and it is safe to say that, including the construction of the Canada Central, the line connecting Lake Nipissing with Sault Ste. Marie, the Ontario and Pacific Junction Railway, the Ottawa and Toronto, and various other routes which must be constructed at a very early day, we shall have before the year 1890 at least 6,000 miles of railway in the Province of Ontario south of Lake Nipissing. The total number of acres of land under cultivation, including pasture lands, does not exceed 15,000,000 acres, or about one sixteenth as many acres as the hon. Minister of Railway says we have of lands "fairly fit for settlement in the North-West Territories." We must not overlook the fact that fully one half of the produce of Ontario is grown within forty miles of the Georgian Bay, Detroit River, Lake Erie, Lake Ontario or the St. Lawrence and Ottawa Rivers, and can be transported to the senboard without the aid of railways. We must also consider the fact that the great bulk of the fuel consumed in Ontario is produced within ten or fifteen miles of the place where it is consumed, and the same is true of lumber consumed in Ontario. Taking these facts into consideration, it will be seen that railways are more necessary in the North-West Territories than in the Province of Ontario, and yet, if we build as many miles of railway in the North-West as we shall, in all probability, have in 1890, in proportion to the area of lands "fairly fit for settlement" it will require 96,000 miles of railway to place the North-West Territories upon a par with the Province of Ontario, or eight times as many miles as I have assumed would be constructed in that region under the contract now upon the Table. In estimating the value of the exemption from taxation upon the road-bed, rolling stock, freight houses, passenger stations, harbors, elevators, telegraph and telephone lines, we will assume, as before, that only 12,000 miles of railway will be constructed. In 1864 there was in operation in England and Wales 12,592 miles of railway, which paid to the Government an average tax of $407.54 per mile; in 1874, the average was $601.05 per mile; in 1875, $664.17; in 1876, $731.14; in 1877, $764.25; in 1878, $809.86 per mile, or an increase in the rate of taxation per mile between 1864 and 1878 of 100 per cont. In-1879 there was in operation in France, 13,871 (English) miles of railway. The direct taxes paid to the Government was $19,155,000, or at the rate of $1,380.93 per mile. The indirect taxes, such as the free conveyance of the mails, troops, munitions of war, Government servants, Government bullion &c., &c., amounted in value to $16,000,000. The Paris, Lyons and Mediterranean railway returned to the Government nearly 11 per cent. per annum in taxes on the cash subsidy granted by the Government to aid in the construction of the railway, and at the end of seventy years the road reverts to the State. I have the opinion of Mr. Charles Francis Adams, jun., that the 94,000 miles of railway now in operation in the United States-which is equal to one-half the railway mileage of the world, 48,000 miles of which have been constructed since the beginning of the year 1870 -pays upon the average $300 per mile, or an aggregate of $25,200,000 per annum. We have here the actual policy of the three most enlightened nations in the world respecting the taxation of railways, showing that in England, in the year 1878, the Government received a revenue of $10,200,000 from 12,592 miles of railway. That in France, for the year 1879, from 13,871 miles of railway, the French Government received nearly $36,000,000 in revenue. That the revenue derived from taxation of railways in the United States was $28,200,000, or a total for the three countries of $74,400,000. an amount three times as great as the entire revenue of the Dominion. English and French Government returns and the returns of railway companies in the United States, show that the rate of taxation per mile is regularly and constantly increasing. Therefore, taking into consideration that more than one-half of the railways of the United States, have been constructed since the beginning of the year 1870-it is not unreasonable to value for a period of fifty years perpetual exemption from taxation for the 12,000 miles of railway I assume will be built in the North-West territories, under this contract, at $500 per mile per annum, or a total of $6,000,000. Capitalized at 5 per cent., the exemption would be worth $125,000,000. The taxation of railways is so important a question that the Government of the United States during the past year obtained, through its foreign Ministers, a statement of the policy pursued by England and continental nations towards railways in this respect, and the manner in which the tax was collected. Reports were received from Austria, Belgium, England, France, Germany, Holland, Hungary, Russia and Switzerland. The only Government exempting railways from taxation is that of Hungary, and in that country concessions are granted companies for ninety years, with the condition that at the end of that period the whole franchise and property, with an equipment equal to the original amount, should revert to the State. Of the thirty six States of the American Union, all of them without a single exception tax railway property, rolling stock, road-bed, etc., etc., and I have not been able to find a single instance in the history of American or European railway companies, in which a perpetual exemption from taxation has ever been granted. Exemption from taxation for a few years only has been granted in some States of the American Union for special reasons, but the general policy of all nations is to treat railway property the same as that of a private individual. The manuer of collecting the tax varies somewhat in different States and countries, but the fact remains that all countries collect in one way or another a very large revenue from railway corporations. The law in New York State is as follows:-There are no taxes except local ones, and these are laid on the real and personal estate in each municipality according to its value, as taxes are laid on individuals. No special rule is followed as to the tax on rolling stock. valuation of the local assessors, if regularly made, is final. The New York Central Railway paid taxes at the rate of nearly $1,000 per mile in 1879. In Pennsylvania all railroad companies paying dividends of six per cent. or more, pay a State tax of one-half mill on each dollar of capital stock. In addition to this, all railroad companies—and also telegraph, palace-car, and sleeping car companies -pay a tax of eight-tenths of one per cent, on gross receipts. In Rhode Island, railway corporations are taxed like other corporations and like individuals, on the value of their estates. In Illinois, taxes are levied on railroad corporations as on other corporations, and on individuals according to the value of their properties. The right of way, all tracks, stations, and improvements on the right of way are assessed by the State Board of Equalization. All other real estate is assessed as the land of individuals is. All personal property except rolling stock is assessed wherever it is found on May 1st. If the value of the capital stock exceeds the value of the real and personal estate the increase is assessed as capital stock. The value of rolling stock is fixed by the State Board and distributed for taxation among the counties and municipalities, in proportion to the length of road therein. The value of right of way, after being assessed by the State Board, is distributed in like manuer except that side and second tracks and buildings on the right of way are taxed where they are situated. There is no appeal from the State Board. In Indiana, the law of taxation is the same as in Illinois except in three particulars: The whole capital stock is liable by law to be valued by the State Board and distributed for taxation to the counties and towns in proportion to the length of road in each. Railroad stock in the hands of individuals is taxed to them as other stocks are. There is no appeal from excessive valuation. In Iowa, the general principle is equality of taxation, for all property assessments are made on the value of the entire railway at the estimated value of each mile including in the estimate right of way, bridges, rolling stock, stations, and all other property exclusively used for railroad purposes. Shares are taxed at their market value to the holders thereof. In Kansas the general principle of taxation is assessment on all property at its value in money. "Railroad property" is assessed by a State Board who estimate the value of the real estate connected with the right of way, and used in the daily operations of the road, including rails, ties, "franchises," and buildings. To this is added all moneys, credits and profits, all rolling stock owned or used by the Company. And the taxable value as ascertained by this addition is apportioned among the counties and municipalities in proportion to the length of road therein. Real estate, not included in the above description —that is real estate not used in the daily operation of the road—is taxed like the land of individuals, in the locality where it lies. In Massachusetts the assessors of each place annually report to the tax commissioner the names of corporations established or owning real estate therein, with an account of the real estate and machinery in said place and its value, and the amount at which it is assessed, and also the amount of taxes laid every year in said place. Each corporation returns a list of stockholders with the number of shares held by each, the amount of capital stock, the par value and market value thereof, and also the real estate, structures and machinery. Railway companies, in addition, return the whole length of their lines and the length lying without the State. The tax commissioner ascertains the market value of the shares on May 1st pre-ceding, and this is the taxable value of the franchises. The Mr. GLEN.

to be raised by property taxed in the State during the year. as returned by the assessors, upon the aggregate valuation of all the towns and cities for the preceding year. From the valuation for railroad companies is deducted an amount proportioned to that portion of their length lying beyond the State limits, the value of real estate and machinery located and subject to local taxes within the State. Taxes are paid by the railroad corporations to the State Treasurer. who is nominally tax commissioner, and who, with the auditor and one member of the council constitutes a Board of Appeal for correction of all errors, and their decision is final. In Michigan, in lieu of all taxes, except this on real estate not used for railroad purposes, a tax is laid of two per cent. on gross earnings, not exceeding $2,000 per mile, and of three per cent. on gross earnings exceeding that sum. There is also a tax of three per cent. on receipts from passengers carried in any palace or sleeping car, or any car for which an extra price is paid; and a tax of two per cent. on gross receipts derived from leasing or hiring of cars by any "special," "fast," "colored" or other freight line. Real estate not used for railroad purposes is subject to local taxes where it lies. In Minnesota, a tax of three per cent on gross earnings is laid in lieu of all other taxes, but by special legislation the amount of taxes has been reduced for a term of years including the Northern Pacific. Taxes for each year are assessed on the earnings for the year preceding. Assuming that four cents per acre per annum would be a fair average rate of taxation upon the railway companies lands' for the next twenty years, and assuming that the whole number of acres will be held by the Company for an average of twelve years, the value of exemption from taxation upon their lands is worth $12,000,000. 186), the States of Iowa, Wisconsin and Minnesota, produced 100,000,000 bushels of grain from 8,000,000 acres of improved lands. In 1870, the same States produced 220,000,000 bushels of grain from 17,500,000 acres of land. Suppose that for the next twenty years we produce upon the average 100,000,000 bushels of grain in the district lying between the western boundary of Manitoba and the Rocky Mountains, a territory more than twice as large as the three States named -we certainly ought to produce much more than this-and suppose the Canadian Pacific Railway Company charge only ten cents per bushel more than they ought to charge to convey this grain to market, or only one-half the rates now being charged by the same gentlemen who own the St. Paul, Minneapolis and Manitoba Railway, it will be seen that they will take from the pockets of the farmers, on the grain produced, no less a sum than $10,000,000 annually. It will be fair to assume that for the transportation of fuel, lumber, machinery, merchandize of all kinds, and other agricultural products that must be shipped into or out of the North-West Territories they will exact an equal amount over and above a fair and reasonable profit upon the cost of services they render, making a total $20,000,000 per annum as the value of the monopoly clause in the contract for twenty years to come. Even if only 8,000,000 acres of land are brought under cultivation, or about one-thirtieth part of the land said to be fairly fit for settlement by the hon. Minister of Railways, the privileges and exemptions granted by the contract now upon the Table are so valuable and extend over so long a period, that it will be almost impossible for private capital to compete with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in the construction of railways in that territory after twenty years shall have expired, so that for all practical purposes the monopoly of railway construction in that vast region, granted under the contract now before us, will be almost perpetual. Clause No. 20 of the Act of incorporation prevents the Government from interfering with the tolls of the railway company until the net profits over and above the working expenses shall exceed ten per rate is determined by an apportionment of the whole amount cent. upon the capital actually expended in the construction of the railway. It does not determine how the actual cost of construction shall be determined. The cost of construction to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company may be a different amount from the actual cost of building the road. As is well known, railways are constantly being constructed by what are known as construction companies, which are generally composed of the leading capitalists who control the railway, and the road sold to the railway company proper at an enormous increase upon the actual cost of construction. This was notoriously the case in the construction of the Union Pacific Railway which has been chosen by the Government as a model for the construction of this railway. There is nothing to prevent leading capitalists with whom the contract on the Table has been made from organizing themselves into a construction company, building the road, and transferring it to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company at an enormous increase upon the cost, and in this way secure unlimited control over the freights to be charged by the railway company. In this way the capital stock and bonds of the Union Pacific Railway Company and the Central Pacific Railway Company, composing the line from Omaha to San Francisco, has been increased to $268,000,000, ten per cent upon which would be $26,800,000, whereas the actual cost of construction did not exceed onehalf the sum. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company may purchase the Ottawa, Montreal, Quebec and Occidental Railway for the sum of $14,000,000, and under the contract exact 10 per cent. upon that sum before the Government could interfere to regulate the tolls. It is well known the leading members of the Syndicate purchased the St. Paul and Manitoba Railway for a sum not exceeding $10,000,000. The road is now said to be worth $32,000,000. There is nothing to prevent the Canadian Pacific Rai-way Company from buying this road at $32,000,000, or even a greater sum, and under the contract the Government could not interfere with the tolls of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company until an additional not profit of ten per cent. upon $32,000,000 had been earned. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company have power to construct or purchase lines from Nipissing to Montreal, Quebec, St. John, or Halifax, or any other branch lines they may choose to purchase, and can demand 10 per cent. upon the cost of these roads to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company before the Government can interfere to regulate the tolls. With the power given to the Company to construct or purchase lines leading to tide-water or branches, the cost of construction can be fixed at such a sum as to give the Canadian Pacific Railway Company unlimited control over the rates which they may charge for the services they render to the public for generations to come. As I said in my opening remarks, I assume that the statements made by hon. Ministers as to the character and quantity of agricultural lands in the North-West Territories lying between the western boundary of Manitoba and the Rocky Mountains are correct—that is to say, that there is 250,000,000 acres of lands fairly fit for settlement—that they are of so high a quality that the right hon. leader of the Government was justified in issuing his land regulations in 1879, charging at the rate of $5 per aere for lands lying near the railway prior to the construc-tion of the road. It is preposterous to suppose that 1,000 miles of railway, extending from Winnipeg to the Rocky Mountains, will develop that vast territory. You might as well undertake to do the carrying trade between Montreal and Liverpool with one steamship. The value of the clause exempting from duty steel rails, bolts, nuts, spikes, fish plates, iron for bridges, wire for telegraphs and telephones, telegraphic apparatus, etc., etc., is worth at the lowest calculation $1,000 per mile, and perpetual exemption from taxation cannot be considered worth less than $500 per mile per annum, or, capitalized at 5 per cent., $10,000 per mile. So that it is plainly evident that no railways can be built by private capital and compete with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, even after the twenty years monopoly has expired. It is evident that the object of the Syndicate, in insisting upon a monopoly of railway building for twenty years, was for the purpose of preventing the construction of competing lines. It is idle to suppose that private capital will construct branch lines which are simply feeders to a main line which absolutely controls and can dictate the price which the branch lines shall be allowed for transporting freights. We are forced to conclude, therefore, that the construction of railways in that vast territory must be, and will be, under the control of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. They will have in their hands the absolute control of the commercial value of the 225,000,000 acres fairly fit for settlement. which it is said will still belong to the Government after they shall have selected the 25,000,000 acres granted under this contract. If we expect to induce emigrants to any extent to settle in that country, we must satisfy them that the cost of transportation to and from the seaboard to the North-West Territories will not exceed the prices charged by roads in the United States; that is to say, a fair and reasonable profit upon the actual cost of transportation. I can conceive of no other way in which we can give intending emigrants ample security that their interests will be protected except by having the tolls of the railways entirely under the control of the Government, or the people free to secure the construction of competing lines, or that the Government shall build the road as a Government work and operate it in the interests of the producers and consumers of the country. With regard to the construction of the line connecting Lake Nipissing with Sault Ste. Marie, permit me to say, that I was one of a deputation who waited upon the hon. Minister of Railways at the inspector's office in the Post Office of Toronto, on December 21st, 1879. There was present among others, the hon. member for West Toronto, the hon. member for Centre Toronto, the hon. member for East Toronto, the hon. member for Welland, the hen. member for Hamilton, the hon. member for Muskoka, the Hon. Frank Smith, the Hon. John Beverly Robinson, the Hon. Alexander Morris, M.P.P. Letters of apology were received from the hon. member for East Durham, the hon. member for East York, the hon. member for Hamilton, and the hon. member for North Simcoe, regretting their unavoidable absence and strong sympathy with the object of the deputation. The hon. Minister of Railways made a speech upon that occasion which gave me very great satisfaction. I thought it was a good speech then, and I think so now. So good that I propose to read it to the House:

"Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am inclined to believe that if a connection were made with the Sault Ste. Marie by a line of railway extending from here by Gravenhurst and Nipissing, and from Montreal by the Canada Central and the line to the Sault Ste. Marie, it would not only have the effect of bringing a great volume of traffic from the Western States—from Minnesota, Dakota, and the countries in the neighborhood of St. Paul and Minnespolis—down through our own country, but that it is not fraught with the danger that I at first apprehended, because I believe we should be enabled by a line of steam communication from Sault Ste. Marie to Thunder Bay, and by the Government road from the North-West to the latter point, which we are now constructing as rapidly as possible, to make our lines of communication so much cheaper and bring at the same time the great North-West into so much more rapid communication with the centres of population in the older and more settled portions of Canada—with Montreal and Toronto—as would render it, instead of any injury to the country, a great advantage. I go further, gentlemen, than any person here has gone to-day in relation to the provincial character of this project which you have in hand. I believe it is not only not a Toronto, or a Hamilton, or a Belleville project—I believe it is not only not merely a project in which the interests of Ontario are concerned, but a project in which the interests of Ontario are concerned, but a project in which the interests of the whole Dominion are concerned. I look upon it as of the greatest possible consequence to the success of our efforts in developing the great North West. There is nothing that can so much contribute to the opening up of the rapid settlement and to the trade conveniences of that immense fertile territory, as the most easy and rapid communications with the great centres of trade and manufactures in the older Provinces, and anything that can facilitate the rapidity and the cheapness with which the manufactures of Toronto, Hamilton, Montreal, or any other part of Canada can be thrown into the North-West, is going to facilitate the settlement of that country, and by facilitating its settlement and development is going to hasten very considerably the day when we can take up the more important project of building a through line north of Lake Superior. I have no hesitation therefore, in saying that I regard this measure as one of great importance—not only to the Province of Ontario but to Canada as a whole,—a very large portion of which will depend upon it. Now, with the importance with which this ques ion has recently assumed, and which will in consequence of the attention that is being directed to it in the United States—at St. Paul, Minneapolis, and the su rounding country—the advantage which the people living in that section of the country find they will derive from reaching the seaboard by a much shorter, easier, and cheaper route than any other (namely one constructed to Sault Ste. Marie,) must result in the construction of that road at an early day."

Speaking of the construction of Sault Ste. Marie Railway. the hon. Minister of Railways remarked further:

"I had an opportunity of discussing this matter a few days ago with Mr. Dawson, the member for Algoma. I asked that gentleman what would be the prospect of keeping up a winter water communication between Sault Ste. Marie and Thunder Bay. He stated that there was a good harbor at Sault Ste. Marie, that the lakes would be entirely open during the winter, and that the navigation would not be interrupted for pure then five or six weeks."

The hon. Minister of Railways met a deputation from the Montreal Board of Trade, January 8th, 1880. I read from the Toronto Mail, report of January 9th, 1880. Sir Charles Tupper, spoke as follows:-

"The Government having provided for the extension of the Canada "The Government having provided for the extension of the Canada Central to Lake Nipissing, it had naturally attracted a great deal of attention to the scheme, and the project to carry on that road from Nipissing, direct to Sault Ste. Marie, had received an additional impetus from the attention which had been given to the question by the railway magnates and persons interested in the development of the North-Western States. They found, on looking at the map, that it was almost an air line running from St. Paul and Minneapolis - the great centres of commerce in the North-West—to the city of Montreal. They found that wheat could be placed in the harbor of Montreal by that route and sent to Liverpool so much more cheaply and easily than by the They found that wheat could be placed in the harbor of Montreal by that route and sent to Liverpool so much more cheaply and easily than by the existing routes, that it was not at all surprising that attention should have been directed to the project. The more he examined the subject the more satisfied he was that, independent altogether of the great importance to Canadian interests of the construction of a line from St. Paul, or from Duluth, or from both, to Sault Ste. Marie, looking to a connection with the ocean traffic at Montreal, independent of the great additional volume of traffic Canada might fairly anticipate would flow from that route, we had a very great interest in establishing communication between Nipissing and the Sault at as early a day as practicable. The development of our great North-West depended to a large extent upon the ease, cheapness had a very great interest in establishing communication between Nipissing and the Sault at as early a day as practicable. The development of our great North-West depended to a large extent upon the ease, cheapness and rapidity with which we could send people into that country, and bring the produce of the west to the seaboard. The fact that the extension of the Canada Central to Nipissing would be accomplished at an early day, the fact that the Government were pushing with all the energy and vigor that they possessed the line from Thunder Bay to Red River, the fact that the extension of the line from Nipissing to the Sault would bring Montreal within 60 hours of Red River, settled the question as to the great importance of carrying out this project at the earliest practicable day. The road from Thunder Bay to Red River, the Government fully expected would be completed by the lat of July, 1882, and there would be no difficulty, from what we could learn of the character of the country, in having the extension from Nipissing to the Sault completed at the same time. Assuming that no movement would be made towards the construction from Minneapolis or Duluth to the Sault, it would not in the slightest degree affect his anxiety to see our own line extended to that point. While it would not secure the trade of the Western States, in would give our own North-West a vast advantage over the adjoining territory, from the facility with which they could send their produce to the sea. I can, therefore, see nothing to prevent the Government and the country from being interested in this project."

I also desire to call the attention of the House, and particularly the hon. member for Welland, to an editorial in the Toronto Mail of November 22nd, 1879, as follows:—

"It can hardly be said, as a result of the interview held on Friday last. that the Government is committed to a positive promise, of subsidising a line of railway, via Gravenhurst and Nipissing, to the Sault Ste. Marie, but it certainly may be said that, as no public work was ever presented to a Minister by so impartial and powerful a deputation, so no deputation had ever a more explicit and satisfactory adoption of their palicies has a Minister.

no deputation had ever a more explicit and satisfactory adoption of their policy by a Minister.

"The commercial necessities and possibilities of the country have increased, and pending the completion of railway connection between Nipissing and Thunder Bay, the Sault Ste Marie line becomes of pressing importance in the eyes of men too much devoted to great public objects to be moved by selfish motives, and too various in political color to be appreciated of partition extratory.

reverting, to a great extent, to Sir Hugh Allan's old idea, that it would enable us to offer a shorter route to the seaboard to American commerce, enable us to offer a shorter route to the seaboard to American commerce, and enable us to rival their older and hitherto unrivalled commercial routes. The future of this new line is now in the hands of three powerful combinations. It is in the hands of the Ontario Government, so far as the provincial subsidy is concerned; it is in the hands of the Dominion Government so far as the aid to be expected from that quarter is concerned; and it is in the hands of the gentlemen who formed the deputation, and of those whom they represented on the occasion. Public opinion, the opinion of the press, commercial opinion, and official opinion all combine to approve of the connection with the Sault, and it will be a strange thing if, in these days of great confidence and of rapid growth, we do not witness the speedy accomplishment of so heavily endorsed an undertaking."

Mr. Speaker, I approved of this editorial when I first read it, and I approve of it now. I do not think that my hon. friend from West-Durham presented the desirability of the immediate construction of the Sault Ste. Marie road, very much better than the hon. Minister of Railways did in his speeches at Toronto and Montreal, or than the Government organ, the Toronto Mail. The reasons which a year ago justified and demanded the early construction of that road, are stronger to-day than they were then. The immediate completion of the Northern Pacific Railway is assured; the construction of the line between Sault Ste. Marie and Duluth is new being pushed forward; the trade of the North Western States has developed greatly within the past year, and we all appreciate, more than ever before, the desirability of directing the trade of the North Western States to our seaboard towns. Since that time, the Grand Trunk have completed the line between Port Huron and Chicago, and during the first year received 29 per cent. of its entire traffic through its Chicago connection. The census of the United States has been taken, showing an enormous increase in the population of the States and territories, which would be tributary to the Northen Pacific Railway, and whose trade would find the shortest. cheapest, and most direct route to the seaboard over the Sault Ste. Marie route. Minnesota, Wisconsin, Washington, Oregon, Montana, Dakota, Idaho and Northern Michigan, States and territories through which the Northern Pacific Railway passes, already have a population of 3,000,000 according to the census of 1880—increasing at the rate of more than 100 per cent. in ten years, so that within ten years it will be within bounds to say that the North-Western States, whose easiest, cheapest, and most direct outlet to the seaboard will be vid Soult Ste. Marie, will have a population of 6,000,000, which will probably be as great as the entire population of the Dominion at that time. Under the pooling arrangements of the Trunk lines, the Grand Trunk was allowed only seven per cent of the traffic centring at Chicago, and yet its earnings from its Chicago connection amounted to $5,000,000 the first year after the road was opened from Port Huron direct to Chicago. This will enable us to estimate the value to Canada of another direct connection with the trade of the North Western States. The gross receipts of the Union Pacific and Central Pacific Railway Companies for the year 1880, exceeded $45,000,000, and it is estimated that for the year 1881 they will exceed $50,000,000. Assuming that a portion of the through traffic of this line will be secured by the Northern Pacific Railway Company, and that its cheapest, most direct, and natural course will be vid Sault Ste. Marie to Montreal, I think I am justified in saying that the trade of the North-Western States, to be secured by the Sault Ste. Marie connection, will be of far greater value than the trade now secured by the Chicago connection of the Grand Trunk Railway, and I am inclined to believe that, at an early day, it will exceed in value not only the trade of the North-Western States which we obtain through the Grand Trunk, but also the trade which comes from the States to Montreal through the Welland and St. Lawrence Canals. But throwing aside the value of the American trade which must flow to Montreal over the Sault Ste. Marie "The earlier opinion was that the Sault Ste. Marie line would place us at the disposal of the Americans. The present opinion appears to be three statements made by the hon. Minister of Railways in Mr. Glen.

his reply to the deputations who waited upon him at Montreal and Toronto. He distinctly states that the Government will complete the line from Thunder Bay to Red River by July 1st, 1882, and that the line can be completed from Nipissing to Sault Ste. Marie by that time. If this be true, there will be no difficulty in securing the construction of the Sault Ste. Marie Branch, and having it open for traffic by the first day of May, 1883; thereby securing, as the hon. Minister says, a cheaper route for the traffic with our own North-West than via St. Paul and Dul th or Chicago. I also desire to call the attention of the House to the statement made by the hon. Minister of Railways that there is a good harbor at Sault Ste. Marie, and that the hon member for Algoma informed him that "the lake would be entirely open during the winter and that navigation would not be interrupted for more than five or six weeks." Now, Sir, we have the authority of the hon. Minister of Railways for stating that the most direct and cheapest route to the North-West Territories can be constructed within two years from the first of July next, that it will give a route through our own territory for at least ten months and a-half in each year; statements which, if they were true when made by the hon. Minister of Railways in Toronto and Montreal, are true to day, and are good and sufficient reasons for the immediate construction of the Sault Ste. Marie road. The hon. Minister of Agriculture has admitted that the great majority of the emigrants arrived in this country during the period of navigation, and that the great majority of emigrants go to Manitoba during the season of navigation. If this be true, within two years we can have the shortest, most direct and cheapest route, not only for freight but for emigrants, through our own territory, if we construct the Sault Ste. Marie Branch. Whereas, if we do not construct this line, we must continue for ten years, to send our immigrants through the United States where, it is said by hon. Ministers that, a large proportion of them are induced to settle. We are asked to proceed with the immediate construction of the eastern or Lake Superior section for the purpose of securing a route through our own territory, for about five or six weeks in each year, and that six weeks at a time, when the traffic between the older and the newer Provinces is at the lowest point. We have heard, Mr. Speaker, much sympathy expressed for the poor Syndicate. I think a little sympathy for the poor farmers, who are invited and encouraged to settle in the North-West Territories, would not be misplaced. The farmers of this country rise early and and toil late. They honorably earn their bread by the sweat of their brow. They bear the burden and heat of the day, and are the real producers of the wealth of the country. It is by the strictest economy and most persistent effort through a lifetime that they are enabled to purchase and improve upon the average a farm of 100 acres, worth, when they have arrived at the age of three score and ten, from $3,000 to $10,000. As a rule they spend no money upon the comforts and luxuries of life, are contented with he bare necessities of life, and compelled to accept for their labor and capital smaller average returns than any other class in the community. On the other hand, the gentlemen of the Syndicate are millionaires, as is the case with the great majority of the railway managers of this continent. No class of men have been more successful in amassing immense fortunes than those who have had the control of the construction and management of railways, and there are no business investments which have paid a better average dividend upon the actual cost of the investment than It is perfectly well known that the capital stock and funded debt of the railways of this continent represent a sum more than twice as great as the actual cost of construction and equipment, or, in other words, whereas the capital stock and funded debt amounts to over $5,000,000,000, the actual cost of construction and equipment does

$2,500,000,000. not exceed Assuming 86,000 miles of railway in operation in the United States. in the year 1879, cost upon the average $30,000 per mile, or $2,580,000,000, the net earnings was equal to eight and a half per cent. It must not be forgotten that more than one-half of the railways have been constructed within ten years, and, therefore, a very large proportion of them have been but a short time in operation, and their business has not been fully developed. We must not overlook the fact, also, that over 26,000 miles lay west of the Mississippi River in the new States and territories. There is no business on this continent employing so large an amount of capital which has paid as large net returns upon the average as constructing and operating railways. The net profits to the national banks of the United States, employing some $2,000,000,000 of capital, did not exceed five per cent. during the year 1879. It is notoriously the fact that there has been, and is still, great extravagance in the construction and management of railways. Presidents and managers have received greater salaries than in any other line of business. It is very doubtful whether or not farming pays over and above a fair reward for the services of the farmer and his family four per cent, upon the capital invested, and yet we are exempting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company from taxation upon its lands, road-bed, rolling stock, &c., and compelling the farmer to not only pay the cost of opening roads and building school houses, etc., but actually to pay the entire cost of protecting the property of the railway company. The 900 miles through the prairie section can undoubtedly be built and equipped for $10,000,000. The construction of the Sault Ste. Marie Branch can be secured for $3,000,000, in all $13,000,000 which, at 4 per cent. per annum, would be equal to an annual tax upon the country of $520,000. Under this contract the Government are to complete the line from Thunder Bay to Winnipeg, and now own the line from Pembina to Winnipeg. The hon. Minister of Railways has said that the prairie section would immediately pay working expenses and a fair and reasonable interest upon the cost of construction. The Government can borrow money at four per cent. per annum. Now, suppose the Government were to announce that they would construct the prairie section as a Government work, and so arrange the tolls on the prairie section and the Thunder Bay and Pembina Branches as to pay to the Government only four per cent. net upon the actual outlay for the next 25 years, and that private corporations would be allowed to build as many branches as the development of the country demanded, that the freights received from the branch lines would be transported over the main line upon as favorable terms as any other traffic, and the lands offered to actual settlers, and to such on y at fair price,we should then have a policy which would induce emigrants to settle in that country. Whereas, if we confirm this contract we create monopolies and grant privileges and exemptions which will tend to divert immigration to the United States. I am opposed to the confirmation of the contract now upon the Table, because it creates a practical monopoly in the construction of railways throughout the fertile section for twenty years, and grants privileges and exemptions which will tend to perpetuate that monopoly Secondly, because it exempts the lands and property of the railway company from taxation thereby unjustly increasing the taxation of the farmers whom we hope to induce to settle in that country. Thirdly, because the material used in the construction of the road bed is exempt from the ordinary and regular custom duties imposed upon other branches of business. Fourthly, because under the contract the Government surrender their right to control the tolls of the railway company until after the net profits of the Company exceed ten per cent, thereby transferring to an irresponsible corporation a control over the carrying trade of the entire country north and west of Lake Superior; and, fifthly, because the Government have now in their possession from thoroughly responsible parties an offer to construct the road for a less consideration and upon much better terms and conditions. For these reasons, and many others which I might mention, I reaffirm that the confirmation of the contract will seriously impede the development and settlement of the North-West Territories, and that it grants privileges and exemptions which will tend to destroy the peace, well-being and prosperity of those who may settle in that vast region. Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a word or two in reference to the new proposition that has been made to the Government by what is called the new Syndicate. It must have been evident to this House that the hon. leader of the Opposition, and those who act with him, seized with great avidity upon the objections which were raised against the contract now before the House. During the last two Sessions they have been endeavoring to make the people of this country believe that the National Policy, upon which the present Administration came into power, is not in the interest of this country. They have endeavored to do that in spite of the logic of events as shown in the byelections which have taken place, and the tendency has been to strengthen the Government. Those hon, gentlemen exhausted their eloquence in endeavoring to cause some break in the ranks of the Conservative party. Failing to do that, they made an appeal to the people during the Christmas recess. Here let me say that the opinions of those hon. gentlemen in relation to the duty of the Government towards the people have very materially altered since the last Session. I think we can recollect—at all events we have the records in the Hansard which show—that those hon. gentlemen, and especially the hon, gentleman for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) did not put so much faith in the opinions of the people in relation to public affairs during the last-two Sessions as they propose to do at the present moment. I think it was the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) who said that it was the duty of the members of this House, upon a great public question like the present, to elicit the opinion of their constituents. We can imagine the hon, member for South Brant calling his electors together, and in that calm and dispassionate manner for which he is celebrated, placing before the electors the terms of this contract, and asking their opinion upon it. We can imagine that, I say, but I think the fact is that he and his friends used every argument in their power to convince the electors that this contract was a bad one, and that they used every argument in their power to induce their electors to endorse that proposition. I venture to say that the only member on either side of the House who has elicited a fair and unbiassed opinion from his electors is the hon, member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall). That hon, gentleman has told us what the result was in his constituency, and I believe that the result would be the same in every constituency in the country if the question was placed before the electors in the same fair manner as it was placed before the electors of Halton. Those hon, gentlemen came back from the country crestfallen. They had failed in their attempt to excite the public against the contract. Since the recess a proposition has been sent to the Minister of Railways, the contents of which were known to the leader of the Opposition, long before its terms were made known either to the Minister of Railways or to any person upon this side of the House. That proposition, on the face of it, is a better one than that which the Government has entered into; but, to enable us to get at the true inwardness of that proposition, we must read between the lines During the discussion which took place in this House prior to the recess, the hon. leader of the Opposition, and all the hon, gentlemen who have spoken on that side of the House, took very strong ground against the construction of a Canadian Pacific Railway at all. They took the Mr. GLEN.

ground that it was not necessary in the present condition of the country to make anything more than a patchwork railway; that it was the duty of the Government not only to give facilities for connections with American railways, but to aid a line of railway to connect with American lines. In view of that fact, the proposition which has been sent to the Minister of Railways, by what is called the new Syndicate, loses all claim to the serious consideration of this House. I do not propose to say one single word in relation to the gentlemen composing what is called the new Syndicate. Some of them are known to be men of integrity, men of means and men of good business ability; but the more you accord to those gentlemen these qualities, the easier it is to perceive that they had no idea that their proposition would be accepted. I believe these men would regard it as an insult if a proposition were made by a person to enter into a contract with them in connection with some business matter, when the proposer knew that a contract for the same work had already been entered into by the party to whom he applied. It may be said that the Government are only a Committee of Parliament, and that the contract now before the House was made by them as the agents of Parliament, and subject to the ratification of Parliament. That, Sir, is quite true; but if we admit that proposition, we must also admit that if we refuse to ratify the acts of our agents we must also disclaim those acts. If we disclaim the acts of our agents, that, so far as the Government of this country is concerned, seems to involve a declaration of non-confidence in the ability of those gentlemen to conduct the public affairs of this country. So that those gentlemen, knowing well as business men that the Government could not possibly accept their proposition, knowing that the rejection of the contract would involve the downfall of the Administration, and would bring into power the gentlemen now composing Her Majesty's loyal Opposition, and knowing the ground these gentlemen take with reference to the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, they had no reason to believe that they would be bound to construct the difficult portions of the road at all. I do not mean to say that it would not be beneficial to Canada, from a commercial point of view, to have railway connection with the United States. It has been stated in this House that the hon. Minister of Railways had given an expression to an opinion favorable to the construction of what is known as the Sault Ste Marie Branch; but it has not been—and cannot be—stated that that hon. gentleman ever made a proposition to tax the people of this country for the purpose of constructing that line, or that he intended it as an alternative line. believe that the people of this country will not be satisfied with anything less than an all-rail route across our own continent; that they will not be satisfied with a route which is dependent upon the caprices of the people of the United States, or dependent, for a certain portion of the year, upon those magnificent water stretches of which we used to hear so much. I believe the construction of the Pacific Railway, in its entirety, is not only a commercial, but a political necessity. And if I had time I think I could show that, from an economical, as well as a national point of view, the construction of the road north of Lake Superior will be of immense advantage to this country. Recent explorations lead us to the conclusion that the character of the country north of Lake Superior has been greatly misjudged. We have reason to believe, from these recent explorations, that large quantities of valuable timber and considerable areas of good arable land exist in that region. As I have already said, the people of Canada will not be satisfied with anything less than the proposal of the present Administration, and I am of opinion that the construction of the road, according to the terms of the contract now before the House, will be acceptable to the people, because we shall have reached a finality of the country's obligation. We shall have accomplished the construction of that road at a cost which the people of this country will be able to bear. We shall have our expectations realized by getting into that country, in a very few years, a more than sufficient number of people to bear the whole cost of the burdens which the construction of that road imposes on the people of Canada. What would be the effect of refusing to endorse the contract now before the House? Why, Sir, if hon. gentlemen opposite come inte power delays would-occur, and we know the effect of the delays that took place in 1373. If those delays had not taken place the construction of the Pacific Railway would to day be well on towards completion. I do not think any further delays should take place, and I think the ratification of this contract by Parliament will meet with the approval of a large majority of the people of Canada. I have only to say, for my own part, that I have very much pleasure in voting for that ratification.

Mr. RYMAL. At this late stage of the debate I will not detain the House but a very short time, because I think the question has been viewed from almost every possible standpoint, and because I am not in a position to speak at length on the subject. Yet, I think it is my duty to say a few words on so important a matter as this. Ever since we entertained the proposition to build the Canadian Pacific Railway we have been in hot water. Troubles have come upon us thick and fast, and my humble opinion, now, after having watched the operation of this matter for some ten years, is that our troubles are not ended. We have seen the disruption of one strong Government in connection with this matter, and I believe some of us shall live to see the disruption of other Governments. I am sorry that it is so; for I think it is disastrous to the country that hon. gentleman should undertake any work that is almost sure to bring about the death of successive Governments. Now, the terms of the first proposition made by the Government composed of hon. gentlemen opposite were $30,000,000 and 50,000,000 acres in of land. acres Of course, a dollar was then worth pretty much what a dollar is worth now. But 50,000,000 acres of land at that time in the North-West bore no proportion in value to 50,000,000 acres there to-day. I said then I did not believe that the sum of money and the amount of land proposed to be given were sufficient to build that work; and I may say that apart from the ugly occurrences that too's place in connection with that charter. I am sorry that charter had not been acted on-that Sir Hugh Allan was unable to raise the money he went to England to negotiate—for I believe it would have been one of the best bargains ever made for the construction of the road. However, we have not to deal with that to-day. It was a failure and is past and gone. The liabilities of the Government that then went out devolved on the new Government. They proposed a more liberal offer, something like $27,030,000 and 27,000,000 acres of land. The land had, perhaps, slightly increased in value during these two or three years. The offer was still, however, insufficient to induce capitalists to engage in the construction of this extensive work. Feeling it incumbent on them to do something to open up this vast country they undertook to build the railway as a Government work. My hon, friend opposite did not disclaim the continuance of that system very much, for they allowed it to continue. But that is past and gone; that scheme has fallen through. Hon. gentlemen opposite proposed to make it a semi-Imperial work, and started off to England in high hope. They had no doubt that they would be successful. But their mission was a lamentable failure, and they came back to adopt another scheme—the scheme to which, I believe, they should have adhered. They asked Parliament ten short months ago to appropriate 100,000,000 acres for the construction of the road, and Parliament placed this amount in their hands. This, I believe, would have been ample to build the road as a Government work. I do not believe it is wise for a them know what the terms were. They were acting for Government to wish to victimize capitalists who may become contractors under them; but I believe that when a Government see that a public work is likely to become a paying concern, and that it is in the interest of the people it should be prosecuted as a Government work, they should undertake it themselves, in order that all the advantages to flow from its construction may accrue to the benefit of the people. I would like to know what it was that changed the opinions of the Government so suddenly. Two or three short months after Parliament had placed in their hands the lands they asked to enable them to build the railway as a Government work, what was it that induced them to post off to Europe to negotiate with capitalists to undertake its construction? Was there much pressure brought to bear on them? Was their resolve becoming weak? Did they find themselves unable to resist the corrupting influences which, they say, sometimes surround Governments when they have contracts to let? I have too high an opinion of the hon. Minister of Railways to believe that his virtue failed, that he was afraid to face defeat. With his splendid abilities, I have no doubt, had he saw fit. he would have let his contract to contractors in sections, and that the amount of money he would have realised on the lands placed at his disposal by Parliament would have been sufficient to build a road entirely equipped and leave a nice surplus to the credit of the Dominion. I am quite willing to give way to the hon. Minister of Railways in order that he may explain to the House the reason for such a sudden change of opinion. Will I sit down? No. On this as on other occasions, when the representatives of the people ask the Government for information, Ministers are silent. What is the reason; is there anything in connection with whole transaction that will not bear the light? conclusion is the country to arrive at, if, after repeated solicitations to the Government to take us into their confidence, they refuse to reply? As they will not, then my imaginations are left free to run wild. I am not possessed of a very fertile imagination. I am slow to believe anything dishonorable in the conduct of other men; but, after this continued silence, my imagination may conceive ugly things, things to which I do not wish to give utterance, but things that, in spite of myself, take possession of my mind from day to day. I do not know why they should have gone to England to consult with an American company, when they might have consulted with them much more conveniently at New York or St. Paul. But it is a nice pleasure trip, I presume. I have never had the opportunity of trying it, and it is very pleasant to pass a few months in Great Britain associating with the big wigs there. My hon, friend the Minister of Agriculture of the control o ture, we were told, received something when he was there —a stroke of genius. Now, I have been acquainted with that hon. gentleman for a long time, and I respect him very much indeed; but that stroke did not seem to have hurt him a great deal. I do not see that there is an additional wrinkle in his forehead or an additional grey hair on his head after receiving this stroke of fire, for genius, I believe, always appears in a flame of fire. There is no visible mark left of the stroke. It reminds me of the Irishman's blows. "The first time I struck him," said Pat, "I missed him entirely; and the second time I hit him in the same place." I hope my hon. friend will never receive a stroke that will do him more injury than this stroke of genius. After his return, the right hon. Premier announced that he had made a contract firm. Is that the same as a firm contract, or is there a little give and take about that more than the other. However, it took him some little time afterwards to conclude this contract; and I do honestly think that it was the bounden duty of the Government, if they had made this contract, to take the people into their confidence and let us, and it is only reasonable to suppose that they ought to other conceivable case, could I imagine that the Government have let us, their masters, know what they were doing. But they chose not to do it, they kept silence until the last hour, and they brought us together at a most inconvenient season of the year—two weeks before the Christmas holidays -with the expectation that they would be able to rush the contract through before the holidays. I am bound to say that when the terms of this contract became known to me, I was perfectly horrified at some of the details. I could have tolerated the granting of $25,000,000 in money, and 25,000,000 of acres of land, although those floures represent a large sum. I think it is quite reasonable that we should value the lands now at the same price that was put upon them by hon gentlemen opposite last year, and if we do-that is nearly four dollars per acre—and that would make the land alone with $100,000,000. That condition of the contract might, however, have been tolerated, but there are other provisions which to me appear monstrous. We have been doing all we could to induce immigrants to settle in the North-West. We have been at considerable expense in acquiring that vast country; we were at still further expense in bringing it into a state of civili zation; we spent large sums in extinguishing the Indian titles, and in brigning the country into a state of law and order; and we all looked upon it as the future heritage of the people of Canada, and of those who might be induced to cast their lot with us. And having induced these people to go there, how do the Government propose to settle them? In alternate blocks of 640 acres, each scattered among intervening blocks over which neither the Government nor the settlers will have any control, and which will belong to the Company who are to build the railway. Now, I do not know that I have heard a proposition such as I am about to make. I have looked at the matter a good deal, and I must say that I do not like that way of parcelling out the land. If the Syndicate is to have one-half of the land—within 50 miles, if you like, of the railway, or 24 miles of the railway-then I would say, let them take their land along one side of the road, and let the other side be held sacred to setlers, and let the Government manage the lands on that side for the benefit of the settlers. I believe it would be better in this case, if everything between the 49th parallel and the road had been kept sacred to the settlers, and the Company had been permitted to take their entire amount of land north of the road. What would have been the result? There would have been a continuous settlement on the one side of the road, and the people would have had neighbors, who would have shared with them the burdens of municipal taxation; they would have had help in establishing schools and other institutions, which civilized society requires, and no man would have felt that he was oppressed, by having lands alongside of him which were exempted from taxation for twenty years, or felt that every blow he struck on his own fee simple was only adding to the value of the lands alongside of him. He would not have felt that there were those alongside of him who were partaking of all the advantages of his labor and enterprise, without contributing any share themselves. I do not suppose I shall live to see the day when so fair a proposition as the one I have made will be accepted by the Government, but I have still further objections to the contract. It appears to me, on reading through the contract, that everything the Company saw fit to ask had been granted to them. I could scarcely conceive of any one being able to draw up such a document, until I was told that it was drawn by the man who was the legal adviser of those who got the charter for the first contract—the man who, it is said, distributed the swag-the corruption money of that day. I could fancy that if the Syndicate committed could have permitted such a one-sided document to be drawn up, as one to which they would give their sanction. Where was the Minister of Justice on that occasion-an able, diligent and painstaking lawyer? Did he sit alongside the attorney of the Syndicate and help to frame the provisions of this contract? The hon. gentleman will not answer that Will any member of the Governhe did, I know. ment say that he was consulted as this document was drawn up clause by clause? I do not think they will—they are all silent. Did they go it blind? Ask what you want, take what you like, rob, plunder, persecute the people we sent into that country, and what you do not want we will take - were those the orders which were given in making the contract? There could not have been a more unconditional surrender of the territory of a free people than the Government have made to the Syndicate. I have not a word to say against the gentlemen who compose the Company. It was a business transaction with them; they were capitalists investing their money; there might be profit or there might be loss, and I do not blame them for getting the be t terms they could. But it is upon the Government who basely surrendered the rights of the people, who sacrificed nearly their all, that the condemnation must fall. I shall not refer to the different clauses of the contract as they have been referred to so frequently already. I disapprove of a good many of them. Some of the concessions which have been made by the Syndicate, and which I presume were brought about by the criticisms passed upon the contract in this House, will render the contract less objectionable than it was in its original state, but I look upon them as only half given as yet. I do not know whether these amendments will be made or not, and I would much rather have seen them incorporated in the document itself, than await their incorporation in the Consolidated Railway Act, an incorporation which may or may not take place. I say that I do not approve of this. It is giving too much money according to the hon, gentlemen opposite themselves. They say it will only take $78,000,000 to build the entire road, $30,000,000 of that we have got to spend, and the Government says that is the end of it. Why, the Government have lowered themselves mightily in my estimation, and they are endeavoring to deceive the people in this respect if they do not know what it is going to cost, and they have become common contractors for that Company Instead of having washed their hands of future liabilities they have done nothing of the sort, and the Company will effectually put the screws on them before the Government get out of their hands. I disapprove of some of the clauses of this contract—so much so that I am prepared to vote against it. I think better terms can be obtained, and I find a second offer has been made. Some say that this new offer is a political dodge, that it is a trick, that it is an attempt to weaken the Government, that it is calculated to give the Opposition a cry with which to go before the country. Well, there may be a little in all this, but there is a difference of $12,500,000 between the two offers, which, to the people of Canada, amounts to more than the little paltry sum which it has been called. $12,500,000 is something like $4 for every man, woman and child in the Dominion. But that is not worth saving, hundreds of millions can be thrown away now; three or four millions of acres of land, more or less, and three or four millions of money, according to the hon, member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall), are of little account. Well, he has not changed in that respect. I can recollect another occasion, when $10,000.000 were at stake; he did not make any very great ado about it, he did not make so much ado as to bring on a crisis in which he or somebody else would have had to resign the seals of office and become private members of Parliament again. But whether the their interests to him, and the Government made him their hon, member for Halton, or any one else, thinks it is a agent to draw up the contract—I say that in that, but in no matter of supreme indifference, I hold it is the bounden duty of the Government-of every Government-when they can save $500,000, or $1,000,000, or $5,000,000, let alone $12,000,000, to do their very best, their utmost, to save the people of Canada the hard earnings of the industrious. is said this is a political dodge, that the leader of the Opposition has managed this thing, and it so happens that as regards the political complexion of both of the Syndicates, they are subject to the same charge. You do not charge the hon. member for West Durham with inducing all Reformers to join the first Company, do you? No, you are wedded to that, you believe in it, you are tied to it; but because another Syndicate or Company, composed of Reformers, who are willing to save $12,500,000, come forward, in a spirit of patriotism, you say we cannot tolerate them. One hon. gentleman went so far as to say he regretted that the members of the Syndicate were all clear Grits; if I could rejoice in anything it would be that the clear Grits are possessed of such money, energy and patriotism that they should step in between the people and the Government, who are about to throw away their money, and offer to save $12,500,000 in building the road. If anything redounds to the credit of the Reform party it is this. It is, surely, nothing to their discredit that they came forward and offered to construct the road for $12,500,000 less than the previous offer. Now, I am acquainted with a few of the members of this Company which has male the offer; among those with whom I am personally acquainted are several gentlemen of known respectability. I do not know how extensive their means may be, but I suppose they are able to implement with money any undertaking they enter upon, and I understand they have deposited $1,500,000 or thereabouts, as security for their good faith in this matter. I ask you whether it lies in the mouth of any man to say that this is a political trick or dodge? Why, hon gentlemen opposite can earn fame, almost immortality, if they test the sincerity of these men, and by testing their sincerity save to the people $12,500,000. If they fail to come to the mark, then, and not till then, does it lie in their mouths to denounce them,—a number of men, second to none, I am bound to believe, in business ability and means. But, now, let us enquire what on earth—I was going to say what in some other place under the earth—is the reason assigned for this adherence to the worst bargain? It is said it is too late. Too late? The contract is not yet ratified. Too late? What for? The hon. member for Renfrew (Mr. White), tells us he would rather see $12,500,000 sacrificed than allow hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches to go out of office, and see other men take their places. Well, I fancy those gentlemen will not re nain there forever, and $12,500,000 is a pretty heavy price for the people to pay for the short time that public opinion will allow them to disgrace the seats they now occupy; disgrace the seats, I say, because they are traitors to the interests of the people. Well, what is the reason? Now, my imagination begins to assume its life, begins to spread her wings, and I will deal, perhaps, a little in the visionary. The memory of other days rises up before me; and but for the memory of other days my imagination would not soar so high, would not sink so low. discover the depths of infamy which some people have to haunt. Now, I ask what is the reason why the better offer is not accepted. I do not wish to stop the construction of the road. I believe the road might be postponed for a time; but if Parliament is bound to build the whole road I would not cry myself to death about it; but I say let us build it in as about this. They knew nothing at all about it. The people economical a manner as is consistent with obtaining a fair of Canada knew nothing at all about it; even you, Mr. road. Why will you not accept the second offer? Are Speaker, with your general intelligence of everything within there private considerations? It is impossible for any man of common sense to say there are any patriotic reasons why every one the intention of the Government was a scaled they should not do it. Is there any national reason? No; book. This contract was made in the dark, it is to be held the road might be built just as well by one Company as the sacred, and no man must know anything about it. Why, other, and we will save the money. There must be something behind the scenes. What can it be? Can it be that in the near future an election is looming? In two years I believe hon. gentlemen opposite will be called upon again to face the electors; and will the same means be resorted to in 1883 as were resorted to in 1873? Will the wickedness of that day be re-enacted on a much more gigantic scale?

Mr. BANNERMAN. They were all Grits.

Mr. RYMAL. I do not suppose that the hon. gentleman knows much about the corruption of that day; it was before his time. But I venture to predict that if he lives until 1883, and proposes to run an election in Renfrew, the Syndicate will authorize their legal adviser to accept his draft for $10,000 if necessary.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I hope the hon. gentleman is not referring to me, when he speaks of Renfrew.

Mr. RYMAL. No. There is another Renfrew.

Mr. WHITE. Well, it is between Renfrew and Manitoba.

Mr ORTON. If the hon, gentleman wishes to revive any of the recollections of the election of 1872, I shall, perhaps, be able to give him some details of the operations of the Reform party in Centre Wellington.

Mr. RYMAL. When I want any information from the pocket edition of Judas Iscariot I will ask for it. A good deal has been said about the feeling of the country in reference to this matter. Now, I do not think the country is altogether in a furore, it has not lost its senses over this matter, but I do believe there is a general feeling that, other things being equal, $12,500,000 should be saved. I believe the men who vote to give this $12,500,000, unnecessarily for the construction of this road, will be called into account by a justly exasperated people. I know not what the result of an appeal to the people might be just now, but I have a strong impression of my own upon the subject, and, greatly as I dislike elections -for they have been a great source of annoyance and hard work to me for these last twenty-five years-I would hail with joy the announcement that within one month we should consult the people upon this all important question. I believe the people have a right to be consulted when such an immense amount of their money is to be disposed of. If that is a correct principle in matters of county jurisdiction, it is much more so in a case of this kind. It is true some gentlemen argue that this matter has been before the country for ten or twelve years. So it has, in one form or another, but the wildest flight of the imagination of any one man has never imagined such a bargain as this which we are asked to ratify. Under these circumstances, I would hail with joy an appeal to the people. I have no doubt some of us would come back wounded; some of us would not come back at all; but I am willing to run the risk in obedience to what I believe to be the dictates of justice. I heard some gentlemen on the opposite side say they would be glad to go to the country on this question; some of them who have very safe constituencies have thrown out challenges to others who have very unsafe ones. But I say, let us all go to the country to see whether this bargain shall be ratified. I believe it was the duty of the Government, having been made aware that a better offer would be made them, to have thrown the whole matter over to public competition. I do not say they should accept the second offer, for I believe that a better offer than either could be got if the proper steps were taken by the Government. It is said that the capitalists of the world knew all your ken, I venture to say, knew nothing about it. To when we ask if any other offers were made we cannot be told—deaf and dumb again. So that we are entirely in the dark, and being entirely in the dark and refused anything like light, the people are suspicious. What makes them more so is, that they have only to cast their mind's eye back and see the foot prints of the same men in a transaction something like the present. As we are living men, I believe the day will come when, if this contract be ratified and carried out, the most convincing evidence possible will be afforded to the people of Canada that a base fraud has been perpetrated upon them. Now it is no use to appeal to my fellow members to stay their hands. The thing is an accomplished fact, or as near it as can be. The flat has gone forth, the party whip has been cracked, the note of defence and defiance has been given by the leader of the Government, and the party journals and the party backs have taken their cue from him in this case as in others, reminding one of the lines:

Upon their backs to bite 'em;
And little fleas have lesser fleas,
And so on, ad infinitum."

And so it is. Before the First Minister sounded that note of defence and defiance, there was a little moderation among hon gentlemen. Some of them I flattered myself were weak in the knees, rheumatic, afflicted with the gout, or something of that sort. But as soon as this invigorating command went forth, like old Daniel Young's soldiers, they stood so straight that they leaned a little backwards. No trembling of the knees, no quaking nerves. Yes; every one of them is willing to fall into the line of the party. Do you suppose that two or three million dollars distributed by this Syndicate in order to consummate this swindle—

Some hon, MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. RYMAL. Oh, do not be quite so thin-skinned. Do not wince. If your skins are thin, I shall touch you all the more easily. Do not let the people know that you are raw. Will the people believe, I say, that the men who have pushed this through, in despite of a much more favorable offer, that they are sharers in the ill-gotten gains—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. RYMAL. You do not know what I am going to say. I say the ill-gotten gains which the Syndicate, through the weakness of the Government, are enabled to distribute—for what?—to corrupt the electorate. These are plain matters of fact, and although I am not in a position to prove them, I believe them just as much as I believe the Evangelists. Mr. Speaker, I shall oppose the adoption of the bargain on the Table of the House. I shall vote for the amendment moved by my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition; and while I have his name on my lips, let me refer for a moment to the frequent regrets expressed by some of the most valiant hearts that beat in the bosoms of hon. gentlemen opposite. How sorry they are that our late leader has been dethroned! What a good man he was! Oh, what a pity that so good a man as Mr. Mackenzie had been supplanted by that vile man, Blake! Why, you will repent of that, they say, to the longest day of your lives. He was such a good man! Mr. Speaker, hypocrisy could go no further. They have denounced him in season and out of season, and in his declining health—

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. RYMAL. Yes, yes; in his declining health, and when he islaid on his bed of sickness.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. RYMAL. It is not beneath some of the biggest and the bravest of you to refer to him in terms of reproach. But gentlemen opposite may possess their souls in patience. We have the internal organization of the Liberal party in our accepted to a certain extent—it proves that the Con-Mr. RYMAL.

hands, and when we want assistance we will not go to the Tory party to ask it. Run your own political machine and run it carefully, or you will run it among the breakers or on the rocks, where you have landed sometimes before, and where it is my humble hope and prayer a kind Providence, on behalf of the Canadian people, will plunge you at no distant day for the action you are taking to night.

Mr. TASSE. Mr. Speaker, although this subject has been discussed ad nauseam, as stated by the First Minister, I feel I would not be justified to give a silent vote on this great and momentous question, the greatest question that has come before the Parliament and the people of this country since Confederation. I may state at the outset that I have always been a strong believer in the building of a Pacific Railway throughout the Canadian portion of the continent. I may, perhaps, take the liberty to recall that when that question first agitated the public mind in 1872, I published a pamphlet -which has been of late freely commented upon by the French Liberal press-in which most of the views I upheld seem to be fully justified. I assumed, for instance, that the road was most important both from a Canadian and an Imperial point of view, that it was the shortest route for the western and Pacific trade both for Canada and Europe, that the cost of the railway would not exceed $100,000,000, that the lands would suffice in the end to pay the cost of the railway, that the pass called Cache de la Tête Jaune was likely to be the passage selected through the Rocky Mountains, and that Burrard Inlet was also likely to be adopted as the Pacific terminus if such a terminus was fixed on the mainland. Being a strong believer in that enterprise, I have viewed with deep gratification the great success—the unexpected success, I may say, to a certain extent—which has been achieved by the Government in the handling of the scheme now submitted to our consideration. Such a success merits, I believe, for the Government, the warmest thanks and congratulations of this House, and of the country at large. Every one who has studied this question, knows that since its inception it has been a source of perplexity, of weakness, of embarrassment to the various Governments which have presided over our destinies. Every one knows that it has been the common aim of those Governments to find out a practical scheme by which this enterprise could be lifted from their shoulders upon those of a private and responsible company. But every one knows also that they have failed one after the other to attain such an important result. It has devolved, it seems, on the present Government-who had been the initiators of that enterprise—to have the still greater honor to push it to a successful completion. Their task has been a hard and difficult one, and they must feel immensely gratified to know that their present scheme is but an enlarged application of the very wise and patriotic scheme which they propounded in 1872, when that great lamented statesman, Sir George Cartier, boldly submitted a Bill to secure the achievement of one of the greatest enterprises of the century—an enterprise of a magnitude which has never been undertaken by a people of our number—an enterprise greater than the ship can'll of Suez, or the projected can'l of Panama, greater than the tunnel of Mount Cenis, greater than any of the Pacific Railways built by the American Republic. I do not claim that the contract made by the Government with a powerful body of capitalists—from Paris, London, Berlin, New York, Montreal, and St. Paul-is unobjectionable, is perfect in every respect. No one expects perfection, even from a Government which is so vast an improvement on its predecessor. If some of the clauses of the contract have been criticized by Conservative papers and by Conservative members, if sugpressed on its consideration—suggestions which have been servatives are not the blind partizans, the pliant tools we are sometimes represented to be. But I say that this contract, considered as a whole, is entitled to the full endorsa-tion of the friends of the enterprise. This contract is deserving the approval of not only the regular supporters of the Government-who form the three-fourths of this assembly and represent a vast majority of the people-but also of those who do not worship at the same political altar. I know that the hon. member for Lambton-whose ill-health I may say, in passing, is a subject of general regret -once defined the rôle of the Opposition as if it were obliged to find fault on all occasions with every measure originating from the Treasury benches. But it seems to me that even a Liberal Opposition should not be compelled to go back on its record, to trample down its principles, and to give the spectacle of a most flagrant inconsistency, in order to remain true to such a definition of its supposed mission. It seems to me there are occasions, there are emergencies—as grave and important as the present occasion for instance-when parties must rise above the mere exigencies of their personal advancement and think a little of their country—which should be paramount to the interests of any party, even the so-called Reform party. I am aware that the other day an hon. leader of the left, the hon, member for Quebec East, endeavored to draw a distinction between the policy of the Conservative and of the Liberal party on this question, stating:

"That our policy was that the railroad should be built immediately and without interruption till finally completed, whereas the policy of the Liberals was that it should be built gradually as the wants of the country should require and its resources permit."

Let me answer that there has been no such material difference between the policy of both parties. If such a difference exists now it is because the Liberal party have changed their policy-since probably they have changed their leader. Is it not a matter of history that the late Administration fully recognized that we had entered into a solemn compact with British Columbia—a compact which could not be broken without bringing dishonor on ourselves—and that we were bound to build the entire line of a Pacific Railway on Canadian soil with the utmost speed? Is it not true that the late Administration accepted the Carnarvon terms -which required an annual expenditure of $2,000,000 in British Columbia, and the construction of the whole line within 15 years—two years before the date mentioned in the present contract? Is it not true that taxes were increased by them to the extent of $3,000,000 for that very purpose? Is it not true they have been the first to violate the principle of the Bill adopted in 1872? The Bill of 1872 provided that no additional taxes should be imposed for the purpose of building the Pacific Railway. The other day, in Montreal, the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Blake) in his great speech denied that the increase was made to ensure the building of the Pacific Railway. He said:

"There is a simple explanation of that point. The rate of taxation which was not to be increased was the rate of 1871. Between then and 1874 there was a considerable reduction in the rate of taxation. An increase of the rate of taxation was made in 1875, but the increase proposed was only one thirty-sixth above the rate of 1871. The result was that there was a sensible, but not a large increase in the rate, but that sensible increase was not for the purposes of the Pacific Railway, but to meet the obligations of the Dominion."

Whatever may be the supposed authority of such a statement, I can, however, prove by the Minutes in Council, of July 23rd, 1874, that those additional taxes were levied for Pacific Railway purposes. Those Minutes say:

"So anxious, however, were the present Government to remove any possible cause of complaint, that they did take means to increase the taxation very materially, in order to place themselves in a position to make arrangements for the prosecution of the initial and difficult portions of the line as soon as it was possible to do so; and, at the same time, a special confidential agent was deputed to British Columbia for the express purpose of conferring with the Government of that Province, and to endeavor to arrive at some understanding as to a course to be pursued which could be satisfactory to British Columbia and meet the circumstances of the Dominion."

Is it not true that the late Administration asked tenders in 1876, offering $10,000 a mile and 20,000 acres of land per mile, on 2,700 miles, besides a guarantee of 4 per cent. per mile for twenty-five years over the whole line? It is also true that no tender was offered—no tender being even offered by the unlucky politicians who mostly compose the new Syndicate—because it was felt, probably, in commercial and financial circles, that the then Ministers were unable to grapple with such a gigantic undertaking. Does the hon. member for Quebec East forget that the Administration of which he was a member, asked tenders to build the Yale-Kamloops section in British Columbia in the very year which witnessed its fall, although now he clamors for the postponement of that same section? Does he forget that the Globe stated, sometime after the elections:

"If Mr. Mackenzie had not been deprived of power, that route at this moment would have been under construction, and being rapidly pushed to completion."

And yet my hon. friend endeavors to convince us that such was not the policy of his party. The hon, member for Quebec East has the right to change his views on this question, as he has changed them on another great question - the question of the National Policy; it is true he is not more inconsistent than his own leader and than many of his colleagues, but he has not the right to misrepresent history, to misconstrue the public records. To present the facts in such a light is to sail under false colors. I repeat there has been no material difference between the policy of the two late Administrations as far as the obligation of building the Pacific Railway in its entirety on Canadian soil is concerned, and were they consistent, were they patriotic, the Liberal party should be found supporting this measure, this contract—whose terms are more advantageous than those which they offered, instead of assailing it with every weapon legitimate or illegitimate at their command. It has been asserted, on the other side of the House, that the subsidy granted to the Syndicate is too large both in land and money. The money subsidy will not exceed $53,000,000, while the land subsidy is but 25,000,000 acres of land. This would make $78,00,000 if we adopt the estimate of the land by the Government at $1 an acre, an estimate which was approved of last year by the Opposition. This subsidy is not too large when we know the approximate cost of the road. This subsidy should not be considered too large by the Opposition, when we know that the cost of the road has been estimated by several of its most prominent members of the left at more than $150,000,000. One of them has even put the figure at $250,000,000. If I am not mistaken the hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House has made that estimation. I notice that the hon member for Rimouski denied the other day that his leaders ever estimated the cost at more than $120,000,000. Well, even at that figure the subsidy would be a moderate one. I am aware that last year the hon. member for West Durham estimated the cost at $120,000,000, but such was not the estimate of other leaders of the party. The hon. member for Centre Huron estimated the same at $150,000,000—at the time he was accumulating deficits—and the hon. member for Quebec East has not been more moderate in his calculation. That hon, gentleman will not deny that he estimated the cost at that figure. In 1875, at a public meeting held at St. Croix, county of Lotbinière, he made that assertion, and not later than last fall, being desirous to frighten his electors at the prospect of heavy taxation, he again reiterated the opinion that the Pacific Railway would cost $150,000,000:

"It is proposed to build a railway which, when terminated, will cost at least $150,000,000, as shown by Mr. Blake at last Session in an admirable speech which has not been yet answered. We are a people of four millions, and the Government wish to impose on us a debt of $150,000,000. You can imagine the result: enormous burdens on the people and, finally, direct taxation The Conservative papers announce with exultation that Sir John has succeeded in his mission, that a company composed of great capitalists is formed. May the news be true! I sincerely trust it is true! Nevertheless, we must not overrate the advantages of those arrangements. According to information given, the Government must finish all the works contracted for, $27,00,000 or thereabouts; they give to the company $20,000,000 and 50,000,000 acres of land. This road will cost us $47,000,000. This is a lesser sum at any rate than $150,000,000."

If the hon, member for Rimouski will not accept the opinion of the member for Quebec East, as that of his leader, then I will submit the estimate made last Session by his rival for the Quebec leadership, the hon. member for L'Islet, who expressed himself in the following strain:-

"When I hear the railway can be built for $60,000,000, and remember that eminent Quebec authorities estimate the cost at $150,000,000, are we to rely upon the data of the Government, which the hon. member for West Durham has shown to be totally incorrect?"

And now those same gentlemen belittle as much as possible the cost of the railway, in order to show that the subsidy is too large. In former days they used to magnify the cost, but such a tactic would not serve their present purposes. In former days they used also to disparage the lands of the North-West; not later than last Session the whole library wrs ransacked by the leaders of the Opposition to find musty papers, in order to under-value the soil, to prove that the plan of the Government to build the road through a land subsidy of 100,000,000 acres was a fallacy; and now they insist on the highest estimation of the value of these lands. In former days they used 10 eulogize the lands of Texas and Kansas, to the prejudice of our lands; in former days they used to forget it is an ill bird that fouls its own nest, but now the exigencies of the situation have made them a little more Canadian, more patriotic. Such is the consistency, such is the sincerity, such is the regard for truth of the opponents of this great enterprise. If some componentory privileges are granted to the Syndicate, we must not forget that their responsibility is enormous. Not only do they build more than 2,000 miles of railway, but they will have to operate forever the entire road—that is to-day 2,700 miles—and such a responsibility is not a light one. The greatest apprehension of the public in this connection was not that the cost of building was beyond our paying power, but that its operating, its running expenses might cause to the country an enormous outlay every year. The public know that the Grand Trunk has given some revenue to its shareholders since a short time, although running through a rich country, and they know also that there has been for several years a deficit of more than half a million of dollars in the working of the Intercolonial Railway—a deficit which, I am glad to say, has been most speedily reduced under the energetic control of the present Minister of Railways. The public have been educated also by the Reform leaders to believe that the operating of the road would constitute a heavy burden on our finances. The hon, member for West Middlesex stated, in 1875, that the railway would be an unproductive one. A higher authority on that side of the House, the hon. member for Gloucester, estimated the annual loss caused thereby at $2,500,000; and a still higher authority, the hon, member for West Durham, loudly proclaimed that the running expenses would reach annually $6,750,000, and that for a long time the road, as a whole, would be run at a loss. By this contract, Sir, we have the great satisfaction of ascertaining the extent of our liabilities, and of knowing that if any deficit occurs hereby in the operating of the Pacific Railway it will not fall on the Government but on the Syndicate themselves. While it is trumpeted on the one hand that this contract will ruin Canada, on the other hand it is contended that the Mr. Tassé.

Suppose the lands are really worth $4 or $5 an acre-I hope they are worth that and more—suppose the land subsidy will give on that basis $275,000,000 to the Syndicate, suppose it will give them immense fortunes, by the same process the 25,000,000 acres of land owned by Canada alongside with those of the Syndicate, will realize the same enormous amount, $275,000,000. And as there remains an immense extent of arable land according to the latest explorations, Canada is doing a most profitable speculation in building through that territory a railway which alone can give some value to its productive power. If these lands are worth $3 or $4 an acre, I say so much the better for the Syndicate, so much the better for Canada. I hope, Sir, the Syndicate will not ruin themselves in this undertaking. I hope they will reap a rich harvest out of the grand work which they have assumed. They have been the first capitalists bold enough to risk their fortunes in this vast enterprise, and they deserve the highest credit as well as the greatest success. If these lands are worth $3 or $4 an acre, and even $2, the whole assertions, the gloomy predictions of the Opposition will be found groundless. If these lands are worth $2, $3, or $4, then the contention of the Government that this road will virtually cost nothing to Canada, will be literally true. In that case, the lands afone will pay the cost of the road; in that case every cent advanced by Canada for the construction of this our great national highway will then be amply recouped. Great stress has been laid on the fact that this enterprise would make of the members of the Syndicate the plutocrats, the magnates, the landlords of the North-West. I confess I entertain no such apprehension. Such a result would be contrary to all experience either in Canada or the United The great difference between the landlords and these capitalists is, that the first are interested in keeping the lands in their own hands, while the others are interested to sell the lands. The locking up system would ruin the Syndicate. To operate the road successfully they must create and develop traffic. To create traffic they must have settlers. They must encourage settlement. must become, to a large extent, the immigration agents of Canada. They must follow the example of the American railway corporations, which have proved the most active immigration agents of that great country. So manifest is this fact that the present arrangement will be found ruinous, disastrous to the Syndicate, if that corporation-assisted by the Government of Canada and assisted also, as it has been announced, by the Imperial authorities-fails to attract a large surplus of the overcrowded countries of Europe towards the fertile prairies of the North-West. In Montreal, the other day, the hon. member for Quebec East stated:

"That if the 25,000,000 acres were put in line one after the other, the number of miles they would extend in length would be so great that had Christopher Columbus commenced at one end at the same time he begun his journey to discover the land, and travelled every day up to the present, he would not yet have arrived at the other extremity of this stretch of acres.

Well, Sir, with such a line of argument I quite conceive why the hon, member and his friends shirked discussion on that occasion. The hon, leader of the Left followed his example, and calculated the number of counties that would embrace such a territory. Were they in earnest; were they desirous of enlightening instead of deceiving these gentlemen, they should have told the people of Montreal that their Government offered the double of that subsidy—54,000,000 acres they should have told them also that they did not vote last year against a proposed subsidy of 100,000,000 acres, and consequently, to continue the comparison of the member for Quebec East, that Christopher Columbus or the Wandering Jew would have to travel yet several conturies were they to land subsidy is too large, that the lands will bring $4 or $5 reach the extent of the territory granted by them. Were an acre. These two propositions destroy one another. they in earnest they should have told the people that these

25,000,000 acres form but a very small part of our vast domains of the North-West. This land subsidy policy, which has been so much deprecated by the Opposition, has been adopted in the United States on a much larger basis since the building of the Illinois Central Railway. This is another leaf which we take out of the book of our American brethren. We have already adopted their fiscal policy, and we now follow their railway policy. We follow them because both have been eminently successful. Experience, Sir, is a greater and a safer teacher than all the sophistry which fills the speeches delivered from the opposite benches. The land subsidy policy has been found so advantageous on the other side of the line, that more than 200,000,000 acres have been granted to railways, out of which the Pacific corporations have received nearly 160,000,000, the Northern Pacific alone receiving 50,000,000 acres. The number of miles of railway constructed under the stimulus of these gentlemen, are as follows:—

While on this subject I will give an extract from a pamphlet published last year entitled "Railway Land Grauts of the United States," which proves that these subsidies have been the greatest factor in the wonderful development of the American west. That work says:

"Self-interest demands the adoption of whatever land policy is best calculated to augment the business along the line. This is not said in the way of recommendation. Every one familiar with this branch of business concedes as much. It is one of the axioms of railway science (for a science it has become). The moment one person is added to the population along the line of a railway, its traffic receives a fresh stimulus. That person may produce nothing and consume little, still there is some gain in the volume of transportation. The average pioneer brings with aim a family; he requires transportation for a great many things, and depends for the money he makes, upon the sale of products which must be conveyed by rail to market. However much profit the company may realize from the sale of the land to him, its profit from his business will greatly exceed it.

"Instead of being a hinderance or an injustice to any one, the land subsidies that have been granted as an inducement for railway building in the wastelled or thinly settled regions of the far West, have had the effect of settling up and developing the dreary plains of the wild wilderness, which would have remained unsettled and unimproved for a century in the future but for this method of occupancy and development. It has proved the most effective agency of Western progress that could possibly have been devised. But for such grants of land, offered as an inducement for the construction of railways in the West, the fertile and now rapidly developing region between the Mississippi and the Rocky Mountains would not to-day teem with a busy population of millions, nor would the two oceans now be connected by a great artery of rapid transportation. That has been accomplished in a few years which otherwise would probably have required centuries. The Government has lost nothing,—on the contrary, the wealth and greatness of the country have been benefited incalculably."

One of the clauses of the contract most bitterly assailed by the Opposition has been that relating to the building of the Lake Superior section. I have been amazed for instance, to see the leader of the Left using his great oratorical power to depreciate that section of the route. We all remember that last year he loudly denounced any expenditure in British Columbia—that Province which he depicted in the darkest colors, although it has been called a "terrestrial paradise" by the late Mr. Brown in his great speech on Confederation—that Province which he styled as being inhospitable, although so far it has proved inhospitable but to the Grit element. We all remember that on that occasion he made a strong appeal to the members of the Province of Quebeo—a Province which has at all times occupied a large place in the affections of the Reform party—to vote against such an expenditure, because they would have to wait till 1890 to see the beginning of the building of the eastern section. I will read a short extract of his speech bearing on that point:

"We must not altogether forget the eastern connection. The hongentleman has not been altogether oblivious of that part of the through line. It was politic on his part to throw out some faint hopes of the construction of that link. Quebec has spent $11,000,000, which she can ill afford, for the construction of a railway principally designed to tap the Pacific trade. Quebec has stretched her arms out towards the Great West, as far as this city, and the question is, how soon is she to get further, how soon that great expenditure is to be productive of the benefits expected! I am glad to know her road is paying something as it is; but what Quebec expected was not simply that it should pay, while it is new and cheaply worked, some fraction of the interest on the cost of construction, but that it would pour a great tide of traffic into her principal cities, and bring prosperity into her midst. But unless and until an eastern connection of some kind is made, those expectations of the Province of Quebec, on the faith of which she proceeded to construct her railway, cannot be realized.

" " I should not be surprised if some hon, member from Quebec had indicated to the Minister of Railways, in language as strong as was consistent with the politeness due to a powerful Minister that it was essential that he should throw out, at any rate, some ray of hope, however faint, that at some early period the Quebec railway should be connected with the through line; that he should say to the members from Quebec: "Gentlemen, at the present time we can only burn the candle in the middle, and at the western end, but the time will come sooner than you expect when we will burn it in the middle and at both ends, when it will be alight in the east also." " " Quebec may expect the eastern end to be commenced when the western road is finished—that is, that it will be begun in 1890, and may be finished in 1897, and I hope they will all be alive to enjoy it."

This speech, Sir, is the strongest condemnation that could be adduced of the present course of the leader of the Left. This speech fully shows there was no sincerity in the sentiments which he then expressed towards eastern Canada, and that he was then merely fishing for . votes. I suppose the fishing has not given very gratifying results. In that speech the hon, gentleman denounced the Government for not marrying the blushing East to the rosy West-to use his flowery language—and now he blames the Government for accomplishing such a union, without interesting Brother Jonathan in this important ceremony. Now he thunders against the Government, because they have seized this great opportunity to give us the eastern connection. The hon. gentleman referred to that important link of the Pacific as if the Province of Quebec alone were interested in its construction; but to take such a view is to give but a diminutive idea of its value. The Province of Quebec is undoubtedly interested to a large extent in the building of the eastern section which shall connect its system of railways with the through line; it has made immense sacrifices to secure its share of the western, of the Pacific trade, and I sincerely trust that these sacrifices will not be found fruitless. But, Sir, Ontario and all the Maritime Provinces are equally concerned in the eastern section. In fact, the whole Dominion is interested in the construction of a through line. As a representative of Eastern Ontario I cannot forget that the Canada Central which will connect Callander station to this city, runs through several counties in Ontario, and will develop an immense territory rich in land, rich in forests, rich in minerals, which shall materially increase the agricultural and commercial importance as well as the revenue of the leading Province of the Dominion. The hon. gentleman who now assumes the role of champion of the Sault Ste. Marie route to the exclusion of the Lake Superior section last Session, a single word of praise not, to utter in favor of that scheme. Why? Because the Government said they would, perhaps, favor that project pending the building of the eastern section. The Government could not foresee then that they would be enabled by the present arrangement to commence immediately that important section of the Pacific. I am the more amazed to see the Reform party advocating the Sault Ste. Marie route, when we know that they have condemned that same project in the past. When Sir Hugh Allan expressed his intention, in 1872, of making a connection with the Northern Pacific through the Sault Ste. Marie route, the Globe ridiculed its scheme which it qualified:

"The great Canadian, Montreal-Carleton-Place-Peterboro-Toronto-Sault. Ste. Marie-America Pacific Railway. If this scheme is carried out, our national enterprise, instead of heing the successful rival of the American Company, competing for the Asiatic trade. Which is now in its infact, and bailding up the Dominion as no undertaking will do, will simply be the Canadian branch of the Northern Pacific Railroad, under its control, and dictated to by it relentlessly."

This was the opinion of the Globe on 28th February, 1872. The Sault Ste. Marie scheme was never advocated before this year by the leaders of the Referm party. "We never propounded that scheme" said, last Session, the hon. member for Lambton; "we never spent a dollar on it. We never advocated it or proposed it to Parliament." Evidently all the advantages of the Sault Ste. Marie route have been discovered by friends opposite since they have learned that the Government is going to build the very section of Lake Superior which they praised even some months ago. Had the Government refused to build the eastern section, I have no doubt the member for West Durham would have given us this Session an enlarged edition of his speech of last year, would have accused the Government of being traitors to Canadian interests, and of playing into the hands of the Americans. By the way, our Reform friends seem strongly inclined to do things by halves. When they took charge of the Pacific Railway they wanted a half water, half land route, and now they want a route half Canadian, half American. They seem to be strong believers in the hybridous or amphibious system. The present leader of the Left seems also to be a strong advocate of the postponement policy. Last year he submitted a motion to postpone the building of the western section of the Pacific, and this Session he proposes to postpone the building of the eastern section—nay, of both sections. Well, Sir, we do not believe in a half-hearted policy on this side of the House. If this railway will give us the great advantages which we expect from it; if this railway will bring us the capital and the population which we expect from it; if this railway is the great factor in our prosperity which it is supposed to be; we say the sooner the railway is built the better for Canada. The only part of the postponement policy of our friends opposite which we may feel inclined to adopt is that which concerns the indefinite postponement of their advent to power-a calamity which I trust is not an imminent one, after the five years of sad experience which we had of what they could do, and especially of what they cannot do. To those who believe, Sir, that this enterprise is beyond the resources of the country, I will tell them that within a few years Canada has built really three Pacific Railways—having constructed 8,000 miles of railway at an aggregate cost of $273,826,000, the Federal and Local Governments having contributed about $80,000,000, and the rest being paid by private capitalists. And has the country suffered from such an immense investment of capital in railways? On the contrary, has it not been benefitted to a high degree? The Government of Canada has given, Sir, not less than $24,000,000 to the Grand Trunk; and who regrets it? The Intercolonial has cost nearly $36,000,000 Mr. TASSE. It would be interesting to know why? to Canada; and who would say that this capital has not been invested in the best interests of the country? Mr. ANGLIN. Because the judgment of the Court friends opposite, and especially the hon. member for that election case is, I think, most improperly withheld. Mr. Tassi.

Wentworth, who has preceded me, are clamoring for an appeal to the people. In Montreal, the other day, the hon. member for West Durham stated to a number of his admirers that the Liberal party looked like an "undisciplined crowd -Such an authorized opinion of the Liberal party should be correct. But our friends opposite may rest satisfied that the great Conservative phalanx, strong with the confidence of the people, strong with the assurance that it had fulfilled its pledges, its promises to the people, solidly united as it is under the leadership of the greatest statesman of Canada—has no more reason to fear to face that " undisciplined crowd" than it had in the glorious days of September, 1878. If we resist the demand of an appeal to the people, it is not because we apprehend the result, but because such a step could not be justified on constitutional grounds. It is because we fail to see in this paper, in this contract, any new issue of paramount importance—any great issue which has not yet been before the people. Some of the terms of the contract are new to the people; but they are not sufficiently important to justify us to abdicate our legislative functions at the present juncture. Both parties, Sir, are committed to the construction of a Pacific Railway; both parties are committed to its construction by a private company; both parties are committed to its construction, through a money and land subsidy. These are facts which cannot be questioned, and which have been fully proved. The main principle involved in this scheme is not a new one, because most of our railways have been built on the same basis. This principle is a familiar one, for instance, to the city which I have the honor to represent. The other day, the city of Ottawa voted a bonus of $200,000 in favor of the Toronto and Ottawa projected railway, after having voted $100,000 towards the Coteau Railway, and a large amount in former years towards our pioneer railroad, the Prescott and St. Lawrence. other day, also, it offered the right of way, free of taxation, to the North Shore, if it would establish its station in the centre of the capital. In short, at every general election, since 1872, the principle of building the Pacific on the main basis adopted in this scheme, has been fully discussed and fully endorsed by the electorate—and, I may assert, by both parties. Sir, our friends opposite are longing for the sweets of office and hope to restore their wretched tortunes through the operation of a new ballot. They should view with alarm, however, the prospect of a general election. They have had any number of partial struggles, since their overwhelming defeat of 1878, and have the people shown that they were anxious to be led again by them? No. They have come out of them only second best. They have been routed in their own strongholds. Much was made at the opening of the Session of the fact that the majority of the member for Toronto West had been less than that of his predecessor. It was a great moral victory, if we were to believe them. I hope they will gain many like moral victories. Our friends opposite are easily satisfied, because they seem to have forgotten that they had lost the county of Brome some months before, and that they had been beaten a few days previous to the meeting of Parliament in the county of Joliette by a majority of 460 votes, a majority much larger than that of 1878. I had the honor to take part in the campaign of Joliette; the Pacific scheme was an important feature of the discussion, and it rallied more supporters than it ever had in the county. Have our friends opposite forgotten also that we captured Selkirk during the recess, and that they have lost Argenteuil and Charlevoix since the general elections.

Mr. ANGLIN. You should be ashamed to name Argen-

Mr. TASSE. It would be interesting to know why? Mr. ANGLIN. Because the judgment of the Court in

Mr. TASSÉ. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the Government has something to do with the postponement of the judgment in that case? It would be most important to know that. That is an attack, not only on the Government, but against the honor and dignity of the Court. It is a most serious charge, and I would be prepared to censure the Government if it could be substantiated. The hon, gentleman should give us more information on that matter. I am quite prepared to give him full opportunity to make that explanation. But as he remains illert, it is quite evident the hon gentleman has no warrent. silent, it is quite evident the hon. gentleman has no very satisfactory explanation to give; that the attack which he has made on the Bench of Lower Canada is most unwise and most unwarranted. To come back to my argument, Sir, why should we be afraid to face our opponents before our common judge—the people of this country—when their most eloquent chieftain, when the Goliah of the party, declines on the hustings to take up the gauntlet thrown to him by a foeman worthy of his steel-the able and powerful advocate of this measure -he or his friends alleging that he could not ventilate his views in less than three or four hours-which is somewhat of an improvement on a six hours' oration. This Parliament, Sir, has been elected for a specific purpose. is a part of its mission, no doubt, to ensure the success of the Pacific Railway and other great undertakings or improvements, and it will be found equal to that task, I am confident; but this Parliament has been explicitly elected for the purpose of moulding and establishing on a firm basis the National Policy, and it cannot and should not be deterred from its true course, from its true mission. The people thought, and thought wisely, that the National Policy would produce all the revenue necessary, not only to fill up the enormous deficits accumulated to the amount of $8,000,000 by the Liberal party, that the National Policy would not only foster the home industries, almost destroyed by the maladministration of the Liberal party, but that it would enable us to meet all our public obligations, including that of the Pacific Railway. And, Sir, if we are to judge by the abundant revenue of this year, exceeding, as it does, the most sanguine expectations of the Finance Minister and his friends—the excess of revenue for the last six months being as much as $3,528,145 compared to the same period of 1879—that glorious policy will permit us to complete our trans-continental highway without increasing materially the burdens of the people. In concluding, I may say if there is one great reason for which I favor this scheme, it is because it ensures the completion of a vast undertaking which is indispensable to the welfare, to the prosperity, to the stability, to the aggrandizement of our Confederation. I believe, Sir, in the future of Canada. I believe there is a glorious future in store for our country. But such a glorious future cannot be attained without the building of a trans-continental route. I look upon this great artery of railway as the mainstay of our national structure. This road will cement, will consolidate, will consummate the grand idea of the Union of the British Provinces. Without this road, a community of feeling, of interest, of ideas, of trade, would be impossible between the various portions of the "British sentiment does not depend on the building of a railway," said, the other day, the hon. member for Quebec East, and this sentiment has been echoed by several of his friends. But I say it does to a great extent. Deep as may be our attachment to British institutions, to British principles, great as may be our devotion to the glorious flag which floats over us, protecting, as it does, our rights, our privileges and our liberties, such a feeling of devotion to the Mother Country might lessen gradually, till, perhaps, it fades away, were this country not to follow the march of progress on this most progressive continent. No political system can satisfy the legitimate aspirations of a free and vigorous people like those of Canada, if it fails to make them happy and prosperous. "British sentiment does not depend on the building of a railway," said the hon. member for Quebec East. Well, Sir, do we not know that one of the main arguments advanced by the Montreal merchants who declared themselves in favor of annexation in 1847, was that there was almost no railway in Canada to stimulate progress, while there existed almost a perfect network of them on the other side of the line. I am sure my hon. friend is conversant with the papers connected with that movement, because one of them was signed by his former leader, now Sir A. A. Dorion, then secretary to the Annexation Association. Let me quote on this point a very conclusive extract of a despatch sent by Earl Elgin —whose memory will live as long as liberty in our country-informing the Colonial authorities of the causes of the annexationist feeling then springing up in Canada:

then springing up in Canada:

"In 1847 the only railway in the Province was a line 22 miles in length, running from a point on the St. Lawrence, opposite Montreal, to the frontier town of St. John; and so hopeless did the prospects of the Province in this respect appear to be, at even a later period, that the following paragraph occurs in a very carefully prepared document signed by several intelligent merchants, and put forth at the close of 1849, with the view of promoting the annexation of Canada to the United States:
While the adjoining States are covered with a network of thriving railways, Canada possesses but three lines, which together scarcely exceed 50 miles in length, and the stock in two of which is held at a depreciation of from 60 to 80 per cent.—a fatal symptom of the torpor overspreading the land."
This fact should be sufficient to prove how groundless is the

This fact should be sufficient to prove how groundless is the contention of my hon. friend. To make my argument still stronger, I will, however, give another instance to the same effect, that railroads may have an immense influence on the When the great question of a destinies of a country. Pacific Railway-or rather two Pacific Railways-was decided upon by the American Congress, after a very long debate, it was on the eve of the fearful war that desolated that country and brought it almost to ruin, and the main argument advanced in favor of the enterprise by that far-seeing statesman, W. H. Seward, was that without such a road—as we say on the present occasion—it would be impossible to hold the Union together:

"I want it to be known; I want it to be seen and read of all men here "I want it to be known; I want it to be seen and read of all men here and elsewhere, that at the very day and hour when it was apprehended by patriotic and wise men throughout the land, that this Union was falling into ruin, the Congress of the United States placed upon the Statute-book for eternal record, an Act appropriating $96,000,000, the largest appropriation ever made, to bind the north east and north-west, and the south-east and the south-west, and north and south, and east and west, by a physical, material bond of indissoluble union Sir, it is railroads and earlier and competitors and facilities for communications commerce and canals, and connections and facilities for communication, commerce and affection, that bind together and assimilate discontented and ill-assorted communities. This is a great measure of conciliation, of pacification, of compromise and of union * The annual interest can never exceed $4,800,000. That $4,800,000, although it seems startling as a large sum, will yet sink in apparent magnitude and become diminutive in our estimation when we look forward to the period when the road will be completed. But it is not to be required of any road, canal or channel of trade or commerce, that it repay the Government for the cost of its construction directly, if it shall produce indirectly adequate rewards distributed throughout the whole nation. Practically, this road will cost nothing * This proposition, in every way, commends itself to a people like those of the United States. It is no hesitating work; it is a boldwork. It is no sectional, it is a national work. It is no narrow work; it is a work for the use of the whole world. When it is completed, you will have effected that without which you cannot hold the Union together. You are building up to-day on the coast of the Pacific ocean, powers which must communicate with foreign nations, and through foreign commerce, and have foreign connections, or else they must connect with the east and be American. You are building up on the coast of the Pacific Ocean Asiatic powers, instead of American powers, and you are turning your people, with their commerce, their enterprise, their spirit and their ambition, all over to follow in the crusade of England in China and India, when, if you will only construct this road, complete this great work, you make the Pacific coast American, and you combine the energies of the East and of the West, extending the civilization of the world westward in its proper way, with American institutions, American principles, American habits, American sentiments and American interests, across the great continent of America, until you reach, on the other side, the shores of the Atlantic ocean."

Almost every word of this interesting and eloquent speech is applicable to Canada. communities. This is a great measure of conciliation, of pacification, of compromise and of union The annual interest can never exceed Almost every word of this interesting and eloquent speech is applicable to Canada. Almost every word is applicable to the building of our Pacific Railway. These observations are the more appropriate to our situation when we know that this statesman was one of the first among his countrymen to believe in the great future reserved to Canada,

At a time, Sir, when this Pacific enterprise was but in embryo, when it was supposed to be one of the remotest questions of future, when its importance was perceived but by a few far-seeing public men, Mr. Seward was also one of the first to express the opinion that the Canadian Pacific Railway would be superior to any of its American rivals. That opinion has already been quoted by the hon. member for Lincoln, but it is of such importance that I will again. draw to it the attention of the House:

"The route through British America is, in some respects, preferable to that through our own territory. By the former, the distance from Europe to Asia is some thousand miles shorter than by the latter. Passing close to Lake Superior, traversing the water-shed which divides the streams flowing towards th Arctic Sea from those which have their exit streams flowing towards th Arctic Sea from those which have their exit southward, crossing the Rocky Mountains at an elevation of over 3,000 feet less than at the south pass, the road could be here constructed with comparative cheapness, and would open up a region abounding in valuable timber and other natural products, and admirably suited to the growth of grain and grazing. Having its Atlantic seaboard at Halifax and its Pacific near Vancouver Island, it would undoubtedly draw to it the commerce of Europe, Asia and the United States. Thus British America, from a mere colonial dependency, would assume a controlling rank in the world. To her other nations would be tributary, and in vain would the United States attempt to be her rival, for she never could dispute with her the possession of the Asiatic commerce, nor the power which that commerce confers."

These are cheerful, these are encouraging words, coming from such a high and disinterested authority, and show that we have only to remain true to ourselves, to remain true to our country, to remain true to our destiny, to make of Canada, in course of time, a nation second to none on this continent. The future belongs to the manly and vigorous people of the North, I have no doubt. Well, Sir, this scheme is one of the greatest levers that we could employ to reach such a glorious result. This enterprise will not only people the vast solitudes of the far west, develop the grain-producing power of a region unsurpassed by its fecundity, attract an immense influx of capital and population, create legions of consumers for the products of the east, build up new territories, new provinces, build up immense cities, the rivals of Chicago, Milwaukee, St. Louis, St. Paul, on the shores of our great lakes, build up another San Francisco on the Pacific slope; but will give to Canada an importance, of which no adequate idea can yet be conceived, and will make of Canada, to use the expression of Mr. Seward, another Russia behind the United States—not a Russia peopled with a nation of slaves, but a Russia enjoying a most advanced state of civilization, a Russia enjoying all the blessings of true liberty. It will make of Canada a country able to hold its own, to defend its rights, to defend its liberties, its autonomy, against all comers. I consider this Pacific scheme, Sir—with the assistance of the National Policy—as the best and safest panacea against annexation. England, Sir, has failed as a power to recognize—in a tangible way, at any rate—the untold value of this road as the shortest communication for its immense Asiatic trade; but the day will come, at no distant date, when she will fully admit that this road has a vast importance not only to Canada, but to the whole British Empire. Many years ago, Sir, a celebrated traveller, a man who has given his name to a magnificent river as long as the Pacific Railway, a namesake of the hon. member for Lambton, the illustrious Alexander Mackenzie, reached the celebrated mountains which separate British Columbia from the rest of the Dominion, after a long and venturous journey and inscribed on the rock in big red letters the following words: "Alexander Mackenzie, from Canada, by land, the 22nd July, 1794." Well, Sir, if this contract is adopted, we have every expectation of securing an all-rail route within ten years from one ocean to the other—a railway which will be the bond of an indissoluble union. If this contract is sanctioned, as I have no doubt if will be by an overwhelming majority, we have also every reason to believe that three years hence the members of this House will be enabled to reach the same celebrated mountains and to carve their names on its rooky Mr. Tasse.

board the first locomotive which shall whistle throughout the "Great Lone Land" the good, the glorious news, that thanks to the enlightened policy of the Government, to the patriotism of this House, and to the energetic assistance of the people, a new cra, an era of progress, an era of true civilization has commenced for those famous and boundless prairies, which, desert to-day, will ere long be the granary of the world and one of the richest, if not the richest, portion of the continent.

Mr. WILDON. I wish briefly to give my views in favor of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for West Furham (Mr. Blake). The speech we have just heard delivered by the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Tassé) was full of fervid eloquence, of a glowing picture of the future of Canada, and it put me in mind of the speeches we used to hear in the Lower Provinces upon the great question of Confederation. At that time glowing pictures were drawn of the great benefit the Maritime Provinces would derive from Confederation, but the people have learned to place no more dependence upon flights of imagination in political affairs, but to prefer sober argument and sound sense. I listened to the hon, the Finance Minister the other night to see what arguments he would bring forward in favor of this contract. and for once he failed to prophecy what the future would be. I listened to him as a representative of our Province in the Government, and I expected to hear him bring forward some arguments to show why the contract should be adopted instead of the offer, when the latter was subscribed by the name of one honored son of New Brunswick who has done more to build up that Province than all the Governments we have had, and who put down half a million dollars as a proof of his sincerity. The hon, gentleman who has just sat down has attempted to show the inconsistencies of the members of the Mackenzie Administration in the relation to the Canadian Pacific Railway; and he has taunted the hon, member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) that the former leader of his party, the present Chief Justice of Quebec, had signed an annexation manifesto. That hon, gentleman seemed to have forgotten that a political friend and colleague of the present leader of the Government, and who now holds a high position in London, also signed that document, and his name was one of the first. I consider these matters have long since been buried and ought not now to be revived. The hon. gentleman has talked of a united Conservative phalanx, but it has been admitted on the other side that nearly every supporter of the Government had found fault with the contract and had suggested modification in one way or another. Even no later than last evening the hon, member for Pictou (Mr. Doull) admitted that in some way or another he had been satisfied. Last year, as I sat in this House and listened to the speeches in regard to the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and about the quantities of land that were te be sold, we were told by the hon. Premier that emigration would flow into the North-West at the rate of 25,000 first year, and that when the House met here again there would be 25,000 additional inhabitants in the North-West. I ask to-day has that prediction been verified? If when the hon. members, some of them in the present Cabinet, were going over the length and breadth of the Maritime Provinces, depicting the advantages we were to obtain, and asserting that our taxes would not be increased, or the duties raised, but that prosperity would could come to our doors, if at that time we had known that within four years after a compact would be made with British Columbia by which the Ministry of that day bound this country to undertake the enormous expense, which if carried out would be utterly ruinous to the country, there would have been howls and execrations throughout the country at such a proposition. If it is claimed that this treaty with British Columbia is one that we are bound to carry out, I ask was summits, after a pleasant and surprisingly rapid trip, on not that very treaty a violation of the terms by which we were drawn into the Union? At that time the hon. Finance Minister stated that the Government had been informed by reliable persons that in British Columbia there were no engineering difficulties; experience now tells us what that information was worth. As we are now situated, however, the discussion is narrowed down, first to the acceptance of one of the two propositions before the Hease, and secondly with regard to the nature of the details of those offers. We find that an offer is laid on the Table by the Government. I call it simply an offer, because, although the Government might constitutionally have the right to enter into certain engagements, yet they knew that those engagements had to be ratified by Parliament. Even the contract itself declares that it shall not be binding on the men who signed it until the Parliament of Canada ratifies it. They knew that it required the sanction of this Parliament, not a mere formal sanction, but the sanction of members in the eyes of their constituents. after a full and fair discussion of its terms, unfettered by feelings of partizanship. If, on the other hand, hon. gentlemen, after making this contract, come down and say they are bound and pledged, then, I say, it is illegal and unconstitutional. They had no right to agree to hand over the money of this country to a company without the authority of the people's representatives. That being the position we occupy, we are left open to accept or reject either of the offers before us. It has been said that this has been a burning question before the country for years. No doubt the general question of the Pacific Railway has been before the country, but until this contract was laid on the Table, was there the slightest hint that such immunities, such privileges, would be granted by the Government to a body of capitalists for the construction of that road? We know that from 21st October to 10th December, this agreement was carefully concealed from the people of this country. But the moment it was made public other capitalists came forward with a better offer. True, they were set down as tricksters; but when they showed solid proof of their sincerity, it was then alleged that their offer was a political trick. It lies on the Table signed by men whose names are known throughout the Dominion as those of men of honor and men of wealth. We have, therefore, to deal with the question as to which of these offers the people should accept. In rejecting the first, we should not be bound to accept the second in its present shape, but it would form a basis for negotiations upon which more favorable terms for the country could be obtained. It is said the Government are bound in honor. If, as I said, the Government have undertaken to bind us, they have done what is unconstitutional. In the Mother Country Governments have withdrawn measures and still retained the confidence of their followers. But the argument has been put forward here that if we refuse the first offer, our action involves the retirement of the Government. I say it is not so. If the Government receives a better offer, then it is not only their right but their duty to accept it, and in doing so they would receive the support of every member of this House. Compare those two offers that are before the House. It is stated that the second contract is only intended to build the prairie section. Hon, mombers who take that view entirely forget the terms of the contract according to which the Company is bound to build the eastern and western sections as well as the prairie sections, unless the Government find it to be in the interest of the Dominion that those sections should not be proceeded with. If this offer should be accepted it will be this Government, therefore, that will have the decision in this respect. But it is said that the acceptance of this offer would entail a change of Government, that it was intended only to enable the Opposition to get into power and then withdraw the eastern section. According to this effect of land grants to corporations by a case which took view it seems that we have to pay the difference of price place in my own Province not long ago. The New Brunsand then withdraw the eastern section. According to this between these two offers in order to allow the present incumbents of the Treasury benches to retain the possession of power. Leaving out of the question the immunities and exemptions which are embraced in the Syndicate contract and not in the last offer, we would by accepting the latter save $3,000,000 and 3,000,000 acres of land. The land has been valued at different rates, but taking a fair average rate we find that the difference in money and land would amount to from ten to twelve million dollars. If that money can be saved it ought to be saved for the country. Look at the annual burden which this additional amount would entail. It represents as interest the sum of a half million dollars annually -a sum sufficient to pay for the administration of justice in the whole Dominion, and greater than the subsidy to New Brunswick or Nova Scotia. The hon, gentleman who preceded me said we viewed with alarm an appeal to the constituencies. Yet we found member after member rising on this side and insisting that the voice of the people should be heard on a question involving so large an expenditure and of such vital interest to Canada as this one. So far as we are concerned we have exhibited no alarm. Hon, gentlemen opposite are anxious to bring in the policy of the Americans as a pattern for us, but whatever grants they may make for their railways, it is certain that they are not increasing their public debt in doing so. Since 1867 our debt has rolled up from $75,000,000 or $80,000,000, to $160,000,000, on which we pay annually $8,000,000 interest, while the American debt has been reduced within the same period nearly $500,000,000. I say, that when we say that the United States is a country which by its age and wealth and population cannot fairly be compared with ours, we cannot justly be accused of disloyalty or a lack of patriotism. We on this side cannot speak in this way or refer to the Sault Sto. Marie Branch without being accused of disloyalty by hon, gentleman opposite. I yield to no man in my loyalty to British institutions, my loyalty to the Dominion, or to my province, for though I was opposed to Confederation, yet when it was carried I went in prepared to do the best for the new constitution. I am not afraid of the Americans; they have treated us well, and as a citizen of St. John I would be a monster of ingratitude if I were to say a word against men who acted so nobly when our city was desolate and in ruins -not by passing resolutions which they did not carry out, but by giving us substantial proofs or their warm-hearted kindness. As regards these two offers, while I do not unconditionally support the second, I say that the advantages in its favor are so great and so obvious, that, to adopt to the present case a remark of the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall) with regard to the Intercolonial, we are about to throw millions of money into the swamps and muskegs of the North-West. As I said before, I am not in favor of either offer, and I shall not refer at length to the objections to the contract for the reason that they have been dealt upon at such length by other hon. gentlemen. I may say briefly, however, and for the purpose of justifying the vote which I purpose giving, that I object:

(1) To the monopoly given to the Company under no real restrictions as to the composition or character of the corporation; (2) to the further monopoly to build branch lines to exclusion of others; (3) to the right to locate the line where the Company wishes; (4) to materials bring exempted from duty; (5) to the right of the Company to select lands; (6) to the grant of land for stations free from taxation; (7) to the extinguishment of Indian title by the Government; (8) to the exemption from taxation; (9) to the Government building the line from Yale to Kamloops; and (10) to there being no right of pre-emption by Government. With regard to the selection of the lands by fhe Syndicate it is very clear that it will be to their interest to select the best lands in the North-West, and I might illustrate the wick Bailway Company were granted $10,000 per mile, and they were to choose the lands which were given them from four counties in that Province. The result of their selection was, that they possessed themselves of the best timber lands in those four counties, so that our lumbermen have now either to pay a double price for their timber lands or else to go to the State of Maine or the Province of Quebec to carry on their operations. Lam willing to take the maxim laid down by the member for Ottawa (Mr. Tassé), "experience teaches," and Lay that the illustration I have employed will give us a very good idea of what will take place in the North-West Territories. Several hon. members notably the member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirk-patrick), and the member for King's, N.S. (Mr. Borden) advanced as an argument in favor of accepting the contract, that it settled definitely what we are going to pay for the railway. The very fact that it is not final upon that point, is one of the most serious objections I entertain against the contract. We find that some completed portions are to be handed over to the Syndicate, and that the Government undertake to finish portions of the road which are now under contract. What does experience teach us with regard to that? When the Intercolonial railway was projected, and when it cost much more to build railways than it does now, it was asserted that £5,000,000 would build the road and that $25,000,000 would be more than sufficient. But to day that road has cost this country nearly $40,000,000, while there are claims against the Government in connection with it for unknown sums which have not yet been settled. We are justified in saying that the cost of building this Pacific railway, is just as uncertain now as it was the day that British Columbia was admitted into Confederation. So far as the eastern section is concerned, I would like to see its construction postponed, because the resources of the country are not now in a position to build it. We must avoid all burden that will increase our taxation. We have a powerful Republic alongside of us offering great inducements to our people to emigrate thither. In the city of St. John the International steamers that run to Boston carry away, every day, men and women who are leaving our country for the States,

Mr. DOMVILLE. No, no.

Mr. WELDON. Some will come back, but for ten that go not more than one will come back. I appeal to every member from the Maritime Provinces whether there is not great emigration to the United States. No inducement is held out to those people to go to Manitoba or the North-West. The Government spend large sums in bringing over European emigrants, but every man and woman that leave our country for the United States are worth ten emigrants that come out from the old country. There was one remark made by the hon, member for Ottawa, in answer to an interruption by the hon, member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin), in regard to a contested election case. I presume the hon. member for Gloucester meant that that case was heard last September and that the judgment has not yet been given. It cannot be that the Bench of Quebec is overworked, because the vacancies of that Province are not filled—there are vacancies in Ontario that are not filled. It may be that the Government are holding these places open until this vote is taken, and that the seats are held up as a reward. But in New Brunswick, scarcely has the grave closed over a member of the Bench and a former member of this House, than the vacancy is filled up. I object to this contract on the ground that it proposes to establish a huge monopoly in the North-West, while in the United States public opinion everywhere is setting strongly upon monopolics of all kinds. I ask hon members to pause before voting away our money and land as they are about to do. When this contract was first laid upon the Table the Minisgiven by the Premier. Some of the papers in more distant parts of the country, however, expressed their opinion before getting word from Ottawa. I will conclude by reading a short article from a paper published in the County of Charlotte, and one of the most violent supporters of the Government in the Lower Provinces, and this is what he said, just after the new proposal had been presented:

"If the offer is a bond fide one and the Company is financially able to carry out its engagements, it behoves the Government in give heed to the proposition. We have no doubt the Government will be equal to the emergency, and even although this new Syndicate may have been conceived in Grit sin and brought forth in Grit iniquity, if it shall result in a modification of the contract, the country will have no reason to complain."

Mr. DOMVILLE. Next to being a good speaker is the capacity of being a good listener. For the last five weeks I have been listening to the arguments presented by the hon, gentlemen opposite—why we should desert our chieftain, desert our party, and place the Government in the hands of the hon. gentlemen opposite, because they are so much better able to carry on the affairs of this country than we are. We have seen those hon gentlemen trying to persuade the electors of New Brunswick-I speak now of New Brunswick, because the last speaker confined himself entirely to New Brunswick-that if they had only supported the late Administration, everything would have been of the most rosy hue. But the people found that the great Administration had failed to carry out the promises they had made during their tenure of office, and they concluded not to be deceived by them again. Sir, I am not going to have the charge brought against me, that the party whip has been snapped over me—that I am told to vote as others wish me. There are a great many things in this contract that I disapprove of, but there are a great many things that I do approve of, and I should be indeed sorry it any vote of mine should place the gentlemen on the other side of the House in possession of the Government of this country. Why? Because, I believe, when they had charge of the Government of this country they did not show that knowledge of human nature which would enable them to keep it. They had a large majority, which dwindled away from time to time, and when, at the end of five years, they went back to the peo-ple, the people rejected them, as they did not believe them fitted to control the affairs of this country. Sir, it would be folly for me, at this time of night, after the question has been so thoroughly discussed, to give the pros and cons why this contract should be ratified or not ratified. The contract, to me, is a most important one. As I am a young man, I look around me, and I see men older than myself who, in the natural course of things, must pass away before I do, and therefore I wish to be very careful in any action of mine that may be misinterpreted in the future, so that I may be able to tell people who sent me here that I voted according to my best lights, and as intelligently as I could do. Sir, the remarks thrown out on the other side of this House that gentlemen on this side of this House were interested in this Syndicate, I look on as a slur, and unworthy of the gentleman who made those remarks. I am satisfied that no hon, gentleman on the other side of this House believes that any gentleman on this side has any pecuniary interest in the contract; if he does think so he had no right to bring the matter up in the House, but if he does not it is a pity that he should try to make the country believe that any members of Parliament are corrupt. I think the day has gone by when either side of this House should vilify the other. I have remarked with pleasure that this Session has been particularly free from vituperation. It is a very galling thing to be in Opposition. I was in Opposition for five years; while in that position I had a bill which passed through both Houses, but when it came back to this House, simply because a verbal alteration of the word THE or or had been made by the Senate, the mechanical majority of tarial press of the country kept silent until the cue had been hon, gentlemen opposite threw it out, and there were Mr. Weldon.

rejoicings at the fact, as they said that "might was right." Yet they are appealing to us now, when we have a measure for the interest of the country, that we should listen to their views. Sir, I would not deign to listen to them. I would let the Government carry out what they think best, and if in doing so they fall in the election of 1883, we shall fall with them, as we fell before. As I said, there are many things in the contract I do not like; but am I to put up my opinion against that of men of tried ability and experience, and who have given the matter so much consideration? No, Sir; I shall support them as it is my duty to do, having been returned by my county for that purpose. The responsibility is with them, and I am prepared to accept what they lay before this House. The hon, member for Queen's, N.B., told us what a great meeting he held at the Narrows in N.B. •Well, Sir, they were Narrows, for there were very few people there. He did not tell me that he was going to hold a meeting or advertise it in any way, but he went there and collected a few of his friends together, without giving us a chance to reply, and yet he says that New Brunswick is going to vote against the Syndicate and endorse his position. If my hon, friend would give me about ten weeks' time, leave behind him those great statistics, that he read to the House, and meet me face to face, I would not be afraid to contest an election with him in his county. I would be prepared to leave the people of Queen's County to decide on the question of the National Policy. He talked gloomily of New Brunswick. I am pre-pared to show that New Brunswick has progressed since Confederation and is still progressing, though his county may unfortunately not have prospered as much as the others, owing to the fact that its business is entirely confined to lumber. In other words, everything that is used by the lumberman is brought from abroad, and the proceeds of the lumber has to be sent off to pay for it. Were these men employed instead in farming, we should have, instead of a wilderness of stumps, flourishing farms all over the country. Had the hon, gentleman taken the trouble to look up the country has represent the same returns he would have seen trouble to look up the census returns, he would have seen that in 1851 we had in King's county only 120,923 acres under cultivation, and in 1871, 207,557 acres under cultivation, and 901,000 acres improved lands; that in 1851 our cereals only realized $670,000, while in 1871 they realized $1,100,000. Whilst in addition to cereals the products of manufactures, lumber, &c., amounted to nearly another million dollars. The county produced as much lumber as Queen's county, and owned 5,766 tons of shipping. Its products embraced 963,000 lbs. butter, 59,000 tons hay, 345,000 bushels oats, 870,000 bushels potatoes, 306,000 bushels buckwheat, &c. It owned 5,500 horses, 28,000 head of cattle, 35,000 sheep; had many manufacturing interests; in fact, was the richest agricultural county in the Province without exception. How then could the hon, member for Queen's give such deplorable accounts of the state of the when s give such deplorable accounts of the state of the county? There had been a marked improvement in the business and productions of the country, and there was no reason to suppose King's county was an exception. In other words, while every man, woman and child in 1851 only earned $35 per head annually, in 1871 they earned $45 per head. I regret the statistics of the new consus are not before me as I might be able to establish a for transatar improvement. The hon marker for the city far greater improvement. The hon, member for the city and county of St. John (Mr. Burpee), whom I regret not to see in his seat, has not yet thought fit to speak on this subject.

Mr. WELDON. He was obliged to leave a short time ago, because he was taken ill.

Mr. DOMVILLE. He has had five weeks in which information before the Government, showing what was the to make a speech and tell the intelligent people of shortest line across the continent. They said that I should canada that he joined in a Syndicate in New Brunswick support the scheme, which would be of most benefit to Onwith George Stephens, who is going to run the North-West tario, Quebec, and, if possible, to New Brunswick. They Syndicate, and he could have told them that the only object of Mr. Gibson in coming up here and joining the new Syndicate was to checkmate Burpee of New Brunswick. I would not throw charges across the floor of this House, but if I were as willing to do so as some hon. gentlemen are I would say that my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Burpee) was here and that he was under the tuition of George Stephens—that he was dependent on him for the management Stephens—that he was dependent on him for the management of that road and the patronage belonging to it, and consequently could not speak against the present Syndicate for fear of offending him. That is what I would say if I were unkind, but I do not say it. The hon, gentleman said he would not be bound by either bargain; that was certainly a side issue for a lawyer to take—that he is neither here nor there. The hon, gentleman reiterates all the arguments and I have now that I leader, the member for Gloucester, and I may say that I have a great deal of respect for that hon, gentleman. He is one who is worthy to lead the New Brunswick contingent. His speech has formed a speech for all their speeches, and they would be ungrateful if they did not acknowledge him as their leader. My hon friend from St. John talks about the large amount of swag that was to be got out of this Syndicate, and the great legal expenses the Government were under. Does he forget that in days gone by he was himself the representative of the Minister of Justice; and himself the representative of the Minister of Justice; and he finds fault now because he has not the office and is a disappointed man. When the people of New Brunswick come to read his speech, they will know very well the reason of great complaints and of his disappointment. The hon, gentleman says that the people are going out of the country like the pelican and the monkey crossing the broad river, but the hon gentleman did not tell the House what induced the people to leave the country—that they were led away by the volume I hold in my hand—extracts from the speeches of the Hon. Edward Blake, with his likeness on the first page, and advocating the United States as a home for emigrants in preference to Canada. He should have told the House the facts instead of leading them to believe that these people left because the United States was a better country than this. With regard to St. John, he knows very well that after the fire took place, a large number of artizans and adventurers of all sorts came in to rebuild the city, and they left as soon as their work was done. They never were inhabitants of the city of St. John. All that St. John wants is a helping hand and it does not thank my hon, friend from St. John and my hon, friend from Queen's, and my hon. friend from Gloucester for running it down, and saying the property is low, that wages are low, and taxation and the cost of living high, thus damaging the value and prospects of the city. I should have been better pleased if these hon, gentlemen had come forward and said that they did not like some things in the contract—for I do not myself—but that on patriotic grounds, on the ground that the scheme would build up this great country and reduce our taxation by the consumption of goods in the North-West country, they were willing to join hands with the Government in this national enterprise. But they are not patriotic enough to take this course. It has been their constant object to whine and run down New Brunswick, and every member from that Province. They would even go so far as to say that I could not be elected again in the county of King's; and again I say I would meet the whole boodle of them in King's county, and I say this without any disrespect. When I visited my constituents I said to them: "What do you think about this contract?" They said it was a matter upon which I ought not to make up my mind until I had all the said to me fairly and frankly: "We sent you to represent us, and we expect you to do the best you can. If you feel and believe that the Government which brought in this measure are doing their duty; if you have confidence in their ability, honesty and integrity, it is your duty to support them. you feel otherwise, then you are free to vote otherwise." New Brunswick I find none of the great excitements we heard of in the petition from St. John. I have read that petition; and although I am in that city almost every day, I do not know thirty names on it, and I fail to find the names of many leading merchants, even of those supporting the Opposition. The people of New Brunswick are satisfied with the Government, and I will show it at the polls next time.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. We will try it.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I know the hon. gentleman is a strong man in his county, and I say in fairness that I do not think anyone can beat him there; but if he will allow me to run for Westmoreland and let him run for King's, we will try what the result will be.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. The Finance Minister and I are going to try in my own county.

Mr. DOMVILLE. He is more able to do so than I am. I have a few words to say to the hon, member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin). That hon, gentleman said if the contract had been drawn upon their side of the House, it would have been better drawn. You remember the story of the lion going through a picture gallery. There was a picture—a man slaying a lion. The lion said: "That is a good picture, but if I had painted it, the lion would have been slaying the man, instead of the man killing the lion." And so it is, we each think we can do what is best. I have no doubt that taking into consideration the natural course of events, and I have looked into the matter very carefully, the Opposition may accede to power fifteen years hence, and then we will see what they will do. I am sorry I have not prepared a speech to read to the House, as I saw my hon friend from Queen's do the other day, to send to my constituents under the heading "with compliments." I am sorry I shall not have telegraphed to St. John a report of my speech, as I saw the other day, done for the member for Queen's-with the statement that it was an able speech by a patriotic man. In reading the St. John papers lately I was amazed to see that the hon. member for Queen's placed in such a leading position; I had expected to have seen the speeches of the First Minister, Minister of Railways and the Minister of Finance; but no, it was but the speech of the member for Queen's. That hon, gentleman had set everything right, and no doubt the next copy of that journal will contain a speech of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon), whose great effort will be published in extenso. In my case I have spoken without notes, but, I hope, to the point. I may say, however, that these speeches do very little good in the county. My county is flooded with them, and I have received a letter stating that it is a god-send those speeches have come, because those people are short of kindling material. Copies of speeches of the Hon. Edward Blake are sent broadcast over my county by an hon. member whose frank I have in my hand. The extraordinary fact is that they are sent to my own committee-men, as if they could expect they would distribute them among my friends. Now, there is an act of intelligence. When I have spoken here I did not send copies of my speeches to the Grits, but I left them in darkness, pone the building of the ends and merely construct which I think is the proper place for them. While disagreeing as I do in some points of this bargain, still I believe it is the best that could be submitted to Partial I believe it is the best that could Mr. DOMVILLE.

tor the Government to take into consideration with honor. To my mind, it is worse than the present contract, because it makes it possible for the country west of Lake Superior to be cut off and that we should be tacked on as a lateral branch of the United States. If there was one point about which I had difficulty in sustaining the Stephens Syndicate, it was the chance that the present Syndicate would-bring grains and cereals from the North-West through the United States and cut off Canada from getting the traffic to which it was entitled. But when I find English, French. German and American gentlemen, whose interest will be paramount in making this a through line through Canada and to keep faith with the Government, I say then that I am in honor bound to support the Government proposal. If there had been anything better proposed to Parliament, I certainly would have been free to vote for it. It is well known that I am a sincere follower of the party, but every one knows that I shall not want the request of a Cabinet Minister or the crack of the party whip to lead me to vote for this bargain, for I believe no better one has been offered to the House and the country. I am therefore able to go back to my people, fully alive to the responsibility I have accepted. I am prepared to meet the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon) and other hon, members when they oppose my election in 1883, and I can tell them this is the best offer that the country or Government received, that the Government were honest in their desire to build up the Dominion, not to depress its industries and persuade the people that the United States was a better place to live in than Canada, and endeavor to prejudice their minds as to the value of the great North-West. If we should fall, let us fall, as I said before, believing that we have done right. If we have done right we have nothing to regret. I give my vote to the Government sincerely believing it is the best thing that has been offered; if I have done wrong then I shall forfeit my seat. But if I have not done wrong then I am satisfied that King's county will endorse my action. King's county has returned me in Opposition and in power. They do not care so much for my politics, but they know that when I have come up here to support a Government, I do not jump the fence, that I never dickered for office, that I was never promised anything for my vote in the House, and that there were no difficulties arising afterwards about what was promised and what I did not get, as in the case of the hon. member for Westmoreland. The people of King's are an intelligent people and they will weigh this question thoroughly. I am satisfied if I go back to them and tell them that I supported this Government, or if my hon. friend on the other side coming with any better scheme, I believe they will return me to support either side of the House I choose. I trust that this scheme will be carried by a large majority, and that, notwithstanding the eloquence of the hon. member for St. John county (Mr. Weldon), none of our friends will follow him and forget their duty to their country and constituents.

Mr. McCARTHY. If I consulted my own taste in the matter I should not have risen at this hour in the morning to trouble this House with any comments upon the question before it. But I have a duty to perform to my constituency, and I cannot cast the vote I propose to give without explaining why I propose to support the measure the Government has brought down. In my opinion the backbone of this question is this: Are we desirous of carrying out the policy of the Government of building an all-rail route through our own Dominion as speedily as possible, or are we to adopt the policy of the Opposition and postpone the building of the ends and merely construct within a period which is now elapsed. Moreover, there was a resolution passed by the House that this work should be done, subject to the condition that it did not increase the taxes of the people. I remember that the Government of the hon, member for Lambton, after the attempt made by the previous Administration to construct the road, by means of the Allan contract, had failed, the Government, I say, did not propose to do then as they might have done, to abandon the connection with British Columbia if they thought the terms were too onerous and the bargain was impossible to fulfil; but instead of that they adopted it and made terms with British Columbia and proposed to pay a compensation for the delay which they said, was inevitable in carrying out the bargain and in building the road within the period of ten years. After that dispute had been referred to the Home authorities, and after Lord Carnarvon had accepted the burden of settling the dispute between British Columbia and this Dominion, we know that the late Administration accepted the terms proposed by Lord Carnarvon, that they agreed to go on as soon as the surveys were completed, and expend $2,000,000 a year in British Columbia; that they agreed that the work, as far as Lake Superior, should be constructed by the year 1890; that it should be prosecuted speedily and without delay; and now I want to know how any hon member, if he thinks the work can be done by the means the Government has proposed, can say that because British Columbia is weak, because her representation in this body is not powerful, that therefore her contract is to be treated with contempt, and that we are to violate the treaty we made with her? The hon. leader of the Opposition told us only last Session, when it was proposed by the hon. member for Algona to appoint a Committee with regard to the disputed boundary between Ontario and the Dominion, that in honor this country was bound to stand by the award that had been made, that it was almost dishonorable in this House to ask for information before agreeing to sanction that award. And yet that hon, member does not hesitate to ask the Liberal party to postpone indefinitely the carrying out of the contract which was made in 1871 with British Columbia, endorsed by the Liberal party in the acceptance of the Carnarvon terms, and which can now be implemented without increasing the burdens upon the people of the Dominion. I am in favor of the policy of the Government in constructing a road from end to end in British territory with the least possible delay, so long as it can be done without increasing taxation, as under this contract it can be done. Under these circumstances, therefore, we are bound to fulfil this contract with British Columbia, if for no other purpose than to keep good faith with that Province. The hon member for Wentworth (Mr. Rymal) almost agreed that he, at all events, would not cry, as he expressed it, if we did build this railroad at once, if such was the will of the country and the will of Parliament. He, as a leading and long-life Liberal, did not pretend to say that that was not a proper policy to adopt; it may be said, however, "granting that to be so, and granting that under the direction of the Minister of Finance, the portion we have to pay for the construction of the road allotted to us can be paid without increasing the burdens of the people. yet the contract laid on the Table is not one which it would be in the interest of this country to accept." That is the point to which I desire more particularly to draw attention. We must look at that as a pure and simple matter of business; the question of the construction of a railroad ought not to be a matter to be bandied from one side of the House to the other, a matter over which political parties should make warfare; but it should be treated as a matter of business, and if this contract is one which we ought to accept, then we should be recreant to estimate was, for the eastern section, $26,000,000; our duty if we do not take advantage of this opportunity of his second estimate brought it down to $20,000,000. relieving the country from the burden it would have to As I will show you in a moment, the hon. member assume if the road were not built by a company. We are all committed to that proposition, I think; at all events that is proved to have been from the very first the policy of both parties, and a resolution was moved by a distinguished leader of hon. gentlemen opposite, that it should be built by a company and not otherwise. I propose to point out, in the first place, what this company are going to do, and in the next place, what we are going to give them, and upon the result of that comparison, I think, ought to rest our decision, whether this contract, in a business sense, is acceptable or They have to construct and equip 2,000 miles of railway, they have to build 900 miles in the prairie section, and 450 miles to Kamloops through the Rocky Mountains; and they have to build the most difficult section of all-that north of Lake Superior. These sections compose the 2,000 miles which this Syndicate proposes to construct. How is that work to be done? is the first question. Because unless we know that, it is impossible to put a value upon what they have agreed to do. They are to build it in accordance with the standard of the Union Pacific Railway "at the time when it was first constructed." Whatever doubt may have existed in the minds of hon. gentlemen as to what these words mean, whether they refer to 1869 or 1873, there can be no doubt, in my mind, that arrangements can, and I have no doubt, will be made satisfactory to the House and country, by which the standard will be that of 1873. What was the standard of 1873? I hold in my hand a memorandum, taken from the report of the Union Pacific Railway Company for that period, which shows pretty well what the standard then was. The road at that time had an earning power over the expenses of $5,000,000 per annum. The report for the year 1873 says:

"The operating expenses cover $4,974 861, an increase of $174,287, or 363 per cent., and the net earnings $5,291,243, an increase of $1,199,211, or 26.86 per cent. The ratio of operating expenses to earnings was reduced from 53.98 to 48.45 per cent. This reduction appears great, in view of many difficulties under which the Union Pacific Railway is operated; but the report states that the relation of expenses to earnings would have been still further reduced had not the cost of new rails for 60. miles of track, and of new cross-ties for 280 miles been charged against miles of track, and of new cross-ties for 280 miles been charged against operating expenses. These very satisfactory results which speak volumes for the ability with which the property has been managed by the executive heads of departments have not been obtained by allowing the track and equipment to depreciate; because it is stated that the railway tracks, locomotives, cars and buildings are in good order, and as a proof of that the regularity with which trains are run is noted. From 1st November, 1873, to 1st March, 1874, the passenger trains of the Union Pacific Railway did not fail in a single instance to connect with the trains of the Central Pacific Railway on the west end and the trains of the lower road. Central Pacific Railway on the west end, and the trains of the lows road on the east. The measures to avoid snow blockades on that part of the road which crosses the Rocky Mountains have been very effective, and by raising embankments in some places, and widening cuts in others, the Company has been enabled to dispense with more than eleven miles of snow fence."

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. That is the fall of 1873.

Mr. McCARTHY. It is the report of 1873.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. The modification was made in February, 1873.

Mr. McCARTHY. This report shows that the road was in the best possible equipment, that its earnings during the year were $10,000,000, that its passengers were 174,894, and its freights 276,000 tons, and that is the standard which the Government have accepted as satisfactory. Now. what is the cost of building and equipping such a road? The equipment of the road, by the same report, is shown to be as follows: locomotives, 147; passenger cars, 51; baggage, mail, and express cars, 30; freight cars of all descriptions, 2,750. Would not such an equipment be satisfactory to us? Now, what is the cost of such a road to be? In the calculation I am going to give to the House, I do not intend to be bound by the statements made on either side of the House. Mr. Fleming's first for Lambton's estimate, after the statement made by the Hon. Minister of Railways as to the manner in which the road was to be constructed, was that the eastern section would cost $32,500,000. The central section, as it is now called, and divided in the manner in which it is divided in the contract, may thus be spoken of: According to Mr. Fleming's first estimate, the prairie region, 900 miles, was to cost $23,400,000; according to his second estimate it was reduced to $11,700,000. According to the hon. member for Lambton last year, that portion was to cost $25,778,000. Let me read what the hon, member for Lambton said after he had heard the statement of the Hon. Minister of Railways:

"It would be interesting to the House to take some of Mr. Fleming's estimates on other occasions Mr. Fleming gave an estimate from Lake Superior to Selkirk at $14,700,000; now it is $17,000,000, or an increase of 16 per cent. His previous estimate of the cost of the prairie region was $26,000,000, or double what he now states it to be. From Nipissing to Lake Superior his estimate to the late Government was $26,000,000, or to Lake Superior his estimate to the late Government was $26,000,000, or $6,000,000 more than now, and $2,000,000 more than that of the hon. Minister. From the Summit Line to Burrard Inlet, his estimate was $35,000,000, which was now reduced to $30,000,000. The Pembina Branch was formerly $1,300,000; now the hon. gentleman stated it to be $1,7.0,000. If the same percentage is applied to the Chief Engineer's calculations on other sections, namely, 16 per cent., the whole cost will be about $114,090,000. Instead of $84,0.0,000 as the hon. gentleman now states. Such wild estimates show how utterly impossible it was for anyone to ascertain the probable cost and I feel pretty certain that the estimates now presented are the merest guess-work."

He then goes on to give his reasons, which I recommend to the attention of my hon. friends opposite:

"I will take the description of the engineers themselves as to the character of the work upon the several sections from Fort William to Selkirk, and carry out figures elsewhere on the same description Seventy miles were described as heavy, 226 miles moderate, and 114 miles light; and in order to reach the $18,000,000, which the engineers had recently estimated, they would have to take the seventy miles of heavy work at $75,000 per mile; the 226 miles of moderate might, at $39,000, and the 114 light, at $20,000, making altogether, with the rolling-stock valued at $1.656,000, $18,000,000. From Selkirk to Battleford the first 112 miles are described as light, which, with the rails, fencing, etc., might be estimated at $14,000 per mile, or $3,000 less that the Pembina Branch; and the second 100 miles I have taken and calculated as to the materials furnished by Mr. Marcus Smith, and I do not believe that any gradient can be obtained on that section to build the road at less than $20,000 an ile."

Then he gives reasons for arriving at that conclusion which I need not trouble the House with. He says:

"From the end of the second hundred miles to Battleford, we have 377 miles. This is not any heavier on the whole. There are some more formidable bridges, but the line is further off for the carriage of the more formidable bridges, but the line is further off for the carriage of the rails. I place that section at $21,000 per mile. Then from Battleford to Edmonton it is reported by the engineers as thirteen miles very heavy; this I estimate at $60,000 a mile, being $10,000 less than the other heavy work east of Selkirk; forty-nine miles more of the line classed as moderately heavy, I put at $39.000 per mile; and seventy miles very moderate, at $25,000, with ninety-eight miles of light work at $20.000 per mile, which makes for this section altogether, an average of $27,000 a mile. From Edmonton to the Summit, 256 miles, the road is divided in this way by the engineer: heavy, seventy-six miles: medium, sixty-three miles: by the engineer: heavy, seventy-six miles; medium, sixty-three miles; light, 117 miles. I calculate the 'heavy' at $60,000 per mile being $10,000 more than the cost of heavy work east of Selkirk; medium at $40,000 per mile; and light at $20.000 per mile, making in all $9,472,000, or an average of $37,000 per mile."

When the hon, gentleman has thus worked out a calculation from the reports of engineers, we have a right to treat his calculation with some respect. The question to be decided is, what value we are to get for what we give to the Syndicate? We can only ascertain that by endeavoring to arrive at the cost of the work. According to Mr. Fleming's first estimate, the cost would be $68,460,000; according to the second estimate, that which hon. gentlemen now treat as perfectly conclusive, but which they refused to accept last Session, treating it as utterly unworthy of credence, is $18,500,000, and the hon. member for Lambton's estimate was $77,278,000. The average per mile would be $34,200 according to Mr. Fleming's first calculation, and $24,250 per mile according to his second calculation, for the whole 2,000 miles; and $39,639 per mile according to the calculation made by the hon. member for Lambton last Session. Mr. McCarthy.

amounts we have a total cost of $67,000,000, and an average cost per mile for the 2,000 miles, of $33,544, and for the prairie section, $21,547. I do not propose to stop there. Satisfictory as that ought to be to my hon, friends opposite, who can hardly deny the calculation made by their late leader, it is not quite satisfactory to me. I have endeavored to ascertain what has been the cost of similar roads constructed in the adjoining States, and the average cost of the roads constructed here in this Dominion. I have endeavored in that way to arrive at what would be the probable cost of the construction of this portion of the work. The cost of the Pembina Branch, 73 miles-

Mr. McCARTHY. I calculated it at 73, but 85 miles makes the case still stronger. The first estimate of the cost of that was $1,300,000, and the cost as estimated last Session was $1,700,000, or an increase of some 30 per cent. in the engineer's estimate. The cost this Session brings it back to the neighborhood of $1,500,000. Assuming it at that we find that the Pembina Branch, which was as casy a branch to construct as any part of the proposed railway system, cost $20,000 per mile, including equipment. Let us see what roads have cost elsewhere? Taking the State of Wisconsin, the average cost of railroads per mile in that State, as given to us by Poor's Manual for 1876, is $39,000. The average cost in Minnesota was $47,887; in Dakota, $48,629; in Nebr. ska, $32,723; in Kansas, $44,427; and taking the average all over the north-western and northern states, we find the cost to be $49,327. This St. Paul and Manitoba railroad, of which we have heard so much, cost $47,874. It seems to me that if a man were going to make a contract with a Government or anybody else to build a line of railway, he would first endeavor to ascertain what such a road would cost elsewhere. He would not be satisfied with an estimate by an engineer, as we all know that even in building a house the estimates of architects are most fallacious, and that in every case the actual cost far exceeds the original estimates. We all remember that the Intercolonial Railway, according to the estimates made, was to be constructed for $24.000 per mile, but we all know equally well that the actual cost of the road, with equipment, is in the neighborhood of, if it does not exceed, $50,000 per mile. I defy hon gentlemen to show a single instance in which a railway has been built at anything like the original estimates, or at anything like the cost which these hon, gentlemen now pretend to say, for the purpose of advancing their case in the country, this road could be built by the Syndicate. We have had some figures given which make it appear that some American roads were built at a very low cost, but I will show that the equipment of such roads, which is a most important element in the calculation, is very inferior. The Omaha and Northern Nebraska road cost $15,383 per mile, but what was the equipment? One locomotive congine, one passenger car and eighteen freight cars Henderson and Overton road, in Texas, cost $12,000 per mile, but it had only one engine, one passenger car and five freight cars. The Hastings and Minnesota Railway cost $14,000 per mile, but it had no rolling stock; and the same was true of the Worthington and Sioux Valley road, which cost $14,396. If you look into the history of railway enterprises on the other side of the line you will find that, with an ordinary guage and an ordinary equipment, I have not been far wide of the mark in estimating the cost at $33,000 per mile. Take the cost of the railways in our own system and we find that, including equipment, they reach an average of $45,945 per mile. I do not think, therefore, that we can reasonably conclude that the rate I have estimated is too large, and if so, the 2,000 miles of road would cost $67,089,000. In addition to this the Syndicate agree to equip the portion of the road which we hand over to them. Averaging these different New, what is the cost of equipment? I have consulted various men who are conversant with such matters, and they say that the amount will vary from $2,000 to $10,000 or $12,000, and assuming as a not extravagant estimate $3,000 per mile, we have to add to the $67,089,000, $7,800,000, making in all $68,889,000. But that is not all the Syndicate have agreed to do. They have agreed to operate and work this road forever, to maintain it effectively and work it efficiently; and, does anyone suppose that for years to come this road from the Atlantic to the Pacific will be a paying road. On the contrary, we know there will be a heavy loss over a great portion of the line. We all know that the reason the country was appalled at the prospect of the road being built by the Government was that there would be an annual burden imposed upon us, as had been the case with regard to the Intercolonial Railway; and—first let us see what the hon, member for West Durham said upon this subject:

"Now, besides this enormous expense to which I have referre I, besides this aggregate of I do not know how many millions of dollars, the interest of which, according to the old estimates, will be six millions a year, we have got to consider the running expenses. These expenses Mr. Fleming estimated, in former days, at $8,000,000 a year; but my hon. friend from Lambton estimates them at a gross sum of $6,750,000 a year for toe whole line, or $1,500,000 a year from Fort. William to the Pacific. Of course, against this sum are to be set the receipts, which will be considerable, and will, in some sections of the road, perhaps, meet the expenses; but in the early days, and for a long time, the road as a whole will, I believe, be run at a loss."

Now whatever that loss may be, it must be borne by the Syndicate. Does the hon member suppose that that can be done for less than $20,000,000? If so, upon what basis?

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. How long?

Mr. McCARTHY. Merely up to the time the contract ends—for the twenty years. I mean to say that it would be unreasonable to suppose, judging by the light of the present day, seeing that this road goes through almost a wilderness, judging by the fact that in order to sustain a railroad it takes a population of 800 people to the mile, as stated by Poor—I say that it would be unreasonable to suppose that the Company could do this work for any less. Hear what Mr. Poor says on the subject:

"The experience of the New England States demonstrates that to enable railways to be operated at a profit, a population of at least 850 to a mile of railroad is necessary in this country. The history of the railroads in the Western States also proves it. In the Western States in 1.67 there were 787 inhabitants to a mile of railroad—in 1876 there were but 427 inhabitants to a mile. The inevitable result has followed, and that result cannot be overcome in the population shall again increase to the necessary proportion."

Now, a population of 850 per mile for 2,003 miles, from Lake Superior alone, leaving out altogether the Lake Nipissing section, would make a population of 1,.50,000. So that it follows, as it appears to me, that this road must be run at a very considerable loss for the first 15 or 20 years.

The Let me show further what the operating expenses are. Union Pacific operating expenses in 1873, were $4,803; in 1879, $5,253 per mile. Central Pacific, in 1873, $6,460 per mile, and in 1879, $8,370; the Atcheson, Topeka and Santa Fe, 996 miles, $3,465; Missouri, Kansas and Texas, 808 miles, $2,037; Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul, 2,334 miles, $3,831 for the year 1873, and $2,742 for the year 1879. Averaging these figures we find that the average cost in 1873 of operating these roads was $5,031; and in 1879, $4,493. So that we have first the statement of Mr. Fleming, next the statement of the hon. member for Lambton; third, the calculation made here from the expenditure of other roads, which of course is more than the cost of operating our road will be. Nevertheless, there must be a heavy expense and considerable loss.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. What about the Pembina Branch?

Mr. McCARTHY. The Pembina Brauch is one of the entrances into the territory, and is therefore no criterion of the entrances into the territory, and is therefore no criterion of the will go into that country. At present there is practically the cost of running this road from the Rocky Mountains to Winnipeg. Taking ten years for operating the whole line from 1090, and five years for operating the prairie section and the portion to Lake Superior, 1,500 miles, i do not think it is unfair to assume that there cannot possibly be less loss than $2,000,000. Add $20,000,000 to the figures I have already mentioned, and we have the cost of the work that is to be done by the Syndicate, within a fraction of $.0,000,000. Now, if we are getting value for that $90,000,000, if this Syndicate are going to take the work off our hands, if we are going to have the road constructed at once through our power termitory, it close appears structed at once through our own territory, it does appear to me that we are bound to support the proposition and to ratify the contract. What are we giving? I have gone through their side of the account; now, what are we giving them? We are giving them, in the first place, the portions of the road we are going to build. But no person will pretend that those the parts of the road are a valuable asset. No matter what they have cost us, the road from Lake Superior to Selkirk, or the portion that we are to build in British Columbia, are not an asset, and not a work that any person would be willing to undertake and be bound to run. It would be a very considerable liability, and therefore I do not propose to charge them with Then there are $25,000,000 in hard money, and in addition to that freedom from Customs duties. On this point I by no means admit that the calculation made on the opposite side of the House is correct. It has been stated that this exemption would amount to $1,000,000. That depends upon whether a duty will be imposed on steel rails. But I will admit, for the sake of argument, that the exemption will be worth $1,000,000. Take this sum and the $25,000,000 in cash from the $90,000,000 and we have still $64,090,000 to the good which this Company has to account for. Then what do we give for the $64,000,000? We give them 25,000,000 acres of land. What is that land worth? The land is worth no more to-day intrinsically than it was seven or eight years ago. The soil is there; we know the land to be good; we know it to be, perhaps, in certain places, superior to the land in any other part of the civilized world. I do not propose to discuss here whether this contract is better than the contract made with Sir Hugh Allan, or whether it is better or worse than that which was proposed under the Act of 1874. I do not think the people of this country will care whether this is a better or a worse contract. What they want to know is whether this is a contract which it is the interest of the people to accept, and I am prepared to argue it upon that basis. From the value of these 25.000,000 acres of land we have first to deduct the expenses of administering it. Assuming that the land is worth the Government price—$3.18 an acre—the entire quantity would be worth $79,500,000. Now, what can the expense of administering it be fairly placed at? My hon. friend from Halton stated the other evening that, in his judgment, the expenses would be about $1 an acre. I have taken from Mr. Poor's Manual the cost of administering the lands belonging to the Atcheson, Topeka and Santa Fe Railway, and I find there that according to the returns brought down that railway had sold 1,105,628 acres, from which they had realized $3,053,088, or $2.75 an acre. Their expenses in administering that land amounted to $757,334, or 87 cents an acre. That being a practical illustration of the cost, and not a mere theory or opinion, I will assume it to be correct, and what does that give us as a result? It gives us as the cost of administering the lands to be sold for $79,500,000, $21,750,000, so that there is a balance left the Syndicate of $57,750,000. Now, when is that to be realized? The land may be worth $3.18 an acre, but it is not worth that to any landed proprietor to day; it will take years and years to dispose of it. A great deal will depend upon the population which will go into that country. At present there is practically people will go into it within the next ten years, and what have the Company to compete with during that time? They have to compete with the railway companies which have still lands to sell in the adjoining States. Poor's Manual shows that there are still lands held in the single State of Minnesota, by railway companies, apart from lands still owned by the Government, to the extent of over 14,000,000 of acres. The Hastings and Dakota Railway hold 27,078 acres, the Northern Pacific 7,891,119 acres, the St. Paul and Duluth 1,661,053 acres; the St. Paul and Pacific, one branch, 668,496 acres, another branch 320,555 acres, and another branch 1,825,051 acres; the St. Paul and Sioux Central 620,479 acres, the St. Paul, Stillwater and Taylor's Falls 44,246 acres, the Sioux City and St. Paul 149,816 acres, the Southern Minnesota 143,887, and the Stillwater and St. Paul 53.676, making a total of 13,406,444 acres. Besides, there are vast quantities of land held by other railway companies, as well as by the Government of the United States. The Government will hold acre for acre of lands, alongside of those of the Company, and no man will go and pay $3.18 an acre to the Company while he can get Government lands for nothing. The Syndicate must therefore look for payment for their lands from the immigrants whom they bring into the country. So that from the value of $3.18 per acre you are bound to deduct, if you deal fairly with the Syndicate, a very considerable sum for interest, from that nominal value of the lands which cannot be realized for years to come. Well, how soon will this be saleable, according to the information we

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. The First Minister stated that we shall have half a million there in ten years.

Mr. McCARTHY. The First Minister made that statement, but the hon. gentleman did not believe him. Instead of there being half a million, I think it will take ten years to get a quarter of a million there. In the State of Kansas, of which we have heard so much, where the population increased so rapidly, the population increased from 107,000 in 1860 to 257,000 in 1870. In Minnesota the population increased from 172,000 in 1860 to 439,000 in 1870. Take any State you like, deduct the natural increase of population there and it can be demonstrated beyond the possibility ef a doubt that the increase has never exceeded, with all their means of inducing emigrants to come in, with all the large eastern population pouring westward as directed by Horace Greeley, has not exceeded 250,000 in ten years. Looking at all this, I want to know how the Syndicate are going to sell their lands with such amazing rapidity and get such an enormous sum of money for them. Even if they could turn the lands into money to-day or within a reasonable time to meet the interest on the bonds, they would have, according to my calculation, but $57,000,000 to meet $64,000,000. As a simple question whether it is right and judicious on business principles, for the Government to make this contract with the Syndicate, it appears to me they are making a bargain which the people when they come to understand it will endorse. There are, it is said, other objections to this contract which ought to prevent an independent Parliament like this sanctioning it. I do not pretend, nor can any hon. member pretend that this contract is exactly what we would desire it to be. There are two sides to this as to every other bargain. If my figures are right, and I have assumed the value of the land at the rate stated by hon. gentlemen opposite, it is one we ought to accept. It is said in the first place the road-way, stock, and equipment are to be free of taxation. That is a great concession, I will admit; but the question arises, if we make them pay taxes, will we not have to increase our subsidy? What hesitation in saying that I think this contract ought to be would the taxes amount to? The member for South Ontario accepted. For these reasons I have no hesitation in saying— Mr. McCarthy.

can say is, we cannot have our bread and eat it; we cannot say to this Syndicate: Build this road and take these lands, and we propose to take the lands from you acre by acre, and mile by mile, in the shape of taxation, while making you carry out your contract in full. The Syndicate would naturally say: "If you insist on taxing our lands and our road-bed, give us a larger bonus." The people of the older Provinces have already paid sufficient for their part. What is the exemption so far as the land is concerned? For many years the Company will not be entitled to the land, and it would not in any case be subject to taxation until the new Provinces were created. As to the road-bed, the pioneers of the older Provinces had to carry sacks on their backs for miles to mills and other places in order to get bread for their families. They had no road except a mere path through the wilderness. In time, as the country became settled, roads were built by the settlers, who had no railroad at their doors; in sone of the counties they taxed themselves for gravel-roads, and pay large taxes to this day. Is it to be supposed that those men, if settled in the North-West, would grudge the taxes that would have been exacted from the road-bed or rolling stock of a railroad, the cost of which was borne by the people of the older Provinces. I want to know, judging by our past experience and by the experience of the older Provinces, whether there has been any place within our recollection or knowledge where they wanted a new road within ten years after the first was constructed. I do not know one such case in Ontario, with which I am more particularly acquainted. The alleged monopoly has been denounced to the people; we are taunted with sanctioning it, and a hue and cry has been raised about it; but I believe the people are a practical people, and when the matter is explained to them that this monopoly, although in theory it is one, yet in practice can hardly be said to exist.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Then why was it inserted?

Mr. McCARTHY. It was inserted for a good reason. I recollect the hon, member for Westmoreland (Sir A. J. Smith) either advocating or sanctioning in the Railway Committee room, about two years ago, that no charters should be granted to any rival railway to our Canadian Pacific. I heard the hon. member for Lambton—I do not mean when leading the House or as a member of the Government, but since the new Government came in—suggest to the Minister of Railways the Session before last, in the Railway Committee room, that it ought to be the policy of the Government not to grant any charter to new railways coming iuto competition with the Pacific line. I say the Syndicate have a right, as business men undertaking the construction of 2,000 miles of railroad and agreeing to operate 2,600 miles, to contend that it was only reasonable that they should be protected against the possibility of competition on any paying section that there might possibly be. But it was said, why has the Syndicate power to carry a line to the United States? The answer is plain. This power is not given to other companies because they might build a railroad and turn the traffic away that fairly and honestly belongs to the Canadian Pacific Railway. If the Syndicate build a road to the boundary, tapping the railways of the American Union and connecting with our system, that will be done with the object of turning the trade from American channels and carrying it over the Canadian Pacific road; so the reason for allowing them to approach the boundary and denying it to other companies which would, practically, be for not more than ten or twelve years, is therefore manifest. For these reasons I have no hesitation in saying that I think this contract ought to be (Mr. Glen) estimates the taxation from which this con- although when I first read the contract I was disappointed tract exempted the Syndicate at a fabulous amount. All I with the terms; and until I considered the matter, investigated the subject and looked at the cost of other roads-being led away without knowing much of the subject, with the idea that the railway could be built for $10,000 per mile on the prairie, forgetting the necessity of equipment and losing sight for the moment of the loss entailed by the running of the road for fifteen or twenty years-losing sight of those costs with which the Syndicate are charged, forgetting that the land was not available to-day, to-morrow, or within the next ten or fifteen years-forgetting also the fact that out of the money realized for the land a considerable sum must be deducted for cost of administration, and carried away, perhaps, by the same feeling which has existed in the minds of hon, members as to the vast wealth of the North West-I did feel at first that the contract was not one that ought to be sanctioned; but when I came to investigate it calmly, to look into the authorities and obtain information, my mind changed, and I came to the conclusion which I hesitate not to announce that the contract is one which, in the interest of the country, Parliament ought to ratify. We have been told that there is a new and a rival offer, and if the contract is good the offer is better and should be accepted. I am free to admit, as the hon. member for South Wentworth (Mr. Rymal) told the House, that every hon. member who will endorse this contract, knowing the offer is on the Table, does so with the responsibility that he has to account to his constituents for not accepting the lower tender. $3,000,000 is no light sum to the people, and 3,000,000 acres of land should not be thrown away; but I am prepared to take the responsibility of stating for the reasons I am about to give that the offer should not be accepted. We all know that the lowest tender is not always accepted, that no man calls for tenders without intimating that he will not be bound to accept the lowest tender, except otherwise satisfactory. In this second offer, we have the names of many respectable men, some of large means, some of no means at all, and some with perhaps a fair amount of capital. We see men some of whom perhaps, are rich men—only one or two at all events, are railroad men who have not been conspicuous for their enterprise, and who have been very careful to look after their money, and have not, in other transactions and enterprises in their own particular parts of the country, done much to advance other than their own interest. We see them do what? Without making any inquiries, without coming to the Government and consulting engineers, examining profiles, or doing what any ordinary business men would do, in order to ascertain whether they could make money out of the contract, they come in a moment of political excitement, and under the feelings of political partnership, make an offer to the Government, and ask it to invite the House to accept it. These men are led on by whom? Mr. Herman Cook boasts that he is the author of the second Syndicate. He and Col. Walker were the main instruments in getting it up. Are the McMasters and the Howlands generally led by the Cooks and Walkers? Can anyone point to any transaction in which they were led by the nose by men such as the gentlemen I have named, and, as regards one of whom, at all events, it can safely be said that he is not a capitalist

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Colonel Walker was a member of the Allan Company.

Mr. McCARTHY. If we say to the Government: "This offer ought to be accepted," what will be the result? They cannot build it, and they do not propose to build it for $5,000,000. They will have to float the scheme in money market, where capitalists will want to know the circumstances under which the offer was made, and why it was made without any attempt at accuracy of detail, and without calculations which would be necessary. If it be supposed for a moment that the details of the work, and that it would have been useless authorized 'the Government offer, and the gentlemen endeavored to carry it out, what would John Bull say when asked to give his money? He would want to know the story of the contract, and more particulars than satisfied hon, gentlemen opposite; he would want to know how the profits were calculated. The result of such an act would be that next Session His Excellency would come down to the House, as he did in the case of the Allan contract, and anaounce the failure of the schome. Again this disturbing element would be sent here to hamper the ordinary business of legislation and be the destruction of this Ministry and the ruin of that Government. Again would we have party warfare all turmoil in connection with the construction of the road, unless the contract entered into by the Government were ratified. It is said the second Syndicate has put up $1,000,000. Has that sum been placed in the hands of the Receiver General? They took care not to do so. The most they have done is to endorse each other's notes. In fact, I happened to see a member of the second Syndicate go into one of the banks with almost as many bill stamps as he could carry. I have not the slightest doubt that the Inland Revenue Department will realize a considerable benefit from this one and a half millions which have been discounted. But is that sufficient to warrant us in going on? We know that in regard to the contract of 1072 Sir Hugh Allan was much better known than any other merchant in this Dominion, across the water; he was a man of great wealth and great enterprise, yet though he went across the Atlantic, though his million of dollars was in the hands of the Government, he could not float his scheme. say therefore that in justice to ourselves we could not accept this second offer because it could not be carried out.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesox). What guarantee does your Syndicate give that they would carry out their offer?

Mr. McCARTHY. Does the hon, gentleman suppose-because if he does, I know his leader will not agree with himthat the Syndicate will not carry out the terms—that they are not able to go on with this scheme? The very fact that three months were taken up in making this contract shows that their offer was made in good faith. The hon, member for South Wentworth (Mr. Rymal) said he could not blame the Syndicate; that they were not men who would risk millions of money. To say nothing of their character as business men shows that we have every reason to believe that they entered upon the contract in good faith. Are we to permit thes gentlemen to say that, after the Government went to England, after it was known that the Government were anxious to build the railroad by a company, after it was advertised that they wanted offers from the bankers and capitalists of Europe to undertake the construction of the road -and no offer was made-and after the contract under such circumstances was entered into-are we to say that, after all this, because a Canadian company come forward and offered to accept the building of the road for a less sum, the gentlemen who had made the first agreement were to be dismissed with contempt?

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. It shows the importance of advertising for tenders.

Mr. McCARTHY. Does the hon, gentleman forget that the Government of which he was a member did advertise for tenders?

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. These are new conditions.

Mr. McCARTHY. Does the hon. gentleman not know that not the slightest attempt at an offer was made during the time that he was in power in answer, to the call for tenders? We know that it took a long time to work the matter into its present shape, that it required weeks for these capitalists to acquaint themselves with to advertise. I think it would have been an act of dishonor for the Government to say to these men, to whom they held out inducements to enter into the contract, that on the terms of the agreement being made known they had found others who were willing to do the work on slightly better terms than those which had been agreed on, and that therefore they could not induce Parliament to ratify the contract. That is the most important question, so far as our credit in Europe is concerned. But the most important point is this: that these men having made the offer in the manner I have briefly outlined, they could not have raised the money necessary in order to perfect the scheme. Now, Sir, I have endeavored to give my reasons for taking the course which I intend to pursue. I am in favor of the construction of the road at once, so long as it can be done without adding to the burdens of the people. I believe our prosperity depends upon our having a medium of traffic, independent of the whims of the American people. I am in favor of having the road built by a company, because I think it should be built on commercial principles. I favor the endorsement of the contract by Parliament, because, as I think I have been able to show, it is in the interests of the country that the second offer should not be accepted. For the reasons I have given I shall not vote for the amendment. of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), but for the adopting and carrying out of the original resolutions.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, before addressing myself to the subject more immediately before the House, I desire to refer to a matter incidentally mentioned by me when addressing the House at an earlier period of this debate. I endeavored then to point out that our system of Government, when conducted as it should be, in accordance with the well understood wishes of the people, required, that a great measure changing the settled policy of the country, changing the constitution of the country or imposing unusual burdens upon the country, ought not to become law without popular sanction. I pointed out that this principle was recognised in dealing with the secularization of the Clergy, Reserves; that, although the country had, in 1847 and again in 1851, pronounced in favor of secularization, yet, because the Legislature had declared that the representation was inadequate, and had increased the number of representatives, it did not venture to deal with the question until after an election was had under the reformed representation. said:

"Mr. Hincks proposed to deal with the secularization of the Clergy Reserves. This, Lord Elgin—then Governor General—declined to accede to. He said you have reformed the representation of the people in Parliament. You have admitted by doing so that they were not adequately represented before. I do not think, on so important a question as the separation of Church and State, you should proceed to act upon the public expression obtained under a confessedly imperfect system of representation. In this view his advisers ultimately concurred, and another election was held."

A few days since I received a letter from Sir Francis Hincks, complaining of this statement in one particular, and which I am anxious to correct so far as he is personally concerned. Sir Francis Hincks, in one of his letters to me, says:

"There never was a difference on the subject between Lord Elgin and his advisers, and I feel strongly the imputation of having endeavoured to settle such questions as the Clergy Reserves and Seignorial Tenure in a Parliament which two-thirds of both Houses had declared to be an inadequate representation of the reopie. The uniform practice of the Imperial Parliament under similar circumstances was in accordance with the Ministerial view, and yet both Gonservatives and Grits joined to insist on legislation on the most important question of the day, by a condemned Parliament; and when they knew that the opponents of the Government demanded a settlement, were in direct antagonism as to Sir Francis expressed his anxiety to learn how I came to be, as he says, misled. I at once informed him of my authority for the statement which I made. It will be in the recollection of many gentlemen from Ontario and Quebec, Mr. McCarthy.

Government in reference to the questions referred to. Mr. Lafontaine, I believe, voted against Mr. Price's resolutions in favour of a repeal of the Imperial Act. When Mr. Baldwin retired and the Government was re-organized under Mr. Hineks, Mr. Malcolm Cameron and Dr. Rolph were taken in as representatives of the more advanced section of the Liberal party. They were pledged to a secularization of the Clergy Reserves. They were not committed to the views subsequently put forward that the Imperial Act should be repealed before the Canadian Legislature undertook to deal with the question. The measure altering the representation became law. The Legislative Assembly was somewhat abruptly dissolved and an appeal had to the country. Rolph, in addressing his constituents, defended himself from the charge of neglect of duty and bad faith, in not having dealt with the subject; and he gave as a reason, the opposi-tion of the Governor General to legislation by a Parliament that did not adequately represent the people. I had no reason to doubt the accuracy of Dr. Rolph's statement. Sir Francis Hincks, in another letter to me, savs:

"What you say of Rolph's speech and Lord Elgin's reference to 'con' sideration and discussion,' leads me to think it probable that Rolph may have argued for an immediate settlement in 1854 without a dissolution. I do not recollect that he did, but think it not improbable.''

I think it is perfectly certain from Lord Elgin's despatch that a difference of opinion did exist in the beginning amongst his advisers, upon this subject. And with the permission of the House I shall read a brief extract from Lord Elgin's despatch, June 22nd, 1854, which will make the point perfectly clear. Lord Elgin, speaking of the Provincial Government, says:

"Some members of this body were strongly pledged to the secularization of the reserves, and it was believed that a proposal to carry out a measure of this description would be supported by a majority in the existing Assembly. After full consideration and discussion, however, my Executive Council arrived unanimously at the conclusion, that apart Executive Council arrived unanimously at the conclusion, that apart altogether from the merits of secularization it would not be consistent with their duty to undertake to legislate upon this subject in the Parliament as then constituted. The Clergy Reserve question was one on which it was notorious that the public mind in Upper Canada more especially, was much divided, and the Imperial Statute on the subject had been repealed for the express purpose of facilitating a settlement which should be final, and in accordance with the deliberate views and convictions of the people of the Province. To attempt, therefore, to settle such a question in a Parliament which had been already declared by its own vote to be an imperfect representation of the people and by the exercise of what might be deemed the influence of the Government, was a course of proceeding obviously open to serious objection. In these views of the Executive Council I entirely concurred."

Before dismissing this subject, I would say that, having again looked at the political history of that time, I have no doubt that the views which I correctly attributed to Lord Elgin, were also the views of his Prime Minister, and that there was but a section of his advisers who favored legislation before dissolution. The House will see that the appositeness of the illustration is not at all affected by the question, as to whether two colleagues or three, in the beginning, differed from the Governor-General of that day, or whether the Governor-General had any strong opinion upon the question. The fact remains, that an appeal was had to the country before the Legislature would venture to deal with so important a public question upon which a majority of Parliament were agreed before an appeal was made. Having said this much in justice to a former Prime Minister of Canada, and in the interest of historic truth. I will now refer to matters more strictly pertinent to the subject in hand. The member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) quoted the following words from a speech of mine made two years ago :--

"Mr. Fleming, some years ago, estimated that the interest on the money required for the construction of the railway, and the cost of working the railway for many years would amount to $14,000,000 per year."

It will be seen that I simply quoted the words of Mr. Fleming to show the House that the cost would be very large, and that the non-productive sections ought not to that in 1851 doubts had arisen as to the sincerity of the be pushed forward with undue haste. I did not pretend to to say that Mr. Fleming's estimate was strictly accurate. I did not know whether it was or not; but the hon member for Frontenae assumes that it is all wrong. The hon, gentleman said:

actually received in excess of the cost of construction. The road may change hands a dozen times before the prairie member for Frontenae assumes that it is all wrong.

"No wonder, entertaining and giving expression to these feelings, hon. gentlemen opposite should be utterly astonished at the idea of the Government resuming possession or allowing these contractors to build the road and then hand it back to the Government so that the Government would be at the cost of running it. No wonder they should raise a howl through the country when it was suggested that was the case."

The hon, member for Frontenac is mistaken, we did not howl, nor did we indulge in beastly noises of any other kind in reference to the matter. The terms of the contract were carefully concealed from us; and if we had been disposed to express our dissent in the manner named by the hon. member—by howling—the occasion for doleful noises d'd not arise. When I asked the hon, member for his own opinion, as to the cost of running the road and the interest on the money, I find the hon. gentleman's estimate quite as astounding as that of Mr. Fleming, which was based upon the cost of a much superior road. He informs us that the cost of running the road will be $6,000,000 or $8,000,000 a year. That the Syndicate will have to pay, on borrowed money, $3,000,000 yearly. Now we know that the interest on Government expenditure will be about $3,000,000 more; so that the hon member for Frontenac finds the cost of the road about what Mr. Fleming estimated it to be, and he will hardly undertake to argue that the company are ready to sustain, out of their own pockets and the earnings of the road, an annual expenditure of $11,000,000. member again referred to the Colonization Railway Bill of the late Government, under which the Government might aid tributary roads to a limited extent. He did not accurately state its provisions. Under that Bill, east of the 102nd meridian, aid not exceeding 6,400 acres a mile could be granted with the approval of the House of Commons, and west of that meridian the maximum area was 7.680 acres a mile. Under the proposed scheme for building a road of the same character upon the prairies, the Government give 12,500 acres, and $10,000 per mile. According to our proposal, the same amount of land and money that is given for 900 miles of the central section, would build, 2,365 miles of railway. The hon, member says, that he wishes us to remember that branch lines will be built without any further subsidy or land grant. We say he does not know that. If branch lines are to be built out of this contribution, why was it not provided that they should be so built? Why give enough subsidy to 900 miles of railway to build nearly 2,400 miles? Why not make the subsidy correspond with the contemplated improvement? What farmer, who has lands to drain, will say to the person to whom he lets the contract of making a principal drain, "I will pay you four times what the drain is worth, and then you will have money enough to make any number of tributary drains." Do you think any one would act in so foolish a manner? It is said "O! but this case is different, these men have a special interest in building these roads." I don't think so. They have a special interest in selling out to some one else at a large profit. They can do so. You pay them nearly four times what the prairie section is worth. Suppose when Parliament rises, they say to the new Syndicate: You have offered to build this easy section for 2,500 acres of land and $1,666 less per mile than we have contracted for. This road can be built at from $10,000 to $13,000 a mile. What will you give us for our charter? Is there anything to prevent a sale? Is there anything to prevent these St. Paul gentlemen putting a large sum in their peckets, and leaving the work to be carried forward by men who have barely enough to build the road? What security has the country that this will not be done? All that the Government retain, as security, under this contract, is a more bagatelle when compared with the amount road may change hands a dozen times before the prairie section is completed, and not one dollar of what is given in excess, which some day is to be used in building branch roads, and which others say is to be used in paying losses, in working the ends, may remain with the Company at the end of three years. The whole may be absorbed by those who sell out to others who succeed them. I press this point upon the consideration of the House, and I tell gentlemen upon the Treasury benches, unless they prevent the transfer of interests in this undertaking, they are simply giving away the public revenues and the public lands without, in any way, strengthing the hands of those who who may ultimately undertake the construction of the railway. The member for Frontenac says, that we, last year, said the lands were bad. I don't think the hon, member will find any such statement. There may have been a difference of opinion as to the area of the fertile belt. I dare say there is a difference of opinion still. I don't know, and I am inclined to think my means of information has been quite as good as the means possessed by the hon. member. The hon. member last year, voted that these lands were worth $3.18 an acre. This year he says they are worth but $1.00: why this change? Has the hon, member had new light since last year? Has he discovered that he was mistaken? Is he now prepared to say that the quality of the land which he voted to be first class last year, has fallen into the third class this year? He says that we, this session, praised the country that last year we discredited it. This statement is wholly unwarrantable. We pointed out that good as the country might be, it was blighted by a vicious administration of its affairs which drove away the settlers. We said that five or six months winter was a drawback; that many would prefer a climate where the winters were less severe; and that the Government ought not to add other impediments to this one. We have postal guides and immigration pamphlets published at the expense of the Government, pointing to other fields of immigration than those of the Dominion, and until the followers of the ministry censure the cosmopolitan policy of their leaders, they are in no position to scrutinize what may have been said on this side of the House. The member for Cornwall says that the Sault line will promote annexation to the United States, because it will send immigration and traffic through American territory. The hon, member has peculiar notions. The effect of building the Sault line would be to bring the trade of the Western States and territories down the valley of the Ottawa. And if the trade of the American territory north of St. Paul would go eastward by the Sault, surely the trade of our territories to the north would not take a more southern route. But how is it now? We have no communication except through the United States. Is annexation being promoted? Are the people growing disloyal? Is the North-West less Canadian in feeling and sentiment than the provinces more remote from the United States? The Sault line gives us direct communication with the North West seven years sooner than it can be obtained by the North Shore route. If there is danger of political contamination at all, is there no danger in seven years delay? We know that in the summer season the immigration will be by Thunder Bay and not along the south shore of Lake Superior. But if there is danger it must be perpetual so tar as Ontario is concerned. By far the largest immigration to Manitoba and the North-West has been from Ontario. The south-western Peninsula must always carry on its traffic with the North-West through the United States. Its geographical position necessitates this. The south-western Peninsula, according to the hon. gentleman's theory, ought long since to have been ripe for annexation, and yet public sentiment has not set in violently in that direction. The hon, gentleman says we have hostile neighbors. I den't think so. The people of the United States have for a quarter of a century been among our best customers. It is unwise, ungenerous observations, such as those of the hon. gentleman, which have tended to keep up a feeling of antagonism between the two countries, unworthy of either, and detrimental to the commerce of both. The patriotism of the hon. gentleman, which views all the rest of the world as our natural enemies, is the patriotism which belongs to barbarous and not to an enlightened age. It is only after tribes of men discover that they have common interests, that they cease to regard each other as enemies, and become one people. It is one of the merits of free trade that it has proved itself an enemy of the mercantile theory and of the apirit it engendered, and put an end to that system of warfare which the mercantile theory kept alive. It has been well said by Sir James Macintosh that:

"One nation has the same interest in the welfare of other nations, that a tradesman has in the prosperity of his customers. Not an acre of land brought into cultivation on the banks of the Mississippi, or in the wilds of Siberia which has not widened the market of English industry. It is nourished by the prosperity of the world, and it amply repays for all the benefits it receives. It can only be used in spreading civilization and enjoyment over the earth. If the blind and barbarous project of destroying English commerce, could succeed, it would have no other effect than that of ruining the countries, who, blindly and barbarously attribute their poverty to English wealth."

I would commend these words to the careful consideration of the hon, member for Cornwall. The First Minister told us that in the failure to adopt Sir Hugh Allan's contract nine precious years had been lost to the country. Sir, we all know how Sir Hugh Allan failed. He failed not only because the railway was to be constructed through a country wholly uninhabited and within a period which must have entailed enormous losses upon the proprietors of the road, but because the contract was tainted in his hands by his own misconduct and still more by the high crimes and misdemeanors of the Government. But I deny that the country has sustained any loss up to this hour by the failure of Sir Hugh Allan. I deny that the settlement of the North-West has been in any degree retarded by that event. The progress of the work under Government has been, at least as great as it could have been under Sir Hugh Allan's Company. I do not stand alone in this opinion. Let me read for the benefit of the First Minister the opinion of his colleague, the Minister of Railways. In the Session of 1879 the Minister of Railways said:

"I have no hesitation in saying that the work I have referred to, as involving an expenditure of over $28,000,000 of public money, has largely contributed to remove the difficulties and promote the progress of the entire undertaking. I believe, that as we originally looked to the development of the great North-West as the only basis upon which any government or company could undertake the construction of the Canadian Pacific railway, so we cannot but regard the expenditure of $18,000,000 of public money in permeating that difficult, almost inaccessible district of country between Lake Superior and the Red River, as money expended in a way that it is most likely to so develop, so improve, and so people the great fertile country of the North-West as to give us a substantial basis upon which we may hope to succeed in permeating the still more difficult and extensive region from the Rocky Mountains down to the shore of the Pacific. And although this expenditure of public money has not been made within the Province of British Columbia, I am free to say that that expenditure, in my judgment, has been made in a way much better calculated to secure the actual realization of this work than if every dollar had been expended in British Columbia, commencing at the shores of the Pacific, because no expenditure in British Columbia could materially contribute to the opening up of that great North-West region upon the development, and upon the peopling—of which must necessarily depend the successful prosecution of such a work as this. There has been a great advantages in the construction of such a work as this. There has been a great advantages in the construction of such a work as this. There has been a great advance made within the past five years: not only have we accomplished an important work in providing for an early, rapid, and easy communication through our own country, from the shores of Lake Superior to the Red River, but we have acquired information with reference to the North-West territories which is invaluable in

I think this extract from the speech of the Minister of Railways is a sufficient answer to the observations made by the First Minister, with so much-affected sadness, as to the nine years—the nine precious years lost to the nation. The Mr. Mills.

House has now two propositions before it. It is free to choose between them. It is not bound to take either. It may reject both. This contract, unauthorized by law, unsanctioned by Parliament, has no more force than if it had been signed by the most obscure person in the country. It is no more binding upon the House than the offer made by Sir William Howland and his associates. We are called here by the Crown to consider what we shall do with it. I trust we shall not fail to act in the public interest. I need not argue in favor of the proposition that this House is wholly unpledged to any particular line of action, by any thing which the Government may have done. The negotiations between the Government and any private company are far less important than negotiations resulting in a proposed treaty between two independent States. There are considerations arising when a treaty is to be confirmed or set aside which have no place in a negotiation of this kind. Well, do States, when treaties are made which they think not in their interests to confirm, feel themselves bound to ratify them? I will refer to two or three instances by way of illustration. During the Crimean War a conference of the great powers was held at Vienna; Lord John Russell, then Colonial Secretary, attended as a representative of Her Majesty, and Druen de L'Huys as the representative of the French Emperor. The treaty was not satisfactory to the Government of either; public opinion had pronounced against it in England, and it was not ratified. In 1868 negotiations were carried on between Lord Stanley, now Earl Derby, and Mr. Reverdy Johnson, the American Minister at St. James. A treaty was signed for the settlement of all difficulties growing out of the American War. After it had been signed, exceptions were taken to certain of its provisions by Lord Stanley's colleagues, and it was amended; exception was also taken by the President and the Secretary of State, and changes were accordingly made. The objections of the Senate were anticipated, and further changes were made. this did not prevent the Senate of the United frominto a full consideration entering of the provisions of that treaty, and refusing to give it their sanction. Then we have the case referred to by the leader of the liberal party, the case of the boundary award; a case where the action of the Government clearly fell within the ordinary duties of administration; and although a former Parliament had approved of the action of the Government, the First Minister, disregarding that approval and repudiating, as he has done, the principle of continuity in government, has dealt with the question as one in which the action of Parliament is wholly unrestrained by what has already transpired. In all these cases the obligations upon those who have been called upon to consider the question, to follow in the lead of what has already been done, is infinitely stronger than in the case now under consideration. The hon. Minister of Finance admits that this House is free to confirm or reject. The hon. Minister admits that the prior negociations and the prior understanding between the Government and the Syndicate, ought to have no influence upon the conduct of this House. We have to look at this paper as if the signature of the Minister was not there. It is not a contract made under the law, it is a contract made outside the law. It has no vitality or force beyond what the sanction of Parliament may give it. It is to us a simple proposition; it is nothing more. It is of no higher character in point of law than the offer made by Sir William Howland and his associate. These two propositions are before us as propositions, and nothing more; and if all the Ministers had signed the one it would have given it no superior claim to our consideration. Both are proposals which involve a tax upon the country; both are proposals asking for large subsidies from the public treasury and from the public domain; they come within the most ancient functions of the People's for this purpose delegates of the people—would be botraying over trust if we allowed durselves to be turned aside by any consideration from disposing of the matter in hand upon its darge difference in favor of the second proposition. There is a difference to the public Treasury of the Dominion. I know that hon. gentlemen opposite have undertaken to make out that the amount of duty remitted is much less than the amount which I have stated. But how do they do so? By suspending the provisions of an Act which they themselves have put upon the Statute Book, and by underestimating the amount to be derived under that part of the law which is at this moment operative. We have some hon, gentlemen tiesmating the operative provisions as affording a duty of less than $100,000. You have in sight of the Buildings a small bridge upon which one fourth of this rum was paid to the Government, and Lunderstand that the Customs Department claims several thousand dollars more. It is folly then to hope to mislead the public by any such representations. Then we have the ordinary tax capitalized which according to the average rates of railway taxation, will represent at least five millions more, and we have the extra charge on freights for twenty years, which at the present Minnesota rates will represent a sum, the present worth of which, will be $25,000,000 more. So that the difference to the Country between the two offers, is at least $44,000,000. Now I ask the members of this House: Are you prepared to pay $14,000,000 from the Treasury and resources of Canada, and impose a burden of thirty millions of dollars upon the industry of a population of the North-West beyond what the offers before you render necessary? Why do you do it? It is vain to say that the second offer is not genuine, is a bogus offer, is a political trick. You know—the whole country knows,—that it is a genuine offer, an offer made in good faith, and backed up by a deposit into the hands of the Government of $1,400,000. The supporters of the Ministry know this is true. Let them summon Sir William Howland, or Mr. Gibson, or Mr. Hendrie, or Mr. Proctor, or all of them, and ask them whether they are not ready to proceed with the undertaking. Then I ask what is this extra sum to be paid for? Is it to save the Gevirement? Are you prepared to impose a charge of $14,000,000 upon the country and $30,000,000 upon the tature inhabitants of the North-West Territories, to save the Government from defeat? Is this the price that you put upon ministers? When ministers have grossly blunddered, is this the sum that you are ready to make the country pay to protect them from its consequences? If you are determined to protect the Government at all hazards why not open neg. tiation with Stephen and company, and see how much they will take and retire? Ask their price and see how much you can save by paying for the release of your leaders. The First Minister informed us that a great deal too much was asked for building the Central Section. The new Syndicate ask, in cash, $7,333, and in lands, 10,000 acres; a mile worth $31,800; making $39,133 a mile. Now, as the cost of the road over the prairie is but $13,000 a mile, this would be $26,133 in excess of the expenditure, a very large sum, no doubt; but when we look at the proposition that the Government are arging upon the House, we find that they propose to pay in cash $9,000, and in lands 12,500 acres a mile, being $39,750 more, making a total of $4°,750, or an excess of $35,750. rotting in their graves. I wish to leave to future Parliaments Now, what reason did the First Minister give for accepting the freedom to judge of what is best in their own times, and the more burdensome and rejecting the less burdensome the power to provide for what is best. The right hon, gentle-offer? He says that three times the value of the road was too much to give, but four times its value is not too much. He says the second Syndicate will only build the central section. And why does he say this? Because they have made three propositions to the Government, any one of which they are ready to enter into a contract to carry out. What evidence does the First Minister adduce to show that they intend to build only the prairie section should they contract to build the whole of that which the Government propose to let to a Company? Simply this, that they have asked more to build the prairie section than it is worth. Did it never occur to the First Minister that if the one Syndicate would shandon the construction of the ends, because they receive $26,000 a mile too much for the prairie section, the other, which he proposes to overpay by nearly $36,000, would have a still greater reason for following the same course. But the First Minister answers, "O, but I remain in power to enforce the first offer, and I'd resign if the House accepts an offer $44,000,000 better. If the First Minister should resign, and my hon. friend from West Durham were called upon to form a Government, he could not conduct the business of the country with this House. He would be obliged to go to the country. If the First Minister and his friends are as strong as they profess to be in the country, the appeal would be made to no purpose. The right hon, gentleman would be again recalled to power, and the second Syndicate would be still under his control. But is it not apparent that the first minister does not believe he has the country with him? Ministers ought not to wait for a vote upon this measure. They ought to admit that their negociations were a mistake. They should either abandon the contract or release their friends from any obligation to support them. We have hoard a great deal about patriotism in this discussion, but, I ask this House, could anything be more unpatriotic than the demand of the Government to be upheld at cost of $44,000,000 to the country? Let me ask the consideration of the House for a moment, to the First Ministers objection to the new offer. He says three times too much is asked for the central section. He proposes a sum four times too great, and what is his defence for this excess? Why, that there will be a loss on the extremities of the road which he invists on having built. Did he tell the House why this extra sum was not credited to the ends? Why are $31,000,000 in excess of the actual cost of these nine hundred miles handed over to the company? Why is it not secured by the Government in some way, in order that it may be made available for the purpose? Why is it not credited to the sections entailing the burden? Is it because that this House dare not vote to go on with the construction of the ends if their actual cost was known to the country? Is it for the purpose of concealing the ruinous folly of building the ends at the present time? Is it because you anticipate defeat and you propose to compel your successors to choose between the whole line and this exorbitant sum for the prairie section? The contract, if sanctioned, will be a scandal and a disgrace to this Parliament. The First Minister seems resolved on making Parliamentary Government unpopular in this country. A course more unconstitutional could not well be taken. Our bounden duty, under a system of Parliamentary Government, is to legislate for the present, but in legislating for the present to legislate in accordance with the principles of natural justice. We should allow the future to judge of its own necessities and provide for its own wants. What right has the Government to make contracts in reference to works not even to be begun until after the term of the present Parliament has expired? Against such a course I enter my most earnest protest. I do not wish myself to be bound by legislators patriotism and public virtue will die with him, and he insists upon looking after the interests of those whom he can never meet in this world, who will not have arrived here until after he has left it. I agree with Sidney Smith that those who moulder in the church yards ought not to rule those who are sitting in the pews. The right hon, gentleman is now captain of the ship. He can sail east or west. He can determine its course for the time being. In my opinion he is not likely to remain in command very long and he may leave to his successor as much good advice as he pleases, but he ought not to undertake to scuttle the ship simply because he cannot continue master. The right hon. gentleman has suddenly discovered that monopoly is a good thing. Three years ago he entertained a very different opinion. Now he is afraid of the traffic being drained to the southward. Then be thought the southward draining was inadequate. If there is proper railway construction there can be no fear of the road being depleted. If the necessary facilities are afforded, the traffic of every section will take the shortest and cheapest line to the place of consumption, and it is to the interest of the country that it should. The right, hon, gentleman is afraid that if the North Shore line is not protected by a desolated and depopulated band along the boundary, fifteen miles in width, the North Shore line will have nothing to do. If it requires $30,000,000 in addition to the cost of construction to provide for the expenses of operating it, it had better be closed after it is built-a better use can be made of the money than to waste it upon the losses anticipated upon this railway. We are told that there are minerals in those regions. It may be so, but when they are discovered and their value ascertained a railway may then be undertaken by those who believe in its wisdom. I have already pointed out that so far as the immigration from Ontario is concerned lying west of the Ottawa district, it will go to the North-West by existing American lines, or by Mr. Beatty's steamers. The Sault line if built would furnish a summer line through Canada by the way of Thunder Bay. In the winter time there will be very little traffic or travel by any line, and a northern line if built would scarcely be used. I believe the country is heartily sick of political railways. The Intercolonial was built on the principle of gush, and it has already cost the country upwards of $45,000,000. The Great Western and the Canada Southern are American roads on Canadian Territory, and if the Sault connection were made the railways of Upper Michigan though built at the expense of American capitalists, would in a great measure become Canadian roads upon American territory. The Minister of Railways, two years ago, paid an excessive price for the Rivière du Loup road upon condition that the money should be spent in building a railway in western Michigan. Why did he do this? Was it not to draw American traffic over the Grand Trunk line, and now he opposes a proposal to expend money in Canadian territory to secure ten times the amount of traffic and to prevent a waste of $36,000,000 of money. The member for Cornwall says, that to say the British Columbia section could be built without an increase of taxation is a fraud upon the country. If so, it is a fraud in which his new friends concurred. The First Minister says we cannot postpone the British Columbia section without disgrace. He has not always been of this opinion. The hon, gentleman did not so vote in 1876. He did not then so speak. He has forgotten the language which he held toward his present colleague at that time. The right hon, gentleman tells us it was a part of the Imperial policy to build the British Columbia section. Let me say to him, Imperial policy should have Imperial support. Imperial policy is not entrusted to this Dominion. It rests with the Parliament at Westminster, and is to be upheld by burdens imposed upon those by whom the Commons of that Parliament is elected. its members? Nothing of the sort; it is the money which Our policy should be national, not Imperial. The modern they are to receive from the Government, and the large Mr. MILLS.

rule is that the power belongs to those upon whom the burden falls. Two years ago the hon, gentleman was of this opinion. Eight years after the union with British Columbia, he set out on a mission to England to make the Pacific Railway matter of Imperial concern. The report of that mission has never been laid on the Table of Parliament. But we have heard nothing of Imperial until now, when policy from that period is dragged out as one of the rusty implements of warfare, from the armoury of the First Minister, to be used in this his hour of need. Several hon, gentlemen have alluded to the Carnarvon terms, as if some new obligation was imposed by them upon the country. The Carnarvon terms were subject to the condition expressed in the Act of 1874, that no expenditure on account of the Pacific Railway beyond the amount warranted by the taxation of 1871 was required to be made. And this was expressed in the resolutions communicated to Lord Carnaryon. Let me here read one of those resolutions, which establishes this point explicitly:

"The minute of Council of September 17th, contained a statement of reasons showing why some of these modifications should not be pressed, reasons showing why some of these modifications should not be pressed, but the Government, actuated by an anxious desire to remove all difficulties, expressed a willingness to make these further concessions, rather than forego an immediate settlement of so irritating a question as the concessions suggested might be made without involving a violation of the provided of the provide spirit of any parliamentary resolution or the letter of any enactment.' These words, Sir, show beyond all room for cavilling or doubt that the Carnaryon terms were to be subordinated to the resolution and to the law relating to non-increase of taxation. The First Minister in his speech at Bath said that no additional burdens were to be imposed upon the country, and yet he now intimates that what he then said was a sufficient notice to all parties that the Government were ready to receive tenders. The obligations of the Government reached, it was supposed, $30,000,000 in railway construction. The natural inference was that there would be no money subsidy—that the railway already constructed, or in the course of construction, would be handed over as so much cash; and that the remaining subsidy would be in lands only. What are the facts disclosed by this contract? The general burdens will be increased by $40,000,000 and the special burdens on the North-West will reach $00,000,000. The First Minister compares his speech at Bath with the manifesto of Mr. Mackenzie of 1874. There was no analogy between them. The member for Lambton was appealing to the country. It was a statement of public policy, upon which the public judgment was sought. It was acted upon by Parliament and by Ministers. The statement of the Premier at Bath was a vague and imperfect statement of facts still undisclosed, a statement which, if we are to judge by what subsequently happened, was calculated to mislead the capitalists of this country. One hon, member, the member for Victoria, Ont., informed us that the new Syndicate had not the credit to undertake the construction of the He then told us that they would build only the middle section of the road; that the Government would have to resign if the new Syndicate were supported by the House, and that the member for West Durham would become First Minister; if we on this side are so unpopular with the country as the hon gentleman says we are it would only be a few months until the First Minister and his friends returned again to power, and the small sum so spent would be well invested if the country saved $40,000,000 by the transaction. But let me notice further the statement as to the want of credit of the new Syndicate. What foundation is there for such a suggestion? They have already placed in the hands of the Government $1,400,000 as an evidence of their good faith. What is to give either Syndicate credit in the money market? Is it the great personal fortunes of area of Territory. To say then that the new Syndicate has not the necessary experience or credit, is not the fact. There experience is at least equal to their rivals. The credit of each for this purpose is mainly what the Government subsidy makes it. An attempt has been made to discredit the new Syndicate because they have submitted to the Government a series of propositions. Did you ask for a definite proposition? Where is your advertisement? What had these gentlemen to guide them? Nothing but the discussion which took place in this House. For what are they maligned and misrepresented? Is it not because they gave to this House a choice in the matter? I do not complain that the Government have a policy upon the question, but I deny that Parliament is tied up to saying yes or no to the Government proposition. This House is above Ministers. If it is true to itself and to the people, it will not occupy its time in hounding capitalists, and men of wealth, belonging to this country, and who assist in upholding its prosperity, because without knowing the views of Parliament and refusing to anticipate its conclusions, they have submitted various propositions in conformity with the views which have been here expressed. There are not the less four propositions, because they are all embraced in one communication. They have offered to build the central and eastern sections and work the whole line. That is one offer. It is as distinct as if no other had been mentioned. They propose to do this for $22,000,000 and 22,000,000 acros of land. They ask no exemptions from duties, which is $1,500,000 paid in Customs duties. They ask for no restrictions upon railway construction. They ask for no exemption from taxation. They ask for no restriction upon the authority to regulate the tolls. They agree to a power of resumption. And they deposit security with the Government as a guarantee of their readiness to enter into a contract. Now I do not hesitate to say that these men are making this proposition in good faith. I say more, There is not a member on that side of the House who doubts it. The country will not doubt it, and no statement made to cast discredit on these gentlemen will prevent the public coming to the conclusion that these attacks are made to uphold the criminal folly of the Government who, contrary to law and contrary to the public interests, made a secret contract with the gentlemen of the first Syndicate. I do not say that Parliament should accept this second offer. I believe that by advertising a better offer could be had, but if either is to be accepted, it certainly should be the second. The hon. member for Halton asks, why recite this offer and the proposed contract if it is not intended to be accepted. The reason, Sir, is very obvious. The second offer being a better one is a reason for rejecting the first. That being done the House is free to say whe ther the second one ought to be accepted without an effort to do better. The hon. member said we ought not to ask the Government to do what we would not ourselves do were we in their places. The hon, member is confusing the action of the Ministers with the action of their supporters. The question is not what would we do were we in Ministers' places, but what will we do in our own places, as representatives of the people. Ministers may enter into foolish obligations from which they cannot recede; but is that any reason why all their supporters should follow them? If the hon member is right no Government could be defeated upon any measure in Parliament. The hon. Minister of Finance says the late Government violated the Act of 1874, and the resolution of 1871 stipulating against the increase of taxation, on account of the Pacific Railway. I say the hon. Minister is mistaken. He says that his predecessor increased the taxation $3,000,000 for this purpose. The statements of the Minister of Finance is disingenuous and contrary to the facts. Taxa- "I feel the same doubt, and am disposed to think that a Court of tion was increased to keep faith with British Columbia Common Law would feel the same difficulty as to a mandamus." of Finance is disingenuous and contrary to the facts. Taxaunder this very resolution, and why? Because the existing rovenues under a former rate of taxation were absorbed to meet new obligations. Let us look at the facts. The compensation to New Brunswick for the abolition of the export duty on logs, and the assumption of Provincial debts imposed annual charges

Amounting to The admission of Prince Edward Island Steam Ferry and Railway expenses, P. E. I. Mounted Police Indian Treaties Interest on Mr. Tilley's loan	418,000 402,000 200,000 850,000
Tetal Tea duties restored	2,619,349 1,250,000

This was an addition to the annual expense of the country, greatly in excess of the revenues added by an extension of territory. To put British Columbia in exactly the same position in 1874 that she occupied in 1871 required an addition of not $3,000,000 to the taxation of the country, but $3,869,349 to the revenues of the country. It is not then a fact to say that the Government increased the taxation to keep faith with British Columbia in any other sense than keeping faith under this resolution. The hon. Minister of Finance in 1879 increased the taxation by $7,500,000, but he did it with so little skill, that he made little or no addition to the revenues of the country. The hon. member for Cardwell attacks the legal attainments of the leader of the Opposition, but the legal standing of the leader of the Opposition is too well assured to be affected by the misrepresentation or the scolding of the hon, member for Cardwell, The hon, member for Cardwell said:

"Will any one pretend or tell us that the impression the hon, gentle-man left on the mind of the House was not that his opinion as a lawyer was that the Courts could not enforce this contract."

It is well to look and see what the hon, member for Lincoln said and the brief discussion that arose at the time. The member for Lincoln said:

ory, which no one knows better than the honourable member for West Durham, to compel them to do what their contract say they shall do.

Mr. BLAKE. Then if I know anything about it, I deny that proposition

Mr. RYKERT. If he denies that he will deny anything. If the Court of Queen's Bench will not grant a mandamus, the Court of Chancery will compel the Company to do it, and the hon. gentleman will go on and compel the railway company to go on and perform the terms of the contract.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Certainly, they can."

And with this encouraging opinion from the Minister of Finance, the member for Lincoln further said:

"And if they will not obey the mandamus of the Court the authority of the Court of Chancery can be invoked.

Mr. BLAKE. It is well laid down that a Court of Chancery will not MIT. DLAME. It is well laid down that a Court of Chancery will not enforce a railway contract.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think the hon, gentleman is mistaken. Under ordinary charters when there is a permission for a company to build a railway, the Courts will not interfere; but when, as in this case, it is provided that the company shall build the railway it might be compulsorily enforced."

Now let me say that that depends on the nature of the work to be performed. It is clear that specific performance in such a case will not be enforced either under a contract or under a statutory obligation. Let me refer the First Minister to a case in which an application was made for an injunction to restrain a railway company from preventing the exercise of a right conferred by statute. It was refused by one of the Vice-Chancellors before whom the matter was heard. It was taken before the Court of Appeals. During the argument, Lord Justice James observed that:

"As far as my experience goes, the Court has never ordered anything which involves doing something from day to day for an indefinite period." Lord Justice Mellish said:

In the decision Sir W. M. James said:

"Where what is required is not merely to restrain a party from doing "Where what is required is not merely to restrain a party from doing an act of wrong, but to oblige him to do some continuous act involving labor and care, the Court has never found its way to do this by injunction. Both the learned Vice Chancellors say that in all their experience they have never known such an injunction granted. My experience is the same. I think, therefore, that the order dismissing the bill must remain affirmed. At the same time, it is to be observed that the plaintiffs came here to enforce a right which the Act of Parliament gives tims came here to enforce a right which the Act of Parliament gives them and which the Legislature intended them to have, and that they do not fail in the merits, the question as to the approval of the engineers being a mere thing thrown in, and the real question between the parties being throughout whether the plaintiffs have a right to use the railway

The member for Cardwell says, that the proposed contract imposes no restrictions upon other railways. The hon. member is mistaken. Is it no restriction to say that no railway shall be built within fifteen miles of the border; that no railway shall extend eastward or to the south of south westward? Is it no restriction to say that no other railway shall have any connection with any American road? Is it no restriction to say that other railways shall pay tax, but that this one shall-pay no tax? Is it no restriction to impose duties upon all the material required in railway construction upon other roads, and to impose none upon the material imported for this one? Is it no restriction to furnish this one with the capital to build a road if they see proper so to use it? The hon. member says that people will not object to the Company building branch lines. Certainly not, but they do object to the refusal to let others build. The hon, member has referred to the surveying expenses, and he says they are already included in the estimated cost of the work to be handed over to the Company. The hon, member is again mistaken. The First Minister has pronounced the offer made by the second Syndicate, a political dodge, a trick—a discreditable trick. right hon, gentleman knows well that the offer was made in good faith. He knows that those who have made this offer to the House are ready to undertake the construction of the whole work, and that there are many others who are ready to join them. It is pretty clear that those gentlemen have not joined for the purpose of making a point against the Administration. The right hon, gentleman informed us that a change is to be made in the Consolidated Railway Act, by which the Government is in some way to have greater power in reference to the tolls, than they can exercise under the provisions of this contract. I have no hesitation in saying that the farce that we had played between the First Minister and the member for Halton, is a trick of the kind so frequently spoken of during this debate. How is the Government going to obtain a larger control over the railway than this contract gives them? How is the Government going to continue the vitality of a power, which, by the very terms of this contract is exhausted the moment it is exercised. Will the Minister say that they are going to give by a subsequent law a different meaning to the expressions here used, than that which they now bear? Is he going to say that the ten per cent, shall be paid upon the capital that the Company put into the transaction? You give this Company a certain sum. You expect them to use it in building this road. Are they to have no dividend upon it?

I believe the sum given is more than sufficient to build all that they contract to build. Are they in that event, to have no dividend at all? But suppose you make this declaration, this Company may do what the Union Pacific did. They may con-They themselves. They may tract with let the tracts for building at sums five times as great as the actual cost of the road. They may make the road represent a capital of $100,000,000 of their own money. There is nothing here to prevent that, and you propose to make it their interest to do so. Instead of correcting a mistake you said resolutions be not now read a second time, but that it propose to commit a greater blunder. Could there be a be recoived, that in the opinion of this House, tenders Mr. MILLS.

more abject exhibition of incapacity than has been exhibited in this contract, and in the attempt to explain away defects such as the one I have just referred to? The Premier have told us that we have had in this discussion a series of theatrical exhibitions; that we have had tragedy, comedy, and farce. I dgn't quite agree with him. The comedy was played before Parliament met. The hon, gentleman appeared as chief comedian at Hochelaga. The farce is now being played by Ministers and their friends. The trapedy is yet to come. It will come with the elections.

REPORT.

Mr. BOWELL presented the Trade and Navigation Returns for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1880.

PACIFIC RAILWAY CONSTRUCTION IN MANITOBA.

Sir RICHARD J CARTWRIGHT enquired, How far the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway has been constructed beyond Portage La Prairie; also, how far the said line has been definitely located west of Portage La Prairie, together with the numbers of the townships through which the said line is intended to pass?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I beg leave to say, in reply to the hon, gentleman, that the track is laid twenty-two miles beyond Portage La Prairie; that the line has been definitely located beyond Portage La Prairie to the boundaries of the Province of Manitoba, thirty-four miles west of Portage La Prairie, and the location is through township twelve, and ranges eleven and twelve west.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Charles Tupper for the second reading of the resolutions reported from the Committee of the Whole on the 14th January instant, granting certain moneys and lands for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the motion of Sir Albert J. Smith in amendment thereto.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I am quite sure the House will be gratified to learn that I do not intend to deliver a speech of any considerable length on this occasion. Before proceeding to discuss the resolutions before the House, perhaps it will be as well to settle the matter which may be regarded as a personal one between the Finance Minister and myself. In the course of his speech the other night the hon. gentleman threw across the floor a challenge. He said he was prepared to go to my county and to meet me atany time. The hon, gentleman is the only representative in the Government from New Brunswick, and he holds all the patronage in his hands. Hitherto New Brunswick had two representatives in the Government, but the hon, gentleman, for some reason best known to himself, seems to prefer that he should be the only representative of that Province in the councils of the country. My hon friend has also great advantage in this respect, that he has two very vile and abusive newspapers in New Brunswick under his control and subject to his inspiration, Their special mission seems to be to abuse and attack me, not only politically but personally, on all occasions. I am disposed to challenge my his seat I will resign mine; let him come to Westmoreland and run against me, and if I do not beat him by more than 500, that he and I will retire into private life. I think it was not very becoming of the hon, gentleman, who represents St. John by only nine votes, that he should flaunt a challenge across the floor to me, when he is aware that I have a majority in my county of between 600 and 700. I will give the hon. gentleman six weeks to consider this proposition.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I represent the whole constituency, for at the last election I was returned by acclamation!

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. If you entertain that field, you will be the more ready to accept the challenge and put some one else in for St. John. Having thus briefly referred to the matter between the Finance Minister and myself, I will now proceed to offer some observations in relation to the amendment I moved last night. If there is principle which should be regarded as sacred should be adhered to on all occasions, it is If there is one and Lbo principle connected with the administration and conduct of public business—that public works should be let by public tender and competition. The advantages of carrying out that principle cannot be overrated. It prevents tavoritism and corruption; it secures purity in the administration of the affairs of the country and prevents fraud. In this case it will not be denied that this principle has not only not been carried out, but has been absolutely violated. It cannot be contended for a single moment that the public had any notice of the intention of the Government to receive tenders for the construction of the Pacific Railway. The policy of the Government was recognised as settled during last Session, but was decided that this work should be constructed as a Government work and in no other way. Hon. gentlemen opposite approved of the policy then promulgated by the Government, and we also voted for the valuation given to the lands in that region. They also approved, and supported and sustained by their votes the estimates of the costs for the construction of the railway. The Minister of Railways told the House that this contract on the Table was made under the authority of the Act of 1872; but it turned out that that Act was The hon, gentleman also stated that this contract was made under the authority of the Act of 1874. My hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Blake), has clearly shown that that was not the case, and that there is no portion of it which is conformable to the contract; and, therefore, the Minister of Railways has failed to prove his contention that the contract was let under the authority of the Acts of 1872 and 1874. Now, as no notice was given that the Government intended to change and radically alter the policy of last Session, that they intended to receive tenders for the construction of this work, it seems to be a reasonable solution of the present difficulty that this contract should be abandoned and the work let out to public tender. I am satisfied that that will be more satisfactory to the people than any other course. Hon. gentlemen on the other side say that if this contract breaks down the Government must fall. Now, we on this side will undertake, and the leader of the Opposition has expressed himself in the same sense, to waive any such chance as that. We are not disposed to take any such advantage, and we want the country to understand that we do not seek to overthrow the Government by defeating this contract. It is well known that an offer has been made much more advantageous to the country than the terms of the present contract, and made, too, by a body of men as wealthy, as respectable, and as responsible as the members of the first Syndicate, and that they are prepared to construct this work from end to end for millions of dollars less hon friend the Minister of Finance, for his challenge is than is asked by the first Syndicate. Why do the rather indefinite, and I do so in this form: if he will resign Government not accept it? Have they no regard in the revenues of the country? they not endeavor to save from? in the revenues economy should $10,000,000 to $20,000,000 by the acceptance of the second offer? But even that offer, in my view, is quite too much; I think the work can be done for a great deal less. The only argument advanced on the other side in favor of this contract is, that it is better than any other offer we have ever had. Now I am prepared to show, beyond controversy, that no offer was ever made, either by Statute or by contract, equal in enormity to this, and that this contract gives more than was ever proposed to be given before. Before coming to that it may be well for me to contrast, as my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition has contrasted, this contract with the provisions of the Act of 1874, and show wherein they differ. First, let us compare this contract with that made by the Government in 1872, with Sir Hugh Allan. Now, it is important to have the views of the Government on that day. the Government on that day. I presume they endeavored to protect and guard the public interests. This contract shows precisely what the views of the Government were in reference to this transaction. There is no concession made in that contract such as we have now, and the Government have failed to give any reason for the change. The Allan contract provided that certain portion of the stock should be held in each of the Provinces of the Dominion. Why is it that there is no provision of the kind in this contract? It was then considered by the Government of the last importance that this work should be constructed by Canadians alone. It was then considered of the last importance to exclude foreigners and that the work should be a Canadian work. Why the change in this respect? We are told now that it is much better to give this contract to foreign capitalists, and so we have on the Syndicate Englishmen, Frenchmen, Germans, and Americans, but only two or three Canadians. It has been stated here, and has not been denied, that it is perfectly competent for George Stephen and his associates to go to New York and sell this contract to Vanderbilt, or any other great railway magnate. There is nothing to prevent foreigners holding this entire road, and holding all the valuable franchise and privileges which are conferred by this contract. I will venture to make the prediction that the leading men in that Syndicate now will not be six months hence in that corporation at all. Now, it seems to be a serious matter that foreigners should come in and control that whole contract, and eventually control the powers of this Legislature—because, by the terms of this contract, our powers are tied up, they are suspended by this contract in favor of the Syndicate. The Allan contract provided that all the directors should be British subjects and that the number should be thirteen. This contract simply provides that a majority of the directors should be British subjects, and it does not limit the number at all. Three directors would be quite sufficient to meet the terms of this contract if they own $25,000 of stock each. Now, this is a very important and serious change in the policy of the Government. Why has it been made? If there is money to be made in this contract our own people ought to have it. If there is money to be made in running this road, it is but right that Canada should get the benefit of it. In 1872, when the Government was composed of nearly the same gentlemen as now, they thought then that this railway should be a British institution. Now, they seem to think it is best to hand it over to foreigners, and they have failed to give any explanation of this change of view. The Allan contract gave $30,000,000 in cash, this contract gives in cash and railways $60,000,000. The Allan contract gave no choice in selection of lands, this one gives a large measure of choice to the Syndicate. The Allan contract gave no exemption from taxation or from Customs duties as be made, why was it not equally right in 1872? I say that did not stop there. It provided for an improvement in the Sir Albert J. Smith.

this exemption from taxation applies not only to the main line but to all its branches that may hereafter be constructed under this contract. The Company have liberty to construct branches everywhere, anywhere, and at any time, one hundred or two hundred years hence, and the exemptions will apply to the branches so far in the future. If that is not the intention, I would suggest to the First Minister that he should look into it and have it made clear, as I am satisfied the Syndicate considered that to be the construction of the contract.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is a mistake, I can assure the hon. gentleman.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Then you have not put it so in the contract. The Allan contract made no exemption from import duties; this contract does. The Allan contract provided for the taxation of the land grant at once; this contract provides for the exemption of the land grant for twenty years, and as some portions of the land will not be granted until the tenth year, these exemptions will last for thirty years. The Allan contract gave no exclusive privileges for the construction of railways in that country. It left this Parliament free to exercise their discretion in conferring on any parties the right to construct railways in that country. This power is taken away by this contract; the hands of the Legislature are tied up; no one can obtain power to build railways except in such directions as to serve the interests of this corporation. Under the Allan contract the Government had power to regulate tolls. This contract gives no such power until the Company have earned 10 per cent. of the capital invested in the road. It is said we are going to have a modification of this clause, as we certainly should, or else the Company will have power to do as they choose in respect of tolls. I would like to ask my hon. friends from Manitoba, what they expect when the Pembina Branch is handed over to those men, who own the railways on the other side, and who will at once have power to enforce such tolls as they please; because the 10 per cent. clause applies only to the whole road after it is constructed. I listened last night with great attention to my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), who, I must do him the credit to say, did frankly and fairly endeavor to answer the arguments put forward by gentlemen on this side, and he is the only gentlemen on that side who did attempt to do so. I was very much amused at the hon. gentleman's great ingenuity. He told us that his first conviction on reading this contract was that it was entre conviction, on reading this contract, was that it was outrageous, that it could not be justified, and that he could only feel justified in ratifying that contract by repudiating entirely the value given to the land by the Government last Session.

Mr. McCARTHY. That was not my statement, I accepted the value given to the lands by the Government, and the value placed upon them by the hon, gentleman and his party-$3.18 per acre-not because I thought that was their value, but merely for the sake of the argument, and I said that-

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. My hon. friend last Session sustained the policy of the Government in placing that value upon the n.

Mr. McCARTHY. No, no.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Of course he did, when this matter was regarded as a Government work. Under the Allan contract the Government had power to appoint officers to see that the work was faithfully performed, which was a very necessary provision; but under this contract they have no such power. Under the Allan contract, the Union Pacific gave no exemption from taxation or from Customs duties as Railway was simply to be an approximate standard, a sort this does. If it is right now that these exemptions should of general guide for the construction of the railway; but it alignment and grades wherever that could be obtained, without undue expenditure. A letter has been put in, which has no legal effect whatever, and the standard is to be that of the Union Pacific Railway when first constructed. When the Alian contract was made, no portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway was built, and no portion could be handed ever to the Company; by this contract, all parts of the railway constructed is to be handed over immediately on the consummation of this contract, and we know that they are profitable and are producing a large revenue, even now. It has been said by hon gentlemen opposite, from the hon. the First Minister down, that this is the best offer ever made for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. No offer was made under the Act of 1874, so that the only previous offer we ever had was that of Sir Hugh Allan. The discussion on the part of hon, gentlemen opposite, has proceeded on the fallacy that this Company are to do all that Sir Hugh Allan's Company were to do. Sir Hugh Allan's contract was to build 2,700 miles of railway, for which he was to get $30,000,000 and 50,000,000 acres of land; or, $11,111 in cash and 18,400 acres per mile. Under this contract, which hon. gentlemen opposite say is more favorable than the Allan contract, the Syndicate gets for building, not 2.700, but 1,900 miles, $25,000,000 cash and 25,000,000 acres. Deducting $700,000 for the first 100 miles west of Winnipeg, over which the Company has to pay cost price, leaves $24,300,000 which the Company will get in cash from the Government, or $12,800 cash per mile, in addition to the railways now being and to be completed, and the cost of survey, which amounts to $32,000,000, or $16,842 per mile, making a total of $29,642 per mile in cash. Then this Company are to get 25,000,000 acres or 13,156 acres per mile; valuing the land at $1 an acre total subsidy is equal to $42,798 per mile, while under the Allan contract the total subsidy only amounted to $29,511 per mile, taking the lands at the same price, $1 per acre; making a difference in favor of the latter of $13,000 per mile. In addition to getting $13,000 per mile more than the Allan Company, this Syndicate got the Pembina Branch, which I have no doubt, in a year or two, will give a net profit of $100,000 per annum. These calculations cannot be controverted. Under the circumstances, is it not proper this work should be put up to public competition, so that every man should have a fair chance to compete for this contract, it would save millions and millions of dollars to the country. These gentlemen of the Syndicate, could in another year, if they choose, sell the whole thing at an enormous profit. Therefore, I move in amendment:

"That the said resolutions be not now read a second time, but that it be resolved, that in the opinion of this House tenders should be invited for the construction and operation of the railway, before Parliament is asked to ratify any contract for the same."

Mr. BECHARD. When, the other day, I had an opportunity of stating some of the reasons which, in my judgment, made it my duty to dissent from the policy embodied in the resolutions before the House, I contended this whole subject should be laid before the people for their decision at the polls. The ground on which I based my contention was that, in a question of such great consequence for the weal or woe of this country, the people should have an opportunity of pronouncing on this new policy and scheme submitted by the Government. True, this Pacific Railway question has been before the people for years, and that it has been the settled policy of the country to build a road connecting the eastern with the western Provinces, and that this road should be continued to the Pacific coast; but it is equally true that the policy now before as to attain that end is completely new to the people. The only scheme on which the people had an opportunity of pronouncing is the scheme of 1872, which we subsequently embodied in that of 1874, and which, up to this time, seems to have been regarded as the settled policy of the country with regard to the construction of the Pacific Railway. The Act of 1874 provided that the railroad should be constructed without increasing the rate of taxation. This provision was reaffirmed in the Session of 1876, proposed by the hon. member for East Middlesex, and which received the almost unanimous support of the House. No such provision can be found in the scheme now before us. By the scheme of 1874, it was provided that if the road or any portion of it was constructed by a company, tenders should be called for before the contracts were let. This principle has not been observed in the present case, as the contract has been given without any tenders being invited, although capitalists are seeking the chance of investment. By the same Act of 1874, the Governor in Council retained the power to purchase the road if found an interest to the country. Such a provision is not to be found in the present bargain. By the Act of 1874, the Governor in Council obtained the control and the right of regulating the tolls on the railway, and the right was reserved to Parliament to grant charters for the construction of other roads. These rights are by this scheme given up and surrendered to a company, which might exercise these powers so as to create an injurious monopoly to the interests of the country. It is clear that this scheme differs in many particulars from the scheme of 1874, which has been considered as the settled policy of the Company, with regard to the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. We do not know what is the real sentiment of the people at present with reference to this scheme. All we know is that meetings have taken place in different parts of the country, some in favor of it and others pronouncing against it; also that petitions have been sent to the House, some in favor of the contract and others opposing it. After these manifestations of public opinion in opposite directions, I believe it is difficult for anyone of us to say what is the real sentiment of the people with regard to the question, and I think that the only way of ascertaining it would be an appeal to the judgments of the people. I will therefore move the following amendment:

"That the said resolutions be not now read a second time, but that it be resolved, that prior to, and during the last general election, it was the policy of all parties, that the arrangements for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway should be such as the resources of the country would permit, without increasing the former rates of taxation, and that the work, if to be constructed by a company, should be let only after tenders had been obtained therefor, and should be subjected to purchase by the Government at ten per cent. over cost, after deducting the public expenditure; and that the property and stock and land grant of the Company should be subject to taxation and that the Governor in Council should have the unrestricted right, from time to time, to regulate the tolls to be taken, and to prescribe the accommodation to be given, and that Parliament should be free to charter such other railways, as the public interest might require. That the Contract respecting the Canadian Pacific Rail ay, laid on the Table, involves violations in the above, and other particulars of the settled policy, in reference to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and should not be ratified till after the people had had the opportunity of expressing their opinion through the medium of a general election."

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Before the motion is carried, I have a word or two to say in respect to another amendment which I propose to submit for the favorable consideration of the House. The House has come to the decision that it will take no steps to ascertain whether it could obtain more favorable terms for the construction of the road than the contract now on the Table, that it will not allow the people to express their opinion on the question of whether or not this contract should be accepted. It now remains to point out the extraordinary and exorbitant character of the terms which we are asked to give for the purpose of obtaining the construction, not of the Pacific Rulway, but of certain portions of that road. Perhaps one of the most extraordinary features of this extraordinary bargain, is the apparent absence of all valuable consideration for the enormous sum of money which the people of Canada are asked to give away, for the many valuable tracts of land which they are to part with, and for the extravagant privileges-in themselves worth an enormous sum of money-with which under this contract the Syndicate are to be endowed. This was not the case in any of the former arrangements proposed to be effected. Whatever may have been said as to the wisdom of the Allan contract I, for one, took objection to it, not because I thought that the terms therein proposed were in themselves exorbitant, but because I saw clearly, what has since been demonstrated, that the terms then proposed to be given would never have enabled the contractors to construct more than a small portion of the railway they were asked to undertake. Under the terms proposed by the hon, member for Lambton, although it is true that they were in some respects better than the Allan contract, we had at any rate this enormous advantage: that the people of Canada would have known what they were called upon to expend and the whole work would have been taken off their hands, and that any sum of money expended by Parliament was to be reckoned against and deducted from the sum which was to be given to the contractors who should undertake that work under the terms of 1874. It is also to be borne in mind that in both these arrangements very careful provision was made against certain gross and palpable dangers which it was clearly apparent would be likely to be incurred if we were to entiust any great corporation with the task of constructing the Canadian Pacific Railway. Moreover, they were free from those monstrous and very objectionable privileges, to which so repeatedly and so justly attention has been called in the debates on this subject for some weeks past. It is not my present business to attempt to explain the mysterious causes which have induced hon gentlemen of long experience and official standing to bring down to the House a contract which the youngest of their supporters must have seen at a glance contained within it an enormous number of provisions which could not fail to excite bitter dissatisfaction among the people-a dissatisfaction which will grow and increase more and more, day by day, according as the people of Canada begin to understand how violently their rights have been taken away from them, and how little consideration they are to receive for all they are called What I desire in my amendment mainly upon to expend. to do, is to call attention to the exorbitant character of the terms which are now offered. I want to consider this question in its business and commercial aspect mainly, I want to examine it with reference more expressly to what we might call the cash side of the question, to what we could do with the $60,000,000 which we propose to hand over as part consideration, and part only, to the Syndicate, for the task of undertaking the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. According to the estimates which have been laid upon the Table of the House, we have, up to date, spent within a small fraction of $20,000,000 in hard cash in the various surveys and works of construction on that road. According to the estimates submitted by Mr. Sandford Fleming in addition to the $25,000,000 which we are to give the Syndicate, we are to pay some $14,000,000 or $15,000,000 more for the purpose of completing those portions of the railroad, which we are to finish within the next ten years, and which are to be handed over to and owned by the new Canadian Pacific Railway Company. It may be, that in spite of looking at the character of these works, the greatly reduced standard on which they are to be constructed, the amount will be a great deal larger than I have stated; but for the purposes of this argument, I propose to use only Mr. Fleming's estimate as submitted to us in the spring of the present year. Before giving away this large amount of money, independently of the land and the privileges to which I have alluded, I think it is pertinent that we should consider briefly these three points. First of all, what we could get for these $60,000,000—that is the $20,000,000 we have spent, and the $40,000,000 we propose to expend—were we to retain the expenditure of that sum within our own hands. Next, Sir, a word or two as to the reasons why we are not to obtain the advantages which we could secure, by keeping that expenditure in our own hands; and, lastly, I want to consider what consideration we are to receive, if we choose to give away the $60,000,000 to these gentlemen. Now, Sir, no matter how wide the difference of opinion between the two sides of the House, there are some few facts which I think are tolerably well agreed upon between us I think, Sir, that every man who knows anything of the condition of things in the North-West, every man who has paid any intelligent attention to the progress and the working of railroads, both in our own country and on the other side of the borders, must have come to the conviction that whatever may be said as to the other portions of the road, there can be no reasonable doubt that the Pembina Branch, the Thunder Bay Branch, and the 900 miles of prairie section from Selkirk westward, are likely, in all probability, within a very short time, probably almost from the moment of their construction, to pay a very considerable return, probably a fair interest on the money they have cost us. I think, also, that all members of this House, particularly those who have taken occasion to examine the wonderful progress of settlement on both sides of the border, are agreed that the greater proportion at any rate of those lands within the fertile belt which we are about to hand over to the Syndicate, will become extremely valuable the moment that 900 miles is built. On that point there can be no dispute, and with respect to those lands which lie close to the railroad about to be constructed, I entertain no doubt a ready and speedy sale within the next three or four years may be calculated upon, and at rates, to say the least, quite as favorable as those assumed by the right hon. First Minister last year, and which was assumed by the hon. member for West Durham as representing the true value of those lands. Then there is a third point on which we as we know would be the case, that the moment the first also agreed, and that is, that this eastern section of 650 490 or 500 miles of that section were constructed, the lands miles is not likely to pay any return, and probably will not of their vicinity would become immediately salesble, allow us to count on receiving, even working expenses, during a considerable number of years. It is true that there are other points on which a wide diversity of opinion exists. There is a very wide variance between the two sides of this House, as to whether there is any necessity at this moment for constructing the eastern section at all. There is also a wide difference of opinion as to whothergiven the necessity for constructing the eastern sectionthere is, or can, in the nature of things, be the smallest pretext or the smallest justification for providing now at enormous cost for the working expenses of a road which is not to be completed, or go into actual operation for ten years from date. There is another point on which I will say but a few words, and that is the question of the propriety of the Dominion owning this line itself. Now, Sir, I do not at all mean to say that I am entirely in accord even with my hon, friends on this side—and I believe there is the same difference of opinion on the other side of the House-but, I say that, for some years back, the more I come to consider what railroads mean in a country like that, the more strongly I have become impressed, speaking for myself alone, with the advisability of the Government of Canada retaining, at any rate, the control and the ownership of the main portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway line, whether it does or does not intend to run it. In support of that opinion. I may refer, not merely to the experience of many Euro can countries where the receipts from railroad, by no means so essential to the prosperity of the country, form a large part of their revenue, but to the well known fact that in our Australian colonies, where the condition of society closely resembles our own, where all the reasons exist against the profitable working of a Government road that can by possibility exist in such a country as the North-West, Government roads are, at this moment, well and profitably worked, and the returns from them form a very appreciable portion of the revenue of the e Australian colonies. Now, I want briefly to summarize the case. I put aside the question of monopolies, the question of exemptions, the question even of the value of land for the moment. I call attention to this plain and simple fact, that as regards the $40,000,000 which we are about to give to the Syndicate, either in the shape of work which we are bound to construct and present to them, or in a cash subsidy of $25,000,000, it is perfectly clear, even if you take what hon. gentlemen say is the inflated estimate of Mr. Sandford Fleming, or if you take the statement made by the Minister of Railways himself, that, were we to take into our own hands the expenditure of that $40,000,00, we could construct, without the aid of any Syndicate, without the aid of any company, and within a much shorter period than ten years, so far, at any rate, as the profitable portion of the work are concerned-which alone the Syndicate is charged with in that particular section—we could construct the entire line of railroad from Lake Superior to the shores of the Pacific at Port Moody. We would then retain our land, which would become, the instant the prairie section was constructed, an asset of very great value. We would have our railway in our own hands to do what we please with, we would be free from all these exemptions and all these land monopolies, which no man, even if willing to swallow the whole scheme, has yet been found hardy enough to stand up in his place in the House and defend as things good in themselves. Now, I need not point out to you that, taking the proposition laid down by the Minister of Railways himself; taking it for granted, as I believe we may take it for granted, that with very moderate energy the whole prairie section, at any rate, might be constructed within four or five years from the present date; taking it for granted, as we know would be the case, that the moment the first would become, as I have said, an asset of great value; I submit that the people of this country, by adopting that plan, would be in an enormously better position to enter into any contract or arrangement for the construction of the remaining section, and what is more to the purpose, we would obtain better surveys, and we would be in a position to complete the whole in quite as short a time as we are likely to do under the present arrangement. Sir, it has been, I think, a great source of injury to us that we have failed to apprehend in this discussion, that the Government in particular have failed to app ehend the enormous difference in the rates of progress between a country like the North-West and a country like that with which we have been in the habit of dealing. No man who has paid the smallest attention to the growth of state, and the growth of cities on the American side of the border, the moment they were supplied with fitting means of railroad development, but must know that 1 am speaking the simple truth when I say that there is every reasonable ground to believe that its trade would be a prize eagerly sought for by all capitalists who possess means enough to establish railway communication with it. I say that the whole position has been revolutionized since 1874, and especially from the very moment that railroad communication was effected by the St. Paul and Manitoba Railway Company, with the Province of Manitoba. I say that the Government failed greatly in their duty, in that knowing this they utterly ignored those facts, and have utterly put out of sight the still more important fact that the enormous reduction which has taken place in the cost of operating railroads, gives us the power of extending colonization and of extending the development of that country to an extent which would have been utterly undreamed of a few years ago. Why, Sir, when my hon, friend from Lambton sat down to consider the details of his Bill it is a well-known fact that the utmost limit to which we thought it likely we could extend cultivation from Winnipeg westward, at the rates which were given to by railway authorities as the lowest at which roads could be fairly and profitably worked, was about 400 miles; so that, on the same terms we ought to-day to expect to carry produce for a distance of 1,200 miles west of Winnipeg. Now, Sir, let us assume, in spite, I think, of all reasonable objections, that it is the fixed will of this House, even if it be not the fixed will of the people of this country, to build the whole of this road as the Government propose. We know perfectly well that the British Columbia section is not to be finished until 1890. We know perfectly well-the contract states it clearly enough to be the intention of the contractors and the Government—that the 450 miles from Jusper to Kamloops are not to be begun, in all probability, for four or five years. We know that the prairie section and the Thunder Bay section, which will pay from the moment of their construction, can be completed by 1883, and will, in all probability, be completed by 1884; and I can conceive nothing more foolish, nothing more unbusinesslike, nothing which promises to give less to the people in return for the money they expend, than this project of constructing this road now from end to end, when by simply deferring its construction for three or four years, you would so enormously increase the value of the assets you have to give, and when it is plain you are able to build it for the identical sum of $60,000,000, which you propose to hand over to the Syndicate in cash or in works. Sir, what are we to get, and what are we to give? All these hon, gentlemen offer to us, is the construction of the eastern section-not within a short space of time-not within two or three or four years, the time in which all the other and valuable portions of the road may be constructed. Not so; we are not to get one iots of benefit from this eastern section for ten years. The

for I have not the slightest doubt, even on the evidence which has been submitted to us, that it would be an easy task for the Government to construct the read from Selkirk to Kamloops for the identical $25,000,000 which they propose to hand over to the Syndicate; and if there be any correctness in the calculations submitted by the hon. Minister of Railways, showing that he expected to make a very large reduction in the estimated cost of the work which we our selves have undertaken to construct, there can be no doubt that the $25,000,000 would much more than discharge all the cost of constructing that section. So all we get is this eastern section ten years hence. For that we are to give 2,000 miles of railroad, mostly paying road, constructed at our own expense; we are to give 25,000,000 acres of land, the greater part of which, at any rate at the instant the prairie section will be constructed three years hence, will be worth at least $3.25 an acre; we are to give also outrageous privileges, outrageous exemptions, outrageous monopolies, worth incalculable sums of money, and which will grow in value when the Company set vigorously to work to construct their road. Now, who really wants this eastern section at such a price? Certainly not the gentlemen who sit on this side of the House. Certainly not, judging by their words, the gentlemen on the other side, for no man has risen to express such a desire with any degree of enthusiasm. I doubt, if we could penetrate the secrets of that mysterious chamber, whether we would not find that in their hearts even a majority of the members of the Government are opposed to the construction of this road at such a price. The Syndicate do not want it. The terms of the contract show that clearly. Is it to be constructed in order to enable us to keep faith? Well, Sir, I say this, whatever may be said as to the terms of the original contract the House should remember that if the Carnarvon terms did nothing else, they freed us completely and absolutely from the necessity of constructing this same eastern branch one hour sooner than we saw fit. British Columbia did not demand the construction of that eastern section. British Columbia said frankly enough, when the negotiations were proceeding, that what they required was the road constructed through their own territory, and they did not care whether the eastern section on the northern side of Lake Superior was built or not. Is it for commercial purposes that this section is advocated? Why, it has been shown here in the clearest possible manner, that the construction of a road to Sault Ste. Marie would give us all the commercial advantages which we can ever hope to reap from the construction of the road on the north shore of Lake Superior, and would give us in addition an enormous portion of the trade of the American North-West which we shall have no chance of obtaining in any other way. Now, Sir, during nine months of the year—or ten months, if the bon. Minister of Railways is to be believed—this North Shore line will have a most formidable competitor through our own territory, because the moment the Sault Branch is constructed—and I do not believe the Government, with all their majority, will refuse to allow the construction of that road—during the entire time navigation is open, almost the whele of the heavy freight will take the easy water route from Thunder Bay, either to Sault Ste. Marie or some other lake port on Lake Huron, and the line north of Lake Superior will have very little to do. I doubt very much whether it will be found profitable to run even one train per day, if that line is ever opened, ten years hence. Is it to secure British connection that this road is to be constructed? Well, Sir, it was well pointed ont that during these ten years, if you choose to grant these outrageous privileges to this corporation, it may well cease to be a matter of practical moment to the people of Canada by whom or how connection is established with the North-West. Sir, I say that of all the imaginable foelish pleas whole of the rest of the road is to be built at our own expense; that have been advanced, that plea certainly appears to me to be the worst and least founded on reason. There is not one of these privileges proposed to be granted to this Syndicate which will not excite in the minds of the people of the North-West more dissatisfaction, and more discontent with Canadian rule and Canadian law, athousand times, than we could neutralize by all the advantages which could be gained by constructing this line north of Lake Superior, were it constructed to-morrow instead of ten years hence. We are asked to expend $40,000,000 within the next ten years, or an average of $1,000 a year in bonuses to the Syndicate, or for works of construction we have ourselves undertaken. That will entail from $180,000 to $200,000 a year interest on our annual expenditure, and at the end of ten years we will find ourselves saddled with nearly $2,000,000 a year in the shape of interest, to be paid on account of the sum now proposed to be given. For that we will have absolutely nothing, though we will have parted with our read, and our money, and our lands. A plea has been made that it is necessary to grant these sums, because, large sums of interest will become due during construction. I invite hon, gentlemen who talk about interest to look at the enormous gift which is given in the first instance to these gentlemen. They get the Pembina Branch which now pays $70,000, and which very soon will pay $150,000 or $200,000 a year. They are to get 100 miles of road extending westward from Selkirk without the expenditure of a penny of theirs, and they get 1,250,000 acres of land which they may, if they choose, put in the market and discose of at once at a very large sum. No man will contend they will be called on to incur any expenditure on account of interest for the construction of the 900 miles west of Selkirk. The only amount on which they will possibly be called to pay interest will be the sum expended in the construction of that part of the line which they may choose to build north of Lake Superior; and for that section they get some $15,000 per mile advanced as each twenty miles are completed. They will be made a present of the Pembina Branch and the 100 miles westward, and the proceeds, whatever they may be, of 1,250,000 acres of land which they will become possessed of the instant that road is constructed. It is clear, therefore, there is not the slightest ground for alleging these people will be out of pocket for more than a most insignificant amount during the whole process of construction of these two sections. If this matter was an unutterable folly known a folly unaccountable on any principles, it ceased—as soon as they obtained, from men equal in standing, ability, and commercial position to the gentlemen of the present Syndicate, an offer which would enable us to construct this road for many millions of money and acres of land less than the offer now before us-to be a folly and became a positive crime, for which they will soon be called to account by the people whose representatives they are, and to whom they dare not on such a question as this appeal. Sir, I move in amendment:

"That the resolutions be not now read a second time, but that it be resolved that the contract respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway involves a total expenditure by the country in connection with that work of about $60,000,000, exclusive of interest, and the cession of 27,000,000 of acres of choice lands, worth, at the estimate of the Government last year, at least $79,500,000, making a total consideration of about $140,000,000, while the railroad itself is estimated by Government to cost not more than $84,600,000, and that the consideration proposed to be given is excessive, and that the contract is, in the highest respect, objectionable."

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. BURPEE (Sunbury). The House has before it an offer to build the whole line for a grant of $25,000,000 and 25,000,000 acres of land with exemptions and concessions which are not contained in the second offer, but which are quite as objectionable as the amount of extra money and land granted by the first contract. If we are restricted to making a choice between those two offers, I much prefer the second, but in my opinion neither of them should be accepted. I hold that public tenders should have been invited for building the road; and if this course had been followed and the change of policy on the part of the Government made known, much more favorable offers than the record one now before the Home would have been submitted. The policy in 1972 and 1874, as detailed in the Acts of those years, was to build the line by a private company, by means of land and money grants. The policy of the Government in 1879 was to build the road out of the proceeds of 100,000,000 acres of land set apart for that purpose, and Imperial aid was to be invoked. I agree with that policy with some exceptions, which also apply to the policy of 1880. It appeared from the speeches of members of the Government, both in the House and elsewhere, that their policy as regards the route was to be somewhat changed. According to the resolutions of 1879, it was to be a through route in British territory. The policy of 1880, judging by the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite, was to take up the Sault route and appropriate a sum for the building of that road, leaving the line along the north shore of Lake Superior untouched for a time. This was understood to be the policy of the Government; and I so understood it, and it was so understood by the country. The people could not have expected that a change of policy would have been made so suddenly, and it is quite out of reason to expect that offers could be made on a change of policy of which the public knew nothing. I objected then to building the British Columbia section of the road until it was required for commercial purposes, and until it could be built for less cost, and until money should accumulate from the sale of those lands which might go towards defraying the expense of construction. I object now to the resolutions before the House, because they will involve an increase of the debt and the retention of the heavy rate of taxation already imposed, if it will not cause it to be increased. I object to them, also, because the contract binds, not only this Parliament to build the railway, but future Parliaments to go on and construct the road upon the terms which this Parliament has determined. I think we should postpone building the British Columbia end-and my resolution is to that effect—because it is not now required. It is not now needed, I contend, for commercial purposes. According to the latest available returns, the population of British Columbia is 11,000. I know it is contended by some hon, members that the population is from 20,000 to 25,000; nevertheless, it is very small, not exceeding that of an ordinary county in other parts of the Dominion. We have, then, British Columbia, with a small population at one end of the proposed railway; we have 600 miles of very sterile country from Port Moody to Jasper Valley, through which it will be very difficult to build a railway. From Jasper Valley to Manitoba we have 800 or 900 miles of good land, but un-ettled, making a stretch of 1,300 or 1,400 miles of unsettled country between British Columbia and Manitoba. I submit that until British Columbia has more population, and the country between Manitoba and Jasper Valley has a reasonable amount of settlers, that the railway will not be required for commercial purposes, and it will be madness to build a road at the present time. I, moreover, object to the Dominion proceeding with the work, because it will add largely to our debt and increase the rate of taxation. Our debt in 1871, at the time British Columbia was admitted into the Dominion, was $77,700,000. The debt at present is, by the Public Accounts of 1880, $199,000,000 gross in round numbers, and $157,000,000 net. So it has more than doubled during that time. Then our debt was $22 per head; now it is nearly $40 per head, or almost double. Our population has increased, certainly, during the last decade, but it cannot amount to more than 17 or 18 per cent, while that debt has increased over 100 per cent. I submit that we should pause before committing the country to the construction of that portion of the road in British Columbia which will be unproductive if built and will add so largely to our debt. If we build the British Columbia end, according to the estimate of the hon. the Minister of Railways, last year, made from Mr. Sandford Fleming's reports, it will cost $20,000,000 for a very inferior colonization road. If we build it, according to the present contract, it will amount to $19,500,000 at least. The estimate for the Onderdouk section is $10,000,000, and for estimate for the Onderdouk section is $10,000,000, and the the road between Yale and Port Moody $3,500,000; and the contract on the Table gives $6,000 000 besides, for that portion of the road between Kanloops and Jasper Valley, making in all $19,500,000, besides 7,500,000 acres of the best land in the fertile belt, and other advantages more valuable than the money to the people of the North-West.

Mr. Rupper (Suphury)

Mr. Burper (Sunbury).

I have another objection, namely, that we can build the road cheaper, when the prairie section is settled up to the Rocky Mountains. All experience goes to show this fact. Since 1871 the means and appliances for the building of railroads have increased so as to cheapen the construction very largely, probably 25 per cent. If this road were carried to the Rocky Mountains, the facilities for getting materials into that country would diminish the cost of construction. For these reasons, I think that we should pause before we go any further in the construction of the British Columbia end of the road. I admit that both parties are bound to build the road sooner or later, under certain restrictions, one of them being that it should not add to the rate of taxation. The Government of 1878 agreed to build it in ten years, and that of 1874 in twenty years. Although I admit that we are bound, sooner or later, to build this road. I deny that we are bound to build it unconditionally. The organs of the Government say we are bound to build it at once, that being the one particular point they insist on. They are glad of an excuse to sanction a contract that they know is detrimental to the interest of the country. On the Ministerial side several hon. gentlemen, and notably the Minister of Finance, and the member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) have asserted in emphatic terms that we were bound to baild it - that our refusal would be repudiation, a breach of faith, and would bring disgrace on the Dominion, notwithstanding the increased debt and taxation it will entail. The member for Jacques Cartier said the resolution of the House limiting the construction of the road so as not to add to our rate of taxation, which taxation clause is embodied in the Acts of this Legislature, had no force. Though he may be a good constitutional and Statute lawyer, which I do not profess to be, I think he is mistaken. In the first resolution with regard to the admission of British Columbia, the condition was that it should not add to the rate of taxation, and in the Acts of 1872-4 and the resolutions of 1876, that condition is reaffirmed. I will refer, as an example of those resolutions and provisions, to two clauses in the Act of 1874, as follows:

"And whereas the House of Commons of Canada resolved in the Session of the year 1871, that the said railway should be constructed and worked by private enterprise and not by the Dominion Government, and that the public aid to be given to secure its accomplishment should sonsist of such liberal grants of land and such subsidy in money or other aid, not increasing the then existing rate of taxation, as the Parliament of Canada should thereafter determine, and whereas the Statute thirty-fifth Victoria, chapter seventy-one, was enacted in order to carry out the said agreement and resolution; but the enactments therein contained have not been effectual for that purpose."

"And whereas the Legislature of this present Session, in order to provide means for meeting the obligations of the Dominion, the rate of taxation has been raised much beyond that existing at the date of the taxation has been raised much beyond that existing at the date of the said resolution; and whereas it is proper to make provision for the construction of the said work as rapidly as the same can be accomplished without further raising the rate of taxation."

That is from the Act of 1874, and it is detailed in the other Act in about the same language. And though there are legal gentlemen on the other side competent to give an opinion on the subject, one of their number-I refer to the hon, member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall)—has given an opinion which we may fairly set against the views of other hon, gentlemen on that side. He was a member of the Government when the negotiations with British Columbia began; he was Minister of Public Works and had special charge of those negotiations. He is a legal gentleman, and has had a good deal of parliamentary experience. In a speech which he delivered in the House last year he used these words:

This, Sir, is an opinion from a gentleman not only well qualified to give an opinion; but who was and is now in full sympathy with bon. gentlemen opposite. I think I am justified in saying, therefore, that it was not the intention of the parties who made the original contract that it should be regarded as one of the nature—which hon gentlemen opposite say should be regarded in the nature—of a treaty. We find that it was not the Dominion that sought to induce British Columbia to enter the Union, but it was the people of British Columbia who made the first advance. They commenced the agitation in 1867—about the time that the negotiations were going on for the Union of the older Provinces—by means of holding public meetings and passing resolutions. I shall here read a portion of the Order in Council which was passed in answer to the application from a portion of British Columbia to enter the Union:

That it appears from these resolutions and the memorial of the committee appointed at the public meeting, which accompanies them, that the Legislative Council of British Columbia, on the 18th March, 1867, unanimously adopted a resolution requesting His Excellency Governor Seymour 'to take measures without delay to secure the admission of British Columbia into the Canadian Confederacy on fair and equitable terms."

Then we find that a meeting was held in Cariboo, which the following is an account:-

"The people of Cariboo, the next most populous and influential portion of the colony, held in December a highly enthusiastic meeting, and unanimously passed resolutions in favor of immediately joining the Dominion of Canada."

We were informed that all the new papers except one, five in number, supported Confederation. The hostite paper was in favor of annexation to the United States.

"The Legislative Council, the only Legislative body in the colony, is made up of a majority consisting of Heads of Departments, Gold Commissioners, Magistrates and others subject to Government influence, and cannot be relied upon to urge Confederation, as it ought to be at the present juncture, and, therefore, they appealed to Canada to help them."

Here are the terms which the people of British Columbia asked for at the time:

- "1. Canada to become liable for the public debt of the Colony, estimated at $1,500,000.
- "2. Canada to provide for Federal officers and services.

  "3. To grant a fixed subsidy and per capita subsidy sufficient to ensure the support of the Local Government, in addition to the powers of taxation reserved to Provincial Governments in the British North America Act.
- America Act.

  "4. Representation in the Senate and Commons of Canada.

  "5. The construction of a trans-continental waggon road from Lake Superior to the head of navigation on the Lower Fraser, within two years after the time of admission. This is regarded as an essential
- "6. Popular representative institutions, insuring responsible control over the Government."

Now, Sir, these are the only conditions that were made at that time. British Columbia did not ask for the railway at all. Subsequently, however, negotiations took place from time to time between British Columbia and the Governments of Canada and Great Britain, the result of which was that delegates were sent from British Columbia to Ottawa to negotiate terms of admission into the Union. I will read from the terms what those delegates were authorized to offer:

"8. Inasmuch as no real Union can subsist between this Colony and Canada without the speedy establishment of communication across the Rocky Mountains by coach road and railway, the Dominion shall, within Rocky Mountains by coach road and railway, the Dominion shall, within three years from the date of Union, construct and open for traffic such coach road from some point on the line of the Main Trunk Road of this Colony to Fort Garry, of a similar character to the said Main Trunk Road, and shall further engage to use all means in her power to complete such railway communication at the earliest practicable date, and that the surveys to determine the proper line of such railway shall be at once commenced, and that a sum of not less than $1,000,000 shall be expended in every year from and after three years from the date of Union, in actually constructing the initial sections of such railway from the seaboard of British Columbia to connect with the railway system of Canada."

A'l that British Columbia delegates asked was an expenditure of $1,000,000 per annum, not on their own end of the road, but on the whole line. The hon. member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall) explained this matter in his speech that | Carnarvon for the purpose of satisfying British Columbia, year so much better than I can do it myself, that I will take the liberty of reading a portion of his remarks on the subject:

"On presenting those terms at Ottawa, and discussing them with the Canadian Government, an alteration of this clause was proposed to the British Columbia delegates, with respect to the railway, as follows:—

British Columbia delegates, with respect to the railway, as follows:—

"I The Government of the Dominion undertake to secure the commencement simultaneously within two years from the date of the Union, of the construction of a railway from the Pacific towards the Rocky Mountains, and from such point as may be selected east of the Rocky Mountains, towards the Pacific, to connect the seaboard of British Columbia with the railway system of Canada; and further, to secure the completion of such railway within ten years from the date of Union."

"That condition or term in the Act of Union was a voluntary proposal of the Government of Canada. The Government of British Columbia proposed that we should undertake the construction of a railway at the rate of $100,000 a year, which, if the estimate of the Chief Engineer that it would cost $100,000,000 be correct, would require 100 years instead of ten to complete the Pacific Railway. My contention is, that, so far as this Parliament is concerned, we are not bound by the terms of Union respecting the railway in the absolute sense or to the extent which Union respecting the railway in the absolute sense or to the extent which some hon, gentlemen even on this side of the House contend. It was a voluntary proposal of our own; a number preturn as lawyers would say, because we received no consideration for it. It is true the British Columbia delegates did not object to it. They were very glad to find that the people of Canada were so anxious to establish rapid transit across the continent. But that, like any other decision of Parliament, was subject to modification. The condition that the resources of the country would enable the Government to 'secure the completion' of the work in tenyears was always understood. Nay, more, it was expressly stipulated. We promised British Columbia, and we promised everybody, that we would build the railway if we could. But Parliament did not deprive would build the railway if we could. But Parliament did not deprive itself of its legal, natural, constitutional right to modify or repeal any law in the Statute-book, or any schemes or undertakings which might be found impracticable. British Columbia, being part of the Dominion, can have no right to complain unless it can show that we have the means, or that they are within our reach, and that it is to the interest of the country to proceed with the construction of the railway in their Province. As members of this House, and representatives of a portion of the people of the Dominion hon, gentlemen from British Columbia have the right to present their case in the best way they can. But to say that the transactions of 1871 are in the nature of a treaty that this Dominion consists of separate parts which have treaty obligations one with another, and that we are bound at all hazards, and under all circumstances, whether we have the means or not, to carry out anything that a previous Parliament may have proposed in reference to public works in any Province—that proposition, Mr. Speaker, cannot be maintained."

This is the opinion of the hon, member for Halton. I stated that delegates from British Columbia came here, and that the Government arranged the terms of Union with those delegates. But while resolutions embodying those arrangements were being passed through this House, providing for the building of the road in ten years, hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House became alarmed. They thought the Government were undertaking a task beyond the resources of the people of this country, and there was difficulty about passing the measure, The me jority of the Government had been sixty or seventy, and during the passing of these resolutions it dwindled down to ten or fifteen, so that they passed a resolution to the effect that the building of this roud should not increase the rate of taxation. The bargain being on the condition I have stated, I do think the country is not bound to go on with the work in British Columbia, irrespective of the burdens to be imposed on the people. The hon. Minister of Railways, when proposing the construction of the Yale-Kamloops section last year, said that he had power to delay the work for a year or more, and that although by the Carnarvon terms the Government agreed to spend $2,000,000 a year in British Columbia, yet they did not intend to spend $1,0 0,000, and, so far as he was concerned, he ignored those terms. In fact, by a return brought down to the House this Session, we find that the expenditure in British Columbia this year has not exceeded $400,000. But the Carnarvon terms have been referred to, and gentlemen opposite appear to put a good deal of emphasis on what are called the Carnarvon terms, substantiating their position by the assertion that the Dominion is bound by those terms to the immediate construction of the whole road. The fact is, the Carnarvon terms were not in the nature of an award, but only a recommendation of Lord The recommendation was that Canada should build the Vancouver Island railroad, and expend $2,000,000 per annum on the mainland. The member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), on the part of the Government of the day was, no doubt, very anxious to do all in his power to satisfy British Columbia and carry out the arrangement made with that colony. He may or may not have gone too far in that direction. For my own part I think he did go too far. But he consented, subject to the resolutions and Acts of Parliament prohibiting an increase of the rate of taxation for that purpose. He could not if he would bind the country contrary to the Acts of Parliament. But what does Mr. Mackenzie himself say about it? I think he is more capable of interpreting his own intentions and acts than gentlemen opposite. In a speech he made in this House last Session, he said:

"When we assumed the responsibility of accepting the proposals of Lord Carnaryon we did so as a matter of course, subject to the reservation made in the Order in Council and to the enactments already in existence, and the parliamentary resolutions prohibiting increased taxation."

Parliament did not sanction the recommendation of Lord Carnarvon. In fact in one important particular it refused to do so by rejecting the Bill for the construction of the Vancouver Island Railway. I submit that if Canada is not bound to build the whole road unconditionally and at once. without reference to the rate of taxation imposed, and if that portion of the road situated in British Columbia be not required for commercial purposes at present and will not be for many years to come; if that portion of the road can be much more cheaply built after the eastern portion of the Pacific Railway has been built to the Rocky Mountains, and the prairie country has a reasonable amount of population, and if it is a fact that this section of the road will be unproductive and burthensome if built now, as is admitted, by gentlemen opposite, what madness, what infatuation to persist in doing so when by doing so the present exorbitant rate of taxation must not only be kept up but increased. I have already stated that the gross debt of the Dominion is $199,000,000, the net debt $157,000,000; if the present contract is carried out it will add at least $40,000,000 more to our obligations. I venture to predict that in ten years when the contract terminates, if indeed it does at that date, if the Government do not ignore all public works in other parts of the Dominion, that our debt will reach the enormous amount of from $230,000,000 to $240,000,000. The interest on that sum will amount to about $12,000,000 annually. A debt of such magnitude will bear heavily on the resources of the people of this country. It must necessarily be detrimental to our best interests and retard our future progress. It will make Canada a dear country to live in, increase the price of manufactures and the cost of products to all classes of consumers. And this in the face of the fact that our debt per head to-day is just about as high as the rate per head is in the United States. While they are rapidly settling their debt we are rapidly increasing ours. Our relative positions in this respect is fast changing; and the United States is a country with which we will have to compete in manufactures as well as in the competition for emigrants and settlers. But it is contended that the sale of lands in the North-West Territory will be sufficient to recoup the Dominion for the outlay on this road. I do not think there are any good grounds for such an assumption, and I think it must be a very sanguine or reckless person who would rely upon such a source to relieve us of our liabilities. Our experience in the older Provinces proves the fallacy of this contention. Several of the older Provinces who have their Crown lands under their own control, from which they derive more or less revenue—these Provinces also have their Dominion subsidy, and other sources of revenue, yet they find very great difficulty in keeping their expenditure within their income. Our experience in Manitoba and the North-West Territory, up to this time, will give us some idea of the expense to be expected in that territory, for which purpose the member Mr. BURPEE (Sunbury).

from Perth (Mr. Trow) gave a statement a few evenings ago of the expenses incurred in establishing a Government in Manitoba and governing the North-West. He stated that the sum of $14,000,000 had been spent in Manitoba and the North-West Territory since we acquired that country, outside of the railway expenditure, and that we received from Customs dues, Excise, and sales of lands less than $1,700,000. In this calculation there are items which would not justly be chargeable to the establishment of a new Province, but the following items will show how large an expenditure has been made for the purpose of establishing the Province of Manitoba and governing that territory: We have paid for Mounted Police, in all, $1,935,000; for Emigration, $1,542,000; Public Works, Buildings, &c., $1,378,000; Dominion Land Surveys, $1,186,000; Indian Treation, $1,542,000; Indian Treation, $1,54 $1,554,000; Military Expedition to Manitoba, $756,000; Subsidy to Manitoba, $698,000; Relief of Settlers, $83,000; making in all about $9,000,000 in round numbers. have received in Customs, $1,381,000; Excise, $148,000; Sa'es of Land, $139,000; total, $1,667,000. This shows the enormous cost likely to be incurred by the Dominion in the establishment of new Provinces in the North-West. Cf the lands in the North-West this contract which we are now asked to ratify gives to this Syndicate 25,000,000 acres of the best lands in the fertile belt. 'The Hudson Bay Company has reserved for themselves 50,000 acres around forts. &c. The same company have five per cent. of the balance of the whole North-West also reserved. There are large reserves for Indians, and also for schools; the whole of which will absorb the major portion of the best lands of that country. I do think he would be a very reckless man indeed that would calculate to pay off our large liabilities from the remaining portion of our lands in that territory. Additional railways will have to be constructed for the purpose of developing that region of country. Provinces will have to be established as population increases, and Local Governments will have to be su sidized for their maintainance; and I contend that the expenditure necessary for those purposes will require all the moneys accruing from Customs, Excise and sales of land. Faith must be kept with British Columbia, is the argument most relied upon by the supporters of the Government. But have the other Provinces no claims on this Dominion? Is there not a stipulation in the resolution and Acts referred to that the road should not be built faster than the resources of the country will admit, without increasing the rate of taxation. Has faith been kept with the older Provinces in that respect? Has not our rate of taxation been enormously increased? Have they no right to complain? I think they have. While millions upon millions are expended, nay, squandered, in British Columbia and the North-West, on unproductive works, the people of the Maritime Provinces are refused the smallest concessions in aid of much needed improvements, and when they ask for necessary expenditures they are told that there are no funds. I contend that we should postpone the building of the British Columbia section until the commercial necessities of the country demand it, and our financial position will warrant the expenditure. I will the elore move the following amendment:-

"That the resolution be not now read a second time, but that it be resolved, that at present the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway is premature and would involve the country in an expense beyond its reasonable capacity, and would lead to the maintenance of too high a rate of taxation, while the postponement of that part of the undertaking till after the prairie section is finished, would enable it to be constructed at a much less cost and within a reasonable time."

Amendment (Mr. Burpee, Sunbury) negatived on the following division:—

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, I have a motion to make in amendment to the main motion, tending to substitute the Sault Ste. Marie Branch for the section to the north of Lake Superior, I am astonished to see the objections that have been made against the Sault Ste. Marie line, and repeated by a great part, I may say, by the whole Conservative press in the Province to which I myself belong. Nevertheless, I still believe that, in the interest of the Dominion, the line of railway to the south of Lake Superior is infinitely pre-ferable to the eastern section of the proposed Pacific Rail-way. In this matter every one should take into consideration not only the local interests of his own Province, but the general interest of the Dominion. Every one, however, is allowed to take note of the particular facts of such a policy, and the particular results that it might have. It is from that standpoint, especially, that the Sault Ste. Marie Branch has been discussed by the Conservative press of the Province of Quebec. I do not in the least oppose the position taken by the press on this point, with regard to the choice either of the route to the north of Lake Superior, or of the route to the south of Lake Superior. I oppose only the conclusions that are arrived at, and the premises from which they are drawn. A paper, published in the city that of the line; there is, moreover, the question of the opening I have the honor of representing, has gone so far as to say up of the trade of the North-West. Under all these aspects, that it could not conceive how a French-Canadian could the line that I suggest to the Government, the line to the possibly vote against the route to the north. I confess, for my part, that I do not conceive, nor do I understand, such language. This is not merely a question of race. Her Majesty's subjects in the Province of Quebec have - not in this matter-interests that can be separated from those of their fellow-countrymen of other nationalities. All the inhabitants, in general, of the Province of Quebec have not, in this matter, interests distinct or separate from those of their fellow-countrymen of other Provinces. This question is not a local one. It is a general question, affecting alike all the Provinces of the Dominion, but from which a part of the Dominion-and I believe that this part is the Province of Quebec-may draw greater profit than another. What I reproach the Conservative press with is to have misunderstood the question. This, as I have already said, is not a local question, but a national one; and when the paper to which I have alluded expressed its views on this question, what it meant and what it said was simply this:

"That it was of the greatest importance for the Province of Quebec, which had sacrificed considerable in order to build a road across its own territory to connect the Ontario railways and to draw the western trade into the heart of the Province."

And what this paper maintained was that by abandoning the route to the north of Lake Superior, all communication with the North-West would be broken, and the trade of that country would be obliged to go, as it is now, by way of Chicago and St. Paul, instead of coming directly by the railways of the Province of Quebec to the ports of Montreal and Quebec. If the first part of this proposition were true, the consequences would be equally true, but the first part of this proposition is groundless. It is not true that by abandoning, as we propose to do for the time being, the construction of the section to the north of Lake Superior, we break off all communication with the North-West, thus closing our doors to the trade of those regions. This proposal would be true were we to propose an abandonment, pure and simple, of the line to the north of Lake Superior. What we propose is not the abandonment of the line to the north of Luke Superior; it is not to close our doors to the western trade. What we propose is merely to substitute one line for another; to substitute the route to the south of Lake Superior for the line to the north, and that only temporarily. Thus it is not breaking off communication with the North-West; it is not closing the doors to the trade of the North-West; it is merely substituting one line for another. Now, the advantages to be derived, not only for the whole Dominion but for the Province of Quebec in particular, from the line of railway to the south of Lake Superior are such that it seems to me that any man who would look at the matter with an impartial eye could not do otherwise than admit that the line I propose is infinitely superior to the one I propose to abandon for the present. You, in proposing the line to the north of Lake Superior, in proposing to make connections with the North-West Territories, you have simply in view the drawing on to the territory of the Province of Ontario and the Province of Quebec the trade that will one day exist and that is to result from the settlement of the North-West Territories. By adopting the line to the north of Lake Superior, you limit the traffic to our territory alone; whereas by adopting the line to the south of Lake Superior you not only draw to our lines the trade of our own North-West, but at the same time you draw the trade of the whole American North-West. That is the immense advantage that would be derived from the building of the line to the south of Lake Superior. instead of the line to the north of Lake Superior. But that is not the only advantage. There is, moreover, the financial advantage; there is, besides, the saving in the construction south of Lake Superior, is infinitely superior to the north of Lake Superior. Let us take for a moment merely the question of economy. By the contract you are obliged to build, according to the estimate of the contract itself, 650 miles with a subsidy of $15,384 61 per mile, being a total of $10,000,000, with an additional land subsidy of 9,615.35 acres per mile, being a total of 6,250,000 acres. Now, we have on the Table of this House a proposal that was made some time ago to the Government, and that was laid before us a few days ago, by a powerful company, at the head of which is a man well known in this country, and whom I need not name. This Company proposes to build the Sault Ste. Marie Branch for an amount that really cannot be compared with the subsidy that we will have to pay for the construction of the line to the north of Lake Superior. The Sault Ste. Marie Branch is 290 miles long, and the Company to which I have just alluded offers to build this line for a subsidy of $4,000 per mile, and an additional land grant of 4,500 acres per mile, being a total subsidy of $1,600,000 in money, and a total land grant of 1,160,000 acres. By making that saving we have immediate communication with the North-West; I therefore show that the advantage, from a financial point of view, will be considerable, and, in the present state of our finances, no one will say that it is a trifling advantage. But if, in spite of the advantage given us from a mere financial point of view, you persist in constructing the line to the north of Lake Superior, you lose the traffic of this line during seven years. According to the terms of the contract the Syndicate is obliged to finish this road in the space of ten years, that is to say, in 1890; whilst by the proposal for the building of the Sault Ste. Marie Branch, the company that made the offer to the Government proposes to construct the road and to open it to traffic in three years hence. Now, that is not a matter of small importance for the Province of Quebec and for the Dominion at large; it is important for us to open up as soon as possible the trade of the North-West. The fact is that the whole discussion has so far turned on the importance there is for the Dominion to unite the territories of the North-West with the eastern Provinces, yet, according to the terms of the contract that you are about to ratify, this communication will be complete before ten years. It is only in ten years that the products of the North-West will be able to be carried by the Quebec line; whereas, if you adopted the Sault Ste. Marie line you would have the North-West trade in three years. As I have already said, this is not a matter of small importance for us. If in the Province of Quebec so much importance is attached to the question, it is on account of the financial position of the country; and at the present time, the country has undertaken considerable obligations, greater indeed than its resources warranted, for the construction of a railway. The fact is that the Province cannot derive any benefit from the policy she has inaugurated, except by bringing to her line, besides the trade of the North-West, the trade of the western States. Every one knows that our Provincial railway, although it gives considerable revenue, does not now pay the interest on the sun that it has cost. There is a considerable deficiency in our finances. I cannot refrain from expressing the fear that the Province of Quebec has exhausted the last of its resources and that even should she wish to go into the European markets, she would not be able to increase the debt she has contracted. For several years past, we are rolling up deficit on deficit in the Province of Quebec, and every one knows that the interest of the debt is paid with borrowed capital. We can continue to exist in this manner for two or three years more perhaps, but after that, what will we do? When we have exhausted the loan that we just negotiated, when we are confronted with considerable deficits, like those we have Mr. LAURIER.

which she will then be placed, is an increase in the traffic coming by our own lines. The revenues of the Province are limited, and the only revenues that are liable to increase are those that may be derived from the railway by an increase in the traffic, and in the present state of things the increase can only be imperceptible. But if you open up immediately to trade the vast territories of the North-West, when we shall have the trade of the north of Michigan, of Wisconsin, of Dakota, and of the other territories which would send us their products by the Sault Ste. Marie Branch and by the Provincial railway to the ports of Quebec and. Montreal—then, I say, we might hope the revenues of this railway would be so increased that the position of the Province might be looked at with some hope; otherwise the position seems to me to be desperate. Under these circumstances, you have in hand two schemes, both equally in the interest of the Dominion, but one of them is of immense importance to the Province to which we belong. have to choose between the line to the north of Lake Superior and the line to the south of Lake Superior. If you adopt the line to the north of Lake Superior, what will be the consequence? The immediate consequence will be that during ten years the traffic of the North-West will still follow the route it follows now—that is to say, that this trade will have to pass by St. Paul and Chicago, escaping thus from our railway, and at the end of ten years you will only have our own trade; whereas if you adopted the Sault Ste. Marie Branch, the line to the south of Lake Superior, not only would you have in three years time the trade of our own North-West over our own line, but you would moreover bring at the same time to our own lines and to our own ports all the trade of the American North-West. Is it possible to hesitate under these circumstances, in view of an advantage so considerable and so evident in favor of the Sault Ste. Marie? And those who pretend that we are not patriotic because we are not in favor of the building of the line to the north of Lake Superior, have they the right to thus reproach us? On the contrary, is it not for us to reproach them with a want of patriotism? Their idea in casting this reproach at us was simply this: by not constructing the line to the north of Lake Superior we would be forcing the trade of the North-West to seek, for many long years to come, the channels it is now in the habit of following. Whereas, the true idea is this: by adopting the line I propose we. force the trade to come to our ports. I could understand the force of the objection that is raised, if the Opposition had proposed the absolute abandonment of the line to the north of Lake Superior, and I could conceive that we would have exposed ourselves to blame. But we merely propose, for the present, the substitution of our line for another, a line the advantages of which must be evident to all those who take the trouble to seriously look into the matter. I am satisfied that if this question had not become, as it has, a Ministerial question, everybody would be obliged to admit that the construction of the Sault Ste. Marie Branch is much more advantageous for the country, and that this line would be adopted immediately; this line would be for the best interests, not only of the Dominion of Canada, but likewise of the Province of Quebec in particular, for though no Province, in this matter, has distinct and separate interests from those of the other parts of the Dominion, the Province of Quebec occupies a peculiar position. Now, there is another question to be considered. If you adopt the line to the north of Lake Superior, you limit your trade to your own territory. I heard some one saying yesterday that we need a national line. Trade knows no such thing as nationality; it does not know favorite lines, it has no favorites. Trade only knows its own interests; and if we want to serve our country we must make use of this maxim. There ought to be no sentievery year, what will be the position of the Province? The mentality over a question like this, it ought to be looked at only thing that can save the Province from the position in only from a business point of view, and the rigorous and logical conclusion is that, at present, by adopting the line to the north of Lake Superior and by refusing to adopt the Sault Ste. Marie Branch you refuse to create an internstional trade, you refuse to bring into our own territory the products of the West to the south of the line. By so doing you restrict your trade to what your own country can give you. And what have we at the present moment in the territories of the North-West? We have only hopes; we have no reality. We may trust, and I do trust as much as any one, that these hopes will be realized; I have no doubt but that some day active, numerous, and industrious populations will be settled in the fertile plains of the North-West, but we have not yet got so far; we only have a few emigrants who settle there from year to year; population is only just beginning to flow in there. In view of these facts, I am astonished to see that there are men in this House who are hostile enough to the interests of their own country to avoid building the line I propose. If we were patriotic, if we had at heart the interests of our own country, is it not evident that we would endeavor to give to our road, which has cost the country so many sacrifices, and which is yet to cost as many more, all the traffic that can be given to it: is it not evident that the policy we ought to follow is not merely to limit the profits of this road to the advantages that our own territory can offer, but that the well understood policy of this country and of this Government should be to give to the road we are building not only the traffic of our own country, but also the traffic of the territories situated on the Pacific coast. It is quite self-evident, and I do not see how any one can object. The statement I am now making, Sir, is not exaggerated; as soon as we shall have built the Sault Ste. Marie Branch we will bring into our own territory, not only the products of our own North-West, but we bring at the same time the products of Wisconsin, of Michigan, of Minnesota, of Dakota, and of all the territories under the same latitude as San Francisco as far as the Pacific Ocean. You have only to glance at a map to be convinced of what I say, and I am saying nothing that is not already known. The fact is that the route by Sault Ste Marie is so advantageous that not one of those who have spoken on the question has failed to admit the worth of the route and to state that it would be built later on. If ever an illogical proposition was uttered it is that one. No one from the Province of Quebec who has spoken on this question but has said that some day or another this road should be built, but the hon. gentlemen opposite want to build it later. Can anything be more illogical? You want now to construct the line to the north of Lake Superior which is to pass through an uninhabited country, whilst you reluse to build a branch that will take you into an inhabited country having a large population and still greater products to be carried. Sound reason should tell you that you ought to build the Sault Ste. Marie Branch first, because you penetrate into an inhabited country that has products to export, whilst by putting off the building of this line you leave to one side inhabited countries in order to penetrate into a desert. The fact is, that if we understood politics as they should be we would first go and got the products of a population that has products to export, and we would wait till there were settlements elsewhere before giving them the required means of communication. As I was saying, the construction of the Sault Ste. Marie Branch' would immediately bring to the ports of Montreal and Quebec by the Provincial line and the Canada Central all the products of the States I have just mentioned, of all the States to the west of Michigan and extending to the Pacific. This statement is not an exaggeration, and the reason is very simple; because not an exaggeration, and the reason is very simple; because the Sault Ste. Marie Branch puts that part of the American territory in communication with the Atlantic sea-ports by a route 300 miles shorter than any other. The Atlantic sea-ports for that part of the American territory are at present New York, Boston, Montreal and Quebec. Now, it is well known, and I need not insist upon that point, that by the Sault Ste Marie route these territories are three hundred miles nearer to Montreal than to New York and Boston. As I was saying a moment ago, commerce has no favorite route; it will always seek the shortest and least expensive line. The products of Minne-sota, Wisconsin, Michigan and all that part of the United States will, therefore, of a necessity seek the ports of Montreal and Quebec. It is known that the western part of the United States is the granary of the world, but I trust that it will not always be so; I trust that in a few years the granary of the world will be in our own territory. We have the ambition of rivalling with our neighbors, and I think that we can do so successfully; for the monce, however, the true policy would be to bring the products of these States to the ports of Montreal and Quebec. Let it be remarked that the distance is 300 miles shorter than to any other part of the American continent, and that the distance between Montreal and Liverpool is 250 miles shorter than the distance from New York to Liverpool; so that, by adopting the Sault Ste. Marie Branch you bring the North-West Territories, not only our own territories but also those I have just mentioned, 550 miles nearer Europe. This is not a small advantage, and it is wilfully putting the good of the country aside not to adopt the amendment I now propose. I do not, therefore, understand, Sir, how hon members from the Province of Quebec, having at heart the interests of our Province which are not distinct from but common with those of the Dominion-I do not understand, I say, how they can find any objection to the Sault Sto.

Marie Branch. I do not understand the persistence with which they insist upon the building of the line to the north of Lake Superior. On the contrary, all should desire the construction of the Sault Ste. Marie Branch, which is the shortest, the most useful, the most economical route by which to bring the products of the West to Liverpool. I am aware, Sir, of the objections that have been raised in Ontario against the Sault Ste. Marie route; national prejudices were appealed to; a part of the press took hold of the question and endeavored to show that the Sault Ste. Marie Branch would be all to the advantage of the Province of Quebec and all to the detriment of the Province of Ontario. And I remarked that the Minister of Railways (Sir Charles Tupper) himself, in a speech he made at Toronto some time ago, took that side of the question. He expressed himself as follows:-

"He (Mr. Blake) will find that it is our duty as politicians and as Canadians, to confine our efforts to the great national work now before us; and Sir, in a year, what will take place? In a little more than a year, communication will be open to Thunder Bay. Mr. Blake says the completion of this line is ten years off, while you can have the Sault Ste. Marie Branch in three, but will you suffer very much? What is your position during these ten years? You stand here in the position of having your trade and industries nearer to the great North-West than any other portion of this country and easy means of access by the Thunder Bay line to pour the traffic and business of Toronto, Hamilton, &c.; into the heart of the great North-West, and to obtaining a hold on that traffic which, once secured by the enterprising men connected with the industries in Oatario, will not be easily taken out of their greap." "He (Mr. Blake) will find that it is our duty as politicians and as Such, Sir, is the language of our friends opposite; this language gives an exact idea of the situation; national prejudices have been appealed to. But I beg leave to simply compare this language with the words pronounced by the leader of the Opposition at a meeting in Montreal. This is what he said:

"Now, I want as much trade for Canada as I can get, as much inter-communication by means of railways. I want to see this commence by the natural, shortest and cheapest route, so that there may be speedy view of this subject, because they would otherwise gain advantages. I should be very sorry for the Liberals, and very much inclined to dissociate myself from them.

That, Sir, is patriotic language, language certainly worthy of a statesman. This language does not seek to raise sectional interests; this language realizes that; above all things, we should seek the interests of the Dominion. Every one is allowed to seek the particular interests that any Legislature can give him; but, in the present instance, the Liberals of Ontario recognize that the Sault Ste. Marie Branch will be more profitable to the Province of Quebec, or to the ports of Montreal and Quebec, than to their own Province: yet they are not jealous over it; they are willing to give usthe benefit; all they ask is to compete with us for their share of the trade. I do not understand the persistence with which hon gentlemen opposite wish to go on immediately with the construction of the line to the north of Lake Superior, instead of adopting the Sault Ste. Marie Branch. If they really want the construction of the line to the north of Lake Superior, I think it was the duty of my friends opposite, and of their leader, to insist upon the construction of the Sault Ste. Marie Branch: They say, "It can be done later?" But are we sure that it will be done later? Are we sure to have, later, the privileges we now have for the building of the Sault Ste. Marie Branch? When the Company has the great monopoly, that it will necessarily have, will it readily consent to the construction of the Sault Ste. Marie Branch, which will be a rival line? Will the Company not impose conditions so encrows that the construction of this branch will become an impossibility? If ever there was an opportunity of building this branch, the advantages whereof are so evident, it is the opportunity that is now offered, and, in my opinion, we would be recreant to our duty were we not to build this branch immediately. Now, what are the objections brought against the Sault Ste. Marie Branch? The advantages of this road are evident; yet I have heard some objections. The member for Portneut (Mr. Varlée) speaking, the other day, on this question, gave as a reason against the construction of this line, that there were no lines built to the south of Lake Superior to communicate with the Sault Ste. Marie Branch. This reason. Sir, is not deserving of a serious answer, because it is groundless. Indeed, at the present time, there are lines constructed, or under construction, all along the south shore of Lake Superior, less a few miles. The Northern Pacific has been continued to Duluth; and the line to the East is under construction for a distance of over a hundred miles. There are other lines under construction, and if I am correctly informed—and I think that I am, for the information I have was given to the House, and has not been contradicted—there only remains a distance of some thirty miles, which is nothing at all. Moreover, it is certain that when we shall have brought our line down to Sault Ste. Marie, the American companies will come and connect with our road. Moreover, the company that offers to construct the Sault Ste. Marie Branch is composed of business men, who know that if they brought a line down to Sault Ste. Marie, it would be an urgent necessity for them to connect in order to reach the American products. Moreover, Sir, it is sufficient upon this point to quote Mr. Fleming's report for last year. This is what he says upon this question: route via Chicago and the south shore of Lake Michigan; it would constantly command the traffic, at all seasons of the year, from every point north of the latitude of St. Paul."

That is the opinion of an eminent man that cannot be contradicted, and which shows all the advantages of the line I suggest, and which also shows to what extent the objections so far raised against the Sault Ste Marie Branch are founded. The most serious objection is that it would be useless to build this line under present circumstances, because there are no communications on American territory. Mr. Fleming's report shows the contrary as do subsequent reports that we have in our possession, and it is a demonstrated fact that since this report was written other lines have been built, and we have now only to throw a bridge over the river Ste. Marie in order to unite the branch line with the American roads. Another objection that has been made is that this road would pass through American territory. Can this objection be considered serious when we look at the history of railroads in this country. This country is a new country, and when the first railways were beginning to be built we were necessarily obliged to make use of our neighbor's lines. Not more than four or five years ago when we built the Winnipeg branch everybody was agreed that it was an excellent affair, and yet this road put Canadian territory in communication with American lines of railway. So it was in former times with regard to the Grand Trunk. The first railway built in the Province of Quebec was to connect the St. Lawrence with Lake Champlain. The second railway built was to connect the St. Lawrence with the Atlantic ocean. Upon this latter question were not all agreed that it was the policy to be adopted? Would it have been patriotic to say: "We will not make use of the American lines, we will have nothing to do with the Americans, we will not carry their products, we only want to carry our own products, and we do not want to have any international trade." It is, moreover, said that this road should be built entirely on Canadian territory, because we may some day or another be at war with the United States. Well, if this railway is to be a military route it is an Imperial railway that we are to build. The policy the Government adopted two years ago, when they wanted to make of this road an Imperial one, was the right policy and they should have adhered to it. If the Government intended to impose upon the people of Canada the burden they are now imposing, merely to build a military route, then I protest againt such a policy. I am as much attached to my country as any one, but I believe that with regard to the question of defence, England owes us a good deal, and if we are going to build a military route it would be worth while to obtain help from England. Besides, if we are going to adopt this new policy, if we are going to legislate in view of a possible war, we must draw the last consequence. In order to have a military route, we must in the first place have an army to transport. If you are consistent, you will first of all create an army, and then you may think of having military routes. But, in my opinion, it is a bad policy to say that we are going to construct now a military road in order to transport an army that we have not, that we shall perhaps never have, and especially that nobody wants. However some may look at this question, there is not one good reason to be urged against the policy I am proposing. The policy I propose is the one heretofore followed. It is to go gradually "The facilities for bridging the River Ste. Marie will doubtless soon lead to the establishment of railway connections extending through the northern part of Michigan and through Wisconsin to Minnesota. Already the railways of the United States, south of Lake Superior, extend to Escanada, a point not more than 150 miles from Sault Ste. Marie. It appears also, from late information, that a line is under contract and is process of construction easterly to the Strait of Mackinaw. This line will reach within forty miles of Sault Ste. Marie. A railway on this short distance, with the Sault Branch, would connect the railway systems of the North-Western States with eastern Canada. All the country north and west of Green Bay and St. Paul would have a choice of outlets. The Canadian outlet would be more direct than any Mr. Laurier.

at all; the line to the north of Lake Superior would pass through an uninhabited and perhaps an uninhabitable country, which, at all events, will not be inhabited for a long time to come. It is possible that in the future, when the population of the North-West becomes very dense, people will be obliged to seek an opening elsewhere, and it is possible that we may see a part of this population going towards the shores of Lake Superior. Perhaps this will not happen for a long time, it may happen in a short time. At all events, in the present state of things, every man wishing to give this matter his serious attention must come to the conclusion that it is important to postpone, for the time being; the construction of the line to the north of Lake Superior, and to be content with the Sault Ste. Marie Branch. I will therefore move the following amendment:—

That the said resolutions be not now read a second time, but that it be resolved, That the contract respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway provides for the construction of between 600 and 700 miles of railway to the north of Lake Superior between Lake Nipissing and the junction with the road from Thunder Bay, through a difficult and uninhabited country, and at a vast expense, that a mere fraction of the cost of this road would, if applied as a basis of credit, secure the construction of those 63 miles common to the through line and to the Sault Ste. Marie Railway, and also of the remainder of the line to Sault Ste. Marie within 3 years; that the line by Sault Ste. Marie would give Ontario, Quebec and the East, railway connection with the North-West of nearly the same length, and of better quality than the proposed North Shore line; that it would also give to Canada a great trade from an enormous area of the Western States, extending from the boundary to a point seuth of St. Paul, and even now inhabited by about 1,200,000 souls; that it would secure a way traffic; that it would thus give within 3 years, and at a fraction of the cost of the other line, greater benefit than can be secured by that line in 10 years, which is the period stipulated for its construction; that it would bring both the Western States and the Canadian North-West into connection by rail with the ocean steamers at Montreal and Quebec on a route shorter by about 300 miles, than the existing route to New York; that this advantage, together with the further gain of about 250 miles in the ocean voyage to Liverpool, would give this route a commanding position, and secure great benefit to the country at large; that the construction of the line to the Sault of Goulais Bay would also give a first-class rail and water route via Sault Ste. Marie and Thunder Bay, within our own limits, by the shortest possible line for the transport of emigrants, goods and produce; that the construction of the line from Sturgeon River to or beyond Thunder Bay to the n

Mr. OUIMET. I do not rise, Mr. Speaker, with the intention of prolonging this debate, nor of discussing whether it be opportune to fasten the building of the section to the north of Lake Superior. I understand that hon. members who have spoken before me upon this question have given all the reasons that could be given why this line should be immediately built, from a commercial as well as a national point of view; nor do I wish to discuss whether it be opportune to aid the construction of a line to Sault Ste. Marie to connect with the different railways leading into the American North-West. I believe that the building of this connecting line or this branch road is not contrary, or at least I trust it is not contrary, to the policy of the Government. I think that it is for our interest to contribute towards the building of that road as soon as, and as much as the commercial wants requrie it; and if the Northern Pacific Railway brings or offers to bring its line down to Sault Ste. Marie, I think that the Government, in the interest of the Province of Quebec, as well as in the interest of the whole Dominion of Canada, will not be backward in materially assisting in the construction of this connecting link of which the hon, member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) has But if I have risen it is merely to draw the attenspoken. tion of the House, and especially the attention of the Province of Quebec, members from hon. to a fact, or rather to an estimate made by the hon. member for Quebec East in order to make his proposition acceptable to the representatives of our Province. One thing that will probably console us for having to remain here during several sittings yet, to vote upon the different amendments of the Opposition and it would seem there are twentythree of them one thing, I say, will console us for remain- division ;-

ing here to vote upon these amendments and lose our time, is that, in order to establish each one of the points contained in the different amendments, the hon. members entrusted with these diverse motions are obliged to destroy, at least in a great measure, the arguments of those entrusted with the other motions. The hon, member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright), I believe, laid before this House a long resolution in order to alarm us and prevent us from voting the immense sums that the Government propose giving away to the Syndicate. He has shown us, by piling up millions upon millions, what this sum was going to amount to; and in order to hoap up these millions, he estimated the lands at $3.18 an acre, and so doing, he arrived at the enormous sum of $79,000,000 that we are going to give to the Syndicate in lands alone. Well, it was all very fine from the standpoint adopted by the hon. member for Centre Huron; but the hon, member for Quebec East has another theory to propound. He wanted to show us how little it would cost to build the Sault Stc. Marie Branch, and in order to do so he gave us these figures; he told us that there are 290 miles of road to be built in order to connect the American roads with the Canada Central. "Now," said he, "a Company offers to build this connecting link for a subsidy of $4,000 in money and of 8,000 acres of land per mile." And he added: "$4,000 a mile gives us $1,600,000 and 8,000 acres of land per mile-"he gave us the amount in money—he gave us an amount of $2,320,000.

Mr. LAURIER. It was evidently a slip.

Mr. OUIMET. I have risen for almost nothing at all, Mr. Speaker, because it seems that when those gentlemen get into a tight place it is a slip. I distinctly remarked, and I even made a note of it, that the hon, member said that it would cost only $2,300,000 to build this connecting link. He stated that $4,000 per mile in money gave $1,600,000, and then he said that 8,000 acres per mile gave $2,320,000, which formed a total of $3,920,000; 8,000 acres per mile gives exactly 2,320,000 acres, and in order to arrive at the total of which I took note, $3,920,000, the hon, member must have valued the land at $1 per acre.

Mr. LAURIER. Will the hon, member allow me to ask him whether I made the addition?

Mr. OUIMET. The hon. member gave the two amounts I have just mentioned, and he made the addition himself. At all events, Mr. Speaker, it is a slip. Well, these slips, we will make use of when the time comes. I wish to draw the attention of the House, I wish to draw especially the attention of members belonging to my Province, that hon. gentlemen opposite are liable to make slips; they have made so many of them for the last twenty-five years that they see no consequence in them, but the public think that they are of great consequence, and the proof of it is that these gentlemen remained so short a time in power. Sir, I have only one word to add. I hope, and I am satisfied that in supporting the policy of the Government, we are sup-porting the policy most conducive to the development of our resources in the Prevince of Quebec and to the increasing in value of the railway that the Province of Quebec has built. And I am happy to say that the Syndicate or Company that is to build the Pacific Railway is exceedingly well disposed in favor of our railway; and if I am to believe intermation that I hold, not from an official source, but from what I consider a perfectly reliable source, the future of the railway of the Province of Quebec is perfectly well secured; and for me that is no slight motive for voting, and voting willingly, with the Government on this question, which is certainly the most important question upon which we shall be called upon to vote during this Session.

The question being put that the resolutions be now read a second time,

Mr. MILLS moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to; and (at 11 o'clock, p.m.,) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 27th January, 1881.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. BUNSTER. I desire to eall your attention, Mr. Speaker, to an injustice that was done me yesterday. I was here when a motion was called, I heard it read, and voted on it, but the hon member for North Perth (Mr. Trow), whipped me out of my vote by calling attention to it. I do not propose to be so whipped out of my vote. I daim I was entitled to vote, and I wish my vote recorded according to the way in which I gave it. I was compelled to visit my friends, and I therefore hope, Mr. Speaker, you will do me justice by having my vote recorded, and I respectfully request that my vote be inserted in the record, in order that I may be placed in a proper position before my constituents.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon, member was kind enough to notify me of his intention to bring this matter before the House, and I then told him I could not have his vote recorded. The 17th Rule of the House says:

"When the Speaker is putting a question, no member shall walk out of or acr as the House, or make any noise or disturbance."

Putting the question is from the time I ask the House "yea" or "nay" till the time I declare the motion carried or lost. The name of the hon, member was recorded, but he went out of the House, according to his own statement, before the question was finally declared. The members will recognize the wisdom of that rule; and, in fact, it would be impossible to receive the votes if every hon, member was allowed to leave his seat, for in this country the vote is taken by what we call assist et leve, by which every member must be in his seat when the vote is taken. If every hon, me ber was allowed to leave his seat, a great confusion would be created, and it would be impossible to correctly register the names of the members. In this case I am very sorry that I cannot comply with the request of the hon, member for Yancouver. I am bound to comply with the Rules of the House.

Mr. BUNSTER. I must bow to the decision of the Speaker, but no authority has yet been quoted to show that I am wrong.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have quoted the Rule of the House.

POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANK DEPOSITS.

Mr. GAULT enquired, Is it the intention of the Government to reduce the rate of interest allowed in the Post Office Savings Banks to three per cent., the rate which is now current at all the banks?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The Government has not decided to reduce the rate of interest to three per cent., on deposits in Post Office Savings Banks.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Charles Tupper for the second reading of the resolutions reported from the Committee of the Whole on the 14th January instant, granting certain moneys and lands for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. MILIS. Mr. Speaker, I need not refer in detail to the provisions of the proposed contract giving a monopoly of railway construction in the North-West for twenty years.

To these provisions I propose moving an amendment. We know that the proposed contract which this House is asked to confirm contains provisions restricting the construction of railways on the south side of the proposed Pacific Railway. Railways may be built extending to the southwest or west of south, so long as they do not approach within fifteen miles of the boundary. I venture to say that from the celebrated days of monopoly in the time of Queen Elizabeth down to our own day, so extraordinary a monopoly as that now proposed in this contract has never been sub-mitted to any Parliament. When we look at the extent of the territory in the North-West, the population which we hope will flow into it, and the extent to which railway construction will be necessary to accommodate that population, we begin to realise the extraordinary nature of the provisions which the Government have inserted in this contract, and which are to remain in operation for twenty years. Along the boundary line there is to be a strip of country 1,000 miles in length and 15 miles in width within which no railway can be constructed by any corporation but this favored one which is now about to receive this charter. When we look at the settlements of the United States, we find that they are not continuous, they are we find that they are not continuous, they are spread over a great extent of country. They begin at points widely separate and from each other, and they radiate in all directions from the points where settlements were first begun. There is no doubt that if there had been any attempt on the part of the Government of the United States, or the Government of the different States, to confine the settlement to a particular locality, and to discourage it from spreading beyond that locality until the intervals became filled up, the progress of the United States in population and wealth would have been very much retarded. We know that a people who are disposed to immigrate, who have no great attachment to a particular locality, and who may be looked upon as the pioneers of settlement, often desire to separate themselves widely from colonies first begun, and estab ish settlements at points far distant from them. The proposition before the House tends to discourage this tendency, and to confine settlement to the line of this particular railway and the railways which may at some subsequent period before the expiration of the twenty years be constructed by this Company as branch lines to their main trunk line. Now, we are told by hon. gentlemen opposite that there are upwards of 200,000,000 acres of cultivated land in the North-West Territories, of which about one-eighth will become the property of the Company. They will select their locations, and in some cases, perhaps, upon these locations, begin the construction of tributary lines. But there must be a large extent of country into which settlers may go, where this Company will have no lands, and where they will have no interest in affording railway facilities. Many districts of this kind will be far away from the main line and the construction of a railway away from the main line, and the construction of a railway to them would entail a very considerable expenditure. Yet settlers would be very likely to choose such districts, particularly for the reason that they could have continuous settlement, uninterrupted by the lands of the railway company. In the building of school-houses and churches, the establishment of municipal institutions, and the making of roads and bridges, the inhabitants of continuously settled districts will have immense advantages. But, according to this contract, no railway can be constructed to such districts. Last year a company was incorporated to build a railway towards Turtle Mountain and the Souris District. We know that that Company had a fair prospect of raising the moneys necessary to construct their road; but since this charter has been submitted to the House, that enterprise has been defeated. But suppose such a road were built, along that line to find an eastern market when this Company has a complete monopoly of the outlets? They could discourage settlement in that district. They could say at Winnipeg: "We have not the cars necessary to forward your freight instantly; it must stand over; " and doubtless, difficulties would present themselves that would make the settlers along such a road wholly dependent upon this Company, and in a position inferior to that occupied by settlers along the tributary roads belonging to the Company. I say, then, that we can easily understand how railway construction, even in the direction permitted by this charter, would be defeated by the incorporation of this Company, so that practically the provisions of this Bill amount to an absolute prohibition against the construction of railways by any other corporation, as much as if they were inhibited from building railroads by the provisions of the Bill itself. The charter says, no railroad shall be built southward of south-west, or to the eastward. There is a long segment of a circle, within which no railway construction can take place; the gates of commerce throughout the whole North West are put in the hands of this Company. It may be said that the main line would be depleted of its traffic if the construction of other roads to the east were permitted. But we know right well that if the railway passes into the hands of this corporation, and if they do not sell out at a speculation, that other lines will be by them constructed to the southward, extending to their roads in Minnesota. The effect of that would be that this Company would have a practical monopoly, not for twenty years merely, but for a very much longer period. Now, we have a territory 1,000 miles in length, and 15 miles in width—15,000 square miles-within which no railway construction can take place, unless by this Company. If we should suppose that in 20 years, one-fifth of that territory, 3,000 square miles, were brought under cultivation, we shall have 1,920,000 acres occupied for which no railway facilities within a reasonable distance will be afforded. If but fifteen bushels of wheat to the acre were produced, there would be, in one-tifth of that territory, nearly 29,000,000 bushels of wheat. Now supposing—for it is possible only in supposition—that you have a railway constructed along the border of the fifteen miles, every farmer would have an average of fifteen miles to drive to the nearest railway station. What a waste of capital does this prohibition cause! We know that the removal of a ton of wheat by horse and wagon costs nearly 14 cents a mile, which is equal to $2 for the fifteen miles. The removal of a crop of 600,000 tons a year to the border would cost $1,200,000 by horse and wagon, while its removal by rail, at one cent per ton per mile, the average price outside Minnesota, would cost $90,000, so that you would have a waste of capital to the extent of $1,100,000 a year within this belt, by the prohibition of railway construction alone. We know that the Company may build railways in any direction. What motive, what object will they have for building those roads? It will be the interest of the Company to build the through line as soon as possible, in order that they may secure the largest amount of profit with the smallest expenditure of capital. They will construct, under the provisions of this contract, 900 miles of road through the territories, and as it will be their interest to have the lands occupied within a reasonable distance of that road first, they will not undertake to build branch lines to the other lands they may own so long as the lands lying within a reasonable distance of the road already constructed remain unoccupied. It will be their interest, therefore, to bear as little of the expense of working the line of railway as possible. They diminish those expenses to a minimum by the construction of no more railroad than is ab-olutely necessary, and they increase also the profits upon the traffic upon it would seek an outlet to the eastern the actual population of the country by confining that markets. What chance would there be for the population population within very narrow and restricted limits. We know that it is the interest of a railway company not to expend more capital than is necessary, and not to carry any more trade and passengers than are necessary. It is their interest to obtain the largest amount of earnings possible from the smallest amount of work they may do. We know if a coachman were running a coach, he would rather carry five passengers at forty cents than ten at twenty cents per head. The net product is not more but the difference to him will be considerable. Railway companies operate their lines on precisely the same principle. During the last twenty years, in the State of Minnesota, about 4,000 miles of railway have been built; in the State of Iowa, about the same quantity; and in the State of Wisconsin, not quite 3,000 miles. So that in an area less than the area of the North-West Territories, within twenty years nearly 11,000 miles of railway have been constructed. I do not pretend to say that so large an amount of railway construction will be necessary in the North-West Territories, but even if we were to suppose but a quarter of that amount were required, it would still be four times as great as the number of miles this Company are compelled to build. I am not saying anything in regard to the effect of this monopoly on the tolls and charges. We know that where there is no competition, no matter whether the Government interfere to regulate the tolls or not, the charges upon the population will be much heavier than they would be if actual competition existed, and there would be competition if freedom was allowed to Parliament here and the Government of the North-West Territories to promote railway construction. It may be that the Company will undertake to promote settlement in those districts where they have lands, and where it is necessary to give employment to the road. But what did they in Minnesota? In Minnesota, under the present tariff—I have it on first rate authority—the company claim to realize a net earning of $2 annually on every acre of land trought into cultivation within the State. That is a very large amount, and it would be easy for this Company to realize for the settlers within a period of twenty years, five times the sum they obtained from the sale of their lands, over and above the ordinary and reasonable rates of freight. By creating, under this contract, a monopoly in railway construction, we will impose serious impediments to the settlement of the portions of the North-West where the Company has not an immediate interest in promoting settlement, and serious burdens on the population of the districts where settlement goes on. There is no doubt the effect of extravagant rates of freight on the production of a country is very considerable. There are many articles that could, if reasonable ra'es were charged, be produced, which could not be produced otherwise. You can confine the industry of the farming population within narrow limits. It is only those articles that will bear being carried a long distance at high rates that are likely to be produced at all; and not only do you seriously interfere with the settlement of the country, but you seriously interfere with its wealth and property by the restrictions contained in this resolution. When we look at the experience of English railway corporations, where there is a practical monopoly in some instances, within certain limits, we find that the dividends declared by a company are in very slight proportion to the charges actually made. In the case of the North and South Western Railway in 1866, it returned a dividend of 6 per cent. The North London returned also a dividend of 6 per cent., although its charges were 20 per cent. less. The Sterling and Dumferm line charged 50 per cent. more than the North London, and its dividend was exactly the same. The Caledonian charged 33 per cent. higher still, and declared the same dividend, while the Lancashire and Yorkshire company charged 30 per cent, more than the Fleming, Mr. MILLS.

Caledonian, and the North Western 20 per cent. higher still, without any increase of dividend by either. So we find the work done by a railway diminishes as the rates increase, and the increased rates do not, perhaps, to any perceptible extent, unless they are excessively increased, diminish the profits. In 1854, two Scotch railway companies undertook to run against each other from that e but the difference period until some time in 1855, for a period of about one Railway companies and a half years. They reduced their freight and passenger charges to about one eighth of what they had been before. This reduction affected the dividend of one company to the extent of one-half and the other to the extent of one per cent. There is no doubt the reduction of charges upon railways would have very much the same effect as the reduction of charges on letters and newspapers. We know that the business increased as the charge diminished; but the earnings were diminished for the time being. It takes some years before the whole advantage to be derived from diminution of charges to be felt. Every railway stockbroker wishes his stock to command the highest price for the time being, so that he may dispose of it at any moment; and, although he may feel that, if his investment were to be permanent in railway stocks, he would gain something by reduction of rates in the course of a few years, he looks more to the present investment, and in no case do we find this reduction of charge take place. In this case we see that there are very serious restrictions on railway construction, and these restrictions must not only interfere with the settlement of the North-West, with the furnishing of railway facilities to its population, but also largely with its profits in those districts through which the railway runs, in consequence of the charges the company will be able to make under the existing circumstances, when they will have complete control of the entire trade of that country. With these observations, I will put into your hands the following amendment:-

That the Contract for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, while it gives to the Company the absolute and perpetual right to build branch lines of Railway from any point or points along their line, to any point or points within the Territories of the Dominion, and cedes to the Company, free, all Government lands required in connection with such branches, provides that for twenty years no line of railway shall be authorized by the Dominion Parliament, or by any new Province, to be constructed south of the Canadian Pacific Railway from ony point at or near that Railway, except such as shall run South-West, or to the Westward of South West, nor to within fifteen miles of the boundary between the United States and Canada,; the same Contract cedes to the Company the only existing outlets to the North-West, namely, the Pembina branch, being the outlet Southward, and the Thunder Bay line, being the outlet Eastward; the Company embraces the chief proprietors of the St. Panl and Manitoba Railway, the only present means of railway communication with the North-West; and, thus not only is there no provision for securing competition, but there is provision securing the Company against competitien and they are secured in a monopoly of the trade and traffic of the North-West for at least twenty years, and that the said Contract is, in this respect, objectionable.

Mr. BORDEN. Before the motion is put, I desire to call the attention of the House to a subject which, I think, is of vital importance to the future of the North-West. I refer to the allotment of the land. It will be observed that by this contract the lands which are given as a subsidy for the construction of the road are all to be taken from the North-West, between the Province of Manitoba and that of British Columbia. This is a provision differing from those with regard to the construction of all other roads either in the United States or Canada, and differing too from the provisions of the Act of 1874. The universal custom has been that the lands should be taken along the whole line of railway, and not from any part, and especially not from the most fertile portion of the whole country. In the Act of 1874 it was provided that the land should be taken from Nipissing to the Pacific Ocean. Then, Sir, as to the quality of the lands. The lands are to be taken in alternate blocks along the railway, and for twenty-four miles on each side of it, and the company may refuse lands which are not fairly fit for settlement. According to the Act of 1874, the lands were to be of fair average quality, and there is a very wide distinction between those qualifications. A great deal has been said as to the amount of land we have in the North-West, and there can be no question that we have a very great quantity of land there; but when we consider that this Company have the privilege of retusing all but the choice lands, we must admit that that fact will limit very materially the extent of the lands which we will have after these gentlemen have made their selection. It is not probable that the choice lands such as they are entitled to receive are greater in extent than 60,000000 or 70,000,000, acres, after deducting the Indian reserves, the school lands, and the Hudson's Bay lands. So that the Syndicate will retain very nearly one half of the choice lands of the whole North-West. Another provision to which I desire to call the attention of the House is that the area of the lakes and water stretches is not to be computed in their acreage; that is to say, they are to have the advantage of harbors along lakes, river frontage and water privileges, and the area cowater, is not to be counted against them. covered by They are to be allowed to go elsewhere and select an equivalent number of acres anywhere in the most fertile lands of the North-West. Now, with regard to the deficiency which will remain after they have taken all the lands which they can get along the main line of the railway. It is not probable that they will be able to get along the main line more than 11,000,000 acres. which will leave a deficiency of 14,000,000. three methods by which this deficiency is to be made up. First, the Company may locate branch lines of railway. They have simply to file a plan in the office of the Minister of Railways, and they may go at their own sweet will anywhere in the North-West and select the most valuable lands in alternate blocks on each side of such located lines, or they may select any tract of land, and, with the consent of the Government, establish a front line and have the land laid off upon that. They have the option of selecting the lands wherever they choose, though, of course, the Government must agree to the laying out of front lines; but this is not true of the branch lines—they may go wherever they choose and lay out for themselves branch lines. Any further deficiency may be made up from whole tracts of land not limited to blocks of a mile square, as in the previous case, anywhere in the North-West Territory, by the consent of the Government. It may be contended that the interests of the country are sufficiently guarded by the provision that the selection shall be made with the consent of the Government, but considering the generous manner in which this Company has been already treated, by the Government, I think it is fair to assume that the Government would not be very strict or particular with them in the future. It is also to be borne in mind that there are gentlemen composing that Company who have extraordinary opportunities of getting information as to where the best and most valuable lands are to be found. The Act of 1874, on the contrary, provided that all deficiencies ever and above what could be obtained along the main line of the railway, should be selected by the Governor in Council-a provision much more favorable to the country and less favorable to the Company. Further, I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact, that no reservations have been made of the coal, mineral, petroleum, salt producing or timber lands, or stone quarries. The coal land—and it is well established now that there important coal areas existing in that country—is a matter of the utmost importance, especially in view of the fact that wood is so scarce, and that the future population of that country will have to depend upon coal for their fuel. Professor Macoun, in Mr. Fleming's Report for 1880, page 244, refers to the presence of coal in that country as follows:-

"Here (at Fort McLeod) is abundance of coal, so that there will be an ample supply of fuel for all purposes. It is currently reported that all the settlers in the vicinity of the Fort burn this coal. Messrs. Patrick and Nelson, two surveyors whom I met at Morleyville, told me they had discovered coal in numerous places south of my line of exploration."

Again he says

"It will be seen by the foregoing remarks that wood is scarce in the southern part of the section explored, but this is in some degree compensated for by the immense deposits of lignite or coal known to exist. On Bow, Red Deer and Battle kivers, these crop out in many places, and specimens burnt on the grouud, and others brought home, testify to their value for fuel. As mentioned on another page, a trader and farmer named French has burned coal, taken from a six-feet seam at the Blackfoot Crossing, for two years. He finds it burns well in self-feeding coal stoves, of which he has two, and I found it to burn well and for a long time on an open fire."

As to minerals he says:

"In every place where lignite was seen, more or less brown or clay iron ore was present, and it is extremely probable that a more thorough examination of the country will reveal large deposits of it in connection with the lignite."

I observe that in the Act incorporating the Union Pacific, mineral lands are exempt from the provisions of the Act. As to timber lands which are of exceeding great value to the settler, Mr. Fleming says:

"The country lying to the south of the fifty-second parallel is devoid of timber. This disadvantage may be said to apply to the whole district extending westerly from the Touchwood Hills to the foothills of the Rocky Mountains, a distance of fully 400 miles. Within this space no wood is found except in the valleys of the large rivers and in a few whom is found except in the varietys of the large rivers and in a few gullies.

"Much fine timber, consisting of spruce and Dougl's pine, is found along the flanks of the Rocky Mountains from whence it may be floated down many of the larger rivers. This timber should be carefully husbanded. In a few years it will be of immense value for building purposes to the settlers on the plains."

Now, I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that under the provision of this clause the Company would have the power to lay out one of these branch lines along any of these rivers where timber is known to exist, and, without ever constructing one mile of the railway, to take advantage of all that timber and use the river for the purpose of floating it down. Further than that, these timber lands being so scarce and the Company having such extraordinary power of selection, it is quite possible that they may acquire at least one-half of all the timber lands of the North-West. Then with regard to stone quarries, I observe in the same report, at page 202, the following:

"Numerous outcrops of limestone were noticed in the stream-beds, which will be, doubtless, of much value in the future."

Now, I desire to call your attention to the fact that the Government have not in the past considered these matters unworthy of their attention. I find that only last Session, in the Dominion Lands Act, section 6, it was enacted:

"Lands containing coal or other minerals, whether in surveyed or unsurveyed territory, shall not be subject to the provisions of this Act, respecting sale or homestead, but shall be disposed of in such manner respecting sale of household out shall be disposed of in such maintains and conditions, as may from time to time be fixed by the Governor in Council by regulations to be made on that behalf which regulations shall not go into operation until after they shall have been published for four successive weeks in the Canada Gazette, and laid before both Houses of Parliament for thirty days without disapproval, by either

With regard to timber lands the same Act, section 47. provides:

"And, whereas it is expedient that the timber forming islands or belts in townships thrown open for settlement, should be so disposed of as to benefit the greatest number of settlers, and to prevent petty monopoly,

A petty monopoly was thus to be prevented by the provisions of this Act, and it does not seem to me to be within the spirit of the Act that a gigantic monopoly of the kind to which I have referred should be established there. In the same Act, section 30, I find that the public interest was guarded as respecting the stone quarries. Sub-section 2 provided

"Any legal sub-division or other portion of unappropriated Dominion Any legal suc-living or other portion of unappropriated Dominion land which may include a water power, harbor, or stone quarry, shall not be open for purchase at the rate of $1 per acre, but the same shall be reserved from ordinary sale, to be disposed of in such manner and on such terms and conditions as may be fixed by the Governor in Council on the report of the Minister of the Interior."

I object further to this contract, that it provides no proper means of deciding whether the alternate sections on the main line or branches shall be accepted by the Company. According to the contract the Company has power to reject any land not fairly fit for settlement, and should any question arise between the Company and the Government, and such questions are very likely to arise-because the Company will not be inclined to receive any but the very best lands—then there is no provision made for any tribunal to decide the question. It seems to me, that under this provision extraordinary powers have been given Farrow, to the Company, such powers, I venture to say, as were never given to any company in the world in the selection of Fortin, land. They have a roving commission over the whole Fulton, Mr. BORDEN.

North-West, to select the best and most valuable lands wherever they can find them. In fact, it is a virtual surrender to the Company of the very best and most valuable lands of the North-West. I, therefore, move:

That the contract respecting the Canadian Pacific Ralway provides that the Company shall not be obliged to receive any section of land consisting in any material degree of land not fairly fit for settlement, and that lakes and water stretches shall not be compared in the acreage of the Company's sections, and gives to the Company the right of selecting in alternate blocks anywhere in the fertile belt, or elsewhere, the amount of the large deficiency in the acreage to be found in where, the amount of the large deficiency in the acreage to be found in alternate blocks within twenty-four miles of the main line, thus including coal, mineral, timber, stone-quarry, petroleum and salt producing lands in their choice, and gives the Company, with the coasent of the Government, the right to select in the North-West-Territories, any tracts of land not taken up, in order to supply the deficiency, and provides no proper means of deciding whether the alternate sections on the main line, and branches should be accepted by the Company; and that the said Contract is, in these particulars, unjust and imposition

Merner,

Mr. ANGLIN. We are much indebted, Mr. Speaker, to the frankness of several hon, gentlemen on the other side, for the information publicly conveyed to us, that they are still much dissatisfied with the provisions of this contract, and that if they had their own way they would effect some material changes in that instrument. Now, I am sure that hon, gentlemen who are still dissatisfied, and very many of those who, although they have declared that it is essentially a good contract, yet admit that at first they were greatly dissatisfied with it, find in the provision with which I am about to deal, one of the strongest causes of that dissatisfac-It must have struck the mind of every hon, gentleman in this House on first reading this contract, that the mode of distributing the money and lands to be appropriated for the construction of this railway, was such a mode as could not reasonably be approved of. We waited with considerable interest to hear first from the hon. Minister who moved these resolutions, and subsequentty from the Prime Minister himself, why that distribution was so disproportionate to the value of the work to be done. In all previous Acts it was expressly provided that any payment in money and land was to bear such proportion to the amount of work actually done when the payment was made, as the total amount of the subsidies bore to the total value of the work to be done. In this case only has that wise and salutary provision been departed from, and departed from so widely as to attract a very large share of public attention out of the House, and to create a very large amount of dissatisfaction within the House. In the contract we find it provided that for the central section the subsidy is to be $10,000 and 12,500 acres per mile, while for the very difficult eastern section the amount of money is larger, it is true, $15,384 per mile, but the quantity of land per mile is even smaller than that for the central section; and for the western portion of the central section, 450 miles, which is said to be extremely difficult, the money subsidy is to be $.3,333 per mile, and the land subsidy. 16,666 acres per mile, a larger quantity of land per mile than is to be given for the central section, but, as compared with the difficulty of the work, a very much smaller proportion. Now, to estimate correctly how far these subsidies are disproportionate to the value of the work to be done, it is necessary to try and fix some value on the lands to be given away. This year, hon gentlemen on the other side, with, I think, but a solitary exception, have attempted to base arguments on the assumption that this land is of very little value indeed. The highest value any hon, gentleman has placed upon it is a dollar an acre—a dollar an acre for the choicest lands lying within 24 miles of the railway to be constructed in the fertile belt-and some have ventured to put the market value at even a very much lower figure. The hon. member for North Simcoe, who did seem to deal more directly and a little more fairly than any other hon. gentleman on that side of the House with this whole question, while admitting the lands to be worth the Government valuation, of $3.18 an acre, nevertheless argued that the cost of administration would be no less than 85 cents an acre. The hon, the Minister of Railways, in one of his speeches, told us that the net proceeds of all the land hitherto disposed of in the North West, deducting the expense of administration, has not exceeded 16 cents an acre. He ridiculed the idea that this large quantity of land could be held by us to be of very material value. Now, if we, on this side of the House, ventured to make any such assertions as this; if we had ventured last year to say that a dollar an acre would be the outside value of any of this land lying beside the railway; if we had ventured to point out that the net proceeds had been only sixteen cents an acre as a basis on which to form a valuation of the lands—I think we would have heard ourselves denounced as most unpatment, that all this land is worthless, and that therefore no people having a regard for their future welfare should emigrate to the North-West. We should have been told prabably, that our speeches would be quoted by the railway companies in the United States and circulated all over the world, to show people that, instead of going to the Canadian North-West, they should settle somewhere in the United States. We have been repeatedly charged this Session with inconsistency because we have chosen to assume, as the basis of some of our calculations, the official statements made a few short months ago by hon, gentlemen on the other side of the House. We have heard $3.18 spoken of as the estimate of the value of the lands made by the Opposition this year, and even the hon. First Minister himself spoke of $3.18 as the estimate of the leader of the Opposition. Sir, we have relied this year, merely as a basis of calculation however, on the formal official statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite so late as last April. We have not been guilty of any inconsistency in this matter. The charge of inconsistency lies entirely at the doors of hon. gentlemen opposite; but they seem to assume that they have a right in dealing with this subject to perform the most astonishing acrobatic feats—somersault forward, somersault backwards, somersault to the right, somersault to the left, and finish with a grand double somersault-and then turn to their supporters and ask them to admire their wonderful agility, and regard all those sudden changes as proof of their wisdom, their statesmanship, and their great administrative ability. Perhaps I may be permitted to quote trative ability. Perhaps I may be permitted to quote the words of the right hon. gentleman at the head of the Government. When speaking on this question on the 5th of April last, he endeavored to show that the railway could be built from the proceeds of a small portion of this territory in the North-West, and estimated the value of the lands in the various belts laid out by a previous Order in Council at $5 an acre within belt A, $4 an acre within belt B, and so on. He calculated that 25,000 people would have gone into that country within this last season, and of those 25,000, 3,000 heads of families would have taken up free homestead, that of those 1,500 would purchase railway lands, and 1,500 would not. This he called a most moderate calculation. Then, according to his estimate, the average price of the lands, extending from the section within five miles of the railway, to 60 or 100 miles outside of the railway, sold to the 1,500 purchasers, would be $3 an acre. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) showed him afterwards that striking an average fairly accorded to the rules of arithmetic, the price would be $3.18 per acre; and this average has since been repeatedly used, but not, however, as the true value, by any one of us on this side of the House, for we have never undertaken to put an estimate on the value of lands in the North-West. I have been charged myself with inconsistency on this point. The hon, member for Frontenac was kind enough to quote a very small passage from my speech of last Session to prove that inconsistency. I did not take the trouble to look up the passage. I never read that speech, but I am certain he cannot bring forward any opinion of mine in which I put a positive estimate on the lands. I made that speech to show that there was not sufficient evidence to maintain the statement that we have so vast an area of really fertile and valuable lands as 250,000,000 acres. I had no means then of forming an estimate of the value of lands, nor do I pretend to say that I have any means of doing so now. We are forced, however, in calculating the effects of this contract, to accept the final estimates of hon. gentlemen opposite. A year previous, when we were asked for 100,000,000 acres of land, as a means of providing for the construction of the railway and the importation and settlement of a large number of immigrants riotic, as doing all in our power to create an impression in that country, we were told that the 100,000,000 acres throughout the world that the country is unfit for settle- were worth $2 an acre. Now, we are asked to believe that the 25,000,000 acres lying next to the main line of railway are worth, at the very outside, but $1 an acre. I do not think we can accept that valuation. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) last evening, argued that -these lands could not be sold for a great many years; that they would be held so long, and sold in such small quantities, and the cost of administration would be so great that, even if they were to be sold at $3.18 per acre, the net proceeds would be smaller than anything we had calculated. The hon. member for Westmoreland (Sir Albert J. Smith) reminded him that the hon, the First Minister, last year, made a different estimate, to which, to my astonishment, the hon. gentleman replied that the hon. member for Westmoreland did not, last year, believe that estimate. The hon. member for North Simcoe apparently neither believed the hon. the First Minister, last year, nor believes him now. The right hon, the First Minister proceeded in his speech, last Session, very minutely, to tell us how the lands would be settled. He told us 25,000 immigrants were to go in last year, with an increase of 5,000 each year, so that we might expect 30,000 this year; he told us how much land they would take, what price they would pay; he made a minute calculation to show the amount of interest that would accrue on the unpaid portions of the purchase money, and he arrived at the following conclusion:-

"I think this is a very moderate es'imate. On those figures, the estimated total of cash revenue to be received from the lands, by 1890, is $38,693,000."

Going further, giving the actual value of all the lands sold. he said:

"That if we added to the total unpaid $32,712,000 tne $38,593,000 that would be received in 1890, we would have $71,305,000 as the amount to be actually received, or for which parties would be actually liable to the Government in ten years—that is by April 1890."

A year before the Syndicate is bound to complete the road. We find that several days after that the hon. Minister of Railways repeated that very statement. He said:

"When I remind the House that the land alone, according to the authority of the right hon. Minister of the Interior, based on a calculation which he believes to be sound, will give us in the next ten years $38,000,000 in hand and $32,000,000 to be received, or a total of $70,000,000, it will be seen that we incur no risk."

Thus, according to these official statements, made only nine months ago, out of the proceeds of a small portion of the whole area of lands, a portion considerably less than the 25,000,000 acres, we would have ample means to secure the construction of this whole road. we are now about to give 25,000,000 acres of the choicest railway lands to the Syndicate, and, in addition, we are to give them $25,000,000 in cash, besides the various exemptions, privileges and immunities of incalculable value. The least we might ask is that this money and these lands should be so distributed as to afford to this country the best possible security that this work, as a whole, will be completed. It is acknowledged that the work of constructing the two ends will be exceedingly difficult and costly, as compared with the labor of constructing the middle portion, and that the cost of working those two ends, when completed, will be very much greater than any revenue the Company can possibly hope obtain from years them for many We should, therefore, have ample security that the work, as a whole, will be completed. Why, then, is it proposed to give to this Company $10,000 in cash per mile, and 12,500 acres of the very best land for the construction of the central section? The highest estimate we have had of the cost of its construction, according to the latest specifications, is $13,000 a mile. The Minister of Railways last year boasted that he had already let 100 miles of that road on such terms that the cost would scarcely exceed $8,000 a mile—everything included. It will certainly not are to vote away liberally the money and lands of the road will be even as good as the road the Minister of Railways proposed to construct as a Government work. Indeed, the presumption is entirely to the contrary, and that no Government would undertake to build so slight, flimsy and poor a road as a private company may, possibly build if it be to their interest to save money in construction. The very fact that the contract contains the proviso that this road shall be constructed according to the standard of the Union Pacific as first constructed, shows the intentions of the Syndicate in this respect. But if we pay say $10,000 a mile for this central section, we will have given all it is to cost and we will give 12,500 acres a miles of the best lands in addition. We are told that one-fifth of the land will be forfeited if the contract be not carried out; that would leave them 10,000 acres a mile for the 900 miles, which is, nevertheless, 10,000 acres a mile over and above the whole cost of the road. It has been shown that one of the most extraordinary provisos of this extraordinary contract is that the first 100 miles now partly built, can be completed by the Government at the cost of $900,000, and then handed over to the Company, and, with it, a balance of $100,000 in cash and 10,000 acres a mile, or 1,000,000 acres altogether -the most valuable lands in the country, because the nearest to the present settlements. How are we to estimate what we pay for this section? We are to pay the whole cost in actual cash, and 10,000 acres a mile, besides which, if taken at $1 an acre, means $10,000 a mile more than the cost; or, if we value it at $2 an acre, $20,000 a mile; if at $3 an acre, $30,000 a mile over and above the actual cost of the road. Now, those lands extend back twenty-f ur miles on each side of the road, and embrace all in belt A estimated at $5 an acre, and all in B at $4, and only a small portion in belt C at $3 an acre. Taking those three sections, the estimated value is $4.04 an acre, which gives $40,400 a mile beyond the whole cost of the railroad, in addition to the 100 miles presented to the Syndicate. The leader of the Government, a few evenings ago, to show why the new offer should not be accepted, argued very ably and quite conclusively, that the amount asked for the central section was enormously more than it would cost or they ought to receive for its construction, and yet he and his Government promise the first Syndicate one third more for the same work than the payment he demonstrated to be preposterous and absurd. Why should we pay that enormous amount to those gentlemen? The right hon, gentleman said it is to be paid to encourage them to build this portion of the road very rapidly. I do not think it necessary to pay such a very large amount for that. Again, he said it was to be paid them to furnish them with a basis of credit, so that they can go into the markets of the world and all the more easily raise the money necessary to complete the two difficult ends. But, according to his own statement last year, this whole road was to cost but $75,000,000, and the highest estimate we have had made it $78,000,000; and we are giving the Syndicate $28,000,000 in works, $25,000,000 in cash, and 25,000,000 acres, which, valued even at $1 an acre, makes $25,000,000, or, altogether, $78,000,000. Now, gentlemen receiving all this can have no great necessity for floating a large amount of bonds, or obtaining a large amount of credit; a very small amount of capital will be quite ample in this case; a few millions to start with will be quite as much as any men competent to carry on this great work will require. Are we to solemnly enter into such terms with men who, at the very start, require we should create for them a basis of credit, who are not themselves the great capitalists with the unbounded resources and means we have heard of-who require we should pay them $30,000 or $40,000 a mile more than this portion of the road will cost them, to enable them to proceed with the rest of it? I do not think we should be parties to any such bargain, or that hon gentlemen opposite, willing as they exceed $9,000 a mile. We have now no security that the country, for the purpose of sustaining this Government, should sanction this agreement. It was argued by the member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) that it would cost, at least, $20,000,000 to pay the working expenses of the two ends, over and above the receipts, for a few years after their completion. Would it not, then, be better that we ourselves retained the means from time to time, of compensating this Syndicate, or any Company that might succeed them, for their loss in the working of those unprofitable sections than that we should, in advance, hand over to them this enormous amount for this service, and trust, afterwards, as has been said, to their honor? We have no security whatever in this contract that those gentlemen, or any who may succeed them, will build the whole road, or work it after it has been built. I know it is alleged by hon, gentlemen opposite that we have ample security. The contract furnishes no such security. The contract provides that the money is to be paid to the Syndicate, day by day, as the work progresses. It is provided by the Act of incorporation that so soon as the Company have been organized, and have paid a certain amount of money to the credit of the Receiver-General, that moment the credit of the receiver-cremeral, that moment the individual and personal responsibility of the gentlemen named in the contract shall altogether and absolutely cease. They may, within a week or two, or within a year or two, cease to be stock-holders, and to talk about depending on their honor is to admit that we are prepared to take a most sentimental and unbusiness-like view of this most important matter. It is our duty to see that the contract itself provides sufficient security for the completion of the work and the running of the road, and to provide that we must take care that we do not pay to these gentlemen at any time more of the subsidy in land or money than is fairly proportionable to the amount of work they have accomplished. The Company might build only the central section of the railway and put that beyond the power of the Government altogether. It has been alleged that if the Company fail to carry out the contract the Courts can be put in operation and enforce the performance of the contract. But by that time, as any one can see under the terms of the contract, the Courts may have to deal with men irresponsible and insolvent. It is to be borne in mind, that they have power, under the provisions of the charter, to issue bonds, simply covering the roadway itself, for $20,000 per mile. They may issue bonds on the basis of a subsidy in money to be paid by the Government, and they may issue bonds on the lands—tho bonds in both cases covering the road. Now, we can easily understand why a company—who may not be, perhaps, the most honorable men in the world, and whose ideas may, at all events, be formed on the standard of railway men on the other side of the line, who as we know are acting up to that standard, if they found it was not likely to be profitable to retain their property in the railway, may issue bonds to an amount covering the value, or more than the value, of the road-bed and rolling-stock, and thus place themselves beyond the reach of the Government or of the country. I think, therefore, we ought to provide that the contract itself furnish sufficient security. One of the best means of doing this is to retain in our own hands all the money and the land subsidy that the contractors do not become fairly entitled to by reason of the work they may have done. It may be said by hon. gentlemen on the other side, that we are now bound to accept the contract in full; that however objectionable this particular feature may be, it is necessary to accept it as part of the whole. But that cannot reasonably be asserted now, inasmuch as we have already had it stated officially on the other side that no less than three important objections to this contract are to be met by material alterations in the contract itself or in the laws of the country. One of these objections was so serious that if it had not been removed, even the hon, member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall) would have voted against the measure—that is the one in regard to the standard of the railway, and we have had a letter read from some members of the Syndicate declaring that they agree to have that portion of the contract so altered that the road shall be constructed according to the standard of the Union Pacific as it was in 1873. Now, we do not attach much importance to that letter. We think it of no value whatever, unless there be a declaration inserted in the contract itself. The hon, member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) has declared that letter to be mere waste paper, and no one of common sense will contend that if this charter be ratified the Company to be formed will be bound in the slightest degree by the declaration which these gentlemen have made. But there is, however, an acknowledgment that a change in that respect is absolutely necessary and ought to be made, though whether it will be made is another matter. Then we are told that the provision with regard to the exemption of materials from duty is to be met by a provision that all Canadians who may thereafter obtain contracts for furnishing any of the articles exempted from duties shall be entitled to import duty free, all the raw material necessary to fulfill such contracts. That is a very extraordinary provision which we will probably have to discuss by-and-bye, and I think we shall be able to show that it will not at all meet the reasonable objections made by those who are in favor of the National Policy. But the promise of an amendment made by the Government upon that point has at all events shown that a change was found to be necessary. There is another important change which we are told will be made by amending another Act of Parliament. It is not proposed to alter the charter immediately or directly, in an houest, straightforward, manly way, but the change is to be made by the introduction of a clause in another Act of Parliament-to amend the general Railway Act, and this clause-we are promised, will be such as to protect us to a great extent against the monopoly, which it is proposed to create in the North-West. Now we have very little hope of any benefit resulting from the operation of any such amendment made in that Act, but we have the admission, however, on the part of the hou. gentlemen on the other side, especially the right hon. leader of the Government himself, that in this respect the charter is so objectionable that a change must be brought about by some means or other. Now, if in these respects the charter is not only objectionable, but if it is to be practically altered, if the laws of the country are to be so shaped hereafter that these objections shall be overcome, or that an attempt shall be made to overcome them, then, surely if the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have, as I believe they have, strong objection to this mode of distributing the money and the land which they are about to give for the purpose of obtaining the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway as a whole and the running of it as a whole, they can relieve themselves from the responsibility which, in this case, rests especially on them, by demanding at the hands of their leaders a change in this section of the contract in the sense I have pointed out. Therefore, we feel it to be our duty on this side of the House to propose the amendment I am about to place in your hands. In moving it, I have felt it to be my duty to draw the attention of the hon. gentlemen on the other side to the very extraordinary character of that section of the charter, and to show them that a change ought to be made, and that if they only will it, the change may yet be made. As in obedience to their will, other changes have been made or are proposed; so if they only will it in this case also, a material change, a change that will prove very satisfactory to a very large number of the people of this country, a change that will go far to allay the apprehensions now existing in the minds of a large number of people, may be made. I therefore move:

That the contract, respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway, provides for a distribution of the money and land to be given for the work, wholly arbitrary and disproportionate; that land and money, far in excess of the proportiona'e cost, is assigned to the prairie part, the easiest and most productive portion of the railway, which it is alleged, will be constructed within three years, by which time, the Company will be entitled it cash and lands to a surplus amounting, according to the Government estimate of the land at $3.18 an acre, to over $4,000,000, which surplus should have been reserved and applied towards the construction and working of the eastern and western ends, and that the said contract is. working of the eastern and western ends, and that the said contract is, in this respect, objectionable.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. TROW. I rise, Mr. Speaker, to move an amendment to the resolution before the House. It is not my intention to occupy much time. The subject has been thoroughly Mr. Anglin.

think the discussion will be disapproved of by the country at large. Something has already been gained in the right direction. Since the outset the Government have made several concessions. The first had reference to the nature of the construction of the road. In the contract under discussion, the road was to be constructed equal to the Union Pacific Railway when first constructed, which was apparently a flimsy and inexpensive road. Either a member of the Syndicate or their attorney have agreed to construct the road and finish it in accordance with the manner in which that road was left in 1873, making a very material difference from 1869 to 1873. Another concession that has been made by the Government was elicited from the Premier by the hon, member for Halton, in reference to the tolls or tariff, or the amount of profit that the Syndicate could extract from their customers It was very indefinite in the in freight rates. wording of the contract whether it was 10 per cent. upon the whole amount expended for construction, that is the amount expended by the Government and also the amount expended by the Syndicate. However, that matter has been set at rest by the Premier, and the 10 per cent. will be only upon the portion of the expenditure made by the Syndicate. Another concession that has been made, apparently, is the rebate or drawback to manufacturers. In my amendment I take decided objection to clause 16 of the resolutions before the House:

"The Canadian Pacific Railway, and all stations and station grounds, workshors, buildings, yards and other property, rolling stock and appurtenances required and used for the construction and working thereof, and the capital sto k of the Company shall be for ever free from taxation by the Dominion, or by any Province hereafter to be established or by any municipal corporation therein, and the lands of the Company, in the North-West Territories, until they are either sold or occupied, shall also be free from taxation for twenty years after the grant thereof from the Crown."

The exemption from taxation is altogether exceptional. I have read of very large grants being given to railway companies in several States of the American Union, but I have still to learn that any of the lands given for the construction of railways in the United States have been exempt from taxation. The Government have certainly the right to tax her citizens, but it is supposed that this taxation will be for the general good of the com-munity. The fundamental principal of all Governments should be equality of taxation and the distribution of rates on the rich as well as on the poor indiscriminately. Inequality in taxation has been characteristic of despotic and barbarous nations, and in my reading of the granting of bonuses and lands to railways, I have failed to find a single instance where lands so granted have been entirely exempted, directly or indirectly, from taxation, either by State or municipal authorities. For a few years, and until the country becomes partially settled, the exemption from taxation provided in the contract may not be of vital importance; but in a very few years, if hon. gentlemen on the Ministerial benches are prophets, which, I presume, they are not, a large immigration will be thrown into that country by the Government and Syndicate combined, and if so, the taxation of the lands held by the Syndicate will be of great importance within a very great few years. In travelling through Manitoba I found that in old settlements that have been established for half a century at least, there are no roads and no bridges spanning small streams, and the people are working at great disadvantage for want of municipal government. There is scarcely a parish or section of the country where taxation had been levied until very recently, and a large portion of Manitoba proper, which has been settled for 50 or 60 years, including the Kildonan settlement on the Red River and Assiniboine, had up to last year not discussed, at the same time I think some very important enjoyed municipal government, and unless there is some amendments may yet be presented to the House. I do not regulation for taxation in the settlements there is no possibility of the country becoming developed. If some few hundreds of thousands of people are located in the North-West-because there is ample scope for very large settlements, and while there are very large limits not Mother Country to settle on its land—and that depends entirely upon the Syndicate's liberality in the location of settlers and on the sale of their lands—if a very large settlement should take place within eight or ten years, it would become very oppressive to actual settlers to have to contribute double towards the construction of bridges, the organization of school sections, the erection of schools, the making of roads and the development of the country, for every alternate section will be vacant. There is no safeguard furnished the settler in regard to drainage. A settler may be placed at a considerable disadvantage by receiving on his land the drainage of lands belonging to the Syndicate, but it would be useless to lodge a complaint against it. There should be some law by which the settler should be allowed at his own expense to carry the surplus water off his own farm across the lands of the Syndicate without being liable to actions for damages. Although such matters may be carried to excess, I hope at all events no disturbance may take place, but I know there are settlers in that country now who will not be imposed upon in respect of these matters, but will certainly make complaints to the Government for redress and fight if necessary until their grievances are removed. It was an attempt to tax the colonies that led to the rebellion in the United States, and ultimately led to the declaration of independence; and we may suggest that something of that kind may possibly take place if such a scheme is carried to the extent of injuring the public interest and retarding settlement in a new country. The exemption of a small portion of land is sometimes tolerated by a community, but the exemption of 25,000,000 acres will be a very serious check on the settlement of the country. In the reign of George III., about 1820, a large tract of land was coded to the Canada Company in Western Ontariotwo and a half millions of acres. The Company was placed under certain restrictions, were to open out roads, construct bridges, &c., &c., and was not exempt from taxation, yet the settlers had many difficulties to contend with in respect to the collection of rates from that Company. The Company contributed yearly were paid yearly. towards municipal government in the various sections where they owned lands. The Canada Company paid 1s. 3d. sterling per acre for their lands, one-third was thrown in for swampy and marshy lands not fit for cultivation. The value of those lands have been enhanced by actual settlement, and I know in many municipalities in Perth those lands, for which that Company have contributed a trifling sum for roads and education purposes, have advanced to $25 or $30 per acre. The labor and toil of the settler in the North West will enhance the value of the Syndicate lands to such an extent that it will be to their interest to retain them, as they are improving yearly, without paying any taxes, at the expense of the honest settler. In the western portion of Manitoba lands were as essed this year at 8 cents per acre; but estimating the rate at 2 cents per acre, the Syndicate would have to pay on the 25,000,000 acres $500,000 a year. In twelve years their taxes would aggregate to $6,000,000. recollect that some years ago petitions were presented to advisability of altering the contract in this respect. The this House against the leasing of lands by the Canada Syndicate will have ample means to bear taxation. They Company, and the late Hon. J. H. Cameron, an eminent are exempt from Dominion taxation, but as this taxation is lawyer, contended that this House had no jurisdiction in never direct I am unable to say what that would amount the matter, as the grant to the Canada Company was an to, nor can I understand what Dominion tax they could be imperial grant. In the event of new provinces being exempted from. The Dominion is increasing its indebtedformed in the North-West, the Company will hold out a ness yearly upwards of $100,000,000 since Confederation, similar defense that they are not accountable to any local and unless checked may find it necessary to resort to direct authority, having obtained their contract and charter from the Dominion Government. It was represented that instead of winding up their business rapidly and encouraging settlement, in one year the company sold 20,000 acres and resumed adopted for colonization, still there are almost unlimited lands possession of 36,000 acres which they had leased; fit for settlement, and no doubt by a good policy on the part of so that instead of yearly diminishing the quantity the Syndicate it may attract a number of settlers from the of land held by the company, and winding up the business of the Company, their limits were increasing by reverting back to them as the original proprietors. Exemptions in any country should apply merely to churches—and many even question that -to educational and benevelent institutions, and to public buildings, but to nothing else. No land, especially that belonging to a wealthy corporation, should be exempted. If you exempt half the arable lands in the North-West, about the quantity this Syndicate will possess, the other half must contribute 100 per cent more, and the result will be that the taxation will fall heavily on the poor settler. The Syndicate has many other advantages. They have a monopoly of the carrying trade of that country. They have the Pembina Branch, which now yields a profit of $70,000 or $80,000 a year, and will, in a very few years, yield a profit of $300,000 or $400,000 a year. They will have possession of the Selkirk line as soon as it is completed. They have a bonus of land and money for the prairie section, very much in excess of the cost of The hon. Minister of Railways the other construction. night thought a monopoly for this Syndicate was quite out of the question. He said there was a road chartered to Hudson's Bay, along the west side of Lake Winnipeg to Norway House, thence down the course of the Nelson River, which would give access from the North-West to the sea, and thus check any monopoly. Well, that is in the distance. Evidence has been given that for only two or three months in the year can the Hudson's Straits be navigated, as they are generally blocked up with ice, and those months are not the season when the surplus produce of any country finds it way to the markets of the world. The hon. member for Westminster (Mr. McInnes) comes to a different conclusion. He says that when the railway is constructed through the Rocky Mountains, the whole of the produce of the North-West will find an outlet through British Columbia to the Pacific Ocean. We have no expectation that such will be the case, as this Dominion has spent about $40,000,000 in the construction of the Intercolonial Railway, many millions in widening and deepening our canals, and about $60,000,000 in forming railway connection with the North-West, on the assumption that the surplus produce of the North-West will find its way eastward, and recoup the Dominion to some extent for those enormous expenditures. The right hon, premier last Session entered into some calculations to show that there would be an immense sale of lands in the North-West. I have no such anticipation. The cost of the mounted police and the payments to the Indians under various treaties made heretofore, would amount at least to probably $1,500,000, and it is questionable whether the Government, at all events, can sell sufficient lands to recoup the Dominion for its annual expenditure in the maintenance of the mounted police payments under Indian treaties and other subsidies to Manitoba and the North-West. expenditure in that country, which will be under the control of the Syndicate, is such that they should be made subject to taxation, and I hope the House will see the

they have taken the caution to be exempted from Dominion taxation. is highly essential that every foot of land in the North-West should contribute its quota towards the improving of that great country. The lands to be exempt from taxation for twenty years, are more extensive than the whole area of England, which is but 24,596,266 acres, and the old country has been under cultivation and improvement for the last 2,000 years. It is greater than the area of the whole cultivated lands of Ireland, which is only 15,337,853 acres; than the area of the whole cultivated lands of Scotland, which is only, 4,738,127 acres; than that of the lands under cultivation in Ontario, which is but 8,883,626 acres, and of Quebec, 5,783,944 acres; also greater than the area of cultivated lands in New Brunswick, 1,171,15; acres; in Nova Scotia, 1,627,991, and in Prince Edward Island, 445,103 acres; or greater than the total area of cultivated lands in the Dominion, outside the Province of Manitoba, which amounts to but 17,780,921 acres. Thus the lands granted to the Syndicate are nearly one-half larger in extent than the cultivated area of the Dominion, more than four times greater than that of Quebec, three times that of Ontario, twenty-two times that of New Brunswick, eighteen times that of Nova Scotia, and fifty times the cultivated area of Prince Edward Island. I will not further detain the House, but will move the following amendment:-

That the contract respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway exempts 25,000,000 acres of choice lands of the Company from Dominion, Provincial and Municipal taxation, until said lands are either sold or occupied for twenty years after the grant thereof from the Crown; that such exemption is unjust and will impose undue burdens on the settlers on the alternate sections, who will be obliged to make improvements and incur expenses, enhancing the value of the Company's lands without receiving their fair share of the cost of said improvements and expenses; that such exemption by freeing the Company from the burdens of taxation, will reduce the inducements to the Company to sell their lands early, and will enable the Company free of expense to hold their lands, till their value has been greatly enhanced by the labors of the adjoining settlers, and that the said contract is, in this respect, objectionable.

Mr. CAMERON. I did not intend troubling the House with any observations on this question, had it not been for some remarks made the other evening by the hon. member for Lincoln, who challenged the accuracy of the figures I took the liberty to present to the House when discussing this branch of the important question under consideration; and I embrace the very earliest opportunity that presents itself, of showing that hon. gentleman and this House that the figures I then submitted to this House were entirely correct, and that the statements made by him were wholly wide of the mark. The hon, gentleman stated that I represented to the House that the Union Pacific Railway paid $835,000 a year taxes. I said no such thing. He further said that I stated the Union Pacific Railway paid $835,000 last year in taxes. I said no such thing. He continued: "I notice that the hon. gentleman has summarized the amount at $835,000 a year, for four years." I made no such statement. When I did make a few observations the other evening, I advanced no argument, I drew no conclusion whatever from the amount of taxes paid by the Union Pacific Railway. I gave that as an illustration. I did mention that the Union Pacific Railway paid in four years $835,000, but the conclusion of my argument was not based on the amount of taxes that were paid by the Union Pacific Railway. I mentioned several other railways in the United States that, during the past ten years, had paid large sums in taxes. I referred to the Chicago and Rock Island Railway which had paid fourteen cents an acre of taxes on their lands for the year 1879, and drew the conclusion that if the same rate of taxation were imposed upon the lands held by this Canadian Pacific Railway, the amount would be very large. Now, the hon. gentleman did not dare to challenge the accuracy Mr. Trow.

other railways, and the only figures to which the hon. gentleman drew the attention of the House, and by which he wished to break the force of the effect of the position I took, were those of the Union Pacific Railway. Now, hon gentlemen opposite in the House have been told that the Union Pacific Railway was paying taxes upon 10,500,100 acres. I say that is not so, that they never did pay taxes on that quantity of land. I do admit, that in the report of my speech on this subject an error crept in.

Some hon. MEMBERS Who?

Mr. CAMERON. If hon gentlemen opposite will listen for a moment and learn wisdom from what I am going to say, they will find that the error is not in my favor, but against me, that the figures I gave are under the mark. I appear to have said that $835,000 taxes was paid in four years upon 10,500,000 acres; I now say that is not correct. But I did say that the amount of land assessed to the Union Pacific Railway was nothing like that that the $835,000 extended over a year or two more, but certainly not over seventeen years, as the member for Lincoln asserted. He knows, or ought to know, that the first mile of that railway was not laid seventeen years ago. The first hundred miles were not completed till 1865, and even then they were not in a position to enable the company to get their land grant that year, and it did not get a foot of land until it was certified by the Commissioners appointed by the Government. The hon, gentleman opposite attached a great deal of importance to that matter. He said that hon, gentlemen on the Opposition side, and particularly the member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron), have given figures not borne out by the record, and if they are not borne out by the record in this instance they are not in the others. I am prepared to show that my figures are correct, and that those of the member for Lincoln are not borne out by the record-to show this from documentary evidence from the Department at Washington. I suppose that hon, gentleman, who has taken the trouble to send a telegram to Mr. Poor, author of the manual on railroads, on this subject will, at all events accept that evidence. Either the hon gentleman is right and I am wrong, or I am wrong and he is right; but I am going to prove he is wrong. In the Act of incorporation of the Union Pacific Railway, it is provided that as each twenty miles is constructed:

"The President of the United States shall appoint three Commissioners to examine the same and report to him in relation thereto, and if it appears to him that twenty consecutive miles of said railroad line have been completed and equipped in all respects, as required by this Act, then, upon certificate of said Commissioners to that effect, patents should issue conveying the right and title to said lines and to said Company."

Now it is perfectly clear that while this land remained the property of the United States it could not be taxed. The hon, gentleman knows it remained such property until the quantity of land appropriated to the Union Pacific Railway was certified to by the Commissioners. I am not going to read from Poor, but from the report of the Secretary of the Interior, a document of 1878-9. Here is a return presented to the United States Congress, giving the quantity of lands certified in every year from 1871 to 1878 inclusive. Up to 1871, 639,024 acres; 1872, none; 1873, 15,395; 1874, 50,733; 1875, 919,771; 1876, 219,373; 1877, 39,371; 1878, 1,842. Thus down to 1878 the whole aggregate certified to by the Commissioners appointed by the United States Government amounted to but 2,430,370 acres. The hon. gentleman from Lincoln must know that a cent of taxes could not be imposed by the local authorities on that land until it was certified and patented to the railway company. He may say that the moment that land was set apart for the construction of this road, it was liable to taxation. It is not so. I the hon. gentleman did not dare to challenge the accuracy will read a passage from "Hilliard on Taxation," that will of any one of the figures that I gave with respect to the show beyond controversy that this land was subject to taxation until certified by the Commissioners to the United States Government and patented to the railway:

"Lands included in grants for the construction of railroads made by Congress are liable to taxation by the State, after the companies become possessed of the unconditional title in fee, and before they have been alienated by the companies."

Thus the moment the companies obtain the unconditional title and fee of those lands, they are subject to taxation. I have shown by the report of the Secretary of Interior that up to 1st of January, 1879, less than 2,500,000 acres had been so certified. Hilliard further says:

"Lands held by a railroad, under the land grant Acts of Congress, which have never been certified or set apart, and which are incapable of identification, are not taxable. So lands conditionally purchased from the United States by the Pacific Railway were not liable to State taxation, where the conditions of the sale had not been fulfilled, and no legal or equitable title had passed to the railway."

It is thus clear that lands could not be liable to taxation until certified and patented.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I understand, then, from the hon. gentleman's statement that, although the Company became entitled to lands, no taxation fell on them till they could make sales of them on receiving the patent from the Government?

Mr. CAMERON. I say that, although the lands were appropriated by the United States Government for railway purposes they were not subject to taxation till certified by the Comment further, they were not liable to taxation until some sort of title had passed, either legal or equitable, from the Government to the Company. I say they were liable before the railway company sold them. If they were not so liable to taxation, then the Company would not be liable for any taxation, because the very moment it sold the lands it had them certified and conveyed to the purchasers in nine cases in ten. But the point I wish to make is, these lands were not liable until they were certified by the Commissioners, and I have shown by the return of the Secretary of the Interior that less than 2,500,000 acres were certified to up to 1st January, 1879. More than that, Sir, during the period from 1871 to 1879 the railway had sold over 1,000,000 acres of those lands, and, therefore, there only remained in their hands about 1,500,000 liable to taxation, and the whole of the taxes that were imposed and paid in 1879, namely, $835,000, was simply upon 1,500,000 acres which have been certified to but not sold. The hon. gentleman says that the Union Pacific Railway only paid last year, $108,000 in taxes. I admit that, but upon what quantity of land did they pay it? They paid it on the quantity of land certified by the Commissioners to the United States Government, and remaining unsold in the hands of the company. Now, by a very simple calculation he can ascertain what would be the taxation on 25,000,000 acres if their taxes on 1,500,000 acres amount to $108,000. hon. gentleman will find that I, in the simplicity of my heart, made an error on the wrong side, and that the amount, so far from being any less than I stated, is very much greater. Assuming that the company each year paid taxes on 1,500,000 acres, for say ten years, to the amount of $835,025, the amount for each year would be $83,502, the amount upon 25,000,000 acres would be for one year, $1,387,673, or for ten years, $13,876,730, I have stated that they only paid taxes on 1,000,000 acres, and if that amount produces $108,000, multiply that by 20,000,000, and we get $2,160,000, so that I do not think the hon, gentleman has made much by challenging the correctness of my figures; and when he has occasion to do so again he had better be a little more careful about his own, for he does not appear to have made very much of them, even with the assistance of Mr. Mc-Fariane, or Mr. Poor, who, by the way, does not appear to know very much on the subject. The hon, gentleman Fleming, knows that even if the figures he gives were correct more than one-half the land is made up of alkaline plains and land covered with sage bushes, and that they are utterly unfit for settlement, whereas our lands are the choice lands of the North-West Territories.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. As the hon, gentleman has taken some pains to explain to the House what he intended to say in reference to his figures, would he allow me to ask him if he adheres to the statement I understood him to make in his speech, viz.: that the exemption from taxation that this Company will enjoy under this arrangement would be something like $22,000,000 in ten years. He made another calculation in which he placed the exemption at $2,600,000. I would like to ask the hon, gentleman if his speech, as reported in the Hansard, correctly conveys his views upon these points?

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). If the hon, gentleman will refer to my speech, he will find the data on which I based my remark. I assumed that the lands within the twenty mile belt would be assessed at $5 per acre, and I gave the House a certificate I had received from a collector in one of the municipalities of Manitoba, showing that that was the rate upon which the taxation was based there. I then said that, taking that rate, the exemption would amount to the sum I stated, and I say so still.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Am I correct in saying that the impression he wished to convey to the House was that the amount of taxation from which the Company are to be exempted would amount to $20,000,000 in ten years.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). The whole of the figures are given in my speech. You will find them there.

Mr. RYKERT. How do you make the amount $15,000,000?

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I never said it would come to $15,000,000. I said the land and the amount granted in the shape of stations and water frontage, and so on, assuming that the assessment would be the same as upon a number of American roads which I named, would come to that amount. The hon. gentleman had better read my speech. He will find it all there and it will do him good.

Mr. RYKE T. If the hon, gentleman will give me a corrected copy of his speech, I will do so. I understand he blames the reporters.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). No; I do not blame the reporters. Read my speech.

Mr. RYKERT. Will the hon. gentleman explain, if he can, why he puts the amount at $15,000,000, while the member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) puts it at $21,000,000, and the Globe at $16,700,000. Will the hon. gentleman be kind enough to explain these contradictions?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant.) No one pretends to deny the fact that there are points granted by the Government in the contract that are not in the interest of the country. I need not enumerate them. These objectionable points have been mentioned, not only by gentlemen sitting upon your left hand, but also by gentlemen sitting upon your right hand. They have been pointed out by men of eminent ability on both sides of the House. I need not remind you of the utterances of those gentlemen for they are fresh in your memory. The exemption of the road-bed from taxation has already been pronounced upon separately. There is the exemption of the lands from taxation, the iniquity of which has been in a measure depicted to the House to-night. There is the unfair provision of the amount that is to be paid in the construction of the central section of this railway; there is the excessive amount that is to be paid for the construction of the portion of the work that is to be undertaken by the Government; there is the free admission of a large part of the material to be used in the construction of this work-this and many other points, not forgetting the extraordinary powers, the monopoly powers that are given to this Company to control the trade and traffic of almost half a continent; the further power that is given to that Corporation to levy rates, which in their nature are excessive and must prove burdensome to the people of this country—these are only some of the bad points of the contract now before you; these are only some of the objections which hon gentlemen opposite see themselves in this contract, and in their calmer moments have acknowledged. But, recognizing that there were these defects, these clauses that were prejudicial to the best interests to this Canada of ours, they said that, viewed and looking at the thing in its better to accept the contract taken as a whole, completeness, it was better to accept the contract with all its blemishes than not to accept it at all, Mr. RYKERT.

placing it on the shoulders an incorporated company. Sir, the eloquent tongue of the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall) alleged as a reason to his constituents assembled in his county that he was not opposed to the grant being given to this Company. Why? Because he considered it was a matter of great importance that this work should be taken out the of control of the Government, as if it remained in their hands it might be used for corrupt purposes, at least would inevitably tend to charges of corruption being levelled against them, and it was to prevent the possibility of those charges that he thought it was wise and expedient for Parliament to sanction the proposition that would hand the building of this route over to a company and relieve the Government of that responsibility altogether. I am bound to say that was the impression of the people of this country with reference to this matter, and I am further bound to tell you—I speak my individual opinion that I believe the sentiment of the people of this country, as they first understood this contract to be, such as they were given by the Government organs to understand to be the terms, while the Government were maintaining their secrecy, while they were maintaining the darkness that enshrouded this scheme from its inception down to the moment it was laid on the Table -I am bound to say that, guided by the information vouchsafed to us, the people of this country were prepared to accept this scheme, and the people did feel a sensible relief from the fact, that what it was alleged had been brought about, had actually taken place. This deception was kept up until the last moment; this deception was practised upon the members of this Chamber when we wended our way, following your lead, to the Upper House, in order to hear from His Excellency's lips the speech he was to deliver to us on that occasion. I say deceptive words were put into His Excellency's mouth on that occasion. Let me read an extract from that speech:

During the recess my advisers thought the time opportune for making "During the recess my advisers thought the time opportune for making another attempt to carry out the declared preference of Parliament for the construction and operation of the Canadian Pacific Railway by means of an incorporated company, aided by grants of money and land, rather than by the direct action of the Government.

"Three of my Ministers, therefore, proceeded to England for the purpose of carrying on negotiations to that end."

What end? Why, the end they had declared in the previous paragraph, that they recognized the fact that Parliament had declared that that road was to be constructed and operated through the means of an incorporated company rather than by the direct action of the Government, and in order to bring that about, three Ministers, he says, proceeded to England for the purpose of carrying on negotiations to that end. He was further instructed to say:

"I am pleased to be able to inform you that their offers were so far successful that a contract has been entered into, subject to the approval of Parliament, with men of high financial standing in Europe, the United States and Canada for the speedy construction and permanent working of this great national enterprise."

What does it all refer to? It is a speech about the Canadian Pacific Railway, not about a portion of that railway across the prairie country, it is not speaking about the country north of Lake Superior, it is not speaking of these two portions of Canadian Pacific Railway alone, detached-nothing of the kind. His Excellency was telling us that three of his Ministers proceeded to England for the purpose of entering into negotiations with eminent capitalists for the construction of this railway, the whole railway across the continent, every part of the railroad that had not been already completed by direct action of the Government. Well, what was the effect of those utterances upon hon. leader of the Opposition fully believed in his heart, as because they allege that in so doing we were lifting the burden of constructing the Canadian Pacific Railway off the shoulders of the Government and on the motion to adopt a reply to the Address from the Throne before the contract was laid on the Table? He said thus:

"The aspect of finality, and the creation of a company and its rights, therefore import elements of the utmost importance and of practical novelty into the discussion of this subject."

So astute a man as the hon. gentleman from West Durham, taking all the information he had at that time from the Government organ, and from the mouth of His Excellency, assumed that the contract, when it would be laid upon the Table of the House, would be final in its nature; a contract, the terms of which, would remove every part of the construction of this railway out of the hands of the Government, and place it upon the shoulders of a company. Was he undeceived by the right hon. the First Minister, who followed him on that occasion? The delusion was still kept up and maintained by that hon. gentleman's utterances, an extract from which I will now read to you:

"The Syndicate are resolved to build this road and they are able to do so, and they had such confidence, in fact, in the arrangement being a fair one, both for themselves and for Canada, that they were confident it would meet with the sanction of Parliament whenever it was submitted, and, therefore, if Government had told them 'Go on at once and we are satisfied that Parliament will confirm our action, and sustain you in whatever expenditure you have gone into,' they would have been quite ready to have gone on with the undertaking. And, Sir, notwithstanding sneers that have been thrown out on the subject, I believe the gentlemen who have undertaken this great and responsible work will complete it successfully, that they will run and work it successfully, and that they will open up that country to the utmost extent which such a great enterprise is calculated to cause, and in doing so, they will relieve this country of immediate responsibility of expenditure in building the road in a great degree."

Such was the utterance of the First Minister, and such were the utterances of the organ of that hon, gentleman, instructed to take the course they did. No one believed but what that contract would reveal, when it was brought down to the House, an arrangement on the part of strong financial men to undertake the entire construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. But, Sir, when the contract came down, did we find that in it? To that point, I will address myself for a few minutes later on. But with this contract lying on the Table, containing some clauses that the hon. Minister of Railways knew was in it. What were his utterances when he made his great speech on December 14th, introducing the contract and recommending it to the favorable consideration of the House. The hon, gentleman at that time said:

"I have the satisfaction of knowing that throughout this intelligent country every man breathed more freely when he learned that the great enormous undertaking of constructing and operating the railway was to be lifted from the shoulders of the Government."

That was the hon. gentleman's language, even when the contract was on the Table, supposing us to be entirely ignorant of clause 6 in the contract. Hon. gentleman opposite, even after the contract was published and in the hands of the people, sought to impress the view on the public mind that the contract would relieve Canada from any responsibility for the construction of any portion of the Pacific Railway. We hear the same tune sung to-day. We find in an issue of the hon. gentleman's organ in this city, of the day before yesterday, an article giving the key to hon. gentlemen opposite as to the course they must take when they return to their constituents, and as to how the battle is to be fought. The Ottawa Citizen of the 24th January, says:

"Despite this, during the early part of the discussion, provincial politics, bitter recrimination, unfair tactics, ungenerous insinuations, characterized many of the speeches delivered, until every right thinking man, even though at first taking little interest in the question, decided in his own mind that it was better for the country that this contract should be duly ratified and the Pacific Railroad construction placed in the hands of a company, and removed not only from departmental control, but from the arena of the House of Commons debates as well."

That is the line the hon. the Minister of Railways followed, and which hon, gentlemen opposite and their Ottawa organ have had the hardihood to follow, with the contract on the Table and copies of it scattered broad cast through the country and containing clause 6, which every one can read. What does clause 6 say? It runs as follows:—

"Unless prevented by the act of God, the Queen's enemies, intestine disturbances, epidemics, floods or other causes beyond the control of the Government, the Government shall cause to be completed the said Lake Superior section, by the dates fixed by the existing contracts for the construction thereof; and shall also cause to be completed the portion of the said Western section now under contract, namely, from Kamloops to Yale, within the period fixed by the contracts therefor, namely, by the thirtieth day of June, 1885; and shall also cause to be completed, on or before the first day of May. 1891, the remaining portion of the said Western section, lying between Yale and Port Moody, which shall be constructed of equally good quality in every respect with the standard hereby created for the portion hereby contracted for. And the said Lake Superior section, and the portions of the said Western section now under contract, shall be completed as nearly as practicable according to the specifications and conditions of the contracts therefor except in so far as the same have been modified by the Government prior to this contract."

Does that clause look like relieving the Government from the work and placing it upon the shoulders of an incorporated company? What work has the Government to do? To complete the Lake Superior section, 406 miles of the most difficult road possible, to be built in good order. Then there is the section of 127 miles, through the canyons of the Rocky Mountains, from Yale to Kamloops. The cost is estimated at $10,000,000. The contract is to be finished in 1885, which will involve taking out of the public treasury and out of the pockets of the tax payers $2,000,000 a year, to hand over to the contractors to satisfy them. Add to all this the unknown cost for constructing the other portion of the British Columbia section, that part between Yale and Port Moody, in order that the House may get a little idea of what the Government are doing in this matter. On contract 25, from Fort William to English River, 113 miles, $57,061 was expended last year, and the work is not yet finished. On contract 41, English River to Eagle River, 118 miles, $586,710 was expended last year, and it will be completed on July 1st, 1883. On contract 42, Eagle River to Keewatin, sixty-seven miles, $532,079 was expended last year, and the section has to be completed by 1st July, 1883. On contract 15, $469,620 was expended on the section from Keewatin to Cross Lake, thirty-six miles, and it is not yet completed. Contracts 60, 61, 62 and 63, for work from Yale to Kamloops, on which $10,000,000 will have to be expended, are being proceeded with by the Government and will not be completed until five years have elapsed. Yet hon, gentlemen opposite talk about the contract now on the Table removing this question from departmental control! It is nonsense to talk of removing this question from the arena of politics when we are binding ourselves by a solemn compact, entered into with capitalists, that for the next five years we will expend $2,000,000 a year. on one short 127 miles of this work, over and above all that. As if determined not to remove this thing out of the political arena, but to keep it a live question before the people, without any certainty as to its cost, the Government have, in their wisdom, reserved to themselves the right to build ninety miles more of this work, to pay for it out of the public money, and to take ten years in doing it. Sir, I maintain that of all the bad features of this bargain worse than this. I maintain none is if there is anything the people of this country have reason to complain of in this contract, it is this. They were given to understand that by this contract the work was to be taken out of the hands of the Government, and that it would be impossible thereafter that any charge of corruption or mismanagement should be laid against the department. Instead of that, more than one third of this road is to be constructed by the Government and the expense to be defrayed by the Government. Sir, what have we gained by this contract, so far as relieving Canada of the responsibility of this matter is concerned? We have gained this much. The contract let in British Columbia involves an expenditure of $10,000,000, and there was a clause which allowed the Government, provided it was too great a strain on the public treasury, and the necessities of trade did not demand it, to stop the expenditure on that section at any moment. What have the Government done? They secured this great boon to the Canadian people-they have bound their hands, under this contract, to spend that $10,000,000, whether the people of this country are able to bear it or not, and to do it in five years. They have bound themselves to do that for the benefit of Messrs. Rose & Company and others who form this Company, no matter how it may grind the people of this country. Why, Sir, I think I should have but to offer to the House the amendment I have to propose in order to find many hon, gentlemen opposite-in order to find the Minister of Railways himself-rise to vote for that resolution; because he said there was not an intelligent man in this country but breathed more freely when he learned that this enormous undertaking of building this road was finally to be removed from the shoulders of the people of this country. I know that hon, gentleman wants the people of this country to breathe freely; and in order to afford him and those who know that the country cannot breathe freely so long as the Government goes on to construct those portions of the road which they may not be able to pay for, I beg to place the following resolution in

That the contract respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway, laid on the Table, does not insure finally as to the public obligations in that regard, but imposes on Canada, besides the grant of large sums of money and areas of land, the construction by the Government for the benefit of the Syndicate of the most expensive parts of the railway, which are to be built by the Government during the next ten years, and that the said contract is, in this respect, objectionable.

Mr. RINFRET. In deciding, some years ago, to build the Pacific Railway, the Government had not only the intention of annexing British Columbia, they had another object, more practical and more in harmony with the well understood interests of the country—that was the colonization of the North-West. It was this latter reason especially that was insisted upon before the people, in order to induce them to accept the resolution passed by Parliament. It was then everywhere stated—on the hustings, in the press, and even in this honorable Housethat we had a kingdom in the Canadian North-West; that we had there a great extent of the most fertile land that was only awaiting the work of the settler to bring forth towns and villages. In a word, the settlement of the North-West was the favorite theme with all those who sought to induce the people to accept the resolutions voted by Parliament for the building of the Pacific. I will not conceal the fact, Sir, that they were showing the people the pleasing side of the question, and that I am one of those who believe in the future of that immense region. happy to say that, on this important question, the Liberal party has always lent a helping hand to the Conservative party, and that both parties have labored to promote the settlement of the great Canadian North-West. We will, undoubtedly, meet with considerable difficulties in settling these vast prairies. And we must not forget the fact that we are not the only people who have lands to sell, but that there are fertile lands to be colonized in the United States. I do not say that these lands are worth more than ours. I do not even say that they are worth as much as our best lands; but there is a fact that no one can gainsay. Our neighbors have in their favor the tide of immigration that is set their way; and the far greater number of Europeans, who come to America, settle in the States instead of Canada. I will even add, though with regret, that a great number of our fellow-countrymen swell this immigration to the United States. If we wish to turn aside this tide of immigration, and compete advantageously with our neighbors; if we wish to have some immigrants go to our vast prairies, we must, and no one can deny it, offer conditions at least equal to those offered by the United States. I regret that the present contract contains no clause that can satisfy this honorable House with regard to this important question of the settlement of the North-West. By the contract now submitted, the Government abandons to the Syndicate, without any reserve whatever, 25,000,000 acres of land. The Syndicate can choose these lands among the most fertile and the best situated in the North-West. These 25,000,000 acres will be laid out in lots of a mile in area, and will alternate with the Crown lands set apart for homesteads and pre-emptions. The lands of the Syndicate will form, with the Crown Lands, an area of 50,000,000 acres. These lands will be the most advantageously situated, and it is evident that they will be sold first, unless some serious obstacle is put in the way of the settlers. These 50,000,000 acres form a greater extent of land than we can hope to sell in twenty-five years from now, or perhaps in half a century, if we take into account the fact that, at the present moment, there are but 11,000,000 acres of land sold in the Province of Quebec and 16,000,000 acres in the Province of Ontario. I will make no remark as to the present disposition of the lands in alternate lots, but I will only say that this disposition, whether it be good or bad, will give the Syndicate almost absolute control, as far as colonization is concerned, not only over its own lots but also over the neighboring lots belonging to the Government, that is to say over 50,000,000 acres, or over nearly all the lands that the Government can reasonably expect to sell for the next half century, perhaps. I believe that the control of the Syndicate over our own lands, a control which is given to it by the very disposition of the lands, can at any moment paralyze, in a great measure, the efforts of any Government to promote colonization. Let us suppose, for instance, that with a view of speculation, or for any other reason. the Syndicate decides to withhold the sale of their lands, or to ask very high prices for them? What will happen? Why, Sir, the Government will experience great difficulty in selling theirs. According to the present disposition of the lands, each square mile contains two homesteads and two pre-emptions of 160 acres each; that is to say, there will be two settlers for each lot. If the neighboring lot is not sold, every settler will not only have to keep up his roads and his fences, but the roads and fences of the neighboring lot. He will be obliged to pay double municipal and school taxes. I think, Sir, that very few settlers will be disposed to purchase the Government lots, if the neighboring lots belonging to the Syndicate are not sold at the same time, unless the Government fix a time for the sale of their lands, thereby giving the assurance to the settlers that they will not have to give a part of their labor for many years in order to enhance the value of the Syndicate's lands. If the Government do not pass such a measure, I think they will not be able to sell their lands before the Syndicate has seen fit to sell its lands, and that even should they wish to promote colonization, they can only do so by sacrificing considerably the value of our public lands. The Government seem to have adopted as a standard for the construction of the Pacific, the Union Pacific Railway. We read in the charter incorporating this railway the following clause, which I respectfully submit to the consideration of hon. Ministers :-

"And all such lands, so granted by this section, which shall not be sold or disposed of by said Company within three years after the entire road shall have been completed, shall be subject to occupation and pre-emption, like other lands, at a price not exceeding one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, to be paid to said Company."

This clause obliges the Company to sell their lands as soon as possible, and takes from them all control if the sale is not made within the time prescribed by law. The hon member for Lambton, when he was the leader of the Government, had also provided that the Government should keep coutrol over the lands offered as a grant to any private company that would undertake the building of the Pacific Railway. We read what follows in the Statutes of 1874, page 120:

That a quantity of land, not exceeding twenty thousand acres, for each inile of the section or sub-section contracted for, shall be appropriated in alternate sections of twenty square miles each along the line of the said railway, or at convenient distance therefrom, each section having a frontage of not less than three miles nor more than six miles on the line of the said railway, and that two-thirds of the quantity of land so appropriated shall be sold by the Government at such prices as may be from time to time agreed upon between the Governor in Council and the contractors, and the proceeds thereof accounted for and paid half-yearly to the contractors free from any charge of administration or management—the meaning third to be conveyed to the contractors."

We see that the hon. member for Lambton's Government reserved the right of selling the lands granted by the Pacific Railway Act of 1874. There are several ways of controlling lands granted to a private company. I do not intend to angest any particular mode of keeping the controlling power over such an important part of the public domain. I only say that the Government should keep a control over the lands of the Syndicate, and that the latter should be forced, in some way or another, to sell their lands within a specified time, if the Government do not want themselves to be exposed to see a part of the public domain lying for the particular idle or worked benefit of it also my duty I deem private company. ask the Government to establish the price of the lands granted to the Syndicate. Those who have listened to the speeches made in this House upon the question of the Pacific Railway, must have remarked that a great number of estimates, more or less contradictory, were ma e as to the value of the lands of the North-West. I think that the discussion which has taken place has not thrown much light upon the real value of those lands. But, from these different and contradictory estimates, this House can infer an important fact, and that is that the value of these lands is not established in a satisfactory manner, and that we do not know the real price of the sacrifice the country is making by giving away these 25,000,000 of acres of land. The hon. Minister of Railways estimated at $25,000,000, or at $1 per acre, the total land grant made to the Syndicate. Probably the estimate of $1 this year will go down as easily as did, at the last Session, the estimate of $3.18 made by the same hon. Minister, for the same lands that are to day granted to the Syndicate. At all events, I do not intend to ask this honorable House not to accept this estimate. I only ask that this estimate, whether it be right or wrong, or any other estimate agreed upon between the Syndicate and the Government, should be fixed by Statute. If the Syndicate does not wish to accept these lands at a greater value than $1 an acre, let it be declared that they cannot be sold at a higher price than $1 an acre. If the Syndicate will not consent that Government should fix the value of the land at less than $2 or $3 an acre, then the Government, for their $25,000,000 should give a considerable less amount than 25,000,000 acres, or take, before the Parliament and before the people, the responsibility of giving to the Syndicate lands valued, by the Syndicate and the Government, at $50,000,000 or $75,000,000. By this means, the House could judge of the value of the land grant made to the Syndicate; by this means the people will know what we are giving away, and I think that the people have an unquestionable right to know it. The hon. Minister has estimated the lands granted to the Syndicate at only $1 an acre. That estimate has been looked upon as too low by some hon. members; but I fancy that the House would be disposed to accept it, provided only that the Government would consent to fix by Statute this price of $1 as the maximum price. We are making, it is true, an immense sacrifice by giving away the finest lands of the North-West; but by fixing such a low price for the sale of the Syndicate's lands, we could sell more easily the Crown lands laid out in alternate lots, and the country could thus recoup itself for the great sacrifice it is making, through the real advantages that would flow from the settlement of the great North-West of Canada. Thus, Sir, I believe that this honorable House should not abandon all control over the lands that we are granting to the Syndicate, and that a maximum price should be set on the railway lands, so that the people might know what they are giving. And if the Government sees fit to grant to the Syndicate 25,000,000 acres of land at a very low figure, let us at least fix the price of those lands so that the people may profit thereby—and that the settlers in the North West may profit thereby. Let us fix the price of these lands if we want the tide of immigration to flow towards Canada; if we want to compensate the people a little by the rapid settlement of the North-West, for the enormous sacrifices they are making in building the Pacific Railway. I move, therefore, the following amendment:-

That the contract respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway contains provision for ceding to the Company twenty-five millions of acres of choice lands in the North-West, but it does not, as it should, embrace any provision that such lands shall be open to sale to actual settlers at any maximum price; that the absence of such provision will enable the Company to lock up the lands at their pleasure for a long time, and so be injurious to the progress of the country, and add to the labors and difficulties of the early settlers, and that the said contract is, in this respect, objectionable.

Mr. ROULEAU. I would like to ask the hon. member where he finds that the proprietors of alternate lots bought from the Government will be obliged to pay double taxes whilst the proprietors of lands bought from the Company will not be obliged to pay any taxes at all, as he has just stated. According to the contract, I have always understood that the exemption from taxation was in favor of the Syndicate during twenty years and inasmuch as the lots were not sold; consequently, I do not see why the holders of lots bought from the Government should be obliged to pay double taxes and to make double fences unless it is to keep their neighbors from looking at them.

Mr. RINFRET. I think it is quite enough to pay double taxes during twenty years. It is perfectly clear in the contract that these lands can remain twenty years in the hands of the Syndicate, and that the settlers who would take up the lots contiguous to these lands would be obliged to pay taxes during twenty years and to keep up the roads and the fences on their own lots and on the lots of the Syndicate.

Mr. ROULEAU. I think that several members who move amendments to the contract have not read it; for in the contract there is no exemption from taxation in favor of the occupiers; there is only an exemption from taxation in favor of the Syndicate as long as the lands are not sold.

Mr. CHARLTON. I can well understand the House naturally begins to be weary of the discussion on this question. Even on this side, I dare say many of the members almost feel like saying:

"Why urge the long unequal fight, Since Truth has fallen in the street; Why lift anew the trampled light, Quenched by the heedless minions' feet?"

But I wish to impress on hon, gentlemen opposite that this is a solemn occasion. I wish to impress upon them that we are religiously trying to adopt all possible measures for the proper celebration of their funeral obsequies; we are making arrangements now for having that party properly and decently buried, and the feat is being rendered more and more certain at every stage in this drama. Hon, gentlemen opposite, apparently, to every candid observer, have abandoned all attempts at argument. They meet us now by the exercise of sheer brute force; and in that respect we must of course go to the wall at every encounter, for they outnumber us by votes. Again and again are presented to the House objections unanswerable in their nature and not a word of argument is offered to rebut the position taken by hon, members on this side. I shall direct my remarks to that feature of this contract granting exemption from taxation, and shall submit an amendment bearing on this feature. The 16th section provides:

"The Canadian Pacific Railway, and all stations and station grounds, work shops, buildings, yards and other property, rolling stock and appurtenances required and used for the construction and working thereof, and the capital stock of the Company shall be forever free from taxation by the Dominion, or by any Province hereafter to be established or by any municipal corporation therein, and the lands of the Company, in the North-West Territories, until they are either sold or occupied, shall also be free from such taxation for twenty years after the grant thereof from the Crown."

This exempts the whole of the railway, from Lake Nipissing to the Pacific Ocean, with all its branches, forever from all Dominion taxation, whatever that may be. It exempts that portion of this railway situated in the North-West Territory, with its branches in that territory, and that portion of the railway situated in the territory of Keewatin from all taxation, municipal, provincial or Dominion, for all time to come. It is a principle which I believe cannot be controverted, that for the payment of the expenses necessary to be incurred in the maintenance of law and order, all property should bear its equitable and due proportion; that no property whatever should be exempt from the payment of its share in the expense of the maintenance of law and order. It is held to be necessary, in this enlightened age, to maintain public schools at public expense. The education of the masses, in a country having free institutions, is held to be a matter of so much importance, that the expense of providing and maintaining schools devolve upon the public. It is held to be a matter of importance that the roads through a country should be paid for at the public expense, and that municipal institutions should be organized, and be maintained by means of taxes on property. What is necessary in the public interest and of common interest to all should be paid for by all. Railways must, at public expense, receive n protection. They must be protected from Railway corporations are peculiarly liable to certain protection. damage from riots, and in cases of riot they call on public authority for protection. They must be protected from obstruction, lawlessness and incendiarism, and they must be protected in many ways unnecessary to specify on this occasion. They may resort to the courts to enforce their rights. No class of property owners resort more frequently to the courts than do the railway corporations. recollect some three years ago, the series of stupendous riots, called the railway 1 iots, which took place in the United States. We recollect that the whole available force of the United States' troops not in the Indian territories were called out, that thousands of State militia and independent military organizations of the various States were called into service, that the police and detective forces of various cities were made available, and that the loss from mob violence on many occasions was borne by the public. In Pittsburg, where a loss of $3,000,000 was sustained by the Pennsylvania Railway Company, the corporation of that city and the county in which it is situated had to make good to the company every dollar of those damages. In return for this protection, the railways of the United States are heavily taxed; but the Syndicate with which the Government are about to ratify a contract asks all this protection, all these privileges that railways enjoy—for nothing. They ask these privileges, and at the same time they ask that they shall be forever exempt from all taxation, from bearing any portion of the public expenditure that should fall upon them. The question at this point is: Are railways in other countries taxed? I think the hon, member for Glengarry in his speech on this question advanced the argument that it was perfectly proper railways should be exempt from taxation. Why, said he, we do not tax highways? And is not a railway a highway? And if a common country road is exempt from taxation, why should not a railway be also exempt? I should certainly say it ought, if it is made as free to the public as a common highway; but so long as a railway is not a free avenue for commercial communications, so long as it is a private enterprise charging tolls for the transaction of all the business it does, and looks to the country for protection, it is entitled to pay taxes as all other classes of private property. So far as my investigations go, railways are taxed in all countries. They are taxed in Austria, Russia, Holland-

Mr. PLUMB. I would like to know whether there are any private railways in Russia.

Mr. CHARLTON. The Russian Government, I believe, guarantees a certain revenue to the railway companies, and levies a tax on passengers. Great Britain, Belgium, and every State in the American Union levy taxes on railway companies, and these taxes are of very different kinds. First of all, there is the tax on gross receipts, which, I believe, is levied in the States of Michigan, Pennsylvania and Minnesota. In Michigan, these taxes are two per cent. under a certain amount of earnings per mile, and three per cent. above that; in Minnesota they are three per cent; in Pennsylvania they are eight tenths per cent., and in addition there is a tax on stock. Besides the tax on gross receipts, some countries levy a tax on net receipts. In Delaware State, a tax of ten per cent. is levied on net receipts. The third form is the tax on passengers. That form is levied in Great Britain, five per cent. on gross passenger receipts; in Delaware State ten cents is levied on each passenger. The fourth form is a specific tax on locomotives and cars. Delaware levies a tax of $100 on each locomotive, $10 on each freight car, and $25 on each passenger car. The fifth form is the tax per mile. Mississippi levies a tax of $40 per mile on narrow gauge, and $80 per mile on broad or standard gauge. The sixth form is the tax on assessed valuation. This form is levied in New York, New Jersey, Ohio, Tennessee, and other States. The seventh form is the lump sum in lieu of taxation. That system is in vogue to a certain extent in New Jersey and in Delaware. The eighth form is the tax on stock or shares. The State of Pensylvania levies taxes in that form. While upon the question of taxation I wish briefly to refer to some remarks of the mem- in the North-West will be is purely problematical. We may ber for Lincoln (Mr. Rykert) last evening, am sorry, is not present at this moment. In treating of the question of taxation and the probable amount that would be levied on the Canadian Pacific Railway, if it were not exempted from taxation, he made the most astoundingly ridiculous statement, that the whole amount would probably not exceed $6,000 per annum. He arrived at that estimate by taking the quantity of land that the road would occupy, allowing a road-bed of 100 feet width, calculating the amount of acres for the whole distance across the North-West. He valued that land at, I think, $5 an acre, and upon this basis reached a total of $6,000. Well, I suppose he would probably proceed to tax city property in the same way, by taking city lots worth $1,000 a foot and taxing them at the rate of $5 an an acre. I have no doubt that he would appraise the oil paintings of the old masters by estimating them to be worth what the paint, varnish, and canvass originally cost. The railway, and land on which it is situated, costing $5 an acre, perhaps would be worth $30,000 a mile. It is proper to assess a road for what it cost to construct it per mile, and in addition to assess the cost of the locomotives, cars, station-houses, and all appurtenances for the further transaction of its business. It will probably require 300 locomotives and several thousand cars, at least, to stock the Canadian Pacific Ruilway, all of which should be subjected to taxation, and, levied, the amount would were thus case taxes be inevitably very large. We may be able to estimate that amount by a comparison of this road with railroads in other countries. I find that in France, in 1878, the direct and indirect taxation upon railways amounted to $16,241,800. In the United States the amount of taxation imposed upon railway companies is immense. I have been unable to ascertain what the aggregate is, because many of the railroad companies make defective returns in this respect. I will give the taxation on a number of the roads to show the largeness of the amount paid. The Chicago and Alton paid in 1879, under the head of taxes and sundry accounts, $195,461; the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul, under the head of miscellaneous and taxes, We cannot ascertain what the taxes are, $473,543. because we do not know what the sundries mean. These are two instances of the defective way of making returns. Many roads, however, make explicit returns as to their special taxation, and among these are the following ones: Burlington and Cedar Rapids, a local road in Iowa, last year paid taxes, amounting to $34,722; the Cincinnati, Hamilton, Dayton, 91 miles $36,706; the Atlantic and Great Western, a road of no very great importance, $96,000; the Pennsylvania Railroad paid on the State tax, $213,852-on its stock, $154,957-total, $368,809; Union Pacific, $297,158; Chicago, Burlington, Quincy, $328,844; Chicago and North-West, $359,996; Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific, $218,155; Illinois Central, $395,010; Michigan Central, $201,681; Lake Shore and Michigan Southern, $457,137; New York Central and Hudson River, $871,787—making a total for those twelve corporations of $3,646,015. Now there are in the United States over 1,000 railway corporations; here are nine of the principal and three of the subordinate once enumerated in this list, paying a tax of $3,646,015. Among the great railway corporations not included are the Erie, Baltimore and Ohio, and many others. Upon this data we may be able to arrive at an approximate estimate of the taxation upon a road similar to the Canadian Pacific Railway The North-West, of course, is when constructed. a region where the branch lines constructed by that Company will be chiefly situated. It will require, I presume, very few in British Columbia and North of Lake Superior. It will require in the region where it is to be exempted from taxation a great number of branch lines if it developes the country. What the future mileage arrive at an approximate estimate by ascertaining what the area of that country is, what the probable amount of arable land is, and comparing it with other countries partially developed with their railways. Let us proceed on this basis: the Government estimate of arable land in the Canadian North-West is 150,000,000 acres. Now, I propose to take for the purpose of comparison the State of Minnesota, which is adjacent to our North-West, and similar to it in many respects. That State contains 53,459,000 acres of good land. waste land, timber, swamp lands and all. I think it fair to assume that the Canadian North-West has four times that amount of arable land. Well, Minnesota, although a new State and but partly developed, having but 780,000 inhabitants, possesses 3,295 miles of railway. It will require more than twice that amount before the State is fully developed. But making a comparison with the present railway mileage of Minnesota, as the North-West possesses four times its arable land, it will require four times the railway mileage developed to the amount that Minnesota is, for the transaction of its business, which would give to the North-West, in round numbers, 13,000 miles. How much of this mileage will be furnished by the Syndicate? It covers the whole country with its charter and can preempt any line if it chooses. All it has to do is to deposit with the hon, the Minister of Public Works its plan for a line in any direction, and it has preemption for that line and can proceed at its leisure to construct it. I presume, therefore, if it is necessary to the Syndicate's interest to construct lines anywhere, it will build them through the North-West. I will assume that our North-West requires, on the scale of Minnesota, as now developed, 13,000, and that the Syndicate constructs less than half that number, taking the easiest route and the branches likely to pay most speedily. What then would be the probable value to the Syndicate of the exemption from taxation which that portion of Section 16 gives to them? I think we may fairly, for the purpose of comparison take the Union Pacific, a road passing through a country inferior to the North-West, through a partially settled country and not paying as large a tax per mile, or doing as large a business as the large and wealthier corporations in the older States. I find that the Union Pacific last year, on 1,597 miles of main line and branches, paid taxes to the amount of $297,000. If the Canadian Pacific Railway pays taxes on 6,000 miles of prospective main line and branches in the same proportion as the Union Pacific, its taxes will amount to $1,116,000 in round numbers. I have assumed that the Syndicate would build less than one half of the branch lines required in that country, and would select the choice routes leaving the rest to other companies. Now, if we take one half of the amount which reduces the mileage one half, and take onehalf the taxes, we have $558,000, which, capitalized at four per cent. would amount to $13,950,000. Or, if we further reduce the amount and, instead of dividing by two we divide by four, we have $279,000, which, capitalized, represents $6,975,000. But if we adhere to this original calculation and take the whole 6,000 miles, and take the taxation as based on that of the Union Pacific, we would have an amount equivalent to a capitalized sum of $27,900,000. Now, is this a reasonable calculation? Is it reasonable to suppose that the Syndicate, covering with their charter the whole North-West, will build less than one-half of all the branch lines the country will require? Is it reasonable to suppose that as the country is settled, this Company will not build 6,000 miles of main line branches? Is it reasonable to suppose that the Company, if taxed at the same rate as the Union Pacific, would not pay as much as I have estimated? I think the exemptions provided for by this clause are worth all I have estimated, and that these exemptions will, n all their lands from market as long as they please. For probability, amount to over $500,000 per annum in the every two blows he strikes, he is to feel that he is probability, amount to over $500,000 per annum in the not distant future. Mr. CHARLTON.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I beg to ask the hon, gentleman if in his calculations he estimates the amount of these exemptions upon the assumption that the branches to be built by the Syndicate are, under the contract, to be exempt from taxation.

Mr. CHARLTON. I do base my calculations on that estimate. I hold that every branch to be built by the Company will be part of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and will be covered by the contract, and to satisfy the hon. gentleman I will read the clause which bears upon that part:

"The said branches to be of the gauge aforesaid; and the said main line of railway, and the said branch lines of railway, shall be commenced and completed as provided by the said contract; and together with such other branch lines as shall be hereafter constructed by the said Company, and any extension of the said main line of railway that shall hereafter be constructed or acquired by the Company, shall constitute the line of railway hereinafter called the Canadian Pacific Pacifics." Railway.'

I hope that satisfies the hon, gentleman from Halton and the First Minister. But whatever the amount may be, whether it is $279,000 or $558,000, or $1,116,000 per annum it is one which the settlers of the North-West must pay, and they must pay it in addition to their own just and fair share of taxation. But are they to do more? Yes, they are to pay in addition to the Syndicate's just share of taxation, a portion of the debt to be incurred for those portions of the railway which this Government is to build and hand over to the Syndicate.

Mr. PLUMB. My hon, friend has changed his views as to how municipalities are likely to act towards the railway.

Mr. CHARITON. I do not exactly catch mychon. friends words.

Mr. PLUMB. Will you allow me to repeat them? Mr. CHARLTON. Certainly.

Mr. PLUMB. My hon, friend gave us last year a very vivid picture of the way in which municipalities tax nonresident lands.

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes; and I believe that the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb), the hon. First Minister, and various gentlemen on that side, in justifying the proposition they then made to sell the lands of the North-West at low prices and on easy terms, in large blocks to speculators, argued that the settler had in his own hands the means of rectifying his position. They said he could make them sell by means of non-resident taxation, and that with this weapon he would speedily cure the evil of large nonresident holdings.

Mr. PLUMB. That, however, is no answer to my

Mr. CHARLTON. As I was saying when the hon. gentleman interrupted me, the settler in addition to paying the railway's taxes must pay his portion of the debt created for the benefit of the railway, and the first item is the $31,000,000 incurred in building the portion of the line to be handed over to the Company and the cost of surveys. That amounts to $7 per head and over for every man, woman and child in the Dominion. In the next place he must pay his proportion of the taxes for the $25,000 000 to be pand to the company, which amounts to over $6 per head for every man, woman and child in the Dominion. In other words, the amount per capita is over $13 in addition to a fair proportionate share of the ordinary taxation of the country, which should be borne by the Company. In addition to all this the settler on the alternate blocks is to go on laboring for the benefit, not merely of himself, but for the benefit of this Company who are enabled by the advantages given in this contract to withhold striking one blow for a soulless corporation which quietly awaits his efforts knowing that it has only to wait to realize results to which they do not contribute in the slightest degree. Whatever arguments our hon. friends opposite may use with reference to this matter, it is one in regard to which the country will not be deceived. The country will understand the great injustice of this provision, will understand the injustice of giving to the Company a railway free of cost with millions to boot, the injustice of saddling upon settlers the cost of maintaining law and order in that country for all time to come and protecting these very men in the rights to their property which have been bestowed on them at the expense of the people of this country. They will understand what it means to give this Company a monopoly of railway construction in the North-West. No other railway can attempt to compete with them on anything like equal terms, in consequence of this monopoly. I wish to ask, in conclusion, if it is not monstrous to present to this Company a road practically free of cost; and in addition to that, to give them millions of dollars worth of valuable property and the privilege of exemption on their road bed and lands. One of the gravest dangers of this latter half of this nineteenth century is the growth of monopoly. In the United States, far-seeing men have taken the alarm and they fear that railway monopolies threaten the liberties of that country. The accumulation of vast estates in the United States is a matter of wonder. Men, who a few years ago were poor, now count their wealth by scores of millions, Why, if the estate of William A. Vanderbilt, now placed at $120,000,000, commenced a few years ago with a few thousand dollars, what may that fortune amount to twenty years hence? Time is coming when these fortunes will be counted by billions instead of millions, and perchance we are placing in the hands of two or three unscrupulous men like Jay Gould, Vanderbilt, and Scott, of Pennsylvania, the practical control of that vast country. For we are creating a monopoly in this country which, in all human probability, will be merged into one of these greater monopolies in the United States. We already have reports that this Syndicate may sell out at pleasure for five or ten million dollars to these American monopolists, who will step into their franchises and privileges and leave them a handsome fortune as the result of their manipulation with the Government. Are we preparing to nurse a foreign monster in this country? Are we preparing to give to such corporations as those controlled by Jay Gould or Vanderbilt, the control of our whole Canadian North-West? That is simply what this measure amounts to. That is the danger that threatens us. That is the danger which the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches, with strange fatuity, are unable to see. I hold, for the reason I have assigned, this is a very objectionable feature of this contract, and I beg to

That the contract respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway exempt<sup>8</sup> perpetually the railway and all stations and station grounds, workshops buildings, yards and other property, rolling stock and appurtenances, required for the construction and working thereof, and the capital stock of the Company, from taxation by the Dominion or by any other Province to be hereafter established, or by any municipal corporation therein. That the property of the Corporation will be in substance a gift from the public; and its exemption from taxes is unjust, creates an unfair incidence of taxation, and gives an undue advantage to the Company over other railway companies, calculated to prevent the construction of competing lines, and the contract is, in this respect, objectionable.

Mr. ORTON. I may refer to two or three striking facts which have been elicited during this discussion. One is that the Opposition, notwithstanding all their loud talk and Railway as a Government work, others are in favor of giving it to a company. One hon gentleman on the other side of the House, in former years, denounced the late Government as loudly, perhaps, as any other member in this House, I mean the hon, member for South Wentworth (Mr. Rymal). He denounced the Allan charter, but to-day we find him eloquent in his admiration of the excellent offer made by the late Government in 1872, after Sir Hugh Allan was unable to raise money to go on with his contract. He (Mr. Rymal) says further: "I believe the Allan contract was one of the best bargains ever offered for the construction of the road." This discussion has had the effect of making my hon. friend believe in the wisdom of the Administration of 1872, led by the leader of the present Government. There is another striking fact. This perfect storm of amendments that we have been favored with has shown the strong determination of the Opposition to act as obstructionists. They are endeavoring, in every way possible, to obstruct the business of this House by the continual introduction of useless amendments. But after all, what has been the effect of all their efforts in this House? The result has been, not to change the views of the hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, but to drive from their ranks an hon. gentleman who has been in the habit of voting with them on almost every occasion. I refer to the hon. member for Napierville (Mr. Coupal), an hon. member who has usually voted with the Opposition, but whom their efforts have resulted in driving from their ranks to support the policy of the Government. Another striking feature of the debate has been the wonderful admiration my hon. friend for South Wentworth (Mr. Rymal) has for the Minister of Railways. Why, Sir, he referred to him in the following eloquent terms:-

"I have too high an opinion of the hon. Minister of R-ilways to believe that his virtue failed, that he was afraid to face defeat. With his splendid abilities. I have no doubt, had he saw fit he would have let his contract to contractors in sections, and that the amount of money he would have realized on the lands placed at his disposal by Parliament would have been sufficient to build a road entirely equipped and leave a nice surplus to the credit of the Dominion.'

That is in contradiction to the assertions and insinuations of the Opposition, and in contradiction to the efforts of the organ of the party, which for the last six months has been denouncing the Minister of Railways as corrupt in every way. There is another matter in reference to my friend from South Wentworth, to which I may be permitted to refer. It is well known that that hon. gentleman is permitted, by consent of both sides of the Honse, to exercise greater latitude than any other member. He is allowed to say things which no other member of this House would be permitted to say for a moment, and I do not desire to take away that privilege from him. He is an old member, having been twenty-five years in this House, and I think it is only right that he should have the privilege of expressing himself as freely as he likes. But it is a very strange physiological fact that, notwithstanding that he has been so long in this House rubbing shoulders with the first gentlemen of our land, he cannot get rid of the effects of his early training. He referred to me in this language the other day:

"When I want any information from the pocket edition of Judas Iscariot, I will ask for it."

I shall not ask him to apologise, for it matters not to me what the views or opinions of that hon, gentleman may be, as they have very little effect on any member of this House or on the country. But it is a very strange fact that a man the tremendous efforts they have made to arouse the country, are still unable to agree on a policy with reference to this question. They have not come to any agreement as to the position they wish this House to adopt. Some of the country, are still unable to agree on a policy with reference to this question. They have not come to any agreement as to the position they wish this House to adopt. Some of Wentworth has distinguished himself in the most loft to the country. But it is a very strange fact that a man can one great effort in his life. When that great culminating effort has been made, they can seldom rise above it, and the hon. member for Sou h to the position they wish this House to adopt. Some of wentworth has distinguished himself in the most loft to the country.

equine engineer. Having arrived at that position by a young and vigorous effort of his life, he finds that when some more noble sphere of life opens to him, he is unable to rise above his old occupation. His first great exertions have so exhausted all the good qualities he possessed, that he cannot do more. It appears to me that the position of certain hon gentlemen is like the alkaline prairies where it is impossible for wheat or any other good grain to grow, and it is hardly possible that a noble or a kindly sentiment can emanate from some gentlemen, even though they associate with the first gentlemen in our country.

Mr. RYMAL. I cannot think my hon. friend from Wellington will take it as a mark of disrespect if I answer the remarks he has just made. He made a remark as to what I had done in my younger days, speaking in an insinuating manner of my equine performances. I presume that he refers to the fact that I did in my younger days own a valuable stallion. I have received the thanks of the agricultural societies in my neighborhood for having introduced and kept for breeding purposes, so valuable an animal, and I never heard any one who used that animal say he did not get value for his money. I was a young man, and then, as now, was proud of being the owner of so valuable an animal. I did, it is true, on occasions, act as groom to that horse, and I felt proud of it. I felt proud of the position I occupied at that time, much more than I do of the position I occupy at the present moment, when I find that instead of being groom to a valuable horse, I am currying down a small specimen of a jackass. Mr. Speaker, you have known me for a number of years, and I happened to be a member of the Canadian House of Commons some few years before you and I became acquainted, and I have yet to learn that my personal conduct has given offence to any gentleman with whom I have been associated during the last twenty-five years in Parliament. I did not intend in the remark I made, and to which the hon. gentleman has taken such exception, to give him any personal offence. When I was speaking he, being inspired, not by the spirit of kindness but by what I call forty-rod whiskey—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. RYMAL. Saw fit to interrupt me, and gave me to understand that if I wanted information of a certain kind, he could give it to me.

Mr. ORTON. I rise to order. I think these are hardly the kind of remarks that should go on.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think I must stop this discussion. It is personal on both sides.

Mr. RYMAL. Very well; if you think it is proper to stop me in the middle of my reply, I think it is only proper that you should have stopped him.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think you have gone a little too far. Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. RYMAL. I will drop the subject. I presume I gave him more attention than he deserves. He is a very small specimen.

Several hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. RYMAL. As I have spoken at some length to him and of him, I shall say nothing more than this, that while he says my doings and sayings are a matter of perfect indifference to him, he gives the lie to what he said by his cringing, fawning and whining here to-night. When I find a man crying "mammy," who has arrived at the age of maturity, I come to the conclusion he is a baby still.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). By the Railway Act of 1879, the conditions upon which tolls are leyied upon the freight and passengers conveyed by the railways in the Dominion are prescribed. The first condition with which a railway has to comply, before it can levy tolls, is that these tolls should be advertised in the Canada Gazette. The second is that they should be approved by the Governor in Council. The Railway Act gives the Governor in Council power to amend these tolls, from time to time, irrespective, entirely, of the profits of the railway companies. It further provides that when the profits of a company exceed 15 per cent. on the money actually expended in the construction of the road, or 15 per cent. of the net income, then Parliament may deal in the matter under certain conditions. First, the consent of the company is prescribed in sub-section 11 of section 17; secondly, Parliament cannot deal with the freight charges or tolls without the consent of the company, as I have said—so as to produce less than 15 per cent. per annum profit on the capital expended on the construction of the road; third, Parliament cannot interfere unless, after an examination made by the hon. Minister of Public Works of the amount received and expended by the company, the net income from all sources for the year last passed is found to have exceeded fifteen per cent of the capital so actually expended. By the Act of incorporation which we are considering in connection with this contract, it is provided that the power conferred on Parliament by the Railway Act of 1879, is limited not to fifteen per cent. as originally in the Railway Act, but to ten per cent. Under this clause in the Act of incorporation, it is held by hon. gentlemen opposite that the conditions under which this railway company exacts its tolls and freight are more favorable to the public than the conditions of the Railway Act as applied to other railways; and it is held that this is a commendatory element in the Act of incorporation. It is held in the second place, that these restrictions are sufficient to prevent extortionate rates of tolls and charges by the Can-I will consider both these propoadian Pacific Railway. sitions separately. In regard to the first, I would say that the conditions of the two railways are entirely different. The Railway Act of 1879 applies to all the railways of the Dominion. These are railways constructed mainly by private capital. The railway we are considering here will be built by the capital of the people of this Dominion, and a rate that would be just and fair as applied to a railway built by a private company might not necessarily be just and fair as applied to a railway built by the Dominion. Whether this condition would prevent extortionate rates being levied, I will next consider. I cannot see that this provision of the Act of incorporation will serve that purpose. In the first place, the Company will have an almost unlimited monopoly of the trade of the North-West. While the other railways in the Dominion are subject to all the contingencies of competition, this Company is subject to no such contingency whatever. It will have control of all the trade that will spring up in this great territory extending over some 250,000,000 acres. The two cases are not parallel. In the one we have a railway 2,700 miles long having the monopoly of the trade of the fertile prairies of the North-West; in the other we have a number of railways competing with each other, and whose combined length is 6,784 miles, three times that of this line, and which draw their trade from an area not as great as that of the country through which this line will draw its trade. Take the area of the eight States: Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Iowa, Wisconsin, Missouri and Pennsylvania, and you have there an area of country not larger than our North-West. These States are supplied with railway facilities to the extent of 33,422 miles in length.

Mr. JONES. What is the population of those States?

Mr. ROSS. Something like 10,000,000 or 12,000,000. have not the figures before me. The hon. gentleman will find the population on referring to the census of 1880, taken recently. I was going to say that these eight States have a railway mileage of 38,422 miles, and this area is not greater than that of the North-West. We are only furnishing this large area with a railway mileage, counting the whole extent of the Canadian Pacific road of 2,700 miles. Inasmuch as this railway has no competition practically, I consider the provisions of this Act of incorporation do not adequately protect the public from such rates and charges as might interfere with the full development of that country, and if you consider the cost of running a mile of railway, and the gross earnings of the railways of Canada, you will see to what an extent these extortions can be carried. The railways of Canada cost on an average $2,496 a mile to run; if the Canadian Pacific cost at the same rate per mile to run with our other railroads last year, the total would be $6,739,200.

Mr. PLUMB. I want to know how the hon. gentleman and engine tools, water, including pump and tank repairs. reconciles that with the statement that was made by one of Under abstract No. 2 I find further particulars, including his leaders yesterday, to the effect that only one train a day would carry all the traffic of the Canadian Pacific Roilway?

Mr. ROSS. I am speaking of the Canadian Pacific Railway as it is expected to turn out by hon, gentlemen opposite, a great railway carrying a large amount of freight, equal in proportion and similar in expense to the other railways of the Dominion. I am not assuming that the Canadian Pacific Railway will earn less or be less valuable than the other railways. If its earnings are as good as the others, they will reach $8,296,200, or a difference between its earnings and expenses of enough to yield a profit of only 2 per cent. on a capital of $80,000,000. Now, in order that the Canadian Pacific Railway may earn a profit of 10 percent. on the cost of construction it will need to earn double as much as the other railways, and to do so must charge for freight twice as high as their rates. I am directing the attention of the member for Niagara to the position in which the trade of the country will be placed before the limitation of even 10 per cent, would cut down the charges of the Canadian Pacific Railway-that is, to the fact the charges of this railway will need to be twice as high for passengers and freight as the average charges of the other railways in the Dominion, and if he is prepared to vote that it shall have a monopoly so tremendous in its effects upon the carrying trade of this country, he possesses a temerity I did not

Mr. PLUMB. What would have been the position of a Government railway which had to be run through that country? It would have had to earn money to support itself, and to make the same charges.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I rise to a point of order; the hon. gentleman is making a speech. Instead of asking a question, he is interjecting a speech.

Several hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon, gentleman gave way to the hon, member for Niagara.

Mr. ROSS. It seems to me very hard for the hon. member for Niagara to keep quiet while hon. gentlemen are speaking. He can make a speech, if he likes, when I have finished. The 20th section of the Act of incorporation provides as follows:—

"The limit to the reduction of tolls by the Parliament of Canada, provided for by the eleventh sub-section of the 17th section of the Consolidated Railway Act, 1879, respecting tolls, is hereby extended, so that such reduction may be to such an extent that such tolls when reduced shall not produce less than ten per cent. per annum profit on the capital actually expended in the construction of the railway, instead of not less than fifteen per cent. per annum profit, as provided by the said sub-section; and so also that such reduction shall not be made unless the net income of the Company, ascertained as described in said sub-section, shall have exceeded ten per cent. per annum, instead of fifteen per cent. per annum, as provided by the said sub-section. And the exercise by the Governor in Council of the power of reducing the tolls of the Company, as provided by the tenth sub-section of said section seventeen, is hereby limited to the same extent with relation to the profit of the Company, and to its net revenue, as that to which the power of Parliament to reduce tolls is limited by said sub-section eleven as hereby amended."

By this contract the railway company must earn over and

By this contract the railway company must earn over and above running expenses a clear profit of ten per cent. on the sum actually expended in construction, Now, what is included under that head? As I understand it, there is a clear profit over and above the cost of running the railway, and the sums expended on engine hire, keeping up the road-bed, on wages, and all the incidentals appertaining to the railway. Take the report of the Minister of Railways. Under the head of running expenses on the Intercolonial Railway, as found in the different schedules, I notice the following:—Schedule 3, includes in running expenses, locomotive power, wages of mechanical superintendent, drivers, firemen, and cleaners, repairs to engines, tenders and engine tools, water, including pump and tank repairs. Under abstract No. 2 I find further particulars, including repairs to passenger cars, postal cars, wages of conductors, train baggage masters, and brakesmen, small stores and fuel. I see, engineers' salary; clerk's office and dwelling expenses; wages in repairing roadways, fonces and semaphores; timber, lumber &c., for repairs to bridges, cattleguards, crossings, snow-sheds, fences &c., clearing ice and snow. I see, again, several charges for station masters and telegraph operators; fuel, oil, light, stationery, tickets and other incidental expenses. I see also, damages to men, animals and goods; salaries of accountant, auditor, paymasters and cashiers, clerks, printing, advertising and other expenses. The House will see, then, that under the head of running a railway is included everything that can possibly be considered as necessary to the running of the road. Before Parliament can restrict the Pacific Railway to the ten per cent. laid down in this section, all those expenses must be first deducted, and a clear net profit of ten per cent. on the sum of money actually expended on the construction of the road must remain. While this might be a legitimate restriction on a railway built by a private company, it seems to me it is hard for the people of Canada first to give to this Company the amount of money they may require to build the road, and then to be subjected to such tolls and charges as may be required before that profit can be realized by the Company. I consider it is unfair to place Parliament in the position of making the Company a present of the road and enable them to make ten per cent. on the capital with which we furnish them, and on that account I beg to move the following amendment :-

That the contract respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway provides, that Parliament shall not have power to interfere with the tolls, charged by the Company, unless the same produce, first the working expenses of the whole line, including the British Columbia and Lake Superior penses of the whole the, including the British Columbia and Lake Superior sections, which working expenses comprise all expenses of maintenance of the railway and of the stations, buildings, workshops and appurtenances belonging thereto, and the rolling-stock and other stock and movable plant used in the working thereof, and also hire of engines, rents, charges and interest on lands not paid for, and all expenses incidental charges and interest on lands not paid for, and all expenses incidental to working the railway and the traffic thereon, including stores and all consumable articles, and also rates, taxes, insurance and compensation for accidents or losses, also all salaries and wages of persons employed in connection with the railway or traffic, and all office and management expenses, including directors' fees, agency, legal and other like expenses, and thereafter a profit at least of 10 per cent. on the capital expended on the construction of the railway which includes the public money and the proceeds of the public lands so expended, thus restraining Parliament from interfering unless the Company receives at least $8,000,000 a year profit, on a private capital of merely nominal amount: the Para year profit, on a private capital of merely nominal amount; the Parliament ought to have power to regulate the tolls on the railway from time to time, as and when the public interest requires, and that the contract is, in this respect, objectionable

Mr. STRANGE. I cannot allow this amendment to pass without offering one or two comments on it, as hon. members on this side of the House are asked to stultify themselves to a certain degree by the votes they are about to give. The amendment moved by the hon, member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) is a specious form of casuistry, and ignores altogether the explanation given to the House by the right hon, the First Minister. When the hon, member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall) was speaking the other evening, the right hon. leader of the House stated that the Minister of Railways intended to introduce in the General Railway Act, this Session, a clause specifying that 10 per cent. chargeable on capital, was to be on the capital actually expended by the Company in the construction of the railway. Now, that does not involve or include grants made by this Parliament to the Company, but it only covers the actual amount of capital expended by the Syndicate in the construction of the railway. So that although the amendment may appear on the face of it to be a very good motion, still it is one which hon. members on this side of the House are able to vote down in view of the statement made by the leader of the Government. The various items of expenditure mentioned by the hon. member for West Middlesex, are chargeable to income, not to capital; they are all included in the working expenses of any | Bunster, Mr. Ross (Middlesex).

railway. After the ordinary working expenses are paid, and the income of the road is sufficient to pay 10 per cent. on capital expended, then Parliament has the power to reduce the rates of toll on the railway. I think no hon. gentleman on this side of the House can hesitate to vote down the amendment, because it is a specious amendment, one not made in good faith, but for the purpose of deceiving hon. gentlemen on this side of the House.

Mr. PLUMB. After the remarks made by the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron), I wish to say simply a word. The time has passed when that hon, gentleman by his nod or frown can bring sufficient force at his back to prevent discussion in the House on any topic which is not out of order and not unparliamentary. I stated that the hon, gentleman had said that the Pacific Railway would not do any large amount of business, and not run one train a day. Here are the words of the hon, gentleman as recorded in the Commons "Debates":

"I doubt very much whether it will be found desirable to run even one train per day, if that line is ever opened for ten years to come."

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Over what part of the

Mr. PLUMB. It is a part of the line north of Lake Superior. The hon, gentleman can have the benefit of that explanation, and I will also say that the hon. gentleman who preceded the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) in moving a resolution said, that in consequence of railway monopoly, that western country would be shut up entirely. He led us to infer that no business would be done on the prairie line.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. What I said I repeat: that I did not believe that when the North Shore section is completed—those 650 miles north of Lake Superior—it would be able to run one train a day, owing to the competition it would have. As to the Canadian Pacific Railway in general, I said nothing.

Those who have known anything of my habits in this House will give me the credit for one merit at least, a merit not too common among my fellow-members—that of brevity. There are special reasons why I should that virtue to-night in a ground al. The importance to this Dominion of hardly be overexercise than usual. the Canadian Pacific Railway can hardly be over-estimated. If we have any future before us at all the success of that future lies in our being able to fill up the great North-West with a population who, by their labor and energy, shall contribute to the resources of this country. For this reason I consider it extremely important that the route to be taken by this railway shall be chosen with special reference to the attractions it may offer to emigrants from abroad. I consider it of special importance that the road should be built through a country the most eligible for settlement. This is, perhaps, the most important question to be considered with reference to this railway. Of course, it is also of consequence that this road should eventually become, consistently with the other points I have mentioned, a rival to the railways across the border for the trans-continental trade. It is pretty well settled now that the construction of this railway shall be put into the hands of a company. We are aware, from what we have seen of this contract, that great privileges have been given to the Company—some privileges very objectionable, some more so than others. Some of these objections have already been discussed and pronounced upon by this Parliament. The one feature to which I wish to call the attention of this House, is the privilege which is given to the Company, with scarcely any restriction, of selecting such a route as they may see fit. It is true that the contract makes this selection subject to the approval of the Government in Council, but those who have paid any attention to the past history of this country, know how little reliance is to be placed upon such a provision when the proposed restriction is attempted to be exercised against the wish of a powerful corporation. But more than that, we have the statement of the Minister of Railways himself, leading us to believe that the present Government, at all events, will not attempt to exercise any restriction upon the choice of route. He has told us that this company will be much better qualified than the Government or the House to make the selection of the route, that it will be for their interest to select the best route, and therefore it would not be wise to exercise any restraint upon their choice. I grant that under certain circumstances this would be a reasonable view of the case. If the contract had been with residents of this Dominion, or even with foreigners, whose interests in the choice of a route would not conflict with the interests of the country, then I grant it would be quite safe to leave it to their judgment. But when we consider that this contract has been made with a company having interests at conflict with those of the country, who are already proprietors of a railway in a foreign country, the question assumes an entirely different aspect. The St. Paul, Minneapolis and Manitoba Railway published, not very long ago, a map, showing their existing line, their connections, and some of the extensions of their line in future. I have been told that as soon as this contract was made it has been very difficult to find a copy of this map; that they have suddenly and mysteriously disappeared from circulation. A few of them, however, could not be recalled, and one of these map. I have before me. This map clearly indicates that it is the intention of this Company to divert the traffic of our great North-West, southward over their road and so to Chicago and New York. The proposed Canadian Pacific Railway is shown on the map as running from Winnipeg to the Pacific Ocean, a very small portion indeed of the eastern line is represented upon the map, and both lines are represented substantially as feeders to the St. Paul, Minneapolis and Manitoba Railway. Upon this map also are indicated two lines extending north-westward from the main line between St. Paul and Winnipeg, and some distance south of the frontier, towards the Canadian This line, if constructed, will run from the boundary. Canadian boundary to the main line of the St Paul, Minneapolis and Manitoba Railway, and if the northern one is extended down to Duluth, it would make a very direct line indeed from the boundary between Minnesota and the North-West Territory to Duluth. Compared with the line to Thunder Bay, provided the Canadian Pacific Railway were to run within forty or fifty miles of this frontier, and then connect with these extensions I have referred to, the distance in favor of the line to Duluth would be at least 100 miles. So that, so far as the interests of the country are concerned, and as regards the traffic especially, before the eastern and western portions of it are finished it would be plainly the interest of this company to deflect the line southward instead of building the road already indicated. As I said before, there are practically no restrictions placed upon the Company with regard to this routenothing but the clause making the route subject to the approval of the Governor in Council. Our friends on the opposite side, in discussing this question, have referred frequently to the Act of 1874, and have tried to find in many clauses of this Act a justification for many of the features of the contract. There is one feature in that Act which it would have been well, I think, to have introduced into this contract, and which the Government have neglected to introduce—that is, the feature which makes the selection of the route subject to the approval of Parliament. There is a clause in that Act which requires all contracts to lie on the Table of the House for one month, if not sooner approved of by resolution, before they are confirmed. I think it would have been judicious, to say the least, if that feature of the law had been incorporated in the present contract; and in order to afford this House an opportunity of expressing an opinion on that point. I propose to submit an amendment which reads as folwithout the sanction of Parliament, and that the contract is, in this res-

Amendment (Mr. Scriver) negatived on the following division :-

Mr. GUTHRIE. Mr. Speaker, in one respect the members of the first Syndicate and I agree. We agree that the Governor in Council is, in the words of the late Sir George Cartier, a great institution. I do not agree with some remarks which fell from the hon, member for Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver), although I supported his amendment, in despising the power of the Governor in Council. I find that in this bold attempt to create a despotic power in a free State, every avenue, every road to liberty has been closed. I find that not only is the arm of Parliament paralyzed, as has been well pointed out by my hon friend from West Middlesex (Mr. Ross); not only are the settlers in that country to be deprived of the right that every settler in Canada has hitherto enjoyed—of being able to provide a way of ingress and egress for himself—but the power of the Governor in Council is to be surrendered, so that this Syndicate may have the right to levy tolls upon the other railways which may be built solely out of private resources. every settler in Canada has hitherto enjoyed-of being able Mr. SCRIVER.

people of the North-West at their own sweet will. So short a time ago as two years the hon. Minister of Railways announced the policy of the Government with respect to all railways subject to our control to be that, so far as tolls were concerned, every by-law fixing and regulating them should be subject to revision by the Governor in Council, from time to time, after approval thereof. The present Government and this House deliberately settled the policy, that should apply to every railway subject to the Dominion, to be that the Governor in Council should have from time to time full control over the matter of tolls and rates to be charged by railways. In order that nothing should be wanting to enable this Company to exercise the utmost power in the matter of charges that they saw fit, not only over settlers in the North-West, but over all manufacturers, merchants and others trading there, this contract provides that that clause which is applicable to every other railway in the Dominion shall not apply to this precious Company—that a clause which binds all railways built out of private resources, shall not apply for the protection of the public to the railway constructed out of the public purse. We have heard a good deal in the way of attempts to answer arguments advanced from this side of the House against this contract, but not a single argument has been advanced to show why this Company, who are to be presented with the railway, and enormous bonuses and privileges in addition, should be exempted from that provision to which every other railway is subject. We are told that the General Railway Act is to be amended. The promised amendment, whatever it may be-and when it comes down, we shall be in a position to discuss it-will not touch in any shape the matter to which I have referred. It does not seek to abolish the extraordinary power which the present contract bestows on this Company. I do not know how far such an amendment will apply to this contract at all. The contract itself says that it is only to be binding upon the parties if an Act is passed incorporating a company in the terms and language of the schedule to that contract; and it is quite clear that that schedule refers to the present Railway Act, not to a future amendment of it; and unless the members of the old Syndicate unanimously consent to the adoption of the preposed amendment it will be utterly futile. However that may be, we shall discuss that amendment when it is proposed; but even so far as it has been foreshadowed in the remarks of the First Minister last Friday it does not touch the point to which I have referred. Now, I say it is perfectly monstrous to ask this House to limit in favor of this Company the power of the Governor in Council from time to time to reduce their tolls; that is a power to which every other regular company is subject, and no reason is advanced why this Company should be exempted from it. While I feel that hon. gentlemen opposite have made up their minds to vote down every amendment I am satisfied that when they come to consider this, they will be unanimous in agreeing that it is a reasonable amendment, and that this extraordinary, exceptional, unjust power should not be granted to this Company. I, therefore, move:

"That by the Consolidated Railway Act, 1879, it is provided that every By-law fixing and regulating the tolls to be taken by a railway company, shall be subject to revision by the Governor in Council from time to time, after approval thereof.

"That the exercise by the Governor in Council of the power of reducing tolls under the said Act, is by the contract respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway limited as regards the said Company to such extent, that the tolls when reduced shall not produce less than 10 per cent. per annum profit on the capital actually expended in the construction of the railway, and that the net income of the Company from all sources shall not be less than 10 per cent. on the capital so expended.

"That the said contract thus limits in favor of the Canadian Pacific

"That the Governor in Council shall have in the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company the same unrestricted power which is possessed in the case of such other railways of revising from time to time, as the public interest may require, any tariff of tolls, and that the contract is, in this particular, objectionable."

Mr. CASGRAIN. I am going to move an amendment which cannot fail to meet the support of both sides of the House, which will meet the approval of the leader of the Government, and to the principle of which the hon. member for North Simcoe is committed, since it is embodied in a Bill that he has introduced in this House with, no doubt, the approval of the First Minister. The more closely we look into this contract, whether to its provisions, or its omissions, the more we discover how far its practical operation will seriously affect and injure the general welfare of the public. One of the grave omissions in this contract is the want of a proper commission or machinery to regulate the management secure reasonable rates of freight, and proper accommodations and terminal facilities for the public. The interest of the public is paramount to that of the Syndicate. Railway Commissions, though new to this country, are not unknown elsewhere, for many States in the American Union have such organizations, to say nothing of the example of the Mother Country. The hon, member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) has a Bill before the House on that subject, but it may not become law, it may be rejected by the House. The General Railway Act of 1869 contains no provision for anything of the kind. It is said that amendments to the contract will be made under this Act, but one must bear in mind that the Syndicate and the Government are contracting parties, and since they have signed the contract it is binding upon both parties. But might is not right. We will not be in a position to divest these parties of their legal and moral rights; and the Government would be bound to carry out the provisions of the contract in their entirety. That is a proposition which cannot be denied. The obligation is a legal and moral obligation, and the good faith and honor of the country is at stake. A somewhat analogous case was before the Supreme Court lately, between the Government of Quebec and the North Shore Turnpike Debenture holders. The Syndicate will recognize nothing but their contract, and they will act rightly to do so. In the English House of Commons, in 1873, an important debate took place on the Railway, Canal and Telegraph Bill. I will refer you now to the speeches of Mr. Chichester Fortescue, in 1854:

"That every railway company should be compelled to afford full advan-"That every railway company should be compelled to afford full advantage of convenient interchange from one system to another, to give every class of traffic fair facilities, and especially to observe the rule of equal charges, under similar circumstances. But as to securing the equal treatment of company by company, or the free and uninterrupted forwarding of traffic over all the lines which Parliament had sanctioned, the success of the Act had been most imperfect. In controling the dealings of company with company, the Act had been to a great degree a d-ad letter. This point was very fully examined into and proved before the Committee of last year. This want of success was, in the opinion of the Committee due to two causes, one the want of more specific enactments within the Act itself, the other the want of an authority better fitted for putting the Act in motion and carrying its intentions and fitted for putting the Act in motion and carrying its intentions and provisions into effect."

As a result of this, a committee was appointed, and upon their report a Commission was appointed. A question arose as to whether that Commission would conflict with the judicial tribunals of the country, and whether the ordinary Courts should take cognizance of cases arising under the Act. Lord Campbell on this point said:

"That was not a code which the judges could interpret; it left them "That was not a code which the judges could interpret; it left them altogether to exercise their discretion as to what they might deem reachable. The judges, and himself among them, felt themselves incompetent to decide on these matters. He confessed he was wholly unacquainted with railway management; he knew not how to determine what was a reason the decision of questions of the nature contemplated by the Bill, and not one composed of the judges."

In consequence it was resolved to appoint a Commission, and the Bill of 1873 was passed to that effect. In our own country we want a similar Commission. The proposition for such a Commission is not new. In England the first Act regulating railway and canal traffic was passed in 1854, and in 1873 a supplementary Act was passed. In the State of New York, also, a similar Commission was appointed by the Legislature in 1880, and I have had occasion to examine their report. It is certainly a very considerable report and shows how these things are looked upon there, and in what a business-like manner the Americans do these things. In this report, all the abuses which arose out of railway management are set forth, and the proper remedy is suggested. The remedy is these commissions, which were created by several of the State Legislatures, and which avoided an immense quantity of trouble and legislation, and This road must be managed so as to prevented the pooling of profits. The effect of these commissions in preventing unjust discrimination is shown in this report, as follows:

"The charge that the railroads of this State discriminate against the citizens of the State, and in favor of western and foreign pr ducers, is fully proven by the evidence taken. The charge that they discriminate against certain localities in the State, as compared with others, is fully proven. The charge that they discriminate in fav r of certain individuals, as compared with others in the same locality, is fully proven.

"Every man who pays the tariff rate is discriminated against, when any man is given a special rate on a similar shipment.

"The tariffs of the several roads all recognize distance as a controlling element, and in no case do they make the longer haul cost less than the shorter. They conform generally to the popular conception of what a railroad tariff ought to be. Special rates conform to no system and vary without rule, and of these exclusively we now speak. A special variation of the schedule rate, made alike to the general public, and without discrimination, is free from objection."

I shall quote from that work on page 50:

"In July last, during a war of rates, wheat was carried from Chicago to New York for ten cents per hundred. In August it was put up to fifteen cents, a "living rate." A short European harvest created an unusual demand-a bountiful harvest here created an extraordinary supp usual demand—a bountiful harvest here created an extraordinary supply. The carrying capacity of all roads leading to the seaboard was taxed to the utmost. The rates were gradually raised from fifteen cents in August to forty cents, in November. It cost the road just as much to haul a hundred pounds of grain in August as in November. The rate was raised simply because the condition of the market warranted it and the product could bear it. It would be difficult to make a criticism upon that raise which public judgment would sustain. But we are distinctly told that public interest plays an insignificant role in the theatre of railroad management. It is at best but a servant waiting upon the interest of the stockholders. The wrong consists in exercising a censorship over the agement. It is at best but a servant waiting upon the interest of the stockholders. The wrong consists in exercising a censorship over the business affairs of the community, secretly, arbitrarily and unequally varying rates, building up this, developing that—not only performing the proper functions of transportation, but taking into consideration the probable or possible profit of a shipment, and adjusting their rat saccordingly. If the shipper is likely to make a large profit, they compel him to divide; if the margin is a close one, they determine whether the shipment shall be made or not, whether it shall result in a profit or loss, and the amount of profit or loss. Thus, under this system of management and this method of giving rates is every merchant every manufacturer, every shipper, and through them every individual along the 5,550 miles of railroad in this State, with its five hundred millions of capital measurably in the power of these corporations. Conciliate their goodwill, court their favor, and favorable rates will follow; incur their hostility, and the margin of their displeasure may be read on your freight bills." margin of their displeasure may be read on your freight bills."

I do not apply this alone to the Canadian Pacific Railway, but to all our Canadian railways. I was told at the office of L'Islet Station, in 1878, that a barrel of flour was carried from Chicago to Halifax for 75 cts., while it cost $1 to Quebec. I was informed on good authority that a barrel of flour was carried on the Grand Trunk, joining the Intercolonial Ruilway, both railways pooling for 75 cts. to Halifax, while we pay a dollar to Quebec. I call that discriminating. This proposition to make a Railway Commission is opposed by all the railways in the country. They are afraid it would interfere with their profits, which is just the reason why we should establish it. The duties of these Commissioners should be a general supervision of all the railroads, to see how they are operated with reference to the security of passengers and the accommodation of the general public, and as to how they comply with their original charters. They ought to investigate into accidents to life and property, and to assess summary damages in such cases, and to direct the proper legal proceedings in the event of the neglect of the Railway Act. They should have the right to order the necessary repairs, addition to rolling stock, stations and terminal facilities for freight and passengers, with which to enforce their regulations. They ought to prepare fixed rates according to distances, as in the United States, and should have the jurisdiction extended to telegraph and general monopolies, with power to enforce their regulations. If the Commissioners be appointed they must receive indemnity from the Government, but none from any railway company-not even a pass. In the United States the receiving of a small gift or pass In the amounts to a misdemeanor, and entails loss of office. The reports of the United States railways are much shorter asking for a grant. In Opposition, Sir, a great many fine and much better compiled than ours. It is the duty of these Commissions to make and supervise their reports, L'Islet open a big book. I do not know what kind of a Mr. CASGRAIN.

which carry an authority with them wherever they appear. If you consider the enormous interests which are involved, whether this railway is built by the Sault or by the proposed line, you will understand the enormous interests which the Government have in the railway if properly managed. It will be the only outlet for the North-West. I say this, that if the men engaged in the enterprise are men of commercial shrewdness, they will select Quebcc as the outport of this Dominion. We have heard a good deal about Halifax and St. John, but the best inland port in this Dominion is Quebec, because you have there those deep waters which are required for the purposes of a port of that kind. I beg pardon of the House for the discursory nature of my remarks, but that is a necessary consequence of the interruptions to which I have been subjected. I, therefore, move:

That the contract respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway makes no provision for the establishment of an Executive Commission or other machinery for regulating the tolls and securing proper accommodation to the public on the railway which is to be built practically at the public cost; that such provision should be made, and that the contract is, in this respect, objectionable.

Mr. VALIN. Mr. Speaker, after the magnificent speeches made by the hon, the Minister of Railways, the admirable speech of the hon. Mr. Langevin, I was greatly edified at hearing two famous speeches made by the hon, member for Rimouski (Mr. Fiset); I was equally edified at hearing two or three speeches by the hon, member for L'Islet (Mr. Casgrain). The hon, member has been pleased to tell us a great many things. He wanted to enlighten us, he wanted to enlighten the Conservatives with a lantern. He is himself the light of L'Islet. Sir, I am not at all astonished to see that these gentlemen want better terms for the contract; the hon, members of the Opposition have made great efforts to obtain better terms for us, they have been looking for these better terms in all possible ways; they were looking for them at the time when the contract was to be given to the Allan Company; it is this contract that was the cause of the Government being accused of the great Pacific Scandal. Well, Sir, these gentlemen when they came into power shouldered this scandal; they did not want to take it up entirely, they broke it into little pieces; they took up one end here and another end there, and they said: "We will wait, perhaps the Conservatives will get back to power and we will make another outcry." Well, the Conservatives are again in power, and yet, before these gentlemen were in power, they tried in every possible manner to take up the entire scandal, and that is why they did not accept it. They admitted thereby, Sir, that we are obliged to build this railway; it is an obligation towards British Columbia. Why do we accept it? It is because we have a condition to fulfil. If British Columbia had been told, when she was negotiating for her entry into the Union: "We will make no engagement for the present generation, but we will make an engagement for future generations, two or three centuries hence," certainly British Columbia would not have come into the Dominion. To come back to what the hon. member for L'Islet was just saying with regard to better terms, well, hon. Ministers went to England. They sought for the best terms, and they at length found them. Once these magnificent terms found, the Opposition, in their turn, sought for better terms still. Well, Sir, they have succeeded in finding a certain number of persons, but they wanted to give too good terms, they took persons who did not even want to make a business matter of it, in order the better to deceive us. Sir, I should not be surprised if the hon, member for Rimouski has also a motion in amend-Well, I hope they will finish with their motions in amendment, by offering the Government money instead of book it was. I do not know if it was not even a Bible; for I have heard say that once a miracle was wrought, and that water was changed into wine; but the hon. member for L'Islet has changed water into gin. The hon, member for L'Islet has also invented a big circular with a great number of objections. These objections were twenty-four in number. I suppose, Sir, they have taken this number as the basis of their motions in amendment. I think that idea comes from the number twenty-four. Sir, people should know themselves a little better than the hon. member for L'Islet does. In the first place he has said a good deal about railways. Because he travels by rail, my hon. friend imagines he knows a great deal about railroads I think, Sir, that I am right in saying that this question has been discussed at length. We have been carried back and forth from Quebcc to the Pacific. Some want to go by Sault Ste. Marie, others want to go by the north of Lake Superior. For my part I went a road over our own territory. If we went through the United States we might, at certain times, meet with We might meet with strikes, and the great obstacles. strikers might take up our rails just when we most needed them on our railway. We do not want the Sault Ste. Marie route, because we do not like to be too closely connected with the States. The city of Montreal is more interested than we are, in order to compete with the great city of New York. As for us, what we want is to settle the North-West, so as to cultivate it. Well, Sir, I will not speak longer as I do not wish to take up the time of the House, but I will say this much to the hon. member for L'Islet. He told us that he knew nothing about the contract; that he had been informed of nothing, that he had not even been informed with regard to signing it. I believe that with all he has said, if he had been consulted with regard to signing this contract, it would have been a poor piece of business because he does not seem to know much about the matter; I do not he does not seem to know what business is. believe that in such an important matter as this he is able to enlighten us with his lantern. I think, Mr. Speaker, that we are sufficiently enlightened upon this question without saying anything more.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I am sorry to trouble the House at this hour with another amendment, and a few observations thereon. The various amendments offered to the House thus far have been directed to questions of a national or Dominion character, but I propose before resuming my seat to submit an amendment which does not bear to so great an extent upon questions of a Dominion or national character as those which have already been submitted. While it is quite proper that, as members of this House, we ought to discuss these questions from a Dominion standpoint, we must not close our eyes to the fact that this Dominion is composed of various Provinces which are all more or less interested in and affected by the great question we have been discussing I am sure even the Minister of Railways will not dispute that proposition, in view of his recent statement to a delegation from the Toronto Board of Trade; for when his attention was called to the fact that the language of this contract was not sufficiently specific to protect the interests of Ontario and the railways of that Province, he stated that if that was the case, it would be a national calamity. S) far as I have been able to discover, no sufficient protection is afforded to the railways of the Provinces of Onlario and Quebec by this contract, or the Bill founded upon it. The Province of Ontario has expended large sums of money in the construction of railways and opening up communication with the back sections of the Province, and to some extent the resources of the Province have been trenched upon for the purpose of extending these lines of railway, in the hope and expectation of securing a portion of the carrying trade of the great North-West; but what I complain of is, that the endeavors of the Province of Ontario in that respect have not been seconded by hon, gentlemen on the Treasury tenches; that no sufficient safeguard has been thrown about these railways in this contract, but that they are left practically in the hands of the Syndicate to deal with them as they see fit. We in Ontario want no advantage over the railways that are east of us; we want only fair play and justice; we want our railways only to be enabled to compete on fair terms with these railways. We do not want to get a single pound of the freight of the North-West to which we are not honestly and fairly entitled. From its geographical and commercial position Montreal will always receive the lion's share of that trade. While we acknowledge that, we desire that our manufacturers and merchants, who are deeply interested in the development of the great North-West, shall have their full share of the trade with that country. Under this contract the Canadian Pacific Railway have the power to acquire the Canada Central Railway and other railways east of Lake Nipissing. The question may be dealt with on the assumption that the Canadian Pacific Railway will not acquire the railways east of Lake Nipissing; or it may be dealt with on the assumption that the Canadian Pacific Railway will acquire the Canada Central Railway. It is, therefore, desirable to consider the effect of this contract on the carrying trade of the Ontario and Quebec railways, assuming that the Canadian Pacific Railway will not acquire the Canada Central Railway Let us see how the traffic of the Province of Ontario is going to be affected by this contract; what safeguards are provided, if any, on the assumption that the Canadian Pacific Railway will have its terminus at Lake Nipissing. In section 24 of the Act an attempt is made to afford a sort of protection to the Ontario and Pacific Junction Railway. It provides:

"For the receiving and forwarding of and delivery of traffic upon and for the railways of the said companies respectively, for the return of car-riages, trucks, and other vehicles, and no one of the said companies shall give or continue any preference or advantages to, or in favor of either of the others, or of any particular description of traffic in any respect what-

It further provides that:

"Nor shall any one of the said companies subject any other thereof, or any particular description of traffic, to any prejudice or disadvantage in any respect whatsoever; and any one of said companies which shall have any terminus, or station near any terminus, or station of either of the others, shall afford all reasonable facilities for receiving and forwardthe others, shall afford all reasonable facilities for receiving and forwarding all the traffic arriving by either of the others, without any unreasonable delay, and without any preference or advantage, or prejudice or disadvantage; and so that no obstruction may be offered in the using of such railway as a continuous line of communication; and so that all reasonable accommodation may at all times, by the means aforesaid, be mutually afforded by and to the said several railway companies; and the said Cauadian Pacific Railway Company shall receive and carry all freight and passenger traffic shipped to or from any point on the railway of either of the said above-named railway companies passing over the Canadian Pacific Railway or any part thereof, at the same mileage rate and subject to the same charges for similar services; without granting or allowing any preference or advantage to the traffic coming from or going and subject to the same charges for similar services; without granting or allowing any preference or advantage to the traffic coming from or going upon one of such railways over such traffic coming from or going upon the other of them, reserving, however, to the said Canadian Pacific Railway Company the right of making special rates for purchasers of land, or for emigrants or intending emigrants, which special rates shall not govern or affect the rates of passenger traffic as between the said Company and the said two above-named companies or either of them."

These provisions, at first sight, would appear to afford some reasonable protection for the Ontario system of railways, and possibly for the Quebec system; but a more careful reading of the clause with the light now shed on such questions by the experience of our own country and that of the United States, shows that it affords no protection to either. I will first discuss this point on the assumption that the Canadian Pacific Railway will have its terminus at Lake Nipissing, that that will be neutral ground common to the Ontario and Quebec railway systems, the Ontario railways connecting at that point with the Canadian Pacific Railway by the Pacific Junction Railway, and the Quebec system by the Canada Central and the Occidental which has running powers over the Canada Central line to Lake Nipissing. In the first place, you will find that the clause only declares that both of the companies to which I have just referred shall be afforded facilities for receiving and handling freight at the terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway, but there is no protection against a preference being shown to either company to the detriment of the The Canadian Pacific Railway have the power at Lake Nipissing, or in the far west, to say over which of those two roads the freight shall pass, by the imposition upon the one as against the other of terminal charges. They have the power to give the preference to the one road by imposing on the other terminal charges. An eminent authority in England has laid down the rule that those terminal charges do afford a protection to one road against the other, and contends that there ought to be a reasonable, moderate and uniform rate for terminal services charged to all companies receiving their freight from a trunk line. These terminal charges may be so high to the one company as to drive every single pound of freight from the great North-West over either of the lines to which I have referred. It is stated of hon. gentlemen, that the Railway. Act covers all this Mr. Cameron (Huron), that 1 cent a bushel in the way of terminal charges will determine the route by which traffic is to go. I shall read the following extract from Parslee:-

"Another part of the freight question, that relating to terminal charges, "Another part of the freight question, that relating to terminal charges, is one which affects the interests of traders to a considerable extent. It is a matter, moreover, involved in great doubt and difficulty; indeed it is scarcely reducable to coherence. We can only hope, therefore, to give a very general idea as to the affect and meaning of 'terminals.' The charges in question are made for the services which the companies render in the forwarding and receiving of goods, in addition to the cost of carriage along the lines. Such services include all the duties generally performed at the railway stations. The provisions of the Special Acts of the companies empower them to demand 'a reasonable sum for localing and unleading delivery and collection has where the services loading and unloading, delivery and collection, &c., where the services, or any of them, are or is performed by the company."

Now you will see the point: it is said that in this Bill it is provided that an equal rate shall be charged the Ontario and Pacific Junction and the Canada Central Railway. But the terminal charges are wholly independent of the freight rates, and the Canada Pacific Railway Company can, by these charges, divert every pound of freight from one railway to another, for carriage to tide-water. That will show the importance of affording protection against the preferences I have indicated. If the intention of the Government was to deal with those railways belonging to both Provinces, on precisely the same footing, then it was the grossest ignorance or carelessness, in the preparation of this contract, to have omitted such a provision. I contend that the Canadian Pacific Railway has the power, without violating the Act, in another way, to force every pound of freight to the seaboard either over the Ontario and Pacific Junction Railway or the Canada Central, in preference to the Quebec railways, by the imposition of elevator charges. The Company can construct their own elevators in the North-West, and charge for storage of grain, and can impose those charges on the freight passing over one railway, and not on the freight over another, which they have a perfect right to do. They can achieve the same results, whether or not the eastern terminus be at Lake Nipissing-can divert all the western freight over either the Ontario or Quebec railways, as they see fit - how? By drawbacks and rebates on ocean shipments. This Bill affords no protection whatever for the railways of the one Province against the railways of the other in that respect. The Canadian Pacific Railway, when they get a through bill of lading for Liverpool, may send their freight over the Ontario and Pacific Junction, the Grand Junction to Belleville and then by the Grand Trunk to Montreal, and thence to Portland and Liverpool, and drive every pound of freight from the west over those lines in preference to the Quebec railways by allowing rebates on ocean shipments alone. This question has already engaged public attention in the United States and remedies are there provided. The Canadian Pacific Railway can also favor one system of railways at the expense of another, by carrying the freight at the owner's risk in one case, and in the other at the Company's risk. There is an extra charge made where it is carried at the owner's risk, and it may be made in one case and not another. On this subject Parsloe says:

"Attention has been called already to the fact that in some instances "Attention has been called already to the fact that in some instances the rates are varied according to whether goods are conveyed at 'owner's risk' or 'company's risk.' * " The plan has been adopted in order to give traders reduced rates in certain cases, whilst the companies are relieved of some responsibility."

Under that ingenious device the Canadian Pacific Railway Company will be enabled to send freight over one railway in preference to another, as also by the system of drawbacks. In every State of the Union, possessing a large system of railways, they have had to enact stringent legislation to prevent drawbacks, robates, terminal charges and other devices to which railways resort for the purpose of evading the law. There is now before Congress a Bill, having the same object in view, which will become law. I deny the statement ground. If it did, what necessity for putting this provision in the Bill at all? All that was necessary was to make the General Railway Act apply if it does not now apply. But if it did, I say its provisions are wholly insufficient to cover the points to which I have just alluded. Clause 24 in the Bill of the Minister of Railways is substantially taken from what is called the "Cardwell Bill," pussed in England in 1854. Now, that clause substantially has been in the Railway Act of the United States for years, and it has been found wholly insufficient for the purpose of effecting the desired object. That has also been found to be the case in Canada, and it has also been found to be the case in England. Here is what Parsloe says on that subject:

"Parliament has again and again endeavored to deal effectually with the great question of a proper regulation of our railways; but; notwithstanding all the legislation which has thus been produced, the great object in view, namely, the passing of such measures as should provide complete and adequate public protection, has not been attained to a full and necessary development. Many of the Acts of Parliament have been subject to such a powerful railway influence that some of these provisions—and these the most important ones as regards the public have been rendered, to a large extent, unsatisfactory. It is not surprising that, under such conditions, to resort to law with a great and powerful railway company has been, and, indeed, is now considered too formidable an undertaking to be hastily attempted by any single individual. But, further, not only was it found, years ago, that the Acts of Parliament were in themselves, inadequate and not sufficiently explicit, but that to deal with such subjects a tribunal was necessary which possessed a practical acquaintance with the subject." "Parliament has again and again endeavored to deal effectually with

We know perfectly well that the law has been insufficient in Canada. I think now is the time when we should have the Ontario system of railways put upon the same footing as those of Quebec, and vice versa. On the assumption that the Canadian Pacific Railway will not have its eastern terminus at Lake Nipissing, and that it will acquire the Canada Central, what will be the resul? During last Session an Act of Parliament was passed. This Act secured for This Act secured for the railways of Ontario and Quebec the same protection. It provided that the Quebec railways should have running powers over the entire line of road owned by the Canada Central Railway, extending from Ottawa via Renfrew to the Sault. Under that Act the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental Railway had running powers over these lines from Ottawa to the Sault. You must bear in mind that the terminus of the Canada Central Railway is at Brockville, and if the Canadian Pacific Railway acquires the Canada Central Railway, it will be the interest of the Canadian Pacific Railway to carry its eastern freight viá Brockville, and therefore the only safety that either the Occidental or the Ontario and Pacific Junction can have will be to make the eastern terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway at Nipissing. In that case, the system of railways in Ontario and Quebec will be on a footing of perfect equality, and it will be the interest of the Canadian Pacific Railway to deal fairly with the railways, in order to secure the freight both ways—east and south. There is another point in connection with this matter to which I wish to refer. Assuming that the Canadian Pacific acquires the Canada Central, the Canadian Pacific will then have an outlet at two points, Ottawa and Brockville. But when we reach Carleton Place we reach a point common to both routes—29 miles from Carleton Place to Ottawa, and 45 miles from Carleton Place to Brockville-so that it will be the interest of the Canadian Pacific Railway to carry the traffic over the longer distance on its own line to Brockville. Let us see what the distances are. From Lake Nipissing to Montreal, by way of Brockville, is 377 miles; from Nipissing to Montreal by the Canada Central and the Ottawa and Occidental it is only 352 miles. Does anybody suppose that the Canadian Pacific Railway will not run their own trains over their own railway to Brockville and there make traffic, or rather arrangement, with the Grand Trunk and send the freight to Montreal by this route in preserence to the route via the Occidental? The difference of 25 miles in the distance is practically nothing. I am glad to see the people of Quebec are | York, or 151 miles in favor of the route by Brockville. Do alive to their interests in this respect. The organ of the Conservatives has spoken out on this point and warned the Government against giving the Canadian Pacific Railway unlimited power to destroy the Quebec railways. I think if there was ever a piece of legis'ation carried through Parliament calculated to destroy their system of railways, the scheme we are now discussing will have that effect. Now, there is another way by which the Quebec system of railways may be injured and practically destroyed if the Syndicate thinks fit. The Canadian Pacific is not bound to carry its traffic by the Canada Central Railway and the Occidental down to Montreal. There is still another route via the Ontario and Pacific Junction Railway and the Grand Junction to Belleville, then v.d. the Grand Trunk to Montreal, by which the western truffic can reach tide water. Suppose the Canadian Pacific Railway should say: "We will not acquire the Canada Central Railway; we will acquire or make traffic arrangements with the Ontario and Pacific Junction Railway and the Grand Junction Railway and carry our freight to the seaboard vid those lines and the Grand Trunk." How will this affect the Quebec railways. The difference in the distance is very small. Let us see. It is 480 miles vid the route I have in dicated, from Lake Nipissing to Montreal, and 325 miles by the other route from Lake Nipissing to Montreal, utilizing the Occidental, or a difference of only 128 miles. Everybody knows that a difference of 50 miles, or even of 150 miles, is not taken into account at all upon through traffic extending over 2,000 miles. In the way I have pointed out the Canadian Pacific Railway may make the arrangement I have indicated and thus effectually destroy the Occidental Railway. That is not all. The power of the Canadian Pacific Railway to destroy the Quebec railways in the traffic to Quebec is equally clear. Let us see how this works. The Occidental runs to Quebec, the Grand Trunk also reaches Quebec by a different route. Compare the distances by the different routes and see what there is to prevent the Syndicate from effectually destroying every line of railway in the whole Province of Quebec. We will again start at the point common to both routes, which is Carleton Place. From Carleton Place to Quebec vid Brockville the distance is 342 miles; and vid Ottawa, over the Occidental, the distance is 313 miles, or a difference in favor of the Occidental of only 23 miles. That is a small difference, but it will enable this Company to say to the people of Quebec: "Unless you submit to our terms we will not ship one pound of freight over the Canada Central Railway to Ottawa, and the Occidental to Montreal and Quebec." It is clear, from the table of distances I have referred to, that the position I have taken cannot be successfully controverted. Now, there is another way by which the freight from the North-West to the seaboard may be effectually diverted from the city of Montreal, and from the Quebec system of railways. Suppose freight is going from the far west to New York, as will probably be the case on account of the facilities for shipment afforded at that port. What is the distance from Lake Nipissing to New York vid the Canada Central and Occidental? and what is the distance by the other route, both seeking New York as an outlet? From Montreal to Lake Nipissing vid the Canada Central and Occidental is 352 miles; from Montreal to Rutland, in the United States, the distance is 169 miles; from Rutland to Albany 101 miles, from Albany to New York 138 miles; in other words, 760 miles from Lake Nipissing to New York vid the city of Montreal. What is the distance vid Brockville? From Lake Nipissing to Brockville is 232 miles—there is a proposition to bridge the St. Lawrence at Brockville to connect the Canada Central with the Morristown Railway across the river, about one mile; fom Morristown o Albany the distance is 132 miles; from Albany to New York 138 miles, or 609 miles from Lake Nipissing to New

you suppose for a moment that one pound of freight from the North-West to New York would pass over the Occidental Railway or any other railway in Quebec, while it is the direct interest of the Canadian Pacific Railway, under this contract, to go vid Brockville?

Mr. BANNERMAN. Does the hon. gentleman know the difference in the freight charged by the Occidental, by the Canada Central and by the Grand Trunk?

Mr. CAMERON. I neither know, nor do I care; and if the hon, gentleman had paid attention to my argument he would have seen that the amount charged for freight from Ottawa to Montreal and Quebec has nothing whatever to do with it. I say that everything points to the fact that if the Canada Central is acquired by the Canadian Pacific not a single pound of freight will pass over the Occidental Railway to Montreal or Quebec or New York. There is another way by which the Quebec system of railways can be effectually destroyed by the Syndicate. Assuming that the Canadian Pacific Railway will acquire the Canada Central Railway and thus reach Ottawa by that route, when it does reach Ottawa, we know well that there are various ways by which the Canadian Pacific Railway can reach Montreal, Quebec and New York without utilizing a foot of the Occidental. What is to prevent the Canadian Pacific Railway making an arrangement with the St. Lawrence and Ottawa Railway for an outlet from Ottawa to the east? What is to prevent the Canadian Pacific Railway from making such arrangements with the Coteau Railway, or taking advantage of the Bill introduced last Session by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby) for the construction of a railway from the seaboard up to Ottawa and thence westward and utilizing that charter to reach the sea? There are several ways by which the Syndicate, having acquired the Canada Central, can reach Montreal, Quebec and the seaboard without touch ing at all upon the Quebec system of railways. It appears to me manifestly clear that, in so far as the certainty is concerned of deriving any benefit whatever from the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Quebec system of railways has none, on the contrary, that system of railways is entirely at the mercy of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Let us now see how this contract guards the out system of railways under section 25 of the Bill the Canadian Pacific Railway has the power of acquiring the Canada Central Railway, and under section 15 the line so acquired becomes the Canadian Pacific Railway. Now, under section 24 of this Bill it is provided that the Canadian Pacific Railway shall afford equal facilities and charge equal mileage rates both to the Ontario and Pacific Junction Railway and to the Canada Central Railway. There is no provision in the Bill respecting the Quebec railways; it is confined entirely to the two railways I have indicated. But supposing the Canadian Pacific acquires the Canada Central what would be the legitimate effect? moment one absorbs the other, that moment I contend, according to the clear legal construction of this contract. that protection ceases to exist. It may be said that until the Canadian Pacific acquires the Canada Central, clause 24 affords protection to the Ontario and Pacific Junction Railway as against the Canada Central Railway and vice versa. That clause in the contract relates to the three companies, the Canadian Pacific, Canada Central, and Ontario and Pacific Junction, and the moment the Canadian Pacific acquires the Canada Central that moment one of those contracting parties drops out, and then that clause is of no effect, and therefore I say there is no protection whatever for the Ontario and Pacific Junction as against unequal rates which the Canadian Pacific may impose. If that protection is removed, the Canadian Pacific, without violating the letter of the law, will have power to impose unequal rates and discriminate against the Ontario and Pacific and in favor of the line of railways eastward. It is quite clear the people of Ontario understand over the Canadian Pacific, the Canada Central and the Grand Mr. CAMERON (Huron).

the effect of the absorption of the Canada Central Railway by the Canadian Pacific Railway. The people of Quebec view that position in the same light. The organ of hon. gentlemen opposite—La Minerve—urges on the Government the necessity of affording protection to the Occidental as against the imposition of unequal rates; and the people of Ontario have taken the same ground. The Minister of Railways will recollect he was interviewed in Toronto by a large deputation of business men. What did they say? They said:

They said:

"That the acquisition of such railways by the Syndicate would destroy the neutral character of the eastern ferminus of the National Railway, and would practically transfer its terminus to Montreal.

"That the acquisition of such railways by the Syndicate will also give them a strong and direct interest to divert the traffic of the North-West away from the Ontario system of railways and centres of trade, so as to pass it over the whole length of their eastern lines.

"Therefore, your memorialists view with alarm such proposal of the Syndicate and protest against the power being granted to the Syndicate to absorb the railways to the east of Lake Nipissing without the most stringent provisions being made to prevent injustice to Ontario traffic.

"That in order to protect Ontario interests, it is absolutely necessary that no higher mileage rates should be charged on Ontario traffic over the Canadian Pacific west of Lake Nipissing than what would be pro rate mileage charges on eastern traffic, in proportion to the whole distance of its carriage by the railways owned or operated by the Syndicate; or, in other words, that the Syndicate should not be permitted to place any higher mileage rates on the portion of their railway over which Ontario traffic must pass than on the portion over which eastern traffic must pass."

The hon. Minister in meeting the arguments presented by

The hon. Minister in meeting the arguments presented by the deputation said that the contract afforded sufficient protection, but if it did not it would be a national calamity. The deputation was composed of business men of large experience in such matters; they were not satisfied. They reported to their constituents, and what did they say? They

"Your Committee is still of opinion that railways will always forward business in the direction of their own interests, and that the Syndicate, if allowed to amalgamate the Canada Central will own a long railway mileage in the direction of Montreal, while owning nothing in the direction of Ontario, they will naturally endeavor to forward business by their own railway instead of handing it over to another at Lake Nipissing."

The House will understand what protection the people of Ontario are entitled to receive from Parliament in dealing with this question, and how little they receive under the terms of this contract. I cannot make the point stronger than the deputation made it to the Minister of Railways. According to what those gentlemen said, and I believe it is the correct interpretation of this contract, the Syndicate will be in a position to divert every pound of freight from west to east, or east to west, away from the Ontario system of railways. If the Syndicate see fit, every pound of freight from Montreal west night pass over the Grand Trunk to Brockville and thence over the Canadian Pacific westward, and so with the traffic from the west eastward. It may be said that this is not likely to occur; but it has occurred elsewhere. In the United States, England and Canada, railways carry freight often at cheaper rates for long than for short distances. The Grand Trunk charges for a cargo of oil cake from Baden to Belleville, $52—the distance is 168 miles; the same car load would be carried from Chicago to Belleville, 628 miles, for $50. If that is done by the Grand Trunk, what is there to prevent the Canadian Pacific carrying freight for short distances at a smaller remuneration than longer distances, so as to force the traffic over the lines owned and controlled by the Company? In England, where they have the full protection afforded by Clause 24, the same grievance often happens, and shippers are at the mercy of the railways in this respect. There is another way in which the Ontario Railways and the business men of that Province, and its towns and villages, may be prejudiced to a considerable extent by the Pacific Railway under the terms of this contract. I contend that, under this charter, every pound of freight from and to the far west from every village, town and city on the Grand Trunk, west of Brockville, will pass

Trunk west of Brockville, instead of taking the natural route by the Ontario and Pacific and the other railways which connect with it south and east. If hen, members will look at the table of distances they will probably be convinced that there is every possibility, and every probability, that the Canadian Pacific Railway will, in order to destroy the Ontario and Pacific Junction Railways, and the system of Ontario railways connecting with it, and to divert all traffic away from the Ontario and Pacific, carry all their freight by the lines I have indicated. Suppose freight was coming to Kingston from the far west, one would naturally expect it to pass over the Ontario and Pacific, and thence by other Ontario lines to its destination. Will it do so? Let us see what the distances are, because we will then have some foundation for the position we are taking. The distance from Nipissing to Kingston, via the Canada Central Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway, is, from Nipissing to Brockville 252 miles, and from Brockville to Kingston 47 miles, a total of 299 miles; the distance, viá the Ontario and Pacific Junction Railway, the Grand Junction Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway, is, from Nipissing to Bellville, via Ontario and Pacific Junction Railway, the Grand Junction Railway, 260 miles, and from Belleville to Kingston via the Grand Trunk 48 miles, a total of 308 miles; only 9 miles against the Ontario and Pacific Junction Railway route. Now, let us see how the traffic to Belleville will be affected. The distance from Nipissing to Belleville is, vid the Canada Central Railway to Brockville, 252 miles, and from Brockville to Belleville via the Grand Trunk Railway, 95 miles, a total of 347 miles; the distance viā the Ontario & Pacific Junction and the Grand Junction Railway is 260 miles; or 87 miles in favor of the Ontario and Pacific Junction Railway. My contention is that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, having acquired the Canada Central, will carry their freight to Brockville by the Canada Central Railway, and then make arrangements with the Grand Trunk Railway to carry it westward. If we take Port Hope as an objective point, we shall find ourselves in the same position. The distance from Nipissing to that point is, from Nipissing to Brockville 252 miles, and from Brockville to Port Hope 145 miles, a total of 397 miles; the distance via the Ontario and Pacific Junction Railway is 215 miles; or 182 miles in favor of the Ontario and Pacific Junction Railway. Now, let us take Whitby. The distance via the Canada Central Railway is, from Nipissing to Brockville 252 miles, and from Brockville to Whitby 178 miles, a total of 430 miles; the distance via the Ontario and Pacific Junction Railway, from Nipissing to Whitby is 217 miles; or 213 miles in favor of the latter. If we take Toronto, a point farther west, and taking this as a starting point, we practically take the whole of western Ontario. The distance via the Canada Central Railway is from Nipissing to Brockville, 252 miles, and from Brockville to Toronto 208 miles, a total of 460 miles; the distance via the Ontario and Pacific Junction Railway is 222 miles, showing 238 miles in favor of the latter route. Yet I say again that even for points as far west as Toronto the Canadian Pacific Railway Company may carry their freight to Brockville on their own railway, and then ship it westward viá the Grand Trunk to Toronto. To Hamilton the distance viá Brockville is 490 miles, and viá the Ontario and Pacific Junction Railway, 252 miles, being 238 miles against the Canada Central Railway. Under this contract, no safeguards are provided against increased traffic to points west of Brockville, over the longer rather than the shorter routes. I think it is quite clear that hon. gentlemen opposite could, had they so desired, have protected these inland lines of railway against this unequal competitor. A word or two as to the position of these two railways—the Occidental and the Ontario and Pacific Junction Railways. With respect to the Sault Branch, you are aware that by section 14 of the Statute to which I have referred, the Government of Quebec

Central Railway from Ottawa to Sault Ste. Marie. You are also aware that the Ontario and Pacific Junction Railway have, by section 13 of the same Statute, running powers over the extension from Lake Nipissing to the Sault. So that both of these roads can pass over that extension, and under that law both occupied precisely the same position both at Lake Nipissing and the Sault—no preference being given the one over the other. The policy of the late Government, as well as that of this Government, until recently, was to make Lake Nipissing a neutral point, so that that should be the terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and that all railways meeting there, from the east and south, should be put on a perfect equality. It seems to me that was a wise policy, as it gave them all the privilege of competing on equal terms for the trade of the North-West, which reached that point by four different outlets: 1st. By the Canadian Pacific all-rail route. 2nd. By the Thunder Bay Branch, thence by Lake Superior to the Sault. 3rd. By the Northern Pacific to Duluth, then by Lake Superior to the Sault. 4th. By the line south of Lake Superior to the Sault, Under the policy now advocated by hon, gentlemen opposite. the Occidenta land Ontario and Pacific Junction Railway can only hope to secure each a share of the traffic over the trunk line alone. I contend that the Government ought to have done what the Government have not done, protect the interests of these two railways, The Government ought to have made Lake Nipissing a neutral point; the Government ought, at that point, to have placed both railways on a footing of perfect equality, so that the one could not possibly be put under any disadvantage to the other. These roads are, by this contract, effectually cut off from any connection in the North-West by way of the Sault. We know that the Canadian Pacific Railway, under this contract, can destroy either road at its option. We know that Quebec desires the construction of the Sault Branch. We know the hon. member for Cardwell, although he strongly supports the Government in the House, is strongly in favor of the Sault line outside of the House, that although he has voted in favor of the policy of the Government, he has outside the House pronounced strongly against that policy, and has induced the people to believe the Government is still in favor of the Sault line; and in order that the hon. gentleman and others may be able to harmonize their views inside with their opinions outside of Parliament, I beg to propose the following amendment:-

"That the contract respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway, laid on the Table, does not, as it should, provide for running powers for the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental Railway, and for the Ontario and Pacific Junction Railway, over the 63 miles from Nipissing to Sturgeon River, which form the line common to the through line, and the Sault Ste.

River, which form the line common to the through line, and the Sault Ste.

Marie line.

"And that the contract does not make satisfactory provision for securing the traffic to and from Montreal and the East by the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental Railway against preferential charges which the Canadian Pacific Railway may establish in favor of the Canada Central Railway, the St. Lawrence and Ottawa Railway, the Ottawa Railway, the St. Lawrence and Ottawa Railway, the Cottawa Railway to the south and east, nor against the preferential charges which it may be the interest of the Canadian Pacific Railway to establish, in case of the authorized and contemplated acquisition of, or amalgamation with, or of the use of running powers over the Canada Central Railway, nor in case the Canadian Pacific Railway amalgamation with, or obtains running powers over the St. Lawrence and Ottawa Railway, the Coteau Railway, or any other railway running south or east.

"Nor does the said contract make satisfactory provision for securing the traffic to and from Ontario, by the Ontario and Pacific Junction Railway, against the preferential charges which it way be the interest of the Canadian Pacific Railway to establish in the event of the authorized and contemplated acquisition of, or amalgamation with, or use of running canadian racine nanway to establish in the event of the authorized and contemplated acquisition of, or amalgamation with, or use of running powers over, the Canada Pacific Railway and other railways south and east of Ottawa; and the said contract is, in these respects, objectionable."

Mr. PLUMB. The gist of the hon. gentleman's statements amount to this, that the longer the distance over which traffic passes the cheaper the rate of freight, and to bring his reasoning to a logical conclusion there may be a road so long that freight will be carried over it for nothing. have running powers secured to them over the Canada The hon gentlemen are making an onslaught of this kind, but I can say, with authority, with regard to this Sault of the Opposition was so enamoured, that he said if it could be constructed his objection to the Syndicate would vanish, that his political friends in the Ontario Legislature, where they have a large majority, have not taken that patriotic view of the Sault route, or considered it so important as to do much for it, for I heard if they would give a bonus of $400 a mile that road would be built. I think if Ontario is so protected in this respect, it should be by the Government which is now in power in that Province, and which, by the municipalities and other authorities, large aid has been extended to railways. Nor are we greatly alarmed by any statement named in this discussion by hon, gentlemen opposite, nor by the bug bears put before the House to catch, for a moment, the public ear. We are willing that these harmless resolutions should be fired off one after another, and that hon. gentlemen opposite should sit still longer in sack cloth and ashes. We have all the pleasures on our side, and are perfectly willing that they should put on the deepest mourning and wear it as long as they like.

Mr. PLUMB.

Mr. KILLAM. I rise for the purpose of moving an route, of which we hear so much, and of which the leader amendment to the resolution bearing upon the clause of the contract which refers to the exemption from duty of rails and other materials imported for the use of the railway. Of course it is entirely impossible for me, at this hour, in the midst of so much noise and confusion, to use any argument which could impress on the minds of hon, gentlemen opposite the proper ideas which should have actuated them when the contract was entered into. Ministers seem to have been anxious to throw themselves into the arms of the Syndicate, and get rid of their responsibilities, without considering the professions they have made to the people, that the interest of the manufacturers of Canada should be regarded in all negotiations of this kind. The amount involved in the exemption of those articles from duty is not particularly to the point. The point is this, a question of principle is at stake, which has been entirely forgotten, or disregarded by the hon. gentlemen opposite. We are to have a National Policy, a protection of home industries. I should like to know why the manufacturers of the articles to be used in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway should not have been considered as well as the foreigners, who are invited, under this contract, to compete with them. The member for Montreal (Mr. Gault) feels this point keenly, no doubt. He pretends to be deeply interested in the development of our mining and manufacturing industries; but what is to be said for him as a protectionist, and of other such supporters of the Government, in regard to a contract, one of the strong points of which is that no iron rails manufactured in the Dominion, no spikes, fish plates, bolts and nuts, shall be used in this railway, but that they all shall be imported. I understand perfectly well the amount of duties which are to be paid, and I think I am as well qualified to speak on the subject as the member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick), who read us a lecture the other day. He, in his calculations, left out the duty on steel rails.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. There is no duty on steel rails.

Mr. KILLAM. If we are to have protection to our own manufactures, why should not the manufacturers of Nova Scotia have a chance to supply the materials of this railway? Why should they be left out in the cold? Under this protection policy we were told that the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway would afford a great field for our manufactures, but their interests have been sadly neglected in this business. The member for Frontenacsaid there was a duty on spikes of 20 per cent. That shows the amount of his information on this and other matters. In fact he did not understand the matter, and is as much mixed as to the duty on steel rails, bolts, nuts and spikes as was the Finance Minister when he brought in his tariff. I would like to ask the Minister of Finance if he knows what the duty was on nuts and bolts a year ago.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Thirty per cent.

Mr. KILLAM. The member for Frontenac knows no more about it than the Minister, and that is all that is necessary to say on the subject. The Government on this question have entirely overlooked the question at stake.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman how many spikes the Syndicate will use.

Mr. KILLAM. I am not prepared to say how many spikes the Syndicate may use, but I am quite prepared to say how many should be used in a railway of that length, and am quite prepared to nail the hon, member when he pretends to discuss subjects of which he is so thoroughly ignorant. The Finance Minister has backed down entirely on this subject, and has not shown himself to be alive to the interests of our manufacturers. I move:

That the contract respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway provides for the admission duty free of all steel rails, fish-plates and other fastenings, spikes, bolts and nuts, wire, timber, and all materials for bridges to be used in the original construction of the railway, and of a telegraph line in connection therewith, and all telegraphic apparatus required for the first equipment of each telegraph line; that such exemption from duty is unjust, and the contract is, in this respect, objectionable.

Fulton,	Methot,

Mr. FISET. Mr. Speaker, before you order the second reading of those resolutions, I will take the liberty of drawing the attention of this honorable House to a clause of the contract that has not been dwelt upon by hon members of the Opposition who have spoken before me. I refer to the second clause of the contract:

"The contractors, immediately after the organization of the said Company, shall deposit with the Government $1,000,000 in cash or approved securities, as a security for the construction of the railway hereby contracted for. The Government shall pay to the Company interest on the cash deposited at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum, half yearly, and shall pay over to the Company the interest received upon securities deposited, the whole until default in the performance of the conditions hereof, or until the repayment of the deposit, and shall return the deposit to the Company on the completion of the railway, according to the terms hereof with any interest accrued thereon."

The hon. Minister of Railways, in his speech of the 14th December, thought to avoid all reproach with regard to the slight gazrantee that the Government requires from the Syndicate, by saying:

"Provided you get the parties who are most likely to deal successfully with the matter, the less security you demand the better; because, just in proportion as you lock up the resources of the party, the more you decrease his power to carry out the work successfully."

Then, as the leader of the Opposition remarked at the time, why not do away entirely with the clause relating to the million. In that case, the resources of the Company would be in nowise decreased, their chances of success would in no way be diminished. That is the logical conclusion to which the reasoning of the hon. Minister brings us. Starting from that point, we might, with much more force, apply the same argument to other contractors, whose resources are less considerable than those of the Syndicate; but fur from that, the Government requires from ordinary contractors a deposit of five per cent. of the price of their contract. In an undertaking like the Canadian Pacific Railway, the great importance of which no one denies, the Government should take all the necessary steps for securing the execution of the contract; otherwise they are exposing themselves to deceptions that might endanger the undertaking itself. Supposing, for instance, that the Company, "as it is its intention to do," should construct in three years the central section, or the first 900 miles from Selkirk towards the Rocky Mountains. According to the estimates of Mr. Fleming, this part of the road, which is the easiest to build, will cost $11,700,000. The Government gives the Company for this same work: (1) a subsidy of $10,000 per mile, making a total amount of $9,000,000; (2) the Government gives 11,250,000 acres of land, which, valued at $2 an acre, give $22,500,000. This estimate should not seem exaggerated, because these lands are of the best quality, and the nearest to the road. The Government, therefore, pays for 900 miles of road, that ought only to cost $11,700,000, the enormous sum of $31,500,000. Now, supposing that the Company, always according to the estimate of Mr. Fleming, build and equip this part of the road for $11,700,000many pretend that it can be built for less—the Company remains with a profit of $19,800,000. Then, if it please the Company to suspend their operations at this point of the contract, they will only lose their million deposited with the Government, and they will remain with a balance of $18,800,000. And supposing that the Government should withhold, besides, a fifth of the lands granted to the Company, say 2,300,000 acres, valued at $2 an acre, which would give $4,600,000, the Company would nevertheless have a clear profit of $14,200,000; but I would at once observe that the 5,000,000 acres of land reserved by the Government are to secure the keeping up and the working of the road after it is built. So, if after having completed the 900 miles of the prairie section, the Company wishes to withdraw with such considerable profits, profits sufficient to make the fortunes of each member of the Syndicate, is it not evident that we will not have had sufficient security for the execution of this gigantic enterprise? Is it not evident, on the contrary, that the Government are giving the Company every facility for arriving at that result, and are inducing them to do so, as it were, by allowing them to make such great profits at the beginning of the undertaking? But that is not all. Not only will the Company be able to withdraw and abandon the remainder of the road, after having realized a profit of $14,200,000; but, moreover, they will be able, if they choose, to remain in possession of the finished part of the road and work it for their own profit. And as that part of the road will pay the most, who can assure us that the Company will not take advantage of this privilege? In fact, there is no clause in the contract which provides that any part of the road built by the Company shall become the property of the Government if the Company fail to keep their engagements. Let us now see whether the 5,000,000 acres of land that the Government are to withhold, are a sufficient security for the keeping up and working of the road after it is built. These 5,000,000 acres of land are especially given, it is said, to make good to the Company the losses that will be sustained during the first ten years of the working of the road. If you emit the idea that the Company will sustain losses, we should become still more circumspect with regard to the security to be furnished by the Company. For, after all, however honorable the members of the Syndicate may be, they have not certainly undertaken the construction and working of the Pacific Railway with the intention of losing money by it. What I find skilful is the manner in which they go about it; in the first place, they leave the Government to build the most difficult parts of the road; next, they undertake themselves the immediate construction of the central section, which is the most easy, and which in three years will allow them to realize a clear profit of $14,000,000; in the meantime, they will begin the works on the Lake Superior section, and at the western end, but we know what "beginning the works" means. Finally, after ten years, they are to work the road, which is the most onerous part of the contract, and which will pay the least, and the only security the Government will have will be those 5,000,000 acres held back, say $5,000,000, according to the Government's estimate. This is the way the Company will then argue the matter. As it is the north of Lake Superior which will be the most costly to work and the least paying, seeing that the lands in that region are of inferior quality, and that the immigrants will prefer to settle on the western plains, we will take this section as an example. It is well known that in Canada it costs at least $2,300 per mile to work a railway; so that to work the 650 miles to the north of Lake Superior it will cost the Company over $1,400,000 yearly. Now, as the Company is only obliged to pay the interest on the $5,000,000 withheld by the Government if the road is not kept open, or $200,000 a year, you readily understand that if the road does not pay the Company will prefer to pay this small sum of $200,000 than to expend $1,400 000 a year in working the road. So that, after having given our money and grant, 20,000,000 acres of land, the Government run the risk of having to work the road at their own expense, less the interest on $5,000,000 that the Company will have to pay. Then can hon gentlemen be in good faith when they say that these 5,000,000 acres of land offer a sufficient security for the working of the road after it is built? Evidently not. The Company may argue the matter in another way. According to the contract, if the Company does not issue land grant bonds, it has the privilege of issuing bonds to the amount of $20,000 per mile on the 2,700 miles of road. Supposing these bonds are floated, the Company will realize $20,000 per mile, or a sum of $54,000,000. Now, once the road is built the Company enters into possession of its rights, and the Government pays over the $25,000,000, and hands over the 20,000,000 acres of land, holding back the 5,000,000 acres as security for the working of the road. Here, again, we see in what a fine position the Syndicate will be. They will have realized $54,000,000 with the bonds issued, they will have drawn $25,000,000 from the Government and 20,000,000 acres of land, and having realized all the profits that they expected, the members of the Syndicate would be able to say to the Government: "Here, keep your 5,000,000 acres of land and work the road. As for us, we have had enough of it." That is really what we are exposing ourselves to. It is easy to be seen that the security the Government requires is not sufficient. If, besides these 5,000,000 acres of land, the Government had reserved to themselves the right of retaining the $1,000,000 deposited with them at the beginning of the work, it would be another security; but, on the completion of the road, this $1,000,000 has to be returned to the Company. Therefore I move:

That the contract respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway makes no sufficient or satisfactory provision for the construction of the work in a proper manner, or its efficient operation afterwards, nor does it, as it should, provide that so much of the work as is done by the Company shall, in case they make default in completing the railway, belong to the Government, and that the contract is, in these respects, objectionable.

Mr. LARUE. Mr. Speaker, at such a late, or rather at such an early hour, I do not intend to speak at any length. You will allow me, however, to make a motion in ameniment to the resolutions now before the House. I rise to fulfil what I consider to be a patriotic duty. The hon. Minister of Public Works, and all the friends of the Conservative party who have taken part in the present del at, have frequently spoken of patriotism; they have often insisted upon the patriotic sentiments that actuate them. Well, for my part, I think that hon. gentlemen would have done much better to study more attentively the con ract that they have submitted to the Houe; that was the only means, the true way, to my mind, of showing whether they really had in their hearts that patriotism that the people have the right to look for in those who represent them. The more we study the contract brought down by the hon. Minister of Railways and his colleagues, the more we are convinced that the Government has been taken by surprise, and that the Syndicate has taken a very active part in the drawing up of this contract, and the more we are convinced, I say, that the members of the Syndicate have exercised a very effective pressure upon the patriotism of

hon. Ministers who at present govern the country. Sir, if I rise to move the amendment that I shall have the honor of placing in your hands in a few moments, it is because I consider that the present contract does not sufficiently protect the interests of Canada; not only the interests of French-Canadians, but the interests of the inhabitants of the Dominion of Canada. Indeed, if we study each clause of the contract, we will easily be convinced that there is not in the contract one single clause which provides that this great undertaking, that has been put into the hands of the Syndicate, shall be exclusively, or even for a small part, in the future, the work of Canadians. No clause in the contract prohibits the members of the contract from transferring the rights granted by the Government to a foreign company. It might happen that at some day, more or less distant, the Syndicate will be composed entirely of foreigners; then how will the interests of Canadians be protected? If the present members of the Syndicate see fit to sell the interests they have in the present contract to a foreign company, whether it be an American, a German, or a French company; for it is very well known—though at this early hour we do hear the Conservative rooster crowing—it is perfectly well known that we find all the nationalities I have just mentioned among the members of the Syndicate. The Conservative party protected Canadian interests much better when the famous contract with Sir Hugh Allan was passed; by referring to the contract passed between the Conservative Government of the day and Sir Hugh Allan I find a clause that protected Canadians, that protected the people of this country, and I will take the liberty, Sir, of quoting a few lines of this contract in order to show the country, and at the same time to show this House, that the interests of Canada were much better protected by that contract than by the present contract. Clause 36 of the Allan contract contains the following provision: -

"Each director shall be a subject of Her Majesty."

And we find the following in the same clause:—

"And the majority of the Directors shall reside in Canada."

In the present contract we find nothing of that; the members of the Syndicate are not obliged to be subjects of Her Majesty, and the directors are not obliged to reside in Canada. Moreover, we find in this contract that the Company can have their offices in Canada, in the United States, in France, in England, or, in short, in any country in the world. By referring to clause 9 of the present contract we find the following:

"The chief place of business of the Company shall be at the city of Montreal, but the Company may from time to time . . . "

Several hon. MEMBERS. Hear! hear!

Mr. LARUE. If my hon, friends will allow me to continue, they will see that I have taken the trouble to read the contract, which is something that a good many of them have not done, in a serious enough manner perhaps. But I trust that when we are before the public these gentlemen will have the courage to read all the clauses of the contract and explain to their electors why, when the dearest interests of the country were at stake, they blindly submitted to the wishes of their leader, the hon. the Minister of Public Works, and especially to the wisher of the great leader of the Conservative party, who is so well beloved, and who is, indeed, so amiable to his friends. I shall continue, with the permission of these hon. gentlemen, who have done nothing but sing since the beginning of the Session, but who will not sing, perhaps, with so much ease at the next general elections. I understand that the Conservative party, with a majority of eighty, can sing in the House of Commons, but at the next elections perhaps the voice of the hou! member for Montmagny (Mr. Landry) will not be so if I merited it, I would be inclined to think that I was unharmonious or so charming. The hon, member for worthy of representing the city of Montreal. But as the Montmagny will be kind enough, I hope, to allow me to continue the quotation I had begun in order to establish in a clear and precise manner the second part of my amendment. The 9th clause of the present contract reads as follows:

"The chief place of business of the Company shall be at the city of Montreal, but the Company may from time to time, by by-law, appoint and fix other places within or beyond the limits of Canada at which the business of the Company may be transacted; and at which the directors or shareholders may meet, when called as shall be determined by the business" by-laws."

Well, Sir, I appeal to the members who represent so worthily the city of Montreal. If they really had at heart the interests of the great commercial metropolis of Canada, is it not time they would have, I do not say abused their influence, but made use of it in order to convince hon. Ministers that in order to protect the interests of Montreal, and in order to protect the interests of Canada, it is necessary to insert a clause obliging the present Syndicate to have its principal place of business, and to carry on all the business of the Company, in the city of Montreal, not only for a few days, or a few months, but for all time to come? If the hon. members who represent the city and district of Montreal have not as much influence as an hon. member who, the other day, rose in his place, and obtained from the Government a concession that the whole House noticed, and that the country will notice, what will happen? Why it will happen that the city of Montreal will see, some day or another, the members of the Syndicate transferring their chief place of business to St. Paul, Minnesota, or to New York, or to no matter what other city of the United States. At this hour of the morning-it is six o'clock, I believe-I will not enumerate all the disadavntages the city of Montreal, the district of Montreal and even Quebec, will experience, if all the great works, if all the principal business of the Syndicate is to be carried on in the Province of Quebec, or in the Dominion of Canada. disadvantages are evident. Sir, I do not wish to take up the time of the House any longer. I think I have fulfilled my duty as the representative of Bellechasse, and also as a representative of the interests of the Province of Quebec and of the Dominion of Canada. I have not the pretension, as several hon. members of this House have the right and the duty to pretend, of representing here the general opinion of the party to which I have the honor to belong, but on this occasion I think I have done my duty as a member of this House. I am satisfied that when I go before my electors they will be content with the work I have done, and that they will be better pleased with the speech I have made than with the songs that hon. gentlemen opposite have been singing. I therefore move the following amendment:-

That the said resolution be not now read a second time, but that it be That the said resolution be not now read a second time, but that it be resolved, That the contract respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway makes no provision for the creation or continuance of a substantial Canadian interest in the stock of the Company; nor does it guard againt the transfer of a controlling interest to foreigners at any time of the incorporation of the Company; and it provides that the Company may appoint and fix places of business beyond the limits of Canada, where the business of the Company may be transacted; and at which the directors and shareholders are that the transfer of the Company may be transacted; and at which the directors and shareholders. may meet; that under this provision the important business of the Company may be transacted, and its directors' and shareholders' meetings held in St. Paul, Minnesota, or New York, or elsewhere in the United States; that such power should not be given, and that the contract in this respect is objectionable.

Mr. COURSOL. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. LaRue) has just shown great solicitude for the French-Canadians in general, and for those of Montreal in particular. He was complimentary enough to tell us that we had not read the contract, that we had neglected the in-terests of our constituents. That is a serious reproach, and hon, member for Bellechasse has had the advantage of understanding the contract, I would be happy to see him come to Montreal after the 10th February next and contest my right to represent the Eastern division of Montreal.

Mr. LANDRY. Mr. Speaker, I have only one word to say in answer to the remarks that the member for the county of Bellechasse has indulged in. He has stated that we were singing. Well, Sir, we have a right to sing. have, no doubt, heard of a game of cards called whist. When we get to eight we are allowed to sing. That is what the Conservative party are now doing in this House with their majority of eighty. And what can be the objection? In the game we are now playing our partner is the people, and when we go before the people at the next elections we will have the trumps. Where will the hon. member for Bellechasse be then? Perhaps he will be in the hole, if I may be allowed to continue the comparison. Just now he speaks very willing of our future election, but have we not two years to run yet? whilst he runs the risk of soon strapping on his armour. The prospect is even sure, if on the 10th February next a judgment of the Supreme Court should set aside the hon. member's election. The hon. member would be obliged to go before the people. It is, perhaps, for that reason that he has been chosen to make the motion that he has now read. why does But say that we have not studied the contract? Is it not rather himself who has not studied the motion he has just made. Having made a speech in French, we had a right to expect that the summing up of this speech, which is the motion, would be in the same language; but he read it in English: by which he has shown that the motion he held in his hand had been prepared by another, and that is probably why there is so wide a difference between the motion and the speech. The motion has reference to the Pacific Railway contract, and the speech is an attack upon the Conservative members in general and the member for Montmagny in

Mr. HOUDE. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Bellechasse has reproached us with not having studied the contract now before us. Yet, whilst he was thus reproaching us, he gave us the proof that he himself had not studied it in all its parts, for he stated that no clause of the contract provided that the directors should be chosen among British subjects, whereas, as you are well aware, Sir, the contract expressly stipulates that a majority of the directors of this Company shall be British subjects. The hon. member disturbed my convictions for a few moments when he said that the board of directors of this Company could be established outside of the limits of this country, and I asked myself, in fact, whether this Syndicate that is going to build a railway on Canadian territory might not decide to build a railway to the moon. Perhaps that railway might be of some use as a means of carrying away the imaginations of hon. members opposite who really, since this discussion has begun, seem to be travelling in the moon. And it would probably be in accordance with the economical ideas of the Opposition to substitute for the present contract, a railway to the moon. The hon, member has stated that his electors, as well as the electors of his friends of the Opposition, will be delighted to see. I think, indeed, that the electors of our friends opposite will be so glad to see them that they will not let them go, and that in the next Parliament we shall see a great many of them no more.

Fulton. Mr. KING. Before these resolutions are read a second time, I desire to call attention to what appears to me to be a dangerous, as well as an important, feature in this contract. I refer to the standard of construction. Everyone who has paid any attention to the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway, knows that two great objects have been kept in First, the opening up and development of the fertile lands in the North-West; and next, the securing a large foreign traffic over the road when constructed. As surveys have progressed from time to time, the country has been told that we possessed a route a thousand miles shorter from the Pacific coast to England than that from San Francisco vid New York; that in addition to this, it would be possible to secure, at a reasonable cost, a route eminently more favorable in respect to grades and curves than that of any line now built south of the boundary. Speech after speech has been delivered, in this House and out of it, showing that foreign travel and traffic were to flow over this great transcontinental line. The trade of China and Japan was to pass by our doors. The hon, member for Lambton had been so far successful, before retiring from office, as to be in a povition, had the financial condition of the country warranted it. to have placed the whole line under contract, basing his estimates for the work on actual surveys, over a line on which the grades would not exceed 26 feet per mile coming east, and 40 feet per mile going west. We find, on referring to the report of the Chief Engineer, 1877, that the estimates then made were for a line of road equal in every respect to the Intercolonial, and so far as grades and curves were concerned, they were to be very much more favorable. In proof of this, I propose reading from the report to which I have alluded, in which Mr. Fleming says, speaking of the Canadian Pacific Railway:

"The amount of expenditure, however, may in the first place be reduced by the introduction of timber trestle-work in the place of solid earth-work or rock embankments, and by the use of temporary structures in place of permanents and more costly ones various expedient could be resorted to to permanents and more costly ones various expedient could be resorted to we limit the first expenditure, generally by the adoption of perishable works. By this means, the first cost could be reduced, but with the prospect of ultimate increased expense. It is considered advisable to take the ultimate increased expense. It is considered advisable to take the standard of the Intercolonial Railway where solid and permanent works generally prevail"

Mr. DOMVILLE. I rise to a point of order. The reading of speeches is getting to be beyond a joke. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to enforce the Rules of Parliament, that speeches shall be spoken and not read.

Mr. KING. I am reading extracts simply. The hon. gentleman thinks he is making a point against me. The hon. gentleman has a horror of notes.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I have no horror of notes, except the hon. gentleman's own notes.

Mr. KING. I am surprised that the hon, member for King's, who has not been present during the discussion on the twenty amendments that have been moved in this House, should now be in his place. I am about to propose an amendment which will meet one of the objections the hon. gentleman has made to the contract. intimation we had of a departure from the policy of the hon. member for Lambton, for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, was a letter addressed to the Chief Engineer by the Minister of Railways, on the 15th of April, 1880, in which he says:

"DEAR SIR,—The Pacific Railway debate will begin this afternoon, and I must ask you to furnish me with an estimate of cost. In doing this, take the following data: "The four contracts recently let in British Columbia, making full allowances for the reductions to be made and referred to in your report on white regard to the location and character of the railway, I am aware that your own preference has been for a line with light, easy gradients. The Government recognizes the advantage of this feature between Lake Superior and Manitoba, but west of Red River we attach less importance to it than the rapid settlement of the country and the immediate accommodation of settlers.

"The policy of the Government is to construct a cheap railway, following, or rather in advance of settlement, with any workable gradients that can be had, incurring no expenditure beyond that absolutely necessary to effect the rapid colonization of the country."

I can understand that the position then taken by the Government might be defended on the ground that the saving to be effected by the change of line was in the interests of the taxpayers; but it is quite a different thing when it is now proposed to hand over to the Syndicate 2,000 miles of that road, to build which, according to the estimate of Mr. Fleming, submitted last year, would cost $48,500,000, for which they are to receive nearly double that amount. The hon gentleman then called the attention of the House to a return laid on the Table which purports to be the basis upon which the Government founded their policy in selecting as a standard for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Union Pacific Railway. The return was made up of a letter signed by the President of the road and some directors, a report on the condition of the road, and a minority report of directors. The gentlemen who made the first report gave it as their opinion that the Union Pacific Railway was completed in 1870. The other report, and the one on which it would appear the Government based their judgment, read as follows:-

first question that comes before the Commission is, what is "The first question that comes before the Commission is, what is means by Comgress in its various Acts relating to the Pacific Railroad by the words 'first-class railroad?' * * * In the opinion of the Commission the requirements of the law will be satisfied, and the designs of Congress carried out if the roads were properly located, with judicious grades; have substantial road-beds of good width; ballasting, which with proper care shall be able to keep the track in good condition throughout the year; permanent structures for crossing streams, good cross ties, iron and joint fastenings; sufficient sidings, water tanks, buildings, machinery, adequate rolling stock—the more important machine shops and engine houses being of masonry; and the Commission is glad to be able to say that in its opinion, while same expenditures still need to be made, these two roads are substantially such roads to-day. The expenditures needed for completion will be given in detail for each road."

Notwithstanding these gentlemen are disposed to report so favorably, we find, a little further along in their report, they are obliged to admit that over one and a-half millions of dollars will be required to put the road in condition fit for traffic. In the details of deficiencies enumerated by them we find that $529,000 would be required to be expended in the way of ballasting, and $551,000 in replacing temporary bridges and trestle-work with more permanent structures. I have in my hands a report by another gentleman. who was appointed by the United States Government to examine the condition of the Union Pacific in 1869. He says, with reference to the road-bed:

"I examined the road-bed constructed in this valley (Salt Lake Valley) by the Central Pacific Commany and found it of a uniform width of fourteen feet, and neatly finished. The Union Pacific road-bed is neither of these. Its width at the grade line on embankments, especially where it should be the widest, if any difference existed, is only the width of the tie or eight feet, sometimes a little over and sometimes a little under In several places I saw the ends of the ties projecting over the embankment. What is here said will apply equally to that part of the road lying east which I examined."

In summing up, this Commissioner says:

"While I may possibly be somewhat at fault in det ils I have given, I feel satisfied I am substantially correct. But however important or unimportant these details, they cannot affect the great truth I shall now

-The road is not as the law requires, a first-class road.

"2nd —It is not supplied with the necessary buildings.
"3rd.—It has not safe and substantial br dges.

44 4th.—The tunnels are not wide enough for a double track.

"5th.—The road-bed at the grade line is not of a uniform width of fourteen feet, nor has it been properly levelled, nor the rails lined.

"6th.—Especially would it be extremely dangerous for heavy trains to pass over the western portion of the road.

'7th.—The ties have sunken in many instances sometimes at one end and sometimes entirely, the dirt being washed from under them. This is more generally the case on embankments.

'Miles upon miles of them were laid during the winter, when the frost was in the ground. The rails consequently have an uneven bearing and in numerous instances are bent and appear, as you look back upon them, like a succession of small waves.

"I saw, however, a number of men at different points engaged in raising the ends of the ties and packing dirt under them, so as to level the track as far as that would do it.

"Two considerations remain which I deem of more importance than hands have been and are now here and there employed in throwing a few shovels of such material as the road-bed is composed of, (taken in all cases from the sides of the embankments, where they exist,) between the ties.

"Cross-ties are laid with great irregularity on the bed of the road.
They appear, indeed, to have been pitched on, and the rails spiked to them wherever they fell."

This was the condition of the Union Pacific Railway as it was when first constructed, and I am not surprised to find that hon, gentlemen opposite are dissatisfied with it as a standard for our road. But now we find a letter laid upon the Table of the House, signed by three gentlemen of the Syndicate, agreeing to adopt, as the standard for this contract, the Union Pacific as it was in February, 1873. This letter may, or may not, be binding on the Syndicate. But let us enquire into the condition of that road at that time, and what do we find? That, of the large sum which was deemed necessary to expend in the way of ballasting the road, not one dollar had been spent prior to 1874, and only about one-half the temporary bridges had been replaced by permanent structures at that time. The Government Railroad Bureau, in its report, dated Dcember 2nd, 1874, states:

"Between the 1st of January, 1874, and the close of our inspection of the road in August last, fifty-five miles of 58 pound rails had been relaid; the cost of rails and transportation to points where used having been $271,552 91. An additional twenty-two miles of rails were contracted for, one-half being in transit, and all to be delivered before the close of

"In the same time there had been put in track 367,307 pine and 47,892 hard-wood ties; the cost of which, at points where used, being $260,249.11, a fraction less than 65 cents per tie, including transportation.

"Eight miles of track have been laised during the year, releasing one-half mile of snow-sheds and ten miles of snow-fence—the fences in many places being double or treble breasts, thus accounting for the excess of miles of fence over miles of raised track. The protection of the road now against obstruction by snow has been carried to such a degree of perfection, that impediments to the operation of the line from that cause will be no greater in the future than may be exceeded on any of the will be no greater in the future than may be expected on any of the lines between Chicago and New York. The problem of the practicability of the road for winter operation may be considered as solved.

"The filling of the high and long treatles mentioned in our report of 1873 has been completed, as follows:—

No. 765, near Arpen, 24 feet high, 498 feet long.
No. 766, near Arpen, 50 feet high, 600 feet long.
No. 767, near Arpen, 29 feet high, 186 feet long.
No. 798, near Wasatch, 29 feet high, 186 feet long.
No. 799, near Wasatch, 71 feet high, 590 feet long.
No. 800, near Wasatch, 24 feet high, 369 feet long.
No. 801, near Wasatch, 35 feet high, 350 feet long.
No. 802, near Wasatch, 35 feet high, 386 feet long."

If further proof is wanted that the road, in February, 1873, was not in the condition of a first-class road, we have it in a report from the President of the Company to the shareholders, in 1875, in which it is stated that the permanent bridges were not completed till 1874. I think this ought to satisfy hon. gentlemen that the Union Pacific Railway, as it existed in 1873, is not a fit standard to be selected for the Canadian Pacific Railway. But we are told that the interest of the Syndicate will induce them to construct a first-class road. We are also told that we are fortunate in having secured these gentlemen, as they have a very extensive experience in dealing with railways in the West. But, I ask, what guarantee have we in this contract that this Syndicate will build the road of themselves? What is to prevent them handing the contract over to Grit Syndicate No. 2, retaining in their own hands the difference in the low effers; viz., $3,000,000 in cash, and 3,000,000 acres of land. I think if anything should be taken on trust in this matter, it should be the promises of the Government, and not that of the Syndicate. It must be plain to every hon, gentleman that the Minister of Railways and Canals, in letting this contract, was not aiming at securing a first-class road. I will read from Hansard, of December 14th, 1850, an extract from the speech of the Minister of Railways, as follows :-

"What would have been my position in demanding excessive terms in relation to the standard of the road, when they had in their hands my own statement, the statement of the Government of Canada, with all the resources of the country at our back, that we were compelled to lower the character of the road in order to construct a cheap line of the road referred to in Section 6 is to be an inferior road. In dealing with this question, that gentleman says:

It must be well known that the Government have contracted with the Syndicate already for the construction of a portion of the Canadian Pacific. Section 6 of the contract says:

"Unless prevented by the Act of God, the Queen's enemies, intestine disturbances, epidemics, floods or other causes beyond the control of the Government, the Government shall cause to be completed the said Lake Superior section, by the dates fixed by the existing contracts for the construction thereof; and shall cause to be completed the portion of the said struction thereof; and shall cause to be completed the portion of the said western section now under contract, namely, from Kamloops to Yale, within the period fixed by the contracts therefor, namely, by the thirtieth day of June, 1885; and shall also cause to be completed, on or before the first day of May, 1891, the remaining portion of the said western section, lying between Yale and Port Moody, which shall be constructed of equally good quality in every respect with the standard hereby created for the portion hereby contracted for. And the said Lake Superior section and the portions of the said western section now under contract, shall be completed as nearly as practicable according to the specifications and conditions of the contracts therefor except in so far as the same have been modified by the Government prior to the 21st day of October, #880." modified by the Government prior to the 21st day of October, $880.'

Now, as this is the first contract let by the Syndicate for the construction of any portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway, it will only be necessary to determine its character in order to decide what the interests of the Company will lead them to in dealing with other portions of the line. We find, in referring to the report of Mr. Schreiber, made since this contract was entered into, that the part of reporters and of the House; the hon. gentleman should follow Mr. King.

"In British Columbia the line follows the valleys of the Thompson and Fraser Rivers, passing along the steep mountain sides, so that the shifting of the line a few feet either to the right or to the left, increases or diminishes the work to be done very much."

Acting upon suggestions made by Mr. Fleming, he proceeds to sav:

"That by making an extremely careful study of the final location, by sharpening the curvature in some places, by using great judgment in adjusting the alignments to sinuosities and sudden and great irregularities of the ground, by substituting the cheaper classes of work for the more costly whenever it can safely be done, and by doing no work that is not absolutely necessary, a very marked reduction may be made"

Mr. Schrieber then proceeds to say:

"The engineers have given the final location great care and attention, and have exercised good judgment in fitting the line as far as practicable to the contour of the country which, combined with slightly sharpening a few of the curves and steepening some of the grades, has resulted in the reduced estimate of cost set forth in the statement referred to."

Now is it not plain, that if the Syndicate really intended to build a first-class road, they would, in making this, their first contract, have insisted upon a standard higher than laid down in the report which I have just read. It must be borne in mind that Mr. Fleming estimated this 125 miles of road to cost $10,000,000, and that on the basis of a road of any workable gradients, with no costly bridges. And that this year Mr. Schrieber has, by the means suggested in his report, still further reduced the estimate to about $3,000,000. Then we were told the standard was the same as that applied to the Allan contract. The provisions of the Allan contract were different from those in the present contract. It was known that the standard of construction, that is the Union Pacific, was only to be applied in a general way, and not as to its grades and curves, which were to be as favorable as the nature of the country would permit, without undue expense. I, therefore, move in amendment:

That the contract respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway provides as a standard, whereby the quality and the character of the railway and of the material used in the construction thereof, and in the equipment thereof may be regulated, the Union Pacific Railway of the United States as the same was when first constructed.

as the same was when first constructed.

That by a letter, since laid on the Table, some members of the Syndicate have expressed their intention to abide by the standard of the Union Pacific Railway, as it was in February, 1873,—that this letter is not binding on the projected Company—that neither of the said proposed standards are satisfactory—that there are objectionable details in the construction of the Union Pacific Railway—that the conformation of the ground on the route of the Canadian Pacific Railway admits of much better alignments and grades than those of the Union Pacific Railway—that this was recognized in the contract made by the Government with Sir Hugh Allan and others in 1873, which provided in this respect, that the Union Pacific Railway should not be the standard with respect to any minor details in its construction and working, which may be found objectionable, and with respect to its alignments and grades which should be as favorable as the nature of the country will admit without undue expenditure, that the contract and letter on the Table contain no such provision, and provide a standard lower than that of the Allan contract, unsuitable to the country and calculated to secure an inferior railway—that the condition of the Union Pacific Railway was very different when first constructed from its condition in February, 1873,—that in order to apply its former condition as a standard for the Canadian Pacific Railway, it would be necessary to engage in an enquiry as to what its condition actually was many years a 20. And this renders the proposed standard unsatisfactory, and that the contract is, in these respects, objectionable.

Mr. DOMVII.I.E. I would not have troubled the House That by a letter, since laid on the Table, some members of the Syndi-

Mr. DOMVILLE. I would not have troubled the House at this hour but for the personal attack made upon me by the hon, gentleman. The hon, gentleman would not dare to make that attack in my own county—he would not dare to make it on the hustings either in St. John or in King's. I noticed that he was reading his speech; and I promise him I shall take good care and go to his own county and remind him and his people of the rigmarole he has read us to-night, at a great expense to the people of the Dominion. the example introduced in Washington, and have his speech taken as read, and hand it to the reporters to be printed. My hon, friend had no business to keep us to night with that long speech, with those books from the Library piled up before him. The country will not be prepared to submit to the obstructions we have had in this debate. We see Mr. Parnell obstructing the British House of Commons in a cause in which he and his friends think they are aggrieved; but we are not aggrieved in this matter, it is merely the question of the giving of a contract.

Mr. MacDONNELL (Inverness). I desire to give a decided contradiction to the assertions of the hon. gentleman from King's, N.B. (Mr. Domville), that my hon friend from Queen's, N.B., was not reading his speech. I sat beside my hon. friend from Queen's while he was speaking, and I saw his notes, and I can assure the House that he was not reading his speech, but that his notes were only such as hon. gentlemen have been using all through this debate.

Mr. MacDONNELL (Inverness). I desire to put my views on record in reference to this great question, but I do not intend to make any extended remarks at this hour of the morning. We have heard about the dangerous power we are creating in our midst by moans of this Fulton, Syndicate. I think we all have had some experience of the power of this great corporation. We have now been in Session about seven weeks, and the passing of these resolutions will be a virtual ratification of the contract before the House. Yet in not the slightest iota have these resolutions been changed. This House has been impotent to make any change in them. I feel satisfied that when the Bill comes before the House, it will pass without any amendment, which will furnish a precedent that has never been witnessed power which we are creating This before. incountry has already exercised its vast this fluence; it has paralyzed the power of this Parliament. One of the most odious features of this contract is the monopolies it creates, in transferring from the Parliament of the country franchises and rights which it should retain. Not the least of these is the privilege of building, to the exclusion of all other corporations, to the exclusion of the Government itself, roads throughout that great territory. I move:

That the contract respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway does not preserve to the Government the right to give to other corporations running powers over the Thunder Bay line and the Pembina Branch, but improperly cedes to the Company the absolute and exclusive right to these avenues to the North-West, and the said contract is, in this respect, objectionable objectionable.

Mr. CASEY. It is of course impossible at this unseasonable hour at which we have been forced to sit, to discuss this question to anything like the extent to which it should be discussed. The amendment I have to propose concerns the power the Government should have, but has not, under the present contract, to acquire the road at any time they may see proper to do so. Although it has been frequently asserted that the policy of both parties has always been unanimous in regard to building this road by a company; and although that was the first policy marked out immediately after we placed ourselves under the obligation to build this road, yet it has always been put forward as an alternative by both parties, up to the publication of the present terms. The conception of the scheme of constructing the road by a company can best be expressed by a slight adaptation of a phrase which the hon leader of the Government was very fond of making use of when he was leader of the Opposition. He used to say that his motto was: "With a party, by a party, but for the country;" and the popular plan of constructing the railway until recently has been with a company, by a company, but for the country. The Company has been looked on as the trustees for the construction of the road while the road belonged in equity to the country, and was to be run in the interest not of the Company but of the country; and I consider that the proper view. We employ a company in order to save certain risk and trouble in the management, and for the purpose of getting rid of some uncertainty as to what the railway will cost; but the principle of construction is not altered in the slighest degree by the fact that the Company, instead of the Government, will carry out the work. It is for B the convenience of the public and for the purpose of filling up the valuable lands in the North-West, and improving their value, and for the convenience of the whole State, which pays the cost of its construction. When we consider that this is to some extent true of other railway companies, trustees of the rights and privileges given them by the State, and that all civilized nations have exercised a great control over the construction and operation of ordinary railways in which private capital has been placed, it is very clear that the control to be exercised over the trustees of the national highway should be of the most severe and searching character. Instead of the road being subjected to watchfulness on the part of the Government, we find, by the terms of the contract, that the Syndicate are not subject to close contro', but they are relieved from many of the provisions applicable to ordinary roads. Instead of the Company being made trustees of the national highway, they are made owners in fee simple for all time. It is as if the executors of a will, who placed a certain portion of the property in trust, were to confiscate it, only in this case the party who confiscates the property is not the trustee, but it is done by the unfaithful conduct of those to whom was committed the power of creating the trust. The Government, which acts for the nation, instead of creating a trust in the hands of the railway company, gave over in fee simple the property for which the nation pays and should own. They handed it over without reserving the usual rights of taxation, which other nations reserve in similar cases. In France and Russia, when the State aids railways, it is provided that they shall revert absolutely to the Crown at the end of a certain period; and the condition of the country in Russia is very similar to that of Canada, for it is a new country, where the railways are compelled to obtain State aid in order to build railroads and open up large tracts of territory. We have reserved no equity of redemption. In this respect the present contract stands in marked contrast to the basis laid down by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) in his Bill of 1874. It is provided in that Act that in any contract for the construction of the railway, or any part thereof, the Fortin, Government would reserve power to purchase the road, or Fulton, Mr. MacDonnell (Inverness).

any part of it, at an advance of ten per cent. on the actual contract price, all the cash and land bomuses previously given to the Company being counted as part of the price; so that if the Government happened to overpay the Company, they could assume the road at any time without any payment. If the Company were locating the road in an improper manner, constructing it improperly, managing it in their own interest, as distinct from the public interest, the Government would have the power under such contracts to assume control of the road attaing time. In this case the House refuses to take other precautions. It is important that at least power should be reserved to the Government to take back that which belongs to it whenever the trustees of that great national work appear to be actuated solely by their own interests and those interests clash with the interests of the country. I, therefore, move the following amendment:—

That the contract respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway makes no provision for the Government having a right, at its option, to acquire the railway on proper terms, having regard to the amount of public resources invested in the enterprise; that the public security may require the exercise by the Government of such an option, and that the right should be secured by the contract, which is, in this respect, objectionable.

The second resolution was carried on the same division.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In the absence of the Minister of Railways, I beg leave to introduce a Bill (No. 37) founded on these resolutions respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Bill read the first time.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 8 o'clock, a.m., Friday) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 28th January, 1881.

PROCEDURE IN CRIMINAL CASES.

Mr. McCARTHY introduced a Bill (No. 38) to amend the laws respecting Criminal Procedure. The Bill, he said; is merely to introduce here the provisions I find in the English Acts, giving the Judge at nisi prius, where a record has been sent down for trial, in a matter which has come before the court, by writ of certiorari, the power to sentence persons sent down for trial, which cannot be done as the law new stands, although for many years it has been the law in England. At present all the Judge can do is to record the verdict, and then the record has to go back to the Court, and the parties have to be brought before the Court to pronounce sentence, which is manifestly unfair.

Bill read the first time.

INSOLVENCY LAWS.

Mr. McCUAIG introduced a Bill (No. 39) to amend the Insolvent Act of 1875, and amending Acts.

Mr. BLAKE. Explain.

Mr. McCUAIG said the intention of the Bill was to give an insolvent his discharge in cases where there was no fraud, without requiring a dividend to be paid on the estate as provided in the Act of 1875, and Acts amending the

Mr. BLAKE. The Insolvency Act was repealed because it gave too great laxity for the discharge of traders without paying their debts. It is now proposed to revise the clause which was so objectionable that it involved the repeal of the whole Act.

Bill read the first time.

ORDER OF GOVERNMENT BUSINESS.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved that all the stages of any Bill to be introduced founded on the resolutions now before the House, on the subject of certain subsidies of land and money in aid of the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, shall have precedence, every day, after Routine Proceedings, until the House otherwise orders.

Mr. BLAKE said as he understood the terms of the motion, it did not in any way interfere with the general rules of the House as to the stages of bills, but it simply gives this measure precedence.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD replied in the negative. The Government would move the second reading when they had an opportunity, and then if they got through on any given day, the motion to go into Committee would be made.

Motion agreed to on division.

MOTIONS FOR RETURNS.

DEPOSITS BY FOREIGN LIFE INSURANCE COMPANIES.

Mr. GAULT enquired, Is if the intention of the Government to introduce a bill this Session, whereby they shall have the power to retain and distribute the deposits made by foreign life insurance companies, in case of their failure, to the Canadian policy holders?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. The propriety of amending the Act in that respect is now under the consideration of

LIGHTHOUSE AT PORT CREDIT.

Mr. ELLIOTT enquired, Is it the intention of the Government to place a sum in the Estimates for the purpose of building a lighthouse at Port Credit?

Mr. POPE (Queen's). The matter is one which was not brought to the notice of the Government until the present question was put on the paper. If, after investigation, a light is found to be necessary at that point, the Government will have no objection to placing a small light

FLOATING LIGHT ON THE ST. LAWRENCE,

Mr. GRANDBOIS enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to place a floating light on the St. Lawrence, between Rivière du Loup and the Brandy Pots?

Mr. POPE (Queen's). It is not the intention of the Government.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved the second reading of Bill (No. 37) respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. ANGLIN. I have to submit respectfully that this Bill should not be allowed to proceed any further, because it has not been framed in compliance with the well understood rule and law of Parliament. The law of Parliament distinctly provides that:

"If any motion be moved in the House for any public aid or charge upon the people, the consideration and debate thereof may not be presently entered upon, but shall be adjourned till such further day as the House should think fit to appoint; and then it should be referred to a Committee of the whole House before any resolution or vote of the House

That rule, Sir, is almost exactly in the same words of a rule adopted some time ago by the Imperial Parliament. The English rule was adopted on the 20th of March, 1866, and is as follows:-

"If any motion be made in the House for any aid, grant, or charge upon the public revenue, whether payable out of the Consolidated Fund or out of the monies to be provided by Parliament, or for any charge upon the people, the consideration and debate thereof shall not be presently entered upon, but shall be adjourned till such further day as the House shall think fit to appoint, and then itshall be referred to a Committee of the whole Bouse before any resolution or you do need to be a seen that the contraction of the whole Bouse hafter any resolution or you do need to be a seen that the contraction of the whole Bouse hafter any resolution or you do need to be a seen that the contraction of the whole Bouse hafter any resolution or you do need to be a seen that the contraction of the Committee of the whole House, before any resolution or vote do pass

On one occasion in the House of Commons some doubt arose as to the propriety of allowing a bill before the House to pass because it was not based on resolutions, and the matter was referred to a Select Committee of the House. They made a report in which it is stated that no precedent precisely similar was discovered, but,

"That the general spirit of the standing orders and resolutions of the House required that every proposition to impose a burden or charge on any class of people, should receive its first discussion in a Committee of the whole House."

The imposition of burdens as the appropriation of money or moneys' worth being held to be entirely inadequate without this provision, it would of course apply to any proposition to appropriate for any purpose any of the money or property of the people. Now, in the Bill before the House it is proposed to go very much further than in the resolutions upon which it professes to be founded. The resolutions are quite specific in their character. They provide:

"1. That it is expedient to grant and appropriate $25,000,0°0 according to the terms of the contract relating to the Canadian Pacific Railway, transmitted to this House by His Excellency the Governor General, by his Message dated December 10th last.

"2. That it is expedient to grant, and appropriate 25,000,000 acres of land in the North-West Territory, according to the terms of the said contract, so transmitted as aforesaid."

It will be seen that they are distinctly limited to the granting or appropriating of $25,000,000 in cash and 25,000,000 acres of land. There is not a word in those resolutions which would imply even in the most vague and general way that any other appropriation was to be asked for or proposed in any Bill to be submitted to Parliament. The Bill, however, goes further than that. It provides that the Company to be incorporated shall, for the purpose of this, railway, obtain the right of way over the Government lands in the North-West, as well as all Government lands necessary for the purpose of erecting workshops, stations, storehouses, warehouses, and lands and water frontages necessary for the wharves required to carry on their extensive trade. More than that, there is a distinct provision in the Bill that, under certain circumstances and at a certain time, a section of the railway which we have constructed at an enormous cost and those sections which we are to complete, are to be handed over to the Company, and after a time to become their absolute property. The estimated cost, as is known, of these sections an address to the Crown praying Her Majesty to grant a is no less than $28,000,000, so that it is proposed to hand that amount over to the Syndicate and their successors. In respect to those two items particularly, the Bill goes entirely beyond and outside the resolutions, and it is plainly necessary, if we are to comply with the well-understood laws of Parliament, that other resolutions should be proposed in Committee of the Whole embracing those particular points. There are some other points of importance in this matter. Last year the hon, the Finance Minister himself introduced a measure into this House for converting a subsidy granted by a previous Act of Parliament to the Canada Central Railway, so as to substitute for the payment of $12,000 per mile in cash, the issue of bonds, the interest on which, payable by the Government, should be terminable at a certain time, and this hon, gentleman introduced that measure by resolution. I think that the hon, gentleman in doing so acted in conformity with the spirit of the law of Parliament; but this year he should be equally careful with regard to a measure by which it is also proposed to substitute bonds bearing interest for a cash payment. It may be argued that the burdens of the people are not to be in any degree increased by this substitution, and possibly, Sir, that is true. But, Sir, the hon. Minister of Finance and the Government for whom he acted last year, set us the example, the good example which I now invite them to follow. I do not know whether hon gentlemen on the other side, who perhaps have not given consideration to this matter up to this time, would be prepared to say that we should not consider land or railways constructed at the people's expense to be equivalent to a money grant; but they can scarcely, however, pretend to hold that position, because they themselves have at all times and under all circumstances, so far as I am aware, whenever it was proposed that lands should be appropriated for the purpose of aiding in the construction of public works or other such purposes, chosen to proceed by resolution. So long ago as 1872, when it was first propo el to build this railway across the continent, the plan was that the company should be subsidized, receiving $30,000,000 in money and 50,000,000 acres of land. In the resolutions introduced by hon. gentlemen opposite, they provided for the appropriation of the land and money. Let me say now, however, that they failed in 1872 to make any provisions in their resolutions for the roadway, but the roadway was subsequently granted to the company by Act of Parliament and by the charter framed under that Act of Parliament, though it was omitted in the original resolutions. I do not admit, however, that that omission can be held to be a justification of a similar omission in this Act when your attention has been drawn to the fact. Let me say, further, that I find in the Act of 1874 was based entirely upon resolutions very carefully drawn up, that the lands, money and roadway were included in the resolutions, and very much else. Although at that time, under that Act and under the very provisions of the resolutions themselves, the policy of the Government was declared to be that the work should be conducted by contractors under the control of the Minister of Public Works; that the contractors were not themselves to have, as they are now to have, the right of selecting the route and of carrying out the whole work very much as they saw fit. In that case I find this provision:

"Provided that the Governor in Council may grant to the contractors the roadway through Government lands, as also any such lands as are required for stations, workshops, and generally a'l such lands as may be necessarily required for the purpose of constructing or working the said railway."

I think that resolution conforms to the law of Parliament, which should be our guide in all matters. The question as to whether money and money alone should be regarded as an aid, came up some years ago when Col. Knox proposed certain quantity of gun metal for the purpose of being used in the casting of a statue of Lord Gough. Then Mr. Gladstone said:

"Now, he felt sure that the hon. gentleman would not wish the Government to break down a rule which had been one of the most difficult achievements of financial reform during the last half century—the rule that none of the public property should be disposed of in kind."

He admitted furthermore that gun metal must be held to be public money, and he suggested that the motion should be changed. At that time he thought that by adding certain words to the address he would bring it within the rules of the House. A few days after, as appears from the Journals, it was found necessary, in order to maintain this rule in its directness, that that order should be discharged, and it was discharged, and then the House was moved into a Committee of the Whole. The following appears in the Journals of the 25th of July:

"Resolved, That this House will, this day, resolve itself into a Committee to consider of an humble Address to be presented to Her Majesty, praying that she will generously please to direct that sufficient gun metal shall be issued for the construction of the statue about to be erected in Dublin to commemorate the services of the late Field Marshal, Viscount Gough, and assuring Her Majesty that this House will make good the cost of the same."

The House resolved itself into Committee. That address was passed and the gun metal obtained. On that occasion Mr. Gladstone said with regard to money:

"While gun metal was money, to overlook that fact would be a breach of duty on the part of Government."

Now, Mr. Speaker, it might have been possible, perhaps, for the Government to have moved resolutions of a vague and general character, within the scope of which it might be contended that the details of this Bill could be held to come. They have not chosen to take that course, but to present to us very specific resolutions, and I think, on reflection, you will be satisfied that, under the circumstances, it is necessary that they be allowed to withdraw this Bill and to introduce other resolutions, get the decision of the House in Committee on those resolutions, and then bring in a bill which will be fairly and properly based upon the resolutions passed into a Committee of the whole House. So late as 1871, the English Government introduced a Bill relating to the income tax. It was introduced in the usual way by resolution, and was regarded as a mere formal measure. When the motion for the second reading was made, the bill was not in the hands of members, and Col. Stuart objected to its passing. Mr. Gladstone asked that he would not raise a mere formal objection of that kind. It turned out, however, that when the bill was brought in it embraced provisions which were not included in the resolutions submitted to the House, as it embraced a resolution relating to the house tax. Objection was taken after the House had come out of Committee and the third reading was ordered, it was moved that the Bill be recommitted. The objection made to it was very distinct. It was said by the Chancellor of the Exchequer:

"In the second place, a doubt had been expressed, which he thought there might be some foundation for, whether it was right to introduce those clauses about the inhabited house duty into the Bill without a previous resolution in Committee."

Further objections were taken to the bill which he did not admit; one, because they chose to tack on to that bill a resolution regarding tea duty. The Government maintained, however, that they had a right to do that because the Committee of the Whole had passed resolutions respecting the re-imposition of the tea duty. They contended that the Committee of the House would have a right to attach this clause but not to introduce into the bill the clause with regard to the house duty, because no resolution to that effect had been submitted to the Committee of the whole House, and on that score the Government consented to withdraw the bill.

Mr. Hunt, who was previously a Chancellor of Mr. Anglin.

the Exchequer, took strong ground on this point the result of which was that the Government withdrew the bill and re-introduced it in another form. Now, in the present case, I think it is very plain that this Bill embraces a great many provisions for the disposal of valuable public properties which do not come at all within the scope of the resolutions upon which we have been asked to pronounce. I do not take this objection in order to delay the passing of the Bill; if that were my object I should prefer to postpone the objection to a later stage. I make this objection because I desire to see the law of Parliament strictly observed, and I do not think hon. gentlemen will lose much time by acting upon it, if they believe the objections to be well founded. I would ask the leader of the House, who, next to yourself, Sir, is especially responsible for the manner in which the public business is conducted, to give this matter full and fair consideration, and determine whether it would not be better, if only for the sake of maintaining an adherence to the laws and rules of Parliament, to give due weight to the objection which I make only because I believe that the public interests require that this rule be strictly enforced.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Of course, I cannot for a moment suppose the hon, gentleman has made this motion at all for the sake of delay. That is quite evident to every hon, member of this House, on both sides, as the hon, gentleman says. He thinks the Government, perhaps, have not given special attention to this point which he now raises. Well, whether we have done so or not, it is quite clear hon, gentlemen opposite have not done so, because they have gone on with the discussion for a month under the supposition that the whole matter was before the House, both in Committee and afterwards in concurrence; and after, by rather marked majorities, the House and the Committee before that have declared unmistakeably what their opinion of the measure is, the hon, gentleman, from his sense of duty—a newly awakened sense of duty—now takes this point. If the hon, gentleman did not want any delay perhaps he might have taken the point before.

Mr. ANGLIN. I could not; I had no chance.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He might on the first reading of the Bill.

Mr. BLAKE. We did not know what the Bill was.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman says he did not know what the Bill was.

Mr. BLAKE. We had no idea of it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I consider that the whole proceeding is quite regular, and I think I must get the support of my hon. friend the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and all those who were in the same Government with him, for I do not think he introduced, by a resolution, his Act giving away the land and the money—

Mr. MILLS. Yes; by resolution.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not think so.

Mr. MILLS. Yes; I remember very well.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, we shall see. It appears to me that the whole proceedings are as regular as they can be. In the first place the contract was affirmed in the Governor's Speech; the earnest attention of the House was called to it, but no recommendation was made. But the Message transmitting the contract, and the schedules attached thereto, called the attention of the House to them, and recommended them to the favorable attention of the House—asked Parliament, in fact, to grant all that was contained in the contract. Now, the essential point of the contract was the granting of $25,000,000 and 25,000,000 acres of land. But the resolutions go further. They say:

"That it is expedient to grant and appropriate $25,000 000, according to the terms of the contract relating to the Canadian Pacific Railway, transmitted to this House by His Excellency the Governor General, by his Message, dated December 10th."

Now, Sir, what did that mean? It did not mean that we were to make a present of 25,000,000 acres of land and $25,000,000, but it called the attention of the House to the contract which had been recommended to the favorable consideration of Parliament, and called upon them to grant the pecuniary aid to be given according to the terms of tho contract. That money could not be paid, lands could not be given, unless the contract had been ratified cand the recommendation of His Excellency carried out; and hon. gentlemen opposite accepted that from the beginning as the meaning of the resolutions. They did not confine the House to the discussion of a grant of 25,000,000 acres of land and $25,000,000. They discussed the schedule and the contract clause after clause, and the House has not only affirmatively approved of both the contract and schedule-every clause, every word, every sentence of them-but voted down the negatives which were moved in amendment by hon. gentlemen opposite. What was the sense of their moving those amendments if they did not themselves understand that the whole contract -the schedule, every article, every word, every clause—was before the House? What is the reason we go into Committee of the Whole at all? Because there is no reason in the world why one measure being introduced by bill and another by resolution, except the great and guiding reason which draws this distinction—that matters of taxation involving so many considerations, involving separate items of consideration, concerning, for instance, multifarious items respecting trade, shall be first introduced by resolution, that the principle shall be established by resolution, and that every hon. member in Committee will have the opportunity of speaking as often as he likes, unrestrained by the rules of discussion applied when the Speaker is in the Chair. I say it has always been held that, no matter under what form the question is brought up in the House, the Committee of the Whole is possessed of the whole subject, deals with the whole subject, discusses the whole subject, and comes to a conclusion on the whole subject, and it matters not whether there is an omission of a single item, whether the Bill founded on these resolutions contains a million clauses or only one, if the subject matter has been fully discussed in Committee, then the object, the reason of the rule, is substantially carried out. Now, I would ask this House, I would ask you, Sir, I would ask every man of common sense, if every clause of the contract was not under the purview of the whole House, and whether hon. gentlemen opposite did not call upon us to discuss clause by clause every one of the matters which the hon, gentleman says should be discussed de novo. If this be not obstruction—of course it is not honest people outside obstruction, but plain, honest people outside will say that it looks like obstruction — I cannot distinguish between the hon, gentleman's desire to preserve the rule of the House from obstruction. I do not think the country will draw the distinction, and I do not think any honest straight-forward man will draw the distinction. Why, it is a more matter of supererogation that the Government come here at all and put the clause relating to the right of way into the Bill. If the hon, gentleman looks at the Dominion Lands Act of 1879, he will see that the Governor in Council has full power, without coming to Parliament, to grant the land. In answer finally to the argument of my hon. friend, I would say simply this, that the whole contract was submitted ex necess tate by resolutions. The resolution calls attention to the $25,000,000 of money and 25,000,000 acres of land, as it calls attention to the whole contract. By looking at the contract, you must see that neither the 25,000,000 acres nor $25,000,000 can be granted unless the contract is affirmed. The first clause of the Bill is ratification or non-ratification of the contract, been discussed? Has not the Committee of the Whole House voted that the contract be confirmed; and that being the case, the first clause of the Bill, that it be confirmed, need only have been introduced and the rest left out. If the contract is confirmed the propriety of the Bill is sustained. I do not see the object of my hon. friend in raising this point.

Mr. MILLS. It is very clear both from the speech of the hon, leader of the Government and that of my learned friend that the objections are well taken. The fact that the contract was submitted by His Excellency for the favorable consideration of the House is beside the question. The law of Parliament requires that the appropriations from public revenues for any such purpose, shall originate in Committee of the Whole House, and be there discussed. The right hon. gentleman himself held this to be the case, for I find that when the hon. Minister of Railways submitted to this House his resolutions, the hon. First Minister accompanied these resolutions with a despatch from His Excellency in the following words: -- "Whereupon the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald informed the House that His Excellency the Governor, having been made aware of the subject-matter of these resolutions, recommends them to the House." Why did he recommend them to the House if they were already recommended to it by implication in the recommendation of the contract? The right hon, gentleman says we discussed the contract when these resolutions were under consideration. That is beside the question. Our discussions may have been much broader than the resolutious warranted. That was a point which was not raised during any of the discussions-whether it could have been well taken or not is not now the question. It is obvious, if these two resolutions embraced everything that was contained in the contract, the hon. gentleman would have been warranted in introducing them into the Bill. But there are in this Bill provisions which are not in the resolutions, and provisions therefore which the hon. gentleman cannot introduce into the Bill. Here is one provision in the Bill in which the Government proposes to construct 90 miles of railway, which are to cost the country upwards of $3,000,000. No provision is made for that, except the provision in this Bill. I ask whether it is not as necessary to include that provision in the appropriation of $3.000,000, to build the railway to be handed over to this corporation, as the $25,000,000 to be given to the corporation as a bonus. Where is the difference? The proposition is that it shall become the property of the Company, and the appropriation be made without its originating in Committee of the Whole. Let me call your attention to another Rule of the House, Rule 86, which provides:

"By the 54th section of the British North America Act, 1867, it is provided that the House shall not adopt or pass any vote, resolution, address or bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue, or of any tax or impost to any purpose that has not been first rec mmended by a Message of the Governor General."

There has been no Message from the Governor General recommending $3,000,000 for the building of the Port Moody honest strai, ht-forward man will draw the distinction. Why, it is a mere matter of supererogation that the Government come here at all and put the clause relating to the right of way into the Bill. If the hon, gentleman looks at the Dominion Lands Act of 1879, he will see that the Governor in Council has full power, without coming to Parliament, to grant the land. In answer finally to the argument of my hon, friend, I would say simply this, that the whole contract was submitted ex necess tate by resolutions. The resolution calls attention to the $25,000,000 of money and 25,000,000 acres of land, as it calls attention to the whole contract. By looking at the contract, you must see that unless the contract is affirmed. The first clause of the Bill is simply that the contract be affirmed. Has not the contract, the British Columbia, which are equally contained in the contract? The hon, gentleman also proposed to remit certain Customs duties to this Company. He does not propose to change the law by reducing the Customs duties in their favor, but he proposes that the duties be remitted them. There is no difference in this proposition and one to refund them money out of the public revenues, yet he knows he could not refund such money without obtaining the sanction of the House, which sanction must originate in Committee of the Whole, on a resolution to that effect. This principle is recognized in England, in the case of a proposition to reduce charges upon advertising from 1s. 6d. to 6d., where it was held to be necessary to introduce it in the form of a resolution of the Whole House, as affecting the question of the general trade of the country. That principle applies in this case, so that from whatever point of view you consider this Bill, the hon. gentleman has not complied with the Rules of this House, has not obtained the sanction of the Crown. Read the two resolutions.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Look at the Message.

Mr. MILLS. If the Message was sufficient, why did the hon. gentleman bring down a Message recommending the subject matter of these resolutions.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. But the hon, gentleman said there was no recommendation from the Crown.

Mr. MILLS. I say there is not. Here are the two resolutions:-First, that it is expedient to grant and appropriate $25,000,000; second, that it is expedient to grant and appropriate 25,000,000 acres. "Whereupon Sir John A. Macdonald informed the House that His Excellency the Governor General, having been made aware of the subject-matter of these resolutions, recommended them to the House." Does that embrace anything else?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman must remember that when I said that, I did not consider it at all requisite; and I stated so at the time.

Mr. MILLS. I say by the Rules of Parliament it was necessary. We were not considering these provisions in Committee, but the resolutions which the hon. gentleman had submitted, and which, by the laws of Parliament, ought to be submitted to the House in Committee. These were all the two resolutions embraced; and the hon. gentleman might as well omit the two resolutions and say they should not be considered at all as to say we should not consider the proposition to hand over to this corporation this $30,000,000 worth of property. There is upwards of $12,000,000 of this not spent. Portions of this line have not yet been built, portions have not yet been contracted for, and the money has not yet been voted by Parliament. The hon, gentleman proposes, without going into Committee and without a resolution, to ask the sanction of Parliament to a large appropriation of money, to construct ninety miles of railway on the Pacific coast. If the hon, gentleman can do this it is a mockery to submit to this House resolutions at all. Those resolutions mark the boundary of the authority of the hon. gentleman to introduce a bill making appropriations. He has asked and obtained the sanction of this House to what? By these resolutions to appropriate $25,000,000 and 25,000,000 acres of land. He has obtained the sanction of this House and of the Committee for nothing else, and the Bill of the hon. gentleman must be confined within the four corners of these resolutions. If he requires anything more he must then proceed anew, and ask this House to pass a resolution to make the necessary appropriation.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). It seems to me that the hon. member for Gloucester has not succeeded in establishing Mr. MILLS.

the hon. member for Bothwell. The resolutions which the hon, member for Bothwell says are not sufficient, are in these words:

"1. Resolved, That it is expedient to grant and appropriate $25,000,000 according to the terms of the contract relating to the Canadish Patific Railway, transmitted to this House by His Excellency the Governor General, by his Message dated December 10th last.

"2. Resolved, That it is expedient to grant and appropriate 25 000,000 acres of land in the North-West Territory, according to the terms of the said contract, so transmitted as aforesaid."

Every word in this Act of Parliament now introduced is embraced in the contract, because it is all embraced in the schedule which is expressly declared to be part and parcel of the contract and embraced in it. If, then, every that is in this Bill is in the schedule which is in the Bill, has not every proposition contained in the Bill been submitted by His Excellency for the consideration of this House?

Mr. MILLS. No.

Mr. CAMERON. Is not the schedule, which is referred to in the Act of Parliament, part of the Act itself? Is not the schedule, which is part of the Act now introduced and embraced in the Message which was sent by His Excellency to this House with a recommendation that it be accepted, part of the contract, and has not that contract and everything in it and in the schedule been recommended to this House for its consideration? And if so, has not the law of Parliament been complied with, unless we can say that this schedule is not part of the contract and the contract has not been sent to this House by His Excellency? Then it is quite impossible to say that we are not in order, according to the Rules of Parliament, in now considering this matter. Every single one of the points which the hon. member for Gloucester took—as to the right of way and construction of the Port Moody Branch—every single item he referred to is embraced in this contract and schedule annexed, which is made part of it. How, then, can it be said that we are asked by this Bill to consider anything which His Excellency has not submitted to us, or a disposition of the public money or property which His Excellency has not advised us to dispose of as we see fit, if the contract is Unless my hon. friend can say that the schedule before us. which is formally declared to be part of the contract is not part of it, then we are in order to proceed with the motion now before the Chair.

Mr. SPEAKER. The point raised by the hon. member for Gloucester is to the effect that the Bill goes beyond the resolutions adopted in Committee of the Whole and on which the Bill is founded. He quotes the 54th section of the British North America Act, which is as follows:-

"The House shall not adopt or pass any vote, resolution, address or bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue, or any tax, or impost, to any purpose that has not been first recommended by a Message of the Governor in Council, etc."

No objection can be properly raised on this ground, for the House is aware that the whole contract came down with a Message in due form. Now, in reference to another point, Rule 88 of the House says:

"If any motion be made in the House for any public aid or charge upon the people, the consideration and debate thereof may not be presently entered upon, but shall be adjourned till such further day as the House shall think fit to appoint; and then it shall be referred to a Committee of the Whole before any resolution or vote of the House be passed thereon."

In this case the question is, whether we must consider the two resolutions and the contract as a whole. In my opinion there can be no doubt on this point, for the resolutions in question expressly declare that the money and land therein set forth are to he appropriated, according to the terms of the contract, transmitted by His Excellency by his Mossage. his case by trifling technicalities and perversion of the common sense of the English language, supported, even thank it was so fully understood by the House, because the though he is, by the eloquence and fine drawn arguments of whole subject was discussed at great length for several weeks by hon, gentlemen on both sides, and the hon, membr for Gloucester himself moved an amendment beyond the resolutions. If the two resolutions had alone been before the House, it would not have been in the power of any member to move an amendment to any article of the contract, but he would have been confined to the resolutions in question. The Rule which prevents any public aid or money being voted, or any impost being put on the people, unless it originates in Committee of the Whole, is a wise one. It is intended to prevent surprise and give fullest scope to-the freedom of debete on matters of such importance to the people. But in the present case I am of opinion that such conditions have been fully observed, and that both the spirit and letter of clause 54 of the Union Act—and Rule 88 of the House have been carried out.

Mr. MILLS. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that your decision on this point will be recorded on the Journals.

Fitzsimmons.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved that the Speaker do leave the Chair and the House resolve itself into Committee on the said Bill

Mr. ANGLIN. It would be, no doubt, entirely useless to ask the Government to depart from their settled policy with respect to this measure, as it would be entirely useless to they have hitherto followed; nevertheless, as we may hereafter be held to have assented to the course taken unless we utter a word or two in protest, let me say that the course taken by hon gentlemen opposite is, so far as I know, entirely without precedent, except that which they themselves set in 1872. Even in 1872 two rival companies were seeking to obtain the contract, and they were required to appear before Parliament and obtain Acts of incorporation as private companies, obtaining their bills in the ordinary parliamentary course. Power was, however, taken for the Governor in Council—which the hon. gentleman who had charge of the Bill, properly designated as a great institution—to incorporate another company should it be found necessary or desirable. Except in that instance, I think it will be found difficult to discover a case in which private companies have been brought into existence in the mode and manner proposed by hon, gentlemen opposite. They make this entirely a public Bill. There are very many instances in which the Government of Great Britain introduced what were in one sense private bills as public or Government measures, and those were not proceeded with in the ordinary way by petition. But nearly all important bills so introduced were treated afterwards as private bills, and were referred to the Committees charged with the duty of taking care that the ordinary precautions were taken that no private rights were unduly interfered with, and that all ordinary safe guards of private rights and privileges were duly inserted in the measure. In this case, Government asks Parliament to confer on them powers-indeed the proper phrase would be that the Government takes to itself absolute power-to confer on any set of gentlemen they choose to bargain with, all rights, powers and privileges that may be thought necessary to enable them to carry out the contract. I protest against that mode of procedure in this matter.

Motion agreed to and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On clause 2,

Mr. BLAKE said the contract itself provided that an Act should be passed incorporating the Company in such and such a form. The Bill proposed a deviation from that course, and that a charter should be issued by the Governor General in Council instead of an Act of Parliament as proposed in the contract. Why had the change been made?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the hon. gentleman could well understand that a private bill for an Act of incorporation would be introduced by petition, and that it would have delayed the matter very much. As it was thought of little consequence by what machinery the result should be attained, it was thought desirable, as this was really a Government measure, that it should be introduced in the manner in which it had been introduced, and that a charter should be given them under the Great Seal, which would have the same force and effect as an Act of incorporation, and thereby we avoided all the objections which might have been taken, and very naturally taken, by an ex-Speaker of the House.

Mr. BLAKE said he did not expect from the First Minister such a candid confession of the reasons of the Government action. It placed in bold relief the importance of the objection taken by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) a little while ago, because it was clear that Parliament, no more than any hon gentleman, could not do indirectly what it could not do directly. It had been stated that, so far as private rights were concerned, certain action would be taken with a view to their being protected, but there had been, confessedly, on the part of the Government a change of plan from that which they themselves proclaimed a few weeks ago.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he had explained at ask the majority of the House to change the course the opening of the discussion that the Government considered the question of very great importance; that it was important, if the proposition was to become law, it should become law without unnecessary delay, and they, therefore, desired to avoid delay arising from technical objections. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) was aware that there was a precedent, in 1873, with respect to the charter given to the Allan Company, and the hon gentleman was particeps crimins in the Bill of 1874.

Mr. BLAKE. No. I was no more particeps criminis than the hon. gentleman; we both occupied the position of Independent members, and neither of us dissented.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the Bill was forced through the House at three o'clock in the morning, not-withstanding the indignant protest of the hon. Minister of Railways; but we were such a miserable wreck of an Opposition that we did not like to show our nakedness by calling for a division.

Mr. ANGLIN said the hon. First Minister had overlooked an important fact in connection with the measure of 1874, viz.: that the work was to be conducted under the superintendence of the Minister of Public Works, and to that extent the Government were directly responsible for any infringement of individual rights. That was not the case under the present measure. The hon. First Minister was also mistaken in assuming that it would be necessary to incorporate a Bill for this Act of incorporation by petition. If the Government regarded it is a measure of great public importance, it could be introduced as a public measure; but upon its being so introduced it became subject to the Rules of the House and should be referred to the Committee ordinarily charged with such bills.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH said the corporation would have double power, and it was a question under which power they would proceed to execute the work—under the power given in the Act or under the charter. The Act of 1872, when the contract was given to the Allan Company, distinctly provided that when powers were given to the Company under the charter all other powers ceased. This Company should not have powers concurrent under both an Act and a charter.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the Company would not have double powers. The charter would stand in the place of the Act, and the charter would, of course, be a copy of what was authorised by Parliament.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 3,

Mr. BLAKE said he thought some explanation was due to the House of the meaning of the provision with respect to the substitution of the interest computation for the money subsidy. Part of clause 3 reads as follows:—

"And in lieu of the payment of the said money subsidy direct to the Company, the Government may convert the same, and any interest accrued thereon, into a fund for the payment to the extent of such fund, of interest on the bonds of the Company, and may pay such interest accordingly; the whole in manner and form as provided for in the said contract."

The $25,000,000 in cash was payable to the Company from time to time, as they completed twenty mile sections, which were divided according to provisions with which the House was just now tamiliar. It did not appear to him therefore that there was any possibility of the interest accruing on the payments, unless they were to suppose that the Government intended to make default in the payment of the money which was due from time to time to the Company. They would get, for instance, $10,000 per mile on the prairie section—on the completion of twenty miles they would get the $200,000 which would be coming to the Company. There was no provision in the contract, nor in the Act, for the Government paying any interest on the $25,000,000 or any part of it, and, as they said, if they substituted for the $25,000,000 cash coupons, they would pay $25,000,000 and any Sir John A. Macdonald.

interest accrued thereon. What they meant to say, he apprehended, was the interest which it would be proper to add to the $25,000,000 for the future forbearance which would be given by the new arrangement.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said if the hon gentleman preferred the word "accruing" it could be substituted for "accrued." He might say, however, that this point had been considered grammatically in a discussion which he had had, and the word complained of had been held, as he thought properly, to be correct. The Government was not, however, super grammatica. And though he believed he could discuss the question philologically with the hon. gentleman at another time, he had no objection to substitute the word "accruing."

Mr. BLAKE said they would thereby get rid of the substantial question. The first time he had risen to discuss the contract he had raised a question which he thought was as yet directed by hon, gentlemen opposite. He had pointed out that while it might be perfectly easy to ascertain what the present what the present value of a payment of $25,000,000 which was to be postponed and turned into an annuity for twenty years, if we get the rate of interest that was to be calculated, there seems to be a difficulty in ascertaining what the sum was to be the basis of this latter grant. This arrangement is to be made at an early period-he thought before 1882-and it was quite clear, therefore, that they were to exercise this privilege, if at all, long before the Company would have made any great progress with the work, or at any rate with the two ends. Suppose they asked at once, as they might suppose they asked on the first of July for the substitution of a deferred payment for the present payment. The first thing the Government would have to consider would be what was the rate of interest, and he thought the House should have some announcement on that subject.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Four per cent. is the rate. Mr. BLAKE. It was not stated specifically in the Bill, but, of course, a statement from the hon. Finance Minister was satisfactory. But then there were two questions which yet remained unsolved. The first was that they had not got the right to take $25,000,000 on the first of July. Their right was to arise from time to time as they completed twenty mile sections, and therefore they could not calculate the interest at four per cent. as if the whole was due on the first of July. The ascertainment of when it became due must depend on the rapidity with which the work is to be prosecuted. By the contract the Company has ten years in which to prosecute the prairie section, and, on a very rough calculation over the whole work, it might be said they were entitled to one-tenth every year. But that calculation would not answer because, as they said, it was their intention to build the prairie section in three years, and therefore there would be a considerable acceleration of the cash payments for that section. But how did the Government propose to proceed to adjust with the Company the capital sum upon which the calculation of interest was to be based? How were they to arrive at a period at which the amount should be treated as due, because the lapse of time, according to the contract, must be taken account of in dealing with the interest. Another difficulty was that it was possible there might be a default. Not only was there uncertainty as to when any particular payment of this $25,000,000 should be due, but uncertainty as to whether any of it would ever be due, as it depended on the completion of certain works. He found in the Act or contract no provision for securing the Government against that contingency. It was quite true that provision was made that the whole of the proceeds of the funds should be in the hands of the Government, but it was also true four per cent interest on all moneys deposited with them. There was therefore no provision that the Government should make a rebate of interest in respect of moneys which should turn out not to become due to the Company, by reason of the works not being executed as rapidly as was expected in the calculation on which was determined what the amount was. This was a very serious question, because it was obvious that the amount to be made payable by the Government, if they made it a deferred payment, would be nominally a sum very much larger than $25,000,000—it would be a sum, perhaps, amounting to $45,000,000, or at any rate a very targe sum, dependent on the period for which the bonds would run. It was important for them to know what means the Government proposed to adopt in making these calculations, so as to be sure that they stipulated that no more money should be paid than should be due to the Company plus the interest due to them at the time.

Mr. PLUMB. The Government will have the money.

Mr. BLAKE said it was true the Government would have the principal money, but the Government also pledged themselves to pay four per cent. on the principal money, and he found no reciprocal provision that the Government should deduct out of the principal money, any sums which should become due by reason of the default of the Company, nor any provision giving a basis of a calculation by which to ascertain the present value of the $25,000,000, under the conditions he had mentioned. He admitted it would be easy to ascertain what its value would be as an annuity at four per cent., but how would its present value be ascertained?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY said he could not imagine any difficulty in the matter, because, in the first place, the proceeds of these bonds were to be paid over to the Government as security, and the bonds of the $25,000,0 0 placed in banks. The Government did not desire to pay the interest on four per cent. beyond $25,000,000, and therefore the Company deposited the balance in the bank under the control of the Government at such interest as they could secure. It was not contemplated to issue more than $25,000,000, but suppose they did, $25,000,000 was to be paid into the hands of the Government, out of which so much every twenty miles was to be paid at four per cent. interest on the money thus deposited.

Mr. BLAKE said the hon. Minister of Finance had not understood him. The Government had agreed to pay this Company $-5,000,000 in cash, at most specified terms, but by instalments at uncertain times and dependent upon the conditions which the Company might not comply with. The Government now proposed to take authority to anticipate those uncertain times of payment and the performance of those conditions which might never be performed, and to give, instead of $25,000,000, a sum equivalent to the liability thus created with interest at four per cent. for the future after it became due in the shape of coupons for bonds. In order to ascertain how much a company was to pay, we must first know the rate of interest, and also we must have some rule as to what the $25,000,000 was equal to; the Government said, in fact, that they intended to treat that sum as presently payable. The Company might then come on the first of July next and say: " Now, we want to avail ourselves of this clause of the contract, and we propose to take coupons for bonds running over a period of twenty years, or whatever number of years we may decide upon." The Government would then assume to owe the Company the whole $25,000,000, and to ascertain what the forbearance in twenty years would be worth on that sum they would take the gross of those two sams, and if the Company demanded coupons for the whole amount the Government would be giving a great advantage on the $25,000,000. They would give a much larger sum, because they were assuming in had only to settle by actuarial calculation what was the favor of the Company that $25,000,000 were already duc, some part of which would not be due for ten years.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY said he would illustrate the case by taking the parallel case of the Canada Central Railway where $12,000 a mile were given for 120 miles. By the Act of Parliament introduced by the hon, gentlemen opposite it was wholly optional with the Company to take a subsidy in lieu of that $12,000 a mile. Under the agreement entered into by the late Minister of Finance, allowing the company five per cent. instead of four, the money was placed at their disposal. The company issued bouds for $2,500,000, and deposited in addition $1,500,000, and the Government paid $12,000 per mile to that company as the work progressed. In the present case it would, of course, be competent for the Government to allow the issue of a portion of this or of the whole. In the case to which he had just referred the Government had issued the whole in advance, but the work extended over a number of years. In case of the substantial failure of that contract we had the money in our own hands to pay this five per cent.

Mr. BLAKE said the hon. gentleman still failed to understand. He (Mr. Blake) had pointed out that, as this was a ten years contract, the sum which was to be payable on the completion of each twenty miles would be payable in tenths. Assuming that as a possible result, at the last year there would be $2,500,000 to be paid, and until the last year that sum would not require to be paid. Now assuming money to be worth four per cent., the postponement of the payment of that $2,500,000 for the ten years would be equal to 40 per cent. or $1,000,000. Now, if the Government paid the Company that $2,500,000 at the beginning instead of at the end of their contract, they virtually give the Company a bonus of $1,000,000 more.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. We have the money in our hands.

Mr. BLAKE. But you do not keep it, you give it away. Sir LEONARD TILLEY. We only give it as the Company construct twenty mile sections.

Mr. BLAKE. But you pay interest at four per cent. on it in the meantime.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Of course, because we have the

Mr. BLAKE asked if the hon, gentleman supposed it was the same thing to pay $25,000,000 in tenannual instalments. and to pay it all to-day? It was quite a different thing, and in round figures would be equal to five years interest on the $25,000,000, or about twenty per cent., that is, about $5,000,000. That was the difference at four per cent., between taking the money at once and getting it in ten annual instalments. The Government were, in fact, agreeing to give a great deal more than $25,000,000; they were giving as great an additional advantage as if they paid the whole subsidy in cash at once, instead of paying it in from one to ten years. True, the Government became the depository of the money, but they were bound to pay interest on it. It was the Company's money handed over to them only as they earned it, but in the meantime they received interest on it, and were the gainers by an advance payment.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I cannot really comprehend what the hon. gentleman is driving at. If the Company floated $25,000,000 of their bonds at present, when money was cheap, and they placed the money in the hands of the Government, who allowed them four per cent. on it, it appeared plain to him that the Company gained nothing, and the Government lost nothing; for the Company had to pay interest for the money, and they obtained interest from the Government for it. This, it struck him, was a parallel case to that of the Canada Central Railway Company, which equivalent at five per cent. of $12,000 a mile, and issue bonds in the same proportion.

Mr. BLAKE. Of course there is no difficulty in settling the value of $25,000,000 by actuarial calculation.

as it is earned, and in this case it is payable as it is

Mr. BLAKE said that the hon, gentleman might have erred in the case of the Canada Central, but, as the road was a short one, the error would be a small error; but that was no reason why there should be a large error in this case. Suppose that, instead of getting the value of $25,000,000 in coupons, the Company asked for it in cash, they might say: "We are entitled to that $25,000,000, and you must pay it over to us; but we will pay it back to you, and you must pay us four per cent. on it, because it is our money." The hon. gentleman would then be paying four per cent. to the Company on the whole amount, in the interval, until they earned it. Instead of that, he gave them the opportunity of paying four per cent. interest son the bonds they floated, and they practically obtained the advantage of getting a present payment instead of a deferred payment of their subsidy.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. They do not get the money at all under this arrangement.

Mr. BLAKE said they got their interest on it, however. They issued their bonds, and the Government agreed to pay them interest for a certain period.

MIMr. MILLS said that if the Company did nothing until the tenth year, they would draw four percent. interest on the $25,000,000 without having done anything for it. Suppose, instead of that, they did one-tenth every year; if the Government security was given at once, and the interest was paid on the whole sum, did not the hon. gentleman see that the Company would be receiving a large amount of interest on money they were not entitled to receive. If the Company did all the work in the first year, the position taken by the hon. gentlemen opposite would be all right; but the Company might defer doing the work till the last year, in which case the hon. gentlemen would be paying four per cent on $25,000,000 for nine years without the Company doing anything at all.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER said the misconception of hon, gentlemen opposite arose from their not having read the clause. The contract provided for the payment of a certain sum of money in a certain way-that was, as it was earned; and it only differed from the precedent established by hon, gentlemen opposite in respect of time and amount. He (Sir Charles Tupper) did not admit that there was any error on the part of the late Finance Minister. On the contrary, be believed that hon, gentleman adopted a perfectly correct mode of dealing with a precisely similar case. By the contract the late Government made for the extension of the Canada Central Railway, they promised to pay a certain sum of money, not at any particular time, but as it should be earned during a certain period of This contract makes exactly the same provision. It provided that a certain sum of money should be paid only as it was earned. Then it provided, exactly as the Canada Central contract provided, that a different mode might be adopted—that instead of money being paid in cash as the work proceeded, a guarantee of interest on bonds for a specific time should be substituted for the cash payment. The amount of that interest was arrived at by an actuarial calculation of what it was worth, the difference being that, as money was dearer then than now, the rate was five per cent. while it was four per cent. under the present arrangement. The Government held the money in this case as in the other. ceeded to ascertain what is its value from then to twenty Sir LEONARD TILLEY.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon, Minister says this is the same thing that was done before by the late Government. He is mistaken. The late Government gave to the Canada Central Railway the option of accepting a guarantee of interest; and I assume that they stated the rate at which Sir CHARLES TUPPER. In that case it is payable the calculation should be made, namely, five per cent. since the hon, gentleman says so; but that was not dealt with until the reign of the present Government. The time had not arrived in which it became necessary to ascertain what the basis of the calculation should be until the present Government came in, and it is they who have fixed the basis of calculation, not the five per cent but who determined, if they did determine—and the hon gentleman says they didthat the whole sum due to the Canada Central Railway, from time to time as the work went on, should be treated as if it was all due cash at the present day. It seems to me perfectly plain that your arrangement is practically the same in its results to this Company as if you anticipated the payment of $25,000,000 in cash. If you take the $25,000,000 which are due from time to time, as they carry on the work, and say you shall give it to them on the 1st July next, you must admit you give a very serious and important advantage to the Company; an advantage, assuming them to be earning their money regularly year by year, from one to ten years, of from $5,000,000 to $5,500,000, calculating interest at four per cent. You say: "We will not give you the subsidy in advance, but we will agree to give you our bonds for the subsidy in advance."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No.

Mr. BLAKE. Because those coupons are nothing less than bonds, as far as the Government is concerned, for the payment of a certain sum out of the first coupons of the capital bonds of the Company. I am not objecting now to the principle of substituting a deferred payment for a payment deferred, it is true, but deferred to a lesser day. I am discussing simply the principle on which you put the Company on the same and no better footing under the new calculation than you would under the old one; and, I say, in order to put them in the same position when you are agreeing to pay at a longer interval than that at which you are now paying the $25,000,000, you must first ascertain what are the intervals at which you must pay the $25,000,000. You are under no obligation to pay out at all until the money is earned, and from now until the time the money is due is a period during which the money should not bear interest. There are two elements of uncertainty in this question: One is, you do not know how fast the money will be earned; the other is, you do not know whether it will be earned or not. What you propose to do is to take the $25,000,000 as if it was now payable, when it is only payable according as the work progresses. You propose to determine what the worth of the delay is at four per cent., and pay that sum to the Company.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. Finance Minister said he was about to enter into a calculation of what the delay would be on the $25,000,000; that he was about to calculate what would fall due the first year, what the second, and so on. He comes to the very point at which I started, namely, that you must not assume the $25,000,000 as now payable, but must acknowledge that it is a sum payable at future periods. How are you going to determine those periods? You would require, not an actuary, but a probability man like Vennor. No actuary can guess when this money will be earned, or predict it will be earned at all. If you agree with me, you have got to meet that problem. How are you going to solve it? What you said was that you had not to meet it at all, that you treated the $25,000,000 as the basis of a calculation, and, having to pay it the 1st July, proyears. The hon. Minister said this was of no consequence, it that the Government got the money and not the Company. But the Company do get it, because they simply lend you the money and you pay four per cent. interest on it.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I cannot see the objection the hon gentleman has raised to the calculation made in the cases to which I have referred. The question is what are we to be called on to pay over a certain number of years, part in principal and part in interest?

Mr. BLAKE. You assume the $25,000,000 as due.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY said that made no difference, because the actuary decided what that $25,000,000 was equivalent to, payable over twenty or thirty years. I give the hon. gentleman the strongest case that could be made. The Government agreed to pay bonds equivalent to $25,000,000 interest and principal, during thirty years. Supposing they were issued for thirty years. Say they realized $40,000,000, $25,000,000 of which were placed in the hands of the Government and $15,000,000 in a bank, at the control of the Government, the Government paying four per cent. on the amount deposited with them—the Government had the use of the money, and the hon, gentleman should congratulate the country on the fact that we could get it at four per cent., when not long ago we had to pay five per cent.; and the money could be used in redeeming five per cent. securities which would give us a gain of one per cent.

Mr. MacDONNELL (Inverness). Do the Company get the benefit of the interest at once on these $25,000,000?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY said the bondholders got the interest if the Government agreed to pay them. Instead of being four per cent., it was four per cent. and a certain portion of the principal. The Company did not get the benefit of the interest. They handed it over to the Government, which agreed to pay the interest on those bonds at four per cent.

Mr. HAGGART said the position seemed to him to be a perfectly clear one. The Company would get the payments spread over a certain number of years. The difficulty was to find out the amount actually to be earned during each year, but, dividing the amount by the number of years and making an actuarial computation of what those lands would bring, you loose the same amount of interest as the Government would give them on the deposit.

Mr. BLAKE. If you do it; but the Finance Minister says he is not going to do it.

Mr. HAGGART said, in order to obtain the $25,000,000 they must have lost an amount equal to the interest at four per cent.

Mr. ANGLIN said there would be no difficulty if we knew exactly at what period the several instalments of this money were to be paid.

Mr. HAGGART. That is the difficulty.

Mr. ANGLIN considered that it was an insuperable difficulty. The Minister of Finance seemed to assume that the bonds would be put on the market on short terms, but how could the value of these bonds be estimated, actuarially or otherwise, without knowing when the Dominion was to become liable to the contractors for any particular amount? That was impossible. What seemed to him to be an easy mode was this—if the contractors chose to be paid by that mode: that the bonds should be calculated from the date at which they were issued, that the Government should take the money realized by the bonds and pay them no interest on it, but make the payments proportionately as the contractors earned the money, and so pay them from time to time, unless it were to be supposed that the Government should make default. In any case, of course, if they should make default then they ought to pay the contractors the nterest on the money so held from them, but the money lodged with the Government and with the banks—not merely the $25,000,000, but the whole proceeds of those bonds—was not the money of the contractors at all until they earned it, but the money of the Government. If the calculation be made upon the value of the bonds as if the money were to be all earned and due to the contractors on the day when the bonds were then issued, then the Government should hold, not the $25,000,000, but the whole proceeds of those bonds, making what use of the money they thought proper in the public interest, and paying to the contractors as they earned the money exactly the amount they earned without nterest, because it was not theirs until they earned it.

Mr. PLUMB said that a good many of these difficulties which had been urged with such ingenuity would disappear on a closer inspection of the Bill. The contractors could substitute the issue of land grant bonds for a mortgage upon their road and lands, and could deposit the proceeds of those bonds with the Government at four per cent. interest. The Government guarantees the interest on the coupons, so far as they have the money in their hands and no further. When the contractors have earned the money upon their contract, the Government have the means in their own hands to pay them as fast as they earn it. The complication which had been made on the other side was the confusion between paying interest to the contractors and paying interest upon the money deposited with them that they paid upon the bonds to whoever paid them. They did not pay double interest.

Mr. ANGLIN. Oh yes, they do.

Mr. PLUMB. That was where the hon, gentleman as at sea. He would discover by reading the contract again that Government only guarantee the payment of interest on the bonds represented by the money deposited with them. The section was perfectly distinct, if it was read in connection with the other clauses, and there was no necessity for actuarial or complicated calculations. He had studied the matter carefully, because it had presented itself to a supporter of the Government in the same way that the hon. member for Gloucester had understood it; and he admitted that at first flush there was some difficulty in understanding the clause from the way it was drawn, but it was clear when read in connection with the other sections. The Government receive from the contractors the proceeds of the bonds. Whether the money is raised to-day or next year, or the year after, the matter is precisely the same; it does not make a bit of difference, except that the Government have got to pay four per cent. interest on the bonds. If there was an objection to that it could be discussed, and there was no other. He thought that the Government had made a capital arrangement in providing this, because it reduced the subsidy to the contractors.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH asked the Finance Minister whether, if the bonds were converted into $25,000,000 and deposited with the Government, the Company would be entitled to any interest upon it, whether they would receive it, and if so, how much?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY said the Government would pay four per cent. interest on any money deposited with them. The Company negotiate these bonds and place the proceeds in the hands of the Government for the protection of the bondholders to a certain extent, because it is in advance of their having earned it. The Government paid for such money—the contractors' money—four per cent. The Government agreed to pay, instead of $25,000,000, a larger sum, extending over a certain number of years.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH asked if the Government were to pay the Company four per cent. on the deposit?

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. To the Company?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It is held as part and parcel of the money out of which we are to pay this interest.

Mr. ANGLIN said if the clause was as the hon. member for Niagara understood it to be, it would not be so objectionable—perhaps not objectionable at all—but the provision was as follows:—

"d. Until the first day of January. 1882, the Company shall have the option, instead of issuing land grant bonds as hereinafter provided, of substituting the payment by the Government of the interest (or part of interest) on bonds of the Company mortgaging the railway and the lands to be granted by the Government, running over such term of years as may be approved by the Governor in Council, in lieu of the cash subsidy agreed to be granted to the Company or any part thereof; such payments of interest to be equivalent according to actuarial calculation to the corresponding cash payment, the Government allowing 4 per cent. Interest on moneys deposited with them; and the coupons representing the interest on such bonds shall be guaranteed by the Government to the extent of such equivalent."

Hence the Government were to undertake to pay interest or part of the interest on those bonds, not to the contractors that they may pay it again to parties owning the bonds, but the Government becoming themselves directly responsible to the holders of bonds. The Government had provided that they were to pay four per cent. upon the money placed in their hands as the produce of those bonds.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said that, of course, the interest would be paid in money, and would be paid to the holders of coupons. The Government agreed to pay interest. The coupons would represent the interest, and the Government guaranteed the interest to be paid on the coupons, which would amount to only four per cent.

AFTER RECESS.

On clause 6,

Mr. BLAKE suggested that "shall" should be substituted for "may," as it was desirable the Government should take security.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER concurred.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

On clause 6,

Mr. BLAKE said he understood that the meaning of the last part of the provision as to what was to be the standard between Yale and Port Moody, and the practical effect of that, was to provide that the Government would construct the piece of railway between these points of the same standard as that provided by the third clause for the contractors' portion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Certainly.

Clause agreed to.

On sub-section b, clause 9 of the schedule,

Mr. BLAKE said he thought the interests of the Dominion would be better consulted by its becoming the negotiator in the markets of the world of its own securities, and that a provision which allowed the Company the option of taking terminable funds of the Government instead of cash was not a wholesome one.

Sub-section agreed to.

On sub-section c,

Mr. BLAKE said that this sub-section provided that:

"If at any time the Company shall cause to be delivered on or near the line of the said railway, at a place satisfactiory to the Government, steel rails and fastenings to be used in the construction of the railway, but in advance of the requirements for such construction, the Government, on the requisition of the Company, shall, upon such terms and conditions as shall be determined by the Government, advance thereon three-fourths of the value thereof at the place of delivery."

He thought that some arrangement should be made by when the interest was to begin to accrue on the $25,000,000. which if the period elapsing between the period of delivery Was the interest to start from the day the contract was Sir Leonard Tilley.

and the period of requirement was a long one, a rebate should be made upon the interest which the Government would pay on three-fourths of the value.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER said a similar provision had been made by the late Government with reference to the Canada Central, and a body of gentlemen for whom the hon. memter for West Durham had a great respect—the new Syndicate—required the same concession.

Mr. BLAKE said he did not object to a reasonable advance being made if the conditions were reasonable, but he objected to the Government paying interest for a period which might be one of considerable length.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER said if the hon. gentleman would read the clause again, he would find that the Government were in a position to exact the interest if they saw fit. The clause read:

"The Government, on the requisition of the Company, shall, upon such terms and conditions as shall be determined by the Government advance," He might add that it was perfectly understood that the Government were to have the interest if they required it, though if the period was short and the amount small it was not likely they would advance.

Mr. BLAKE said he was perfectly satisfied with the hon. gentleman's statements.

Sub-section agreed to.

On sub-section d,

Mr. BLAKE said this brought them back to where they were before recess. He wanted to point out that the clause of the Bill which has been passed through the Committee rightly stated the nature of the proposed transaction. He did not object in its principle to the substitution of a properly calculated allowance representing what the Company were to get in the subsidy. If the interests were calculated on a proper basis and proper precautions were taken, this was a change which would not unduly alter the position of the Government. But he wished to point out that the mode of conducting this particular operation was seriously important—that it might materially affect the real amount that the Company is to receive. It had been suggested that this would be only a guarantee of interest, but it was quite clear, although the phrase guarantee was used, this was really a payment of interest. In the first place, the intention was to substitute one sum of money paid in instalments for another sum of money which was an absolute payment. The Company were to receive $25,000,000 as the work progressed in twenty mile sections, but we were going to agree that instead of paying that sum to the Company, instead of certain unfixed proportions, to pay a larger sum for forbespeares of the subsidy by annual instal larger sum for forbearance of the subsidy by annual instalments to the Company or to its bondholders. That that view was correct was shown in clause 3, which stated that in lieu of the payment of the said subsidy direct to the Company, the Government might convert the same and any interests accruing thereon into a fund for payment to the extent of such fund, with interest on the bonds of the Company; that is, instead of paying $25,000,000 direct to the Company, as it would be entitled to under the contract, the Government might make a fund composed of the $25,000,000 and the interest for forbearance of that sum, and pay that fund out in interest on the bonds of the Company. It was desirable to ascertain what was meant by "any interests accruing thereon." To ascertain that it was necessary to know when the interest commenced to accrue, at what rate, and for what time it accrued? The rate was stated to be four per cent., the time was to be such as the Company and the Government might agree upon. The first question in the three factors, making the gross amount, was the question which his hou friend had not yet answered. He wanted to know when the interest was to begin to accrue on the $25,000,000.

made with the Company or from the day the Bill passed through Parliament? It certainly was not to start from the day the money became actually payable to the Company under the contract, because this arrangement could only be implemented before January, 1884. As he had already remarked, they were substituting for the subsidy payable to the Company a larger sum, composed of that subsidy and the interests on that subsidy for a certain period of forbearance which they were to pay to the bondholders of the Company instead. This was borne out by the clause under consideration, reading as follows:-

"Until the first day of January, 1882, the Company shall have the option, instead of issuing land-grant bonds as hereinafter provided, and substituting the payment, by the Government, of the interest (or part of interest) on the bonds of the Company, mortgaging the railway and the lands to be granted by the Government, running over such term of years as may be approved by the Governor in Council. in lieu of the cash subsidy hereby agreed to be granted to the Company or any part thereof; such payments of interest to be equivalent, according to actuarial calculation, to the corresponding cash payment."

Now any sum paid for interest out of the moneys deposited by the Company would not be charged against the Company in that respect, but as against this fund which, by this third clause, they were creating out of the subsidy and the interest on the subsidy. Instead of paying the subsidy at certain or uncertain times they were going to obtain a longer time and to pay it by half yearly instalments, and to pay interest at four per cent. How large the fund would be would depend upon the date from which they commenced to pay interest. It was obvious that the practical value of the fund depended upon the question when the subsidy became payable. If instead of the $25,000,000 being payable at once they arranged to make twenty half yearly payments and to calculate the interest at four per cent. for the forbearance the Company would give, it would amount to forty half yearly payments, or a little over $913,000, and they would pay in the course of twenty years a little over $3,...00,000. What he wanted to point out was, that in order to make a fund up to that amount they required to give this as an addition to the $25, 00.000 presently payable. But a large portion of that sum was not payable for many years, a considerable portion was not payable until the end of ten years, and it was quite clear that, in making any calculation which they would have to make before 1st January 1882, they ought not to allow interest upon the $25,000,000 as if it was due at the time they were making the calculation. They must recognize the fact that a large portion of it was payable without interest at a later date, and a large portion of it many years later.

Mr. PLUMB. Is my hon. friend arguing upon the basis that this payment that he is speaking of is made to the Company in advance of the earnings that they make by building the road?

Mr. BLAKE. According to the contract I say this $25,000,000 would be payable as earned. The earlier they determined that the $25,000,000 was due to the Company, the larger would be the fund, and the more they would advantage the Company. Without having run the figures out he estimated that if the $25,000,000 were payable in ten half yearly instalments at four per cent. something like $20,500,000 would be the representation of the $25,000,000 so payable. It was quite clear, then, that if they took the $25,000,000 as presently payable, they added between $4,000,000 and $5,000,000 in cash to the advantage the Company were receiving. Of course, they had to add the interest, which would perhaps, increase this amount by $2,000,000. What he wanted to understand was upon what basis did the Government calculate in order to fix the amount of the aggregate fund.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY, in order to illustrate his view, would suppose that on the 1st of January, 1882, the Government, at the request of the Company, gave their fund he proposed to create by this process would be larger assent to the issue of $37,500,000 of bonds at four than if he took into account the fact that there was no cent. Suppose they were sold at par, proceeds of the bonds were placed in the hands of the Government, or at the disposal of the Government— $25,000,000 in the hands of the Government, and $12,500,000 at the disposal of the Government, in one of the banks of the Dominion. If the whole thing failed, the Government would be in a position of having $35,000,000 at 4 per cent. for 35 years, and the money to pay the bonds when they became due. Supposing that the Company went on in good faith under the terms of the contract, the liability of the Government would accree on the 1st of January, 1882, when the bonds were issued, because they would receive the proceeds and undertake to pay the money at the same time. Under the conditions of the first sub-section, the Company would be entitled then to receive $2,500,000, together with fifty per cent of that, or $1,250,000 in addition, or $3,750,000. That money would be in the hands of the Government to pay the interest on the bonds, and might be paid to the Company, or to the men who paid the interest on the coupons. Therefore there was no loss to the Government. It might go into the hands of the Company, or it might not. If it did, we only ran the risk of paying the coupons, but, as in the case of the Canada Central, that was a matter of arrangement. With reference to the sinking fund, the Government agreed to take that sinking fund and hold it subject to arrangement after-

Mr. BLAKE said the explanation was very lengthy, but the Finance Minister had not answered the very simple question which he (Mr. Blake) had put to him. He would like an answer to that one question. The Government had to undertake the task of deciding this point some time, and it should be decided before the Bill was passed. The Government had no option, but had to yield to the absolute right of the Company to enter into the transaction they were now discussing. The question was: When the Government was asked to create a fund by taking the $2,000,000 cash, and the interest on that $25,000,000 for the length of time that the bonds had to run, from what date was the Government going to calculate the interest would commonce to fall due?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. From the date of the bonds. It makes no difference whether it is to morrow or six months hence, because the proceeds of those bonds must come into the hands of the Government.

Mr. BLAKE said it was clear they now had a basis of calculation, and that basis was not what the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches to the right of the Finance Minister and the Finance Minister in expectancy thought it was, but the calculation was to be from the date of the issue of the bonds, namely, some time after 1st January, 1880. They were therefore to assume, for the purpose of creating this fund, that the $25,000,000 was presently payable. The hon. Finance Minister said: "I take the $25,000.000 and I ascertain what the interest will be at four per cent. on the $25,000,000, turning it into half-yearly instalments for the years these bonds are to run, and I find it amounts to a much larger sum, and instead of giving you $25,000,000 in cash, I give you my bonds for this larger sum," and the Finance Minister rightly said: "If the money was then due, and if the rate of interest was not too onerous, the country would not lose by the transaction, for he had obtained time for payment at a fair rate of interest." The difficulty lay in his assuming that the $25,000,000 was then due on the 1st of July next. He had calculated interest from that time and was giving, therefore, an aggregate of coupons of $36,000,000 or $37,000,000, when, in point of fact, by the operation he was paying interest on the $25,000,000 for that interval of years that would elapse before it was really earned by the Company. The hon. gentleman could not deny that the interest payable on that $25,000,000 for a great number of years; and being so much larger, it had to be recouped to the country some way or other, or the bonus would be in fact larger by the difference. How was it to be recouped to the country? Not under any provision of this Bill, because this Bill simply provides that the proceeds of these lands, when sold, in part in the hands of the Government, and in part in bank under control of the Government. For the part in bank the Government got nothing, though he admitted the control was a considerable security against misappropriation of the money. The money which was put into its own hands was simply borrowed by the Government from the Company at forty cents interest for the period until it was put into the construction of the What was the position of the Company? been able to raise, say, $45,000,000, as it might, if it used the whole of these $45,000,000 in twenty year bonds at four per cent., and if paid no interest on the $45,000,000 for the period of the currency of these bonds, because the interest was provided by the public in lieu of the $25,000,000 subsidy. Since, the hon gentleman had attached coupons representing $25,000,000, plus interest on those bonds.

Mr. PLUMB. Hear, bear.

Mr. BLAKE said he referred the hon. member for Niagara to the clause which read as follows:-

"In lieu of the payment of the said money subsidy direct to the Company, the Government may convert the same and any interest accrued thereon into a fund for the payment to the extent of such fund, of interest on the bonds of the Company, and may pay such interest accordingly."

So that the $25,000,000 and interest were to be turned into a Government fund, which Government fund was to be devoted, in lieu of the subsidy, to the payment of interest on the Company's bonds. The Company were, therefore, at no charge for interest on those bonds. The subsidy which was received from the Government paid that interest. So that the interest is paid by the Government for what it borrows in effect from the Company and holds as security. The best interest they can arrange for is paid by the other corporations that have it, and the Government pays the other interest in lieu of subsidy on the bonds. Assuming for the purpose of calculation that the $25,000,000 is presently payable, the Government are in effect making a present to the Company of the interest that would accrue between the time it is presently payable and the time it would really be payable to the Company.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY said, suppose bonds were issued for $35,000,000, and that the proceeds were placed in the hands of the Government, they would simply be paying four per cent. on those bonds until they were due, and the principal would be there to pay it. There would be no loss to the country in that case. We would simply be obtaining money at four per cent. for a period of years. That is on the main transaction. What interest would the Govern-ment pay out besides? Just simply the interest on whatever subsidy would be coming to the Company, year after year. If it were two millions and a half the first year, the Government would pay $100,000 out of the Treasury; if two and a half millions more the following year, the interest would be $200,000 taken out of the Treasury. We pay interest in proportion as we pay the subsidies the Company are entitled to.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT said he understood the hen. Finance Minister to say that he proposed to pay out the $37,500,000, or whatever sum he realized.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It depends on the number of years, but say that amount.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Supposing the Com-Mr. BLAKE,

according to this clause, one million of dollars to be paid as four per cent, interest on the $25,000,000. To whom is the hon, gentleman going to assign that? According to his (Sir Richard J. Cartwright's) understanding of this clause that would be the property of the Company.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT said if that was the property of the Company they would gain an enormous advantage. That might not be the meaning of the Government, but Parliament had to consider the construction of the clause, and it would not be at all unlikely that the Company would put the same construction upon it that he did, if it passed in its present shape. We would be prettily circumstanced indeed, if at some future time the Company obtained a legal decision that the clause admitted of this construction. What precautions were to be taken to prevent this $1,000,000 or $900,000 getting into the hands of the Company?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD thought that the House and country would trust the Government with this sacred charge; that they would not allow the country to pay eight per cent.; they would only pay four per cent.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman may not be able to help himself.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We will trust the hon. gentlemen opposite.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. We may not be able to help you. A misconstruction here may come to have an excessively serious effect.

Mr. McCUAIG said he understood we were to pay four per cent. on $25,000,000 until the completion of this road, and this was to be paid as the work progressed. Would this clause place us in any different position from that?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No.

Mr. McCUAIG. The issue of these bonds is to enable the Company to borrow at four per cent. in the market now, in consequence of the money being very cheap.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. That is it.

Mr. McCUAIG. Then there should be no doubt about the construction of this clause.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. There is none.

Mr. McCUAIG asked if four per cent. coupons would be attached to those bonds.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes.

Mr. McCUAIG thought the Government would be liable for the interest. He understood the proceeds of those bonds would be deposited with the Government to the extent of $25,000,000, on which amount the Government would have to pay four per cent. interest. Was he to understand that when the four per cent. was paid on the deposit it was to be placed to the debit of the Govern-

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No; we pay it to the compons. Mr. McCUAIG did not understand it that way. If this Company issue bonds upon which there are coupons for which the Government is liable, and the proceeds of the bonds are deposited with the Government, and if we pay the Company four per cent on the deposit, we pay eight per cent.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. That four per cent is paid by the Government to the coupons. We use the money deposited with us to pay the coupons on the bonds, and relieve the Government of the responsibility of paying them.

Mr. McCUAIG said that if the Government redesmed those coupons it would be a charge on the consolidated pany do one-tenth of the work they will be paid $3,750,000. revenue of the country, and if the proceeds of those bonds So far so good; but in addition to that there will be, were deposited under the Government, and they had to pay to the Company four per cent. on that deposit, it would be contractors would be entitled to certain shares of the equivalent to eight per cent.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY said the four per cent. on the deposit would be paid to the party who was bound to take up those coupons, as in the case of the Canada Central. If, for instance, those coupons were payable at the office of any bank in London, as in the case of the Canada Central, the Government would redeem the interest on those $25,000,000 in its hands, and that ought to redeem those coupons which were the Government's liability.

Mr. McCUAIG said the Company could, at their own convenience, dispose of those bonds in the highest market, and whenever it suited them to deposit with the Government, whether they required the money or not, and from that time it would commence to bear interest. It might occur that Government had no use for the money. Under those circumstances there would certainly be a loss of interest, unless the parties with whom it was deposited were willing to pay four per cent.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY said the hon. member was raising another question, whether it was desirable that the Government should accept the money and pay four per cent. when possibly they might have no use for the money. During the next fiscal year the Government would have to borrow perhaps $15,000,000, and if they went upon the English market they could not obtain it just as they required it. The same objection would lie with respect to any loan as to the $15,000,000. But he was satisfied the Government could use in the interest of the Dominion the $25,000,000 either in meeting liabilities or in redeeming five per cent. securities between this time and 18r5, without the loss of any more money than the Government were on the English market three months hence and floated a loan.

Mr. McCUAIG said he was quite satisfied with the answer given by the Finance Minister to the first question. Several other hon, members have been uncertain on that point, and it was desirable it should be made clear. It was gratifying to hear that there was no probability of a large sum of money being at the credit of the Government in the

Mr. ANGLIN said the Finance Minister persisted in arguing as if the money would be the money of the Syndicate, whereas it would really be that of the people of this country. The hon. gentleman had proceeded with his calculations as if the whole of the $25,000,000 were to be due to the Company when the bonds were issued. None of that money would in any sense belong to the Company until some portion of the road had been constructed, and then they would become entitled to a fair proportion. If, in the arrangement between the Government and Company, it had been settled that the bonds should be sold whenever it appeared that they could be disposed of most advantageously, and that they should be sold all at once, rather them piecemeal, no objection would be made; but he could not understand why the Government pledged itself to pay any interest on the money so obtained. To whom would the Government pay the interest? The last proposition was a second thought. The Government, it was stated, would pay 4 per cent. on $37,500,000, equal to 6 per cent. on $25,000,000, and thus would in the time named extinguish the Government liability to pay the $25,000,000 subsidy. If the 4 per cent. mentioned in the clause under consideration were really to be applied in part payment of the amount the Government undertake to pay the bondholders, that part of the clause was wholly unnecessary. The obvious meaning is that four per cent. is to be paid to the contractors—that the Government are first to pay whatever rate might be necessary after a certain number of years to cover both interest and principal, and besides that, if this clause was to go into effect as it stood, they would have to pay four per cent. As the work proceeded the at that time, but he must know that he could not expect to money and they would be paid accordingly. The matter might be got at in another way. If they were to assume that the share to be due to the contractors year after year was one-tenth, and the work was to progress uniformly, then of course one-tenth of $25,000,000, or a sum equivalent to that amount, would be paid one year after another. In that case we would have no interest account, and we would go on paying a sum on sinking fund year after year. But under this arrangement we would after year. have to pay interest and sinking fund for the extinction of the claim, and yet it was argued by the hon. gentleman opposite as if this money would be the money of the contractors, before they had earned any of it, and as if the Government were really incurring an obligation to the contractors, because they had the holding and the using of the money in the public interests. It was at any rate evident that there was a good deal of doubt as to what the clause really meant, and it should be so recon structed as to make its meaning perfectly clear, and to secure the exemption of the country from a liability which Parlia-

Mr. PLUMB said he was not surprised that the late Finance Minister did not venture to take the view of this sub-section which had been taken by other hon, gentlemen who were not so familiar with financial operations as he (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) was. He was not much surprised at the views expressed by the hon. gentleman who had just taken his seat. He was not much surprised at the views taken by the leader of the Opposition, though he fancied if this proposition he had supported were made to him as the solicitor for, or as a large shareholder in, a loan society, he would soon perceive that it was untonable. What was the actual common sense view of this section? It was that if the Company choose to avail themselves of the option under this clause before say 1882, they might issue a certain amount of bonds upon the whole franchises of the Company, including the land grant and the money grant of $25,000,000—or, perhaps, more, for the amount was not material to the principal—they could substitute—the word was an awkward one, but it conveyed the meaningthat amount of the payment of subsidy and interest paid by the Government for those bonds up to the amount which they secured to the Government by the deposit of If they received $25,000,000 deposited, and money. the Government could pay four per cent. on that deposit, as they would pay interest on any other loan, the subsidies due to the Company afterwards were not to be paid out of the money for that period. The whole argument by hon, gentlemen opposite was that there was some connection between the money which the Company had borrowed and put in the hands of the Government, and the subsidy, whereas they had no connection whatever, and no possibility of the Company getting double interest, as might be inferred from the remarks of hon. gentlemen opposite. The only question involved was whether the Government was in a position to undertake to pay on a deposit, not defined but coming in at any particular moment, a rate of four per cent. If the Government could say that their arrangements were such that they could do so without inconvenience, they made the transaction entirely distinct from any payment to the contractors on account of their work, and this was expressly stipulated in the clause. In that case the Government were perfectly justified in taking the money as they proposed to take it. The late Finance Minister knew very well that in November, 1876, when he made his loan of $3,000,000 sterling, he did not want his money for more than a year, and he left the money in England at a low rate of interest, as money was just then realizing in London more than one and a half per cent. It was convenient for him to borrow the money get his money in a day's searching, and that therefore there must be a considerable amount of interest. They were told that there must be some abstruse actuarial calculation made to ascertain what time this sum became due to the contractors under the contract. This had nothing whatever to do with this calculation, and he must say, and he said it with great respect, that the hon. gentleman had mixed himself up upon this point. This whole argument had grown out of the fact that the hon. gentleman had, in some extraordinary way, mixed up two entirely separate questions. The whole transaction was this: It might be convenient for this Syndicate to raise a certain sum of money otherwise than was provided in this Bill. The Government undertook to guarantee coupons on the bonds of the sum so raised, and it was provided that after these bonds were negotiated the proceeds would go into their hands and the money be deposited with the Government. The Government would have to pay the coupons as they came round, and as they had the money in their hands they could afford to pay four per cent. interest on it. It was simply a deposit of money with the Government, exactly as if a loan association received that money and the Government undertook the trust of paying coupons upon it, and if they had money enough in their hands in the end they would apply it to the payment of the bonds. When the Syndicate did their work they would receive their money for it. Did anybody suppose the fund was one which the Company themselves were to be debited with when they received the money on their contract? He rather thought not.

Mr. HAGGART said he had a great difficulty in understanding this clause, and his final opinion of it differed from that of other hon, gentlemen. In the first place, it seemed to him that the Government, instead of giving $25,000,000 to the Company as they earned it, proposed to give it in the form of interest coupons, or to pay interest coupons on bonds to be issued by the Company. The most difficult point to determine was at what period this money was to be paid. If the work was done equally each year it would not he very easy to say how much the Company should receive each year. But they might do a small quantity of work one year and a large quantity of work another year. He would presume that the Company would do the work equally over the ten years; if so, it was a simple calculation to find out what amount the Government ought to guarantee to the Company. It would be very easy to find out what $25,000,000 would be divided by ten, and what four per cent. on the balance would realize on the sale at the present moment. In his opinion that was the extent responsible for the $37,500,000 at once? to which Government guaranteed the coupons.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Ought to guarantee.

Mr. HAGGART said that seemed to be the present intention of the Government. It did not matter whether the time was to-morrow or the 1st of July, 1882. The calculation was just as easily made now as then, provided they knew the time at which the Company would earn the amount. The Government did not guarantee the bonds, but for the safety of the bondholders the Company deposited the amount received for the bonds, the latter acting as keepers of the amount as security that the contractors would go on and do the work. They paid over the amount of bonds to the bondholders as the work progressed. There was no doubt that of the amount deposited with the Government the four per cent. must be paid to the contractors, because the contractors lost that amount in the sale of their bonds in the first instance to the public. Then the bonds to be issued must be in excess of $50,000,000. The Company received $25,000,000 in cash and would probably receive $25,000,000 more for their land, and unless they receive a great amount by this operation it would be folly for them to issue bonds for a less amount than $50,000,000. Mr. Plumb.

Mr. BLAKE. It would only run to $45,500,000. That is to say, if you take $25,000,000 and add the interest on it at four per cent. for twenty years.

Mr. HAGGART said it depended entirely on the length of time the bonds might run, whether it were for ten, twenty or fifty years. The Company would take good care that the amount they were to receive would equal at least $1 per acre for the land and the $25,000,000 of each subsidy. Taking that view it seemed to him this was a very fair arrangement for the Government to make. The Government ment would enable the Company to raise $25,000,000 on the credit both of the Company and of the Government, and on the land grant. It simply enabled the Company to raise $25,000,000 and loan it to the Government.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY differed entirely with the hon. gentleman as to the construction of this paragraph. As the late Finance Minister is now present he would repeat the illustration he had already given based on the Canada Central Railway. That road of 120 miles had a subsidy of $12,000 per mile which was to be paid as the work was constructed. It was not necessary, when this Government agreed to carry out the arrangements made by their predecessors, to consider how many miles of that road were to be constructed each year. They had to pay the Company $12,000 a mile; but as they wished to float their bonds in order to raise more money, the Government agreed to pay them $2,500,000 per annum, and they paid $1,500,000 into the Treasury of Canada for the purpose of paying the interest the Government agreed to pay to the expiration of the bords. That made the Government perfectly safe. The transaction simply amounted to taking money from them at a certain rate, and paying it back in principal and interest in twenty years. The same rule was applied here. The Company desired the guarantee of the Government in order to float their bonds now while the market was favorable; but the Government said to them: "We are bound to pay the interest on the coupons, and you may not perform the work." The answer, as they expected, was: "We will put the whole proceeds of these bonds in your hands, and you will be perfectly safe, because you will be able to use the money at four per cent." It was practically a loan of money, and the Company, out of the sales of lands, provided a sinking fund for the payment of the bonds themselves. The only advantage the Company obtained was to be placed in the position of floating their bonds at a favorable time.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Does the Government not become

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No; we become responsible for the interest and the charges equivalent to $25,00,000.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. The Government are paying four per cent. for the money in the banks, but the Government do not get four per cent. for the money.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. There is no loss. We decline to take more than $25,000,000. They get four per cent. for the money they put into the banks. But I may say we shall be prepared to take the whole $25,000,000, and use it advantageously if there is any question with reference to the interest.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT said the Finance Minister would hardly tell the House that $25,000,000 paysble in instalments over a period of ten years, was as valuable as $25,000,000 due to-day.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I am not arguing that at all. It does not apply to this case.

Sir RICHARDJ. CARTWRIGHT said our obligation was not to pay the Company $25,000,000 on or before the 1st of January, 1882, but $25,000,000 in instalments, the last of which will mature in January, 1891. Our cash obligation to the Company would be fairly computed to-day at something like $18,000,000 or $19,000,000, and not at $25,000,000. What he contended was that the clause was so drawn that the Company could gain an advantage by it, and he asked the Government to amend it so as to carry out their intention, which was not to give the Company $25,000,000 to-day, but to give them the equivalent of $25,000,000 running over ten years.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY asked the hon. gentleman to place his finger on a line of this contract which stated that the Gowernment were to give the Company $25,000,000 in 1882.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT said the clause was so drawn as to leave the door open to great ambiguity, and to enable the Company to obtain an advantage over the Government by making the payment equivalent to $25,000,000 on or before the 1st of January, 1882. They were both agreed, and the addition of a few words to indicate their meaning would save all this discussion. It appeared they were all of the same opinion. They did not want to give to the Company $25,000,000. Therefore, this clause should be amended so that there would be no possibility of the Company attaining what was equivalent to $25,000,000.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER said he was extremely glad the hon, gentleman had correctly stated that the cash subsidy, instead of being $25,000,000, was only between $19,000,000 and $20,000,000.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. If paid in ten equal instalments.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER said they were agreed, therefore, upon the premises. How is that money to be paid? In sub-section b of clause 9 of the schedule, it was detailed that it was to be paid on the one section at one rate, another at another rate, and that there was ten years during which it would be paid in proportion as the work went on. Sub-section d said:

"Until the first day of January, 1882, the Company shall have the option, instead of issuing land grant bonds as hereinafter provided, of substituting the payment by the Government of the interest or part of the interest) on bonds of the Company mortgaging the railway and the land to be granted by the Government, running over such term of years as may be approved by the Governor in Council, in lieu of the cash subsidy hereby agreed to be granted to the Company, or any part thereof; such payment of interest to be equivalent according to actuarial calculation to the corresponding cash payment."

This same sub-section describes how payments are to be made as the work progressed, and the next sub-section declared that if the Company wished to have these payments changed into terminable bonds the amount should be based, in lieu of a cash subsidy, upon the amount they would be entitled to receive of cash subsidy according to an actuarial calculation. The House had, in the first place, the statement that the amount to be paid under this contract was between $19,000,000 and $20,000,000, and in the next place, if the Company chose to exercise its option, the payment was to be equivalent to a cash subsidy, as provided under this contract by an actuarial calculation.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Then you ought to strike out the words—"To be allowed four per cent. interest on the money deposited."

Mr. ANGLIN said the hon. the Minister of Railways took up another point entirely different to that under debate. The question to be disposed of was the payment of the interest and the money to be obtained by the sale of those bonds. The Government should take this clause into further consideration, and alter it so as to remove all doubt. The hon, member for Niagara even doubted its bearing, and could not succeed in satisfying himself. The clause certainly required revision.

Mr. PLUMB said the hon, gentleman ought to suggest mr. WHITE said if the fact be that the Government took some amendment which would be satisfactory. None of the amount as being due to the Company on the 1st of the hon, gentlemen opposite had yet suggested any amendment to the clause. This clause meant that these contractors can, if they choose, waive the right to issue a certain class of lands; that they can mortgage their whole road and land grant; that they can anticipate their work; that they can raise the money when the money market is easy of access and the rate of interest is low, instead of taking the risk of raising money hereafter. They can regulate their bonds and deposit the money with the Government, and the Government can undertake to pay the interest on those bonds just so far as it has the money in hand. When the have done their work in twenty mile When the Company sections, the Government can then settle with the Syndicate; they can apply whatever money the Syndicate has carned to their own account, and then, if they have money on hand, they can release it from the Company. They will always hold money enough to secure them for the guarantee of their bonds. They are not paying anything to the Company but four per cent, interest on the money they have deposited, a less rate than the late Finance Minister who negotiated a four per cent, loan at 871 and thereby paid at least five per Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I did not.

Mr. PLUMB said the hon. gentleman had never dared to dispute the statement except in that form. The clause as it stood did not require any legal interpretation; there was no ambiguity in it, but a cloud of argument had been thrown about it, no doubt, for the purpose of embarrassing the Government and delaying the passage of the Bill.

Mr. MILLS said the Government were putting forward a different proposition and defence from that which they had stated to the House before six o'clock. The Finance Minister had then contended that it made no difference whether the loan was negotiated for the whole $25,000,000 or not; they were going to apply it to their purpose, and it was of no consequence what the sum might be. The Minister of Railways said that that was an indefensible position, and the Finance Minister changed round to the same view as his colleague. If the whole amount should be made available for the construction of the railway at once, its present worth would be considerably less-somewhere in the neighborhood of $20,000,000. The hon. gentleman, admitting that proposition, admitted that he had done what he originally proposed to do, and what this Act, as it stands, would entitle him to do; he would be paying to this Company a very much larger bonus than the House proposed they should receive, or that the Government had led the House to suppose they should receive. The House should, therefore, set about framing a clause which would give effect to their own and the Government's intentions.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew) said it seemed to him that the words "such payment of interest to the equivalent, according to actuarial calculation to the corresponding cash payment" must indicate the intention of the construction to be put on this clause. The cash would be earned by the Company over a certain number of years, and, in making calculation of the amount of interest that the Government will guarantee, they must have in view in making that actuarial calculation the fact that the payment is not to be made at once but extend over a certain number of years.

Mr. BLAKE. The Finance Minister says "no."

Mr. WHITE said he did not understand it so. The actuarial calculation in fixing the amount that the Government is to become responsible for to the bondholders will have in view the time at which the money was to be paid.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. From the date of the bonds. Mr. WHITE said if the fact be that the Government took January, 1882, it was manifest that the Company must receive a considerable advantage. The money, of course, is paid to the Government, and upon that money the Government have to pay four per cent. interest. That four per cent, has no regard to the interest that has been guaranteed by the Government to the bondholders, and in making the actuarial calculation mentioned in this subsection, read in connection with the other clause, that calculation must be made having regard to the fact that the Company are not entitled to $25,000,009, as at the time of the issue of the bonds, but as at the time when they would be entitled to receive payments as the work progressed. Under an Order in Council in 1878, relating to the Canada Central Railway subsidy, there was a similar provision for the manner in which the payments were to be made. Those payments of $12,000 per mile were not all earned by the Canada Central at the time the guarantee was given by the Government in lieu of the subsidy to be received by the Company, and in making that guarantee of interest it would be necessary to have regard to the payments as they were to be made; and just so it would be necessary to have regard to the dates at which the payments were to be made to the Company under the terms of this contract. If the amount was taken as being due to the Company on or before the first of January, 1882, he must agree with the view which had been taken by the hon, member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright), that the Company would receive a much greater advantage under an arrangement of that kind than if the proper actuarial calculation were made.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY said the hon. gentleman was in error as to the very Order in Council he had mentioned, for the period at which the Company were to receive the $12,000 per mile did not enter into the calculation. It was simply a question of how much the $1,440,000 paid when the work was completed would amount to at five per cent. paid over a number of years-what amount of bonds should be issued, without the slightest reference to the period when the whole work should be completed. That Company and the present Company were to receive the money pro rata as the work proceeded, but that did not enter into the question of when they were to receive the money because that was stipulated in the payments afterwards. It was simply a question of lending money, because the Government got the money grant the moment they began to pay interest. If it was on the first of January, 1882, the bonds were issued, the Government became responsible, they received the money, and the moment it was realized from the bonds the interest went to pay the interest under this engagement.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). If, as I understand from the last remarks of the Finance Minister, the four per cent. which is provided under this clause of the agreement shall be paid to the Company goes to pay the interest on the bonds, then I have no objection to make.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. That is the position exactly. Mr. CASEY said the Finance Minister might say so but the clause did not, and that was what they had to look to. So far as he could understand the intention of the clause this $25,000,000 deposit from the Company was a guarantee that they would not have to pay the coupons while the Company failed to perform their share of the bargain. The hon. member for North Renfrew (Mr. White), and as he would have imagined every one possessing a knowledge of finance, understood the clause to provide that the Company should have no right to the money until they had earned it, and that the only basis for actuarial calculation would be the probabilities when the Company should earn the money. But an insuperable obstacle in the way was that there was no basis for this actuarial calculation, as it would depend altogether upon the rate of progress at Mr. WHITE (Renfrew).

the money should be paid any time between now and the 1st of January, 1882, whenever it should be demanded, the Government would simply be borrowing $25,000,000, and they would be forced to borrow it so many years earlier than they would otherwise have done. If it was the intention of the Finance Minister to effect a loan he ought to say so in a straightforward manner, though it must be said that a loan of $25,000,000 seemed rather absurd in view of the large surplus which the hon gentleman claimed to have. The hon, gentleman said he could take up those former loans with these $25,000,000 deposited by the Company. That was absurd because it was not to be left in the hands of the Government for any definite term. It was not a permanent loan; we did not know when the Company would call for it. It was liable to be drawn at sight on completion of the work. In the computation of the amount the Company was going to get extra, it had generally been assumed that the subsidy would be paid out from year to year, and that, therefore, it would be fair to take it as paid out in tenths. It seemed to him that the clause provided for a worse arrangement than that for the Government, for it left as much as possible in the Government at the end of the ten years, because it said that the first money to be realized was to be realized out of the surplus, and not out of the $25,000,000 left in the hands of the Government. It was therefore possible that for the last two or three years of the ten the whole sum might remain without reduction in the hands of the Government. He saw nothing whatever in the clause to show that that four per cent on the $25,000,000 went to reduce the coupons. The words of the clause were certainly ambiguous, and it would seem intentionally so. The only hon, gentleman in this House who could explain the meaning of this clause and the intention of those who framed it was the hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Abbott). But this House had to do with the clause as it stood, and neither the explanation given of it by the hon. member for Argenteuil or by the Finance Minister would settle its meaning in a court of justice. No two persons apparently could understand it alike, and a court might see something in it still more disadvantageous to the country.

On sub-section e,

Mr. BLAKE asked why, if the Company availed themselves of the option granted by the preceding clause, the sum of $2,000 per mile on the first 800 of the central section was to be deducted pro rata from the amount payable to the Company on that section, and be appropriated to another part of the section.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon, gentleman will see at once there is a provision in the one case that the Company make their lands immediately available, and in the other case the probability is that they will not.

Mr. BLAKE said there was no provision about making the lands immediately available here. If they got their cash and land subsidy they got $10,000 a mile for the prairie section and so many acres of land. If they avail themselves of this option they were not to get the same pro rata for the prairie section. Why was there a reduction in that event of the prairie section and an amount added on?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER replied that if they received the amount in land and in money it was not available to the same extent as if they floated the bonds on the land and on the money. In the one case they were paid in money and in the other case in land.

Mr. BLAKE said it appeared to him to be an indication that the pro rata prescribed in the other part of the contract was unjustifiable. If it was reasonable that in this event $2,000 a mile should be deducted from the prairie section and put on to the other section, why, in the other event, should not a which the work was pushed. Suppose the bargain was that certain proportion be deducted from the prairie section and put on to the other. According to this scheme an issue of four per cent. bonds would float at par $45,500,000, which would give the Company about $10,000 a mile for the prairie section. But the hon. gentleman proposed to give $18,000 a mile for the prairie section, and in that event $2,000 a mile should be deducted and added on to the other part. If so, why should not a similar proportion of the cash subsidy be deducted? The hon gentleman said they would have more cash, but if so they would have more for the eastern and western sections as well as for the central section. The hon. gentleman said they would be better off only for the middle section, and worse off for the end, and in order to compensate for this inferior position he proposed to take $2,000 a mile off the middle section. It was an acknowledgment in terms that the provision for the prairie section was wholly indefensible.

Mr. POPE (Compton) said that it would take a considerable time for the Company to realize money out of the land subsidy. In place of the land these bonds could be issued and the money realized on them at once, and, of course, that money helped to build up the road.

Mr. ANGLIN said the explanation of the hon. Minister of Agriculture had placed matters in an extraordinary light. They were giving in the one case just as much as in the other. If a guarantee more than the contract provided was necessary to enable the Company to build the ends of the road, the guarantee should be over the whole line. Again, they found hon. gentlemen opposite altering their views with regard to the value of these lands, the facilities of disposing of them, and the flow of immigration. If the population were there the lands would be easily disposed of; but we were told that it would be difficult to dispose of them, and therefore we must facilitate the efforts of the gentlemen entering into this contract to raise money. It must appear to the country that the proportion of lands and money to be given to the prairie section would be out of all proportion to the cost of that work.

Mr. CASEY said the hon. Minister of Railways and the hon. Minister of Agriculture had distinctly stated that the Company would have a greater advantage by getting this issue of bonds than by getting the cash and the lands as they came due. This the hon. Minister of Railways urged as a reason for distributing the bonds along the line. On the contrary, it was a reason for reducing the total grant, as it enabled the Company to raise money most readily.

On clause 10.

Sir ALBERT SMITH expressed his opinion that the wording of this clause would enable the Company to claim all the rails bought in 1879, and not those only which were not required but on the Lake Superior and the western sections.

Mr. DOMVILLE hoped the Government would give some reasons for admitting the goods mentioned in this clause free of duty.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER said the hon, gentleman could not have been in his place during the discussion of this question, as the explanations he asked for had been made at least a dozen times. The whole amount of these remissions ofduty, with the exception of those referring to steel rails, were utterly insignificant, amounting to a little more than $100,000 in all, and he thought there would be more reason to enquire why these remissions should not be granted to a company undertaking to relieve the Government of a work of such magnitude as to excite alarm in the minds of hon. gentleman opposite that the Government of this country were going to be ruined by undertaking it with all these exemptions. At the opening of this discussion, it was stated that the interests of manufacturers in this country would be fully protected. So far as steel rails were concerned, when they cost double the amount they did now, no capitalist in this country entered into their manufacture, and it was scarcely to be expected that they would enter into their manufacture at their present price. The Government are prepared, in order to do justice to the manufacturers in the country, to introduce a measure by which they will be placed on an equal footing to compete with foreign manufacturers of these articles.

Mr. DOMVILLE said he only just arrived from Montreal, and therefore he could not have been in his seat when the hon. Minister gave his explanations. He had already voted three times on this matter, and would have voted for the Government on the division to-day had he been in time. As far as the speeches were concerned, there was quite a large volume of interest on this subject, which it would require the best part of recess to read through. All he wanted was to be assured that the manufacturers would be protected. The hon. Minister said he was going to protect the manufacturers. He was sure the Government would do all in its power to do so, but he did not see in section 10 how they were to be protected, how the drawback was going to place them as they were before.

Mr. BLAKE said the House would learn that when the hon. Minister brought down his Bill. He supposed the hon. member had not so far lost confidence in his leaders, that when they pledged themselves to accomplish a particular result he did not believe they would do so. He (Mr. Blake) did not rise to precipitate a discussion as to how the hon. Minister was about to accomplish the result, but rather to make an enquiry as to how he made out his estimates which varied from each other, at one time the amount of remission of duties being at $99,000, and another at $100,000, exclusive of steel rails.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER said he would place in the hands of the hon. gentlemen a calculation covering the whole ground. That calculation would show that if the duty were put on steel rails, taking them at the rate of the 50,000,000 tons the Government purchased, or about $500,000 total, the amount would hardly exceed $100,000. He did not not include bridges, for the reason that it was contemplated the bridges should be made of iron, but the iron material used in wooden bridges would be included.

Mr. CASEY asked if was the policy of the Government to encourage the building of railways by admitting steel rails free, until they could be manufactured in Canada.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. CASEY said it would certainly remove one of the complaints in regard to the admission of steel rails free, namely, that this road was in this respect given an unfair advantage over other roads. He would also ask why rails alone were to be handed over at cost price with interest, while other material were to be handed over at a valuation.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER said that any other articles in the possession of the Government were probably plant, articles already in use. The clause was perfectly simple and plain; and as for the rails, he had already given an estimate showing that the value of the exemption was something like $14,000. The Government did not propose to speculate on the rails that they were furnishing, and to require parties to pay more than they had cost the country in case they had used them themselves to carry on the construction of the road.

Mr. BLAKE said he would give the plain English of the matter. The reason of the difference was this: the rails were worth more than they had cost, and therefore they were given to the Syndicate at cost, and others were worth less than they had cost, and therefore were to be given at a valuation.

Mr. MILLS said the Minister of Railways had taken the ground that there would be no interference with the National Policy, because steel rails were now so cheap that they could not be manufactured at a profit in this country. He (Mr. Mills) had been under the impression that the Government were able to fix the price and secure a better market not only for the industries now in existence, but for the industries that might be called into existence by the new tariff. If he understood the hon, gentlemen the present condition of things was very unfortunate. The country was getting steel rails too cheaply, and thus many persons were prevented from getting employment. If the theory of the present Government was correct, it would only be necessary to increase the duty to establish the industry in this country. If fifty per cent. was not enough, increase it to seventy-five, if seventy-five was not enough increase it to 100, and go on increasing it until steel rails could be produced in this country. If the hon, gentleman was right in the view he had expressed just now, then he had been all wrong in supporting the tariff. He had also stated that the Government would take care that those who produced articles in this country, which could be used in the construction of the railway, should have a remission of duties but that was not sufficient. It would be bringing about a principle equivalent to free-trade, unless in remitting duties, the Government were prepared to pay the manufacturers a handsome bonus. Unless the Government were prepared to give a premium to manufacturers they were not prepared to uphold the National Policy in any particular with regard to articles which enter into the construction of this railway.

Mr. BOULTBEE said the House had learned, as the debate went on, that the Opposition entertained a deadly hostility to the Canadian Pacific Railway, but they had also learned from the hon. member for Bothwell they had an equal animosity against all railways, because the policy which he had just announced would prevent the construction of railways in this country. To manufacture steel rails time and an enormous capital was necessary, and the net result of the hon. gentleman's argument was that he would stop the building of railways in Canada.

Mr. GAULT said the merchants of Montreal were satisfied with the assurances given by the Government, and were making preparations to enter into large contracts with the Syndicate. He hoped, also, that George Stephens, who was a member of the Syndicate, and one of the largest proprietors of the Londonderry iron mine, might see it to his interest to manufacture rails there.

Mr. BLAKE asked whether any estimate had been made of the quantity of land, such as is prescribed to be received by the Company, is to be found within the twenty-four mile belt between Winnipeg and Jasper.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said it must be a rough estimate, but the Deputy Minister of the Interior, Colonel Donnis, and the Surveyor General, Mr. Lindsay Russell, informed him that on the whole there would not be more than 11,000,000 acres.

Mr. BLAKE said he understood the whole quantity of available land was 11,500,000 acres; he was referring rather to the quantity of land which the Company would be bound to accept.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD thought there was really no difference between the provision in the Hugh Allan contract and this. It meant that land that is not absolutely sterile and unfit for settlement must be taken, although even lands of inferior quality from their proximity to the railway would be more valuable than much more fertile lands at greater distances, and would be greedily sought for by the Company.

Mr. BLAKE said he wished to know if any estimate had been made of the available lands.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said there had not, and for Mr. MILLS.

vary a good many miles one way or the other. He did not think a single acre of land from the western boundary of Manitoba to Jasper House would be rejected by the Company on account of its being valueless.

Mr. BLAKE. That is very satisfactory indeed.

Mr. ANGLIN said it was very extraordinary. There was a very remarkable fact in reference to the lands. 11,000,000 acres would furnish 10,000 acres per mile for 900 miles, making a total of 9,000,000, and furnish about 2,000,000 acres more for the three-tenths of the road of the eastern section which the Company were required to build within the first three years. So that within three years the Company could have acquired and obtained possession of the two twenty-four mile belts in the prairie section.

Mr. CASEY said it was not so extraordinary in view of the statement of the First Minister that the road had not yet been located, and as the Company had an equal, if not a preponderating, voice with the Government in its location. they could locate the road so as to greatly increase the quantity of land in the twenty-four mile belt.

Mr. BLAKE said the Committee would receive with very great satisfaction the statement of the First Minister who was also Minister of the Interior, and who claimed greater knowledge of the subject than any other Minister or member. that the quality of the land through which the railway would pass from the western boundary of Manitoba to Jasper House was such—and probably it would apply to the alternate sections—as to be fit for settlement.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I did not say that.

Mr. BLAKE said the hon. gentleman said they would be accepted by the Company as fairly fit for settlement. In any other case they would not be accepted because the Company had been careful to provide that unless the lands were fairly fit for settlement they were not obliged to receive them. He desired to know whether in cases where the Company obtained a section which was partly covered by water th y would be entitled to the whole of the section, but the acreage of the water would not be included in it, and the Company might-take it out in dry land clsewhere.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No. The hon, gentleman would not read it in that way if he occupied my position. It stands thus: if the Company should reject any railway section on the ground that it is covered with water, they will have it made up. No doubt the Government agree to give 25,000,000 acres of land; they do not agree to give 25,000,000 acres of water. They will certainly receive 25,000,000 acres of land fit for settlement. We will not give them land not fit for sale.

Mr. MILLS said that by the Bill the section was to be granted, but the whole area was not to be measured.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD I can only tell the hon. gentleman that the Company will get land fit for settlement. and perhaps we may make a present to the hon, member of the land covered by water.

Mr. BLAKE asked whether, inasmuch as the Company would have power to select elsewhere than in alternate blocks, the Company might, with the consent of the Government, select areas which were not to be taken in alternate blocks?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said that if there should prove to be a deficiency the Government would consent to the Company obtaining lands elsewhere; but such consent would be regulated by the Orders in Council made from time to time as to the disposal of lands. They would have to take such lands as the Government agreed to give them in other portions of the country, and until the present system was altered by the Government, with the consent of this reason, that the actual line is not yet settled, and it may | Parliament, the present system would continue whereby

Mr. MILLS said the section did not apply to lands which were to be conveyed; the word used was "granted," so that the Company would have the power to retain not only the good lands, which might be substituted for the waste lands or the lands covered by water, but these waste lands or water stretches as well,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said that the grant was made on the principle of caveat emptor. There were two parties to a bargain; and the patents would be issued to the Company, or mayhap to their assignees, and in either case, when the patent had issued that patent was a conveyance of a part of the 25,000,000 acres. If a patent was applied for and a patent issued there was an end of the matter and a reduction of the 25,000,000 acres.

Mr. BLAKE remarked that the clause said that in calculating the amount of the deduction they were not to include the quantity of lakes, water stretches, and so on.

Mr. MILLS said the principle of caveat emptor could not apply as the word "granted" was used; the section applied to lands of which a grant had taken place.

Mr. CASEY said that, as the leader of the Government had said, there were two parties to a bargain, and they must take into account not only the interpretation which the Government might put upon the clause, but the interpretation which would be put upon it by the other party or by the courts. The question was one of importance, as these marsh lands and lands covered by water might be the most valuable lands in the territory.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Then they will take them.

Mr. CASEY said that they would not, however, be charged to them, and there was no provision by which such waste lands should be resumed by the Government. Why should not the settler or even the speculator have the same rights which were allowed the Syndicate in this particular? appeared that after taking certain lands in alternate blocks, they might take, with the consent of the Government, any tract of land.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Suppose the Government should not consent.

Mr. CASEY. The question is whether it leaves it in the power of the Government to consent or not.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That certainly is the intention.

Mr. BOULTBEE said that the trouble with the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), and the hon, member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey), was that they had a theoretical and not a practical knowledge of law. Any lawyer knew very well that the Company could not get other lands in place of the waste lands without releasing their claim to the waste lands. As to the point taken, by the leader of the Opposition that if there was a running stream through one of these sections or a valuable mill privilege the Company would get the land discounted and the mill privilege as well, he did not think that the hon, gentleman would give a professional opinion to that effect.

Mr. MILLS suggested the substitution of the word "allotted" for "granted" in the clause.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said he could not agree to

Clause agreed to.

On clause 12,

Mr. CHARLTON suggested that this clause should be amended so as to read: "The Government shall extinguish Indian titles affecting the lands herein appropriated and to be hereafter granted in aid of the railway, as rapidly as may greatly to the vagueness of this obligation that we did not be consistent with public policy and the welfare of the know where these might be chosen. We could form no Indians." As the clause now reads the Government was absolutely obliged to extinguish the Indian titles; but circumstances might arise which would render it impolitic on the part of the Government to attempt to do so. The Government might wish to reserve lands in localities where the Company might call upon the Government to extinguish the Indian titles, and an attempt to do so might involve great cost and even war. A similar provision to the one he proposed had been adopted by the American Government in granting the charter to the Northern Pacific Railway.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the clauses was simply this: we must have the title to the land before we give it to the Company. We cannot give title to any lands that belong to the Indians, and therefore we cannot ask the Company to accept any land on either side of the railway unless we have the title to it.

Mr. CASEY said this clause alone seems to c avey that before you hand over the land you must acquire the title to it, and another clause says that the Company may select lands anywhere they please, that is to say "land lying between parallels 49 and 57 degrees north latitude, or elsewhere, at the option of the Company." According to the 11th clause the Company have the right to select lands within or without the fertile belt as they choose, and as soon as they choose to select lands the Government are bound to give them, and at the same time to extinguish the Indian titles; that is, the Company may say on what lands the Government must extinguish the Indian titles.

Mr. MILLS said the lands vested in the Government were to be included in the lands in which the Indian titles had not been extinguished. The Government did not recognize in the Indians any other than a posse-sory title in the soil. Although there was no doubt this 12th section was intended to refer to the Peace River District where the Indian titles had not yet been extinguished, the words were sufficiently comprehensible to include the title to the Indian reservations within the 24 mile belt on each side, and Indian reservations where the titles had been generally extinguished over the country The hon, gentleman knew that at this moment there were in his office unsettled questions between the Hudson Bay Company and the Government with regard to the Indian titles, and it was not desirable to give rise to similar questions between the Government and the Syndicate. The Syndicate could have no objection to the clause being amended so as to make it clear that it was not intended to embrace Indian reservations which might fall within the 24 mile belt on each side of the railway or of the branch lines.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the titles must be extinguished before any land could be conveyed. There was no doubt about that. The land, after the title was so extinguished, was to be granted in aid of the railway. Now, if the hon, gentleman, as a lawyer, would take the whole of the contract and the whole of the schedule, he would see that the whole spirit of the contract was simply this: That wherever the lands, by possessory right or otherwise, belonged to other parties, the Company could not and would not claim the land. This was simply the ordinary provision, as in the charter of 1872. The Company were going across the plains where in some portions the title had not been extinguished by treaty, and there the Government agreed to extinguish the Indian title before they asked the Company to take the land.

Mr. CASEY said he could understand that, unless it were possible that some lands might be granted to this Company hereafter, on which the Indian title would be extinguished. there would be no use of inserting this clause; and it added estimate of what the extinguishment of these Indian fitles would cost us. It might cost us an Indian war.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 13,

Mr. BLAKE asked what would be the maximum deviation

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon, gentleman is not serious.

Mr. BLAKE. I am; I think it is important we should know.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER said they would not exceed the license which the hon, gentleman took in the Act of 1874. That Act fixed the commencement of the Canadian Pacific Railway "at or near" the south-east of Lake Nipissing, and the hon. gentleman's Government located it 40 miles from that point, adding at least $1,500,000 to the expenditure. He would promise that they would not exceed that deviation.

Mr. BLAKE said he did not know anything about that location. What it was material to know was the intention of the present Government, and not the acts and derelicts of a previous Government. The hon, gentleman stated that there would not be a deviation of more than 40 miles; from what point? From the terminal points, or the intervening points?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the Company would send their surveyors out and choose a line. They would submit it to the Government, and if it was a proper line, one in the interest of the country and the North-West, they would accept it; otherwise they would reject it.

Mr. BLAKE. But the hon. gentleman cannot give the maximum.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALO. No; because we have had no proposition from a company that does not exist as to where they are going to locate their line.

Mr. ANGLIN said the line of the railway as at present fixed had, after much care and cost, been agreed upon by both the late and the present Government, with the exception of the deviation by the latter to the south of Lake Manitoba. But they were now giving the Company the right to deviate as much as they liked, subject to the approval of the Governor in Council. The Minister of Railways said the Company would know better than the late Government or the present Government, or the engineers of both Governments where the line should run. Therefore, he thought some limit should be placed on the deviation. But he presumed the only court of appeal was not hon, gentlemen opposite, but the Syndicate themselves.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER said there was an ultimate court of appeal, and that was this House. If the Government failed to protect the public interest they would be amenable to this House -

Mr. BLAKE. But the mischief will be done.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. And that being the case would cause them to guard the public interest in every possible way. This Bill gave the Government the power to refuse to concur in any location which they did not believe in the interests of the country, and that power would be exercised to their best judgment when the time himself already located and for which he gave out contracts.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT said the hon. Minister of Railways had given out contracts for the construction of 200 miles west of Winnipeg, and he had decided that their location, at any rate, was in the interest of the country. He Mr. Casey.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER replied he was sorry he could not bind the Government to that extent. During the past season a very great deviation was made in the termination of the line by the examination during the past season, bringing the line further south than was intended a year ago when the contract was let, and when it was said that it might be subject to some considerable variations. It was only, comparatively, recently determined to bring the line to the south of Lake Manitoba. During the past season the location of the line had been improved very much, and a greater deviation than the latitude the hon. gentleman indicated had been used by the Government. It would not do to bind the Government to a fixed line that -might preclude them from the exercise of their judgment in still further improving the location.

Mr. MILLS said under this arrangement the Government and the Company may determine the location of this line all the way to the Rocky Mountains before the House meets again; and that control which he says the House has, in the last resort over the location of the railway, is one which would be of no svail. The explorations of Professor Macoun and others have shown that the character of the country of the south-west is much better than what was hitherto supposed to be. This Company may find that by going in a south-westerly direction and then skirting the base of the Rocky Mountains, they may find a larger quantity of land fit for settlement than they would by taking the direct line. That would cut off the possibility of constructing a road such as that of the Souris River Railway that has been projected. We know it would not be in the public interest if that change took place, because we have before us a Bill to construct a line in that direction by a company with comparatively little aid from the public, and if the road were deviated through this section it might destroy the possibility of our having the two roads. The House was entitled to know if any serious deviation in the proposed line was contemplated.

Clause agreed to.

Mr. BLAKE said, looking at the 15th clause in conjunction with sub-section a of clause 18 of schedule A, it was obvious the Bill intended to apply in the east of Lake Nipissing. The Company had the absolute right to build branch lines west of Lake Nipissing, but east of the lake required the authority of the Governor in Council. If that were not the case sub-section a of the 18th clause, would have no operation at all.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Perhaps it has no operation.

Mr. BLAKE. I assume the hon gentleman had a hand in drawing it, not a principal hand, but a hand.

Mr. CHARLTON said there seemed to be no prevision as to the quantity of land the Company may demand under this provision. What width of road would be permitted? - what amount of lard for statious, &c.?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER said the width of the road bed of the Canadian Pacific Railway was 100 feet, and the Government would apply the same rule to the Company as they would to themselves. So far as the land required for stations was concerned, that was a matter susceptible of being readily understood by the parties concerned.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH said it was evident that power was given to construct branch lines east of Lake Nipissing, because, under the 15th section, the Company have power to acquire other lines eastward and they become a portion of now asked the hon, gentleman whether he was prepared to the main line. Unless it was intended that the line shouldstate whether he would deviate to any considerable extent, be extended eastward to Montreal or Quebec, this classes say to the extent of five or six miles from the line which he would be unnecessary. If they should acquire the North Shore line they would have the power to construct branch lines from it without reference to this Parliament at all.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said the 14th clause gave power to construct branch lines from the main line which was defined in the contract, the schedule and the Bill before the House, from Lake Nipissing westward. The provision that they may afterwards extend their line does not affect what the contract, the schedule and this Bill define shall be the main line of the railway.

Mr. CASEY said they would, even in that case, have power to build branch lines in Ontario.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. West of Callendar Station.

Mr CASEY said, he thought it unfair that this powerful corporation, with all the peculiar and extraordinary powers conferred upon it, should have the right, without consulting Parliament, to introduce destructive rivalry with railways in Ontario and prevent the construction of other lines.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 15,

Mr. BLAKE wished to know if the words "north, within fifteen miles of latitude 49°" meant that no line should be built to within fifteen miles of latitude 49°.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is so.

Clause ugreed to.

On clause 19,

Mr. BLAKE wished to know if, in the event of the Company issuing land grant bonds, the only security the Government would hold would be the $5,000,000 of land grant bonds?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The land or the bonds. Clause agreed to.

On clause 4,

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT asked what was the meaning of the very extraordinary and remarkable power which it was proposed to give by words "all the franchises and powers necessary or useful to the Company to enable them to carry out, perform, enforce, use, and avail themselves of, every condition, stipulation, obligation, duty, right, remedy, privilege, and advantage agreed upon, contained or described in the said contract, are hereby conferred upon the Company." certainly was the most sweeping and extraordinary form of words which he had ever seen used in the course of a good many years experience. He would like to know what the words "are due to the Company" meant.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER said that the phrase explained itself-"useful to the Company to enable them to carry out i' and so forth.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It would not be of much good to give them anything which would be of no use.

Mr. BLAKE said that there was no doubt that the form of words here employed was an extraordinary one, and he did not think the leader of the Government would justify it, as he had justified a former clause, by saying it was usual. The form was the very widest that could possibly be used. There might be many things which might be useful to the Company in carrying out their objects, but which might not be in the public interests.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 9,

Mr. CASEY. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Rillways if he has any information as to the correctness or otherwise of a statement currently reported in the newspapers, as having been made by Mr. Hill and other members of the Syndicate, that it was intended to make St. Paul because I did not give the lie to anything he said; the headquarters of the Company, and that all the operations of the Company, except such as are pro forma, are to be carried on in that city.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have no reason to believe that there is the slightest foundation for the statement. I know that Mr. Hill has stated that a number of statements with regard to the Syndicate which are credited to the St. Paul newspapers, are unqualifiedly false. I have no doubt that the statement alluded to by the hon, gentleman is entirely false, and that it emanated from the same source as the others to which Mr. Hill referred.

Mr. CASEY. On what ground does the hon. gentleman make his denial?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon, gentleman wishes to know upon what ground. Upon the ground that from the very inception of this contract the most gross and unfounded falsehoods have been stated with regard to it; and also upon the ground of common sense, because as the hon, gentleman probably knows the Company have purchased an expensive establishment in Montreal.

Mr. CASEY said no doubt the papers have been furnished with a great many lies, but I do not think the papers of St. Paul could have any object in lying about a matter of this kind, for they are naturally friendly to the Syndicate and not likely to do anything adverse to their interests; yet they have furnished this information as a piece of news to the people of St. Paul. As to what common sense would require, it seems to me that it would be in the interests of the Company to keep their headquarters at the headquarters of their present business. An office in Montreal may be purchased and it may be sold; and it is just as likely that offices might be purchased for a purpose as that stories might be put into the newspapers for a purpose. I know that nominally they must have a place of business in Montreal, but they may have a place outside of Canada where their real business would be done. I think there is no reason to doubt that it would be to their interest to have their real place of business in St. Paul, and I think the Minister of Railways knows this as well as I do.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman closed his remarks with a gross and unqualified insult towards myself. He heard me state that I had no reason to believe that there was the slightest truth in the rumor which he mentioned, and he has ventured to give me the lie direct. I call upon the hon, gentleman to retract, and if he does not I shall ask Mr. Speaker to take the chair.

Mr. CASEY. I do not think the hon, gentleman understood my language in the sonse which I intended. I understood him to say that the chief place of business of the Company would necessarily be in Montreal, because-

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did not say that. I said the reason I had for believing so was that they had purchased a large place in Montreal.

Mr. CASEY. Yes; and the hon. gentleman said that it was common sense to believe that their place of business would be there—that he had no reason to believe that the headquarters of the Company would be in St. Paul. It was not in regard to that statement that I made my assertion. My assertion was that the real place of business was in St. Paul.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. And you said you believed the hon. Minister knew it, as well as you did.

Mr. CASEY. I did not understand the hon. Minister to deny that assertion in his former statement. I said I thought. the hon. Minister knew as well as I did that the great place of business would be in St. Paul.

An hon, MEMBER. Retract,

Mr. CASEY. I do not think there is anything to retract

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If the hon, gentleman takes it back—

Mr. CASEY. I do not take it back because I have explained its meaning.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. You should not have said it if you did not think it.

Mr. CASEY. I did say so and I did think so. The hon. gentleman misunderstood my words.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 15,

Mr. MILLS said this clause allowed the Company to construct their branch lines in any possible direction. It seemed to him they scarcely had the power to enable the Company to do that under the British North America Act. For instance, if it was proposed later to construct a railway in Ontario as a branch of this line, the House would have to make a declaration that the road, if it lay wholly within the Province, was of Dominion importance before they could deal with the question at all. The hon, gentleman by this Bill proposed to give power to construct roads which this House had no authority to charter. According to the British North America Act, this House, before chartering a particular road within the limits of a Province, should ascertain that it was of Dominion importance, and how could we declare that one of these branches was of a Dominion character or even a subordinate character, and until we knew that, we could not make this declaration.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said it was rather a hypercriticism on the part of his hon friend. Of course, if we could at once declare, by putting in a sentence stating that all branches feeding the Canadian Pacific Railway would be for the advantage of the Dominion, he thought that clause might well be put in the Bill and then we could give such power to the Company as it might desire. He did not think the point raised by the hon gentleman was worth the reason.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 16,

Mr. BLAKE asked whether any arrangement had been made or projected with reference to the Government lines of telegraph in the North-West and British Columbia, in so far as they were connected with the railway.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER said the Company had not acquired any portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway telegraph. An examination of the line to British Columbia was now being made, and when the Government received the report they would settle upon a policy in relation to the telegraph.

Mr. BUNSTER asked why it was that Port Moody had been made the terminus in British Columbia in place of Esquimalt as originally intended.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER said the Government in extending the road to Port Moody were doing as much as the finances would sllow. But they had to go to Port Moody before going to Esquimalt. They were moving in the right direction.

Mr. BUNSTER said the original plan was to locate the terminus at Esquimalt, and he believed the hon. Minister of Railways would yet have to bring the terminus there. All it required was a few more bonds.

Mr. BLAKE observed that the Company were entitled, and he thought they ought also to be obliged, to convey messages for the public along the line of telegraph. He thought it would be a serious matter if the Company had a telegraph line which they were not bound to keep open to the public, and if the public would have to be supplied by other and independent lines,

Mr. CASEY.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER said there was no doubt that every company who were compelled to construct a line of telegraph for their own convenience, would only be too glad to give the public the use of that line. He thought nothing compulsory was required in order to obtain that advantage for the public, as it was manifestly to the company's advantage to grant it. They would soon encounter competition if they refused to send messages for the public.

Mr. BLAKE failed to see how there could be competition in sending messages for the public if they would not send them. As the Syndicate and the Government were both agreed that it was to the mutual advantage to both the public and the Company that the telegraph line should be kept open as suggested, he should have preferred to see the little word "may" struck out and the little word "shall" inserted, so that the Company "shall undertake the transmission of messages for the public." But his hon, friend seemed to think it was quite unnecessary to order the Syndicate to do anything, that all that was necessary was to order the Government.

Mr. PLUMB observed that for so long a line as this Company were to operate, it was absolutely necessary that they should have the control of the telegraph line, and it would be manifestly unfair to compel them to take private messages, and subject themselves to damages for any mishaps which might occur in the send ng of these messages. He thought it might be left to the Company to take private messages when they could do so. It was well known that the railway companies, having telegraph offices throughout this country, gave their own messages the preference.

Mr. BLAKE said it was not his intention that the business of the public should have priority over the business of the railway, which was most important, but the provision might be made subject to the priority of the Company. He supposed an assurance would be given that it was not considered an infringement of the rights given to this Company, if at any future time a charter should be given to another company, or to the Government perhaps, to use the right of way of the railway for the purpose of erecting telegraph lines along it. It was obvious that in that stretch of country it was of great consequence that telegraph lines should be near the railway, and this Company should not have any exclusive right of the use of the road-bed for the erection of poles.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said that of course no exclusive right was given by the clause. It was a mere empowering clause. As they were giving the Company certain powers to build a railway, he did not think they should compel them to establish a telegraph system, as they would do by substituting "shall" for "may." They had asked for the additional power to send messages for the general public, but there could be no exclusive power given, and there was no exclusive power asked for. It would be very unfair to strike out "may" and insert "shall."

Mr. BLAKE said he did not desire that the word "shall" should apply to the construction and maintenance of a telegraph line, but, having constructed, maintained and worked it, that they "shall" open it to the public.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think we may well leave that to competition.

Mr. CASEY said it was evidently intended to give the company the charter of a telegraph as well as a railway Company. Besides having the monopoly in the North-West they would have the right to acquire lines in the Provinces of Ontario, Quebec, the Lower Provinces and the neighboring parts of the United States.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 21,

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT drew the attention of the Minister of Railways to the fact that he had promised to introduce a new clause into the Consolidated Railway Act which would alter the significance that would otherwise attach to this clause, also that the House should have a declaration or a Bill laid before it, showing what amendment was proposed to be made to the general Act.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER said he had already given notice of a B ill which would embrace a clause that hon, gentlemen opposite would find would meet the case as stated. The Bill would be open to such amendments as might be deemed necessary. It would not be unalterable like the laws of the Medes and Persians.

Mr. BLAKE said the hon, gentleman need not go so far back as the Medes and Persians for a comparison. He might have said equally well it would not be like the Syndicate contract.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 25,

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew) said this clause provided for the acquisition by the Company of the Canada Central Railway from Callendar station eastward. Under the Order in Council of 18th April, 1878, it was provided that certain other roads should have running powers over the Canada Central from a certain point to Lake Nipissing. Would those powers be continued, provided the Canadian Pacific Railway acquired the Canada Central road? We desire to enquire whether the Canada Central Company had entered into the agreement provided for by the Order in Council of April 18th, 1877, and if so, whether the obligations of that agreement upon the Canada Central would be continued, provided the Canada Central became part of the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER said the obligations which devolved upon the Canada Central would, if the railways were amalgamated, be required to be carried out.

Mr. BLAKE. Including this one? Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE asked if the hon. Minister of Railways knew, as a matter of fact, that the agreement referred to by the hon. member for Renfrew (Mr. White) had been executed?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not remember.

Mr. BLAKE said if that had not been done, the agreement should be executed before the Act received the Royal assent.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 26,

Mr. BLAKE said the clause was of the widest possible character, and would include ocean as well as inward transportation.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER said it was the same clause as in other charters of other Pacific Railway Companies.

Clause agreed to.

On the preamble,

Mr. BLAKE said there was a very important omission in the Bill which he thought could be remedied consistent with its provisions, viz. that specific and detailed accounts of the operations connected with the various departments of the Pacific Railway should be submitted to Parliament. No doubt Parliament pose sed the power, with respect to this corporation, as to any competition at this time or at any time, to demand various accounts and statements. Experience on the other side of the line had shown that this was exceedingly important with reference to the question of calculating what was the capital of the Company and what were the tolls. The utmost difficulty was experienced in obtaining a statement as to what was the actual cost of the Union Pacific particularly with respect to this question of tolls, and three or four Commissions were appointed to ascertain the facts. A clause should be inserted in the present Bill compelling the Pacific Railway Company to bring down, within fifteen days of the opening of each Session, a detailed account, showing what the receipts were from the Government subsidy; 2nd, profits from land sales; 3rd, from other sales; what the expenditure was on capital account, on construction, and also on administration of the land. Inasmuch as that would be an operating as well as a constructing Company, it ought to bring down an account showing the operating expenses and operating receipts, in fact, everything in the way of working expenses and receipts. There should also be a statement of the bonds issued by the Company each year; also copies of the contracts for construction entered into each year; and copies of all tariffs, of tolls, and charges, and changes in tolls made during the year. That statement was one that should be commenced at once and go on for ever.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER said it would not be necessary to delay the Bill for the purpose of making such provision as was suggested, because he had already announced that he would propose extensive amendments in the Consolidated Railway Act, when this question could be fully considered and all the points raised by the hon. gentlemen could be met. Most of the points are already provided for in the general Act and he (Sir Charles Tupper) would have no objection, if the House would have noue, to make those provisions specially applicable to such an extensive corporation as the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. BLAKE said that was an exceedingly satisfactory statement. He had prepared a rough draft as an amendment which he would be glad to forward to the Minister of Railways with a view to its insertion in the present Bill.

The Committee rose and reported Bill with amendments. House resumed.

Amendments concurred in.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that the Bill be read the third time at the next sitting of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 12:40 o'clock, a.m.,) the House adjourned.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 40) to incorporate the Bay of Quinte Railway and Navigation Company.—(Mr. White, Hastings.)

Bill (No. 41) to incorporate the Hull Mines Railway Company.—(Mr. Cameron, Huron.)

PETITIONS FOR PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. DREW moved that the time for receiving petitions for Private Bills be extended to Thursday, 10th February.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. DOMVILLE. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to bring a matter before the House which Parties interested in vilifying country are so unjust it illconcerns myself. me through the becomes me to take any notice of this attack, but at the same time I cannot allow it to be sent broadcast through the country that I have neglected my duties as a member of this House. I will read an article in the St. John Telegraph. That paper, which has a special reporter here, has attacked me every year; this is not the first time I have had to bring that paper before the House for circulating not only what is perfectly untrue, but which it can only have been done with the intention to damage me in the country and place me in a false position. The article also refers to you, Mr. Speaker, and if your memory serves you, you will see that the part you took on that occasion is also entirely inaccurately stated. The paper says:

"Mr. KING, on taking the floor to move an amendment, was rudely ther mar. King, on taking the moor to move an amendment, was rudely by several members, who drowned his voice by noises which they made despite the calls of "order" by the Speaker, and the protests of the leader of the Opposition. In this business a New Brunswick M.P., Mr. Domville, was most prominent. He shirked the vote on twenty-three amendments."

I never lost a vote in this House on the amendments. That is, however, equally as correct as a great many other statements made in the interest of the other side of the House. The article continues:

"But entering the House in evening costume, and in an excited manner, while Mr. King was speaking, Mr. Domville sh uted out: 'He is reading his speech.'"

I did enter the House in evening costume. I had the honor of dining with His Excellency the Governor General that evening; and as we are accustomed in our part of the world to wear dress clothes, and as ever since I have gone into society I have worn a dress coat, I hope I may be pardoned for having entered the House in that costume. The article proceeds:

"Mr. KING. I am not reading my speech but only my notes, and I can understand the hon gentleman's horror of notes. (Cheers, inter-"Mr. DOMVILLE. I say that the hon, gentleman is reading his

"Mr. DUMY ILLE. I say that the lack green."

"Mr. KING (holding up a page or two of paper.) Mr. Speaker and hon members can see whether or not.

"Mr. King proceeded. He was reading an extract from Sandford Fleming's report in proof or support of his position. There was a cry from Ministerial Benches that Mr. King was making the extract part of his speech, and was therefore reading it.

"Mr. Blake invoked the interference of the Speaker at such unwarrantable conduct. it being perfectly legitimate to read such extracts as Dr.

Mr. Didde invoke the interference of the Speaker at such inwarrantable conduct, it being perfectly legitimate to read such extracts as Dr. Tupper had read long extracts from Mr. Mackenzie's speeches.

"Before the Speaker could get in a word Messrs. Domville and Plumb again raise the cry, 'The hon. member is reading his speech.'

"The Speaker now, at last, gave both members a cutting rebuke."

"'I can judge of that matter for myself, whereupon the two honorable and distinguished members subsided; Mr. Domville, however, uttered the dreadful threat he would make Mr. King's constituents acquainted with the manner in which he (King) had delayed the House at

All I object to in that article is the statement sent through the country by the reporter of the St. John Telegraph in this House, that I shirked the vote. Either he was absent, or he did not know or attend to his duty, and I wish to have that statement contradicted in the country. In the next place, any insinuation of my being in a disorderly condition is an unwarranted attack on the privileges of this House; and as it is not the first time it has been done, I shall have to insist that the reporter of that paper must behave himself while admitted to the privileges of the House. The reporters have a great many privileges. They have the use of the readingroom and restaurant; they have a room in this building where they can be made comfortable. Every attention is Mr. DREW.

paid to their comfort, and they must behave themselves. Unless something is done in regard to this matter, I shall have to move, every time the reporter of that paper is in the gallery, that there are strangers in the House. I would not do it if this were the first occasion, but it has happened so often, and we must be protected, at all events, from those who are in the building on sufferance.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved the third reading of Bill (No. 37) respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. BLAKE. I shall trouble the House but a few moments, since the discussion which has taken place on the several stages of this subject has exhausted all those topics on which it would be proper to address the House. In that view, our debate yesterday was confined almost exclusively to the discussion of those points which had been but imperfectly elucidated, and to obtain the further information as to the import of the clau-es of the measure as it was impossible to extract until the Bill came before us in Committee of the Whole. There is no object in challenging once more a decision of the House upon the various propositions contained in this Bill. The record of the views of hon. members deliberately stated, exists and will remain, and a repetition of it would be useless. I simply desire, to-day, to say that the reason why the discussion upon the measure itself has been so conducted, is because we thought it better, on both sides of the House, that the discussion should be concluded as far as possible at the earlier stages; and in placing in your hands an amendment which I desire formally to record, I do so, not with a reference to any of the points which have already been pronounced upon, but with reference to one which was brought up yesterday. I do not intend to renew at any length the debate upon that subject. It seems to me to be a very important one. I myself have no doubt at all upon the soundness of the conclusion which I ventured to state. I entertain no doubt at all that the money subsidy is, according to its true meaning as prescribed in the contract, of less value than that which hon. gentlemen propose that it should represent, in case the arrangement for its being turned into a fund for the payment of interest coupons is adopted. The calculation on the basis of a present money payment of $2,000,000 being commuted for an annuity payable half yearly for twenty years, at four per cent. interest, would produce $913.393 every half year, or a total, as the representative of the $25,000,000, of a little over $36,500,000. But if the sum of $25,0 0,000, instead of being presently payable, were payable in ten yearly instalments, which is the hypothetical calculation, and is the nearest we can adopt, that would be worth a present sum, calculating interest at four per cent., of $20,277,250, making a difference in the present value of $4,722, 50; and the annuity which the lesser sum, or the present value of the $25,000,000, would produce, would be, instead of $913,000 half yearly, but $741,250 half yearly. There is, therfore, a difference of about $4.750,000, according as you take the nearest calculation we can assume as to the present value of the $25,000,000, or as you ignore the circumstance that that $25,000,000 is not presently payable. Now the Bill in this case is more objectionable than the contract. The language of the contract, although not correct in my view, is more easily sus-ceptible of a sound interpretation than the language of the Bill. The Bill states that the Government may at the option of the Company convert the $25,000,000 and the interest accruing thereon into a fund which is to be turned into four per cent. coupons. I do not intend to divide the House upon this amendment, but I wish to record my view as to the proper structure of that clause of the Bill, and I therefore move:

That the Bill be not! now read a third time, but that it be re-committed to a Committee of the Whole, with instructions that they have power to amend Clause 3 of the Bill by inserting after the words "may convert the same and any interest accruing thereon into a fund"—the words following:—"equal according to actuarial calculation to the value of the said money subsidy, having regard to the times at which the same would be payable to the Company under sub-section b of section 9 of the said contract."

Amendment negatived on division.

Mr. BUNSTER. I do not intend to take up the time of the House upon the injustice that is being done to that part of the Dominion I have the honor to represent, namely, the Vancouver constituency. I have to draw the attention, particularly the hon, the Prime Minister, to the great injustice that is being done to his constituents in not having included the Vancouver section of the road in the contract with the Syndicate. I am certain that that hon. gentleman must to-day feel aggrieved that he did not do so, after the success he has met with in passing the Bill through the House. I, for one, cannot for a moment imagine how it is that he has left that section of the road out, when it would be from the very commencement a paying institution. To-day there is more commerce for that road than many hon, members of this House have any conception of. We are, to-day, exporting from the Nanaimo coal mines alone 1,000 tons of coal daily, and which would probably pass over the road. That in itself would make the road a paying concern. Ever since British Columbia joined this Confederation it has been neglected. There has been no attention paid to her. The terms have not been in any sense carried out. The treaty obligations with British Columbia have been ignored both by the late, and, I am sorry to say, by the present Government. The present Government have made two sad mistakes. They at first located the terminus at Esquimalt, and I have been informed, whether credibly or not, that they have changed the terminus from Esquimalt to Port Moody. If they have done so, they have certainly done a great injustice to Esquimalt, and not only so, but to the Province of British Columbia and the Dominion at large. All business men know the importance of having a good port as the terminus of the railway, and Esquimalt is the best port in British Columbia, except Nanaimo. In 1873 Mr. Marcus Smith located the terminus of the Esquimalt Road by sticking down a post; but nothing has been done from that day to this, except the landing of steel rails previous to the last election, which were afterwards removed to the Fraser River, where they have remained ever since. If these rails had been used they would have paid for themselves by this time in the traffic of the road. I will rest my case on its merits, and I will trust to the intelligence of the House to instruct the Government to go on immediately with the construction of the road on Vancouver's Island. I therefore move:

That the Bill be not now read a third time but that it be resolved, that this House while agreeing with the general terms of the proposed contract with a Syndicate for the construction of the Canadian Pacific contract with a Syndicate for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, is nevertheless of the opinion that provision should have been made for the building of that section of the Canadian Pacific Railway known as the Nanaimo and Esquimalt portion thereof, on Vancouver Island, as stipulated for in the terms agreed upon between the Dominion Government and Lord Carnarvon, Colonial Secretary, as follows:—

"1. That the railway from Esquimalt to Nanaimo shall be commenced as soon as possible and completed with all practical despatch.

"4. That $2,000,000 a year, and not $1 500,000, shall be the minimum expenditure on railway works within the Province from the date at which the surveys are sufficiently completed to enable that amount to be expended on construction. In naming this amount, I understand that which the surveys are sunciently completed to enable that amount to be expended on construction. In naming this amount, I understand that it being alike the interest and the wish of the Dominion Government to urge on with all seed the completion of the works now to be undertaken, the anual expenditure will be as much in excess of the minimum of $2,000,000, as in any year may be found practicable."

Mr. SPEAKER ordered the members to be called in.

Mr. RYAN (Montreal). I rise to a point of order. The motion has not been seconded.

Mr. RYMAL. Too late; the members are called in.

I named Mr. Pinsonneault as the Mr. SPEAKER. seconder.

Mr. MILLS. I rise for the purpose of moving:

That the Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be re-committed to a Committee of the Whole with instructions that they have power to add the following clause:—" No amendment of this Act or of the Charter hereby authorized, which may be hereafter made, shall be deemed an infringement of the privileges granted by this Act or of the

It is very important that this House should retain control over its future action. We know that no legislation can bind the future action of this Parliament or of a future parliament; but that we may act consistently with the principles of parliamentary practice, it is very desirable that this House should not, by proposing to grant a charter affecting public works for a long series of years, appear to take that course. In the ten years during which this contract is to run, very important changes may take place in the financial condition of the country, and the Parliament which succeeds this one ought to be as free to judge what is best in the public interest, as hon, gentlemen who occupy the Treasury Benches, or we who are legislating for the country at the present time. There are provisions in this charter which will not be initiated or acted upon until after the period for which this Parliament is elected expires, and a new Parliament takes its place, and it is therefore desirable that that Parliament should be free to judge of what is best in the public interest; and that it should not be in the power of this corporation, when Parliament proposes to vote some action or adopt some measure, which may, in some degree, alter the provisions of this charter, to claim damages in consequence. On these grounds I move the amendment I have placed in your hands.

Amendment negatived on division

Mr. CHARLTON. Before this Bill goes through its final stage, I desire to say a few words by way of final protest against it. I have often been quoted in reference to the views I held on the measure introduced by my hon, friend the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) in 1878. In looking over the reports of the speeches on that subject, I fell upon a clause in a speech of my hon. friend from Niagara (Mr. Plumb). I do not often take the trouble to look over that hon. gentleman's speeches; to go through the whole of them would be rather a lengthy task for so short a life as mine; but I did accidentally light on this extract from his speech on that occasion:

"They were told by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) that the American system of land grants for the building of railways had been generally adopted in the West. There could be no doubt about this, or the question that the population followed the construction of railways in the Western States; but it was well known that nearly all the best lands of the West had been, by means of railway charters, absorbed and monopolized by rings of railway contractors and speculators. He believed that this Bill would establish the same condition of things in the North-West Territories and in Manitoba. He objected, upon principle, to the building of railways by contractors. He considered that roads placed in the hands of contractors to be built were imperfectly built. They were not well constructed, and they were not such roads as we wanted in this country. He could also say that, by this scheme, in view of the present price of iron and labor, the bonus that would be paid by the Government would nearly build this road, and give them free of cost to the contractors who were fortunate enough to go there to build them." "They were told by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) tors who were fortunate enough to go there to build them.

These were the views of my hon. triend in 1878. They scarcely need comment. One clause of my speech on that occasion has been quoted with great unction by speakers on the opposite side. It is as fo'lows:-

"Some of the railways, had perhaps been subsidized more than was necessary, perhaps more land had been given than was advisable; but capitalists would not embark their money unless they had a prospect of a fair return, and it was folly to haggle with them about an unimportant difference when important interests were at stake."

In that speech I distinctly took the ground that railways in the United States had been subsidized to a greater extent than was necessary. My speech on that occasion has been repeatedly quoted during the course of this debate. I wish now to make a comparison between the extent of aid granted to railways in the United States - aid that was in excess of effected had the offer made by a responsible company-Mr. BUNSTER.

the wants of those roads—and the extent of the aid that it is proposed to grant to the Canadian Pacific Railway. I have taken some pains to ascertain the land grants to every railway corporation that has received land grants up to the present day. I find that with the exception of what are known as the Pacific railways and the railways on the Pacific slope, these land grants have been very moderate indeed. I find that forty-six companies. embracing a mileage of 13,634 miles, received 51,681,329 acres, and these companies embrace all, save the Union Pacific, Central Pacific, Northern Pacific, Atlantic Pacific, Oregon Branch, Oregon and (alifornia Southern Pacific, and Oregon Central. These grants of 51,000,000 acres were made in alternate sections, and subject to the companies running the chance of the lands having been previously sold by the Government; and it is estimated that, on this account, they will not realize over 37,000,000 acres. But estimating that the companies receive the full amount, what is the average grant per mile? It amounts to 3,790 acres per mile. I find that the land grant of the Illinois Central amounted to 3,680 acres per mile: the Burlington and Missouri road, 1,370; the Rock Island Pacific, 1,200 in these two cases that is the amount actually received by the roads—the Cedar Rapids and Minnesota, 4,740; the Jackson, Lansing and Saginaw, 3,680; the Chicago and North-Western, 2,331; the Wisconsin Central, 1,661; the St. Paul and Pacific, now known as the St. Paul, Minneapolis and Manitoba, belonging to this very Company, whose interests are being promoted by this Bill, 6,342; the Winona and St. Peter, 4,33). These are a fair specimen of the average rate of aid given in land grants to the various corporations whose interests were promoted in this way, and their average, as I have said, is 3,790 acres per mile. The highest land grant given by the United States is that given to the Northern Pacific road, which amounted to about 47,000,000 acres, and this embraces all variety of land, without selection, including part of the American desert. Good authorities estimate that the Company will not realize from the grant of. 47,000,000 acres, over 15,000,000 to 20,000,000 acres of arable land. If that is the case, the aid granted to the Northern Pacific, the most heavily subsidized of the American roads, is less in actual value than that granted the Canadian Pacific road; and, with the exception of the Northern Pacific, none of the American roads have been aided by land grants of over 12,800 acres per mile. We find that the Canadian Pacific Railway, in addition to receiving a land grant, greater in value per mile than any American road has ever received, receives $12,500 cash per mile for that portion of the road which the contractors are to build, and the works to be constructed by the Government, which, with the surveys amount to $31,000,000, being equivalent to $15,500 per mile on the portion the Syndicate are to build; or the aid that the Cana lian Pacific Railway receives over the most favored and most heavily subsidized American line amounts to over $28,000 cash per mile on the portion they are to build. In addition to its land and cash subsidy, this Company receives freedom from taxation and from duty on material, and monopoly of transportation in the North-West for twenty years. The terms of this contract are so monstrous that it is almost surprising hon. gentlemen opposite should insist on forcing it through the House. Although the debate on the whole has been conducted in a spirit of fairness, they have passed this measure in a domineering spirit, as was evinced last night. when not a single suggestion would be accepted, and clauses that were manifestly absurd the Government insisted on retaining unaltered. The course of the Opposition in this debate may perhaps be challenged. The most serious charge brought against the Opposition was that they had made a midnight conspiracy to save this country many millions of dollars. What would be the amount of saving

Company more responsible than the Syndicate—that has put ing of the unproductive portion of the road. We up $500,000 more money than the amount contemplated to have been told that it is necessary to endow this be put up by the Syndicate, been accepted? It is certain that we should have saved $3,000,000 cash and 3,000,000 acres, worth at the lowest calculation $6,000,000. It is certain that this Company would have had to pay taxes on whatever length of road they constructed, and their taxes on the main line and branches could not have amounted ultimately to less than $250,000 per annum, which at four per cent, would represent, capitalized, $7,250,000. The Company would also have to pay taxes on the lands granted to them. We can only conjecture what this would amount to. The Chicago and Rock Island road last year paid fourteen cents per acre tax upon its lands. If we estimate that this Company would pay only one cent per acre for twenty years, it would amount to $5,000,000. The duties on cars, locomotives, rails, iron, bridge material, wire, and various other articles the Company will use, would at the lowest estimate have amounted to $1,500,000 more, making a total of $22,750,000, which this Government have recklessly thrown away. They have insisted in carrying through a contract which is, at least, twenty-two and three-quarter millions of dollars worse for the country than an offer which has been made by a responsible company—a company more responsible than the one which is being chartered, and upon terms which, though so less favorable to the Company, would still have afforded them a large profit. The Government refused to insert in the charter a provision to the effect that the Company should not count the money aid given by the Government as part of the capital upon which they could make ten per cent, dividends before the Government should have power to regulate the tolls. I presume, on reflection, that this will be viewed as a matter of no consequence, because it is quite easy for a Company to manage such matters by subsidiary organizations, such as car shops, by the purchasing of supplies at two or three times their regular price, by watered stock, by building branch lines, and in various other ways-I say by these methods it will be perfectly easy for the Company to swell the amount of their capital to any figure they choose. So that even if a provision of the kind we demand were inserted it would possibly be perfeetly nugatory. We have been told by hon, gentlemen opposite that the new Syndicate is a sham, that it is a political dodge; but the country will not believe that, because, if the Government believed it, it was their duty to have tested and proved their belief. If the new Company was formed, as hon. gentlemen say, for political purposes, and did not mean to carry out their offer, it would have been an easy thing for the Government to demonstrate that fact, and they would then have placed themselves in a strong position, while their refusal to do so was tantamount to an acknowledgement that they did not believe the assertion that they made. They have told us that they were bound to go on with the contract. Why, Sir, an agent making a bargain for his principal does not bind that principal by his acts. The acts of the agent are referred to the principal for ratification just as these hon, gentlemen should have referred to us the result of their negotiations, and it would not follow, in either case, that if the principal disapproved of the agent's acts the agent must be discharged. The Government would not necessarily have lost their seats if they had given up the contract made with the first Syndicate, if it was demonstrated that it was not in the interests of the country. But despite all the palpable objections that have been raised to this contract; despite the fact that with their eyes wide open we find them making a contract $20,000,000 to $25,000,000 worse for the country than one they might have made, in a few hours more the blindness of party bondage will have made this monstrous contract the law of the land. Various arguments have been advanced to justify the build- the exhibition we saw last night, hon, gentlemen opposite 100

Syndicate with a large grant, because a portion of this road will not now, and probably never will, pay running expenses. Now, Sir, I would like to ask what good there is in investing money in an enterprise which will not pay; and what good is there in building a line north of Lake Superior which will not pay its expenses, especially when we can have a better line for nothing? Why the Government have committed themselves to so mad a scheme, whether it is from infatuation or something else, it is not for us to say. Those of us who have the interests of Canada at heart, have been seeking to build up a nation here, and to demonstrate, side by side with the United States, the superiority of these institutions we have inherited from Great Britain. The experience is an interesting one—one which those who wish well to the human race desire to see worked out under the most favorable circumstances. But I say that by the action of the Government of the day, in making a great monopoly supreme in more than half of the Dominion, and in handing the people over to its tender mercies, bound and helpless, they have gone very far towards insuring the failure of that experiment. No party could play more directly into the hands of the disloyalists and the annexationists than have the party who now occupy the Treasury Benches by their action in this matter. They have made many mistakes and absurd blunders in their time: they threw away $30,000,000 on the Intercolonial; they made an absurd bargain with British Columbia; they gave away valuable territorial rights in the Washington Treaty: they brought disgresses and hymilicities on Treaty; they brought disgrace and humiliation on this country by their action in the Pacific scandal; they, last Session, introduced into the North-West a land policy which was most detrimental to the best interests of the country; but the worst and greatest of all their mistakes and blunders is the crowning blunder which will be perpetrated when this contract shall have been ratified. We, on this side, number very small on the division list; but I say that the fifty odd members who are sitting on the Opposition benches to-day, represent the wishes and views of a vast majority of the people of Canada; and the day will come when the haughty Ministry, with their subservient followers, who are determined to carry through this Bill without admitting one jot or iota of change, will have to stand before the bar of intelligent public opinion, and, in my humble opinion, they will be rejected by the people. Until that day there is no hope for redress—until that day we must continue to drift on as we are drifting towards the goal of ruin.

Mr. PLUMB. 1 do not think I can permit the attack which the hon member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), has made to pass unnoticed, even though, in replying to it. I should—with, however, the greatest reluctance—trespass upon the patience of my friends and the time of the House. I did not think that at this stage of the debate, even that hon gentleman would have ventured to repeat the statements which he has just made on the floor of this Honse and provoke a reply. I did not think that that hon. gentleman would have ventured to mislead the House, and to mislead the country at this last critical moment, when his leader had just now stated that the debate had virtually closed, and when we expected to take the question without again provoking discussion. But, Sir, I cannot sit still and allow that hon. gentleman's statement to pass unchallenged. I rise to say that he has made a statement, with respect to land grants to railways in the United States, which is utterly misleading, and I would be doing injustice to his intelligence if I did not venture to state that I think he knows it is

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order,

Mr. PLUMB. I am quite in order; and I think that, after ought to be very careful before they challenge utterances from this side which are strictly within parliamentary rule. The hon gentleman read a statement of the grants to railways in the United States. He omitted purposely the Northern Pacific, he omitted purposely the Union Pacific, he omitted purposely several others of the larger railways in the statement of the average acreage per mile of those grants, and he took the Illinois central as a fair type of railways subsidized by lands. He knows that the land grant to that road was made by the State of Illinois. The State held a certain quantity of public land; certain private parties went into the enterprise of building the railway as a speculation. and they went to the Legislature, and by means of lobbying they persuaded the Legislature to give them a land grant. This grant was simply a bonus; the road could have been built without it; and, besides, it was not the fashion in those days to subsidize a railway line, especially like that one which ran through the heart of the State and the best part of it. The hon, gentleman knows very well that, in order to obtain that land from the State of Illinois, large concessions were made by the men who got the grant. That, Sir, is a specimen of the kind of argument which the hon. gentleman has employed to mislead the House, and through the House to mislead the country. The hon, gentleman knows that he has selected the smallest grants given to railways, he knows that these grants were doled out by the State Legislatures, and he knows that many of them were not given by the States at all. He knows, also, that they were bought and lobbied through. He understands well what kind of machinery was going on to grasp at the lands of Michigan and the other States that remained. I am perfectly willing to stand by the statement I made, that a contractor's road is a poor road. I had reference, and the hon. gentleman knows it, to roads that are built in the United States without purpose, except the purpose of floating bonds and making unfair profits out of the bondholders, upon whose hands these roads usually fall. Such railways gridironed the whole of the United States, and they brought enormous losses upon those who invested their money in them. If the hon gentleman will look at the statistics he will find that within the last two years, more than 23,000 miles of railway in the United States, out of the 87,000 miles that were in existence in 1879. have gone into bankruptcy, and that the losses amount to hundreds of millions. Yet hon gentlemen on the other side would persuade us that there is a gigantic system of railway monopoly in the United States, which is sucking the life blood out of the people. Of the men who have put money into those roads, three fourths are to-day without a dividend. The average dividend upon the whole railway system of the United States is under three per cent. Yet we are told, today, that the contract which we are about to ratify is a shameful one, because we have subsidized a party of gentlemen by a lesser sum than the average cost of western roads in the United States, and they are undertaking a scheme which it will tax their utmost energies to bring to a successful completion. I am sorry to see hon. gentlemen on the other side take the stand they do. They know as well as we do that the offer of the second Syndicate could not be accepted without involving the resignation of the present Government. That is why the second Syndicate were so free to underbid the Syndicate which the Government had accepted. They knew perfectly well that the present Ministry could not accept their offer, that they were in honor bound by the contract they had entered into. The hon. leader of the Opposition, and some of the gentlemen also who signed that paper, know parliamentary rules too well to suppose that the Government could stand for one instant after they had withdrawn from the contract they solemnly entered into, or after they had been defeated in the House upon the measure by a majority. Every man of Parliamentary knowledge understood that, and the leader of the Opposition misled—I do not say intentionally misled—the people and the lignominiously out of office—to win their way back to these Mr. PLUMB.

public when he hinted that the withdrawal of the first contract, or the essential modification of its terms, would not involve the necessity of the resignation of the Government. We -the Parliament of Canada-were perfectly free to accept or reject the contract. We understood perfectly well that Parliament was not bound to ratify it; but we knew that if the second Syndicate was accepted, it could only be accepted by a set of gentlemen who had pledged themselves absolutely to the abandonment of the through route, and to throw the traffic of this country into the hands of the Americans on the south side of Lake Superior. We knew perfectly well that the cunning little clauses in the proposition of the new Syndicate, and the variations so important but so artfully worded-from the terms of the agreement they had plagiarized, variations which were so significant-meant exactly that they intended not to build the difficult portions of the line; that they never would be held by the gentlemen opposite to build those portions; and that it was never expected, when they signed that paper, that they would have to build them; and I do not think three-fourths of that Syndicate thought they would ever be required to build a railroad at all. They never saw an official plan, or profile, or an estimate, and some signers never saw the proposal they signed by proxy, and careful men do not act in that way—and many of them are careful men—and would not risk $5,000 in any project. I challenge any gentleman on the opposite side of the House to say that this is not the fair construction of the whole proceeding. Upon what possible principle, then, can you say that the second Syndicate made a more favorable offer than the gentlemen who were willing to take the responsibility of building the whole line and of operating it afterwards? If the recond Syndicate were to be relieved from operating the difficult portions of the road, they could afford to construct the remainder for less money. That was the whole secret. From beginning to end it was an attempt to spring upon this House something which was almost unworthy the tactics even of a fourth-rate pot-house politician. If the second Syndicate offer was bond ride why did not the hon. gentlemen opposite, who were so anxious to get it before the House, adhere to it. They saw the hole they were getting into, and withdrew from it? This was because they discovered at last that the whole plot was seen through. But they have committed themselves to that offer and we shall hold them to it. We shall say that it was never a bond fide offer to construct, maintain and operate the whole Pacific Railway. That is the entire argument in respect to the new Syndicate, and I am indebted to my hon. friend for having given me an opportunity to present it, by making the statement to the House which he has made in a most imprudent manner. The great Reform party has been condensed into a small minority by a process of mismanagement, by a process I do not like to describe exactly, for my description might involve unparliamentary language, but it is a process which has been going on from the day they came into power, and has disgusted the people with the very name of that party. It is the mere fragment of a party, now on the Opposition benches, which my hon, friend boldly asserts represents the public sentiment of the country. Why, hon, gentlemen, after drumming together every man they could find, every woman probably who was willing to sign, and every school child, managed to get up petitions against the first Syndicate, and they claim that such petitions represent public opinion. They have manufactured resolutions and sent them into the country, and those resolutions have been passed at partizan meetings where fair discussion was gagged, and they say that such resolution so passed represent public opinion. The hon, gentleman asserts that at the coming elections he and his friends on the Opposition benches are, in some mysterious manner, to revolutionize the country upon this special question. Well, at the very commencement of this Parliament, so eager were those gentlemen-after they had been turned benches, to get hold of that Treasury which they had depleted, to get hold of that Treasury marked by deficits year after year through the mismanagement of the then Finance Minister, and through the reckless expenditure which was carried on during the whole five years of the Reform Administration—so eager were they to get back so ludicrously restive and unwilling to accept the situation with a show of the dignity that wins respect for misfortune, that they often hinted to us that there was a reaction in public opinion which would drive the present occupants from office long before Parliament expired. Nothing came of that prediction; it was just about as sound and well founded as the prediction which has now been made by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). Hon. gentlemen opposite are famous for winning their battles before they fight them; they are famous for the triumphs they achieve before the actions have commenced; and I can remember that up to the very day of the elections of 1878, they claimed not only that they would keep what seats they had in Ontario when they went into the contest, but that they would wrest thirteen seats from us in that noble Province. That was the last prophecy of the Globe, made on the morning of polling The prediction of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) we will have to accept in the same sense. The hon, gentleman may speak for the fragment of a party which, torn by dissensions within, is in such exigency and such strait, that it actually turns back upon itself, within this very Session, and eats its own words. But I can tell the hon, gentleman that the lack of himself and his leader, from the beginning to the end, has been of that political instinct which flows out of honest convictions of that consistent action which enables a man who is taking a straightforward course, to feel the pulse of the public and to know whether he stands in accord with it or not; and that political instinct in the new leader of the Opposition has never been manifested in any such degree as to entitle him to be called a leader of men. I know it, and any man who has watched the career of the hon. gentleman knows it. On the other hand, I say that the great leader of the Conservative party knows that the people accepted him as one who had taken a consistent course throughout, and we know that the people take at their own true worth the hollow promises, hollow shams and hollow pretences of the hon. gentlemen who attempted to manufacture public opinion against him For one moment I will stop to show the nature of the petitions which were sent in by the Chartists to the British Parliament, and I believe a great many of the petitions produced before us against the contract are tarred with the same stick, for I understand that in one petition alone there are 137 repetitions of the same name, written by the same hand, and ab uno disce omnes. author of the "History of Our Own Times" says:

"The great Chartist petition itself, which was to have made so profound an impression on the House of Commons, proved as utter a failure as the demonstration on Kensington Common."

I may say that the petitions presented here have proved, and will prove, as great a failure as the demonstrations that were got up through the country by hon. gentlemen opposite during the recess. The writer continues:

"Mr. O'Connor in presenting this portentous document boasted that it would be found to have five million seven hundred thousand signatures in round numbers. The calculation was made in very round numbers indeed. The Committee on Public Petitions were requested to make a minute examination of the document and to report to the House of Commons. The committee called in the service of a little army of law-stationers' clerks, and went to work to analyze the signatures. They found, to begin with, that the whole number of signatures, genuine or otherwise, fell short of two millions. But that was not all. The committee found in many cases that whole sheets of the petition were signed by the one hand, and that eight per cent. of the signatures were those of women. It did not need much investigation to prove that a large proportion of the signatures were not genuine. The name of the Queen, of Prince Albert, of the Duke of Wellington, Sir Robert Peel. Lord John Russell, Colonel Sibthorp, and various other public personages, appeared again and again on the Chartist roll. Some of these eminent persons would appear to have carried their zeal for the people's charter so far as to keep signing their names untiringly all over the petition. A large number of yet stranger allies would seem to have been drawn to the cause of the charter. 'Cheeks the Marine' was a personage very familiar at that time to the readers of apt. Marryat's sea stories; and the name of that mythical hero appeared with bewildering iteration in the petition. So did 'Davy Jōnes'; so did various persons describing themselves as Pugnose, Flatnose, Wooden-legs, and by other such epithets acknowledging curious personal defects. We need not describe the laughter and scorn which these revelations produced. There really was not anything very marvellous in the discovery. The petition was got up in great haste and with almost utter carelessness. Its sheets used to be sent anywhere, and left lying about anywhere on a chance of obtaining signatures. The temptation to schoolboys and practical jokers of all kinds was irresistible. Wherever there was a mischievous hand that could get hold of a pen, there was some name of a royal personage or some 'Cheeks the Marine' at once added to the muster-roll of the Chartists. As a matter of fact, almost all large popular petitions are found to have some such buffooneries mixed up with their s-rious business. The Committee on Petitions have on several occasions had reason to draw attention to the obviously fictitious nature of signatures appended to such documents. The petitions in favour of O'Connell's movement used to lie at the doors of chapels all the Sunday long in Ireland, with pen and ink ready for all who approved to sign; and it was many a time the favorite amusement of schoolboys to scrawl down the most fantastic names and nonsensical imitations of names. But the Chartist petitions had been so loudly boasted of, and the whole Chartist movement had created such a scare, that the delight of the public generally at any discovery that threw both into ridicule was overwhelming. It was made certain that the number of genuine signatures was ridiculously below the estimate formed by the Ch

"The effect, however, of this unlucky petition on the English public mind was decisive. From that day Chartism never presented itself to the ordinary middle-class Englishman as anything but an object of ridicule."

History repeats itself, and I have every reason to believe that the same frauds and absurdities will be found to abound in the petitions which have been presented to this Just before the new Syndicate proposition was introduced into this House, it was whispered with knowing winks and pointings and sly hints that there were expectations of an interesting event. There was very much of such gossip as one hears among old ladies when a certain other event-a very important one in a family-is about to occur. The Betsy Prig of that occasion was the hon. member for South Ontario (Mr. Glen); the Sairey Gamp, the friend of Betsy, who was indifferent whether she sicked or whether she monthlied, I presume we might characterize as our hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). These gentlemen ordered the long clothes and the safety pins; prepared what is called the layette; got the cradle ready; and when the little bantling was presented to the public, its features were so like its putative papa's that everybody would have sworn that it was his own darling child, and if nature, out of her mysterious laboratory, could have presented to the little weakling a pair of spectacles, the resemblance would have been almost perfect. But after dandling the dear little thing, after accepting it from the nurse, after preparing it for its christening, the unnatural parent suddenly deserted it, and attempted to put it in the basket at the foundling hospital, It is true that there were no state witnesses present at the accouchement, as in the case of royal offspring, and no salvos of artillery hailed the heir whose helplessness should, at least, have appealed to the pity of nurses, wet and dry; but alas, true to the instincts of those who always people when they are down, the whole party in this House, who are loudest in their peans of welcome at its nativity, from the leader down to the smallest follower-and I will not name him, but he knows very well whom I would select -deserted the poor little feeble wretch, and disowned it, and it has since been kicked about in the gutter. It could not even be received in the alms-house, it is branded as a nullius filius, and the consequence is that, after a feeble and short-lived existence, no one has offered to give it the last rites of humanity, and it is kicked about in the gutter stil. It ill becomes the hon, member for North Norfolk to bring out that draggled bantling and hold it up and dandle it in this House again. We thought we had got rid of it, and we were willing to let these hon. gentlemen share among themselves the celebrity which attaches to that sort of paternity. Sir, in contrast with the whole procedure on the Opposition side, in contrast with the obstruction which has been given to this measure from the very beginning, I am perfectly willing that we should appeal to the country to judge between this party and that. Sir, look at the space taken up in the debates, look at the liberty the hon. gentlemen on the other side have had unchallenged, and compare that with the course pursued by the dominant, overbearing and insolent majority which held power here for five years. Look at that record and see how a party of hon, gentlemen on the Government side treat their opponents and their foes. More than 40 per cent of the whole space of the Hansard, up to this time, has been taken up by the speeches of hon. gentlemen on the opposite side, although their proportion to the hon. members on this side is about as one to four; and they have had the opportunity of repeating, over and over again, with the most monotonous iteration, every argument that can be adduced; forthe hon. leader of the Opposition exhausted the whole subject in his first speeches he made, and nobody could follow him without repeating what he had said. One of these gentlemen came to the front, and although he was challenged, unblushingly occupied the time of the House reading his speech, having previously, without doubt, sent it for publication in the Globe, and then handed the manuscript to the reporters. Hon. gentlemen on the other side found fault with me when I called the attention of the Speaker to that fact. There is no more obvious rule in May's "Parliamentary Practice," than that the reading of speeches is not permitted, because it destroys the spirit of debate. I did not press the question, although, if I had done so, I could have stopped the hon. gentleman from reading his speech, and the Globe would have had a report on the following day of a speech that was not delivered; and I think now that speech ought not to be permitted to remain on the records of this House, because it is not such a speech in any sense as ought to be uttered in the freedom of debate. Not only that, but I sat near the hon. gentleman, and I saw him skip page after page of his speech; you, Sir, stated that as other gentlemen had read their speeches you would not interfere while this debate was going on, although it was against the rule, and would not be permitted thereafter. But your attention, Sir, was not before called to the fact that speeches were read in the House, or your duty would have been to stop the practice. But it eventually became an abuse-one which I hope the discussion we have had will be the means of checking. I assert, Sir, that every opportunity has been afforded for the discussion of this question. Every phase of the discussion has strengthened our position with the people, has strengthened our party with the public, and the hon. gentleman need not lay the flattering unction to his soul that he and his friends are going to mislead the public as they did on a former occasion. The hon. gentleman must remember that lightning does not strike twice in the same place, and although they succeeded once, they will not succeed again, for the people's eyes are open to the hollow shams of an organized hypocrisy; and I wish to say, once for all, that these hon. gentlemen, not true to the instincts which characterized the Conservative party -when their leader lost a battle, deposed and disgraced him. How was it with the true and faithful party that, in spite of obloquys, slanders and unjust reproaches, in spite of every calumny that could be heaped upon a man, clung to the Great Chieftain who has led the Conservative party to power more than once, and who we hope God will spare to lead it more than once again. And now we have the reward of our fidelity. That hon gentleman may remember with pride and pleasure that never in his darkest days has he failed to draw to him the faithful hearts that have supported him and carried him to this hour of triumph; and I say that when hon, gentlemen opposite, on the night of our long discussion, accused us of treating this subject with | that the people of Prince Edward Island are opposed to the undue levity, I was perfectly justified in telling them that if they choose they had a good right to clothe themselves in sackcloth and ashes; but it was our belief that we had put on the garments of festivity and could afford to laugh and be happy, while they might toll the death-knell, for all we cared, like the Indian braves—that they might build their own funereal pyre, and sit on it as long as they liked. The right hon, gentleman, our leader, may feel that to day he is stronger in the hearts of the people by far than if the hon. gentleman whom I see opposite (Sir R. J. Cartwright) had not poured out his vials of vitriol against him upon the public platform, than if the press which united against him had not attacked and slandered him, because those attacks raised to him friends who grappled him to their hearts with hooks of steel, and who now believed their proudest reward to be the fact that they have kept in position one of the greatest statesmen of the world, certainly by far the greatest that Canada has ever produced. We are willing to let this contract for building the Canadian Pacific Railway be the record upon which he shall be judged, to compare it with the obstructive policy of the other side, with that policy which would turn the whole trade and future of Canada into the United States. We are willing to contrast it with the policy of him who said, in that Aurora speech, for which he got so much credit, with extraordinary prescience, that he intended to seek a warmer south, and we saw the literal fulfilment of that prophecy, in the attempt, futile as it was, to turn the course of the Pacific Railway down across the Sault Ste. Marie, into the United States, and divert the stream of travel and traffic into that country. Nothing could be more fruitless than the attempts which have been made in every possible form to induce the hon. gentlemen on this side to desert their leader. The hon. gentlemen opposite got a crumb of comfort in the acknowledgment by some gentlemen on this side that the contract was not in every respect what we could wish it to be. Nobody pretends to say that it is the ideal contract that could be made in the library, and which would in every respect suit our views; but it was a bargain made with live business men, men who watched their own interest, and who intended to perform the work they agreed to carry out to the letter. Parliament having accepted that contract, will do injury to itself if it does not force those gentlemen to carry it out to the letter. The Government have the power, and they have never relinquished the power, to force its fulfilment. Not one step can be taken which could violate that contract, without the Government having the power to check it. The Government will do injury to all the traditions of the past if it does not see that the agreement is fulfilled. In this connection I am reminded that the hon member for North Brant (Mr. Fleming) quoted from the first proofs of the "Debates," which are often incorrect, a statement of mine that the contract was all that could be wished. I did not say any such thing. I simply said that it was not all that could have been wished, if we had the bargain made all on our side; and if the hon, member for North Brant had looked at the context he would have found there could be no misapprehension of my meaning. I thank the House for the attention they have given to me; and must apologize for the hasty manner in which I have been compelled to rise to vindicate myself, and defend the question from the sophistries which have been thrown about it, by the hon. member for North Norfolk-sophistries which he knows so well how to use. And I can truly say, in conclusion, that the charge of inconsistency made against me comes with a very bad grace from that hon, gentleman.

Mr. POPE (Queen's). I do not intend to discuss this question fully, as it has already been discussed; but intend only to refer to sundry references that have been made to the Province from which I come, and to the large petition presented to this House with the view of impressing on it passing of the contract. Hon. members from Prince Edward Island were taken to task the other day by the hon. member for Gloucester for having said that this was a bogus petition. I will go a little further. I will show that the hon. member for Gloucester, who presented this petition, should receive the censure of this House. Every hon. member who presents a petition should read it, in order to ascertain whether it is a respectable and proper petition to present, and, if he finds that it is based on deception and fraud, he is guilty of a violation of the rules of the House in presenting it. He should be made to withdraw it and receive the censure of the House for having presented it. The hon. member for Gloucester may arrogate to himself the leadership of his party in the Province of New Brunswick, and I will not complain. He may visit Nova Scotia and I will not complain. He did visit Halifax with the view of impressing the people there with his great importance, and convincing them of the dishonesty of the Government; but, notwithstanding his great ability and musical voice, he was unable, although there was a very large audience present at the meeting, to induce them to remain to hear him out. Before he had concluded the audience left, leaving behind the Hon. Mr. Jones, the Hon. Mr. Vail and the hon. gentleman himself, who could sympathize with each other on the good old times gone by, which they hoped by their exertions might be brought back again. I will not allow the hon. gentleman to take charge of the little Province of Prince Edward You would suppose that the fact of the hon. member's own constituency presenting a petition in favor of this contract would induce him to pay a little respect to the wishes of his constituency. I will read you a paragraph containing one of the resolutions passed by the corporation in his own county a short time ago He has much better reason for saying the people of his county have faith in this contract than he has for saying that the people of Prince Edward Island are opposed to it. The resolution passed was as follows:-

"It is further resolved that we consider it the obvious duty of every honest, loyal lover of his country, to give his warm support to the Government in this matter, and frustrate the objects of factious opponents who are only trifling with the best interests of the country."

I do not know whether they hoped that the hon. member would become a loyal and honest supporter of the Administration in the interests of the country. Perhaps they did not; but I think the hon. gentleman should pay a little attention to the expressed wishes of these people; he should not spread himself quite so much or endeavor to take charge of the whole Maritime Provinces. If he continues to spread himself we shall have to call on the hon. member for Victoria, N.B. (Mr. Costigan), to keep him within bounds. The petition to which the hon, gentleman has referred is based on deception, falsehood and fraud. I suppose that, in the first place, the instructions were sent down from head quarters here to call a meeting. Mr. Louis H. Davis, who is well known in public life in the Maritime Provinces, took a leading part, and I will show the House how he endeavored to influence the people. In Prince Edward Island the people have a great dread of leasehold land tenancy, from their own past experience, and Mr. Davis' object was to frighten them into believing that the men who went from the Island to the North-West with their wives and families would not be able to get a foot of land along the railway line. I will record an extract from his speech:

"The most infamous part of this wicked bargain has yet to be told. It is said that the Syndicate land is to be taken in alternate blocks, no part of which is to be more than 24 miles from the railway. Now, this phrase "alternate blocks" has a good sound. On the face of it the division seems to be a fair one. But there is a 'but' in this business. It is proviled that if any of those blocks, in the opinion of the Syndicate is unfit for settlement, they can choose other lands from those held by the Government, and it is further provided that if any of the land is swampy or barren, or occupied by water stretches or river or morass, it is not to be calculated in the concession, but the Syndicate can select portions of arable land sufficient to make it up. Now, what does this mean? It means that all the arable lands within 24 miles of the railway are to be given to the Syndicate."

Now, Sir, that is a gross falsehood intentionally uttered for the purpose of deceiving the people, and it has been sent all over the country. So far as the petition goes, I find that there is not upon it the names of any bankers, or the name of any able merchants or lawyer, except Mr. Warburton, Mr. Davis himself, his student. the letter which was who wrote read in the House the other day, and who, by the way, is only remarkable for his forwardness and impudence. petition itself is grossly fraudulent upon the face of it. I find on the first sheet the name of William McIntyre, and all the names upon it are in the one handwriting; in the next all but one are in the same handwriting, and here also appears the name of William McIntyre, and so on.

Mr. ANGLIN, In how many of the sheets does that occur?

Mr. POPE (Queen's). The next sheet has the name of Thomas Campbell; the next commences with the same name, and it is the same all through. I find the name of some men signed in two places in different handwriting, and I am quite satisfied that one of them is a forgery. I find several names here that appear in two columns, in fact the whole sheet seems to be duplicated. I have received hundreds of letters in regard to this petition. One from a countryman in the back settlements asks for information. He says:

"Hon. Sir, I am requested by your supporters in this district to write these few lines and enquire what does the Opposition party mean by sending men round with a petition against selling land to a railway company in England, almost compelling people to sign it for them, but getting very few. Will you be so good as to let me know what they mean?"

I have often remarked how the leading Grits in all parts of the country act in the same way and are guided by the same principles. In private life they are everything you could wish. They are a little better than other people; they carry their prayer-books about in their pockets on Sunday and profess to be quite as good or better than other people. But when it comes to their political conduct, it seems to be necessary for them to resort to deception and fraud to gain their point, and that they should sacrifice for that purpose everything that is straightforward and honest. I will give you one instance of how that party acted in Prince Edward Island. In 1871 the Provincial Government carried a railway They entered into a contract and the Opposition immediately began to hold meetings throughout the Province. They said the contract was entered into for the purpose of selling the Island into Confederation, that scheming Confederators were sent down there as contractors. They declared they would spend £100,000 to get the contract cancelled, that they would rip up the rails already laid, and that the Province should not be sacrificed. They got into power, but before one month had passed they resumed the work we had undertaken, and not only that, but they found they could not hold their position without giving to these scheming Confederators, these contractors sent down, as they said from Canada to build sixty miles more road, and they give these contractors $1,000 a mile more than we were paying. That was the course they pursued, and although they went to the country there was a strong feeling against the Confederation, and they persuaded the people to keep the Island out of Confederation. But instead of doing that, what did these same gentlemen do? Two leaders of that Government came to Ottawa without the knowledge of the people to negotiate the terms of While they were negotiating those terms the question came up as to how much money they should receive as a condition of their coming in. They argued that, inasmuch as Canada had incurred a large public debt to build this Pacific Railway, they could not come in on the same terms as the other Provinces, because they would receive no benefit from the railway. Those gentlemen agreed to these terms—$30,000,000 was put down for the construction of this work, together with a large sum for canals, and the people of Prince Edward Island have been and are now receiving their portion of the expenditure for the Pacific Railway. Yet there are men in Prince Edward Island who complain that they are not getting any benefit from Confederation. At a meeting held lately on the Island, Mr. W. D. Stewart, Mr. Davidson's right-hand man, said:

"It was high time that the people of this Island asserted themselves and endeavored to put a stop to this enormous expenditure in one section of the Dominion, while the public works of the eastern Provinces were starved."

Now, so far as Prince Edward Island is concerned, we have been receiving a fair share of that expenditure, in consequence of the additional burden put upon the people by the building of this railway; and when these lands come to be sold the probability is that the debt will not be increased at all, and that Prince Edward Island will continue to receive her share of this $30,000,000 a long time to come. But I rose to say that no importance should be attached to a petition which is based upon fraud and deception to start with. The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin), who presented this petition to the House, declared it was one of the most respectable petitions ever presented to the House of Commons. There are many respectable names on that petition, but I do not know whether the owners of those names subscribed them. But we know that hundreds of the names are forgeries, that there are many duplicates, and that the names of many dead persons have also been added to that list. I have been told that children ten years old have had their names placed in that petition I do not hesitate to say that the Syndicate contract, when explained to the people of Prince Edward Island, will be perfectly satisfactory to them, and they will feel, with the other people of the Maritime Provinces, that they are relieved from a burden. They know the worst, they know what it is going to cost, and they feel relieved. They may wonder why the Government should reject a contract offering to do the work for some millions less, but all they want in the Maritime Provinces is an explanation of the terms of the two contracts, for they are anxious to do what is right, and are not prepared to repudiate obligations solemnly entered into by this Government.

Mr. YEO. In replying to the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries respecting that petition, I may say that I happen to know a little about it, having been in Prince Edward Island at the time. I was telegraphed to from several places to attend meetings and I did attend one meeting. At that meeting there was one of these papers on the desk, and it was signed by every individual at that meeting, both Conservative and Liberal. It is very customary at meetings held in country places, for one person to sign for one-half or two-thirds of the meeting, but it was not the case at the meeting at which I was present. The hon. Minister has pointed out only ten or twelve names; one of the members from the Island told me there was 200 names which were duplicated. That might be the case; but I fancy it was because the pe itions were to be sent both to the Senate and the Commons. One thing I can assure this House, from what I know of the Island, if one had time to go through the country, I believe nearly every elector on Prince Edward Island would have signed that petition, except, perhaps, some gentlemen who might want office. The hon. Minister thinks the people are in favor of this contract; if so, let him open his county, and I will open mine, and we will test the question. I think it does not come with very good grace from the hon. Minister to charge a fraud against the Province which he represents. I think you will find as much honesty, straightforwardness and intelligence there as in any Province of this Dominion, | handed me a letter, requesting me, in the absence of the Mr. Pope (Queen's).

and I defy anyone who has been on that Island to say anything to the contrary.

Mr. MACDONALD (King's). The hon. member for Prince (Mr. Yeo) may take his own tuency under his wing, but I certainly object to his taking mine, and I can say, with the positive assurance that I am speaking the candid, honest truth when I say that every one who supported me at the last election is prepared to endorse the policy of the Government in the present instance, and I think it is a piece of impertinence-

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh,

Mr. MACDONALD. If it is not parliamentary I will withdraw the word; but I think it is a very cool thing indeed for the hon, member for Prince to come forward and speak for my constituency. I believe, not only my own constituency, but seven eighths, if not nine-tenths, of the electors of Prince Edward Island will endorse the policy of the present Government. I believe it is carrying out the terms under which we came into this Confederation. About $30,000,000 has been added to the debt of this country by the construction of this road, of which we have been getting the benefit since Confederation; and I believe the lands of the North-West will wipe out the debt incurred for the construction of this railway, and Prince Edward Island will get the benefit of it. I fully endorse the policy of the present Government in carrying that great highway through this country, and I believe it will develop the country and throw population into it as it could not be done in any other way, and thus relieve the public of the burden of the work.

Mr. CHARLTON. I wish to make a personal explanation. The hon, member for Niagara stated I carefully avoided allusion to the Northern Pacific road, the Southern Pacific road, and the roads in Texas. I think you will bear me out that I alluded to the Northern Pacific, the Southern Pacific and the various other roads. I presume the hon. gentleman is aware that it would not be proper to allude to the roads in Texas, as Texas was admitted to the Union as an independent territory, it controls its own public lands, and the United States has not the appropriation of public lands in Texas.

Mr. ANGLIN. I had no intention this afternoon of taking part in the debate, but the speeches delivered render it necessary for me to say a few words. The hon. member for Niagara looked at me in a very knowing manner.

Mr. PLUMB. A cat may look at a king.

Mr. ANGLIN. A cat may look at a king, and so the hon. member for Niagara may look at me. The hon member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) indulged in a great deal of what, in any other hon. member, would be called abuse of the Liberal party. We are a small and a weak party in this House, but I believe we are now a strong party in the country; and we are willing to await the decision of the people as to which party is right. The hon. gentleman speaks of fourth-class pot-house politicians. We are willing, if there are any pot-house politicians in this House, that the people at large should decide to which party they belong, and which is the party of gentlemen, judging us by our conduct in debate and when before the country. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries chose to assert that this petition is based on fraud, and that I did not do my duty, and in fact offered an insult to the House in presenting the petition without having thoroughly examined it, and ascertained if fraud existed on the face of it, as the hon. gentleman alleges. I stated on a former occasion how I came to present the petition; that it was handed to me a few minutes before the Speaker took the chair on that particular occasion by a member of the other branch of Parliament, who also hon, member for Prince, to present the petition. I believe that in presenting it I was discharging my duty as a member of Parliament towards one of the Provinces of this Dominion, towards a large number of respectable electors, and I was satisfied I did right in relying entirely on the honor and integrity of the gentleman to whom I have referred. Technically speaking I was perhaps wrong in relying on the statement of that gentleman and the letter, and in taking the responsibility of presenting the petition without having examined it. The Minister of Marine travelled out of the record very widely in asserting that I am seeking the leadership in my own Province. the hon. gentleman knows enough of my past actions to be satisfied that I never sought the leadership of my Province. During the past say ten or twelve years of my political life I have never opened my mouth in public save in my own constituency; I never even took a prominent part in a meeting in St. John. The hon. gentleman's assertion that I am striving for the lendership in my Province is, therefore, only matter of conjecture. He probably imagined that by making such an assertion he would hurt, not myself, but some hon. members who sit on this side of the House. The assertion made by the Minister of Marine is entirely unfounded. The statement made by the hon. gentleman respecting my visit to Halifax is also entirely incorrect. The hon. gentleman would convey to this House the impression that I, for the purpose of "spreading myself," sought an opportunity of addressing a public meeting at Halifax. That is the direct opposite of the truth. I did not seek an opportunity of addressing a public meeting in that city. When I left Ottawa I had not the slightest idea of going to Halifax, but I received from a number of gentlemen an urgent invitation to attend a public meeting, probably because I happened to be one of those on the Opposition side of the House, who had resisted the hurried passage of this Bill. When I received the invitation, I wrote a private letter to the gentlemen setting forth reasons why I thought it better to confine the meeting to residents in Halifax. They thought otherwise; they renewed the invitation, and, under the circumstances, I felt it to be my duty to attend that meeting and to state why I opposed the contract before Parliament. I did that in the simplest language possible; and if any one told the Minister of Marine that a number of persons left the meeting while I spoke, that party misinformed him. I kept my eyes on the entrances and although there were many persons standing at the rear of the hail, I did not observe that any one left while I addressed the meeting. Resolutions were offerred condemning the contract in the strongest language; and not more than twenty, probably not ten, expressed dissent therefrom. Another resolution was submitted, declaring that a copy of the resolution should be sent to the members for the city and county of Halifax asking them to use their influence to prevent the ratification of the contract. That decision has never been officially stated in the House; and, perhaps, I am now justified in conveying this information to the House.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. ANGLIN. The hon. Minister of Railways made, before recess, certain statements with reference to the petition from Prince Edward Island which I presented, that call for a reply on my part. The hon member asserted that many names were in the same handwriting, that many were those of dead persons, and that many were repeated. Charges of that kind should not be made deliberately unless the hon. gentleman is prepared to point out the names he objects to, even if he gives no proof to sustain the assertion. He did name one which he said was repeated in two or three remember a gentleman who represented in this House one of the Nova Scotian counties saying that in his county there were no less than 700 electors bearing the same name and of the same family. In Prince Edward Island there are many Scotchmen settled from the same part of Scotland-Highland Scotchmen-who have been quite as prolific as Scotchmen on the mainland. Names such as John Smith, and many Irish names, are borne by many different individuals; so that, unless the hon. Minister could prove distinctly that all these names were the name of one person, that charge must fall to the ground. The charge that several names were in the same handwriting has already been answered. It is well known that, in country districts especially, people often prefer that their names should be written for them, and names so written, with the authority of those asked to sign, are as authentic as if those people had signed themselves. With regard to the only point on which the slightest proof has been given, the duplication of names, I have in my hand a letter from Mr. Warburton which settles that point. The hon. Minister has chosen to describe Mr. Warburton as a very impertment person, I believe him to be a gentleman of respectablity and standing in Charlottetown. I do not know that I have always agreed in politics with that gentleman, but I never heard anything derogatory to his character before, and I think Mr. Warburton's character will not suffer from an attack of that kind. The following is the letter:-

" CHARLOTTETOWN, P.E.I.,

"Hon. T. W. ANGLIN,

"Dear Sir.—I learn that reports have been circulated in the lobbies of the House of Commons to the effect that 'investigation proves the petition (from P. E. Island) to contain double sheets of the same signatures, and in many instances numerous names signed in the same hand-writing.' tion (from P. E. Island) to contain double sheets of the same signatures, and in many instances numerous names signed in the same hand-writing. As Mr. Haythorne, at my request gave you the petition to present, I feel it only fair to you not to lose a moment in writing to you on this matter, so that you may be in a position to meet any charges brought by our opponents. In the first place as to the aupticates. On one sheet, from the first district of Prince County, there are two parallel rows of duplicate signatures, but I have run my pencil through one of the duplicate rows and that row is not included in the aggregate number of signatures, the single row is alone reckoned. On looking at the petition you will see it is in double columns and some of the persons who had it in charge thought a second one would be required for the Senate, as was the case last year, and in consequence I received a great number of duplicates, the one I speak of among the rest. This was the only one that contained the duplicates on the same sheet in the parallel columns. The different petitions were pasted togerther by a law student of four years standing, in whom I have every confidence, and I particularly impressed upon him the necessity of looking out for duplicates. When he had finished pasting them together I personally went over the whole petition and counted the names for the express purpose of seeing that everything was bond fide, and I did not find any double sheets or duplicates save the one I have mentioned, the duplicate columns of which I have cancelled. I think it impossible that duplicates could have escaped my notice, and feel quite safe in saying that the petition is signed by 4,465 bona fide electors. Moreover, had it not been for the short time at our disposal, and for a heavy snow storm that came on when the petitions were sent out, we could have easily doubled the number: as it is, I can forward some more heavy snow storm that came on when the petitions were sent out, we could have easily doubled the number; as it is, I can forward some more should the Government supporters wish to get them, several having been received since the first were sent away. The duplicates I still hold.

"As to the second charge that 'numerous signatures are signed in the same hand writing.' This may be the case to a limited extent. It arises from the fact that in the country it is a very common practice when one man signs, for his neighbor to direct the first signer to sign for him, or in other world for now men to sign for nother both. man signs, for his neighbor to direct the first signer to sign for him, or in other words for one man to sign for another by the latter's direction. I have frequently been asked to sign this and last year's petitions for other persons, but of course I invariably refused to do so.

"The petitions were all sent out to reliable parties in the county in whom confidence could be placed, so that I am quite satisfied that everything is fair and above board. You are at liberty to make any use of this latter won see fit

"I remain yours truly,
"A. B. WARBURTON,
"Secretary of Reform Association of P. E. Island."

I put the matter fairly before the House, not merely for my own sake, because I do not suppose any hon. gentleman would suspect me of deliberately presenting a petition which I knew to be fraudulently signed, but for the sake of those 4,465 electors of Prince Edward Island, whom their places. There must be in an island like Prince Edward representative in the Government has chosen to asperse so Island a great many persons bearing the same name. I grossly. I will leave the matter entirely between that gentleman and the signers of the petition as to who is right and who is wrong. I have no desire to prolong the discussion. I have said nothing of the merits of the question before us. I merely rose to reply to the charges made against the petitioners and the unprovoked attack made on myself. When I feel it my duty to deal with a charge against myself, I avoid all recrimination. On this occasion I shall not recriminate. I have answered fairly the charges made in such strong language by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and am content to let the case stand on its merits. He spoke of the possibility of my addressing a public meeting some time or other in his Province, and he threatened me with what he no doubt considers will be a very serious infliction indeed. Now, I shall not threaten him in return but will simply say, that I have been repeatedly asked to speak at public meetings in various parts of Nova Scotia as well as in Prince Edward Island; that I have invariably declined appearing at a public meeting in his Province, because of the extraordinary position in which the two parties have stood towards one another in that Province for several years. Should I feel it my duty to my party, and above that to my country, to accept an invitation to address a meeting in Prince Edward Island, I can assure him that his threat will have no effect upon me. If duty would call me to do so, I should like very much to meet the hon. gentleman before his own people, but for no personal gratification would I embrace an opportunity of that kind. The hon, member for Niagara has also indulged in many attacks on the new Syndicate, but I do not think it is necessary now to reply to them as we have talked a great deal on that subject, and as the value of his statements will be properly estimated by the people; and I do not think that anything that has been said by him or by other hon. gentlemen on the opposite side will affect the estimation in which the gentlemen, whose names are attached to the new offer, will always be held by the people of this whole country. These gentlemen are known; they are known as men of high character and high reputation; they are men who in their various localities are known to be utterly incapable of such conduct and motives as have been attributed to them. So I think that hon, gentlemen on this side can allow those charges also to go without further answer. By the way, however, the hon. gentleman chose, amongst other things, to deal with private life, and he insinuated something with regard to my personal conduct and private life which, I think, was not becoming to him. I will recriminate for once, if recrimination it can be called, by saying that I have heard some things of the private life of that gentleman which entitle him to the highest respect and esteem of those who know him.

Mr. RICHEY. I should not have addressed the House at this stage of the measure had hon. gentlemen on both sides been content, as I expected they would be content, to permit the Bill to pass through its third reading without debate. But as the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has opened the whole question afresh and anew, impugning the contract in all its particulars, and charging members on this side of the House with infatuation in supporting it; and as the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) has repeated a challenge which has been made more than once from the other side of the House, I feel that I should hardly be justified in permitting this last opportunity to pass without replying to the allegations and insinuations which have been put forth by some of my hon. friends. The member for Yarmouth (Mr. Killam) said, the and of the United States, by gentlemen who are so situated other evening, that the people of Halifax were not surprised as to be able very materially to advance the interests of at the silence of their members, because they knew that they could not defend a contract which was against the interests of their constituents—which had not the approval of their constituents. Sir, the people of Halifax know my by another company of gentlemen during our discussion weakness for silence, but they know, too, that I am neither upon this question. I think it is meritorious, in that it Mr. Anglin.

ashamed nor afraid to speak when occasion requires—as I am accustomed to act according to my convictions. Silence I hold to be golden, especially in those who are young in political years, and I think the hon. gentleman might have refrained from his censure when he considered that he, a veteran, spoke late in the debate, and that it was only becoming in us to wait "to give ear to his words while he searched out what to say." If with Elihu we felt "Days should speak." But I confess that after having waited and listened I am forced to acknowledge the same experience as expressed by the ancient to whom I have referred, "Great men are not always wise, neither do the aged [necessarily] understand judgment." I have endeavored to follow the discussion which has taken place during the past six or seven weeks upon this great question with as much attention as I was capable of, and whilst there were many utterances on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite with which I could not concur, I did think that to one at least I might give a ready and cordial assent. I thought I could sympathise with the feelings to which they gave expression when they invited and exhorted us to free ourselves from the fetters of party, and in that emancipated condition to consider this question only in the light of patriotic duty. But, Sir, I grieve to find that even here, where I had hoped that some accord of sentiment might be established between us, we must part company. I am driven, but inevitably driven, reluctantly to the conclusion that there was no significance in the remarks of hon, gentlemen opposite on that point, for I have noticed in the speeches which have been made and in the numerous amendments which have been moved, not the slightest disposition to sunder the ties of party; and 1 feel that, as a Liberal-Conservative, I have no alternative but to hold that, in this case, the claims of party and the duty of patriotism are convertible terms. Indeed, as I reflect upon it, I am astonished at myself that I could ever have been so far beguiled by the silvery and seductive tones of my hon. friends as to imagine for a moment that this could be regarded in any other light than as a party question; for is it not indissolubly a part of the very policy for which we as a party exist; is it not by virtue of that great National Policy, which is the very soul and substance of our being, that we are this night ratifying this scheme as the most satisfactory, swift and economical mode for constructing a road which, uniting with our eastern railways, shall bind as with an iron band the British territory on this continent to integrate and confirm our union. We must not suffer ourselves to be deluded by the cry: "peace! peace!" which those hon, gentleman have so loudly vociferated, when in their heart there was no peace, when every device of partizan counsel and every strategy of party warfare has been put into operation against us. gentlemen on this side have been freely charged with not having discussed this question upon its merits. I think it has been most elaborately and successfully discussed upon its merits. It has merits in itself, and merits by way of contrast-absolute and relative merits. It is meritorious in that it provides for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway from end to end by a company; the mode in which we are told by hon. gentlemen on both sides of this House that it ought to be built, and by a company not precipitately formed in the interests of party, but a company formed by gentlemen who have given attention to point after point in this contract, and have finally assumed the work as a matter of business; by a company composed of capitalists of our own country, of En land, of Europe, immigration to our great North-West Territory, in itself a consideration, as I conceive, far outweighing the more pecuniary difference between this plan and that interjected gives to us for the first time a definite promise of the completion of this work; a time within which it can be completed, and the cost of its construction; that it is meritorious, in that it relieves the Government at once and forever of the cost of operating the railway already built, and that is to be built, which, according to Mr. Mackenzie's estimate, would for a long series of years have involved this country in a loss of not less than $6,000,000 a year. It provides for the completion of the work within the shortest possible time consistent with its due construction. These, I think, are positive merits which stand out upon the very face of the contract itself, and which must be obvious to every unprejudiced eye. But it has merits also by way of contrast. It is more economical, practicable and complete than any other plan which had been previously proposed for the construction of the railway. I say it is more economical; for I care not upon what basis you frame your calconstruction of the railway. I say it is more economical; for I care not upon what basis you frame your calculation, I believe there is no one who will impartially examine this contract, but must come to the conclusion that it is decidedly the least costly to this country of any which has been presented. I know that there are several hon.

Settimate of the Opposition in each case, and give to mr. Mackenzie's plan the benefit of the difference of 68 cents, and what is the result? The proposal of 1874 was:

Cash, say, $27,000,000; land, 54,000,000 acres, at $2.50, it is decidedly the least costly to this country of any which has been presented. I know that there are several hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House to whom may aptly be applied Butler's description of his hero in "Hudibras:

"He was in logic a great critic, Profoundly skilled in analytic; He could distinguish and divide A hair 'twixt south and south-west side; On either which he would dispute, Confute, change hands, and s ill confute."

But, however hon. gentlemen opposite may distinguish and divide, change hands and still confute, however they may add, subtract, retract and distract their figures, there are some few arithmetical facts Macaulay's schoolboy would at any time have worked out for them in a few moments, that I think they cannot, without great difficulty, get rid of them. Now, I attach no importance to the value of the lands in a permiant. commercial sense. Their value is so far unknown, and may in the future become so great, that I would rather part with as little as possible of them except for actual settlement, which I believe to be their value to us. I agree with Mr. Mackenzie that any value you place on those lands at present must be a fictitious value, and I would "frankly acknowledge," in his own words "the utter fallaciousness of any attempt to put a fictitious value on the land, and expect English capitalists to take the value as real value." Sir, we have only to consider that, if the statement which has been made here be correct, that you have to-day, after a century of settlement, only seven or eight million acres of cultivable land in the great Province of Ontario, and but seventeen million acres for the whole Dominion, the value of those lands cannot be realized in a month, or a year, or a decade of years. You have only to look at the return which was laid on the Table of this House a few days ago, to examine the quantity of lands sold and the money received and to be received, to see how high are even your lowest calculations respecting the value of these lands in the presence of actual facts. You have to consider with regard to the disposition of the 25,000,000 acres of land placed at the disposal of the Syndicate, that side by side for every square mile which they possess there is a square mile owned by the Government, interested in filling up that country with immigrants, not in selling the land, but in giving it away, establishing homesteads for the people who go there. Therefore you have a square mile adjoining every square mile of the Company's, which provides for at least two settlers, alongside of whose homestead there is a preemption, giving them an equal quantity of land, which, if we count it at $2,50, would make the whole value not more than $1.25 an acre, in competition with these gentlemen upon their line of railway, out of which must be drawn the be the death knell to the scheme of connecting the Atlantic cost of bringing immigrants into that country. I have no doubt these lands will become very valuable. They will increase in value, and we may hope for the Company that they will derive a profit from the sale of their lands, as this country will in conjunction with them. If, however, it be necessary to put some fictitious value upon these lands for the purpose of comparison, I care not what value is placed upon them. I find that when the hon. leader of the late Government brought down his Bill in 1874, estimating the lands at $1 an acre, he was told by some members of the Opposition that they were worth $2.50 per acre, and when the hon. Minister of Railways brought down his proposal this year, and estimated the lands for the purpose of calculation at one dollar an acre, he was told by the Opposition that they were worth $3.18 per acre. Now, I am willing to take the estimate of the Opposition in each case, and give to Mr. land to be given under that Act was 56,000,000 acres, instead of 54,000,000, we should have $5,000,000 to add to that amount. The Allan contract was: Cash subsidy, $30,000,000: land, 50,000,000 acres, at $2.50, $125,000,00; total, 155,000,000. The Syndicate terms $25,000,000: subsidy, railways constructed Cash $28,000,000; Government, 25.000,000 by land, at $3.18, $79,500,000; $132,500,000, acres. total, being a difference in favor of this contract as against the Mackenzie terms of $49,500,000, and against the Allan terms of $22,500,000. I said this scheme was more no small consideration that we have enlisted in this enterprise gentlemen who can bring to bear so great an influence in the development of our country as those who are residents of France, Germany and England can in the way of promoting immigration. Why, the late Government expended, during their term of office, nearly $1,000,000 in bringing less than 65,000 immigrants into this country. How long, and how much money would it take, at that rate, to produce the 3,000,000 of population in the North-West which it is estimated is necessary before this railway can be made a paying speculation. But we are told that another company without coaxing are ready to jump at the chance of constructing this railway on better terms than those proposed. Well, Sir, that is always the way. There are always those ready to bid after the hammer has fallen, always those ready to under b'd after the contract has been "made firm." I said this contract was more complete. It leaves nothing for future negotiation. Company is formed and ready to proceed with the work. Its financial arrangements we understand to be complete, and they only await the ratification of the contract in order to begin operations. I cannot look upon the offer of the so called new Syndicate as a bond fide offer. I can only regard it as a great political kite, of which hon. gentlemen on the opposite side hold the string, and these friendly capitalists raise the wind. If I could feel that that offer would be vigorously and honestly carried out; if I felt that it did not necessarily involve the return to power of hon. gentlemen opposite, resulting in the loss of millions and millions of money to this country by their mismanagement, and in the abroga-tion of our tariff, which is fast raising us from the slongh of despond into a region of hope; if I did not think it would

with the Pacific by a continuous line of railway through British territory, I should then be in a position to consider whether I should vote down the scheme proposed to this Parliament by my right hon. friend. But, even then, I would have to consider what might be the effect on the moral and material standing of my country in the eyes of the world; and I confess such a consideration as that alone would appal me. I believe the Government have acted strictly within the authority with which they are clothed as the trusted representatives of this Parliament, and within the authority of the resolutions and enactments which have been passed by this Parliament from the very inception of this scheme. With these credentials they proceeded to England and negotiated a fair bargain with which they have returned to us for its ratification, and I feel that we have nothing else to do but to sustain them in it. That if we refused to ratify a contract which has been thus negotiated and thus brought to a conclusion, we would proclaim that our Government is not to be trusted, and we would render it exceedingly difficult for this Government, or any other Government, to approach at any time, when they need to do so, the capitalists of the civilized world. We have heard a good deal of aspersion of the details of this measure. It has been mildly insinuated by the hon, member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), if not boldly assertedand I think he would shrink from the assertion—that there is not sufficient guarantee for the completion of the ends of this road, whilst at the same time we have had rolled up before our eyes the tremendous character of the exemptions which are conceded to this Company. There is the monopoly arising from the prohibition for twenty years of any line of railway south of the Canadian Pacific Railway from any point at or near the railway, except such line as shall run south-west or to the westward of south-west. There is the power to the Company to construct and work branch lines of railway from any point or points along their main line of railway to any point or points within the territory of the Dominion. There is the exemption from taxation forever of the Canadian Pacific Railway, its capital stock and all stations, station grounds, workshops, buildings, yards and other property and appurtenances, and for twenty years after the grant made by the Crown of the lands of the Company in the North-west Territories unless sooner sold or occupied. There is the promise from the Government to grant to the Company the lands required for the road-bed of such branches and for the stations, station grounds, buildings, workshops, yards and other appurtenances requisite for the efficient construction and working of their branches in so far as such lands are vested in the Government. There is the restriction placed upon the Government interference with the rates of the Company, having once agreed to them, until the tolls produce ten per cent. per annum profit on the capital actually expended in the construction of the railway. There are the facilities which the Government is to afford to the Company in their financial arrangements. All those are confessedly great advantages. They may have been exaggerated; I think they have been. it has been demonstrated in the course of this discussion that the hon. gentlemen opposite have taken a very exaggerated view of those concessions. But let me assume that they have not, to what amount have they been aggregated by hon. gentlemen opposite? We have been told that one member of the Syndicate estimated one of those concessions as worth at least $5,000,000; others have been made to amount to $15,000,000, and others have brought up the sum to $23,000,000 Our apprehensions have been raised to the highest pitch respecting the formidable character of those concessions. We are told over and over again, told upon the high legal authority of the leader of the Opposition, that there is no security for the completion of the work; that they may go on and construct the easy portion of the contract to completion. It therefore becomes necessary to Mr. RICHEY, road, the prairie section, and receive the large bonus in money and lands which apply to it, and then retire from the construction of the ends. The hon, member for West Durham put it in this way, he said:

"There is, it seems to me, a practical privilege of abandonment, for I do not see anything in this contract of reverter of the railway to the Government or reverter of the land to the Government in case they fail to complete the ends or either end after building the middle."

I would say this: had there been in this contract a provision for reverter to the Government on the failure of the Company to fulfil that portion of the contract, I would have expected the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) to denounce that as the most stupid blunder of all. I should have expected him to indulge in the loudest denunciation of the Government, for having, as he would have contended, given this Company money enough to build the roal at a profit and then prepared to relieve them from the only actual burden, viz.: that of operating the road after it was bnilt. Had there been any power of reverter in this contract, then the Government might have been said to confine itself to that remedy and debar itself from all others, and that in case of the failure of the Company the Government would find that its only remedy was to take the road out of the hands of the Company. But as the contract is now framed, owing to the astuteness and legal acumen with which it has been drawn, we have left to us every remedy which may lie in law or equity, in addition to which we have the power of Parliament to interpret its own acts. But the point with which I started, and which I desire to impress on this honorable House is this: I wish to ask the leader of the Opposition whether these promises by which the Government is bound in this contract, are dependent promises, or are they not? The contract starts with an undertaking on the part of the Company to build certain sections of the railway, and to build them concurrently, to take over the sections constructed and to be constructed by the Government, and to equip, maintain and efficiently operate for all time this continuous line of railway. Not any part or parts, but the whole continuous line from Nipissing to Burrard Inlet is to be the Canadian Pacific Railway. It is in consideration of the performance of the various acts on the part of the Company thus to be performed, of those conditions precedent, that the Government undertake to convey the lands and pay the money stipulated in the contract, and to secure to them all the exemptions of which we have heard so much. Let them fail in one jot or tittle of their contract; let them fail in the performance of any one of the conditions precedent, and what is the result? They may, it is true, from time to time receive appropriations of land and payments of money as the work proceeds, as they construct and equip and have the road in operation for each 20 miles; but let them fail to complete the railway from end to end, and to operate it efficiently after it is built, and what becomes of those favorable exemptions and concessions now placed before us, and which hon, gentlemen opposite have so much exaggerated? What becomes of all that edifice of frightful pictures which hon, genilemen have constructed with so much art, and ingenuity? Why, Sir, it topples like a house of cards. Every concession, every exemption granted to the company in this contract, if it be of substantial value in itself, becomes a substantial security to the Government and the country, not only for the complete construction of the railway, but for its operation by the Company effectively for all time to come. The hon, member for Gloucester, told us the other evening that the Company might be compelled to construct three-tenths of the road, and by that time the railway through the prairie section would be completed, and the Company could abandon the work. But if they should abandon it, the railway would become ours, the examptions would cease, and the security deposited would fall into our hands. We assume they will not fail in carrying out this enquire whether the exemptions are justifiable or fair in themselves. I feel that these exemptions are favorable to the older Provinces, that they do not bring inconvenience or injury to any part of the Dominion, and therefore should be accepted with satisfaction. The estimated value of each of these exemptions must have been taken into calculation in framing the offer of the gentlemen composing the Syndicate, or why did they insist upon them? By how much they estimated the concession, by so much could they diminish the pecuniary demand. The exemption from taxation is one that should be viewed with satisfaction by the older Provinces which have themselves pursued the policy not only of exempting railways from taxation, but of largely subsidizing them. Would it be reasonable that the older Provinces, having burdened themselves for the construction of their own railways, should now be called to contribute more than necessary the means by which the Provinces yet to be created in the North-West are to be provided with railways, instead of imposing on those Provinces their contribution to that end? The exemption from duties has been made a great ground of cavil on the assumption that it is in contravention of the National Policy. I hold it to be in perfect conformity with the true carrying out of that policy. The National Policy is not simply a policy of taxation, but a policy of development of our resources in every way, as well as of fostering our industries. It might have been, yesterday, necessarily a policy of imposition of duties on certain goods, to protect our various industries; it may, today, be a policy of exemption from taxation in certain directions; to-morrow it may be something else. It is a policy which has to adapt itself to the circumstances of the country, which take cognizance of everything that concerns the interest of the country, and therefore the exemption from duties which will aid the development of our North-West is in no wise in contravention of, but is in perfect harmony with, the great National Policy. We have been told this Company has the right to choose the choicest lands of the North-West, and we have had a comparison drawn between the terms of this contract and the Act of 1874. Now, I will confess to not understanding the English language, if the terms of the Act of 1874 are not as large in their operation in favor of the Company as the concessions in this contract. The Act of 1874 provided that lands of fair average value were to be granted to the companies that should contract for the building of the road. Here, I must draw attention to the interpolation in the amendment which was moved by the introducing his resolutions proposed "either by a fresh hon. member for West Durham, an interpolation which that hon. gentleman can hardly justify. It is "that by the Act the land grant is to be taken so far as obtainable along or in the immediate vicinity of the whole line of railway to the Pacific Ocean, and is to be of fair average quality, thus embracing a large proportion not fit for settlement." That embracing a large proportion not fit for settlement." word, "whole," does not occur in the Act. It pr does not occur in the Act. It provides that the land is to be taken along the line of railway, and that the land is to be of fair average quality. And when the advertisements were issued, what would any contractor in England or Europe or on this continent understand by lands of fair average quality, but that these lands were to be fairly fit for settlement. That was then the offer on the part of the Government; here there is a stipulation, according to the reading of the contract, that the Company are not to be required to receive lands that are not fairly fit for settlement; and I certainly not do more than assert that a stipulation of this kind can have no construction put upon it more favorable to the contractors than the words themselves inevitably imply. They are not to be the choices: lands; it is not that they are to have the selection of the lands; it means that when these alternate sections into which the territory is divided the Company have theirs allotted to them, if they object to any it must be shown that they are not fairly fit for settlement exceed that by several thousands of dollars, and parts would

-and that I suppose will be determined by the arbitrators -and then they shall have the lands along the branch lines. or upon the frontages which are to be determined by the Government. But I wish to refer to another point in connection with this clause in the Act of 1874, which only more fully confirms the view I have taken of the reading of that particular portion of it to which I have referred. If I read this Act aright, it contemplated the construction of the whole line of the Canadian Pacific Railway through a series of smaller railways. It provided specifically that the road should be divided into four sections; it provided that the Government might divide those sections into subsections, and it provided for the taking of contracts for each of these subsections as so many distinct railways. "Each subsection of the railway as it is in whole or in part completed shall be the property of the contractors, and shall be worked by, and for the advantage and benefit of such contractors, under such regulations as shall from time to time be made by the Governor in Council," and so on. In applying the Railway Act of 1868 to the Canadian Pacific Railway, it is stated that the expression "The Railway" shall be constructed as meaning any section or subsection of the railway the construction of which has been undertaken by the contractors. How can it be said that the contractors were to take lands of fair average quality through the whole extent of the railway; that the contractors for the prairie section, for example, should take lands of average value, taking into consideration the barren or waste lands which might be found in parts of British Columbia, or along the northwestern shore of Lake Superior? If the contractors constructed the prairie section, that was to be their railway, and were they not to receive the $10,000, and the 20,000 acres per mile along the line they built? I say that this conclusion is inevitable, and that another of the assertions of hon, gentlemen opposite has been fully, fairly and completely met. Hon, gentlemen grumble at the fact that, for the prairie section, a larger sum is appropriated than would be necessary to construct it, but let me tell those hon. gentleman that it falls very far below what was to be given under the Act of 1874. I may be told that it was not contemplated by the leader of the late Government that $10,000 and 20,000 acres per mile should be granted, and in reply I have only to turn to the statements of that hon. gentleman himself. The hon. member for Lambton, in grant of money to make it an object for companies to undertake the enterprise, or by a combined system of giving both land and money." He "proposed to give a specific sum per mile, in the first place $10,000, and in the next place a grant, the same proposition he said as was made by the former Government, of 20,000 acres per mile, and "proposed inviting the sending in of tenders from capitalists stating the amount for which they would require a guarantee at four per cent. in order to give them what they might deem a sufficient sum wherewith to build the road."
"They knew," he said, "that $10,000 and 20,000 acres per mile, supposing it to average a dollar an acre would not build the road. It would more than build it in some parts but from end to end it could not be built." Then shewing that the Intercolonial, traversing a very tavorable country, and with the benefit of having purchased within the time of very cheap iron, had cost $40,000 per mile; that the Northern Pacific Railway, with material almost all the way within easy reach, and the country traversed altogether quite as favorable as the most favorable spot in the whole of our territories, and nearer the source of supplies, cost $48,000 per mile, he asserted that there was no reason to suppose that it would be possible to construct this line from end to end for less than $40,000 per mile, or it might exceed that very much. "They proposed to donate $10,000 per mile to the companies and guarantee of 4 per cent. on the sum named in tenders, 20,000 acres of land being also an absolute grant in each case." Then, Sir, we are told of the vast monopoly in land, and the hon. member for West Durham, in his speech at Montreal, spoke about establishing another monopoly in the North-West, involving the evils of the land laws in Ireland. I believe we can have no better immigration into this country than that drawn from the green fields of Ireland. I agree with him in his denunciation of that system of landlordism which has proved the curse of that country, but I ask him where is the analogy between that case and this? Where is the analogy between a country that has groaned under a system of landlordism, taking its rise in confiscation and absention, and the state of things which will exist in the North-West Territory? Is it not trifling with the intelligence of the country to place before it such a picture as that? With regard to the monopoly in lands I have said that I place no special pecuniary value upon the lands in the North-West. I believe an acre must be its own unit of value. I believe that 25,000,000 acres are less than 54,000,000 or 55,000,000 which were to be donated under the former Act, and are less in proportion to the whole quantity of land which we are supposed now to possess of a quality fairly fit for settlement, in less proportion than the 18,000,000 or 20,000,000 acres of land which was to be given in 1874, was to then known quantity of available land—to say nothing of the 36,000,000 acres to be held in trust for the Company by the Government, and sold as they agreed upon the price. But 25,000, 00 acres now is an immense monopoly, when 18,000,000 or 20,000,000 acres of land in 1874 was no monopoly at all. Can any sane man suppose that with 18,000,000 acres of land in the hands of a company, an area exceeding that of the whole cultivable area of the Provinces of the Dominion, and that the quantity of lands in the hands of the Government to be disposed of to immigrants, they would have reached even in twenty years the disposition of the 36,000,000 acres which were held in the hands of the Government to be sold at the cost of the Government, whilst the Company were to receive the proceeds, and that those lands would within that time, have become subject to taxation? That was the true means of creating a monopoly. The hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Killam), referring to the Hudson Bay outlet in his speech the other night, said:

" Now I would like to call the attention of the member for Halifax to "Now I would like to call the attention of the member for Halifax to that point. What becomes of his winter port for Halifax, if the grain trade of the North-West, instead of going down to Halifax, is either to go down by the St. Paul and Manitoba Railway to New York and Baltimore or out through the Hudson Bay? I think when this subject is brought before the people of Halifax, they will say the hon. member has not been very attentive to his duty in that matter."

I think I may fairly ask that hon, member to consult his captains, and to tell me in what months of the year the outlet through Hudson Bay will be found in conflict with the outlet by Halifax. If we can establish that the transportation by Hudson Bay can be seriously brought into conflict with transportation by the port of Halifax, then I can understand something of his argument. He charged us with violation of duty on the ground that we were to have competitive routes. Did he wish to help us? Did he wish to stimulate us in our duty in that regard? What has he done? Why, he has voted for a resolution which would have given to the offer which has been rejected by this House, his own endorsation and that of this House, for the very reason that it preserved to Parliament and the new provinces the freedom to create competitive routes. There is another point which has been frequently referred to, and that is the standard of the Union Pacific Railway that was selected as the approximate standard for this work, I find in the amendment to which I have referred, that the policy of the Government in the Act of 1874 was to have and the trump of the Archangel will sound in the ears this road constructed with very low grades, and that we of our posterity, while still distracted by the confused have taken as an approximate standard a railway of very high grades. The American "Railway Manual" of 1873 says, of the Union Pacific Railway:

"It may be noted specially here that although in passing the mountain ranges the Union Pacific Railway attains an altitude of more than 8,000 feet above the sea, the grades do not exceed 80 feet to the mile and compare favorably with those prevalent in the Pennsylvania, and Baltimore and Ohio railroads."

Poor's "Manual of Railways" of the United States further

"On the Baltimore and Ohio roads the mountains are crossed at an elevation of about 2.600 feet above the sea and with long grades of 110 feet to the mile. The whole line of the Union Pacific Railway is a very favorable line when its immense length is considered. More than one half of it is practically level, while the mountain ranges are surmounted by grades not in any case exceeding those now existing on some of our most successful roads.

That I think ought to dispose effectually of the objection in the matter of the grades. I began, Sir, by adverting to the advice which hon gentlemen opposite gave to us with regard to our abandonment of party. I shall conclude by referring a little more particularly to the precepts which they have exemplified in practice. They have proved to be very apt pupils of a writer in the Edinburgh Review, who, a quarter of a century ago, undertook to promulge the maxims of parliamentary opposition. Let me read an extract:

"Whatever course the Government may take the oppositionist must be able to find some ground, general or special, for censure. His business with respect to the Government is, in fine, to sustain the part of an advocatus diaboli; his office is to state the case against the Administration, to say everything that can be said with plausibility against every measure, every act, and every word of every Minister and every person in the service and under the control of the Ministry. It is clear that such an office (the writer remarks) accompanied with a strong personal interest in misrepresenting, defaming and undermining, the Minister is liable to serious abuse."

I think we have had that exemplified during the past seven weeks. I may now refer to the maxims. I need not refer to those he produced in the first instance, but I will cite those he produces in the second instance:

"Secondly, the measure may be condemned as premature. There has not been sufficient time for consideration. There has been no inquiry. The facts are not ascertained. The papers are not printed. The Committee have not reported. Members have not had time to communicate with their constitutents. The country is taken by surprise."

There was the canon of inspiration for hon, gentlemen opposite, and faithfully have they conformed to it. How have we heard this Chamber ring with the assertion that there was not sufficient time for consideration, that members had not had time to communicate with their constituents, and that the country was taken by surprise. And what they could not find in the Edinburgh Review adapted to their purpose they found in the Bigelow papers, where the candidate is represented as relating the story of his campaign, and says:

Only these hon, gentlemen got up pertitions instead of percessions, and the mud they marched through was metaphorical mud. They got up meetings too, and now by their resolutions they call upon us to appeal to the people at the polls. Well, Sir, if we are to relegate to our constituents the duty which they have devolved upon us; if we who have been entrasted by them with the task and responsibility of enquiring into and sifting for them with daily devotion and nightly toil every measure which affects the common weal, are to refuse to shoulder our responsibility and throw it back upon its source; if we who, at least, may be supposed to possess some superior means for arriving at a decision, are to confess ourselves incapable of doing so, and are to wait until the people have mastered every detail of an intricate measure placed before us, until they have mastered the figures and analyzed the sophistries of hon. gentlemen opposite, we shall have to wait until the crack of doom noise of politicians warring over the Syndicate. The honmember for Gloucester and other hon, gentlemen have referred to a meeting held at Halifax. Well, there was a meeting held at Halifax, addressed by the hon. member for Gloucester, and I may say to my hon. friend that we did not know that he was to honor our constituency with a visit, or we might have thought proper to modify the answer which we gave to the invitation sent to us by the young men's Liberal Club to postpone our return to Parliament for the purpose of attending the meeting convened by them. Whatever may have been the action of that meeting, I think the hon, member for Gloucester has furnished me with an effective answer to it. We know that a resolution passed by a representative body in his own constituency was produced in this House, and the hon. member referred to it in the following terms:-

"It enables me to tell the House that so far as I can recollect not one of those gentlemen ever voted for me at any election, but that every one of them, so far as I know, opposed me at every election; opposed me when my majority was nearly 1,200, and did their best to prevent my election, and I think if I recognize one of the names, it is the name of a gentleman who opposed me as a candidate."

I have not the names of the gentlemen who occupied the body of the hall at Halifax, but I have the names of all the gentlemen who occupied seats upon the platform, and with the exception of two, I think I may apply to every one of them the language of my hon. friend. I can say that not one of them as far as I can recollect, voted for me, but that every one of them, so far as I know, and I do know, opposed me at each election-opposed me when my majority was-I cannot say 1,200, but I trust that I may be able to say so if the Government continues on its present course, but when my majority was nearly 900 in the city of Halifax and Dartmouth, and did their best to prevent my election. I may go further and, using his words, say that I recognize one of the names as the name of a gentleman who opposed me as a candidate. In fact, Sir, the only representative character of that meeting was its representation of defeated representatives. It was presided over by an ex-representative, now the representative of a defeated party. The hon. gentleman was escorted to the meeting by defeated candidates, and had defeated candidates upon the platform to right and left of him. I have received many letters from my constituents, not one of them, save that conveying to me officially the resolutions passed at that meeting to which the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) has referred, breathe the slightest doubt regarding the propriety of ratifying this contract. They all approve of it, and a Liberal Conservative Association in Halifax, in its annual meeting assembled, when it heard of the passage of the railway resolutions through Committee, telegraphed to my hon. colleague and myself its congratulations, adding that the members unanimously approved of the terms. I trust hon. gentlemen opposite will at least give me credit for knowing how to gauge the feelings of my constituents, and how to consult their interests, as well as my hon. friend can instruct me. He, Sir, would be a mistaken and unworthy mariner on the political sea, who should at all times trim his sails to catch the popular breeze; but it is well for us when we have the wind from that particular quarter with us, as I believe we have at present; and so far from concurring in the predictions of hor. gentlemen opposite, I believe, that should it freshen to a gale, it will prove for us a propitious gale.

Mr. BRECKEN. I will not detain the House long, and I should have preferred to follow the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin). The petition presented by that hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island was the most numerously signed of any laid before the House, and on that account it had the advantage of receiving a good deal of attention. My colleague, the hon. Minister of Marine and attention. My colleague, the hon. Minister of Marine and "Now, what sort of a road is it that this Syndicate has to build? Its Fisheries, characterized the nature of that petition. Of model is the Union Pacific Railroad—not, mark you, as it was after being course. I was absent from the Island when it was signed, and I cannot speak of my own knowledge respecting the signatures. I have gone over the names and I find there are signatures in duplicate; whether they have been placed there by accident or designedly I cannot say. I am not going to speak disparagingly or disrespectfully of a petition coming from my constituents, because I recognize that the right of petition is one of the dearest rights possessed by the people of a free country; but I will give some reasons why that petition will not thwart me from sustaining the vote I have already given. The petition presented by the hon. member for Gloucester was accompanied by a letter from a young gentleman who has been for 18 or 20 months at the Bar of the Island. I observe in that letter addressed to the Hon. Mr. Haythorne, the writer says:

"The people here will not trust any of the other five members, so if Mr. Yeo is not back we would like to entrust it to either Mr. Anglin or Mr. Cameron, the former preferred because of his being from the Maritime Provinces."

I am sensible of this fact that I would have felt it to be my duty to have presented the petition if it had been forwarded to me, although I might have dissented from its prayer, and have not felt that I could vote in accordance with its prayer. There are thousands of names in the petition who would have trusted me with it, and I look upon that paragraph in the letter as one of those many gratuitous insults and taunts that have been thrown in our faces again and again by the bad taste and political malignity of our political opponents. I will state one reason why I do not consider if my duty to vote in accordance with its prayer. I hold that the position of a member of Parliament is not that of a delegate, a mere repeating machine; but he is sent to Parliament to examine, submitted judge and discuss the questions to vote according to what he believes to be right; and he returns to his constituents when Parliament dies either a natural death or comes to a premature end, which is not probable at present, and renders an account of his stewardship. I do not know whether dead men's signatures' are on the petition or not; but I have received letters from highly respectable men on the Island, who are not very ardent supporters of the Conservative party, informing me that a number of the signatures to the petition are those of minors. The hon, member for Prince (Mr. Yeo) made the assertion, and I am sorry he made it, that if time had permitted he could have obtained the names of nearly all the electors of the Island to the petition. I admit the hon. gentleman knows a little more than I do about Prince county, but he does not know half as much as I do about Queen's county, and I can tell him that from Charlottetown, which I had the honor to represent for thirteen years, there is not a Liberal-Conservative name on the petition with a single exception. Moreover, while I admit there are very respectable names, the most prominent Reformers are absent with the exception of three or four. If I were to vote in accordance with the prayer of that petition hundreds of men whose names are upon it would not thank me for doing so. Meetings were held—indeed I think they were inaugurated here, and resolutions were sent to the Island—called by our political opponents, and the manner in which the Government measure was represented, was simply discreditable; and I can tell the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) there is not a crumb of comfort to pick up out of the agitation, and that we will be delighted to see him there, for we are not afraid to meet him. Those meetings were conducted by the Liberal party. This contract was grossly misrepresented. Take for instance what the principal gentleman in this agitation said about the standard question. He said:

rebuilt, not as it is now, but as it was when first constructed. And here rebuilt, not as it is now, but as it was when first constructed. And here he would point out an important difference between the contract with the Syndicate and the one with Sir Hugh Allan. In both the model is the Union Pacific. In the contract with Sir Hugh Allan it was as that road was after it had been re-built at a cost of millions of money to the United States. In that with the present Syndicate it is as it was when first constructed. And what was the Union Pacific when it was first constructed? It was the flimsiest kind of a road. Its ties were of basswood or poplar, and other un-substantial material. Its rails were of iron. There is no limit to the grades of this proposed road." limit to the grades of this proposed road.

He had got his cue from the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) when he said the ties were of cottonwood and basswood, and the road was ballasted with lumps of dirt. Those who signed that petition did so under the impression that the Government were giving $25,000,000 and 25,000,000 acres to build this clap-trap railroad. Another gross misrepresentation was in respect to the allotments of lands. The gentleman who spoke knew the weak point of the people of Prince Edward Island. We suffered for years under the absentee system, but, thank goodness, we have been emancipated from it. In order not to misstate I will read what he said on this point:

"But this is not all. The most infamous part of this wicked bargain has "But this is not all. The most infamous part of this wicked bargain has yet to be told. It is said that the Syndicate land is to be taken in alternate blocks, no part of which is to be more than twenty-four miles from the railway. Now, this phrase 'alternate blocks' has a good sound. On the face of it, the division seems to be a fair one. But there is a 'but' in the business. It is provided that if any of those blocks, in the opinion of the Syndicate, is unfit for settlement, they can choose other lands from those held by the Government, and it is further provided that if any of the load is sympny or betreen or occupied by water stretches other lands from those next by the Government, and the standar provided that if any of the land is swampy or barren or occupied by water stretches or river or morass, it is not to be calculated in the concession, but the Syndicate can select portions of arable land sufficient to make it up. Now, what does this mean? It means that all the arable land within twenty-four miles of the railway is to be given to the Syndicate."

There was not a man who signed that petition who was not induced to do so, through misstatements such as this. Many of these signatories are respectable men who, I believe, if they had as much light on the question as has been thrown on it in this House, would have withheld their signature. I would be a coward and recreant to my duty if I allowed this petition, even were it signed by 14,000 instead of 4,000, knowing the means by which it was obtained, to cause me to deviate from the course which I believe to be in the true interests of the country. Mr. Warburton, in his letter, which the hon. member for Gloucester read, assures this House that all the signatures to that petition were the signatures of electors of Prince Edward Island. I have been twenty years connected with politics in that Province where, as the hon, member for Gloucester said, there were many of the same name, and I would not venture to say whether the signatures were those of electors or not; and the assurance of Mr. Warburton is not worth the paper it is written on. I feel perfectly satisfied that not 25 per cent. of the men who signed that petition had an opportunity of an unbiassed consideration of the merits of the question, and I know there are men in Prince Edward Island who would sign a petition to hang, draw and quarter every one of us, politically. Their policy is: "No good can come out of Nazareth." When this work will have been in operation two or three years, those most opposed to this contract will recognize its merits. not believe that there are 10 per cent. of the signatures upon that petition who are men who ought to sway the mind of any hon. member of this House. I believe that the contract is a good one, and that it is in the interests of the country, and I believe that those of us who support the Government will find when we go to the hustings that the people will recognize that we have discharged the duty that was reposed in us by exercising our common sense and refusing to be deluded and humbugged by our practical opponents.

that, in common with, I am sure, all hon. members who sant with the merits and demerits of this contract and the Mr. Brecken.

listened to it, I heard it with a great deal of pleasure. He seems to have gone fully into the question, and, perhaps, if his speech had been delivered at an earlier period of the debate, many of the speeches made upon this side would have been unnecessary, and some of the amendments and in consequence some of the speeches made by hon, gentlemen on both sides might have been dispensed with. No doubt a speech which, like that of the hon, gentleman, occupied six weeks in compiling, and which the hon, gentleman has been able to add to from time to time, should be one covering the whole ground and be practically effective; but the hon. gentleman and his references to what I have said on previous occasions, has failed altogether to touch the points I raised. When I referred to the hon. member for Halifax, I was speaking about the taxation which would be imposed so suddenly upon the people of Nova Scotia, and I said I thought it was his duty as representing the metropolis of that Province to have protested against that imposition both in Halifax and in this House. I said that this contract, by increasing the debt of the Dominion too rapidly, was placing burdens on the people of his Province which were unjustifiable. My remarks were general, and applied to other Nova Scotia members in the House-some of whom were here before me and some of whom have come in since. I believe that true patriotism does not consist of a blind support of party such as the hon. gentleman from Halifax accords to the hon. Minister of Railways; but that true patriotism at this time is to consider the position of our Province and of the Dominion as a whole, and to see that unjust burdens were not imposed by reckless Governments to the disadvantage of the people. I also referred to the outlets from the North-West, and the hon. gentleman has taken me up on that question. I was led up to my remarks by the speech of the hon member for Provencher (Mr. Royal), and from what I had read of the speech of the hon. the Minister of Railways at London. I gathered from them that at present, at all events, there would be no outlet from the North-West except by St. Paul. member for Provencher said that the people of Winnipeg were dissatisfied with that prospect, but since they have been told that there was an alternative line to be built by way of Hudson's Bay, they have become more contented. I thought it no more than right—and I think I said so kindly and properly—that I should warn the member for Halifax, that the interests of his city were being affected in this particular. It is not necessary for me to enlarge on this point, because both the member for Halifax (Mr. Richey) and the member for Queen's (Mr. Brecken) have admitted at the close of their speeches that the feelings of their constituents are against them, as I relieved they were when I spoke before, and in which belief I am confirmed by every report which has reached me from that Province. I do not care to throw out useless challenges across the floor, but I think that while we hold the views which we do hold, we can only wait until the electors in the different localities have an opportunity of deciding upon them.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton). I feel very reluctant to prolong this discussion any further, but occupying as I do the position of a representative of one of the most important constituencies in this Dominion, I feel I could not take leave of this question without saying something with refer-Whatever may have been the case three ence to it. or four weeks ago, with reference to the general question it cannot be said now that it is not well understood. The general principles of this measure have been dis. cussed on both sides of the House, and I am sure there is not an hon, gentleman here who does not understand it fully and thoroughly. In fact, I may say that there is not Mr. KILLAM. I merely wish to say, with reference to the speech of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Richey), any interest whatever in public affairs who is not convertible.

Bill now before the House. The discussion has been conducted most ably on both sides of the House; and while I think the hon, gentlemen who have presented their case from the Government point of view have had the advantage, I am not so illiberal as to imitate the example of the hon. member for Lambton, by saying that I can see no merit, no argument, or no virtue, in anything that was said on the other side of the House upon this question. The subject has also been very fully discussed in the country. During the recess we had nothing else to talk about except this Pacific Railway measure, and the people have considered it fully, and I am satisfied that although there was some reluctance on the part of the Government at the time to grant an intermission, that the longer that intermission was, and the more the question has been discussed in the House and before the country, the stronger does the Government stand in the hearts of the people with reference to it. Now, Sir, it cannot be said that this is a new question. It cannot be said that it was sprung upon the country, when the papers were laid on the Table of the House on the 10th of December last, because we all know that since the days of Confederation the question of a great national trans-continental railway has been a matter that has been considered and thought about by all statesmen. It was considered then that Confederation would not be an accomplished fact until all British North America was united and in one Dominion. It was known then that in order to keep that Confederation intact, the Atlantic Ocean must be bound to the Pacific Ocean by an unbroken chain of railway on Canadian soil. This was the aspiration of all statesmen of that day, both Liberal and Conservative, and there has not been a Government from that time until the present that has not had its Canadian Pacific Railway policy. I do not intend to take up the time of the House by showing how the patriotic efforts of the right hon, gentleman who now leads the Government, were frustrated when he brought down his first great scheme for the purpose of carrying out this idea. But, Sir, I will say that when the history of this country comes to be written by an impartial hand, and by one who will have naught of party hatred, but who will aspire to be an honest historian, I venture to say that there will appear amongst the names of those arch tricksters, who so successfully carried out their fell purposes, the name of one who has not yet had his fair share of the ignominy, which has so far been placed upon those who took no less the desperate part, but who played the character with less disguise. When it was first announced last autumn that a bargain was likely to be made by the Government with a Syndicate, it was received with the greatest satisfaction by all parties. Men felt as if they were relieved of a burden which might some day or other crush them. They felt further that if that road, after it was constructed, could be worked and carried on without the a sistance of Government, a great boon would be granted to this country. I am satisfied that is the opinion of the people at large still. If it were not for the party exigencies that are now prevailing, that would be the all but unanimous opinion of the people of this country. Now, Sir, we know that almost as soon as the contract could be read after it was placed upon the Table, the members of the Opposition began to find fault with it and endeavored to pull it to piece. The first thing we heard was that after a caucus was held, a manifesto was to be issued to the whole people that would carry consternation into the ranks of the Conservative party, in I that it was to be the banner under which the hon. gentlemen opposite were to march gloriously to power. The country wanted with bated bleath. people knew the mountain was in labor and expected that something would be brought forth. But what was it? I hold in my hand what certainly cannot be called anything of more of being a great manifesto to the people of this country has dwindled down to the insignificence of a memorandum, a poor bantling that has no father. It was supposed this great manifesto would be signed and sealed by the leaders of that great party. It was to be their confession of faith on this question. But when it was produced it had no known father, it was not even signed by a Reform member of the House of Commons, but simply was said to be by a member of the House of Commons. I can understand why those hon. gentlemen did not wish to reveal the authorship of this document. I felt when I saw it that they would probably be ashamed of it in a short time, and that they wished to be in a position, on some future day, to say: "Why, there is no evidence that it came from the Reform side of the House. It is from a member of the House of Commons. It is some wretched Tory who has produced this document." I do not think I was very far wrong when we consider the policy those hon, gentlemen pursued in 1873 by stealing letters, and doing other disreputable things that ought hardly to be mentioned under the light of the sun. They were not satisfied to issue this document as coming from themselves, but in order to give it an air of respectability they palmed it off upon the people as coming from a member of this side of the House. I hold in my hand a copy on which is printed at the top: "With Thomas Robertson's compliments." It is unnecessary for me to say that I had nothing to do with its production. It is a well-known fact that there is another hon. gentleman in this House whose name is "Thomas Rob-I have no fault to find with that hon, gentleman issuing that document under his auspices and under his name, if he would only give it a distinctive mark and not be ashamed to say that he came from Shelburne. What I do complain of is that it has been sent to numbers of my constituents. Hon gentlemen no doubt considered it a joke; but when I tell him that the crime of forgery was committed in sending it, they may consider the matter more serious. I have in my hand two of the wrappers which were sent to the city of Hamilton—and I suppose I could have obtained a dozen—and I find that my initials are forged on the wrappers. I merely mention this circumstance to show that hon, gentlemen opposite are only pursuing that contemptible and ungentlemanly practice they indulged in in 1872 and 18.3. These documents were addressed to political friends of mine in the city of Hamilton, and the wrappers are franked with the initials "T. R., M.P." Now, there is no other gentleman in this House except my hon. friend from Shelburne who has these initials, and that hon, gentleman has declared to me that he knew nothing of the matter, and that the writing was not his. I therefore acquit him of the act, but some hon. gentleman on that side of the House, I have no doubt, committed the forgery and is responsible for it. It is not extraordinary that these hon, gentlemen smile at and glory in this matter, it is quite in accord with this mode of party warfare. They were never guilty of a statesmanlike act in their lives, as the country well knows and has punished them for; but this business is of a piece with their pernicious acts. It is a great misfortune that this country is placed in a position so unlike that of any other country, because I believe every country under the sun can boast of her children being patriots; but I deny that that spirit is to be found in the hearts of hon. gentlemen opposite. Anything for them so long as they get place and power, and after they do get it they have not the capacity to govern the country as statesmen should govern it. They decried the National Policy, and told us it was going to ruin the coun'ry, and they have been doing everything they could to make the people believe that. They have not succeeded, but unfortunately their papers, their speeches and their vile insinuations are carried across the Atlantic, and gentleimportance than a mouse. I hold a document which instead | men of capital and enterprise who would have come here and embarked in various industries, are afraid to do so, and until the people ratify, at another general election, that policy by an unmistakable majority, the interests of the country must materially suffer. It is the same with the question now before the House. Although this House, by a majority of eighty-six, a majority unequalled on any question since Confederation, has declared that the railway policy of the Government is the proper one, what do we find? It is stated in the press—and I presume with the authority of hon. gentlemen opposite—that notwithstanding that this contract may become the law of the land now, yet the Reform party will not be bound by it, and the first opportunity they get they will rescind it. Hon gentlemen were not satisfied to leave this question to the people, in order that they might discuss it among themselves. In the interests of their party, and with the view of embarrassing the Government, in which I am happy to say they signally failed, they got up an agitation. That agitation was begotten here; it was not the spontaneous outburst of any section of the people. They were told that they must agitate against it, and the organs of the party have done all they could to create and assist that agitation. Before it was known what the bargain really was the Globe newspaper found fault with it. It first built up a man of straw, which it called the bargain, and then knocked it to pieces. It has been said that the country had no notice of this bargain being made, and that no opportunity was given to other capitalists to make an offer to the Government. Why, from the very time it was first stated that the members of the Government had gone to England to endeavor to make an arrangement, the Globe kept the matter before the public daily. It was afterwards announced that the bargain had been made, and when the right hon, gentleman and his colleagues came back to this country to settle the details, we were told day after day that the settlement of these details was going on. Yet hon, gentlemen say no notice was given to the country. Well, Sir, the agitation having failed, meeting after meeting having been called without producing the desired effect, we heard whispers that a new Syndicate was to be formed, and a new offer made. At last this new offer is brought down and handed to the Minister of Railways, who lays it on the Table. Sir, the House must pardon me if I recite a story, which I was reminded of, when I heard of that affair. It put me in mind of the fable of the fox and a certain little animal that has not a very agreeable odor. This little animal paid a visit to the house of the fox and asked for admission. The fox declined, saying, "I do not know you."

"Why," said the little animal, "I am a fox;" feel my hands, they are like those of a fox; feel my nose, it is that of a fox, and above all look at my tail, that is like a fox's." "True," said the fox, "your hands, your tail, and your nose, are like those of a fox; but you smell very much like a skunk." That is exactly the way it struck me, with respect to the second Syndicate offer. It had all the appearance of a bond fide offer on the face of it, but when you came to sift it, to understand it, and see the names of the gentlemen who were at the bottom of it, you understood exactly that it was a fraud. I wish to say that, while there are gentlemen connected with it who were induced to join that Syndicate, of great respectability and wealth, I do not want it to be understood that I attribute to those gentlemen any fraudulent intent; but what I mean to say is that there was a fraud in its inception; that hon. gentlemen opposite suggested it, and that by means best known to themselves, they induced some of their political partizans to take the matter up and endeavor to form a Syndicate. They succeeded in doing that, and those political gentlemen who were asked to get up the Syndicate knew perfectly well the Ontario system of railways will not be that the Government could not accept the offer. But I believe there were gentlemen who joined the Syndicate who did not know that such was the agitation, that that agitation was not spontaneous, but Mr. Robertson (Hamilton).

fact; they were humbugged into the idea that there was a good thing open, and that the Government must, as a matter of course, in the interests of the country, if they underbid the other Syndicate, accept their offer, and 1 underbid the other Syndicate, accept their offer, and 1 believe it was on these representations that a respectable and wealthy firm of gentlemen in Hamilton, Messrs. E. & C. Gurney, were induced to join the Syndicate. I may make the same remark with respect to Mr. William Hendrie, a gentleman who is not a politician, but a man of means, who is greatly skilled in railway work, and a large railway contractor and who would be influenced by Mr. J. Stuart, his colleague on the Hamilton and North-Western, and Mr. J. Proctor, another colleague. I do not give credit to J. Proctor, another colleague. I do not give credit to Mr. A. T. Wood, a late member of this House, or to Mr. J. Stuart, also a member of this House for a short time, for being in that position. They knew perfectly well that the offer of the second Syndicate could not be accepted by the Government; and they are such strong partizans they would not hesitate to do what they could to assist their friends in the Opposition benches and embarrass the Government. If this is not so, why did those gentlemen not think of this thing before? They cannot say they had no notice, for it was known that the Government were only too anxious to negotiate with anyone who had the means for the construction of the road. But those gentlemen did not then make an offer. How could the Government now accept this offer? It was a most absurd thing to imagine that they could under almost any circumstances. Before they accepted the offer they must notify those with whom they had already contracted that the bargain was off, and before negotiations were concluded and the House ratified the desired arrangement, we would have another Syndicate offer brought down, and hon, gentlemen opposite would be delighted to find that the Government was being embarrassed from day to day, that new syndicates were being organized and the time of the country wasted and the great hope of the Opposition almost carried out, that the building of the railway would be postponed for all time. In comparing the new offer with the contract, I observe that there is a great similarity between them; it is true, less land and money is offered to be received, of these I need not repeat what has already been said. I think, on the whole, that the contract is far more beneficial for the country than the new offer; but it has struck me as singular that several of these gentlemen are said to be, and are, in fact, interested in the Ontario system of railways, and we know that the Toronto Board of Trade has petitioned this House with reference to the effect of the 24th and 25th clauses of the Act of Incorporation, claiming that the interests of Ontario are not sufficiently protected by the 24th section; but, Sir, I find that the new Syndicate have adopted the very same form of words. There is a strong feeling with respect to these sections, and I mention this in order to draw the attention of the Minister of Railways to the fact and suggest to him that, in the interests of Ontario, when he introduces his Railway Amendment Bill he will take notice of it, as I understand he is disposed to do. In those sections there are certain provisions made with the view of keeping the Ontario system of railways perfectly independent of the Canada Central Railway, and according to my idea, the 24th section covers all that is required; but it appears that in the estimation of the Toronto Board of Trade, and other gentlemen who reside in Hamilton, there is a difference of opinion about that; and they seem to be alarmed for fear that, in case the Canada Contral should become the property of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Ontario system of railways will not be fairly dealt with. I have said before that hon.

that agitators were sent through the country, and the leader of the Opposition opened the ball in London, afterwards proceeding to Hamilton and Toronto. When I heard that the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) was going to address a mass meeting, as it was called, in Hamilton, for the purpose of laying this matter of the Syndicate before it, my colleague and I dropped a note to the hon. gentleman asking him if he had any objection to discuss the question on this occasion, with another gentleman, in order that the people might have an opportunity of hearing both sides. I received a courteous reply informing me in so many words that he did not think it could be done; however, he would leave the matter to the committeee which had invited him to speak, and if they were desirous it should be so he would place himself in their hands. He also intimated that a copy of our note, with his answer, had been sent to the committee. You may be sure that the gentlemen in Hamilton could not see their way to such an arrangement, and the consequence was there was no discussion. I am not one to suggest for a moment that the member for West Durham is afraid to meet any man. I presume he thinks there is no man in this House who is worthy of his steel. He informed me that my hon, and esteemed friend from South Wentworth was to be one of the speakers at that meeting, with the view, no doubt, of assisting to convert the unrighteous to repentance, and make all the citizens of Hamilton good followers of the hon. member for West Durham. The meeting took place, and a large meeting it was. There was no one there to represent the other side, for the reason that none would be admitted, although I begged to be allowed to, and that the hon. Minister of Railways might be allowed to attend. I felt the hon, member for West Durham might turn up his nose if I were to be his opponent, so I informed him that the hon, Minister of Railways had expressed his willingness to attend; but that made no difference. One would have supposed that when the hon. gentleman had it all his own way, when the Music Hall in Hamilton was packed, his cloquence and powers of persuasion would have been sufficient to convert the whole city, and petitions would have been sent from every quarter of it praying this House not to pass this measure. But not a petition has been sent. Not the slightest excitement took place and the hon. gentleman made nothing by his motion. His speech was talked of certainly for a couple of days later. He was said to be a most magnificent speaker, well known to be a very able lawyer and special pleader, who presented his case in a way that must have carried conviction had there been truth or force in the arguments he used, or had the people no common sense; but the people of Hamilton have common sense, they read the papers, they reason for themselves and will not allow the eloquence of the hon. member for West Durham nor his legal skill to carry them away, against their better judgment. The meeting resulted in nothing, and my colleague and myself are plied with letters asking when this cruel war will be over, when the contract will be ratified. All want to see the question settled, and settled exactly as the Government have agreed with the Syndicate. In saving, as I did, that nothing came of the meeting, I was not literally correct. One of the grievances the hon. gentleman presented to the people of Hamilton was this fact, that the Syndicate would hold their lands back and create a land monopoly, taking advantage of the Government settlers, who would increase the value of their lands. Somebody suggested that would not be altogether an unmixed evil, for the settlers could then use the Company's lands for the purpose of grazing their cattle; but the hon. gentleman, quick as thought, said the Syndicate would fence in their lands, and then a calculation was entered into to show how many miles of fencing and how many thousand tons of nails they would use, and how many post holes or the other—does the hon. gentleman wish himself to be would have to be made. The question arose whether these registered as a man who knows nothing of the history of post holes should come in free of duty, because it was suggested the Northern Railway would be defunct and might transfer their post holes to the Syndicate. More than this came out of the discussion. It was suggested that a monument should be erected to the memory of the hon. member for West Durham. All men, no matter how clever they may be, must some day die; but this monument was to be erected on the political death of the hon. member, which it was predicted would take place about the year 1883. It was suggested a magnificent statue should be erected to his political memory, in the middle of a 640 acres square, to be surrounded by a magnificent pine board fence, with post holes imported from the Northern Pacific Railway; that the monument should be in marble, that from the shoulders of the figure the mantle of Aurora should be slipping off-and in parenthesis permit me to say that that mantle is very thin—that in his left hand he would hold a scroll, said to be the refused offer of the new Syndicate; and that a phantom cow from West Elgin would appear looking most wistfully at the grass, while in the right hand of the figure would be

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I have been a listener during a considerable part of this long debate, at which it was not my good fortune to have been present all the time. I have been pleased with the ability which has been displayed in the discussion of this great question on both sides of the House. I have not, myself, taken part in the debate, because a great portion of the time I was not here, and when here I contented myself by my pride in the ability with which my colleagues on this side have discussed the provided by the state of the s question, and I registered my views by my votes. I would have been better pleased if, since we seem on the whole to have got on in this debate with good nature, the special orators of the Government side had not been set up, just now, to call us all the bad names with which they seem to be familiar. The hon, member for Niagara and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries agreed in this particular, though they may differ in some things. The hon, member for Niagara is, I think, not so genial, not so gracious, not so gifted, shall I say, as the hon gentleman who has dwelt down by the sea all his life in a softer atmosphere, and who has probably enjoyed the advantages of better society than the hon. member for Niagara, who betrays the cold frigid latitude from which he comes. I say nothing of the want of courtesy which he sometimes displays, for, unlike the hon. member for Queens, he has not enjoyed the refining effects of learning and good society, and all the genial influences which culture can confer upon a man. But in all other respects these two hon gentlemen whose names began with a particular letter are as like as two peas. They have a common contempt for the Opposition. They both regard the gentlemen on this side of the House as no gentlemen, indeed there are none on this side or in our party; the party of gentlemen in which the hon. member for Niagara is so distinguished a light sit altogether on the other side of the House. I do not, Sir, dispute that the gentlemen over there are gentlemen; but I do dispute that the men of learning and culture, the men who deserve the respect of this House are the men who rise and indulge in such wholesale denunciations of a great party as the hon. gentleman did to-day. Does he want the country to believe that he is so far removed from that wisdom which should distinguish a member of Parliamentdoes he wish them to believe that he is honest when he rises in his place and expresses contempt for the abilities of all the men who sit on this side of the House? Does he want the country to believe that he is honest when he expresses his contempt for the whole Reform party and for the men who have led that party for years in this House? On the other hand —for the hon, gentleman must take one horn of the dilemma or the other—does the hon, gentleman wish himself to be the men in this House or of a party in this country; or does he wish the people to believe that he was insincere and that he was looking into a mirror when he described the pot-house politician? I would be unwilling to say a disrespectful word of the hon. gentleman—to say a single word which could at all deteriorate from that courtesy which I know the hon. gentleman is capable of displaying; but what would the country think if we sat by and allowed a gentleman of his eminence and learning and culture to hurl at us such epithets as he has hurled across the floor to-day, without holding up the mirror to him? What a blessed and a pleasant thing it would be if we could "see ourselves as others see us." Let the hon, gentleman look at his distinguished colleague, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, the hon. gentleman who does not like to have people allowed to carry prayer books around with them. I do not speak of the general ability which that hon gentleman displays in the discharge of his duties; I do not speak of him as a foul renegade, as being no gentleman, as being a pot-house politician, as he has chosen to speak of those who are at least his equals. I shall speak of the hon. gentleman only as he has displayed himself, and if I am compelled to do this not only in the vindication of the rights of this House, but in the fulfilment of my duty, it is because the hon, gentleman has obtruded an ugly presence in this debate which should call for the censure not only of the members on this side of the House, but of those who sit around him, and who I doubt not regretted the tone he assumed. I want to tell the hon. gentlemen of the other "P," the distinguished member who comes from down by the sea, and who I hope will be recognized by the culture, the education, the refinement and the geniality which distinguish him—I wish to tell him who talks so glibly about his betters—and as the hon, member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) said, I have no doubt that he is kind-hearted when he is not mad with the spirit of partizanship—that perhaps he has not been long enough in this Confederation to understand the question he talked about. He talked of us as if we belonged to the party which had made itself disreputable in public life. We could forgive the hon, member for Niagara for saying—as I understood him to say—that the leadership of this party had always been a disgrace, that we had always upset ourselves by the want of ability in our leaders-I say, we could forgive the hon. member for Niagara for saying this of a party which from the days of Robert Baldwin has been nobly led. The hon, gentleman could be forgiven on the ground that he sacrificed his manners to his partizanship in making a declaration which he must have known he was not justified in making, and which he must have known placed himself in an undesirable position before the country. But, Sir, we cannot forgive the hon. Minister of Marine, although I believe that hon. gentleman disturbed his colleagues more than he disturbed us. It was amusing to see them wince as the hon. gentleman did that which seemed so like nothing else as the act of hurling a fish from one counter to the other. We could forgive that hon. gentleman a great deal, but we should not be forgiven ourselves if we did not take this opportunity of correcting his ignorance. When he speaks with contempt of the Reform party and its leaders let him understand that to that party is due, every amelioration of the condition of the people, in the sense of extending their rights and privileges, which has ever been granted in this country. From the time when the Reformers of this country, fifty years ago, were denounced by the Tories of that day as the Reformers of this day have been denounced here to-night, down to the present; every attempt which has been made to secure privileges to the people, every attempt which has been made to put less burdens and more responsibilities upon their shoulders, has been steadily advocated by this side of the House and as steadily resisted by have thought from the first start that there was an intention that. If the hon, gentleman can mention me an instance of consulting the House. I have seen a patriotic course of Mr. HUNTINGTON.

in exception I will be glad to have him do it now. I would be pleased to sit down and let him have the opportunity. The members on this side of the House have never put forward offensively their claim to be considered a "party of gentlemen," but they have always been the advocates of the rights of the people. They have always, at least, enjoyed the confidence in the main of those who read and think, of those who act upon their convictions. But this, Sir, is no new thing. It does not apply alone to Canada. It is an element in the very principle of Liberalism the world over. You Conservatives, as you now call yourselves, do not like the word Tory. Our celebrated litterateur, Goldwin Smith, has said you do not like that word; it is too old-fashioned. For myself, I think it was a respectable name, and I think when you shook off that name you did not shake off the shackles of Toryism. But, as Mr. Goldwin Smith said, you had to have a deodorizer, and so you called yourselves Conservative-Liberals, or rather Liberal-Conservatives, for I believe that is the name you have adopted; but if you look at the history of the efforts which have been made by slow degrees to win the rights of the people of this country from the early days you will find that although the Tory party sometimes yielded, under fear of loss of power, though sometimes when the majority was against them, they accepted position and salary and carried out the behests of the men they denounced, and thus became the dominant party, yet to the advocacy and the efforts of the Reform party has been due every great measure tending to the amelioration of the condition of the people. From the days when constitutional government was one for Upper and Lower Canada, from the days when municipal institutions were fought for in Upper Canada and seignorial tenure was the question upon which parties divided in Lower Canada, every great measure tending in the direction of popular rights was initiated by the men whom you denounce to-day, the men who sat on this side of the House the men whom you denounced then as you do now. At your head in the days when municipal government was first talked of in Upper Canada, even a Tory Governor went so far as to declare that municipal reform meant annexation to the United States. They have constantly declared from that day to this that annexation to the United States would be the terrible consequence of every reform we have tried to carry out, and which they have resisted. One day it was municipal institutions, the next day it was constitutional government. All the way down that has been the attitude which the Conservative party, or the Tory party, as you may please to call it, has held towards the Reformers in this country ever since we had anything to reform. Whether we have been in a minority or a majority there was always the same wave of misrepresentation, the same wave of abuse as that with which the hon. gentleman who last spoke has seen fit to close the debate. We have heard a good deal during the progress of this discussion, and particularly from the last speaker, about partizanship. The partizanship of the Opposition is something which seems to be rank in the nostrils of the hon. gentlemen opposite. Let us see exactly what is the partizanship of this question. I will not go back far. But who are the partizans in this House à propos of the Syndicate question? What did the Government do after they made the contract? They called Parliament together. What did they call Parliament together for? Was it merely to register their decrees, or was it for the purpose of getting the opinion of Parliament? Why, they might as well have said to the members of Parliament: "You need not have come here, because we have already settled the thing. If you want to come and vote us down, come on; but if you intend to stick by us, stay at home." When we arrived here the Government presented the House certain documents for its consideration. Certainly one would that kind pursued by gentlemen of both parties when a matter of great public consequence came up for the consideration of Parliament, and Governments have been willing to take the House into their confidence. But in the present case the disposition of Ministers has been quite the opposite. They have said in effect: "Don't make a suggestion, because we will not dot an i or cross a t." And from the day we came here and during all the discussion that has taken place the attitude of the Government has been simply-if you don't accept this contract just as we present it to you we will go out of office at once. They would not accept the smallest suggestion from any of their supporters. The hon, member for Halifax (Mr. Richey) has just stated that he would be almost tempted to vote against this bargain if he did not believe the terrible Opposition would come in. Is that not partizanship? The hon, gentleman was so frightened that he would vote for a bad bargain rather than jeopardize the Government. What would that hon. gentleman, and others like him, have done if the terms of this contract had been doubly as onerous as they are? Let them ask themselves this question in that calm, friendly, and dispassionate manner which they have been recommending to us. If the exemption from taxation and from duties had been more exemption from taxation and from duties had been more extensive, the money and land compensation doubly as great, and the Government had said: "We will have the contract carried or else we will go out;" does the hon. gentlemen on the other side pretend that in that case the Government would have been driven out of office? Perhaps not. There are many people in the country who believe as I believe, that the hon. gentlemen opposite would have voted almost any Pacific Railway contract rather than see the Government fall. Whence they arrive and in ? see the Government fall. Whence then the partizanship? On which side of the House is it? We have been obliged to take care of ourselves, and have defended ourselves when the Government have risen and hurled epithets at us. Government refused to accept suggestions from us, and then because we make suggestions we are unfaithful to the country. I say, where is the partizanship, and where is a better evidence of partizanship than the statement frequently made by hon, gentlemen opposite that though a good many clauses in this contract were objectionable to them they would still vote for the contract, for fear the other ride would still vote for the contract, for fear the other side would come in? Now, we had one evidence of yielding, it was a gentle evidence—I am not going to make any observations about it—but a certain hon. gentleman was said on more than one occasion to have expressed himself very strongly against some of the terms of this contract. He seemed to think that the monopoly that was being recreated in the North-West was as bad as the one he had bought out years before. He had a little concession made to him, one just large enough to hang his hat on, one that enabled him to take part in that interesting little piece of acting when the Prime Minister rose at the convenient moment and promised to withdraw the objectionable clause. So it seems there was a chance to have dotted one i, and to have crossed one t for the sake of winning a recalcitrant supporter. I cannot avoid asking one little question. We have heard about Prince Edward Island. According to the Minister of Marine and River and According to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, it is rather a tight little place. We have heard some things about it I hope are not true. We have heard a sort of rumor about what happened in Ontario, but things have been mighty quiet in Quebec. Yet Quebec is represented in this House, to a considerable extent, by gentlemen who sit on Ministerial benches. I should be sorry, without giving two days' notice to ask those gentlemen any questions, but I should like to know, if it were proper to ask, what arrangements have been made by the Province of Quebec to protect her own special interests. It was held out last winter that the business of the great sea-board trade would be brought down ministry of the Sault Ste. Marie Branch, and thence through Quebec to the sea-board. I would like to ask those hongentlemen, who were so much elated by the news last winter, what assurance they have that this Sault Branch is now to be built. I would like to know whether those gentlemen, if they have not actually made arrangements in this particular, are aware that last year George Stephen and Donald A. Smith, and other members of the Syndicate were powerful allies of theirs in favor of the construction of the Sault branch, and whether they are aware that by this contract they have made this powerful company enemies and opposers of the scheme of the Sault railway? This is an important matter. The people of Quebec ought to be acquainted with it, and if any hon, gentleman would get up and explain this matter in the House, the people of that Province would be relieved of considerable anxiety. Why is that which was so good for us last winter so bad for us now? We have heard a great deal of the security that was to be taken on the part of the Province of Quebec. We have seen in the Minerve and other papers that troubles and clouds of darkness were hanging over the Province of Quebec from which she must be protected, and there have been occasional itinerations of our public men to lead us to believe that they were looking after the interest of their Province; and now, have they placed themselves in such a position that their railways are safe, or may the Syndicate, like the monopolies of the United States, discriminate against all the future trade of that Province? Have they left to the Syndicate the power to build a rival railway along the St. Lawrence and drive them into the sea? We are told that enormous benefits are to accrue to this country from the developments that are now taking place. When an anxious elector has suggested that the interests of Quebec should be looked after, he has been told that Sir John would make it all right. Well, the Prime Minister is about to cease to have any control over the railway destinies of this country. The Prime Minister does not control the Grand Trunk; he does not control the Syndicate; for after they have once got their feet in the stirrups the Province of Quebec, like any other Province, must look after its own interests or its interests will be forgotten. I know that the Province has powerful men in the Government, and if they were not there there would be less danger for the province. If my hon friend who sits before me were on this side of this side of the House there would be a wail of lamentation that would reach to the Citadel of Quebec over the terrible condition of things which now exist. Now all is silence, all is serene. I remember when the hon. gentlemen who represent a majority in that Province thought they had a grievance. There was no silence then. There was a disposition to secure a certain end, and that end was secured against what was thought to be a constitutional doctrine; that end was secured, at all events, by the firm alliance of gentlemen from the Province of Quebec, who said, as we all believed, to the Prime Minister: "Unless Mr. Letellier is dismissed we will oppose you." I do not mention this circumstance on account of the unhappy event which has occurred. God forbid that I should bring Mr. Letellier's name into this debate. But I refer to a great public movement in the Province of Quebec, which I say was a personal movement, and that movement caused the Prime Minister to fulfil the demands of the members from Quebec then, as he would have been obliged to fulfil them now, if the hon. members from Quebec were so inclined. Let me say one word, in which the hon. members from Quebec will join with me. This is, perhaps, no place for the allusion I am about to make; but I think every one will forgive me when I say that there is no man in the Province of Quebec who does not mourn over the calamity which has befallen that Province. The death of Mr. Letellier is a calamity to the party from our North-West and the American North-West by the to which I belong; but it is also a calamity to his native

Province, for when an honest man falls, whether his views accord with those of all his fellow-citizens or not, there is cause for mourning. Mr. BOULTBEE: It is rather difficult to divine at what precise object the hon gentleman who last spoke had in rising, for he seems more to have carried on a desultory conversation than to make a speech on a particular point. He charged the hon, member for Niagara with calling gentlemen on that side of the House, fourth-rate pot-house politicians. I did not understand the member for Niagara to say so, and I should be very sorry that any man should make use of such language. What I understood the hon. member to say was that the new Syndicate was a small trick, worthy of a fourth-rate pot-house politician. These gentlemen cannot say that that cap fits them, unless they assume the paternity of that Syndicate. If they did that they might inferentially come under the cognomen the hon. gentleman applied to the Syndicate; but then it would be through their own act, and not through the act of the member for Niagara. I feel myself, as no doubt the gentleman who spoke last has felt, that very often in the heat of debate we use language which should not be used in a Chamber like this; but I would say to these hon gentlemen who comment so severely on the remarks of the member for Niagara that we have had a great deal to bear from them. We have had insinuations thrown across the House that we have been bribed by the Syndicate. We have heard the man who leads us, and of whom we are proud, charged with a mercenary motive in bringing this matter to an issue. I think gentlemen should consider this a little; they should recollect that we are men with the same feelings as themselves. The hon, member for Shefford (Mr. Huntington), in speaking of the party to which he belongs, remarked that it had been honored with the leadership of Robert Baldwin. I think there is a group around the member for Shefford composed of the heirs of the man who hanted Behort Baldwin into the heirs of the men who hunted Robert Baldwin into a too early grave. They were called Reformers then; but about the time they destroyed Baldwin they were called Grits, and the name has stuck to them since. They cannot up the shadow of Robert Baldwin to cover them now. They cannot call knew that great patriot when a lad; I admired his sterling qualities; and there is no man in broad Canada who would say that if Robert Baldwin were alive now he would have spent seven weeks of useless opposition in trying to retard the greatest scheme that was ever launched in Canada. For seven weeks the discussion has gone on with no apparent object; nothing has been done. Not a vote has been gained from this side of the Honse; no opinion has been created in the country except that this is an excellent bargain, and one which it is well for Parliament to affirm and carry out. The only vote in this House I have seen changed is that of an hon, member who generally, I believe, follows the Opposition, but who now it seems to me is voting consistently and determinedly with this side of the House. After seven weeks' debates, it looks as if the debate would be continued still further; and I ask hon gentlemen opposite what they expect to gain by it. The hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Huntington), appeared to endeavor to raise up some feeling among the members from the Province of Quebec. There seems to be no good ground for that. So far as we can see, the construction of this great work will be of greater service to Quebec than we think it will be to Ontario, and there seems to be no reason to try to raise any jealousy in any such matter, because this scheme is one so grand in its conception, and large in its interests, that it involves the building up of a nationality, and its advantages will be such that not the smallest Province but will feel the beneficial influence of this scheme when it is fully consummated. The hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Huntington), after the subject has been discussed for two months, said the Government permitted no alteration to be made in the con- Domville, tract. No alteration can be permitted. The Government who have the confidence of the people and an enormous majority in the House, and possess not only the confidence of the Conservative party, but a very large portion of the Reform party also, who think public affairs are conducted safely and wisely by the present Administration and are very unwilling to disturb them-spent a whole year in formulating this agreement, and going over clause by clause with the other parties to the negotiations, protecting every interest that required to be protected; and a more carefully drawn instrument I have never had the good fortune to see, and the assault made upon it during the discussion and the attempt made to tear it to pieces more clearly demonstrated. the great wisdom and care bestowed in drawing up the document. But once drawn up who is going to remove from our shoulders a burden which the people thought too heavy to carry; what were the Government to do? It. seemed to me, although the hon member for Shefford (Mr. Huntington) is an older politician than myself, that, to a certain extent, he talked nonsense. The agreement could not be altered and cut up. The bargain was a made-bargain, and what the House had to do was either to affirm or reject it. When the bargain was first thrown against hon. members, owing to the novelty of the transaction, and to itsbeing one with the like of which they had never previously been called to deal, and owing to some of its terms now being sufficiently understood, some hon. members felt uncomfortable. They heard what the Opposition were saying; they heard the opinion expressed by clever men that the agreement would ruin the country and destroy the party, and there was some uneasiness. What been called to deal, and owing to some of its terms not destroy the party, and there was some uneasiness. What has been the result? During two months every clause of the contract has been discussed, and every hon, member on this side of the House is fully satisfied not only that the agreement was well done, but that it is the best bargain ever offered, and they are convinced that the utmost skill and care and the greatest wisdom possible has been shown in framing the agreement, that it is perfect in all its parts, and it will effectively carry out the object we all have.

Amendment (Mr. Mills) negatived on a division.

ORDER, PRIVILEGE, AND PROCEDURE, —Questions of Order: Quoting Documents not before the House (Mr. Mackenzie). Ruled that point of Order not well taken (Mr. Speaker) 43.

On the right to speak from any part of the House (Mr. Casgrain). Rule read that the member must address the Speaker from his seat (Mr. Speaker) 443. On M. to adjourn a debate. Second M. objected to

(Mr. Blake). Mr. Speaker ruled as follows :-

"The motion for the adjournment of the Debate should be pure and simple, but the motion made by the hon, member for Shelburne is an amendment not coming within the parliamentary meaning of the first mentioned motion, inasmuch as it contains a preamble. I am of opinion that the amendment of the hon. member is in reality out of Order, since it contains a recital of reasons for the adjournment of the Debate. As in the motion for the adjournment of the Debate no preamble can be allowed, so to the motion for the adjournment of the House, no amendment can be made, except as to the time of the adjournment. Under these circumstances I feel called upon to decide that the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Shelburne is irregular and cannot be put," 483.

On recording a vote. Member claimed he had a right to record his vote, being in the House when the motion was put (Mr. Bunster). Ruled that "no member shall walk out of or across the House," according to the 17th Rule of the House (Mr.
