SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honor to inform this House that when the House attended His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate Chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a Speech to both Houses of Parliament, and, to prevent mistakes, I have obtained a copy of the Speech, which is as follows:-

Honorable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

In opening this, the Third Session of the present Parliament, I have to offer you my sincere congratulations on the bountiful harvest with which Canada has been blessed, as well as on the undoubted return of her Commercial prosperity, and the substantial development of her various

During the recess my advisers thought the time opportune for making another attempt to carry out the declared preference of Parliament for the construction and operation of the Canadian Pacific Railway by means of an Incorporated Company, aided by grants of money and land, rather than by the direct action of the Government.

Three of my Ministers therefore proceeded to England for the purpose of carrying on negotiations to that end.

I am pleased to be able to inform you that their efforts were so far successful that a contract has been entered into, subject to the approval of Parliament, with men of high financial standing in Europe, the United States and Canada, for the speedy construction and permanent working of this great national enterprise.

The Contract and the papers connected therewith, will be submitted to you without delay, and I invoke for them your early and earnest consideration.

With this view I have summoned you before the usual period, as no action can be taken by the Contractors to prosecute the work, and no permanent arrangement for the organization of a systematic Emigration from Europe to the North West Territories, can be satisfactorily made until the policy of Parliament with respect to the Railway has been decided.

Steady progress has been made in the construction of the Railway now under contract. Two additional sections have been recently opened for traffic, one from Winnipeg to Portage la Prairie, the other from Cross Lake to Keewatin; so that there are now in all 264 miles in operation.

You will be glad to learn that the measures adopted to promote economy in the working of the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railways have resulted in a large reduction of the difference between Revenue and Expenditure; and that the steadily increasing traffic warrants the expectation that during the current year these railways will be self-sustaining.

I have the gratification of informing you that Her Majesty's Government has generously presented to Canada, for training school purposes, the steam corvette Charybdis lately returned from service in the Chinese Seas. The correspondence on this subject will be laid before you.

I have thought it well, in consideration of the increasing duties thrown by the development of the Country upon the Civil Service, and for the more efficient organization of such service, to issue a Royal Commission to examine and report on the whole question.

The Report of the Commissioners will, I believe, be ready to lay before you at an early day; and I ask for your consideration of such Report and of the whole subject of Civil Service Reform.

A measure for the enlargement of the boundaries of the Province of Manitoba will be submitted to you.

I greatly regret being obliged to state that the entire failure of the usual food supply of the Indians in the North-West, to which I called your attention last Session, has continued during the present season, and has involved the necessity of a large expenditure in order to save them from absolute starvation. Several of the Bands have, however, already applied themselves to the cultivation of their reserves and the care of their cattle. No effort will be spared to induce the whole of the aboriginal population to betake themselves to agricultural pursuits.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

The Accounts of the last, and the Estimates for the ensuing year, will be laid before you. The Estimates will, I trust, be found to have been prepared with due regard to economy and the efficiency of the Public Service.

It will be satisfactory to you to know that the existing Tariff has not only promoted the Manufactures and other products of the Country, but has so far increased the Revenues of the Dominion as to place it beyond doubt that the receipts of the current fiscal year will be in excess of the expenditures chargeable to Consolidated Revenue.

Honorable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

Several measures of importance will be submitted to you, among them will be Bills for the winding up of Insolvent Banks and Incorporated Companies; for the amendment of the Railway Act of 1879; for the revision and consolidation of the Laws relating to Government Railways; and for the improvement, in several respects, of the Criminal Law.

I am pleased to be able to inform you that there are now good hopes of our being able to place the naturalization of German Settlers on a Mr. Speaker.

more satisfactory footing. A measure will be submitted, with all the papers connected with the matter, for your consideration.

Your best attention will, I am sure, be given to the subjects I have mentioned, as well as to everything that affects the well-being and good government of the Dominion.

REPORT.

Mr. SPEAKER laid before the House the report of the Librarian, on the state of the Library of Parliament.

HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that the speech of His Excellency the Governor-General be taken into consideration to-morrow.

Motion agreed to.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved:

"That Select Standing Committees of this House for the present Session, be appointed for the following purposes:—1. On Privileges and Elections; 2. On Expiring Laws; 3. On Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines; 4. On Miscellaneous Private Bills; 5. On Standing Orders; 6. On Printing; 7. On Public Accounts; 8. On Banking and Commerce; 9. On Immigration and Colonization; which said Committees shall severally be empowered to examine and enquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the House; and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon; with power to send for persons, papers and records."

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. BLAKE. Perhaps the hon, gentleman would make it convenient now to state when he proposes to lay before us the papers mentioned in the Address—the papers relating to the Pacific Railway agreement.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Immediately after the Answer to the Address has been carried.

Mr. BLAKE. And perhaps the hon. gentleman would say whether these papers will include any other offers and correspondence connected with any other offers than the contract which has been made.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am not yet prepared to say.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Will you be good enough, Mr. Speaker, to state for what reason Mr. Patrick was superannuated. Was it recommended by you on account of his inefficiency?—has he resigned? or what has become of him?

Mr. SPEAKER. The Commission on Internal Economy made a recommendation for the superannuation of Mr. Patrick, because it was considered that his health was not such as to enable him to perform his duties this Session.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I am informed that Mr. Patrick is unconscious of that feeling himself. I would like to know how the members of the Commission found it out.

Mr. SPEAKER. It appears that the patient himself does not know his own state, and the statement made by the hon. member that Mr. Patrick does not think himself unable to perform his duties is, perhaps, the best evidence that he would not have been able to perform them this Session.

Mr. ANGLIN. I have had the pleasure of seeing Mr. Patrick to-day, and, so far as I can judge, I never saw him in better health, physically or intellectually.

Motion agreed to; and (at 3:40 o'clock, p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

OTTAWA, 10th December, 1880.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House proceeded to the consideration of His Excellency's Speech at the opening of the Session.

Mr. BEATY. Mr. Speaker, I crave your indulgence and the indulgence of the House, in the novel situation in which I am placed, with regard to the observations which I propose to make in moving the Address in answer to His Excellency's Speech from the Throne. The calling of Parliament at this unusually early day will, no doubt, find its justification in the important subjects which are committed, in the Speech from the Throne, to the House and country, and especially that overwhelmingly important subject—the question of the Pacific Railway. Whatever differences of opinion may exist regarding a question of such magnitude to the country, there is one point on which we can all agree, and concerning which we can rejoice together, and that is in reference to the abundant harvest which a bountiful Providence has bestowed on this country. And the improved condition of affairs which has been manifested over the whole Dominion warrants us in being grateful for the abundant harvest which has blessed this Dominion during the past year. The prosperity of the country, it is quite true, is sometimes attributed to various causes. is sometimes, notably by extremists, claimed to be attributable to the harvest; at other times largely if, not chiefly, to the National Policy. I think that the prosperity of the country may reasonably be attributed to both causes, as well as to others. Without discrediting the National Policy in any respect whatever, it may reasonably be claimed that the harvest has had a great deal to do with the promotion of the present prosperity of the country, and, without detracting from the great advantages which such a splendid harvest has brought to the country, we may reasonably claim, and it may be readily conceded, that the National Policy has been productive of much good. We would, I think, be very badly off without this policy, and it may be truly said that we would be worse off without the harvest; with regard to both causes, I think that we can very properly rejoice with one another, and congratulate the whole country, upon the fair share of commercial and general prosperity which at the present time is spreading over the land. It indicates that we can attribute to this Policy, as well as to the products of the soil, these benefits. It indicates also to us that a people can help themselves to some extent, and that a Government may do something for the benefit of the country. A policy of inaction, or of doing nothing, is not commendable in a Government any more than it is in the case of the individual or family. Every individual and every family may improve its condition by intelligent industry, and I am of opinion that a Government, by adopting a proper policy, may also benefit the country which it governs. The increase in the exports and imports, which is manifested in the trade returns of this country, shows that there is a vast activity, and a greater activity in all branches of trade and commerce than has hitherto existed; and one important feature in connection with this matter, is the fact that the exports of Canada this year, I believe, exceed the imports by at least a million and one-half of dollars. The imports also exceed somewhat the imports of last year, and this fact shows to us, that, notwithstanding what we may reasonably claim, that a large amount of home industry has been promoted by the National Policy, nevertheless, owing to the increased wealth of the country, not suppose that the maddest Tory-if eyer Tories do become mad-would claim taxation to be an unmixed blessing; but if, in connection with the degree of taxation necessary to meet the needs of the country; and the demands of the expenditure, a policy can be adopted and so adjusted as to continue these conditions and promote the welfare of the country as well, I think that this is a policy which should receive, and which in that has received the sanction should receive, and which in fact has received the sanction of the whole country. We must have money to meet the wants of the Government and the needs of expenditure in connection with the administration of public affairs. To obtain this, taxation necessarily follows, and if, at the same time, we can so arrange the system of taxation as to produce good results to the community in encouraging industries and manufactures, and in promoting trade and commerce, then I maintain that a policy, so simple, so reasonable and so just, is one, regarding the adoption of which the country can be congratulated. If the adoption of which the country can be congratulated. 1f. while there must be taxation, there obtains a proportionate increase in the capacity of the taxpayer, so that the burden of taxation can be borne by him as easily when increased as when the smaller rate existed, then I say that a policy which has produced results of this description is a policy that can be approved of. There is evidence on all sides, I take it, that there is increased activity in trade, in commerce, in manufactures, and in all the elements which go to make up the wealth and prosperity of the country. There is no doubt whatever that this is evidenced by the increased exports and increased imports, and by the contented disposition of the people in all parts of this Dominion. There are not, to-day, that I know of or have observed, any disturbing elements in the whole community. There is no provincial disturbance, no sectional disturbance of any kind whatever, and when we find the people contented and happy, we may readily assume that they are prosperous and gaining in wealth. The large increase in trade, evidenced in connection with the lumber interest, itself shows that a great advantage has been produced in the country through the introduction of such large sums of money as the export of lumber induces, and a very large increase in the exports of agricultural products is also a matter of congratulation. It is sometimes claimed that the National Policy crushes out the farmer, but when one observes the condition of things all over the country, and the large quantity of cheese and butter and the great number of fine cattle exported, it is readily understood that a large amount of capital and labor is invested in the farming interests of the country. Prices have also increased. Cereals, especially the coarse grains, and products of that description, have increased in price. In consequence of these facts, we may, with reason, claim that the tariff does not injure the farmer, while, at the same time, it certainly benefits the residents of our cities and towns. The large amount of revenue which has been produced under the National Policy is, to my mind, one of the strongest indications of the success of that measure. The revenue, this fiscal year, if it comes in at the same rate that it has during the first six months, will produce a surplus of possibly a million and a half of dollars: in view of which we can well say that the Policy, so far as the question of taxation is concerned, has been all its promoters expected it to be-a measure for the advancement of the financial and be—a measure for the advancement of the financial and general interests of the country. But in addition to this, what have we? We have cheap money. Our factories are running. Stocks are booming. The business of the country is prospering. I think, therefore, Parliament, and the whole country, may be congratulated upon the success of the Policy. The National Policy, I may say, can now be regarded as the country's policy. The whole country endorsed it in September, 1878; and since that time, at elections east and west, in city and county—even, as I am just informed, in North Oxford, it has been sustained. At almost every opportunity since last Session of Parliament the the imports of the country have not been decreased. I do every opportunity since last Session of Parliament the country has endorsed it in the elections which have transpired.

Mr. MACKENZIE. It did not in West Toronto.

Mr. BEATY. It did not in West Toronto? It certainly did not endorse the policy of the Opposition. The policy, I repeat, is, therefore, established not merely as the policy of the party, but as the policy of the country. Now the question of the Pacific Railway contract, reference to which is made in the Speech from the Throne, is, I presume, the most important question of the Session. The policy on the subject of that great undertaking, the colossal conception of which will produce a trans-continental railway across Canada, is one which cannot be called a new or novel one. The compact entered into by the Provinces when Confederation was formed looks to this policy, and, I think, I may safely declare, as is intimated in the Speech from the Throne, that Parliament is committed to the construction of the line. I may add, that both Governments, the late Government and the present Government, have acted on the principle that the road must be built, the only difference between the two Administrations being as to when it shall be built, and what means are to be adopted for the purposes of its construction. The country at all events by the action of its public men, is committed to the building of the road, and certainly, if it can be constructed at a reasonable, a comparatively moderate expense to the country, the promise that it shall be built—if Confederation is to be maintained—should be faithfully and honestly carried out. There should be no room for disputation between the Provinces interested in this great work, and the Dominion Government; and all the people should join with heart and hand in the prosecution of the enterprise, which will not only promote harmony and good will in all sections of the Dominion, but will enable us to develope these vast resources, that great wealth, which we know our country possesses, and will form a tangible, a material bond, uniting the old Provinces with the new, and strengthening our loyalty to the Crown, and our love for Canada, its constitution and institutions. In reference to this question of the Pacific Railway, the Government can, as I understand it, in the prosecution of the work, act in one of three ways. They can build the road themselves with their own officers, and the direct expenditure of public money; they can let it out in sections to contractors, by tender, or they can adopt the mode presented in the Speech from the Throne, under which the construction of the road en bloc, can be given to a company, the company to receive grants in land, in money, or in both. The question arises, now, by what means shall the building of this great road be accomplished? How can it be best constructed, with a view to promoting the general welfare of the country? I think the Government has tried the first and second plans. It is about time to try the giving over of the road to a company with a grant of money for its construction. We are told that the contract, involved in the carrying out of this last plan, has been entered into, and that Parliament is to be asked to approve of that contract. All we are asked to do just now, however, is, not to endorse the details which may be presented to the House, but to express our approval of the policy that that this work should be constructed by a company, and that that company should have the power, first, to build the road within a limited period, and then to work it for a limited period afterwards. Now, it may be asked, what are the advantages of this general policy of constructing the road by a company? One advantage, and I think a very great one, is this: that the country will know, under the terms of the contract, what the extent of our liabilities, in the granting of lands and in the expenditure of money upon the undertaking will be. The giving of lands for the purpose of constructing this road cannot be a burden to this country, or a matter at which any one can complain, because Mr. BEATY.

worthless now, and can only be made of value by the opening up of the North-West by the railway. There is another advantage arising out of the adoption of this plan. It We will not only have the expenditure of the Dominion upon the undertaking fimited, but we will have, in consequence of the contract entered into, large sums of money brought into the country from independent sources and spent upon the road. We will therefore have, besides the advantages which are accruing to the country by reason of the causes I have already mentioned, the additional force in increasing the wealth of the country—a large amount of money brought in from outside aud independent sources. A great deal of money must be broughtin, because the company can scarcely be expected to realize from the land, if we may judge from Ministerial statements as to the period at which this road is to be completed, a sufficient sum with which to carry on operations. There is another feature of a very important character, in connection with this matter, and that is the one of immigration. I would not rely wholly on European emigration for the peopling of the North-West Territory. The immigration question is not so important to my mind as the fact of our ability to send the youth of the several provinces to that country, where they may enjoy, under our own flag and our own institutions, the advantages which they enjoyed in the Eastern Provinces, while having, at the same time, abundant scope for their energies, industry and intelligence. I think it is of the first importance that the youth of this country, instead of going to the United States—they have, no doubt, gone to that country, but to nothing like the extent sometimes claimed -should have a field in which their best energies can be employed and where they can secure homesteads, which they cannot so easily obtain in the Eastern Provinces, in consequence of the increasing value of land and pressure of population in them. But there is still left the great fact that this Policy will do most to make those lands valuable and productive -will do most for the development of our resources-that the hope of gain from them, in connection with the Railway, will induce the company to bring in settlers who will people our great North-West Territory. If that is done, the Government will relieve themselves and the country from a very important task, which hitherto has been only moderately successful, that of bringing into this country emigrants from the older countries of Europe. While we, in this country, enjoy the blessings of prosperity to a large extent to-day. every person knows that the bringing in from older countries of the bone and sinew of their population, and of a certain portion of their wealth, which the emigrants possess, is a great benefit to our country; and whilst the immigration was not so large last year, a better, a wealthier class came in than that hitherto observed. This country only wants women and men.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. And children.

Mr. BEATY. Get the men and women, and I am not afraid of the children following. The emigrants and money, coming into the North-West, will promote the welfare of the whole community; and, I am quite sure, that anything that accomplishes that result will be beneficial to the older Provinces, the Eastern provinces of the Dominion. I do not propose to detain you, nor need I, by dealing with details in reference to this great undertaking, but I would simply say, the Government, it seems to me, have done wisely in this matter, and I think the country will endorse the policy which has committed this undertaking to a company for the construction and working of the road for the period usually understood as designed by the contract. It may be said, coming to another point, that if the Government should construct and work the road in as economical a manner as they have shown their capacity to do in regard to the Intercolonial, it might have been left in their hands. these lands, as far as we are concerned, are comparatively But the experience of former years and former Governments does not justify such expectations. True, the working of the Intercolonial during the last year or two, has shown that a very large decrease in the working expenses may be secured by economical or efficient management. In 1878 and 1879 the working expenses of that road were about $2,010,000; in 1879 and 1880, $1,600,000; while there had been an expenditure in 1878 and 1879, in steel rails, of $186,000; at all events there has been a large saving effected, comparing those two years. Then, if you take 1878-'79 and 1879-80 with a view to ascertain the country's loss in working the road, there is a marked contrast between the results for last year and those of the present year. The loss last year was $716,000; this year it was only $97,000. I think, therefore, the country ought to be congratulated on the fact that the road is approaching a self-sustaining position, in which it will be no longer a burden upon the finances of the Dominion. Then, making another comparison, as to the working expenses during the three months of last year, from 1st July to 1st October, the loss on the road was $46,000; the profit during the corresponding months of this year has been $1,400, showing it has reached the point where it ceases to be a loss to the country. Then the P. E. I. Railway, also worked by the Government, shows a decrease in working expenses, as compared with last year, of about $50,000. But there is one feature in connection with this Intercolonial road which, probably, is of more importance than items of this character, and that is, the increasing traffic shows a marked difference from the 1st July to 30th September, 1880, between the receipts for the corresponding period of 1879, there being an increase for 1880 of about $100,000. True, in making the comparison it must be taken into account that the River du Loup section did not belong to the road in 1879, before 13th August, and that it has had the advantage of that branch during the whole of this year. Another very important item in the Speech from the Throne is that relating to the Civil Service, an examination into and report on which will, we are promised, be made by a Royal Commission. It is, I think, a very important matter in the present state of transition in this country that the Civil Service should be placed on a footing that will equalise labor with salaries and reform those inequalities which may exist in the Service. There is one thing to regret in connection with the present condition of the country, and that is, as stated in the Speech, the condition of starvation to which the North-West Indians have been reduced this year as well as last year, necessitating a large expenditure to meet their necessities. This deplorable state of affairs cannot fail to enlist the sympathies of the House, because the sympathies of all civilized communities must be drawn to the suffering red men when, through lack of provisions, they are obliged to appeal to the Government for the means of sustaining life; and, if by promoting agricultural pursuits amongst the Indians, results of this kind may be prevented in the future, all the encouragement and aid which the Government can give towards such an end will certainly not meet with objection. The presentation to Canada for training school purposes of the steam corvette Charybydis, lately returned from service in the Chinese seas, by the Imperial Government, forms a pleasing feature in the Speech from the Throne. This generous act proves that the Imperial Government still retains its sympathies for us, as I am quite persuaded we do toward the Mother Country. The loyalty of Canadians is a subject that need not be dwelt upon, for we know that in every manner, and on every possible occasion, our people have been able and willing to show their devotion to the British Crown, and are prepared to give their sons such training as is needed for the protection of the country, either in the army or navy. We need not seek, as it is sometimes suggested, any new political alliance for the development of this country and the promotion of its welfare. We need not seek annexation. We are able, under the old flag, the old constitution, and those institutions which we have, in principle, at all events, adopted, to work out the welfare of the whole community as well as we could possibly do under other circumstances. country, in view of all the advantages it possesses in its illimitable territory in the North-West, comprising hundreds of millions of acres—with these large tracts awaiting cultivation, with our wealth in forests, fisheries, minerals and other natural resources, there is no reason whatever why we should not have in this country, if we only take proper advantage of our natural resources, millions of people to enjoy the benefits of its great territory and fertile soil. We also possess what emigrants from European countries often think they can only find in the United States. Oppressed, in some instances, by monarchical governments, they imagine that a Republican form of government is the only one which can give them that wide liberty they desire to enjoy; but I believe we can say to them that here they will possess the widest, largest, truest liberty which it is possible for any people to enjoy. We can also assure to them the enjoyment of all the privileges which flow from just laws justly administered by a Bench unsullied in honor, whose integrity and ability are, if not unequalled, certainly unsurpassed, in many respects, by any in the world; -we can assure to all classes of persons the most complete enjoyment of civil and religious liberty. I say, then, with such inheritance in our possession to bequeath to our children, we can look forward to the future with hope, with the prospect that our country will certainly become developed and enlarged in all the elements that make up a great nation; that through the present policy of the Government the improved condition of affairs and the increased confidence of the people in all that pertains to our country's advancement;—the best energies of the people, inspired by new hope, will be devoted to the promotion of the common welfare, of which every person in this Dominion, and every one who will come into it, will reap the benefit. I think, then, that I need not appeal to the patriotism of this House, to the patriotism of every Canadian, that we should all devote our best energies to building up on this continent a nation which may be second to none in all the elements of progress and happiness. What we have to do is to build up this country under a national, compact government, which will give every Province its fair consideration, and the eby prevent the creation of disturbing elements arising out of provincialisms or sectionalisms, and moulding the whole Dominion into one harmonious whole, confident in its national administration and its ability to build the great national highway, which is to be the mainstay of our progress and prosperity, which will unite still more closely in bonds of sentiments and interests the Provinces of our Confederation, extending from ocean to ocean, from the temperate to the frigid zone, and which will afford to the nations of the two continents of Europe and Asia, as well as those of this continent, a new avenue for trade and commerce. In doing this, the Government will accomplish a work that will make this country the home of an industrious, a happy and contented people. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and the House, for the patience and indulgence accorded me, and have the honor to move the adoption of the following Address to His Excellency the Governor General, in answer to his Speech from the Throne:

1. That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General to thank His Excellency for his gracious Speech at the opening of the present Session, and further to assure His Excellency,—that we receive with great pleasure His Excellency's congratulations on the bountiful harvest with which Canada has been blessed, as well as on the undoubted return of her commercial prosperity, and the substantial development of her various industries.

2. That we learn with much interest that during the recess His Excellency's advisers thought the time opportune for making another attempt to carry out the declared preference of Parliament for the construction and operation of the Canadian Pacific Railway by means of an Incorporated Company, aided by grants of money and land, rather than by the direct action of the Government; and three of His Excellency's Ministers therefore proceeded to England for the purpose of carvying on negotiations to that end.

- 3. That we are well pleased that His Excellency is able to inform us 3. That we are well pleased that his Excellency is able to inform us that their efforts were so far successful that a contract has been entered into, subject to the approval of Parliament, with men of high financial standing in Europe, the United States and Canada, for the speedy construction and permanent working of this great national enterprise; that we thank His Excellency for informing us that the Contract and papers connected therewith, will be submitted to us without delay, and that they shall receive our early and earnest consideration.
- 4. That we are grateful to His Excellency for the information that he has summoned us before the usual period, in view of the fact that no action can be taken by the contractors to prosecute the work, and no permanent arrangement for the organization of a systematic emigration from Europe to the North West Territories, can be satisfactorily made until the policy of Parliament with respect to the railway has been decided.
- 5. That we are pleased to know that steady progress has been made in the construction of those portions of the railway now under contract, and that two additional sections have been recently opened for traffic, one from Winnipeg to Portage la Prairie, the other from Cross Lake to Keewatin; so that there are now in all 264 miles in operation.
- 6. That we are glad to learn that the measures adopted to promote economy in the working of the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railways have resulted in a large reduction of the difference between revenue and expenditure; and that the steadily increasing traffic warrants the expectation that during the current year these railways will be self-sustaining.
- 7. That we are gratified to be informed by His Excellency that Her Majesty's Government has generously presented to Canada, for training school purpose, the steam corvette Charybdis lately returned from service in the Chinese Seas, and that the correspondence on this subject will be laid before us.
- 8. That we receive with much interest the intimation that, His Excellency has thought it well, in consideration of the increasing duties thrown by the development of the country upon the Civil Service, and for the more efficient organisation of such Service, and for the more efficient organization of such service, to issue a Royal Commission to examine and report on the whole question, and that His Excellency believes that the Report of the Commissioners will be ready to be laid before us at an early ; and that our earnest consideration shall be given to such Report and to the whole subject of Civil Service Reform.
- 9. That we shall give our best attention to the measure for the enlargment of the boundaries of the Province of Manitoba, which His Excellency is pleased to say, will be submitted to us.
- 10. That we share His Excellency's regret that the entire failure of the usual food supply of the Indians in the North-West, to which he called our attention last Session, has continued during the present season, and has involved the necessity of a large expenditure in order to save them from absolute starvation. That we are glad to learn that several of the Bands have, however, already applied themselves to the cultivation of their Reserves and the care of their cattle, and that no effort will be spared to induce the whole aboriginal population to betake themselves to agricultural nursuits. tural pursuits.
- 11. That we thank His Excellency for the assurance that the Accounts of the last, and the Estimates for the ensuing year, will be laid before us; and that we trust that the Estimates will be found to have been prepared with due regard to economy and the efficiency of the Public Service.
- 12. That it will be satisfactory to us to find that the existing tariff has not only promoted the manufactures and other products of the country, but has so far increased the Revenues of the Dominion as to place it beyond doubt that the receipt of the current fiscal year will be in excess of the expenditures chargeable to Consolidated Revenue.
- 13. That we shall respectfully receive and consider such measures of importance as His Excellency may cause to be submitted to us, including any Bills for the winding up of Insolvent Banks and Incorporated Companies, for the amendment of the Railway Act of 1879, for the revision and consolidation of the Laws relating to Government Railways, and for the improvement, in several respects, of the Criminal Law.
- 14. That we are pleased to be informed that there are now good hopes of our being able to place the naturalization of German Settlers on a more satisfactory footing; and that any measure on the subject which may be submitted to us, with all the papers connected with the matter, shall receive our willing consideration.
- 15. That His Excellency may rest assured that our best attention will be given to the subjects he has mentioned, as well as to everything that affects the well-being and good government of the Dominion.

Mr. VANASSE. In rising to second the motion that an humble Address be presented to His Excellency in answer to the Speech from the Throne, I at once experience the necessity of begging this honorable House to vouchsafe all the patience and indulgence at its command to one of its youngest members. It is according to the usages and traditions of this House that the work of each session should be initiated by two of its members the most recently elected by popular suffrage, and it is this custom—whether it be good or bad it is not for me to say—that gives me the opportunity Mr. BEATY.

am particularly happy, Mr. Speaker, that my youth, a fault with which I am so often reproached, but which I am mending a little every day, can for once at least redound to the honor of the fine county that I have the advantage of representing here; for it was in the name of the County of Yamaska that I was offered, and that I accepted, the honorable duty of seconding the motion that the honorable member has just placed in your hands. I am well aware, Mr. Speaker, that after the speech, as eloquent as it was practical, delivered by the honorable member for West Toronto, all that remains for me to do is to applaud his words, full of confidence in the wisdom of the policy set forth in the Speech from the Throne, and to share in the brilliant hopes that this policy inspires for the future of our country. Indeed, when the head of the Government, supported by official and sure data, comes and declares before the country, upon the authority and dignity of the Crown, that peace, prosperity and happiness reign in the Dominion confided to his care, every friend of his country should be able to find in his heart, enough energy, enough strength and enough patriotism to lay aside, at least for a moment, the unjust prejudices of party spirit, and receive these official statements with the most enthusiastic applause. It is from this wholly national point of view that I wish to judge of the importance of the statements contained in the Speech from the Throne. After having referred to the return of general prosperity in our country, His Excellency draws the attention of the House to the question of the building of the Pacific Railway. This question, Mr. Speaker, is not a new one. It has occupied public attention in England long before it became a part of Canadian politics. More than 30 years ago the Imperial Government even ordered surveys to be made in the North-West in order to ascertain if it were possible to unite the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by means of a gigantic railway on British territory. This question has been before the Canadian public for more than 15 years. Since 1867, it has been, so to speak, the banner of all our federal elections, and to-day, no political demonstration takes place in any part of the country, from the shores of Prince Edward Island to those of Vancouver, without the importance of this great national enterprise being discussed from a political as well as a commercial stand point. In a word, both the political parties that now contend for the honor of conducting the affairs of the country, have admitted, on many and many occasions, the necessity of constructing this railway. In 1871 and 1872, the Government had a law passed favorable to the construction, by a private company, of a railway from the shores of Lake Nipissing to the sea-board in British Columbia. In 1873, the honorable member for Lambton, on accepting the duty and honor of conducting the business of the country, stated that:

"He had always thought a speedy means of communication across the continent necessary for the good of settlement and for the purpose of opening up districts where we have great riches undeveloped in the bosom of the earth. Without that communication their development cannot take place and immigration cannot be affected."

And the hon, member went on to say:

"It will be the duty of the Administration, in the first place, to secure a means of communication to our navigable waters from Lake Superior at Fort Garry and the Rocky Mountains, at the same time commencing at the Pacific Ocean and constructing communication by the western slope.'

The Speech from the Throne in 1874 announced that a Bill would be brought down providing "for easy com-munication with British Columbia as rapidly as possible." On the opening of the Federal Session of 1875, the country was informed, in the Speech from the Throne, that the surveys for the location of the Pacific Railway were being vigorously pushed forward, and that the Government had concluded an arrangement with British Columbia. In 1876, the House was put in possession of all the or bad it is not for me to say—that gives me the opportunity of addressing the House at this moment as seconder of the Address in answer to His Excellency's gracious speech. I delayed the progress of surveys along the line; and in 1878. the official speech of His Excellency hailed with satisfaction the completion of the surveys, and stated that the Government had chosen the route, and that the work would be carried on with the utmost vigor. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, the Confederation would be an incomplete work without this railway. It is not merely the requirements of a policy of expedients that gave birth to this plan of uniting under one flag all the provinces of British North America, but rather the noble and patriotic ambition of laying, on the American continent, the foundations of an Empire under the protection and with the friendship of the great and powerful British Empire. Such, Mr. Speaker, is the object of our Confederation. It can have no other; otherwise this Confederation would be the betrayal of the most legitimate aspirations of the diverse provinces of the Canadian Union. In the minds of the fathers of Confederation, the Canadian Pacific Railway was to be the most powerful material tie of the Federal Union. It is destined, in the first place, to put the Dominion of Canada in easy communication with each of the confederated provinces, and, in the second place, with the entire world. With the Intercolonial in the Eastern Provinces and the Pacific in the Western, it can be said that distances have disappeared, and that there are no more Rocky Mountains. Halifax and Quebec, Montreal and Toronto, Winnipeg and Victoria have become neighboring cities, and Canada is at the gates of Europe and Asia. Such are, in my opinion, Mr. Speaker, some of the political necessities which should induce us to construct, with all the speed and all the economy possible, this great Railway. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, it is easy to foresee the vast material advantages that will accrue to the country if this enterprise is successfully completed. That is the practical aspect of the question, for if we were asked to build this Railway for the mere pleasure of being able to say some day that we have direct communications between the Atlantic and the Pacific, and if this costly route was to be of great use to us in times of war, then, Mr. Speaker, considering the many improvements that our young country yet requires, and taking into account the peaceful character of our powerful but generous neighbors, I would venture to advise His Excellency's Government to postpone the enterprise sine die. But, Mr. Speaker, we are entitled to expect advantages more real, more practical, more immediate, from the construction of this railway which is, in all likelihood, destined to become the greatest artery of Canadian commerce, and the most powerful instrument for the development of all the industrial, manufacturing, agricultural, mining, and other resources of Canada. According to experts and to strangers, who have no interest in over-praising our country, we possess in the west rich and varied mines and the most fertile plains of the world. But through want of communications all this immense natural wealth is unproductive for the country. I might almost say that this great wealth threatens to become a real burden, for the public treasury has had to pay considerable sums for the administration of this vast portion of the national domain. We must, therefore, seek all possible means of colonizing these lands as quickly as possible. Now the history of American colonization shows us, beyond all doubt, that, in new countries, railways are the most powerful means for colonization. And it was only by building railways in all parts of their territory that the neighboring States have been able to stimulate that wonderful progressive movement which has secured for the American Union the place of honor she now occupies among the nations of the world. But it is particularly in the Western States that the operation of this powerful factor in colonization is to be studied. Let us take the example of Kansas. In 1865 there were but 130 miles of railway in this territory, to-day the length of communication by rail in this State is over 3,000 miles; the population of Kansas in 1865 hardly reached 150,000 souls, and to-day it reaches 1,500,000 souls;

the value of real estate in Kansas amounted in 1865 to only $36,120,000, to-day it amounts to $150,000,000; in 1865 there were but 273,000 acres of land in a state of culture, in 1879 there were 7,900,000 acres. I could quote similar figures for nearly all the other western territories of the American Union. Mr. Speaker, the settlement of a country is not an affair of sentiment or of taste, and we should not hesitate to adopt a system that has procured so much prosperity and wealth to all other nations that have applied it. Now, Mr. Speaker, the material and political interests of the country are not alone to induce us to build this road; there is, moreover, our national honor at stake. In virtue of the Carnarvon Treaty, Canada is obliged to complete the enterprise between 1876 and 1890. By signing this Treaty, the former Administration engaged the honor of the country. Can Canada, to-day, fail to keep her word solemnly given under the faith of a treaty? We would be unworthy of a seat in this House, should we not redeem, by all the means in our power, the obligations There is too much glory on the brow of the nation. of our young country for us to sully it with the shame of dishonor. But the Speech from the Throne fortunately dispels all these fears, and reassures the public conscience on this subject. Arrangements, that render certain the building of the road, according to the stipulations of the Treaty, have been entered into. The whole road, from east to west, is to be constructed, equipped and worked by a private company, and at comparatively little cost to the Dominion of Canada. Such is the glad tidings that His Excellency has just given to the country, and which we should welcome with the most joyful unanimity. Henceforth, Mr. Speaker, we can say that the great question of the Pacific Railway is settled. Canada has fulfilled her engagements. Her national honor is safe. I would be very selfish, Mr. Speaker, were I only to see, in the settlement of this question, a success for my party. But I see therein a great national success. It is not a triumph of the Conservative party, but a triumph of the whole country. It is not the right hon, leader of the Government and his colleagues who will profit by this contract, but the people, the country laborer, and the city mechanic. The Government will undoubtedly have the glory and honor of having carried on the negotiations. None can deprive the Ministry of these, but the country will have the benefit, and all the material advantages accruing from this great national success. From the question of the Pacific Railway, I pass to that of the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railways, which occupy the third paragraph of the Speech from the Throne. Our extensive public works have heretofore been a source of expense rather than of profit to the country, and the House learns with satisfaction that the economy practiced by the Government in the administration of these two great commercial highways, has, on the one hand, considerably reduced the working expenses, while, on the other hand, the return of prosperity, the improvement in business have largely contributed to increase the receipts. I beg leave to submit to the consideration of this House a few official statistics as a proof of what I have just stated. Here is a comparative statement of the receipts and expenditure of these two roads from 1876 to 18:0:

According to these figures it is evident that these public works will 'ere long be an abundant source of revenue for the country. The fourth paragraph of the Speech from the Throne refers to the generous gift that Her Majesty's Government has just made to Canada by sending us the splendid steam corvette Charybdis. This gift, that the country accepts with the greatest gratitude, is destined to supply a want long felt in the organization of the forces of the country. We are a maritime people. Perhaps no country in the world possesses a more extensive sea-board than ours, and the interior is covered with lakes and rivers that constitute, as it were, vast inland seas. Nevertheless, we are wanting in marines. The training ship is calculated to create this new calling, and our young men will be able to defend the country on the high seas with as much skill and valor as on land. The next paragraph relates to the enlargement of the boundaries of Manitoba. From a geographical point of view this question offers no difficulty. It through the Federal system, we have taken a distinguished is evident that the boundaries of Manitoba are too narrow. rank among nations. We are no longer a mere colony, but The young giant requires a wider field of operation. The an Empire, allied by the ties of blood and friendship to the MR. VANASSE.

development of our vast western territories, the importance that they have acquired, render necessary the enlargement of this province to the east, north and west. A few thousand square miles cannot constitute a province which seems to have such a grand future before it; but I trust that the new scheme will be devised so as to protect and maintain the civil, political and religious institutions, as established by the Manitoba Act, or any subsequent legislation. As His Excellency says, it is much to be regretted that we are obliged to come to the aid of the Indians, who have had to suffer from the want of food. But let us hope that it is but an accident. We learn, by the latest news received from these territories, that the Indians have been, or are now, hunting the buffalo which, with fishing, has been their sole means of support as well as their chief occupation On the other hand, we must congratulate the Government on the efforts they have made to introduce civilization among the nomadic tribes by inducing them to cultivate the soil, of which they are the original masters. And the House will learn, no doubt, with satisfaction, that the model farms established by Government have already produced satisfactory results. It is with satisfaction, Mr. Speaker, that we have learned, through the Speech from the Throne, that the existing Tariff has not only promoted the manufactures and other products of the country, but has also so far increased the revenues of the Dominion as to place beyond doubt that the receipts of the current fixeal year will be in excess of the expenditure chargeable to consolidated revenue. We have a surplus. It is a long time, Mr. Speaker, since the country was last favored with a similar statement; this is, in my opinion, the most tangible proof of the efficiency of the National Policy. I will not quote any statistics on the subject. The honorable mover of the resolution has said all that there was to say on this question. The figures that the honorable member has laid before the House are unanswerable. They may say all they please against the present Tariff, they will never be able to drown the mighty voice of these figures and of these facts, which alone will be heard and understood by the country. But they think to have overthrown the arguments and facts in favor of this policy by saying that this return of prosperity is not due to the National Policy, but to the action of Providence. I do not deny, Mr. Speaker, but that Providence has greatly protected us. It is doubtless Divine Providence that caused the rich harvests of late years to grow; but it is the present policy that protected these first fruits of the national wealth. What would have been the lot of these abundant harvests if the former fiscal legislation had still been the law of the land? They would have been submerged by the importation of foreign grain, and the farmers of this country would have been obliged to sell their products at half price, or else to put them in sheds to become the prey of vermin, as it happened not more than three years ago in several parts of Canada. If the National Policy does not make our harvests grow in the fields, it at least protects them on our markets, together with the other products of the national industry. The effects of this policy, Mr. Speaker, will not be limited to promoting our manufactures, but the effective application of the protective principle, by creating the capital of labor, and by retaining it in the country, will contribute necessarily towards the development of our industrial centres. The number of consumers will increase, our market will become more and more remunerative for the agricultural classes of the country; and it is through the protection thus afforded it that agriculture will become, what it should never have ceased to be, the first and the purest of our national resources. If the work so well begun is carried out, we may hope soon to see for our country magnificent prospects. Already, great and powerful British Empire; and our loyalty towards England is only equalled by the hearty sympathy of the Mother Country for us. As a mark of esteem and friendship, unprecedented in the history of her colonies. England has associated us with her glory and her power by giving us a noble member of the Royal family to represent in Canada the well beloved authority and the majesty of Our Most Gracious Sovereign. The obtaining of the right to settle our own affairs, and to adopt a National Policy in accordance with our wants, and the aspirations of the country was, no doubt, a splendid victory, and the accrediting of a Canadian Minister with the foreign powers in Europe was another not less brilliant. Thus we effect the conquest of our rights, one after the other, peacefully, thanks to the friendly relations that exist between Canada and the Mother Country; thanks also to the skill, the broad views, the patriotism of the distinguished men who preside over the destinies of these two Empires. And it is thus, Mr. Speaker, that we will obtain the full possession of our rights and acquire, at the same time, national wealth and prosperity. It is with pleasure that I second the motion of the hon. member for Toronto.

Mr. BLAKE. I think everyone will be thankful to the Mover and Seconder of the reply to the Speech from the Throne, for being disposed to attribute some share of that measure of returning prosperity, which we all know exists, to causes on which we can agree with them; but we consider that the returning prosperity is in spite of legislative obstruction. It is pleasant to know that the harvest is an element, at any rate, however slight and modest it may be, and that the increased demand for our exports in foreign countries, and the larger prices those exports have realized, are elements, however modest and slight they may be, as described by the hon. gentleman, that have contributed to the prosperity upon which he desires us to congratulate ourselves. Allow me, before I go further, to correct the hon member for West Toronto, upon a subject on which he is a little misinformed. He was not content with that just measure of congratulation which he might fairly take to himself, as to the results of the late elections, but he also claimed North Oxford. I may inform him that there was a pleasant little family contention in that constituency, where there is a very numerous family of Reformers, but that the candidates were all out-and-out Reformers. If he is not disposed to accept what I say in preference to the gentleman who may have given him the information, let me read an extract from the statement of Mr. Sutherland, the present member for North Oxford. He says: "Upon the great questions of the day, he, as well as myself, is an out-and-out Reformer." The circumstances of North Oxford are these: That while there were two outand-out Reformers contesting the seat, each of whom had a very large measure of support among the Reformers of that constituency, no Tory was found bold enough to go to the polls. With reference to the hon member's own victory, let me tell him, as that has been alluded to, that it was of the Pyrrhic order. Although the West Division of Toronto had returned by an overwhelming majority its old member, yet the hon. gentleman (Mr. Beaty) was returned by only a greatly reduced majority. If the condition of affairs in West Toronto continues to spread, the same proportionate change in the relative strength of parties which was exhibited at that election, as compared with the preceding one, would at the next election give us as the result of that change 64 seats which were taken by the Conservatives in the elections of 1878, thus giving a majority to the Reformers. Now, Sir, the great subject which has been brought before us, and the necessities of which are the justification of this unusually early Session of Parliament, is of course, that which will be most largely discussed upon this occasion. The policy of this Administration since its return to power upon that question, has been, from time to time, very seriously modified. In the first Session of this Parliament the Government proposed to the House a grand scheme involving substantial Imperial aid and countenance in the construction of the Pacific Railway. They included, in effect, the giving of an Imperial character to that work, it being held that as the road was in the interests of the Empire. it should give substantial assistance in its prosecution. In the second Session of this Parliament we heard no more of that glorious scheme, but we were brought face to face with a programme for the construction of portions of the road upon another basis from that which in former times had been suggested. The line was to be degraded into a cheap colonization line, built with sharp curves and steep gradients, and in the cheapest manner consistent with the safety of passengers travelling over it. In that shape it was to be built in detached portions, and a section in British Columbia, and 200 miles on the prairies, were at once to be laid. Now, we find another very serious change in the policy. Instead of that mode of prosecuting the work, the proposal is made that our liabilities—which, so long as the work was to be constructed by the Government, were limited by the different engagements which each Session we might authorize to be made—shall be once and for ever defined so far as a contract can define them, and that, through the medium of a company, the road shall be constructed from end to end, and that we shall be placed in a position which, whatever this obligation may involve, will be beyond recall. With reference to the eastern connection there is also a very serious change in the policy involved in the propositions of to-day. It is well known that, if not from the beginning, yet at an early date, that line on the north shore of Lake Superior was placed in abeyance, and was indefinitely postponed. At different times different suggestions have been made for obtaining a more or less satisfactory connection with the east. Last Session that subject underwent some ventilation here, and some more in the other Chamber. It was admitted by the hon. Minister, who has special charge of the subject of railways, that a good line valuable for Canadian purposes, and extremely important in point, not only of national but international commerce, could be found by Sault Ste. Marie, and that it would be for the interest of this country that that line should be built at the speediest moment. The question of what the Administration were doing was alluded to by me in this House, and it was adverted to in the other Chamber, and the Government were asked as to their intentions. The answer at that time was that the subject was under consideration. Later on, after they had had that period for anxious consideration, the question was renewed in the third week of the month of April, and the answer then was on the part of the Administration, that it was their intention to take steps to procure surveys for the line to Sault Ste. Marie, and to aid, this Session, in its construction. Now, we hear that this line on the north shore of Lake Superior is to be built, and therefore that part of the policy of the Administration is seriously changed. Now, Sir, for these changes, simply as changes, I have no word of complaint or rebuke to utter. In carrying out the arrangements for a great enterprise of this kind, it is not merely right, but it is the bounden duty of the Administration, observing changed conditions, to mould their policy with a view of providing what the best interests of the country may require, and the time for action necessitates. Therefore, I say, I am not complaining of these changes simply as changes, but solely for a purpose that I will point out in a moment, a purpose which requires that we should observe that there are serious changes, for we find that though as the Speech tells us there is a recurrence to an old policy yet there are serious changes from the policy defined and announced and assented to by Parliament in the two first Sessions of this Administration. It is, of course, impossible for us to express an opinion upon the terms or upon the propriety of a bargain which is not yet before us. The hon, member for West Toronto said relations to the road that is to be constructed at that he placed himself in that position. I place myself in that position; but it seems impossible to do more than allude to the weighty problems which are involved in the discussion of this policy, which is to be brought before us this Session. There are very important questions upon which we are to be informed, before it would be possible for us to express an intelligent opinion as to the propriety of the course of the Administration. We know not, for example, what the price is, in works or in cash, for I know no difference except a difference of disadvantage between giving a price in works and giving it in eash; there is a difference of disadvantage, because the cost of completing the work may very largely exceed the estimate of the cost, but there can certainly be no very great advantage, unless we shall find some considerable diminution of the cost as compared with the estimate, a thing which very rarely happens. Nor do we know what is to be done by the country, what is to be paid for out of the Treasury, what are to be the payments in cash to the company as they construct the road. We know not the cash price, in works or money; we know not the amount of subsidy in land; we know not how the terms of payment of cash or of work are arranged, or what they are to be in relation to the progress of the works themselves, or in relation to the probable strain these payments will make upon the resources of the country. These questions are not solved by anything that is before us; we require information upon them before we can intelligently discuss the subject in its clearest and most obvious financial aspect. We know not what are the terms for the selection and the sale of the lands. The arrangement for the alternate blocks is a question of the utmost importance in dealing with this branch of the payment to the company; we know not whether the company is, after being handsomely paid to build the road and run it, to own it too; we know not what the subsequent arrangements are, or whether they are to be subject to the consent of Parliament. We know not, as to the eastern link to which I have referred, whether the policy of the Government last Session is wholly abandoned, whether it is intended to substitute for the announced policy of the Government, the road by the north shore of Lake Superior, whether while we gain that 660 miles of railway, we are to lose the Sault Ste. Marie line. There are here very important questions, questions of momentous importance, with reference to the eastern link and the policy to be adopted in connection therewith. I repeat that though the question of an eastern link has been before the country ever since the arrangement was made with British Columbia, it is a practical question now first presented to our minds for immediate action, and it is the first time that Parliament has been called upon to undertakede finitely to make provision for the construction of that eastern link. We know not what the rate of progress on the work is to be, how far it is to be in advance of the supposed wants of settlement; and if, as is rumored, it is to be very far in advance of these wants, how far the increased rapidity of construction is to involve an enhanced cost of construction in the first place, and an enhanced reward for working the line before the population is in the country in the second place. We know not the character of the road, whether it is to be of the character described by Ministers last Session, when they represented that the work which they put under contract on the prairies and in British Columbia, was for an inferior colonization road, or whether all these contracts, as well as the portion to be constructed by the Company, are to be returned to the old notion of a first-class trans-continental road. We know nothing of these points, nor as to the arrangements for equipment; we know nothing of other main points; we know nothing as to whether it is proposed to enter into any obligation, express or implied, or to declare any course of policy which shall be taken as an enactment with reference to other roads through the North-Mr. BLAKE.

this present time—the Canadian Pacific Railway. know not what provisions are to be made for securing the means of getting into that vast territory. Short lines are of very little value to a country, and it matters little how they are constructed if they are the property of a monopoly; they are merely the means of increasing the profit of that monopoly. That is a subject upon which we ought to reflect. We have the knowledge that has been acquired as to the gigantic powers which have been obtained by railway corporations in the neighboring republic, and the difficulties which have been found in the great West by reason of the existence, in some parts of that country, of practical monopolies. The whole conditions of railway transportation have changed most remarkably in the course of the last ten years, since this scheme was first projected, and there are indications of still further change in the same direction. Great as have been the results in cheapening the price of transportation by rail, I believe that process to have been by no means fully accomplished. You find that the estimated cost-not including profit-for hauling, under the average conditions of freight, is but one-third of what it was ten years ago. The steel rail, the enlarged car, the composite engine, and, in some cases, the multiplication of tracks have produced this result. But there is still an enormous field for the ingenuity of the inventor—in saving in the consumption of fuel, the motive power, and in other ways, so that the hopes of cheap transportation by rail are by no means yet exhausted. But, Sir, while that is so, cheap transportation by rail does not obtain under all circumstances. It does not obtain at all under those circumstances which have given to particular corporations the whole profit which is derivable from these improved facilities, and given the country none of them. Let me enforce these views with an illustration which will, perhaps, bring the subject more clearly before the House, and is not wholly alien to the subject in hand. The December rate per car from Montreal to Winnipeg is $293, and from Montreal to St. Paul $120, which is at the rate of 9½ cents per mile by the car. If you assume that the Government Railway is charging the full average rate charged from Montreal to St. Paul, on each 67 miles, you make the charge $6.37, which leaves for the purposes of the road between St. Paul and Winnipeg—190 miles—$166.64, or 42\frac{2}{3} cents per mile, instead of 9\frac{1}{2} cents per mile, instead of 9\frac{1}{2} cents per mile, the rate over the rest of the journey—a rate more than four times as great as the rate charged in getting to St. Paul. The rate at the general rate would be $37.05, making a total of $153.41—a saving of $129.59, out of $293, or nearly half the freight over the whole distance from Montreal to Winnipeg. If you apply the monopoly rates all over, you get $721 as the freight, instead of $293, and the result of the extra charge on the 390 miles, alone, is this: that it practically, for all purposes of communication involving cost, throws Winnipeg—where? Not seventeen hundred and thirteen or fourteen miles from Montreal, but it throws it to the Rocky Mountains—across the Rocky Mountains to the Pacific shore, without the advantage of the Pacific trade, or adds 1,360 miles, estimating by cost, to the distance from Winnipeg to Montreal. Now, let us consider the rates in the summer time. Last summer the rate from Collingwood to Duluth was $70 a car, but to Winnipeg $243, the rate being $173 from Duluth to Winnipeg, showing that, although some saving is effected by the route by water, yet if you have a link of iron controlled by two corporations, you will not effect much saving in the summer time, after all. I am told that the rate quoted for wheat from Emerson to Chicago by the car was 45 cents a bushel, while I believe it to have been carried by the big car load for 8 cents a bushel from St. Paul to Toronto—a difference that amounted, not to a compensation for carriage, but to a proportionate interest in the profits of every farm in the West territory, constructed or to be constructed, and their | North-West. Now, Sir, that is the state of things in a great many places in the West, and we find ourselves in that position from the want of some provision—whether freedom of competition or other regulation—which shall prevent these facilities from being converted into a machinery whereby the railway company inflicts, in effect, a tax on the farmers of the North-West, instead of a reasonable compensation for the work it does. Under these circumstances I cannot doubt that whatever the Administration have done, they have taken care to provide for the most strenuous competition between the new company and the St. Paul and Manitoba Railway Company, so that the moment we have the gateways of the North-West placed in the hands of a private corporation, we shall have the benefit of that friendly competition and rivalry which will result in the immediate cessation of these extortionate rates and this in a reduction to reasonable and normal rates of profit. There are Sir several There are, Sir, several possible solutions of this problem which is now presented to our consideration. You have that of free competition, that of Governmental power of regulation, that of parliamentary power of regulation, that of arbitration, that of a reserved interest in the country itself, that of giving running powers to other companies so as to preserve moderation in freights, and there may be others. We know not what the particular solution of this great problem is; but that it is a great and difficult problem, now for the first time presented to our consideration by our being practically brought face to face with the proposal that the road shall be owned and run by a private railway company, I suppose no hon. gentleman will We know not what the mode of settlement of possible disputes between the Government and the Company as to the contract may be. We know not what the traffic facilities for the connections with other Provinces may be. There will be one great corporation stretching practically to the ocean steamships; it is right and proper that every facility should be given for trade to go through; it is equally right and proper that every facility should be given to such trade as may be seeking the North-West through other channels, and on fair, equal and advantageous terms to make use of the national highway to which all the Provinces of this Dominion are bound to contribute. We know not what security may be given for the formance of the contract in case a security required. A security is not required unless given for the perenterprise turns out disastrous; but what the nature or the extent of the security which in that event it has been arranged to give us, so as to secure that limitation of the liability on which the hon member for West Toronto descanted so eloquently, we do not know, and therefore of its value cannot judge. All these things press on us now for consideration—all these things, and many more. I do not wish to prolong the discussion of this question by a reference to matters which, though they may be termed matters of detail, are still of importance; but all these things, and other matters are involved in the great question to which our attention is to be addressed. So long as the country was doing the work, so long as from session to session we could practically control it, things were different, but now they are to be altogether changed. Now the matter is to be regulated and arranged once for all, and regulated and arranged by the intervention of a corporate interest, introducing these new elements of difficulty, these new conditions to which, practically, we have never as yet addressed our minds. The aspect of finality and the creation of a company and its rights, therefore, impart elements of the utmost importance and of practical novelty into the discussion of this subject. The hon the First Minister is reported to have said in a speech which he made shortly after his landing in this country, on his return from the English mission, that the contract had been made "firm;" that the contractors would go on at once, whether Parliament met in November or in rect-if we are good boys and say our lessons well, according

February; that the meeting of Parliament would make no difference, and that they would trust to the ratification of the act. This statement hardly coincides with the statement which the First Minister has put into the lips of His Excellency, and which we heard in the other Chamber the other day. It is, of course, for the hon gentleman to reconcile these statements and to explain how it is that his first, and I believe his only, public amnouncement as to the character of this contract and the nature of the arrangement with these contractors, should vary in a degree so material as I have pointed out from that which is now given to us; and whereas it was then a matter of no consequence at what time Parliament was summoned and the work was to progress, it is now said that the public interest requires that we shall not wait to February, but shall proceed immediately with the discussion and come immediately to a conclusion upon this question. In my opinion, Sir, the public interest requires, above all things, that this tremendous business should not be too hurriedly disposed of. The public interest requires, above all things, - and it is the right of the public to demand,—that there shall be some time allowed to obtain that information which has not yet been brought before the country; that the country shall have breathing time for consideration and reflection, for communication amongst the people themselves, as well as amongst the people's representatives assembled in Parliament, before we shall be called upon to give our verdict upon a question so momentous as this. We have been told, not authoritatively, indeed, but it has been suggested in Ministerial organs, that the dignity of Parliament required that no communication should be made upon this question, until the people's representatives were assembled here in Parliament. I am not quite certain, Sir, that there is not more than one hon. member of this House who would have been quite disposed to put his dignity in his pocket for the purpose of allowing himself in common with his constitutents, opportunity, of becoming acquainted with the contents of this paper, and of having a sufficient apprehension of the subject before the meeting of Parliament, particularly if such a result would have also produced the result of a meeting a little later than the present meeting. If an unusual course was to have been adopted, I, for one, should have preferred—in a business like this,—as being more in accordance with the development of popular government which has obtained in this country, that the people should have had the opportunity of expressing their opinion upon this subject at the polls. More than this, we are told that the people shall not even know the details until after it is disposed of. They are not even to become acquainted with the terms of this bargain until after their representatives shall have passed upon them. Time is essential in my judgment; time is due to the people for that consideration which they require and which they are entitled to. I have no doubt that those of us who feel we have responsibilities to discharge on this occasion, have considered this question conjecturally so far as we could. I have no doubt we have thought it over with such dim and uncertain lights as Ministerial bounty has vouchsafed us in the matter. For myself I confess I have thought over a great deal such scattered statements as have, from time to time, been made to us. But I say that this sort of discussion is eminently unsatisfactory. One likes to know, before coming to a conclusion on a subject, what the subject is on which we are asked to come to a conclusion; and I say, as to the mass of the people, that they can have formed no conception of this matter, and that they might properly and reasonably have expected that the papers should have been laid on the Table, and that ample time should have then clapsed before we were called upon to consider them and deliberate upon them. But, on the contrary, according to a rumor which has spread about these benches—I do not say it is corto the instructions of our masters opposite, we may get home on the twenty-third, but if we are not good boys we shall be kept here at school until we say our lessons properly. I suppose we are all willing to work; we are willing to meet at any season, however inconvenient, if the public interest requires it. We are willing to dispense with our Christmas holidays and remain at work, if the public interest demands it; but what is wanted is deliberation and consultation—and then work after there has been opportunity for consideration by the country, but not before. I maintain that if it is considered necessary to force this measure through the House before Christmas, the vast proportion of the electorate will not have even read the terms of the bargain before we shall have made them the law of the land. It was amusing to observe how thoroughly the test of experience verified the position we took with reference to the appointment of a High Commissioner at the last meeting of Parliament. You will remember that the memorandum on which that appointment was made pointed out that-"It is now being found in practice that there are constantly questions arising connected with the administration of affairs in Canada, requiring discussions in a mode and to an extent wholly impracticable by the ordinary channel of correspondence through the Governor General, and periodical visits have to be made to London for this purpose by the important members of the Canadian Government, entailing serious inconvenience. At this moment the following subjects are thus under consideration: the Pacific Railway, and important collateral subjects; treaties of commerce with France and Spain; Esquimalt graving dock; military defence of Canada generally, and of British Columbia more especially; while the fishery and commercial clauses of the Washington Treaty may, at any moment, be re-opened by the United States; with many other matters of importance connected with the better organization of the military force of the Dominion.

matters of importance connected with the better organization of the military force of the Dominion.

"It is manifestly impossible that the views of the Canadian Government on such subjects can be submitted for the intelligent consideration of Her Majesty's Government in any other mode than that of personal communication; and as the subjects themselves relate to different departments of administration, the necessity arises for the absence from their posts at this moment of not less than three Ministers."

And to obviate all this we were to have High Commissioner, and yet we find that all this we were to have language might have been repeated this year in London, by the hon, gentlemen themselves, although their High Commissioner was along with them; indeed, I believe there was an extra Minister along, probably to remedy some of the evils created by the appointment of a High Commissioner. I do not complain that a Minister, or more than one Minister, went over to England to negotiate, but I do complain that the hon. gentlemen made it a ground for the appointment of a Commissioner, that no such results as these would follow. Some information has been given to us from time to time, some small scraps of information as to these negotiations. The hon. Minister of Railways, during the last Session of Parliament, stated that an offer had been received for the construction and working of a large portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway, at that time, by arrangements which were within his grasp, if the Government, chose to accept them. On the 29th of June last, the First Minister was reported to have taken occasion, at a pic-nic, to state that there were two distinct offers at that moment under the consideration of the Government, and that they were deliberating which they would accept, or if they would accept either. After that period they went to England, and the announcement was made, on their return, that a contract had been made; but it did not appear to have been made so firm as to prevent a considerable amount of consideration after their return. We are promised, in the Speech, the papers connected with the contract, but I think we are entitled to have, if called upon to judge the course of the Administration, and to ratify it, the other offers also, and all the papers connected with them. Reason points to that, and precedent sanctions the demand. On the occasion of the last Pacific Railway contract, for other and alien purposes. That resolution authorised down various papers connected with other offers and proposals, Mr. BLAKE.

as to the construction of the railway. It is reasonable, if you demand from us our approval of the course you are taking. in having concluded a particular bargain, that we should know what bargains were open to you, what offers were made, so that we should judge whether you wisely chose, in that ample choice, that embarrassment of riches which presented itself to you when considering to whom you should let the work, and at how small a price, for the building of the Canada Pacific Railway. Now, vast as the subject of this railway is, it by no means exhausts the share which the North-West has in the discussion of this question. There are large questions connected with the land policy of the North-West, apart from the questions connected with the railway grant. Other questions have been raised, also, by Ministerial utterances, as to the grant of very large areas of that territory. The honorable Minister, on the occasion to which I referred a little while ago, declared exultingly, that Mr. Brassey was good enough to tell us he was willing to purchase 100 square miles of our lands, and settle how many persons? His son. So we were to get rid of 100 square miles of land, and receive young Brassey. The hon. Minister announced he was the bearer of that proposal, which he was about to lay before the Council for the acceptance of that confiding, if not obsequious, body. I suppose it has been accepted, and that we shall have the good fortune some day or other, when the country becomes habitable, and those 100 miles are surrounded with smiling farms, to see young Brassey along there. That proposed grant is, in my opinion, not only contrary to sound policy but to the spirit of the understanding on which Parliament has been acting and allowing the Government to act in this matter. The statement with reference to the general administration of these lands was wholly different, and whether this particular grant is beyond the area of the lands included within the regulations or not, I maintain it would have been more in accordance with the dignity of Parliament and the duty of the Executive not to have proposed or acted upon any other policy with reference to the outlying territories than that which they had called upon Parliament to sustain with regard to the others. The regulations of the Government were brought before us when there was an object in so doing, whenever, as to the lands as well as the railway, there had been changes. But those regulations indicated the impossibility of the acquisition by purchase, and without settlement, of any very large areas of territory together. I do not say there are not two sides to this question; there are difficulties on both sides, but what I do maintain is, that the policy of granting to individuals enormous tracts of land in the North-West, is not a policy which the Government ought to adopt, except subject to the prior sanction of this House. We have had experience of large land grants in almost all the Provinces: we have had bitter experience of them in Ontario, and severe experience of them in Prince Edward Island, and also an experience in the townships of the Province of Quebec, but I do not know that we need go beyond the limits of the North-West of to-day to judge of the important consequences of the land policy. We find in the Province of Manitoba, with reference to the difficulties of settlement there, that a large area of territory has, from one cause or another, got into the hands of speculators, and is not subject to conditions of settlement, a circumstance which does, at this moment, and is likely also in the future, to diminish and retard the prosperity of that Our short experience with reference to these consequences in the North-West does not sanction the policy which is now being adopted. There was last Session, a resolution passed to modify the land resolutions, which was avowedly a proposal to make them harmonize with the existing regulations, and it has been used in my judgment of unhappy memory, the honorable Minister himself brought the Administration to alienate 100,000,000 acres of land at a price of not less than $2 per acre. The Government determined upon a policy of graduating the prices—a higher price near the railway and a lower price where land was remote. They took the responsibility of making regulations of that description; but inasmuch as that policy involved the selling of large tracts of land at much less than $2 per acre, it was therefore in conflict with the letter, though not perhaps with the spirit, seeing the average price exceeded $2 per acre. It being wholly in conflict with the letter of the resolution, they brought down, last session, a resolution amending the prior one, and placing the minimum rate at $1 instead of $2. But it was dealared that this was in order to make the resolution harmonize with the land policy formulated by the Order-in-Council and laid on the Table. The purpose for which those sales were to be made, was to aid in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. It is said in so many quarters that I must consider it to be true that that authority has been used for the granting of a very large tract, some hundreds of thousands of acres of land, at the minimum price, and with the real design not of aiding in the construction of the Pacific Railway, but that the price had been lessened with the design of giving a bonus towards the construction of another railway; that the purpose is to alienate those lands at $1, they being well known to be worth far more, in order that the extra profit may inure to assisting in the construction of another railway. Now, I am not saying one word in condemnation of the policy of aiding railways in the North-West where necessary by land grants. Far from it. I am in favor of such a policy; but I am saying that a policy of that description is a policy to be decided, not by the Executive, but by Parliament; that it is for Parliament to decide whether large areas of these lands shall be alienated as a bonus to such companies. It is for Parliament to decide what railways shall be so aided. It was never contemplated by any member of this House, No suggestion was ever made that such a use should be made of the power then given as to enable large land grants practically to be given for any particular railway. I think it should be the the duty of Parliament to lay down the proposition that the alienation of these lands, whether as the quantity or as to the object of the alienations, is a matter of policy, that the alienation which aids other roads, which would not have been accomplished in that particular way, except for that purpose, are things beyond the power of the Executive, and fall within our domain, at their instance, at their guidance, it may be, but still to be decided upon by us before they are acted upon by them. There is no doubt whatever, Mr. Speaker, many rail-ways will be wanted in the North West, if the area, or anything like the area, of fertile land which is said to exist there, does exist. No doubt you might as well talk of settling up that vast area with one cart road as with one railway, although one may be sufficient for the demands of colonization at present. Therefore, I would be sorry for an instant to be supposed to be throwing out any proposal at all hostile to the building of other railways in proper directions, upon proper terms, and giving them proper grants of land in aid; but what I do maintain is, that these are questions of high policy for the decision of Parliament, and that we have not yet entrusted the Executive with the power of disposing of them. We had a nice little paragraph in the Speech last year informing us that a very large immigration was expected during the approaching session, as follows :-

The visit of two Members of the Royal Commission on the agricultural distress in the Mother Country and the favorable report of the tenant farmers * * * will, it is believed, largely increase the number of immigrants during the present year. Preparations must be made for their reception, and your attention will be speedily called to this subject.

The hon. Minister told us, not merely in general terms, but he gave the figures, and told us that 25,000 was the most moderate estimate of the number of immigrants who would be settled in the North-West during the year now closed. There is a reference to immigration this year, too, but I do not observe that congratulatory information which we might naturally have expected, in view of the remarkable verification of these prophecies made in the Speech last year, and, during the debates in this House, as to the settlement of the North-West. There is a reference to further efforts to be made to promote, to create, that immigration which, we were told, had been already arranged for last year, and which was almost to embarrass us with the number of immigrants that were to come amongst us. The information I have received is, of course, not from official sources, and I should be very glad to be corrected at the earliest moment if it is erroneous; but I am told that if the hon. gentleman had divided his figures by three, he would have been found to be an extravagant prophet. I am told that a very small number have settled in the North-West, and that a considerable number that went in have gone out again; and I am told that the departure of several of these is due to the consummation of this same policy of utilizing the powers which we gave for the sale of lands for the construction of the Pacific Railway to the other and incidental purpose of aiding another railway. If my information is correct, at an early period of the year, shortly after the Session, settlers intending to go to one of the best sections of the North-West, the Turtle Mountain district, were warned that they could not be at all assured of the prices which would be charged for the lands. Well, that was not a very encouraging intimation. I remember some ardent speeches upon the subject of a similar intimation made last Session. I remember some hon, gentlemen denouncing an intimation of that description as calculated wholly to destroy immigration to the particular section to which it applied; but so great were the supposed advantages of this particular promised land, that, although that notice was partly effective, although it did a good deal of the good work which it was destined to do, although it did turn away a good many men from the Turtle Mountain, yet some went on despite it and took their chance of getting lands. I am told that that notice, being found not to be sufficiently effective, was followed up by another which declared, as before, that the immigrants could not be assured what prices they would have to pay, but that they could have no security, that they would be allowed to remain on the lands on any terms; and that that last notice had the desired effect, that it turned off the most of those few who had gone on in spite of the first order. I am told that, of these, considerable numbers went straight across the line, Turtle Mountain being not far from the boundary, and adjoining the State of Dakotah; that they found there circumstances which enabled them to settle in that State, and that thus we lost a very considerable number of persons who might otherwise have been added to the population of the North West. It is also alleged that these notices and arrangements designed to prevent, and which resulted in preventing, the settlement of a large extent of Turtle Mountain territory, were made in order that the policy which the Executive intended to pursue, if letting these lands be sold at a large profit by some railway company or other—I do not know the name of the company—might be carried out. I think that very circumstance is a sufficient proof to us that it will be well we should thoroughly here consider what should be the principle of our land regulations, what powers we will accord to the Executive upon these subjects. We learn, from the Speech, that one Royal Commission has issued, a Commission on the subject of the Civil Service. I am afraid we are not to see this Session the Bill which was ready last Session, according to the hon. gentleman who told us towards the close of that Session, that his Civil Service Bill was ready and in print, but it being impossible to get through with it, then had reserved it with a view to its introduction this Session. The language of the Speech is no doubt slightly mixed, but mixed as it is I am afraid it means there will be no Civil Service Bill this Session. However, it is satisfactory so far, that we should be informed from the Throne of the issuance of this Royal Commission. There is, however, another Royal Commission of which we do not hear anything in this document, although I venture to say that it has attracted a larger share of attention, and its operations have been watched with very much greater interest than even the Royal Commission on the subject of the Civil Service of which we know little, and, I suspect, a larger part of the population care less. Now, as to this Commission of which we do not hear anything, it is said that it was issued; and it contains upon the face of it, the averment that it was issued to enquire into allegations or charges made on the floor of Parliament, in reference to certain matters connected with the Pacific Railway. It is said, indeed, that it is not confined to such allegations, but that it expressly embraces in its terms, as one of the material grounds for the issue of an enquiry and for the subject matter of an enquiry, allegations made in this House. I take the earliest oppor-tunity of, for my part, protesting, as I have before protested, upon the occasion of the issue of a Royal Commission of enquiry, into other transactions connected with the Pacific Railway, against any such action on the part of the advisers of the Crown. I believe that to be in fact, and in substance, a serious attack, not upon the dignity, for which I do not care much, but upon the independence of Parliament. I believe that charges which are made here are not to be taken up by the Crown unless communicated by the Crown to this House. I believe that what passes here is to be known there only when we choose it shall be known, and I believe that charges we make here are to be enquired into either by us or by machinery by us constituted, not by machinery constituted independent of Parliament by the advisers of the Crown. And, so far as we may judge from the course pursued in this investigation it seems to me to go far beyond the legitimate objects of such a Commission. Such a Commission may properly be issued in order to inform the minds of the advisers of the Crown, and through them the Crown, of facts of which they are ignorant, or in order to investigate the causes, not, in my opinion, when they go so far as crime, but causes, at any rate, short of crime—of the management or misman agement by subordinate officers of the departments—in order, in a word, to inform the minds of Ministers of things of which they ought to be informed with a view to the proper conduct of the business of the country; but I believe it to be wholly beyond the scope of such a Commission to entertain questions of public policy, political questions, still less do I believe it to be within the proper scope of such a Commission to enter into the question of the particular connection of Ministers of the present or past Government with such questions. These are beyond the domain of such Commissions; they are high and important matters of State to be disposed of by Parliament, or by machinery which Parliament shall devise. They are not departmental matters; they are not oftentimes on questions of fact, they are matters of policy or political questions, with reference to which the confidence of the people of this country may be given or withheld. There is yet another objection, from my point of view, to such questions being entertained by such a Commission. It is contrary to the very first principles of reason and justice that men should appoint their own judges. It is contrary to the very first principles of reason and justice that men should appoint judges for their own adversaries. Both these principles are violated by the appointment of a Commission which we see summons before it Ministers and Ex-Ministers, and calls upon them to purge themselves upon oath as to whether they have been guilty of acts of corruption, or of being personally interested in contracts. I believe that these accusations, if they are to be made here, are to be made on the responsibility of the member, and should be prosecuted according to the machinery which Parliament executive matters any more than we are able to intervene shall devise, and that there is no justice, no precedent, no on matters which are dependent in either House of Parlia-Mr. BLAKE.

reason or fair dealing in the arrangements which, in this case, have been made. Who are these appointed to enquire into these subjects, and what are their instructions? know that Royal Commissioners are bound to act according to the instructions they may receive from time to time; we know that the Crown is entitled to give them instructions, which means the Ministers. Whether the Ministers gave instructions or not, I do not know; but there is no positive rule as to the manner in which these instructions are to be received, or the manner in which they may be communicated. We do not know whether the hon. the Minister of Railways may not, by Order in Council, have up his chief Commissioner every morning in the Department to point out what line of enquiry he should take or what questions he should ask; but, at any rate, when he made a Junior County Court Judge one, an Assistant-Commissioner of Revenue, another, an occasional employee of the Government, a third, and a defeated candidate for a constituency in his interest, the secretary, he has a tribunal very apt to do the work he wants it to do, and which may be doing it, not exactly according to his taste, but still fairly well. Hon, members on this side have no reason to complain about any Commission under any circumstances, but it is our bounden duty to protest against proceedings which might, under other circumstances, be productive of wrong and injustice, and which are based on a violation of the rules of equity. What is wanted in this case is a full enquiry. How is that to be secured? It is to be secured, as we know in all cases involving political considerations, by having both sides represented. That is what is done on the other side of the water when commissions are issued, even though they do not involve questions of political enquiry. These commissioners are not one sided. They are, as a rule, composed of prominent men from the ranks of both parties. Still more, if you are going to have a political enquiry, which is to end in the whitewashing or condemnation of one side or the other, if it is to be an enquiry of this transcendent importance, should not both sides be represented in order that all questions may be asked, all evidence elicited in full, and that the great tribunal of public opinion, and this House, may have the largest amount of material from which to draw its own conclusions? I have never cared much for the findings of such tribunals. What I have been always anxious for is, that they should be so constituted that the facts should be got out, and the facts being got out, let us form our own judgments. Without entering at all upon a discussion of the proceedings of that Commission, or its revelations, and confining my observations, as I have confined them, to the questions of policy and to the constitutional questions involved in the question of such a Commission, I may say that, in my opinion, not merely what has there taken place, but what has taken place and been made public in other ways, and, antecedent to the appointment of that Commission, point to the necessity of some further action on the part of Parliament. I believe, Sir, that the time has arrived at which we ought to take some steps to put an end to the system of contract-broking. I-believe the time has arrived at which we shall best consult our own dignity and standing with the public by placing further restrictions on the right of members of Parliament to act as agents of suitors before departments and the Government for favors of any kind. I impute no unworthy conduct to any member on this occasion, either expressedly or impliedly, but I say that when such transactions as those stated have been made public, when you find it obvious that an impression prevails in the minds of those who are desirous to negotiate with the Government that they can do better by getting the assistance of Mr. So-and-So, because he is a member of Parliament, it is time that such a thing should be put an end toonce and forever, and that for profit or reward, at any rate, none of us should be able to intervene in departmental or executive matters any more than we are able to intervene ment. We have some observations in this Speech upon the general condition of the country. It is agreed by all of us that an essential element in the progress of our country, and particularly since the acquisition of the North-West, is the increase of our population. In that regard I am afraid we are not able greatly to boast. I remember, during the years of the late Administration, the feeling appeals that were from time to time made from these benches. Why, I almost saw tears drop from the eyes of gentlemen opposite when they lamented the depletion that the country was suffering under the malign influence of the hon, member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie). We were told that the country was being ruined by an exodus, not more important in its quantity than its quality—that the lifeblood of the country was going to the States. That was told during those five lean years—those years in which the figures upon which hon, gentlemen based these statements, and which have never been disputed until now. The figures presented in the United States immigration returns, were as follows:—

	1875-76	22,379

a steadily decreasing quantity, and an aggregate of 120,037. It was upon such a showing, both as to the numbers and as to the ratio in which these numbers were diminishing annually, that these lamentations were poured out. Hon, gentlemen who poured out those lamentations forgot that there were five years in which they had held office before, and in which they had not been so deeply moved by this depletion, when the figures had been quite different. They had been quite different, I admit at once. They were as follows:—

an aggregate of 209,400 as against 120,000 in the disastrous years, or a larger amount by 89,000, or nearly 75 per cent. them that which excited the deep grief and woe of hon. genucmen opposite when they occupied these benches. But Sir, they have gone back to office and the exodus has also returned. They have come back to Ottawa, and the people are fleeing the country. When hon, gentlemen quoted the United States figures they had not then found out that they were wholly unreliable, that they were entirely exaggerated, that they were cooked figures, prepared for a purpose, and did not represent the truth. On the contrary, they thundered these figures at us, and we not possessing the acuteness and intelligence of hon. gentlemen opposite, did not say that the United States cooked the figures. Upon the same statements, the figures for the last year amounted to 99,500, and for the quarter following to 37,779, or a total of 137,279, in the fifteen months last past, being 17,200 more than left in the whole five years of my hon. friend, 17,000 more than left in all that period of lamentation; and yet I have not heard a single groan or observed one isolated tear from hon. gentlemen opposite over the departure of their fellow countrymen. Well, Sir, I do not say myself but what we ought all to weep together under the circumstances. We will condole with you if you will only weep with us. You have here a total immigration into the United States in the last year of 450,000 people, and of that total little Canada has contributed two-Her share has exceeded that of England, has exceeded that of Ireland, has exceeded that of Germany, has exceeded that of any other contributor. Our share for fifteen months has been  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. of the whole population, and had there been a similar transference of the population of the United States to us, we would have had an addition of exodus of which the hon, gentleman complained was, largely composed of the normal transference, because the figures are small, but no one can doubt, who has paid anything more than a passing attention to the subject, that these other figures represent an exodus which is wholly abnormal-a serious and calamitous depletion of our most important resources. But we are told, Sir, that we ought not to complain of these things. The hon. Minister of Finance admitted that this exodus was a thing to be deplored, but he said it was not well to exaggerate the thing. He said he found that matters were quite different from what they were represented to be, and he found this by making a careful comparison between a year which ended on the 31st December, and one which ended on the 30th of June; at least, if he did not do so, it is a remarkable and an extraordinary fact that the figures that he gave are those for the year ending on the 31st of December instead of on the 30th June. I say we ought not to keep silence; I say we ought to enquire, and if possible, ascertain what the causes are of this large removal; for even if there are great mistakes in these figures, even if the United States census-takers and statisticians are getting less and less correct every year, no one can gainsay the fact that there has been a large, an unusual depletion of our population. I say, Sir, that we ought not to keep silence. Did hon, gentlemen opposite keep silence? What we say here, in this country and in this House, concerning this affair, with a view to ascertain what the difficulties are, and if possible to remove them, is one thing, but it is quite another thing when the First Minister, with all the authority of his position, standing in the most conspicuous position in which a First Minister could stand, addressing in London a deputation of Manchester merchants, expresses himself thus:

"The consequence is that all the ingenuity, all the ambition, all the mechanical skill and enterprise of such of our young men as have a distaste for agricultural pursuits, or prefer industrial employment, go to the United States. The men who thus leave our country are of the brightest, wisest, ablest, most ingenious. All go away because they can get employment in the United States, where there are manufactures. They won't be farmers and we lose them."

You will notice, Sir, that the hon gentleman speaks in the present tense. The figures told us the quantity, the hon gentleman tells us the quality of the emigration. We have, first, the thousands which are rolled up by those who count the heads, and then we have their value in the hon gentleman's estimation. Such an emigration, and of such a character, is surely deserving of an allusion, even in the Speech from the Throne. But it is my belief that the hon gentleman was in error in describing the cause and the character of that emigration. I believe that a large number of farmers leave this country in order to farm elsewhere; and that, besides losing some of our young men, who want to do other things, we lose large numbers of those who, under other circumstances, would remain on the farms of the older provinces or settle on the farms of the newer districts.

observed one isolated tear from hon, gentlemen opposite over the departure of their fellow countrymen. Well, Sir, I do not say myself but what we ought all to weep together under the circumstances. We will condole with you if you will only weep with us. You have here a total immigration into the United States in the last year of 450,000 people, and of that total little Canada has contributed two-ninths. Her share has exceeded that of England, has exceeded that of Ireland, has exceeded that of Germany, has exceeded that of any other contributor. Our share for fifteen months has been 3½ per cent of the whole population, and had there been a similar transference of the population of that kind believe they are to be fed, they will want food, and although on this occasion this demand may have been, to a great extent, justified by the failure of the food supply, yet I fear that, since in two successive years it has been necessary to feed the Indians of the North-West, it will be necessary to feed them a good many years in succession. Rumors that reach us from some of the officers of that Department are not very encouraging. I have received letters which inform me that a very great degree of extravagance and folly has been practised with regard to Indian supplies; that, independently of the food supplies there have gone forward large supplies of ginger-bread and ribbons and some hundredweights of wax candles, for what purpose, in connection with Indian supplies, I do not know. I believe that one of the officers, guilty of some of those follies, has been very properly removed from his position; but I am afraid that some portion of the extra vote, which we shall be called upon to sanction, will be found to have been needless in the sense to which I have referred. The Speech from the Throne attributes our increased prosperity largely to the Tariff, and gives the interesting information that the Tariff has "not only promoted the manufactures and other products of the community,"&c. I am very glad to learn that the other products of the country have been promoted by the Tariff. It is, certainly, a very sweeping tariff. It covers almost everything, and it is very satisfactory to the country that all the products of the country have been really promoted by its operation. However, it would be convenient, before adopting that clause, to have some information in detail, giving the classes of products, other than manufactures, so largely promoted by the Tariff. The First Minister, in the course of the speech to which I have referred, dealt also with that subject, and his remarks, may, perhaps, answer the member for West Toronto (Mr. Beaty) with regard to some of his economic arguments on the subject of the Tariff. The language of the First Minister, so far as it goes, expresses very clearly the views I also hold.

"Of course, if the question of the accumulation of wealth, if buying in the cheapest, and selling in the dearest market were the only principles to be regarded in the life of a nation, then I would say that our tariff is a mistake, but there are other considerations. There are such things as natural strength and natural development."

The right hon, gentleman proceeded to give his reasons, convincing or not convincing, why national strength and national development can be promoted by a tariff not calculated to facilitate the accumulation of wealth, and which does not give the cheapest market to the buyer and the dearest to the seller. With those reasons we may not entirely agree. We may be disposed to differ with him in the view that national strength and national development are likely to be promoted by fiscal regulations which make us not richer but poorer, and do not give us facilities for buying and selling in the most profitable markets. But it is satisfactory to know that, upon economic grounds, we find that while in England, in that free trade atmosphere, the First Minister, who is largely responsible for the Tariff, as for all other things emanating from the Government, plainly acknowledged that, regarded from those economic considerations, the Tariff was not what the hon, gentleman stated it was to be before the electors of 1878, but was regarded from this economic standpoint as a mistake. On the same occasion the hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) took the opportunity of stating the mode in which the farmers of the country were to be benefitted by the Tariff. We did not hear, when the hon gentleman elucidated his views on this subject in England, some of the wild and extraordinary statements which, upon this subject, were very frequently made before the elections of 1878. I believe there has been a little more caution in putting them forward of late, than was observable in former days. On that occasion he spoke thus:

"It was thought, wisely or unwisely, that it (the Tariff) could be so adjusted as to assist the infant manufactures of Ganada; and as regards the farmers to prevent the great occasional local disturbance in values of agricultural products in Canada, by the interdiction at particular points for particular purposes of the great American capitalists, who form rings and corners of all kinds for the purpose of the disturbance of the trade of other people."

Mr. BLAKE.

There is the extent to which the hon. gentleman offered a tariff to assist the farmers. We do not hear now of the great principles so loudly declared in the speeches in the Eastern Townships and other parts of the country, in which it was pointed out that positive advantages in the disposal of the products of the farmers, that must seek a foreign market, were to be obtained from the new Tariff. But the farmer is now to be simply protected from loss by the interdiction of the products of those shocking American capitalists who invade our markets. We differ as to the remedy for that trouble. But the case of the farmer, under this fiscal system, is stated very much more modestly and moderately than at any former time. The First Minister has declared, like other Ministers during the recess, that the Tariff was "a revenue Tariff" in substance for the purpose of meeting our obligations that it was "essentially a revenue Tariff." I quite admit that in some of its provisions it is a revenue Tariff; in others, the greater part, it is essentially protective; and some, designed for protective purposes, have not quite fully accomplished their object. They are, in the meantime, productive of a considerable amount of revenue. But I believe the Tariff may be more properly described as essentially a protective tariff, and incidentally one for revenue, than essentially a revenue Tariff, and incidentally one for protection; and such it was described in the days when the virtue of such Ta ariff was lauded to the electors of the country before they had had experience of its operation. Speaking generally, it is expressly designed to check importations in favor of home industries. A tariff expressly chosen to check importations in favor of home industries, cannot be properly described as a revenue, but must be described as a protective, Tariff. But it was not the First Minister alone who, during the late recess, illustrated the beauties of the Tariff. The Minister of Finance paid several visits to several points in Ontario, in which he discussed these subjects. I very well recollect that, during the peregrinations of the Finance Minister the season before last Session, when he visited some twenty different manufacturing points with a view to seeing how his Tariff was working, and how the manufacturers felt, and so forth, he announced, on more than one occasion, it was his intention this past season to take the farmers under his protectionist wing, and visit the rural constituencies, and see how the Tariff was working with them. We expected this year his visits would be devoted to that community; but, with one exception, the County of Prince Edward, I am not aware that the hon, gentleman carried out his intention. For electoral purposes he visited North Ontario and came back again; but for the purpose of investigation, which animated him in his other visits, as far as I know, it was only in Prince Edward that he visited the farmers. Now, why lose such an admirable opportunity of discussing the Tariff with the farmers? Why lose the opportunity of verifying by the facts which have occurred since 1878, the promises made to the farmers prior to the General Elections of that year? Why should be have avoided the delightful duty of explaining to them how the prices of their products had been enhanced: how the price of barley, for example, had been raised by the duty, and how other grains had been equally satisfactorily affected? I am sure I do not understand why, when the hon. the Finance Minister had proclaimed his intention to fulfil this duty, he should have so ill-performed it on this occasion. Perhaps he was waiting for a still more convenient season, when the times might be more propitious, and the arguments he might advance to the farmers be more plausible than they could be under the circumstances. I am glad he visited manufacturing points in the Province. The visits were extremely gratifying to the manufacturers, and acted as advertisements of the widest possible kind, of the establishments visited. I am extremely delighted to know that, in the constituency in which I am interested, two important industries have been visited by him, and through the advertisement thus given them their business has, I hope, been increased. I hope the hon gentleman will visit all the towns and give these gratuitous advertisements to all the manufacturing establishments everywhere; but I would beg him to remember that all constituencies are not composed of towns, that there are a few farms in the country and a little portion of his time had better be directed to examining and enquiring into the condition of that class of the community which he promised so long, but which he has not yet found leisure, to visit. The hon. gentleman began his operations by the publication in the Gazette, after a reasonable interval, of his balance sheet for the year, and I must say, I was surprised that he should have set his hand to such a statement. hon, friend beside me (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) has demolished, and I suppose will again demolish, here in presence of the hon gentleman, the calculations which justified, in his view, the proposition that $1,300,000 of revenue had been anticipated by his operations. But, assuming all that, assuming it to be an accurate calculation that $1,300,000 had been anticipated, I am not aware of any precedent whatever for any Finance Minister making or authorizing any statement of revenue of any country which would include so large a portion of the whole as that already received, which was not really received in the year, but added for the purpose of forcing a less unfavorable balance than the real statement would have brought down. There are many points in which the hon. gentleman strove to satisfy the electors of Ontario that the Tariff was a blessing to them. I do not intend to follow him through all his fallacies. I wish to advert, however, to one or two in particular, because the speech brings up the subject in a prominent manner, and the honorable gentleman from West Toronto, in general terms, asserted a feeling of the country in regard to the Tariff which, in my opinion, is wholly incorrect. The Finance Minister referred to the duty on coal on several occasions, and he declared that that duty was imposed in pursuance of the policy of creating good feeling and inter-provincial trade, that all parts were benefitted by it. Well, we desire to create good feeling as much as he can. We desire to foster legitimate inter-provincial trade as much as he can, but we altogether deny that either a good feeling or legitimate inter-provincial trade can be created by the process by which he seeks to accomplish these objects. Now, it was very amusing to hear, in the very next breath, the hon, gentleman topple down his house of cards when he said :-

"I may say, as a member of the Government, that if the American people will take off their duty on coal and admit, free, the product of our Nova Scotia mines, which lie convenient to their hand, we will take off our duty on coal, and let the West have theirs free as before."

Well, what about the kindly feeling and inter-provincial trade? Is kindly feeling to be restored and legitimate interprovincial trade to be created by the imposition of the coal duty which forces Nova Scotia coal to the West; and yet is the Finance Minister prepared to forego these advantages in order to secure the free admission of their coal into the United States? But the hon, gentleman ventures to defend the tax on another and wholly inconsistent ground. He defended it as a revenue tax, in which case it could not produce, of course, that kindly feeling by creating inter-provincial trade; and he said, as a revenue tax, if we do not get the revenue out of you this way we must take it some way else. As a revenue tax it fails in its object of promoting inter-provincial trade and is besides wholly indefensible, because the hon. gentleman is not entitled to take revenue out of one section of the country and leave the other untaxed. It is a local, sectional, partial tax, not merely upon the whole country, nor upon a whole province, but upon a particular portion of the population of that province, and therefore, as a revenue tax in that particular, and also because it is a tax on a first necessity of life, and a raw material in effect, it is wholly indefensible. The hon. The hon. gentleman said the coal tax was not "a patch" to to the Tariff.

the coal oil duty. He declared that the imposition of the coal oil duty was necessary to the building up of a great industry, and that the industry was entitled to some consideration. Why was it entitled to consideration? Let me give you the answer in the member's own words: "Inasmuch as we have not the free flowing oil wells that they have in the United States, but are obliged to produce it at a great expense of unprofitable labor," we are compelled to impose a duty of 200 per cent. on the raw material and something like 60 per cent, on the manufactured article. Well, upon this coal oil question I think another observation has to be made. In the first Session of this Parliament, in the very last days of the Session, a bill was passed, read through its three stages, I think, in a day, perhaps in a moment, without any time for its consideration. It was known that what might be expected to happen did happen, that the bill was a mistake in many material parts, that it was ill considered, that the proper opportunity for consideration by all parties interested had not been given, and the natural result followed. Last Session, in just the same way-not in all particulars, because in some respects the question was under debate for a long while on the motion of the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Colby)—the Government brought in a bill at the end of the Session, and it was run through without any opportunty being given for enquiry or investigation; and it has turned out that, in one particular, some of the unfortunate results of that legislation have been due to that circumstance. I refer to the change in the specific gravity, which a letter written in the name of an oil producer, states was known only to one party interested in the trade, and the others were not able to discuss, and which has had the effect of very largely increasing the price. I suppose, in this Session, we shall have a third coal oil bill. I hope it will be brought down in such time that information on a subject somewhat abstruse and technical, and on which it is important that the views of those interested should be known, may be obtained. The hon, gentleman also adverted to the sugar duties, and more than once brought forward an isolated fact in a manner which I regretted to observe, and which was not intended no doubt, to produce a false impression, but which did produce an impression wholly at variance with the facts. The hon, gentleman used, at Stratford and at other places, language like this:

"Let me point out another fact: It is this—that refined sugar has sold at our refineries in Montreal for less than it could have been imported at that time if the old tariff had been in existence. There may also at times have been a slight increase in the price; but though there was that slight increase, you must remember that that increase has been amply covered by the lower duty collected on the lower grades of sugar."

Now, Sir, what I complain of is that his statement indicated that sugar was, as a rule, and upon the whole, not sold at prices higher in Montreal under the new Tariff. The hon. gentleman adverted to some occasions on which, owing to the state of the market, there were no differences in price, and he used that statement as indicative of the general result. Well, Sir, that surprised me at the time, because those of us who had looked at the discussions as they had been going on from time to time, and had been observing the quotations, were led to the conclusion that this would not be a fair inference from the course of trade. I have not verified the figures, but I have observed the figures which have been published in a newspaper in the hon, gentleman's own city. They show that the average New York price was $6.13, which with the duty added would be $8.65, while the average Montreal price was $3.70, making on the average a difference of $1.04, or $1,114,000 on our average imports, and a much larger sum on our imports of 1880. I believe, if you take all periods of the year, you will find a general current of prices which would produce this, or something like this, result. The general tone of the speech has been to attribute the improvement in business largely We aver that that improvement is not due to, but in spite of, the Tariff. It is quite true that good harvests, a long continuance of economy, the circumstance that the export of lumber is at very much better prices, as well as in increased demand, and the circumstance that our good harvests are paying us by reason of a fair price for grain, have produced a revival in the business of the country. But it is to these circumstances that such a revival as has taken place is due; and that revival, I believe, would have been much more marked if our people, during the last few years, had been freer to trade where they would have liked to trade, and to buy where they would have wished to buy. I believe that the restrictive, or so-called protective, influence of the Tariff has been to delay and to diminish the advancing tide of prosperity, instead of promoting it. If it be true, as I hope it is, that we are entering upon a period of prosperity, it is our duty to be wise in time, to remember that we have had periods of prosperity before, and that they have been followed, and will, according to all past experience and to obvious reason, be followed by a period of reaction. It is our duty as a Parliament, particularly, to be cautious with reference to our permanent commitments. We must remember that at a former period, while the tide was on the flow, hon. gentlemen opposite calculated upon its permanent advance, and that they made lasting commitments which it was found difficult, or impossible, to meet or to break, when the tide began to ebb. Our permanent commitments ought to be based, not upon the progressive increase of revenue during a time of prosperity, but upon the reasonable average progress which we may expect, taking the flows of prosperity and the recurrent ebbs of depression altogether. And if we neglect that consideration, and if we impose burdens upon this country incommensurate with its average rate of progress, a temporary period of prosperity will have injured more than it will have improved our situation. This applies to us all. Every man of us in his private affairs would act upon these views, and as a nation we must act upon them or suffer the consequences. The first duty of the Administration, in my opinion, is, if the revenue does show a surplus, to diminish the excessive burdens of taxation. Those burdens of taxation have been imposed contrary to pledges made by the hon, gentlemen before the elections, because they said that the financial condition of the country required them, because they said they found its financial condition was so much worse than they had expected, that it was necessary to impose burdens which they regretted. Those burdens are onerous in the extreme, and if the imposition of those burdens has produced a surplus, it is contrary to the duty of the hon. gentlemen to pretend to a fictitious prosperity based only on receipts from excessive burdens, and it is their duty to relieve the country from some portion of that taxation the moment it has been found And, in relieving the country from that taxation, it is our duty first of all to consider which are the most odious, the most partial, the most sectional, the least productive taxes, to take away those taxes and to leave our people unburdened by them, the freer to promote their individual, and by promoting their individual, to promote the national prosperity. The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Beaty) took, in my opinion, a somewhat questionable view of the political situation. He said that we were all perfectly contented, that there was no sectional difficulty, no feeling of annoyance, that the Tariff was no longer the Tariff of a party, but of the whole country. Did the hon. gentleman read the resolutions passed the other day at a large meeting in British Columbia, which is going to have its railway, it seems, but which nevertheless declares that the Tariff has been very injurious to that country, that it is a burden and not a benefit? Will the hon. gentleman invite, Mr. BLAKE.

them the effect and operation of this Tariff, and find what they have got to say about it,—about the feeling of their people, its effect upon their provinces, and its proximate effect upon the future of this whole Confederation, if some of its iniquities be not removed? After the hon, gentleman has had those opportunities which he may open to him during this Session, I venture to say he will not find himself able to revel any longer in that dream of universal happiness and contentment produced from one end of the country to the other by the Tariff which he adores. I hardly dare to hope-yet hope I will-that our discussions may be characterized by the spirit of caution and moderation which I have suggested, that it may not be proposed to-day, as some years ago it was proposed, to take advantage of this temporary tide of prosperity to plunge the country into permanent commitments which its average rate of progress will not permit. I hope, I say, that moderation may characterize our counsels, and that our decisions may be such as will redound to the honor and conduce to the advantage of the country whose interests are committed to our hands.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Mr. Speaker, I must begin by congratulating my two hon. friends, the mover and seconder of this resolution, upon the able manner in which they have addressed this House--a manner which must have been pleasing to the House. I must also congratulate my hon. friend who has just taken, his seat upon the vigorous manner in which he performed the duties of the rather forlorn position of leader of the Opposition in this House. He has spoken well and vigorously, but while we receive him and listen to him with pleasure as the leader of the great Liberal party, I must say that his practice, as shown by his conduct to-night, has not been that of a Reformer. Why he should return to the old fashioned way of talking de omnibus rebus, and attempting to introduce into the Speech from the Throne a discussion upon every possible subject that can engage the attention of the House, I do not know. We have had coal and coal oil, the sugar duties, my Manchester speech, my hon. friend the Finance Minister's visit to Bowmanville, in fact every possible subject, with all sorts of suppositions and rumours, introduced into the debate. "It is rumored here;" "it is stated in the organ of gentlemen opposite, there;" and "we have heard so-and-so so frequently that it must be true." These rumours have formed the bases of the speech of the hon. gentleman, who, in consequence of his having accepted such rumours, has built up a series of card castles, which he will find 'ere the Session is closed, will fall to pieces. Sir, the hon gentleman, though he had taken this course, cannot expect, and I am sure the House cannot expect, that we will follow him by taking up the several points to which he has addressed himself. The hon, gentleman has, however, attained his object. He has pleased the House on both sides. He has given us the opportunity of listening to an admirable and eloquent discussion of public affairs; and he has given great satisfaction, no doubt, to the gentlemen behind him. But I decline, for one, to be drawn into a debate upon any specific matter, until a bill, measure or resolution dealing with that subject is before the House. The practice in England, and in this country, which was adopted with the approbation of both sides of the House, is that in the formal acceptance of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne such remarks as may occur to the leaders on both sides may be made, and the Address be then passed in order that we may place ourselves in a position to go on as early as possible with the work of the Session. What good can the dragging in of a discussion on the Tariff question, to-night, We have discussed it for two Sessions. Whether it is to be ultimately satisfactory to the country, is for the future I do not say upon the floor of this House, but to a private to say. Its discussion to-night can answer no good object; conference, such of his colleagues as come from Nova Scotia, and if we do not conclude its discussion to-night, we will in New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island, and discuss with fact lose a day, and be prevented from entering as early as we should upon the consideration of the great question, for the discussion of which this House has been summoned. thank the hon. gentleman for the remarks he has made with respect to every possible contingency which may arise out of the giving of the construction of the Pacific Railway to a private company. While we thank him very much for the suggestions he has made, and for the doubts he has raised, we cannot say we have little doubt whether the measure, when submitted to the House, will meet with the hon. gentleman's objections or his approbation; but that it will be accepted, not only by this House but by the whole country as a satisfactory solution of the great question which overhung the destinies of this country and which, in some degree, from the apprehension that the country was going to be plunged by it into an unlimited expense, has retarded the progress of the country and prevented people from having in its future that confidence which it deserves. I am satsified that this House and the whole country will receive a measure of relief from the responsibility which has been thrown upon us in respect to the construction of the railway. The hon, gentleman has said -and this is the only other remark I shall make, in connection with the Pacific Railway-that the Government ought to have laid their arrangements before the country before Parliament was called. I do not think he could have meant to go so far as that, because he is too good a Parliamentarian not to know that such a course is contrary to Parliamentary practice and principle. No measures of Parliament are to be submitted, in the manner at which he hints, to the people for their approbation. All measures are to be carefully prepared and considered by the representatives of the people specially elected for the purpose. The members of Parliament are to sit down together to consider the various questions before them, to listen to the views and opinions of their brother representatives, and to bring to bear upon every question, all the knowledge they can acquire regarding it. It is for them, according to the British Constitution, to deal with questions of this kind; and it is contrary to the British Constitution to submit any complicated measure for the discussion of the whole people. The hon, gentleman, who is a good parliamentarian, knows perfectly well, that we would not have been carrying out the principles of the Constitution, had we taken the course which he suggests. It is not a question of whether it would be an affront to Parlianot, to lay these papers ment or before the public in the first place rather than before Parliament, it is a question of principle involved in the difference between the American and the British systems. It is a matter of principle that, of all such subjects, Parliament should have the first knowledge. Parliament should listen to the proposals, and Parliament should be the tribunal to judge of their wisdom, because its members are appointed by the people to apply their best judgment to the decision of all such questions. There can be no more imperfect tribunal, for the decision of any specific question involving details, than the whole country, no matter how well educated and intelligent the people may be. The hon, gentleman almost went as far as to say that we should have a plebiscite. He says that a question of this kind should have been submitted to the people in the first place. Sir, we know what a plebiscite means. A plebiscite means the machinery by which a tyrant forces a question upon the people. We know what that is in other countries. We are not going to introduce the French system, the Imperial system here. We are going to adhere to the grand old rule of the British Constitution. But, Sir, if it was right, or obligatory, or expedient that we should have submitted the measure to the people, involving, as it does, questions of great import, as to the expenditure of money and the development of the country, why did not the late Ministry, of which the hon. gentleman was for a considerable time a member, and for some time a supporter, though occasionally not a very strong one, submit country, that the statement, or calculations rather, which I

to the people their new railway measures in 1874, which effected a complete change with respect to the railway system and especially with reference to the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway? Why was not there then a dissolution and a measure submitted for the decision of the people? The hon, gentlemen came into office in 1873. They had prepared their measures before 1874. According to the doctrine laid down by the present leader of the Opposition, I do not believe the late leader of the Opposition can, as a British parliamentarian, support the doctrine, the late Premier would have had, on account of the largeness of the scheme, to have submitted his proposals to the people before laying them before Parliament. But we had a measure in the ordinary way just as if it was to incorporate an orphan asylum. A bill was introduced, the ordinary parliamentary practice was followed, the bill became law, and enormous expenditures were incurred without a previous announcement of the measure to the people, and without asking them for their decision or their opinion upon i However, fir, I shall say no more about the Canadian Pacific Railway except in this relation: the hon. gentleman alluded to a remark of mine when I was caught on the wing at Hochelaga, when coming home here to Ottawa, by a deputation from some of my political friends in Montreal; and when I said that contractors were ready to go on with the road and build it, whether the Parliament met in November or February, I stated what was the fact. The contractors are in carnest, Mr. Speaker. The Syndicate are resolved to build this road and they are able to do so; and they had such confidence, in fact, in the arrangement being a fair one, both for themselves and for Canada, that they were confident it would meet with the sanction of Parliament whenever it was submitted, and, therefore, if Government had told them "go on at once and we are satisfied that Parliament will confirm our action, and sustain you in whatever expenditure you have gone into," they would have been quite ready to have gone on with the undertaking. And, Sir, notwithstanding sneers that have been thrown out on the subject, I believe, the gentlemen who have undertaken this great and responsible work will complete it successfully, that they will run and work it successfully, and that they will open up that country to the utmost extent which such a great enterprise is calculated to cause; and in doing so, they will relieve this country of immediate responsibility of expenditure in building the road in a great degree and from apprehension that a great railway like this would be used as a political engine, and that, run as a Government work, it would not be so satisfactory an institution. or means of opening up that country. While this would be the means of enabling parties who had gone into that work to receive reasonable compensation for their expenditure, it was felt that they would accomplish the work infinitely better than Government could possibly do. The hon. gentleman, in his remarks, then went on to speak about the land policy of the Government. I think, Sir, that this is a question which the hon, gentleman ought to have well considered before he threw broad cast insinuations, not charges, with respect to the land policy. He says he had read that certain people had been driven away from Turtle Mountain, and that notices had been issued, stating that people's claims would not be recognized. What I can tell the hon. gentleman is this: that the law of the land is there, and that the Government thought it well the people should get notice of exactly what the law of the land was. They were told, lest they were mistaken, lest, lying under misapprehension, they should feel themselves wronged hereafter. People got full notice of what the law of the land was; and therefore if they acted in contravention of these laws, they should do it at their own peril. Their attention was merely called to the character of the law and this was the extent of any notice which was given. The hon, gentleman says, in speaking of the influx of immigration into that made last year were altogether inconsistent with facts. I regret very much to say, Mr. Speaker, the estimate which was formed by officers of the Government, under the best evidence that could be well obtained at that time, has not been realised. I regret to say the extent of the immigration has not been so large as we had every reason to suppose would be the case. There are some reasons for it; but, in the first place, I may say that the hon gentleman has, in his statement, far underrated, I believe, the amount of the immigration into the country this year. The hon gentleman said that instead of 25,000, not one third of this number had arrived; but I believe the hon gentleman is entirely wrong.

Mr. MACKENZIE. No.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman says "No." One of the disadvantages connected with a discussion of this kind with reference to the Speech from the Throne is. that a rumor or statement is made, and documents are not yet before the House to show the utter fallacy and erroneousness of the statement so recklessly made—so recklessly made, I repeat, I have no hesitation in using that word. The hon. gentleman spoke with a degree of glee and enthusiasm, and of enthusiastic joy, regarding the fact that the country was disappointed in its reasonable expectations that there would be a large addition last year to the immigration. The hon. gentleman said that be remembered how, when we were in Opposition, we used to weep at the depletion of the country owing to the malign influences of the late Government and of free trade. Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether we dropped any briny tears in Opposition, but I am quite certain, we regretted it. We saw the consequences, the continuing, the inevitable consequences attending the continued depletion of the country, if this country had remained under their guidance. We regretted it, Mr. Speaker, but certainly did not rejoice on account of it at the time. On the other hand, my hon friend seems to think he has made a great point in being able to state that this country was not so prosperous as we hoped it might be. He is one of those men who, rather than have his own opinion controverted would submit to any sacrifice. The hon, gentleman has stated, and has elaborated the statement with great ability and zeal, that by no possibility could this country progress in the manner we had hoped and stated was within the range of our expectations; and the hon. gentleman would have been graver had his calculations been overborne by contrary facts. There was a very good sketch of one of the gentlemen who acted with my hon. friend, in a late number of Grip, in which the gentleman is represented as weeping, and when he was asked what he was weeping for said: "Oh have you not heard the bad news: that barley has risen?' The hon. gentleman gloats over the fact that the immigration into the country has not come up to our expectations, and though he may suffer from it himself as an owner of property, and though the country may suffer by its more tardy prosperity, yet he would make a sacrifice of himself and the prosperity of the country for the sake of verifying his predictions. He is in the position of the man who laid a bet with his co-laborer that he could not carry him to the top of the house in his hod. The bet was made and the man jumped into the hod. By slow degrees the better was landed on the roof. "Now," he said, "you have landed me safely." "Well," said the other, "I have got to pay you, but I am sorry. You nearly made a stumble once."

Mr. BLAKE. I thought I had a chance about the third storey.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. With regard to the immigration, it has not, as we have been obliged to admit, been equal to our expectations, but it has been composed of a very respectable and a very wealthy class. The exact numbers I could not state until we lay the return before the House, but I may say that the hon. gentleman has greatly underestimated the amount of emigration into this country. I Sir John A. Macdonald.

can state this, that during my late visit to England with my two hon. friends—who will corroborate what I say—I found that Canada is creating great attention in England. There was a rush of people of means and fortune wishing to change their destiny by leaving the Mother Country for Manitoba and the North-West. The hon, gentleman will say we have no right to predict, because my predictions were not carried out last year; but I will venture to say that he will find that in 1881-unless it is dwarfed to some degree by the unpatriotic exertions of some hon, gentlemen in Canadawe will have a very large and a very satisfactory emigration from the Mother Country. I hope also that the additional aid of this railway company, which, like all other railway companies having a grant of land has a distinct and great immediate object and advantage in helping forward immigration, will have a very decided effect in that direction, and that unless something unforeseen occurs, unless hon. gentlemen opposite redouble their exertions to keep people out, we will have a very large immigration into this country from this time forward. There is no doubt that the speeches of the hon, gentlemen opposite have been quoted in England against this country. They were thrown up in our faces and quoted as reasons why we could not ask Englishmento enter into Canadian enterprises. I refer to the speeches of the hon. member for West Durham and of the hon. member for Lambton last year, but we have, besides the silent speech, the likeness of the former hon, gentlemen which appears in the pamphlet I hold in my hand. We have here the expressive face of my hon. friend—a very good likeness, but not quite so handsome as the original. And we have too, "Extracts from the Hon. Edward Blake's famous speech delivered in the Canadian House of Commons." When, in addition to the hon. gentleman's speeches, in addition to his vast influence, we have the handsome, intellectual and expressive contenance of my hon, friend along with these speeches going among people who do not know him so well as we do—and we can scarcely resist him—I say is it any wonder that some should be found who are not proof against his wiles, and who believe his statement that Canada is the great recruiting ground for the United States, that some have been led away by the exertions of the hon. gentleman and his friends, who otherwise would have made their homes in our own territories. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blake) alluded to the Civil Service Commission mentioned in the Speech. Well, the Government, as the hon. gentleman truly states, was prepared to bring down a measure on the subject last Session, and the more we looked at the question the larger it appeared, and the point the Government wished to arrive at more satisfactorily than any other connected with the Civil Service was that respecting the outside service, which has never been really studied in any systematic way with a view or desire to arrive at any organic change or improvement. This, I need not say, is not a party question. It is a question in which hon. gentlemen opposite are equally interested with the Government of the day. Should the time ever come—I am sorry to say, for the future of this country that their time may come some day—that they will be on this side of the House, I have no doubt they will gladly profit by any changes this Commission may suggest, if they be amendments; and I think they will assist the Government in carrying out such This is a matter, as has been said, in which there is no immediate, earnest, burning necessity, and this question can, therefore, be fairly and fully examined, and the result of this examination, which, I think, will be thorough and exhaustive, will be laid before the House. While the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blake) rather taunted us with our want of energy and zeal in this matter, I am not aware that hon. gentlemen opposite took up the subject with any energy. think it was left to the solitary exertions of my hon. friend opposite, from West Elgin, (Mr. Casey), who has followed it would be a pleasure to us all, the improvement of the efficiency of the Civil Service. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blake) alluded to another Commission, which he said was of much more importance. In the first place, he protested against such a Commission at all. He said, I protest against this as in 1873 I protested against the other Commission on the l'acific Railway Scandal question. He protested it was unconstitutional, improper, altogether contrary to the principles which should actuate any Government, or should be sanctioned by any Parliament. Among other things, he said the Government should not choose their own judges. Well, this is not a matter of judgment. There is a special Statute on the Statute book providing that, whenever any enquiry is necessary for the good government of Canada, the Government of the day shall have power to issue a Commission and demand an account. So the power of the Government, under the Act, is beyond a doubt. If they have that power, they must, of course, have power to select the Commission. I will venture to say that in this case the choice of the Commissioners will do no discredit to the Government in the eves of the House or of the country. It was announced in the House, press and country that there had been gross improprieties—this had been made the battle-ground of both parties there were charges and counter charges of misconduct of official subordinates, and even insinuations as well as assertions with regard to members of the Government. It is absurd to suppose that a Committee of the House could by any possibility satisfactorily examine into matters of that kind. It would be a farce, a most perfunctory enquiry if made here, in Ottawa, dragging witnesses from British Columbia and the Georgian Bay, for the purpose of a full enquiry. The only consequence of this enquiry will be this: if the Commissioners will carry out their commission honestly and impartially, they will enquire into all the proceedings connected with the railway. They will report without fear, favor or affection, what they consider has been wrong, what extravagant, what well done—what parties are liable to censure, who are worthy of praise. I can only say this—and if my word be doubted, we can prove to the House—that not one single word of instruction, not a single word of insinuation, not one hint has been given to the Commissioners or any of them as to the manner in which they should perform their duty. The Commission itself tells them what the object of the enquiry is. They are told, there are your instructions, and there are to be no other. The Government sent no officer with them to guide them, no legal man to push a charge against one man or withdraw a charge against another. They left the Commissioners completely unbound in the future, to go where they might, to do what they chose, to call such witnesses as they pleased. I believe it will be satisfactory to the House and country to have a thorough onquiry, the more especially before one of the measures of the Government—that of transferring to a railway company the construction of the road—is adopted; that the exact position of the road, the exact truth or falsity of the suggestions that insinuations or have been made may be ascertained the exact state of the case at the time the road is handed over by the Government to the company be fully known. The enquiry should elicit the facts as to the circumstances under which the Government and Parliament of Canada handed over this great work to this great company. In the meantime, no man is condemned by that enquiry, no one convicted by it. As the hon, gentleman said, it is a Commission of Enquiry, and therefore must, in one sense, be a one-sided tribunal. It must be appointed by the Government of the day, and therefore it may be supposed the Government ought to have some influence or interest in the selection of the Commissioners. But, that enquiry is not binding or conclusive

Parliament, if he thinks that, either by act of the Commissioners, or by the slurring of his case—by the avoidance or bringing up of any testimony, for the acquitting or clearing of any man, any injustice has been done. House will readily protect any man or any number of individuals who can make out any case of injury or prejudice to their standing by the evidence taken before, or the report of, the Commission. But the most extraordinary feature is this, that the hon. gentleman, while in the first place he protests against the Commission as being improper, illegal and unconstitutional, states it is a one-sided tribunal, that we ought to have men on it from both sides. But the hon. gentleman would not sit on it himself. When the last Commission was issued in 1873, the hon. gentleman and his hon, friends protested against it as being unconstitutional; they would not sit on it; and they would not sit on it now. It would be absurd to ask those hon gentlemen to sit on a Commission which they declared to be unconstitutional and improper. The hon gentleman to-day took up the same points as at Toronto, in his successful campaign there, and might have therefore spared us the repetition, which had rather the air of a twice-told tale. But with respect to this same Manchester matter, it arose thus: I was in London, not as Mr. Bethune said, because I was afraid to meet the electors of West Toronto, but I was in England on the purpose, which you all know, that of forming the syndicate. Fifteen members of Parliament connected with the Manchester interest asked to see me. At first I thought it would be no good, but on the whole concluded it would be discourteous not to meet them. I was told it was for the purpose of these gentlemen attempting to impress upon me the injury that the trade of Lancaster and Manchester especially were suffering from our tariff, and I met them for that purpose. Instead, however, of their pressing upon me as a member of the Canadian Government, the great hardships that they complained our fellow-countrymen in Manchester and Lancashire were suffering from; instead of making an appeal to Canada to alter the tariff in order to assist their trade, these gentlemen got up and delivered me a Cobdenite lecture, telling me the people of Canada were fools, that our tariff was nonsense, that we were ruining Canada, and for the salvation of Canada it was absolutely necessary we should alter our tariff. I was inclined to say, the people of Canada knew their own business as well as the people of Manchester. The hon gentleman ought not to have taken that verbal criticism on my remarks, when he said I spoke in the present tense. I was giving them the reason why Canada ought to alter the tariff, and was showing that under the influence of free trade when our markets were open to the American manufacturers and theirs closed to us, we had no hope of manufacturing in Canada, and that all the ability, constructive skill, skilled labor, everybody in fact but those who were engaged in agricultural labor, was drawn to the United States. In order to prevent this, this tariff was introduced, and I believe the tariff was and would be successful in one of the objects for which it was got up. The hon, gentleman says I stated it was a revenue tariff. is a revenue tariff and an incidental protective tariff at the same time. The hon, gentleman may remember for years and years the Conservative party adhered to the one statement that the tariff should be so readjusted that while it would meet the revenue requirements of the country, and equalize the revenue and expenditure, it would incidentally, at the same time, develop and foster the varied interests of the country. That is the resolution which I moved years ago. It was carried out after the present Government came to power, and I say it here, and the country knows it, that both objects have been gained, that we have changed a deficiency into a surplus, equalized revenue and expenditure, upon any man. Every man, the moment the report is restored confidence at home and abroad in the resources submitted to the House, can come before Parliament, and and credit of Canada. At the same time honorable claim a Committee of the House, and protection from gentlemen opposite cannot but fail to see that in every part of the country new manufacturing industries are being established and old ones extended, lifted out of the slough of despond, and now becoming centres of industry, employing a population, which otherwise, in my language to the Manchester people, must have gone off in sheer despair to the United States. The hon. gentleman has spoken about the Indian supplies, and I regret that he should speak about rumors of extravagance, rumors of distributions of silks and wax candles. That is going a little too far. The hon, gentleman must see that such rumors must be founded on a very weak basis. That there have been large expenditures, owing to very inadequate means of transport, and very inadequate means of checks on subordinates, as hon, gentlemen opposite have found, I am free to admit. There has been one case, certainly, of wanton extravagance in the conduct of an officer, which was most unexpected in one of his standing and experience, and he has been removed from office. With that exception, I am not aware that the distributing officers have not performed their duty. It is unwise to allude to rumors unless the allusion is followed by a distinct statement of facts, with the evidence connected with those facts. I may have, perhaps, trespassed on the rule I laid down that we should get through as soon as possible with the Speech from the Throne in order that we should get at work. I will again congratulate my hon. friend on his very able speech, but I will say however, that I think he ought to take rather a 'leaf out of the hon. the Finance Minister's book. My hon. friend has stated he was very much obliged to the Finance Minister for having visited his constituency, for having visited its factories and made speeches which proved good advertisements. Could not the hon. gentleman also make some speeches which would be an advertisement for the good of the country, instead of making speeches for the purpose of keeping people out of the country, or sending people away who are in the country by showing them the superior advantages of every other country but his own. Let him follow the example that he praises in his hon. friend. If it is good for my hon. friend the Finance Minister, it is good for the hon. gentleman to give the same assistance to the country of his nativity which is proud of him and in which he has not displayed the confidence which I think he ought to have done as a public man. The hon. gentleman. in his opening remarks, spoke about the election in North Oxford. He said he was happy to tell us that Mr. Sutherland is a Reformer, and read a statement of Mr. Sutherland's that he is a Reformer and that his father was a Reformer before him. That may be true. I have no doubt it is true; but I say that in this House and this country there are many men who can say that they are Reformers and that their fathers were Reformers before them, and who have confidence in the policy of the present Government. But, Mr. Speaker, I have no reason to doubt that, in the mere party sense of the word, Mr. Sutherland is an opponent of the Government and a supporter of the hon. gentleman opposite. But there are Reformers and Reformers, and it is a significant circumstance that such an old Grit constituency as the North Riding is, should throw over the candidate selected and ordered by the organ of hon. gentlemen opposite, the man of all work, Mr. Patullo, the agent of the Reform party and its organizerin order to choose a man who had less previous connection with the official leaders of the party. But the hon, gentleman not only asserts that Mr. Sutherland is as good as Mr. Patullo, and I have no doubta little better, but he says that there was a moral victory or something of that kind in West Toronto, that my hon. friend (Mr. Beaty) has no cause to boast of his triumph there. I think he has a great deal to boast of. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blake) and the other leaders of the Opposition went there in order to defeat him. All the guns of the Opposition were there to aid in defeating the hon. member for West Toronto, while I like a coward, and some other members of the Government, went off to Fingland. He was elected, notwithstanding the able Sir John A. Macdonald.

speech of my hon. friend. The hon. gentleman thought he was going to have more than a moral victory, and I think he told the people of Toronto that he had travelled over 800 miles in order to join with them in the great victory they were going to achieve. I am sorry my hon. friend's retirement at the seaside was interrupted so needlessly. It was a great sacrifice on his part, and all I can say is, that I condone with my hon. friend that he made the sacrifice and did not get the victory.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a word before you put the motion. I have no intention of extending the discussion, because I am quite certain that hon. gentlemen opposite and we on this side are satisfied that it should stop where it is. But the hon, leader of the Government accused the hon, member for Durham (Mr. Blake) of violating the practice that was established many years ago in this country of allowing the Address to pass pro forma, leaving the matters of which it treated to be discussed afterwards when specific subjects were brought up. Now, Sir, during the last year of my incumbence Parliament met on the 11th of February, and the hon. gentleman himself (Sir John A. Macdonald) led an opposition of eight days to that Address. There are 346 pages of Hansard taken up almost entirely by hon. gentlemen then in Opposition, now on the Ministerial side, and yet the hon. gentleman, with that forgetfulness which characterizes him sometimes, now reproaches the leader on this side of the House with violating the practice which he says was established many years ago. Why, Sir, I was quite astonished when I heard the hon. gentleman's speech. I appealed to him on that occasion, but his answer was that though the speech itself was as innocuous in its wording and neutral in its character as any speech could be, yet the member for Norfolk had introduced some subjects in his speech, and therefore we must go on with the discussion. Now, Sir, I think the speech of the hon. member for Durham did not touch in detail any subject which is likely to be discussed before us. It dealt with which is likely to be discussed before us. It dealt with general principles, and although the hon, gentleman may object to it, as a speech on the Address it was perfectly legitimate. Nay, Sir, it would have been legitimate if we had gone into a discussion for days, because the Speech challenges contradiction, the Speech affirms what it ought not to affirm—that "it will be satisfactory, to know that the existing toyiff has not satisfactory to know that the existing tariff has not only promoted the manufactures and other products of the country," and so on. Now, I maintain that it did nothing of the kind, and I maintain that it would have been the privilege of the leader of the Opposition to enter into a detailed argument to show that this was a misstatement of the factsto go into a formal and exhaustive discussion to show the injury the tariff has done to the manufactures of the country as well as the great industry of farming. Farming is an industry as much as making shoes or any other industry, and the farmers are entitled to protection from the tariff of hon. gentlemen opposite. We do not propose to go into that, but I merely call attention to this to show that the Speech is not worded so as to invite that form of discussion which the hon, gentleman thinks should have been adopted, and which, I think, was adopted. The hon. First Minister complains because a ministerial paper printed some garbled extracts from the speech of the hon. member for Durham, and placed a portrait of the hon, member at the head of the Speech to prevent emigrants from coming into the country. First Minister should get out a counter fly-sheet, and put his portrait at the head of it so as to attract emigrants into the country. That would be a just method of retaliation, and no one who had seen the portraits side by side could hesitate for a moment. The hon, gentleman says that my hon, friend from Durham wished to have a sort of plebiscite or vote of the people before some great coup d'état which be expected. Nothing of the sort was said or implied; but it was implied that the public out of doors, of whom we are the representatives, ought to know something of such a great scheme as this. The hon. gentleman says that I, while at the head of the late Administration, gave no premonitory indications of the measure I was about to introduce. If the hon, gentleman looks at my address to the electors of Lambton, he will find that the scheme is laid down there in great detail, and he will find, if he looks at the votes, that he himself pratically approved of that scheme when it was brought here. We made no delay in bringing in our measure, but we only brought it in after it had been discussed for weeks by the press of the country. I listened with a great deal of interest to the hon. gentleman to learn whether he would confirm or reject the rumor that I heard in a very influential quarter that we were expected to decide this matter before Christmas. The hon, gentleman did not choose to do so. If he has forgotten it, I will be glad to give way to him now to tell us whether it is his deliberate purpose to give this House

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will tell the hon. gentleman that, with the assistance of the majority of this House, such is the intention of the Government, for the reason given in the Speech. It is important that if this policy is to be carried out, it should be carried out at once. Immigration very much depends upon it. The company cannot organize, nor take any step to bring out emigrants before the contract is ratified. They have only got January, February and March to prepare the work in. Emigrants will be here in May, and it is of very great importance, if Parliament is going to adopt the arrangement, that it should do so with all convenient speed. We consider it of so much importance that we shall ask the House to take it into early and earnest consideration; and to remain here with as short a Christmas interval as possible until it is passed.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Of course I can tell the hon. gentleman at once that, so far as I am concerned, if his measure is a right one, a just one, I shall not only offer no opposition, but I will help him through with it. But if his measure, as I fear it will, be what it ought not to be, then I want time to discuss it, and I shall probably occupy some little time in doing so, because I consider it is my duty as a representative of the people to discuss a measure fraught with such great consequences to the country as this is. But, Sir, if these gentlemen who are now in such a desperate hurry to bring out emigrants, had so much confidence two months ago that everything was right and that they could go ahead safely upon the assurance that the hon. gentleman opposite could give them, how is it that they are in such a hurry now?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They have confidence enough to spend their own money, but not confidence enough to make statements to the whole of the population of Europe.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The hon, gentleman is always a little too sanguine about his immigration schemes. We have had two statements from him during the last two Sessions, and both of them were so very inaccurate as predictions that I am afraid we cannot pay much attention to mere speculative opinions advanced at the present time. These opinions are valuable only in so far as we see ground for hoping that they may be realized. What is wanted in the North-West I will not enter upon to-night, because I mean to discuss that pretty fully from information I have. I have merely to say that no immigration scheme that can be devised in connection with the railroad, or otherwise, can be successful so long as the present system is carried on by the Department of which the hon. gentleman is the head; I do not say who is to blame for the matter; that I will discuss on another occasion. The hon, gentleman says it is preposterous and ridiculous to have witnesses dragged before a Committee of this House in order to give information, such as it is now sought to obtain, I presume, by the commission appointed by the hon gentleman opposite to investigate the Pacific Railway contracts. Well, it is very late to discuss that now, because the hon gentleman and his immediate friends behind him have been promoting arrangements of this kind every year for the last five years, and prosecuting inquiries in the Senate, where they had an absolue majority the whole time, in the most exhaustive—I will not say unfair, because the reports will show that—in the most exhaustive manner. So it was in regard to this House, both before the honorable gentleman took office, and since, and it is, surely, a most extraordinary position to take, that the Government is not to allow this House to express an opinion, or to attempt to collate facts. That must be done, it seems, after this, by a Royal Commission, and we may express our opinion upon it, if we like, after that is all done. Now, I have only to say that if that is the honorable gentleman's idea of a Commission, it is wholly different from mine. but ten days in which to agree to a measure upon pain of ladmit that the Government may appoint a Commission to being punished by not having a holiday. down pretty fully and fairly in May's Parliamentary Practice, and there it is confined to a certain line. But this Commission has been examining Ministers, and other parties upon the policy of Government, upon the route of the Pacific Railway, even upon matters which they can have no knowledge of, and no business to inquire into. Now, what we wanted to know was where the Commission obtained any instructions to do this, or if there were instructions apart from the commission which seems to authorize those gentlemen to do what Parliament, I presume, will never sanction. I can hardly believe that gentlemen on the other side of the House will set aside their own dignity, to use their present phrase, and the independence and privileges of Parliament in order to have certain friends of the Government appointed upon a Commission to do things which they have no right to do. That is the position the matter is in. I merely mention these few things as matters that seem to come prominently before the House since the hon. gentleman spoke. I also had some expectation that the hon, gentleman would have answered the statement of my hon. friend respecting emigra-tion from Canada. The hon. the Finance Minister denied the statement published from official documents in the United States. The hon, gentleman was horrified, to use his own words, while in Eastern Townships two years ago to find that so many Canadians went to the United States. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) gave a list of figures for the last ten years, including the last season, and the hon. gentleman opposite did not venture to challenge the accuracy of any of those statements.

> Sir JOHN A. MACDONALI'. Yes, I did; I stated that the hon. gentleman was altogether wrong, and I instanced it as one of the inconveniences of discussing these things now.

> Mr. MACKENZIE. I am speaking of the emigration from Canada.

> Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is the same thing exactly.

> Mr. MACKENZIE. Oh, no, it is not the same thing precisely, one was going and the other coming. That matter will no doubt be brought up again, because the honorable gentleman must have an opportunity to verify his statements, and show how it was that he was horrified a few years ago when we were in power at a thing that ought to terrify him now if he was horrified then.

> Mr. POPE (Compton). I rise to correct a wrong impresion which may go to the country and may be drawn from the speech of the hon member for Durham, in respect to emigration. Undoubtedly it has done a great injury to the cause of emigration, on the other side of the water, to publish such reports as that there were 17,000 who went away from Canada. If the hon member will, for one moment, think of the number of people he will see that these people have Customs authorities pass their goods free of duty in consequence. I much fear that when that matter comes up it will be found that the figures of the United States authorities are indeed inaccurate, but most unhappily in this, that they seriously under-estimate the number of those who are leaving the country. Hon, gentlemen, as usual, choose to get up here and make random and reckless assertions, as they did before, without taking the trouble to examine the United States authorities. I venture to say the hon. Minister of Agriculture has not taken the trouble to examine the recent United States returns, and if he has examined them he must know that one of two things is the case, either those returns are falsified, or else those facts I stated on the authority of the United States Customs returns are literally true.

Mr. POPE (Compton). I would inform the hon. gentleman that I sent a man to that very port, and he asked the Collector how he got at the figures. "Why," says he, "I can tell pretty well by looking at the train; I never count them.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Nimmo, over his own signature, expressly denies that, and Mr. Sanborn, the Collector at Port Huron, over his signature, expressly states that that is a falsehood. I will not say whether Mr. Sanborn is at fault or whether the agent of the hon. Minister is, but I say this, that this matter has been brought to the attention of the Collector at Port Huron, and he has, in the most formal fashion, over his own signature, denied the statements of the hon. the Minister of Agriculture on the authority of his subordinate. Let us look into this matter, let us ascertain from what causes this tremendous exodus from Canada is taking place, and if it appears, as I believe to be the case, that, to a large extent, it is due to the enormous taxation under which sections of this country are laboring, then I say, on their own evidence, out of their own mouths, these hon, gentlemen are convicted of having attained power under false pretences, of having utterly failed of redeeming any and every one of the pledges they made. They told us their dearest desire was that Canada should be for the Canadians, that their hearts were breaking by reason of the enormous depletion of our people, and during the first year their Tariff has been in operation, as my hon. friend has said, the emigration has been five-fold greater than it was the last year my hon. friend conducted the affairs of this country. I am not disposed to protract the discussion on the Address, but I will say that if the hon, the First Minister had designed and invited discussion on the Tariff, he could not have done better than to allude to it in the way he has done in the Speech. What is that paragraph? That "It will be satisfactory to us to find that the existing tariff has not only promoted the manufactures and other products of the country."

Now. Iwould like to have the First Minister explain how he promotes other products than manufactures by a tariff-how he promotes wheat, beef, lumber. The hon. gentleman arrogates to himself a particular blessing of Providence on himself. I think he will find it difficult to show that the tariff he has specially designed to cause certain lines of goods to be manufactured in this country, can have any particular effect on the production of those leading articles to the additional production of which this prosperity has been due. Now, my impression is, that the improvement which has taken place is clear enough, and that it is due to causes entirely beyond the control of the hon. gentleman. It was not due to the hon, gentleman that there has been a revival of trade in the United States, owing to which we have been able to sell them a larger quantity of lumber than before; it is not due to his policy that there have been two good harvests on this side of the Atlantic, and two bad or indifferent harvests on the other side. I do not think the First Minister would assert that the National Policy can have effected the growth of cereals or our capacity to sell lumber arrived at Port Huron. Now, then, I have seen it stated that the number who passed there was 99,000. How many would have to pass there every day? 'Ihere would have to be 300 emigrants pass there every week-day of the year, and something over. As a matter of fact, I have investigated the matter, and I may now state, for the information of my friend, the member for Lambton, I find that all the tickets that have been so d and that have been given do not amount to two-thirds of that number. I find that the number of those who proceeded to the west did not amount to anything like that number; not more than two-thirds. I find that the whole number of people who went that way and bought tickets to come back was less by 15,000 than that number. I will be able to lay these figures before my hon. friends, and I will be able to show them what is the state of things; but I would ask, is this patriotic, is it right to send statements like these brondcast and have them published on the other side of the water. As to the number of emigrants we have had in this country, let me tell them that the emigration this year is very much larger, it is more than double that of last year. They are men of means who have come into the country, and a large amount of capital has been brought in. When we speak of the emigration to the North-West, it is true that in the summer the number that has gone there has been expected, but it is equally true that had a very wet season, and my hon. friend, the late Finance Minister, knows that is one of the causes why people could not get there. Then, again we hoped to have been able to have had a railroad in the interior of the country, that the emigrants might have gone on, but, unfortunately, the wet weather came and the people could not get into the country, and the emigration fell off. I should be sorry to have these remarks of the hon. gentleman go forth in the country, and I am sure they would be sorry themselves that a false impression should be caused by their being circulated on the other side of the water.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I regret exceedingly to be obliged to go into this question to-night, but as I took it upon myself, after full consideration and examination of this matter, to make certain statements with respect to emigration from Canada to the United States, I feel that I cannot possibly permit the assertions of the hon, the Minister of Agriculture to pass without comment. I regret as much as, and probably more than the hon gentlemen opposite, the enormous exodus which has gone on, and is still going on every day, from Canada to the United States. But I say this, that no greater act of folly, no greater act of unpatriotism could be perpetrated than for the Opposition to shut their eyes, or to allow the Government to shut their eyes, to this extremely unhappy and unfortunate state of things. It is the duty of this House, and especially of those members who are on the Committee of Emigration, to probe this matter to the bottom. When I made the statement at the Town of Goderich that a certain number of Canadians had gone from this country to the United States, I had taken all the pains that could be taken to ascertain the manner in which the United States authorities estimated these people. I say here, on the authority of Mr. Nimmo, the head of the Bureau of Statistics in the United States, that this 99,000 odd who left Canada for the United States in the year ending 30th June, 1880, were persons who had declared their intention of becoming settlers in the United States. I say that the United States Customs authorities do not take cognizance of stray and casual passengers. I have crossed the frontier twenty times myself, and I suppose hon. gentlemen here have crossed it a hundred times, and were they counted in that number? At the proper time and place I will produce statistics from the United States which contain two distinct columns, in one of which are entered all the passengers, and the other including those who formally declare their intention of becoming settlers in the United States, and the to other countries. When we are told that the effect of the Mr. Pore (Compton).

Tariff has been, by promoting manufactures, largely to increase the revenue of the Dominion, I would like to call attention to the fact that the whole policy of those hon. gentlemen was to stop the importation of dutiable goods. They alleged that the enormous importation of dutiable goods was a great evil, that we imported far too much. They were to institute manufactures here, which were to take the place of a large portion of the goods then imported. Now, just by so much as the hon. gentleman's policy has been successful, in causing our own manufacturers to make those goods we formerly imported, just by so much must they be exnecessitate, unsuccessful in helping the revenue. You may give employment to 10,000 persons producing goods to the value of a milion and a quarter, which you formerly imported and on which you formerly received duties, but you cannot at the same time stimulate the manufacture of such goods and yet increase the revenue received on the same class of imported goods. I think it will be better, as the First Minister has stated, to reserve, until the Trade and Navigation Returns are in our hands, a discussion of how far the manufactures of this country have been promoted by the Tariff. As far as my observation goes the effect has been that certain of our leading manufactures have been largely discouraged by the operation of the Tariff, while certain others have been benefitted. You have not added one penny to the wealth of the country, but have taken out of the pockets of the large mass of consumers considerable sums of money, and, instead of putting it into the Treasury, have put it into the pockets of a favored few. The effect has been, as correctly stated by the hon. member for Lambton, that you have discouraged those leading industries for which Canada has special advantages, and which have hitherto flourished, and that it is in no small measure to this cause that we may attribute the exodus which we deplore.

Mr. MILLS. I wish to make an observation on a statement of the right hon. gentleman as to the un-British character of the proposal of the leader of the Opposition about acquainting the country with the contents of the measure about to be submitted upon the Pacific Railway. The position taken by the right hon. gentleman seems to me a very extraordinary one. He says that the proposition of my hon. friend—that the Government should have disclosed the contract made with the Syndicate-is incompatible with our system of government. Well, that is not the general opinion of statesmen on the other side of the Atlantic, nor was that the opinion of the hon, gentleman himself when he made known the terms of the Washington Treaty, some months before Parliament met. He will find, upon enquiry, that Lord Beaconsfield made known to the people of England the fact of the purchase of shares of the Suez Canal, and also, that when Lord Beaconsfield returned from Germany, although Parliament was in session, he did not hesitate to declare, in general terms, what had been done at the Conference of Berlin. Moreover, the position taken by the right hon. gentleman is wholly inconsistent with his accepting office in September, 1878. He thought, at that time, that the hon. member for Lambton and his colleagues held office longer after the elections than they ought to have done, but if the views the hon. gentleman entertains now are sound, the Government ought to have continued in office until Parliament was convened and until an adverse vote was pronounced in this House. The position taken by the Government of England in 1868 when Disraeli resigned office was, that the opinion expressed by the country was a sufficient notification to the Government that they did not enjoy the confidence of Parliament. And why? Because it was supposed that in appealing to the country upon a particular line forward by Lord Brougham and others somewhat in the line of those expressed by the First Minister to-night. But what were the facts upon which these opinions were founded? At that time there were many close boroughs sending members to Parliament. Some members had not a score of constituents, although representing populous cities, and Lord Brougham, in his "Political Philosophy," expresses the opinion that the views of the electors, looking at the smallness of their numbers, and at the fact that that a large portion of the people were excluded from the franchise, ought not to be taken as the opinion of the people. And why? Because those constituents were recognized simply as trustees for the whole population. But when the franchise is extended to the mass of the population, then the condition of things is entirely changed, and the population have a right to know what line Parliament will take upon certain important public questions. Let me read, for the information of the House, a passage from Mr. May's work on the constitutional history of England. In referring to this very question, he says:

"The political education of the people, the publicity of all Parliamentary proceedings, and the free discussions of the press, have combined to force upon constituencies the estimation of measures as well as of men. Hence candidates have sought to recommend themselves by the admen. Hence candidates have sought to recommend themselves by the advocacy of popular measures; and constituents have expected explicit declarations of the political faith of candidates. And how can it be contended that upon such measures as Catholic Emancipation, Parliamentary Reform and the Repeal of the Corn Laws, constituencies were not entitled to know the opinions of their members. Unless the electors are to be deprived of their voice in legislation, such occasions as these were surely fit for their peculiar vigilance. At a dissolution the Crown has often appealed directly to the sense of the people, on the policy of great public measures; and how could they respond to that appeal without satisfying themselyes regarding the opinions and intentions of the candidates?"

If that principle holds good with regard to those measures then before the people of England, it holds equally good with regard to an important measure like this. In Great Britain theré have been many appeals from the adverse vote of Parliament, because it was recognized that in the end public opinion must govern. In 1831, when the King was advised by Earl Grey's government to dissolve Parliament and appeal to the country, the King informed the House that he was about to prorogue them with a view to a dissolution for the purpose of ascertaining whether the policy of the Government, or the other Chamber, was that of the nation. He appealed to the nation for the purpose of ascertaining whether the Reform Bill which had been submitted by his advisers was one of which the nation approved. If it was not his intention to consult the people, then there was no object in dissolution. If the hon, gentleman is right, then no government ought to have the power of advising a dissolution. The right to dissolve ought to be taken away from the Crown, for an adverse vote in Parliament should be conclusive, even if the Administration think the country entertain a different opinion. It is perfectly obvious that this House, if the opinion of the people can be known upon a public question, has no right whatever to pursue a policy in contravention to the opinions of the majority of the nation. This was held, too, by all the Whigs and Reformers in the old Irish Parliament; and if the hon, gentleman will look at the discussion which took place on the Act of Union in the Parliament of Great Britain, he will find that Lord Howick, Fox, and all the eminent men on the Whig side of politics, opposed the Union without a vote of the Irish people. When Pitt objected to such a position, he did not base his objection upon the argument presented by the First Minister here to-night. His objection was that there presentation in the Irish Parliament was so imperfect that the opinion of the nation would not be expressed by the election; that there was a large number of of policy adopted by the Government, the votes of the people seats in the hands of a few parties who filled the formed a sufficient indication to the Government as to whether they enjoyed the confidence of the country of the nation might entertain one view, the majority or not. I know that some years ago views were put of Parliament might entertain a wholly different view. Let me refer to a few cases here in Canada. Sir Francis Hincks, many years ago, when he was at the head of the Government of this country, was found fault with by some of his friends because he did not, at an earlier day than he did, submit a measure for the secularization of the Clergy Reserves. When the hon, gentleman appeared before his constituents he defended himself from the accusation, and informed them that a certain measure—I think it was the extension of the franchise, or an increase in the number of the members of Parliament—had been carried previously to this, and the Governor informed the First Minister that he was not willing that so important a measure as the secularization of the Clergy Reserves should be carried through by that House, although it had been-elected partially for that purpose, for, he said, until an election had been held with special reference to those important measures, under the new law, Government was not warranted in carrying them through to completion. Lord Elgin, it is generally supposed, was sufficiently conversant with the English system of government not to advise a line of policy at variance with its principle or spirit. We find that, in 1868, when the Bill for the separation of Church and State in Ireland was about to be submitted, Disraeli, then leader of the Conservative laid down the general doctrine important measure on which the public verdict had not been pronounced ought to be carried through Parliament—that no important change in the constitution of the country should be carried out without the people having had an op-portunity of pronouncing upon it. This same doctrine was laid down by Mr. Plunket at the time that the Irish Union was under discussion. He was an eminent member of the Irish Parliament, and was also a distinguished member of the Parliament of the United Kingdom subsequently, and he may certainly be considered as fairly understanding the system of Government under which he lived and which he assisted in administering. He says with regard to the proposition to bring about a union between Great Britain and Ireland without reference to the people:

"Sir, I, in the most express terms, deny the competency of this Parliament so to act. I warn you, do not dare to lay your hands on the Constitution. I tell you that, if, circumstanced as you are, you pass this Act, it will be a nullity and no man in Ireland will be bound to obey it."

I know that hon, gentlemen pressed forward Confederation to completion without giving the people any opportunity of pronouncing upon it. But, while they adopted that course, I do not think it is desirable that it should be persisted in. The course suggested by the hon. member for West Durham was not that there should be a formal dissolution and election had upon this measure. He did not go so far. He said that this agreement between the Syndicate and the Government ought to have been disclosed, and that the people ought to have had an opportunity of informing themselves in regard to it; if the people are competent to pronounce on any question, they are competent to pronounce on this. The hon gentleman sits here as leader of the House in virtue of having announced a certain platform with regard to the tariff, and of having gone to the country upon that platform. He took the opinion of the people upon it in every part of Canada, and having done so, he would have betrayed his trust if he had not adopted it. If the people are competent to pronounce on a question of that sort they are equally competent to pronounce on this; and there is no more impropriety in making known the terms and conditions of this agreement than there was in asking them to say whether they approved or disapproved of a protective tariff. The hon, gentle-man has himself, over and over again, when he has introduced measures into this House, or when measures were submitted by others, asked for delay in order that persons specially affected by them might have an opportunity of expressing their opinion upon them. The hon gentleman did that with regard to the Insolvency Act which was formerly have told us some things with regard to the project, Mr. MILLS.

upon the Statute Book, at his instance. The hon. gentleman said this measure or that affects a particular class of the population, and we are anxious to know their views with respect to it. The measure now proposed by him affects the entire population of this country, and my hon. friend insists that the entire population should have an opportunity of knowing its terms and conditions, in order that the representatives of the people in this House may be informed of their views upon this question. I say there is nothing inconsistent with a Parliamentary Government or with the representative character of this House in the people being informed upon questions of this character; and it is of the utmost consequence to this country, seeing that the measure adopted will be a contract binding not merely upon this Government and Parliament, but on future Governments and future Parliaments, that the utmost consideration should be given to the question, and that the whole country should have an opportunity of knowing its exact character.

Mr. ANGLIN. I feel very fully the force of the position of the leader of the Government when he says it has been a wise custom in years past, both in the Imperial Parliament and the Dominion Parliament, to abstain from long discussions upon the motion for an Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne. But, I think, I would be wanting in my duty to my constituents if I did not join in a protest against the manner in which the people of this country have d by the present Administration. highest regard, the most profound treated by Administration. been have the spect, for the rights and privileges and dignity of Parliament, but I have also a deep respect and profound regard for the rights and liberties of the people of this country; and I do believe that in the manner and way in which they have been treated with regard to this question, their rights have been disregarded. I do not think it would derogate from our position as representatives of the people, enjoying all the rights of members of Parliament, if we had had an opportunity of consulting with our constituents for the purpose of ascertaining their views upon a measure of this kind. As has been stated by the hon. gentleman who has just preceded me, the instances are almost innumerable in Great Britain in which the Ministers of the Crown have chosen to take the people into their confidence when Parliament was not assembled. But a few days ago the present Prime Minister of Great Britain told the people at the Guildhall banquet how his Government intended to deal with the Irish question and the great Eastern question-not very plainly, perhaps, with regard to the latter, but distinctly with regard to the former. And so, from time to time, the Premiers of Great Britain have found it expedient and desirable to put themselves, in communication with the people; and it has never been asserted that, in doing so, they have offended the dignity of Parliament in the slightest degree. We do not know the terms of this agreement. It may be that when they are submitted we may approve of them, and it may be that we will have to take exception to some of the terms. I think that the people of this whole country will hold that the terms of the bargain should have been submitted long before this for their consideration. Various statements have appeared in organs which are supposed to enjoy the entire confidence of hon. gentlemen opposite with regard to the character and conditions of this We have been told that the Government are to hand over to the Syndicate all the sections of the road now under contract, after they have been completed at the expense of the country. We are told that they are to get $25,000,000 in cash and 25,000,000 acres of land, to be selected where they please, of the best lands in the North-West. If these statements are correct, they must have been made at the instance of hon. gentlemen opposite. Some of the Ministers themselves have from time to time given us some hints as to some of the features of this bargain. They

Why, if the dignity of Parliament would be offended by publishing a plain statement of the terms made, surely that dignity was hurt by the partial statements from time to time. I do not think the position taken by the leader of the Government with regard to this matter will meet with the approval of the people of the country; nor do I think it will satisfy the people that they have not been unfairly dealt with. I merely wish to join in the protest against the manner in which the public have been treated in this respect, and against our treatment in being compelled to come here without having been afforded the slightest opportunity of consulting with those whose opinions we are bound to respect. There would be no objection to the passing of this address immediately but that there is much in it apparently introduced to provoke discussion, and for the purpose of placing this side of the House in a false position before the country. I remember well, some years ago, what a desperate opposition was made to the passing of the Address by the present Minister of Railways, because the Address was not perfectly colorless. The Premier of that day, the member for Lambton, assured the hon. gentleman he had done all in his power to avoid giving cause for the slighest opposition to the Address. But that did not satisfy the hon, gentleman, who insisted that there were words offensive to him and those acting with him, and he stated that unless they were expunged, he would insist on discussing all the questions mentioned in the Address at full length. The late Premier replied in effect, "we have no intention of protracting the discussion on the Address. A general discussion of public affairs on occasions of this kind has fallen into disuse, and if there is now any real objection to certain expressions, I have no objection to strike them out,"-and he did strike out some words, substituting others for them. I think it would not be too much to ask the right hon. gentleman to confer with the leaders on this side with regard to some very objectionable passages in this Address, that it may pass without further discussion. We have no desire on this side to occupy time unnecessarily; no disposition to discuss questions at improper times, or under improper circumstances. But so much has been done by the Government to provoke discussion, and the circumstances under which we were called together are so peculiar, that it was absolutely necessary to say all that has been said on this side. I think we can claim from the House and the country, and that the people will accord us, entire credit for the most extraordinary moderation in allowing the Address to pass under the circumstances. I, therefore, propose that hon, gentlemen on the other side consent that the words to which we object may be struck out, or altered, so that the Address may be as colorless as an Address ought to be, if we are to act on the principle that on the Address there should be no protracted discussion

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think the hon. gentleman asked that the Address be read clause by clause. Let that be done, and if any objections made by hon. gentlemen opposite be reasonable, we will try to meet their views.

Mr. CHARLTON. I do not rise to impede the passage of the Resolutions. The First Minister in his speech, deprecated the discussion of specific propositions on occasions of this kind. I feel called upon, however, to answer one specific proposition advanced by the hon. gentleman who moved the Address. In the course of his admirable maiden speech, he told the House that the National Policy did not injure the farmer; that in consequence of it, his barley, oats and other careals bore a higher price. I wish to take issue on that assertion—to assert that, on the contrary, the National Policy has had no effect whatever on the price of cereals, with the exception, perhaps, of Indian corn, and to say that, in my opinion, it is time that that well-worn humbug by which the farmers of the Dominion were deceived in 1878 was disposed of in the discussion of this question before the House and country. I wish to adduce some facts that may effectually dispose of that assertion to-night. On turning to the market quotations of the day, for Canada and the United States, I find they refute that assertion most effectually. Yesterday No. 2 wheat in Toronto was quoted at $1.14 and in Oswego, at $1.22 to $1.24. The hon, member for West Toronto asserted that the duty of 15 cents is necessary to prevent the importation of wheat from a market where it costs $1.24 to where it would be sold at $1.14, a loss of 10 cents in addition to the freight. These two quotations show the preposterousness of the assertion that a duty is necessary to keep American wheat from the Canadian market. The price of wheat in Canada and the United States is regulated by the common markets of the world; these productions seek markets in Europe, where the prices received regulate the prices paid in this country and the United States. I find that the quotation of oats in Toronto is 34 cents a bushel of 34 lbs., the price in Chicago being 32½ cents for 32 lbs.; oats in Chicago are therefore worth half a cent per bushel of 34 lbs. more than in Toronto. Will the hon, gentleman tell the farmers of the Dominion that a duty of 10 cents a bushel is necessary to prevent the importation of oats from Chicago under those circumstances. The market quotation of oats in New York is 46\ cents a bushel, or 12\ cents more than in Toronto; that is a much larger sum than the cost of carriage between those points. These figures cannot but demonstrate the utter absurdity of the position taken by the hon. gentleman in asserting that cereals are higher here in consequence of the N. P. At present, I find, Sir, that the quotations of rye are, in the city of Toronto, 88 cents; in Chicago, 87 cents; and in Oswego, 95 cents. Does the hon. gentleman wish the verdant farmers of this Dominion to believe that a duty of ten cents on rye is necessary to keep out 95 cent rye from a market where it would have to be sold at 88 cents. The price of barley is in Toronto 97 cents for No. 1, and 93 cents for No. 2; in Oswego, $1.25 for No. 1, and $1.20 for No. 2; or 28 cents for No. 1, and 27 cents for No. 2, higher in Oswego than in Toronto. Does the hon. gentleman wish the country to believe that a duty of 15 cents a bushel is necessary to keep Oswego barley out of our market. These are the absurd propositions made by the hon gentleman when he stands before the House and country, and gravely gives utterance to the assertion that the National Policy has raised the price of barley, oats, peas and other cereals. I find also that the price of peas in Toronto is from 68 to 70 cents, in New York 87 cents in bond, to which must be added the duty when the consumer takes it out of bond; and are we to be told it is necessary to impose a duty of 10 cents to keep out American peas from our market when they can be sold at a higher rate on their own market. I find that butter is worth in New-York, common to choice, 19 to 36 cents, and the same grades in Montreal 14 to 27 cents. Does the hon. gentleman suppose that a duty of four cents per pound has any influence on the market for butter in Canada. Cheese in New York of the best grade is worth 123 cents, and in Montreal, same quality, the same price. The prices of cheese in both markets are regulated by the Liverpool market. Does the hon. gentleman suppose that a duty of 3 cents per pound on American cheese has any effect on the market quotations provided that the prices are regulated by the common market of the world. The farmers of this Dominion are beginning to thoroughly understand that the promises made to them, in order to induce them to consent to taxation, intended to swell largely the profits of rings who wish to charge enhanced prices for their own benefit, cannot be carried out because they were fallacious in their nature. I do not wish to enter into any lengthy discussion on this question. I took occasion, last session, to make a lengthy comparison of the prices at different periods both before and after the adoption of the National Policy, and I shall probably

I merely thought proper on this occasion to present these few facts which dispose effectually of the fallacies promulgated by the hon, member for West Toronto (Mr. Beaty). Before taking my seat I wish to say a word in relation to the great question on which Parliament has been called together, and which is the most important probably ever brought up before a deliberative body in this Dominion. I wish to say in the most dispassionate spirit that in my belief it is highly desirable that ample time should be taken for the consideration and the discussion of this question; and I wish to say to the First Minister, assuming as he naturally will the responsibility of this great measure, that his reputation for future generations will be inseparably connected with it. I wish to impress on him the great gravity of the position he occupies and to ask him to bear in mind the Apostolic injunction, "To do all things decently and in order," and my firm conviction that to hurry this important measure through, without giving ample time for deliberation, without allowing the people of this country time to express their opinions on this matter, without allowing time for public discussion, discussion in the press, and the influence that may be exerted by public sentiment being brought to bear on this House, he will not be held to have done these things decently and in order; and if possibly a mistake be made through over-hasty legislation, the hon. gentleman may regret he did not allow the time that was properly asked for ample discussion of this great question.

Mr. ANGLIN said that the hon. the Frst Minister had been kind enough to show his good-will by accepting his (Mr. Anglin's) suggestion, but he (Mr. Anglin) might be permitted to say that on reading over the Address he found so many improvements required, it would be necessary to reconstruct the whole of it. He thought, therefore, it would be better to allow it to pass on division.

On paragraph 10,

Mr. MILLS said that he did not feel how it could be defended; it required reconstruction His Excellency was made to regret the entire failure of the food supply. There had not been an entire failure nor anything like it; there had, no doubt, been a partial failure.

Mr. ANGLIN said that was put there to encourage emigration to the North-West.

Mr. MACKENZIE. To avoid showing the bad features in the country.

Paragraphs 1 to 15 of the said proposed Address being severally read a second time, were agreed to on a division.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved:

"That the said Resolution be referred to a Select Committee, composed of Sir Leonard Tilley, Sir Charles Tupper, Mr. Langevin, and Messrs. Beaty and Vanasse to draft an Address pursuant thereto."

Motion agreed to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD, from the Committee, reported the draft of an address, which was read the second time and agreed to. (To be presented by Privy Councillors.)

- 3. The Company shall lay out, construct and equip the said Eastern section, and the said Central section, of a uniform gauge of 4 feet 81 inches, and in order to establish an approximate standard whereby the quality and the character of the Railway and of the materials used in the construction thereof, and of the equipment thereof may be regulated, the Union Pacific Railway of the United States as the same was when first constructed, is hereby selected and fixed as such standard. And if the Government and the Company should be unable to agree as to whether or not any work done or materials furnished under this contract are in fair conformity with such standard, or as to any other question of fact, excluding questions of law, the subject of disagreement shall be from time to time referred to the determination of three referees, one of whom shall be chosen by the Government, one by the Company, and one by the two referees so chosen, and such referees shall decide as to the party by whom the expense of such reference shall be defrayed. And if such two referees should be unable to agree upon a third referee, he shall be appointed at the instance of either party hereto, after notice to the other, by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada. And the decision of such referees, or of the majority of them, shall be final.

- 4. The work of construction shall be commenced at the eastern extremity of the Eastern section not later than the first day of July next, and the work upon the Central section shall be commenced by the Company at such point towards the eastern end thereof on the portion of the line now under construction as shall be found convenient and as shall be approved by the Government, at a date not later than the 1st May next. And the work upon the Eastern and Central sections, shall be vigorously and continuously carried on at such rate of annual progress on each section as shall enable the Company to complete and equip the same and each of them, in running order, on or before the first day of May, 1891, by which date the Company hereby agree to complete and equip the said sections in conformity with this contract, unless prevented by the act of God, the Queen's enemies, intestine disturbances, epidemics, floods, or other causes beyond the control of the Company. - 6. And the said Lake Superior section, and the portions of the said Western section now under contract, shall be completed as nearly as practicable according to the specifications and conditions of the contracts therefor except in so far as the same have been modified by the Government prior to this contract.

And upon the completion of the Eastern and Central sections, the Government shall convey to the Company, with a suitable number of station buildings and with water service (but without equipment), those portions of the Canadian Pacific Railway constructed or to be constructed by the Government which shall then be completed; and upon completion of the remainder of the portion of railway to be constructed by the Government, that portion shall also be conveyed to the Company, and the Canadian Pacific Railway shall become, and be thereafter the absolute property of the Company. And the Company shall thereafter and forever efficiently maintain, work and run the Canadian Facific Railway.

- 9. In consideration of the premises, the Government agree to grant to the Company a subsidy in money of $25,000,000, and in land of 25,000,000 acres, for which subsidies the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway shall be completed and the same shall be equipped, maintained and operated, the said subsidies respectively to be paid and granted as the work of construction shall proceed, in manner and upon the conditions following, that is to say:
- a. The said subsidy in money is hereby divided and appropriated as follows, namely:-

CENTRAL SECTION.

EASTERN SECTION.

Assumed at 650 miles, subsidy equal to $15,384.61 per mile......10,000,000 -$25,000,000

And the said subsidy in land is hereby divided and appropriated as follows, subject to the reserve hereafter provided for.

CENTRAL SECTION.

1st.—900 miles, at 12,500 acres per mile ....... 11.250,000 2nd.—450 '' 16,663.66 '' 7,500,000 7,500,000 18,750,000

EASTERN SECTION.

Assumed at 650 miles, subsidy equal to 9,615.35 acres per mile. ...... 6,250,000

- b. Upon the construction of any portion of the railway hereby contracted for, not less than 20 miles in length and the completion thereof so as to admit of the running of regular trains thereon, together with such equipment thereof as shall be required for the traffic thereon, the Government shall pay and grant to the Company the money, and land subsidies applicable thereto, according to the division and appropriation thereof made, as hereinbefore provided; the Company having the option of receiving in lieu of cash, terminable bonds of the Government, bearing such rate of interest for such period and nominal amount as may be arranged, and which may be equivalent according to actuarial calculation to the corresponding cash payment, the Government allowing four per cent. interest on monies deposited with them.
- c. If at any time the Company shall cause to be delivered on or near the line of the said railway, at a place satisfactory to the Government, steel rails and fastenings to be used in the construction of the railway, but in advance of the requirements for such construction, the Government, on the requisition of the Company, shall, upon such terms and conditions as shall be determined by the Government, advance thereon three-fourths of the value thereof at the place of delivery. And a proportion of the amount so advanced shall be deducted according to such terms and conditions from the subsidy to be thereafter paid, upon the settlement for each section of 20 miles of railway, which proportion shall correspond with the proportion of such rails and fastenings which have been used in the construction of such sections.
- d. Until the first day of January, 1882, the Company shall have the option, instead of issuing land grant bonds as hereinafter provided, of substituting the payment by the Government of the interest (or part of the interest) on bonds of the Company, mortgaging the railway and the land to be granted by the Government, running over such term of years 8. Upon the reception from the Government of the pos-session of each of the respective portions of the Canadian the cash subsidy hereby agreed to be granted to the Company or any part thereof; such payments of interest to be equivalent according to actuarial calculation to the corresponding cash payment, the Government allowing four per cent. interest on monies deposited with them; and the coupons representing the interest on such bonds shall be guaranteed by the Government to the extent of such equivalent. And the proceeds of the sale of such bonds to the extent of not more than $25,000,000 shall be deposited with the Government, and the balance of such proceeds shall be placed elsewhere by the Company, to the satisfaction, and under the exclusive control of the Government; failing which last condition the bonds in excess of those sold shall remain in the hands of the Government. And from time to time as the work proceeds, the Government shall pay ever to the Company: firstly, out of the amount so to be placed by the Government, - and, after the expenditure of that amount, out of the amount deposited with the Government,-sums of money bearing the same proportion to the mileage cash subsidy hereby agreed upon, which the net proceeds of such sale (if the whole of such bonds are sold upon the issue thereof) or, if such bonds be not all then sold, the net proceeds of the issue, calculated at the rate at which the sale of part them shall have been made, shall bear to the sum of $25,000,000. But if only a portion of the issue be sold, the amount earned by the Company according to the proportion aforesaid, shall be paid to the Company, partly out of the bonds in the hands of the Government, and partly out of the cash deposited with the Government, in similar proportions to the amount of such bonds sold and remaining unsold respectively; and the Company shall receive the bonds so paid as cash at the rate at which the said partial sale thereof shall have been made. And the Government will receive and hold such sum of money towards the creation of a sinking fund for the redemption of such bonds and upon such terms and conditions, as shall be agreed upon between the Government and the Company.

- e. If the Company avail themselves of the option granted by clause d, the sum of $2,000 per mile for the first eight hundred miles of the Central section shall be deducted pro rata from the amount payable to the Company in respect of the said eight hundred miles, and shall be appropriateted to increase the mileage cash subsidy appropriated to the remainder of the said Central section.
- 10. In further consideration of the premises the Government shall also grant to the Company the lauds required for the roadbed of the railway, and for its stations, station grounds, workshops, dock ground and water frontage at the termini on navigable waters, buildings, yards, and other appurtenances required for the convenient and effectual construction and working of the railway, in so far as such land shall be vested in the Government. And the Government shall also permit the admission free of duty, of all steel rails, fish plates and other fastenings, spikes, bolts and nuts, wire, timber and all material for bridges, to be used in the original construction of the railway, and of a telegraph line in connection therewith, and all telegraphic apparatus required for the first equipment of such telegraph line. And will convey to the Company, at cost price, with interest, all rails and fastenings bought in or since the year 1879, and other materials for construction in the possession of or purchased by the Government at a valuation; such rails, fastenings and materials not being required by it for the construction of the said Lake Superior and Western sections.
- 11. The grant of land hereby agreed to be made to the Company, shall be so made in alternate sections of 640 acres each, extending back 24 miles deep, on each side of the railway, from Winnipez to Jasper House, in so far as such lands shall be vested in the Government, the Company receiving the sections bearing uneven numbers. But should any of such sections consist in a material degree of land not fairly fit for settlement, the Company shall not be obliged to receive them the use of such bonds in the acquisition of lands, and such Mr. SPEAKER.

as part of such grant, and the deficiency thereby caused and any further deficiency which may arise from the insufficient quantity of land along the said portion of railway, to complete the said 25,000,000 acres, or from the prevalence of lakes and water stretches in the sections granted (which lakes and water stretches shall not be computed in the acreage of such sections), shall be made up from other portions to be selected by the Company in the tract known as the Fertile Belt, that is to say the land lying between parallels 49 and 57 degrees of north latitude or elsewhere at the option of the Company by the grant therein of similar alternate sections extending back 24 miles deep on each side of any branch line or lines of railway to be located by the Company, and to be shown on a map or plan thereof deposited with the Minister of Railways; or of any common front line or lines agreed upon between the Government and the Company, the conditions hereinbefore stated as to lands not fairly fit for settlement to be applicable to such additional grants. And the Company may, with the consent of the Government, select in the North-West Territories any tract or tracts of land not taken up as a means of supplying or partially supplying such deficiency. But such grants shall be made only from lands remaining vested in the Government.

- 12. The Government shall extinguish the Indian title affecting the lands herein appropriated, and to be hereafter granted in aid of the railway.
- 13. The Company shall have the right subject to the approval of the Governor in Council to lay out and locate the line of the railway hereby contracted for, as they may see fit, preserving the following terminal points, namely: from Callander station to the point of junction with the Lake Superior section; and from Selkirk to the junction with the Western section at Kamloops by way of the Yellow Head
- 14. The Company shall have the right, from time to time, to lay out, construct, equip, maintain and work branch lines of railway from any point or points along their main line of railway, to any point or points within the territory of the Dominion. Provided always that before commencing any branch they shall first deposit a map and plan of such branch in the Department of Railways. And the Government shall grant to the Company the lands required for the roadbed of such branches, and for the stations, station grounds, buildings, workshops, yards and other appurtenances requisite for the efficient construction and working of such branches in so far as such lands are vested in the Government.
- 15. For 20 years from the date hereof, no line of railway shall be authorised by the Dominion Parliament to be constructed South of the Canadian Pacific Railway, from any point at or near the Canadian Pacific Railway except such line as shall run South West, or to the Westward of South West: nor to within fifteen miles of Latitude 49. And in the establishment of any new Province in the North West Territories, provision shall be made for continuing such prohibition after such establishment until the expiration of the said period.
- 16. The Canadian Pacific Railway, and all stations and station grounds, workshops, buildings, yards and other property, rolling stock and appurtenances required and used for the construction and working thereof, and the capital stock of the Company shall be forever free from taxation by the Dominion, or by any Province hereafter to be established or by any Municipal Corporation therein, and the lands of the Company, in the North-West Territories, untill they are either sold or occupied, shall also be free from such taxation for 20 years after the grant thereof from the Crown.
- 17. The Company shall be authorized by their Act of incorporation to issue bonds, secured upon the land granted and to be granted to the Company, containing provisions for other conditions as the Company shall see fit, such issue to be for $25,000,000. And should the Company make such issue of land grant bonds, then they shall deposit them in the hands of the Government; and the Government shall retain and hold one-fifth of such bonds as security for the due performance of the present contract in respect of the maintenance and continuous working of the railway by the Company, as herein agreed, for ten years after the completion thereof, and the remaining $20,000,000 of such bonds shall be dealt with as hereinafter provided. And as to the said one-fifth of the said bonds, so long as no default shall occur in the maintenance and working of the said Canadian Pacific Railway, the Government shall not present or demand payment of the coupons of such bonds, nor require payment of any interest thereon. And if any of such bonds so to be retained by the Government shall be paid off in the manner to be provided for the extinction of the whole issue thereof, the Government shall hold the amount received in payment thereof as security for the same purposes as the bonds so paid off, paying interest thereon at four per cent. per annum so long as default is not made by the Company in the performance of the conditions hereof. And at the end of the said period of ten years from the completion of the said railway, if no default shall then have occurred in such maintenance and working thereof, the said bonds, or if any of them shall then have been paid off, the remainder of said bonds and the money received for those paid off, with accrued interest shall be delivered back by the Government to the Company with all the coupons attached to such bonds. But if such default should occur, the Government may thereafter require payment of interest on the bonds so held, and shall not be obliged to continue to pay interest on the money representing bonds paid off; and while the Government shall retain the right to hold the said portion of the said land grant bonds, other securities satisfactory to the Government may be substituted for them by the Company by agreement with the Government.

18. If the Company shall find it necessary or expedient to sell the remaining $20,000,000 of the land grant bonds or a larger portion thereof than in the proportion of one dollar for each acre of land then earned by the Company, they shall be allowed to do so, but the proceeds thereof, over and above the amount to which the Company shall be entitled as herein provided, shall be deposited with the Government. And the Government shall pay interest upon such deposit half-yearly, at the rate of four per cent. per annum, and shall pay over the amount of such deposit to the Company from time to time as the work proceeds, in the same proportions, and at the same times and upon the same conditions as the land grant—that is to say: the Company shall be entitled to receive from the Government out of the proceeds of the said land grant bonds, the same number of dollars as the number of acres of the land subsidy which shall then have been earned by them, less one fifth thereof, that is to say, if the bonds are sold at par, but if they are sold at less than par, then a deduction shall be made therefrom corresponding to the discount at which such bonds are sold. And such land grant shall be conveyed to them by the Government, subject to the charge created as security for the said land grant bonds, and shall remain subject to such charge till relieved thereof in such manner as shall be provided for at the time of the issue of such bonds.

- 19. The company shall pay any expenses which shall be incurred by the Government in carrying out the provisions of the two last preceding clauses of this contract.
- 20. If the Company should not issue such land grant bonds, then the Government shall retain from out of each grant to be made from time to time, every fifth section of the lands hereby agreed to be granted, such lands to be so retained as security for the purposes, and for the length paid up, and upon the deposit with the Minister of Finance of time, mentioned in section eighteen hereof. And such lands may be sold in such manner and at such prices as shall be agreed upon between the Government and the Company, and in that case the price thereof shall be paid to, and held by the Government for the same period, and for the same purposes as the land itself, the Government paying four per cent. per annum interest thereon. And other securities satisfactory to the Government may be substituted for such lands or money by agreement with the Government.

21. The company to be incorporated, with sufficient powers to enable them to carry out the foregoing contract, and this contract shall only be binding in the event of an Act of incorporation being granted to the Company in the form hereby appended as Schedule A.

22. The Railway Act of 1879, in so far as the provisions of the same are appliable to the undertaking referred to in this contract, and in so far as they are not inconsistent herewith or inconsistent with or contrary to the provisions of the Act of incorporation to be granted to the Company, shall apply to the Canadian Pacific Railway.

In witness whereof the parties hereto have executed these presents at the City of Ottawa, this twenty-first day of October, 1880.

"The Consolidated Railway Act, 1879," in so far as the provisions of the same are applicable to the undertaking authorized by this charter, and in so far as they are not inconsistent with or contrary to the provisions hereof, and save and except as hereinafter provided, is hereby incorporated herewith.
- 18. As respects the said railway, the seventh section of reduction shall not be made unless the net income of the "The Consolidated Railway Act, 1879," relating to Powers, and Company, ascertained as described in said sub-section, shall

- the eighth section thereof relating to Plans and Surveys, shall be subject to the following provisions:—

But the provisions of this sub-section shall not apply to any beach or land lying East of Lake Nipissing except with the approval of the Governor in Council.
- b. It shall be sufficient that the map or plan and book of reference for any portion of the line of the railway, not being within any district or county for which there is a Clerk of the Peace, be deposited in the office of the Minister of Railways of Canada, and any omission, mis-statement or erroneous description of any lands therein may be corrected by the Company, with the consent of the Minister and certified by him; and the Company may then make the railway in accordance with such certified correction.
- c. The eleventh sub-section of the said eighth section of the Railway Act shall not apply to any portion of the railway passing over ungranted lands of the Crown, or lands not within any surveyed township in any Province; and in such places, deviations not exceeding five miles from the line shown on the map or plan as aforesaid, deposited by the Company, shall be allowed, without any formal correction or certificate; and any further deviation that may be found expedient may be authorized by order of the Governor in Council, and the Company may then make their railway in accordance with such authorized deviation.

- 19. It shall be lawful for the Company to take from any public lands adjacent to or near the line of the said railway, all stone, timber, gravel and other materials which may be necessary or useful for the construction of the railway; and also to lay out and appropriate to the use of the Company, a greater extent of lands, whether 'public or private, for stations, depots, workshops, buildings, side-tracks, wharves, harbors and roadway, and for establishing screens against snow, than the breadth and quantity mentioned in "The Consolidated Railway Act, 1879," such greater extent taken, in any case, being allowed by the Government, and shown on the maps or plans deposited with the Minister of Railways.
- 20. The limit to the reduction of tolls by the Parliament of Canada provided for by the eleventh sub-section of the 17th section of the Consolidated Railway Act, 1879, respecting TOLLS, is hereby extended, so that such reduction may be to such an extent that such tolls when reduced shall not produce less than ten per cent. per annum profit on the capital actually expended in the construction of the Railway, instead of not less than fifteen per cent. per annum profit, as provided by the said sub-section; and so also that such reduction shall not be made unless the net income of the Company, ascertained as described in said sub-section, shall have exceeded ten per cent. per annum instead of fifteen per cent. per annum as provided by the said sub-section. And the exercise by the Governor in Council of the power of reducing the tolls of the Company as provided by the tenth sub-section of said section seventeen is hereby limited to the same extent with relation to the profit of the Company, and to its net revenue, as that to which the power of Parliament to reduce tolls is limited by said sub-section eleven as hereby

The first and second sub-sections of section 22, of the Consolidated Rashway Act, 1879, shall not apply to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company; and it is hereby enacted that the transfer of shares in the undertaking shall be made only upon the books of the Company in person or by attorney, and shall not be valid unless so made; and the form and mode of transfer shall be such as shall be from time to time regulated by the By-laws of the Company. And the funds of the Company shall not be used in any advance upon the security of any of the shares or stock of the Company.

22. The third and fourth sub-sections of said section 22 of the Consolidated Railway Act of 1879 shall be subject to the following provisions, namely, that if before the completion of the Railway and works under the said contract, any transfer should purport to be made of any stock or share in the Company, or any transmission of any share should be effected under the provisions of said sub section four; to a person not already a shareholder in the Company; and if in the opinion of the Board it should not be expedient that the person (not being already a shareholder) to whom such transfer or transmission shall be made or effected should be accepted as a shareholder; the Directors may, by resolution, veto such transfer or transmission; and thereafter, and until after the completion of the said Railway and works under the said contract, such person shall not be, or be recognized as a shareholder in the Company; and the original shareholder, or his estate, as the case may be, shall remain subject to all the obligations of a shareholder in the Company, with all the rights conferred upon a shareholder under this Act. But any firm holding paid-up shares in the Company may transfer the whole or any of such shares to any partner in such firm having already an interest as such partner in such shares, without being subject to such veto. And in the event of such veto being exercised, a note shall be taken of the transfer or transmission so vetoed in order that it may be recorded in the books of the Company after the completion of the Railway and works as aforesaid: But until such completion, the transfer or transmission so vetoed shall not confer any rights, nor have any effect of any nature or kind whatever as respects the Company.

25. The Company, under the authority of a special general meeting of the shareholders thereof; and as an extension of the railway hereby authorized to be constructed; may purchase or acquire by lease or otherwise, and hold and operate, the Canada Central Railway, or may amalgamate therewith, and may purchase or acquire by lease or otherwise and hold and operate a line or lines of railway from the City of Ottawa to any point at navigable water on the Atlantic seaboard or to any intermediate point, or may acquire running powers over any railway now constructed between Ottawa and any such point or intermediate point. And the Company may purchase or acquire any such railway subject to such existing mortgages, charges or liens thereon as shall be agreed upon; and shall possess with regard to any lines of railway so purchased, or acquired, and becoming the property of the Company, the same powers as to the issue of bonds thereon, or on any of them, to an amount not exceeding twenty thousand dollars per mile; and as to the security for such bonds, as are conferred upon the Company by the twenty-seventh section hereof, in respect of bonds to be issued upon the Canadian Pacific Railway. But such issue of bonds shall not affect the right of any holder of mortgages or other charges already existing upon any line of railway so purchased or acquired; and the amount of bonds hereby authorized to be issued upon such line of railway shall be diminished by the amount of such existing mortgages or charges thereon.

26. The Company shall have power and authority to erect and maintain docks, dockyards, wharves, slips and piers at any point on or in connection with the said Canadian Pacific Railway, and at all the termini thereof on navigable water, for the convenience and accommodation of vessels and elevators; and also to acquire, and work elevators, and to acquire, own, hold, charter, work, and run, steam and other vessels for cargo and passengers upon any navigable water, which the Canadian Pacific Railway may reach or connect with.

But the by-laws of the Company made as provided by law shall in no case have any force or effect after the next general meeting of shareholders, which shall be held after the passage of such by-laws, unless they are approved by such meeting.

BONDS.

B28. The Company, under the authority of a special general meeting of the shareholders called for the purpose, may issue mortgage bonds to the extent of ten thousand dollars per mile of the Canadian Pacific Railway for the purposes of the undertaking authorized by the present Act; which issue shall constitue a first mortgage and privilege upon the said railway, constructed or acquired, and to be thereafter constructed, or acquired, and upon its property, real and personal, acquired and to be thereafter acquired including rolling stock, and plant; and upon its tolls and revenues (after deduction from such tolls and revenues of working expenses); and upon the franchises of the Company; the whole as shall be declared and described as so mortgaged in any deed of mortgage as hereinafter provided. Provided always, however, that if the Company shall have issued, or shall intend to issue land grant bonds under the provisions of the thirtieth section hereof, the lands granted and to be granted by the Government to the Company may be excluded from the operation of such mortgage and privilege; and provided also that such mortgage and privilege shall not attach upon any property which the Company are hereby, or by the said contract, authorized to acquire or receive from the Government of Canada until the same shall have been conveyed by the Government to the Company; but shall attach upon such property, if so declared in such deed, as soon as the same shall be conveyed to the Company. And such mortgage and privilege may be evidenced by a deed or deeds of mortgage executed by the Company, with the authority of its shareholders expressed by a resolution passed at such special general meeting; and any such deed may contain such description of the property mortgaged by such deed, and such conditions respecting the payment of the bonds secured thereby and of the interest thereon, and the remedies which shall be enjoyed by the holders of such bonds or by any trustee or trustees for them in default of such payment; and the enforcement of such remedies; and may provide for such forfeitures and penalties, in default of such payment; as may be approved by such meeting; and may also contain, with the approval aforesaid, authority to the trustee or trustees, upon such default, as one of such remedies, to take possession of the railway and property mort-gaged, and to hold and run the same for the benefit of the bondholders thereof for a time to be limited by such deed; or to sell the said railway and property, after such delay, and upon such terms and conditions as may be stated in such deed; and with like approval any such deed may contain provisions to the effect that upon such default aud upon such other conditions as shall be described in such deed, the right of voting possessed by the shareholders of the Company, and by the holders of preferred stock therein, or by either of them, shall cease and determine, and shall thereafter appertain to the Bondholders, or to them and to the holders of the whole or of any part of the preferred stock of the Company, as shall be declared by such deed; and such deed may also provide for the conditional or absolute cancellation after such sale of any or all of the shares so deprived of voting power; or of any or all of the preferred stock of the Company, or both; and may also, either directly by its terms, or indirectly by reference to the defined by such deed, under the provisions hereof. And such deed, and the provisions thereof made under the authority hereof; and such other provisions thereof as shall purport (with like approval) to grant such further and other powers and privileges to such trustee or trustees and to such bondholders, as are not contrary to law or to the provisions of this Act, shall be valid and binding. But if any change in the ownership or possession of the said Railway and property shall at any time take place under the provisions hereof, or of any such deed, or in any other manner, the said Railway and property shall continue to be held and operated under the provisions hereof, and of the Consolidated Railway does not avail itself of the power of issuing bonds secured upon the land grant alone as hereinafter provided, the issue of bonds hereby authorized may be increased to any amount not exceeding twenty thousand dollars per mile of the said Canadian Pacific Railway.

- 29. If any bond issue be made by the Company under the last preceding section before the said railway is completed according to the said Contract, a proportion of the proceeds of such bonds, or a proportion of such bonds if they be not sold, corresponding to the proportion of the work contracted for then remaining incomplete, shall be received by the Government, and shall be held, dealt with and, from time to time, paid over by the Government to the Company upon the same conditions, in the same manner and according to the same proportions as the proceeds of the bonds, the issue of which is contemplated by sub-section d of Clause 9 of the said Contract, and by the thirty-first section hereof.
- 50. The Company may also issue mortgage bonds to the extent of twenty-five million dollars upon the lands granted in aid of the said railway and of the undertaking authorized by this Act; such issue to be made only upon similar authority to that required by this Act for the issue of bonds upon the railway: and when so made such bonds shall constitute a first mortgage upon such lands, and shall attach upon them when they shall be granted, if they are not actually granted at the time of the issue of such bonds. And such mortgage may be evidenced by a deed or deeds of mortgage to be executed under like authority to the deed securing the issue of bonds on the railway; and such deed or deeds under like authority may contain similar conditions and may confer upon the trustee or trustees named thereunder and upon the holders of the bonds secured thereby, remedies, authority, power and privileges and may provide for forfeitures and penalties, similar to those which may be inserted and provided for under the provisions of this Act in any deed securing the issue of bonds on the railway, together with such other provisions and conditions not inconsistent with law or with this Act as shall be so authorized. And such bonds may be styled Land Grant Bonds, and they and the proceeds thereof shall be dealt with in the manner provided in the said contract.
- such deed; and with like approval any such deed may contain provisions to the effect that upon such default and upon such other conditions as shall be described in such deed, the right of voting possessed by the shareholders of the Company, and by the holders of preferred stock therein, or by either of them, shall cease and determine, and shall thereafter appertain to the Bondholders, or to them and to the holders of the Whole or of any part of the preferred stock of the Company, as shall be declared by such deed; and such deed may also provide for the conditional or absolute cancellation after such sale of any or all of the shares so deprived of voting power; or of any or all of the shares so deprived of voting power; or of any or all of the preferred stock of the Company, or both; and may also, either directly by its terms, or indirectly by reference to the By-laws of the Company, provide for the mode of enforcing and exercising the powers and authority to be conferred and egiven for the payment thereof, and they and the proceeds thereof shall be dealt with as hereby and by the said contract provided.

- 32. It shall not be necessary to affix the seal of the Company to any mortgage bond issued under the authority of this Act; and every such bond issued without such seal shall have the same force and effect; and be held, treated and dealt with by all courts of law and of equity, as if it were sealed with the seal of the company. And if it is provided by the mortgage deed executed to secure the issue of any bonds, that any of the signatures to such bonds or to the coupons thereto appended, may be engraved, stamped or lithographed thereon, such engraved, stamped or lithographed signatures shall be valid and binding on the Company.
- 33. The phrase "working expenses" shall mean and include all expenses of maintenance of the railway, and of the stations, buildings, works and conveniencies belonging thereto, and of the rolling and other stock and moveable plant used in the working thereof, and also all such tolls, rents or annual sums as may be paid in respect of the hire of engines, carriages or waggons let to the company; also all rent, charges, or interest on the purchase money of lands belonging to the Company, purchased but not paid for, or not fully paid for; and also all expenses of and incidental to, working the railway and the traffic thereon, including stores and consumable articles; also rates, taxes, insurance and compensation for accidents or losses; also all salaries and wages of persons employed in and about the working of the railway and traffic, and all office and management expenses, including directors' fees, agency, legal and other like expenses.
- 34. The bonds authorized by this Act to be issued upon the railway or upon the lands to be granted to the Company, or both, may be so issued in whole or in part in the denomination of dollars, pounds sterling, or francs, or in any or all of them, and the coupons may be for payment in denominations similar to those of the bond to which they are attached. And the whole or any of such bonds, may be pledged, negotiated or sold upon such conditions and at such price as the Board of Directors shall from time to time determine. And provision may be made by the By-laws of the Company, that after the issue of any bond, the same may be surrendered to the Company by the holder thereof, and the Company may, in exchange therefor, issue to such holder inscribed stock of the Company, which inscribed stock may be registered or inscribed at the chief place of business of the Company or elsewhere, in such manner, with such rights, liens, privileges and preferences; at such place; and upon such conditions; as shall be provided by the By-laws of the Com-
- 35. It shall not be necessary, in order to preserve, the priority, lien, charge, mortgage or privilege, purporting to appertain to or be created by any bond issued or mortgage deed executed under the provisions of this Act, that such bond or deed should be enregistered in any manner, or in any place whatever. But every such mortgage deed shall be deposited in the office of the Secretary of State: of which deposit notice shall be given in the Canada Gazette. And in like manner any agreement entered into by the Company, under section thirty-four of this Act, shall also be deposited in the said office. And a copy of any such mortgage deed, or agreement, certified to be a true copy by the Secretary of State or his Deputy, shall be received as prima facie evidence of the original in all courts of justice, without proof of the signatures or seal upon such original.
- 36. If, at any time, any agreement be made by the Company with any persons intending to become bordholders of the Company; or be contained in any mortgage the issue of bonds by the Company, under the powers con- | Company, their successors and assigns for ever. Mr. SPRAKER.

And no bond thereafter issued by the Company, and no order, resolution or proceeding thereafter made, passed or had by the Company, or by the board of directors, contrary to the terms of such agreement, shall be valid or effectual.
- 37. The Company may, from time to time, issue guaranteed or preferred stock at such price, to such amount, not exceeding ten thousand dollars per mile, and upon such conditions as to the preferences and privileges appertaining thereto, or to different issues or classes thereof, and otherwise as shall be authorized by the majority in value of the shareholders present in person or represented by proxy at any annual meeting or at any special general meeting thereof called for the purpose, -notice of the intention to propose such issue at such meeting being given in the notice calling such meeting. But the guarantee or preference accorded to such stock shall not interfere with the lien, mortgage and privilege attaching to bonds issued under the authority of this Act. And the holders of such preferred stock shall have such power of voting at meetings of shareholders, as shall be conferred upon them by the By-laws of the Company.

EXECUTION OF AGREEMENTS.

38. Every contract, agreement, engagement, scrip certificate or bargain made, and every bill of exchange drawn, accepted or endorsed, and every promissory note and cheque made, drawn or endorsed on behalf of the Company, by any agent, officer or servant of the Company, in general accordance with his powers as such under the by-laws of the Company, shall be binding upon the Company; and in no case shall it be necessary to have the seal of the Company affixed to any such bill, note, cheque, contract, agreement, engagement, bargain, or scrip certificate, or to prove that the same was made, drawn, accepted or endorsed, as the case may be, in pursuance of any by-law or special vote or order; nor shall the party so acting as agent, officer or servant of the Company be subjected individually to any liability, whatsoever, to any third party therefor; Provided always, that nothing in this Act shall be construed to authorize the Company to issue any note payable to the bearer thereof, or any promissory note intended to be circulated as money, or as the note of a bank, or to engage in the business of banking or insurance.

COMMISSION OF INTERNAL ECONOMY.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD delivered a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message, as follows:—Lorne.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons, two approved Minutes in Council, appointing the Right Honorable Sir John A. Macdonald, Minister of the Interior; the Honorable Sir Leonard Tilley, Minister of Finance; the Honorable Sir Charles Tupper, Minister of Railways and Canals, and the Honorable Hector L. Langevin, C.B., Minister of Public Works, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons, as Commissioners for the purposes and under the provisions of the Act 31 Victoria, Chapter 27, intituled: "An Act respecting the "Internal Economy of the House of Commons, and for other purposes." GOVERNMENT HOUSE,

SUPPLY.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved:

"That this House will, on Friday next, resolve itself into a Committee to consider a Supply to be granted to Her Majesty."

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved:

"That this House will, on Friday next, resolve itself into a Committee to consider the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to Her Majesty."

Motion agreed to.

. ADJOURNMENT.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT asked when the Public Accounts would be laid on the Table.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I hope they may be ready by Christmas, but I am not quite certain. We are making an effort to have them ready then.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. May I further enquire whether, if they are ready by Christmas, the hon. Minister can distribute them to the Members of the House? It would possibly save some trouble and inconvenience if he did.

Mr. BLAKE. Are the papers just laid on the Table all the papers that are to be supplied, in accordance with the terms of the Speech.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is a motion on the paper.

Mr. BLAKE. I am aware. But the Speech declared that we were to receive some papers; I simply enquire whether these are all the papers.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. And, may I ask, are they in print?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes, they will be distributed in the Votes in the morning.

Mr. ANGLIN stated that last session he had moved for a return relating to the lands of the North-West—the quantities sold, the prices at which they were sold, the expenses connected therewith, etc. The hon. Minister had stated that the Government intended to lay before the House a Return of a somewhat similar character. If that general return were brought down, it would, of course, render unnecessary the one for which he had moved. It was information which he thought the House should be put in possession of before they discussed the Pacific Railway bargain, so that they might form a closer estimate of the value of the lands in the North-West than they could by means of the conjectures in which hon. members were forced to indulge. He would like to ask the hon. the First Minister if he knew anything of that return, or whether the general return would be brought down.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not know anything about the special return the hon. gentleman speaks of, but the general return is almost ready, if it is not already in the hands of the printers—a very full statement.

House adjourned at 10:30 o'clock, p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 13th December, 1880.

EXPLORATIONS ON ST. LAWRENCE.

Mr. LANTIER enquired, Whether the Engineer-in-Chief of Canals has received instructions to make a report on the explorations made on the north side of the St. Lawrence, from Coteau Landing to the Bay of Cascades, for the construction of a canal; and, if so, whether his, report is ready and the Government prepared to give a decision on that question?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I beg leave to say, in answer to the question of the hon member, that the Chief Engineer of Canals has been requested and received instructions, to make a report on the subject referred to in this question; that he has stated the matter is one of very great importance indeed, and that the pressure upon his time was such that it had prevented him being able to give it that attention which its importance demanded, but that so soon as possible he would make a full examination into the subject and report upon it. The subject is now-receiving the fullest attention of the Department.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Some time next year.

STORM WARNINGS ON INLAND WATERS.

Mr. FLEMING enquired, Whether, in view of the recent loss of life and property on the inland waters of the Dominion, it is the intention of the Government to increase the number of storm signal stations, and also, whether steps will be taken to insure greater promptness and accuracy in giving storm warnings?

Mr. POPE (Queen's). The matter has not yet received the attention of the Government. As the question has been asked by the hon, member, the subject will be considered.

MINISTERIAL EXPLANATIONS.

Mr. BLAKE. Before motions are called, I invite the right hon, gentleman at the head of the Government to give to the House the usual explanations with respect to the changes that have occurred in the Ministry since last Session, in regard to the personnel of the Administration and the distribution of the offices.

Sir JOHN A. MACDUNALD. With respect to the changes in the personnel, it is well known to the House that the health of the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson), who was in the Government since its formation in 1878, unfortunately for us, and, I think, for the House and the country, broke down to a certain extent. My hon friend, in his anxious desire to assist us, remained in office as long as possible, at our urgent solicitation, notwithstanding the pressure of his medical adviser. At last, however, we found we could not properly press him further. My hon. friend was in great danger of injuring his health permanently if he remained longer with us, and to our unanimous regret and sorrow we were obliged to say we could no longer press him to remain in the Government. He was succeeded by an hon. gentleman from his section of the country. Mr. Baby, the late member for Joliette, was promoted to the Bench, which, I believe, he will adorn, and his place was filled by a gentleman from his section of the country. The redistribution of offices was made in the manner we thought most conducive to the public service.

Mr. BLAKE. With respect to the arrangement made for the distribution of offices, I think a word or two requires to be said. So far as I know, this is the first occasion on which a department, connected with one of the two great branches of taxation, has been transferred from this House to the Senate. While there are but two members of that body who are Ministers, I quite agree that it is not at all unreasonable they should hold some important departments; but I think that it is contrary to precedent, and to the general understanding as to the mode of managing public business, that the great taxing departments should be represented by their Ministers otherwise than here. As to the other change in the distribution of offices, although that involves the loss to this House of the opportunity of representing to the chief of the Post Office Department our needs,—and it is certainly a very great ad-vantage ordinarily,—yet I can heartly congratulate hon. gentlemen opposite on that particular change, believing, with them, that the interests of the country have been very much consulted in giving that important department to its present occupant, as compared with its late administrator, who, no doubt, will be able to discharge the less onerous duties attaching to the position of Secretary of State, while Sir Alexander Campbell will, no doubt, discharge better than the late administrator could have discharged, the duties of the Post Office. With regard to the changes that have taken place, to which the hon. gentleman (Sir John A. Macdonald) has referred, we are glad to know that our late colleague and friend, Mr. Baby, has exchanged a somewhat precarious position as a Minister for the honorable and permanent position of a member of the judicial bench. The hongentleman has stated that Mr. Baby was promoted to the Bench, and that created a vacancy. I had supposed the vacancy was required, and therefore Mr. Baby was promoted to the Bench; but I now understand the circumstances to be different. As to the other cause of change, I am sure all hon. members on this side of the House will agree in the regret which the hon, gentleman has expressed as to the circumstances which occasioned the resignation of the hon. member for Terrebonne. My hon. friend has been a member of Parliament ever since Confederation, and while we on this side have been unable to agree in his general views on politics, we have all admired the honesty of his course, the sacrifice to convictions which on occasions he has made, and the integrity of principle which has marked his public career. It was a source of deep regret to myself personally, and I am sure to those with whom I act, that his health should have so far failed as to require his leaving the Ad- working of the said Railway, said: I ask for these papers ministration. I have to express my congratulations to the because no intimation was given by the Government on the Mr. BLAKE.

hon, gentlemen to whom the hon, leader of the Government has referred as gentlemen from the same sections of the country on their having succeeded the outgoing Ministers. The Minister of Militia swallowed the gnat last year, and, of course, makes no difficulty about the camel this time. The President of the Council strained at the gnat last year, but he looks to me as if he was disposed to swallow the camel this year.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think it was the other House that swallowed the camel. With respect to the offices: the Inland Revenue is not one of the paying departments, but it is one of the revenue departments of the Government; and it is quite true, as a general rule, it is well that it should be represented in this House; but, as perhaps the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) has already ascertained—I do not know where, in his time, but, at any rate, in our time—there is a feeling in the Senate that the co-ordinate branch of the Legislature ought to have a certain amount of representation in the Government in their body. With regard to the selection of the present incumbent of the office of Minister of Inland Revenue, Mr. Aikins, he was appointed for this reason: the position is one that requires a good deal of knowledge of commercial business and of the ways of dealers and traders. Mr. Baby had not that advantage; but still, I am happy to say, I am proud to say in his absence, that he filled that office most satisfactorily to his colleagues, and, I believe, satisfactorily to the country. He devoted himself most assiduously to the duties of his office, and he overcame the disadvantage which a lawyer was naturally supposed to labor under in filling the position of Minister of Inland Revenue. Mr. Aikins is a man who, as everybody knows, was in business a great many years, and we believe his practical knowledge will be of advantage in administering the department—a very difficult department, and a department which, as the hon. gentleman is aware, is continually liable to attack if the law is put in execution. That is the reason why Mr. Aikins was appointed to that office. With respect to the other changes, the hon. member for West Durham, with his usual kindness of heart and grace, made a special reference to the appointment of the Secretary of State. The reasons of his appointment was shortly these: Mr. Masson could no longer perform his duties as Minister of Militia,—and he is not the man to hold office unless he is able to perform them, - and we were exceedingly anxious to retain his services to the country and have the advantage of his advice. Mr. Masson said he could no longer perform the duties of any department calling on him for continuous labor and office work. We, therefore, asked the President of the Council to make way for him, and he was appointed President of the Council, and he held that office until his health compelled him eventually to retire. The present Postmaster General, Sir Alexander Campbell, who had been Postmaster General a good many years, and who understood the duties thoroughly, assumed the duties of Minister of Militia, but with the understanding that, so soon as new arrangements could be made, he would return to the office he had held so long and worthily. That is the whole story of the readjustment.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. MACKENZIE, in moving for all papers, letters or telegrams, concerning the construction of the Can-ada Pacific Railway, including offers made for its construction and working to the Government before the delegation of Ministers left for England, and all similar offers made, while Ministers were in England, by European or other contractors or capitalists, with copies of all correspondence by letters or telegraph, with any parties, respecting the construction and working of the said Railway, said: I ask for these papers day we met, as to whether they would be laid upon the Table. We have statements—on the authority of two or three Ministers—certainly two, that some offer was made for this purpose before the Ministers went to England at all. We have the statement of the Prime Minister himself, immediately on his return from England, that he had made an arrangement in England, or had received certain offers, and was in a condition to conclude an arrangement. We had the announcement from time to time in Ministerial papers, during the residence of the Minister in England, that their mission was succeeding, that it was progressing successfully, that offers were made which would be accepted by the Canadian people. We are now about to enter upon the discussion of the most important, momentous question ever submitted to a Canadian Legislature,—one which, I may say, will affect the prosperity of this country very materially, for a long time to come, and will affect still more materially that portion of our territories where this Railway is to be built. It is, therefore, of the last importance that this Parliament should have, before it comes to any decision upon the paper submitted on Friday, a complete statement of all offers made, to enable us to judge whether the Government have received any offers, which, in the estimation of this House, would be more favorable to the public interest of the country than this, or whether any of them, including this, were of such character as should be entertained by any Government having the public interest at heart. I presume there can be no possible objection to the production of these papers, because, on a previous occasion, in the case of a much less onerous bargain, though presented in a different manner to the public, there was included all the correspondence with other companies which had made offers or submitted propositions concerning the construction of the railway. Ministers should have brought down these papers without any motion, acting upon the precedent which they themselves set in 1873, but as they did not intimate any desire or any intention of doing so, I placed this notice on the paper in order that we may reach them as soon as possible, and have the benefit of them in the ensuing discussion upon the project now submitted to Parliame it. Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The first part of the hon. gentleman's motion asking for all papers, letters or documents concerning the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, is a rather wide order. Does it involve any paper connected with the construction of the railway? But I understand, from what he says, that he asks for the offers made by companies or individuals, or capitalists, for the construction of the railway. I am afraid we cannot give much assistance to the hon. gentleman in that regard. Before we went to England there was a provisional offer made to the Government which was distinctly understood to be provisional. We subsequently received a second offer, and the Government came to the conclusion, especially as we had an indirect intimation, verbally, that an offer would probably be made from New York and San Francisco, that we could not possibly settle up the matter here. We decided to inform all the parties that we would attend to the reception of any applications, tenders, or proffers, in London. Thereupon the first party who made this provisional offer withdrew it and would not hold to it. The second party did not do so—this was an offer from England—and the party subsequently dropped their application. The communications that were made in England were principally, if not altogether verbal. Gentlemen came over again and again from Paris and sat with us to the discussion of these matters. first offer was withdrawn. The second one it would be unfair to disclose; as the hon. gentlemen opposite will see there were persons in it, bankers and others of considerable commercial standing, who were connected with that offer. They found they were not strong enough to press it. Their offer was made, of course, with the desire of coming in if they could, and being the right hon gentleman will not now allow to be visited engaged in the construction of the road, and it would upon those contractors who happily are under his protection.

hardly be fair to them to use their names and to state that these persons failed in being strong enough to undertake the work. It would affect their position. But I would say this, that the present offer is the most favorable offer, both as to money and land, that the Government or delegates received. Arrangements were made; we sat de die in diem as a little committee, meeting different gentlemen again and again. They were all desirous of making an arrangement, money being plenty and enterprise ripe on the continent of Europe, especially in France and England. They were all anxious to connect themselves with such a great enterprise. Some were appalled by the largeness of the scheme; some were frightened by the eventual responsibility, and one after another withdrew from attempts to be concerned with the railway. As to the present parties we met them every day, and the results are laid before this House. I cannot possibly bring down the papers asked for; I think it would be an injury to the parties who have attempted to aid us by making offers.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I can only say I am extremely disappointed at the course taken by the hon. gentleman. He has indicated, since he first came home from England, a determination to keep the people in the dark as to the offers received and the bargain made. He endeavors now to force the House to a conclusion upon the one offer submitted, telling us that we must decide at once, and must decide it precisely as it is placed before the House, without any change or amendment. Now, in addition to all that, he refuses the House information; he constitutes himself the sole judge of the necessity for producing those papers; he says that, in his opinion, it would not be fair to so and so who made the offer. What has he to do with judging whether it is fair or not? It is for Parliament, for those who placed him where he is, to judge whether it is fair or not to look at the offers which have been made for a public undertaking. This, Sir, is the first time that offers made to the Government for a great public work have been refused to Parliament; and the hon. gentleman will find that, though he may get his majority to vote his extraordinary scheme through Parliament, the country will not justify the refusal of papers which are absolutely essential to us in discussing the project, and in enabling us to come to a righteous conclusion. Siv, I shall divide the House on this question. I shall require the right hon. gentleman, and every one who thinks with him that these papers should not be placed on the Table of the House, to say so by their votes, and to take the responsibility of justifying to the people the course they have chosen to adopt, in thus endeavoring to forestall public opinion and prevent its expression, in order that they may carry out their scheme without the slightest information being placed before us, except the monstrosity itself which was presented to Parliament the other day. require that the information we have asked for shall be laid before Parliament as a matter of public policy, and that requirement I am sure every parliamentarian on both sides of the House will agree is a reasonable one, and one that should not be refused even to a minority of this House.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I submit, Sir, that the observations of the right hon. gentleman are unfair to the gentlemen whose offers were not accepted, as they leave us to infer that those offers were refused because these gentlemen failed to carry them out. I am quite sure that the right hon. gentleman does not believe that these other tenderers were not accepted because they so failed. The right hon, gentleman first makes the extraordinary proposition that he will not take the people into his confidence, because it would be an injustice to those who failed. But let us look at the practice of the Department of Public Works. Every day Every day his proposition is violated. It is well known to the public that the names of some of the parties who were negotiating were paraded in Ottawa as men of distinction and strength long before the right hon. gentleman went to England to negotiate, and some people are inclined to think that my right hon, friend did not intend to give these gentlemen a chance; and they will be surprised that he gives as a reason for protecting them in Parliament, that they failed in making good their propositions, and that therefore he is obliged to keep their names from the public.

Mr. ANGLIN. The country, I think, Sir, will be rather surprised to find the dignity of Parliament pleaded one day as a reason for withholding information to which we are entitled, and the rights of the parties tendering pleaded on another day for the same reason. There will be no necessity for stating in any return asked for by the motion of my hon. friend, the member for Lambton, that the parties who have chosen to withdraw their tenders, withdrew because they were unable to carry out the contract. It would be quite sufficient to say that they chose to withdraw their tenders, or that hon, gentlemen on the other side, acting for the Government, did not choose to accept them. But when we are told that the greater part of these negotiations were carried on viva voce, we cannot surely be expected to believe that propositions made on an all-important matter like this were not reduced to writing in all cases. Surely there were enough members of the Government representing the country on the occasion to do that, and I have no doubt they had ample means at their command to have work of that kind properly done. It was due to the hon, gentlemen themselves, it was due to the party upon whom they call for support in this matter, and it was due to the people of the country that all the information should have been put together and submitted to the House without any such demand as that now made. I am delighted that the hon. member for Lambton has declared that he will divide the House, and that at the very opening of this Session of Parliament, we shall know who are of opinion that it is proper to demand information with which the people have a right to be furnished, and who are prepared to support the Ministry in withholding that information.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I am a little surprised at the heat which has been exhibited by hon. gentlemen on the other side in relation to a matter which seems to me to require no such display of ardour. The statement of my right hon. friend, I think, will carry conviction to the mind of every fair-minded man.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Over there.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes; and I hope a good many over there as well. I say that the course which the leader of the Government has pursued on this occasion, is one which will commend itself to the judgment of hon. members as one which is only a matter of justice to the parties with whom we have been negotiating. My right hon. friend has stated to the House, and stated truly, that in the proposition which we have laid upon the Table of the House—the contract which we have made, subject to the approval of Parliament, for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, is the very best—

Mr. BLAKE. I rise to order. It is quite out of order for the hon gentleman to speak of the contents of any paper which he is not prepared to lay on the Table.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am now referring to the paper on the Table.

Mr. BLAKE. Yes, but the hon gentleman is declaring that the paper on the Table is more favorable than one which he will not bring down.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I thought the hon. gentlemen opposite were desirous of information. Now they seek to prevent it.

Mr. Huntington.

Mr. MACKENZIE. We will read the information ourselves if you give it to us.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Then, Mr. Speaker, since the hon gentlemen are afraid I shall disclose some of the information for which they profess to be desirous, allow me to state that, at this moment, there is no offer before the Government. I say, Sir, that it is not in the power of the Government to lay on the Table of the House an offer from any parties who were found able to carry their offer to a conclusion. They have no such offer before them. What took place was this: the Government having determined to endeavor to secure the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, in conformity with the declared policy of Parliament, placed themselves in communication with a number of parties; other parties placed themselves nber of parties; other parties placed themselves communication with them, and they exhausted every means at their command. They had a proposal which they were led to suppose by the parties from whom it emanated would be backed up by such a support, and such an organization as would warrant the Government in making a contract with them. For the purpose of exhausting every possible means of finding the very best terms upon which this great work could be accomplished, in conformity with the will of Parliament, declared again and again, three Ministers were authorized to go to London, and the parties with whom we had been negotiating, and other parties from whom we had any reason to suppose a favorable offer might emanate, were communicated with, and having exhaustively discussed the whole question, we stand in the position to-day of dealing with the parties who made the very best proposal.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The very best offer that was laid before the House is the proposal that we submit for the consideration of Parliament, and the only one that emanated from any parties, who, upon full investigation, were found prepared to take up this work and carry it out upon the proposed terms, and that we believed could furnish the evidence necessary of their ability to do so. That is a plain statement of the case, and yet the hon, gentleman seemed to demand that, because men who were anxious to undertake this work entered into negotiations, without prejudice, which subsequently resulted in nothing, as they were finally not in a position to carry the negotiations to a conclusion, they should be placed before the people in the position of parties who, upon investigation, were found not to be possessed of all the means necessary to carry on this work. So far as relates to the business before the House, the leader of the late Government ought not to say—it is a little premature for him to say—that the Government proposes to force this House to a decision without an opportunity being given the House to make a full investigation.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The First Minister said so.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Not at all. All that the First Minister said will commend itself to the judgment of every fair-minded man. All that he said was that it was a matter that Parliament was called, at perhaps an inconvenient period for some gentlemen, to consider, because it was of great moment that no time should be lost in bringing this matter to a prompt conclusion; but no intimation has emanated from the First Minister, or anybody else, that this Parliament will not have all the time that, in its judgment, it desires to give this question the most exhaustive consideration. The contract is upon the Table of this House for acceptance by the House on its own merits or rejection. If, after full discussion, it is found to be in the interests of Canada, it will be accepted.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Will the hon gentleman allow me to read from the Hansard what the First Minister said? I asked if the hon. gentleman would now tell us whether it is his deliberate purpose to give this House but ten days in which to agree to a measure, upon pain of being punished by not having a holiday. The right hon. gentleman replied, that, with the assistance of the majority of this House, such was the intention of the Government.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I say so, too; but I ask the hon. gentleman if that will bear, for one moment, the forced construction that he put upon it. The First Minister did not say that this measure would not take a month to discuss, but that of course a long adjournment would be inconsistent with the policy that had induced the Government to summon Parliament at this early date.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I read his words.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER But you did not read a word that intimated that any person was to be forced for want of time—

Mr. MACKENZIE. Ten days.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The question was, if this matter was not concluded within that period, would there be a long adjournment and a long period of time lost before the subject would be again considered, and the right hon. gentleman said frankly to the House, if we are not able to conclude this matter before the Christmas holidays, there will be but a short adjournment, for the obvious reason that it is in the interest of the country this question should be dealt with promptly. In calling Parliament together at this period, there is no intention of depriving the House of the fullest opportunity of examining this question in all its details. I believe the more it is discussed the more hon. gentlemen opposite themselves, will find, if they have any regard for their own past pledges, they will be compelled to support it. That is the difficulty these hon, gentlemen will meet. So far from there being any desire not to have the fullest and frankest discussion, I trust this great measure, in all its will continue to be the subject haustive discussion, and the more it is discussed, the more the Government will gain in the general opinion of the House and country. The measure is here. It is the only measure we are in a position to lay before the House, and say there is a proposal to construct the Canadian Pacific Railway emanating from parties who afford a satisfactory guarantee of their ability to carry out the contract. I believe it would be acting most unfairly to gentlemen who have been zealously engaged in endeavoring to make arrangements by which they could grapple with the great work, and whose negotiations were fruitless, to have their names bandied about here and discussed one way or the other. I have no objection to the motion of the hon. member for Lambton being placed in your hands, because it is a motion on which every hon. gentleman in this House who wishes to see public business conducted upon those fair principles that will enable Governments to discuss matters with gentlemen without making the gentlemen interested in the question under debate the victims, subsequently, of that discussion, will wish to record his opinion. I trust the motion will be met, as such a motion requires to be met. We have laid everything upon the Table necessary to place every detail connected with this question in the possession of the House, and are prepared for its fullest discussion.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Will you vote for it?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon member for Lambton quoted what 1 said. I think that he did not read the full reply. I said: "Emigrants will be here in May, and it is of very great importance, if Parliament is going to adopt the arrangement, that it should do so with all convenient speed. We consider it of so much importance that we shall ask the House to take it into early and earnest consideration; and to remain here with as short a Christmas interval as possible until it is passed."

Mr. BLAKE. I shall not complicate this discussion by questioning the policy of the Government as to the time at which they propose to commence, and the diligence with which they propose to prosecute the discussion of the great question they are about to submit for our consideration. All we are at present engaged in considering is, what is the nature of the materials essential to a just consideration of the subject. The proposition advanced by the Government is wholly unprecedented. It would render the conduct of public business by Ministers of a free country, more like the conduct of public business by a despot in a despotic country than anything else. It is not the magnitude of the contract that makes any difference in the attitude of a contractor towards the public; it is not the importance of the transaction that entitles those who propose to enter into it to any different consideration from ordinary contractors. There is no different motive that animates men who come forward and make tenders for one public work, as compared with those who tender for another public work, that would entitle them to have their proposals received in confidence, as the Minister implied, though he did not dare say so in express terms, they were—because to receive such proposals in confidence would be a gross breach of duty. He said they were received without prejudice. He borrowed a legal phrase wholly without application to this occasion. A man makes an offer; he knows when he makes that offer that he submits it to the possibility of acceptance or rejection; he knows, also, that if he fails to meet his offer to the Government, his offer will be disclosed. What is this we hear of?-humiliation! Every day men are tendering for public works and are awarded contracts on condition of being able to carry them out. One condition is that they give security; every day they fail to give security. Sometimes a a supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite buys off the security of a contractor, and the next contractor gets the work; but I do not hear that the contractors who fail are entitled to have their names withheld, or that they are not to be exposed to the humiliation of its being known that they have failed to carry out their propositions. Public business could not safely go on if Ministers were to be permitted to arrogate this power to themselves-of deciding that they would conceal from the House and the country offers made to them of one description, and bring down only one offer. The hon. gentleman was out of order when he undertook to characterise papers which he refused to bring down. At the same time, he tells us that the offers he refuses to bring down were not rejected, but that the men who made them found themselves unable to carry them out—that the difficulty arose, not from their offers being too favorable to themselves, but from their being unable to implement them, assuming, therefore, that if they had been implemented they would have been accepted by the Administration. In the debate upon my resolution last Session, the Minister of Railways gave us some details of the form of the road, but he stated that an offer was made for the construction of the road from Selkirk to Kamloops for $13,000 and 13,000 acres a mile.

Mr. CASEY. $10,000 a mile.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, I think, if I remember right, it was thirteen millions of money and twenty-six millions of acres—

Mr. BLAKE. Well, Sir, this only shows how important it is that we should have the papers. The hon. Minister himself does not remember whether it was $13,000,000 and 26,000,000 acres.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER, Oh yes.

Mr. BLAKE. Well, he did not know a moment ago.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. See what the Hansard says.

Mr. BLAKE. I don't care what the Hansard says. I am speaking of the hon. gentleman's memory, Why should we not have more particulars of that offer? The hon, the First Minister, at a pic-nic on the 29th of June last, said this:

"He could say this, and the Minister of Finance, who was on the platform, could corroborate his statement, if necessary, that there were capitalists at this moment who, knowing that there was a certain fortune to be made out of the construction of the railway, were asking that the work be handed over to them. They had said, 'We will relieve you of all anxiety and the people of all apprehension of being taxed. We will take the railway in hand, build it, and make fortunes out of it.' The Government, at this moment, had the offers made under consideration, so that there was no danger regarding the road."

That the hon, gentleman stated before he went to England. Now, who were these gentlemen, to whom the hon. gentleman refers as friends of the Government who, in the interests of the Government, or with some patriotic motives, were exerting themselves to meet the views of the Government? He tells us they were capitalists who, wanting to make fortunes out of this enterprise, made these offers. Now, Sir, why should we not see the offers of these gentlemen? Are their names not to be disclosed to us? Are they to make offers to us secretly? The hon, gentleman says they were not made secretly. Why should we not hear and know all about them? Why should this transaction be shrouded in mystery and concealment if it was not done in secret? I am glad to hear that the hon. member for Lambton will divide the House on this motion, and I have only to say that I hope as many gentlemen opposite as possible will record their votes against it.

Mr. LANGEVIN. I am sorry that the hon, gentleman characterises the action of the Government in this case as despotic. There is no despotism: we have brought down every paper in connection with the contract that we could bring down. It frequently happens that the Government says it cannot, in the interest of the country, bring down all the papers in connection with a contract, and Parliament assents to the declaration of the Government. The hon. gentleman says it is not for the Government to be judges in this case, but Parliament. Well, the Government knowing what has occurred in the negotiations, states positively that the papers now before the House are really the only papers that can be put before the House—that it has no better offer than this-that offers, informal offers if you like, were made and withdrawn, and the Government sent three of its members to England to enter into negotiations there. If two or three capitalists come to the Government and say, we are disposed to build this road for so much money and so much land, the Government is not to take that as an offer; but we say, here is a tender that the capitalists have made and are able to carry out, and we have made it a contract. The leader of the Opposition says this is not more than an ordinary case of a public work; when we make a contract, all the tenders are laid before Parliament if they are called for; and he asks, why should it not be the same in this case? man tenders, why should he be afraid that his tender should be known? Surely the hon, gentleman does not consider that this great work, perhaps the greatest that has ever come before Parliament, should be put on the level of a tender for a lighthouse or a wharf. It is a work of very great magnitude—of such magnitude that hon, gentlemen opposite, that Parliament, that the Government, thought we should not undertake it ourselves, but place it in the hands of a company composed of capitalists backed by the largest amount of money we could find; and yet the hon. gentleman must know that, with all their money, these gentlemen have hesitated to undertake such a work. He knows full well that capitalists cannot make tenders of that kind without consulting with others, and negotiating with the great moneyed institutions, and that if these negotiations had been with the Government, it is no reason why they should be laid before Parliament. Why? Negotiations proceed in cases of this kind viva voce, and are not reduced to writing like Mr. BLAKE, the House I have no doubt that the majority will consider it one that should not be supported.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Langevin) says this is a very great work, and is not to be put on a level with ordinary contracts given out by the department; that while it is proper that all tenders for ordinary public works should be made to the House, those for a work of infinitely greater magnitude should not be made public; that the House should be kept in ignorance with regard to them. The hon, gentleman seems to think there are different grades of people, that these who are very wealthy and capable of tendering for so important a work as the present possess much finer feelings than the tenderers for ordinary public works, and are to be dealt with in a different way; and that while it is right and proper that tenders made to the Public Works Department for ordinary railway contracts should be brought down, whether the parties failed because their tenders were too high, or because they could not give the necessary security, the other kind should not be submitted to the House. In the case of the most important works, whether the parties fail for one reason or another, the people's representatives in Parliament are to be kept ignorant of the character of the propositions made to the Government. We find those hon gentlemen who are supposed to be responsible to this House, and whose conduct, if the House properly discharges its duty, must be examined into and judged by it, are to be, themselves, the judges of their own conduct in this particular matter. It is argued that the House has nothing whatever to do but accept the conclusions they have come to with reference to their own transactions. I do not think hon. gentlemen on this side of the House will be disposed to agree to any such proposition, and I do not think that the country, in so far as it has supported hon, gentlemen opposite, will be disposed to support them in upholding the Administration at this particular time in this important public matter. One hon, gentleman on the Treasury benches tells us there is no proposition except this one. Another tells us other propositions have been made by parties who failed because unable to give the necessary security, and that the present tender is the best. This is a very extraordinary statement—that this is better than another proposition not formally made and better than propositions in respect to which the parties were not able to give the necessary security. That this contract concerns the expenditure of public money, and, with regard to the application of the public resources to any public purpose, whether land or money, it is the peculiar function of this House to carefully supervise administrative acts. This Parliament, or House, would be derelict in its duty to the country if it did not insist upon the Administration laying all the correspondence on the Table, and allow members to judge for themselves whether this is the best proposition made. I cannot well conceive how a worse proposition, or a more atrocious proposition, could have been submitted to any Administration. I cannot conceive how gentlemen of very fine feeling could come to the people's representatives, or the Administration, and say: these are the terms upon which we are ready to go on with the construction of such an important public work. I am not disposed to place the most implicit confidence in the statements of hon. gentlemen opposite. I do not know with what care they have made their calculations, or how very different they may have been from those actually laid on the Table; and until I have an opportunity to judge for myself, I can form no decided opinion with regard to the matter.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. It seems to me that hon. gentlemen opposite have got themselves into a white rage at a very early period of the Session, and upon a very small matter; and it is only to be expected, when we understand, other negotiations. I hope the hon. member for Lambton as has been said by the hon. gentleman who has just taken will not succeed in his motion. If he persists in dividing his seat, that the reason why they are pressing this matter to a division is that they have no confidence in the statements of the right hon, leader of the House. That is just the whole truth of the matter. If they had the confidence in him that I believe the country possesses, they would not press this motion to a division, or ask for papers. The leader of the Opposition draws a comparison between the tenders for this railroad, and those for any other public work. There is one great difference however. When an advertisement is inserted in Dominion newspapers, calling for tenders for a public work, tenders are submitted in answer to it, and then we can all understand they are public property. But in this case no advertisement was put in. Strangers came here from Europe and the United States—not our own citizens—and said: We will offer to do this work.

Mr. BLAKE. Do you know that?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. No more than I am told by the leader of the House. Strangers came here and made an offer, and when a counter-proposition was made, they said, we will make this offer, and if not accepted, will withdraw it. I think it would not be fair to these gentlemen to bring down their propositions unless they had been told at the time such would be done, or unless their offer was in answer to an advertisement calling for tenders for such a great public work. I am quite satisfied with the statement that it would be a breach of confidence if those papers were brought down, and am quite prepared to vote confidence in it.

Mr. LAURIER. It is the basis of all free government that the acts of the Administration should be judged by the representatives of the people. In this case the same rule, it must be conceded, should apply. It is a well known principle that the people have a right to judge, not only of the honesty of those entrusted with the management of their affairs, but even of their judgment in action. The people have a right to say they have erred in judgment. How are we to deal with or decide this question, or whether the Government have accepted the best ofter? It is impossible for the country to say, we have only the word of the Government. I am quite disposed to take the word of the Government as an individual, but not as a member of the House. As representatives of the people, I think every one of us has a right to say the acts of the Government should be done in broad daylight, so that every elector may have an oppor-tunity of judging whether or not the Government and every individual member was right not only in motive but in judgment. This is the reason of the motion, and I think it will be the duty of every member to affirm its principle, that nothing should be concealed from the representatives of the

Mr. MACKENZIE. I have to call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to a point of order, and to ask your ruling. Attention was called to the hon. the Minister of Railways quoting documents not before the House. He persisted, however, in referring to those documents, and by that reference he was able to inform the House, from his personal knowledge, that the best offer received by the Government, for constructing the Pacific Railway, was before the House. Now, according to the Rules of Debate in our own House, no Minister of the Crown is at liberty to read or quote from any despatch or other State paper not before the House, unless he is prepared to lay it on the Table. The hon. gentleman has made that reference, and he has succeeded, by it, in persuading a large number of the members of this House to vote against the motion that I submitted, for I cannot conceive it possible that, without some belief of that kind being instilled into their minds by the confidence they have in the hon. gentleman, such a vote could possibly have been obtained.

An Hon. MEMBER. Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am in order; I am giving my reasons for making the motion. I am here as an aggrieved member of the House of Commons. I want your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER. It is too late to raise the point of order now, but as the hon. gentleman has asked for my ruling, it is this: According to May, a Minister of the Crown is not at liberty to read or quote from papers not before the House. I did not see that any hon. gentleman read or quoted from any document. Besides, I do not see any objection to a member referring in general terms to what is mentioned in the motion of the hon. member for Lambton, or characterising or qualifying some of his statements by referring generally to documents or papers asked for. I think the point of order is not well taken.

PROPOSED LINE TO SAULT STE. MARIE.

Mr. MACKENZIE, in moving for copies of all offers made to the Government for the construction of a line of railway from any part of the proposed Canada Pacific Railway line to Sault Ste. Marie, said: I have only to say that I have heard that some offers have been made, and I hopethey are not made by parties who are in danger of failing, because, in that case, according to what has passed, we are not to expect any information. I move this motion, hoping that the Minister will not choke off inquiry any further in relation to such matters.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am sorry to find that so great a stickler for order as the leader of the late Government should, in making his motion, violate that point of order which declares that no reference shall be made to a previous debate.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I made no reference to a previous debate.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. member referred to the debate that has just closed.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I made no reference to a previous debate. I said I hoped the parties were not likely to fail.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Did not the hon. member refer to choking off?

Mr. MACKENZIE. Certainly, that was by the division. Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say, with reference to this, that I am not aware exactly of any offers having been made for the construction of the road to Sault Ste. Marie. There are applications in connection with that work for subsidies. I shall be very glad to bring any papers down that Mr. MACKENZIE. I wish to ask if the hon. gentleman will bring down a statement of the expenditure upon the Pacific Railway, before this debate upon the motion commences?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

have reference to that project in any shape.

Motion agreed to.

PACIFIC RAILWAY COMMISSION.

Mr. MILLS, in moving for an address to His Excellency the Governor General for a copy of the Royal Commission issued to Messrs. Clarke, Keefer and Miall, to enquire into certain public matters, together with any instructions reduced to writing, relating to the same; also the salaries allowed to the said Commissioners, the amount so far paid to each, and the cost of the Commission up to date, said: observe, with regard to the Commission, statements made by the hon. the Minister of Railways, and by some of his colleagues, that seem to me at variance with our constitutional rights, and with the law of the land. I notice that those hon, gentlemen lay down propositions broadly that they are at liberty to enquire into any public matters, that they can appoint a Commission to enquire into the conduct of Ministers of the Crown, that they can enquire into the conduct of persons who have been Ministers of the Crown in their official relations, and that they can enquire into matters which have already attracted the attention of Parliament. Now, it seems to me that these practices are wholly at variance with the well known principles of parliamentary government. If the report which appeared in the newspapers is correct, the hon. the Minister of Railways informed the people at a public meeting that this Commission had been issued at his instance, that certain charges had been made against himself, and that the Commission was appointed for the purpose of enquiring into them. Well, it seems to me that when a Minister of the Crown advises His Excellency to issue his Commission for the purpose of enquiring into charges which have been made against such Minister, he is violating the first principles of law which forbid any man being a judge in his own case, or appointing a party by whom he is to be judged. That is what the hon, gentleman has done, and precisely the same objections can be raised against this Commission as were made from this side of the House some years ago to the appointment of a Commission Mr. MACKENZIE.

for the Pacific Railway. A copy of that Commission has appeared in the public press, and it refers to certain charges made against the hon, gentleman on the floor of the House as one of the grounds assigned for the issuing of the Commission. Now, I beg to call the attention of the House to a rule of parliamentary law of long standing, but which has as much force as it had at the time it was first declared in the House of Commons. In the remonstrance of the Commons to Charles I., 15th December, 1641, it was declared:

"That it is their ancient and undoubted right and privilege that Your Majesty ought not to take notice of any matter in agitation or debate in either of the Houses of Parliament, but by their information or agreement."

This resolution was carried against the interference with the privileges of the House of Commons by the King, who had taken cognizance of what was passing in the House. When he demanded what had been said by certain members the Speaker informed him that he could give him no information in regard to them, that he had no eyes for the purpose of seeing anything that transpired in the House except what the House brought especially under his notice. The doctrine laid down in this resolution is, I contend, that the Crown can possess no information with regard to any statement made in this House unless the matter is specially referred to the Crown. If any charge were made against the hon. gentleman or against any member of the Government or of this House, whether on this side or that, it is competent for this House to investigate that charge, but it is not competent for the other House or for the Crown to do so. I know that the terms in which the power of issuing commissions are referred to in the Act are very broad, but I submit they will not at all bear the construction which the Government have put upon them. The provisions of this Act are to be interpreted with reference to the law of the land, and the powers that are conferred are to be confined within those limits which it was the obvious intention of Parliament should not be overstepped by any inquiry made at the instance of the Government. It is perfectly clear that the Crown would have no power to issue a Commission to inquire into any criminal act; it is perfectly clear that the Crown will issue no commission to inquire into anything that properly comes before any legal tribunal of the country. If we are to construe this Act, broad as are its terms, so as to prevent the Government from issuing a commission to usurp those functions that belong to any court for the administration of jurisprudence, it is equally clear that we are so to construe the Act that the Government shall not trench upon the powers belonging to the High Court of Parliament. The words are these:

"Whenever the Governor in Council deems it expedient to call an inquiry to be made into and concerning any matter connected with the Government of Canada, or the conduct of any part of the public business thereof, and such enquiry is not regulated by any special law, the Governor may, by the Commission in the case, confer upon the Commissioners power to do, &c."

I contend this is a matter that is regulated by a special law of Parliament. It is the law of Parliament that any charge made against a Minister of the Crown in his capacity as such, should be investigated at the instance of the House of Commons, and not at the instance of any other body. Nothing could be more monstrous than when a charge is made against a Minister of the Crown to have the investigation conducted by a person appointed by the Minister himself. It is laid down in Herstlet's Precedents that the House of Commons, as the grand inquest of the nation, may examine into the conduct of any public official or officer on It is not necessary that any charge mere common fame. should be especially formulated. If any rumor has gone abroad affecting the public conduct of a Minister of the Crown, or of a Member of Parliament, it is competent for the House of Commons upon that to base an enquiry. to enquire into certain corrupt practices which were alleged the rule in England is not the one upon which the hon. to exist in connection with the granting of a former charter gentlemen opposite have acted, and that they have no right whatever to exercise powers under the provisions of this Act relating to any matter which comes under the purvieu of Parliament, I need only refer to a few instances. Some years ago certain charges were made with reference to mail contracts entered into by the Postmaster General. A committee was appointed to enquire into the conduct of the Minister and of the parties who had made tenders for the contract, and on that occasion the Government declined to take any action in the appointment of the committee. Mr. Gladstone said, when the matter was first brought before Parliament, that the Government should take as little part as possible, and should be guided by the general feeling of the House in the matter, that whatever way the House proposed to conduct the enquiry the Government would assent to. At a later period Mr. Gladstone said: "He should have been glad if there had been such an indication of opinion on the part of the House as to have enabled the Government to judge what was the prevailing sense of the House, and if that had been expressed the Government would have been guided by it." Now, what was the rule laid down by Mr. Gladstone? It is obviously this: that when any charges are made affecting the conduct of a Minister, the Government will allow the House to appoint a committee to investigate the same, and if the House indicates the manner in which it desires that committee to be appointed, the Government will forward the wish of the House in the matter, but will take no part themselves in the constitution of a tribunal which is to enquire into their own conduct. Then we find that, at a former time, when Parliament had asked the Crown, and had, in fact, passed an Act requiring an investigation into the conduct of a certain constituency where corrupt practices existed, and when the Bill was first brought down, it was proposed to give the Crown power to appoint the Commissioners to make the enquiry. The Earl of Derby objected to that. He said in relation to the enquiry asked for into the conduct of the electors in the constituency, or of the candidate, that the Crown did not appoint the Commissioners by by whom the enquiry was to be made; and the Bill, as it was carried through Parliament provided that when a petition was submitted to Her Majesty, asking that a Commission should be appointed to enquire into the conduct of parties at an election of the House of Commons, they in their petition should name the parties whom they desired to be appointed as Commissioners. In the Lancaster election case in 1867, Mr. Darby Griffith complained that the Government had not asked for a Commission to enquire into the corrupt practices that prevailed in that constituency. But, in reply to him, Sir George Grey said, that it was open to any member of the House to present a petition with a view of having it presented to Her Majesty, asking for an investigation, and to have himself named the Commissioners if the House chose to consent. In 1869 there were two important cases bearing upon this point. In one instance (Norwich election case) the Attorney-General presented a petition to name Commissioners; and at a later period, in the Dublin election case, Mr. O'Reilly made a motion in favor of a petition to the Crown, in which he named the Commissioners whom the Crown were to appoint to investigate a particular election. The principle observed in that case is one that lies at the basis of our own political system—namely, that no one should be appointed to enquire into his own conduct, or the conduct of those to whom he stands directly opposed. My objection to the Commission under consideration is, first, that it was appointed by the gentlemen who were themselves interested in the enquiry, for the purpose, if possible, of blackening their opponents and vindicating themselves; and, further, it was a Commission to enquire into matters of which Parliament alone, as the grand inquest of the nation, could take cognizance, for they were matters tribunals of the country. Now, if the Commission in question is of such a character as it is represented to be, and if it was issued as the hon continuous contains.

broad enough to interfere with the law of Parliament, they are broad enough to interfere with the ordinary administration of justice. They are no more limited against the administration of justice and the trial of parties for ordinary crimes than against the investigation of charges against a member of this House or a Minister of the Crown by a Commissioner appointed by that Minister himself. This whole question was raised in a very full and elaborate discussion which took place some years ago in reference to the Belfast riots. The Government issued a Commission to enquire into the origin of these riots, and the conduct of the police, with a view of ascertaining if the police were numerous enough to secure a due observance of the law and the preservation of the peace. The investigation was held with a view of further legislation and the rendering of the ordinary administration of the law more efficient than it had been up to that time. But in the course of the enquiry many matters were brought out incidentally which affected particular individuals, and it was held by some of the Judges that the publication of reports of the evidence and of the documents was not privileged, and that the parties who were injuriously affected by the publication would have redress against the Commissioners and parties who published the document. When Mr. O'Connell was a member of the Irish Bar, the House of Commons appointed a Commission to enquire into the corporations of Ireland, and in the course of the enquiry, certain charges were incidentally made against the Mayor of the City of Cork. The Commission asked a witness, if there was anything else he had to say, and the witness replied: "I have an instance of a £10 note slipping into the Mayor's pocket from off the Board room table of the House of Industry, and it never slipped out since." This was a statement made before a Commission. The Mayor was advised by eminent counsel to prosecute the party who gave the evidence for libel. The point was argued by Mr. O'Connell and Mr. Holmes, and it was insisted by counsel for the prosecutor that there was no power in the Crown to issue such a Commission, and that even an address of the House of Commons would not give it any validity. The case came by appeal to England, and the Lord Chief Justice of the day, in delivering judgment, said that it was contended that a right existed to report truly the proceedings of a court of justice; but that principle was not applicable in the present case, because this was a commission of enquiry and not a court of justice; it had not the characteristics of one, but was preparatory to some ulterior measure and for the purpose of enquiry merely. The evidence was entirely ex parte, and the proceedings bore less analogy to those of a court of justice than to those of a police magistrate or at a coroner's inquest. If, therefore, those proceedings were defamatory they might tend to prejudice the public mind and to defeat the ends of justice if the case were brought to trial. And Mr. Justice Burton said that it was impossible to say that those proceedings took place before a tribunal which had any analogy to a court of justice, for a court of justice had authority to hear and determine cases, whereas the tribunal in question could hear merely; the Commissioners were only to enquire into certain facts; they could not give an acquittal; they were empowered to hear evidence and that ex parte—not for the purpose of being communicated to the public, but of being returned to another place. He then said, that anything which might inflame the public mind when a man was likely to be tried, was a high crime and misdemeanour. There was another ease—that of Mr. Balfe, in which the same principles were involved; and it was laid down by Lord Cairns, that it was an improper proceeding for the interfere in any way. If the provisions of the Act are if it was issued, as the hon. gentleman says, because certain charges were made against himself, with a view of vindicating his character against those charges, then it is not within the powers conferred by statute, and is in contravention of the law of Parliament, and the elementary principles of law and justice. I ask that the information may be brought down at an early day, in order that a motion may be founded upon the subject and the views of Parliament taken upon it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I merely rise for the purpose of asking the hon. gentleman to correct the statement he has just made; that is, that I stated that the Commission was issued for the purpose of defending myself against charges made against myself. I never made any such state-

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This is an old friend with a new face, and I am glad to see it again. It will answer, however, no good purpose to discuss the matter until the papers are brought down. They will be brought down at once. I do not remember the terms of the Commission. Every hon. member ought to have the Commission and the Act before him and see whether the Commission is in accordance with the Act, with the powers given by the Act or not. We will all have, when the papers are brought down, an opportunity of considering the able speech of my hon. friend from Bothwell on the subject.

Motion agreed to.

THE CONSOLIDATED FUND.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT moved for a return of receipts and expenditures, in detail, chargeable to the Consolidated Fund, from 1st July to 1st December, in the year 1879 and 1880 respectively.

Motion agreed to.

EXPORTS AND IMPORTS.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT moved for a return of exports and imports, in detail, from 1st July to 1st December, in the years 1879 and 1830 respectively; showing the countries whence and to which the same were respectively exported or imported.

Mr. BOWELL said it would be impossible to produce the return asked for until a very late period of the Session. He suggested that instead of 1st December, the final date be 31st December.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT accepted the suggestion, and the motion thus amended was agreed to.

CATTLE AND SHEEP EXPORT TRADE.

Mr. DOMYILLE, on rising to move for a Select Committee to enquire into the export trade of cattle and sheep from Canada to Europe, and how it can be further developed and fostered, said: Since putting this notice on the paper, I have learnt it would be more acceptable to have referred the matter to the Immigration and Colonization Committee. I did not think so in entering the motion, because I thought it was a subject that might be kept entirely clear of other questions, in order that information might be obtained in as practicable a shape as possible for the benefit of the cattle and sheep traders throughout the Dominion, especially in the Lower Provinces, where the feeling is, that if this subject were given some consideration we, being nearer the sea than other portions of the Dominion, and having less distances to drive our cattle and sheep in order to reach the sea-board than have the graziers in the far west, were in a superior position to do the trade, and only required some information and encouragement to make better use of our facilities. We need a line of steamers for the trade, and I thought by bringing up the subject before the House, the Government would, on acquiring the needed information, lend us some was not laid before the House, was a statement of the assistance in the development of the trade; but as I am told expense, which I will bring down. Mr. MILLS.

it would be far better the subject should go before the Committee of Immigration and Colonization, I beg to withdraw.

Mr. ANGLIN. Before the hon, gentleman obtains leave to withdraw the motion I would suggest to him to consider whether it would not be better to bring the subject before the House in some other form. If the matter is referred to one of the large committees, the chances are we shall not have a report until the end of the Session, when it will be too late for the House to take any action. The hon. gentleman could tell the House how much the persons engaged in that trade in the Lower Provinces have suffered during the past season, through being obliged to transport their cattle to Quebec, where they are received on board the steamers. I trust the hon. gentleman will give the matter such consideration as will lead him to bring the subject before the House in another form. A resolution, asking the opinion of the House, asking the House to declare that it was but just and reasonable that the Government should render such assistance to the lower ports in this matter, as would enable them to establish lines of steamers for the purpose of carrying on this cattle trade, and other trades now awaiting development, would be, perhaps, the most feasible way of arriving at a satisfactory result. I only throw out the suggestion; I do not want to interfere in the matter.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It seems to me the hon. member for King's (Mr. Domville) has taken the right course. It would be better to get the evidence first before the Committee and then introduce resolutions founded upon the evidence. It is quite true that the final reports of Standing Committees are brought in late the session, but the committees have power, in the meantime, to report from time to time, and I have no doubt this is a question in which the Committee will appoint a sub-committee to take up, and report upon, early in the Session. My hon. friends, the members for King's and Gloucester, could be put on the Standing Committee so as to form part of the sub-committee appointed to enquire into this question.

Motion withdrawn.

WRECKAGE IN CANADIAN WATERS.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex), moved for all the evidence collected in regard to wreckage in Canadian waters, particularly on the shores of Lakes Erie, Ontario and Huron, and rivers St. Clair and Detroit; also, a statement of the money expended and to whom paid for collecting the same.

Mr. BOWELL. If the hon. member had stated what he expected to obtain by this motion, I should have been better able to inform him as to whether there was any information in the department. I am not aware of any information, or any statement of expenses incurred in connection with wreckage, other than what was laid before the House last Session.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). I understood that a gentleman was appointed for the purpose of travelling along the frontier, on the Canadian side, and collecting information as to the number of wrecks which have taken place within the last eight or nine years. It is of great importance that the inland navigation of the country, which forms a large part of our commerce, should be adequately protected, and it was with the view of learning what information had been collected, bearing on the prevention of wrecks, that I put my motion on the paper.

Mr. BOWELL. It is true that a gentleman was appointed to make enquiry as to the number of wrecks along the shores of Lake Erie and the head of Lake Ontario. His report was presented to the House, I think, last Session. The only information asked for in this motion which

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex), said the return might include any correspondence which had taken place between the authorities at Washington and the Dominion Govern ment, on the subject of wreckage.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD suggested that such correspondence should be made the subject of a separate motion.

Motion agreed to.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex), moved for copies of all contracts or agreements made for the printing of Parliament during the recess, together with all correspondence and papers connected therewith.

Motion agreed to.

ACCIDENT ON THE LACHINE CANAL.

Mr. DESJARDINS, in moving for copies of all correspondence, protests or reports of engineers, in relation to the accident which has recently occurred in section No. 11 of the Lachine Canal, now under contract, said: Before moving this motion, I desire to offer a few remarks. The attention of the public has several times been called to the accidents that have occurred in the construction of the Lachine Canal. Last year I accompanied the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals on a visit to section 11, for the purpose of ascertaining what had caused a suspension of the work there, and the throwing out of employment of two or three hundred laborers in the midst of a severe winter. Recently another accident occurred in that section, having the effect again of stopping the operations of the contractors until next Spring. evident if these accidents occur very often, when the work is delivered up, the Government will have to pay heavy damages every year. The particular work in progress there at present is a long pier running from the opening of the canal about a mile up the stream. It is intended to build it water tight, so as to keep the water at the proper level in the basin, and is of the nature of construction called cofferdam. After the last accident, I went to examine that cofferdam. After the last accident, I went to examine that pier and found that, although yet under construction, it looked really in many parts like a ruin. The clay chamber, which had been intended originally to be four or five feet wide, had become in some places ten or twelve feet wide. The weight of clay had evidently canted the crib work towards the basin, so that the contractor had to prop it up with beams and other supports. It has been said, with reference to the works already completed on the Lachine Canal, that their actual want of repairs there was evidently some defect in the original plan. Last year we were called on to vote $10,000 to repair the dry walls which had been built along the banks of the canal, and it is estimated that not less than $100,000 more will be required to make the necessary changes, so as to give the works the proper solidity. think the facts should be enquired into, with the view of ascertaining whether the fault rests upon the Chief Engineer in charge of the work or not. It is very well known that he has not been very happy in his inventions lately. We know he is putting up gates just now that will require all the strength of a man during twelve minutes to open, while the old ones require only one minute. Now we have that one pier that shows manifest defects. I do not know that the responsibility can be put on the shoulders of the contractors, who seem to have done all they could to properly complete these works. Therefore, I think an enquiry should be made, and my motion has that end.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am very sorry that the hon. gentleman, in making his motion, to which, of course, there is no objection, the Government being ready to bring down all the papers that can throw any light on the subject, should have felt it his duty to animadvert with so much severity upon the standing and conduct of the Chief Engineer return laid on the Table, but I assume it was made in strict of Canals. I think I may say that if there is a public officer response to the motion. I think it would be well were that in the country who stands high, and deservedly high, in its estimation, it is this gentleman. It would require a much cooler statement than that just made by my hon. friend, at all events, to shake my confidence materially in that public officer, and lead me to the conclusion that the accidents that occurred are traceable to the neglect of duty of that officer and to his inability. Every person familiar with contracts knows that difficulties constantly arise in carrying them to completion, and that the contractor at any rate forms a strong opinion that he is not at fault. Of course, the responsibility and expense of those accidents falls on the contractor, who undertakes to do a certain amount of work for a certain sum. To be sure if it can be shown there has been anything defective in the plans or directions given to the contractor, the question will arise as to how it should be dealt with. I shall not hastily conclude that all the strictures made on that officer are entirely deserved until I am able to examine the case more closely.

Mr. MACKENZIE. 1 am very glad to hear the hon. gentleman opposite make such remarks with regard to Mr. Page, who, I think, is entitled to them. I am quite sure that in the matter of hydraulic engineering we have no man to compare with him in the Dominion. I would be exceedingly glad if the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) would always act on his advice for, although he happens to be right in this case, as to the Lachine Canal, he was quite wrong as to the Carillon Canal last year.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will be quite prepared to discuss that subject, exhaustively, with my hon. friend when the proper time comes.

Motion agreed to.

IMMIGRATION TO MANITOBA AND THE NORTH-

Mr. IVES, in moving for a statement of the number of immigrants who have gone into Manitoba and the North-West Territories for the year ending October 31st, 1880; the number of persons who have purchased lands; the number of persons who have taken homesteads and pre-emption rights; the number of acres sold, the total number of acres taken up and purchased; the total receipts for lands sold or taken up during that period, and the amount hereafter to be received, said: I have not had an opportunity of seeing the return brought down by the Minister of the Interior. I did not know, when I put the notice on the paper, that it was his intention to bring down such a return, nor did I know that a motion was made last Session by the member for Gloucester on the subject. I apprehend the return will not cover the period aimed at in the motion.

Mr. BLAKE. I observe the return just brought down does not specify the period over which it runs; I fancy it runs over more than one year—the return brought down in answer to the motion of the member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin). I think it would be quite convenient if we had a uniform statement on this subject. I suppose the reason why the hon. gentleman mentions the 31st October is that it marks the limit of the departmental year, which ends on that day. I suppose that covers the period not covered by the preceding return. It does not state how long it runs. It would be very important if the usual digest form were given with a yearly return that would convey full informa-tion on this subject. I think a distinction between Manitoba and the rest of the North-West would also be useful. Suppose the facts were given showing those who emigrated to Manitoba and left it, and those who have gone thither and settled in that Province.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I did not look at the statement, already prepared, supplemented in accordance with the motion of my hon. friend (Mr. Ives). I quite agree with the hon. member for West Durham that it would be well to have a statement showing year by year the amount of land sold, the money received, the amount of scrip, and the expense of surveys and so forth. I have already given orders for such a statement.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I hope the hon, mover will permit a slight amendment in regard to his return. I do not see that it provides for showing the quantity of land that may be sold to any individual. It is said that some very large purchases have been made by individuals. I think a return showing the properties sold to individuals would be information useful to the House. The return now proposed does not provide for that information.

Motion agreed to.

HOMESTEADS AND PRE-EMPTION RIGHTS IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. IVES moved for a statement of the total number of acres of land sold and taken up as homesteads and pre-emption rights from the acquisition of the North-West up to the 31st October last; the total amount received in money therefrom, and the amount which should thereafter be received.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would suggest that it be amended so that the returns shall be made year by year.

Mr. IVES. With the permission of the House I will amend it so that the return may be an annual one, distinguishing one year from another.

Mr. ANGLIN. The returns brought down this afternoon contain all the information the hon, gentleman asks for up to the 31st December last. I have some recollection that towards the close of the last Session the right hon, leader of the Government stated in the House that some such report as this would be laid upon the Table annually, and that some regulations to that effect were brought down and adopted by the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think the conversation arose from an enquiry made by the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) as to the advisability to bring down the account from the beginning, and some time ago I gave orders that the report should be prepared.

Mr. BLAKE. It was in connection with the proposition that we ought to know the expenditure year by year in connection with the surveys and administration of these lands, and also the returns, because it was said that inasmuch as you are taking as capital account $300,000 for surveys, it is important to see year by year that it is repaid.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. The matter was brought up upon a motion of mine to make certain returns standing orders. That, upon consideration, was withdrawn. The First Minister said it was too grave a matter to be adopted off hand. I think what the hon member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) referred to arose later in the Session in connection with the discussion on the Estimates, and more particularly with the appropriation of $300,000 for service which was to be charged to capital account instead of, as heretofore, to ordinary income.

Mr. MILLS. It seems to me this information ought to be given every year in the annual return of the department. We have in the Trade and Navigation Returns statements with regard to the condition of trade, and all the information required in that particular branch; but with regard to the Crown Lands sold, the amount of money received during the year, and the like of that information, might be given by the Minister of the Interior in that part of his report relating to the management of the Dominion Lands.

Motion, as amended, agreed to. Sir John A, Macdonald.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that a Special Committee of seven members be appointed to prepare and and report, with all convenient speed, lists of members, to compose the Select Standing Committees, ordered by the House on Thursday, the 9th instant, and that Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir Leonard Tilley, Sir Charles Tupper, Messrs. Langevin, Mackenzie, Blake and Laurier do compose the said Committee.

Motion agreed to.

THE PACIFIC RAILWAY RESOLUTIONS.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved that the House do go into Committee of the Whole, on Tuesday next, to consider the following resolutions:—

1st. That it is expedient to grant and appropriate twenty-five millions of dollars according to the terms of the contract relating to the Canadian Pacific Railway transmitted to this House by His Excellency the Governor General, by his Message dated December 10th.

2nd. That it is expedient to grant and appropriate twenty-five millions of acres of land in the North West Territories according to the terms of the said contract so transmitted as aforesaid.

Mr. BLAKE. I had really hoped that the Government would make a different response to the appeal which was made at the earliest moment it could be made, not to proceed with the discussion of this enormous question until due time had been given for consideration by the House and the country. I think that all the arguments which, in ignorance of the precise details of the contract, were advanced in favor of that view, as to any contract which could raise questions of such practical novelty and magnitude as this, are increased in importance by the contract which has been brought down. I am not about to discuss the contract, but I think it is fair to make the observation that there are in it provisions of various kinds which were certainly not contemplated by members of this House, or by the public. I think it is fair to say that such lights as we have had upon the subject have been misleading lights, and that the public has—I do not mean by the Ministers, but by those who assume to speak with some degree of authority as being the organs of the Ministers - these organs have been not merely not well informed, but absolutely misinformed. The importance and the gravity of this question, as the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) observed at an earlier period of the day, transcends that of any question which could be submitted to Parliament. It is of the very greatest magnitude, and the decision of it will materially affect our interests financially. It will affect the interests of the North-West vitally for twenty years to come, at least, and perhaps for ever. The country has had no opportunity of being aware of the proposals of Ministers. The House had no opportunity of being aware of those proposals until late on Friday night, and it is proposed to commence the discussion of them on Tuesday, with the avowed object of, if possible, proceeding de die in diem, and of bringing the subject to a conclusion before Christmas. The hon leader of the Government stated that there was no intention to force a decision before Christmas, but the intention is to force it with the utmost expedition, and if it may be, before Christmas. Now, I say the discussion ought not to be commenced before Christmas. I say time is required for consideration by members and the country, with a view to the formation of a just and proper opinion outside as well as inside of this House, before we can be called upon to decide. The subject is of such importance, the question is so unusual, so unprecedented, and the results will be so grave, that I think it my duty to mark, in the most signal manner, the opinion that there ought to be an interval for reflection, consideration, and the formation of opinion outside as well as inside of this House before we are called upon to deliberate and decide. With that view, without protracting the discussion at this hour of the afternoon, I move in amendment to leave out the words "the House do resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on Tuesday next" and to substitute the following:-

"In view of the magnitude and gravity of the questions presented, and in order to give time for consideration by the House and country, the House do resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday the fifth day of January next."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The objection to this resolution, in my opinion, is that it is altogether premature. Granting the premises of the hon. gentleman, granting the great gravity of the question, granting the immensity of the interests involved—all these being granted, there is still greater reason that the discussion should go on at once. The contract is before the House and the country. It has reached from one end of the Dominion to the other. The people of British Columbia know every word of the contract and the schedule just as well as we do; and what the whole country wants and is waiting for, and will insist on having, is to obtain as soon as possible the reasons for and against the contract, for and against the measure which the Government has thought proper to bring down. After it has been fully discussed, after the Government has been heard as to their policy, after the objections which may be taken by any hon. member have been fully laid before the House and the country—if then it be the will and voice of Parliament that delay shall be laid granted and an extension of time shall be granted, we are, of course, the servants of Parliament, and must yield; but we desire and claim, as a matter of right, as a Ministry, taking the responsibility of submitting this large measure, to lay, as soon as possible, before the House, the reasons for our action.

After a division had been called,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD rose and said: I omitted to state—I do not know it is necessary, because it is conveyed to us by a Message-but I wish to say that these resolutions have been submitted to His Excellency, and I have received his sanction to submit them to Parliament.

House divided. Amendment negatived. Yeas 51, nays 104.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 14th December, 1880.

COMMITTEES APPOINTED.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD reported lists of Members to compose the Select Standing Committees of the House, from the Special Committee appointed to prepare said lists. Ordered, That the said Report be concurred in.

The following Committees were also appointed:-

Select Committee to assist Mr. Speaker in the direction of the Library of Parliament, so far as the interests of this House are concerned, and to act as members of a Joint Committee of both Houses on the Library.

Ordered, That a Message be sent to the Senate requesting that their Honors will unite with this House in the formation of a Joint Committee of both Houses, on the subject of the Printing of Parliament; and that the members of the Select Standing Committee on Printing will act as members of the said Joint Committee on Printing.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD presented a Message from His Excellency.

Mr. SI'EAKER read the Message as follows:-

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons, in accordance with the Act 34 Victoria, Chapter 6, Section 10, three approved Minutes of Council, relating to the administration of Savings Banks, and to the computation of the rates of Interest allowed on Deposits in such Banks, etc., etc.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE OTTAWA, December 14th, 1880.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT enquired whether it had been usual to bring down a message on the subject of Savings Banks, as he did not remember any such course having been previously adopted.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY said a Message had not been brought down before, the fact that the Savings Bank Act required it having been overlooked by his predecessors in office, and by himself for the past two sessions.

Mr. MACKENZIE asked if the Act required that a Message should be brought down.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY said he thought it did; and the Government thought it desirable that that course should be followed.

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

Mr. SPEAKER presented a statement of the Receipts and Disbursements of the House of Commons.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY laid on the Table the annual Report of the Auditor General.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER-laid on the Table a return showing the expenditure on the Canadian Pacific Railway down to 30th November, 1880; also an estimate of the Chief Engineer of that railway of the amount which will be required to complete all the works that under the proposed arrangement are handed over to the Syndicate.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

On the Orders of the Day being called.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER rose and said: I move, Mr. Speaker, that you do now leave the Chair, and that the House do now resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the resolutions on the Orders for to-day. I think, on the present occasion, it will be more convenient to take the discussion in Committee, where there will be the fullest opportunity for a free interchange of opinions and explanations from time to time as the question may seem to demand.

Mr. BLAKE. Does the hon. gentleman propose, by the House going into Committee, to make a full statement of the question?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. As a rule, I have supposed that it was generally deemed more convenient that there should be a general statement of a question with you, Mr. Speaker, in the Chair, and that we should so reach a conclusion upon the question as to whether we should go into Committee. It does seem to me that this is an occasion, of all others, upon which the usual practice should not be departed from. This is a case of the utmost gravity, and I think the explanations should be made with the Speaker in the Chair.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think the principle is the other way. Great measures like this can only originate by resolution, and it is obvious the resolution must be discussed in the proper place. My hon, friend's motion is this, that the House do now resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole to consider the propriety of these resolutions. As for the practice, it is simply a matter of convenience, and my hon. friend thinks it is more convenient to discuss it in Committee. I think in a measure containing so many details this course is much more convenient, and it must be obvious to the minds of everybody that the discussion should be in Committee, where every question can be discussed in detail, rather than by a series of formal speeches with the Speaker in the Chair, to be renewed over and over again in Committee of the Whole.

Motion agreed to.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Chairman, it affords me very much pleasure to rise for the purpose of submitting a motion to this House in relation to the most important question that has ever engaged the attention of this Parliament—a motion which submits for the approval of this House the means by which the great national work, the Canadian Pacific Railway, shall be completed and operated hereafter, in a way that has more than once obtained the approval of this House, and the sanction of the people of this country, and upon terms more favorable than any that have ever previously been offered to the House. I shall be obliged, Mr. Chairman, to ask the indulgence of the House while at some considerable length I place before it the the grounds upon which I affirm that this resolution embodies the policy of the Parliament of Canada as expressed on more than one occasion, and that these resolutions present terms for the consideration of this Parliament, for the completion of this work, more favorable than any Mr. SPEAKER, asking the indulgence of the House, because I ask it mainly for the purpose of repeating to the House statements made by gentlemen of much greater ability than myself, and occupying positions in this House and country second to no other. But for what took place here yesterday I would have felt warranted in expressing the opinion that the resolutions, grave and important as they are, would receive the unanimous consent of this Parliament.

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear,

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would, I say, have been warranted in arriving at that conclusion - but for the very significant indications that were made from the other side of the House-because these resolutions only ask hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House to affirm a proposition to which they have again and again, as public men, committed themselves. I need not remind the House that when my right hon. friend, the leader of the Government, occupied in 1871 the same position which he now occupies, the policy of constructing a great line of Canadian Pacific Railway that would connect the two great oceans which form the eastern and western boundaries of the Dominion of Canada, received the approval of this House. Not only did the policy of accomplishing that great work receive the endorsation of a large majority in the Parliament of the country, but in specific terms, the means by which that work should be accomplished were embodied in the form of a resolution and submitted for the consideration of Parliament. It was moved by the late lamented Sir George Cartier,

"That the railway referred to in the Address of Her Majesty concerning the agreement made with British Columbia, and adopted by this House, on Saturday, 1st April next, should be constructed and worked by private enterprise, and not by the Dominion Government; and that the public aid to be given to secure the undertaking should consist of such liberal grants of land and such subsidy in money, or other aid, not unduly pressing on the industry and resources of the Dominion, as the Parliament of Canada shall hereafter determine."

That was the resolution first brought down.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That was the first resolution, and it was amended to state more strongly that the work should not involve an increase in the existing rate of taxation. I was under the impression that the resolution I had in my hand was the original motion as carried. The hon. gentleman will agree with me that it embodies the mode upon which the road should be constructed. Now, Sir, although hon gentlemen in this House, although the two great parties represented in this House may entertain differences of opinion as to the construction of the Railway, and the means that may be adequate to its accomplishment, the House was unanimous in that; because the hon. gentlemen then representing the Opposition in this House supported a resolution introduced as an amendment to ours, by the present Chief Justice Dorion, declaring that the road should be constructed in no other way, adding to the resolution the words "and not otherwise," the object of which was to make it impossible for any Government to secure the construction of the road in any other mode than through the agency of a private company aided by a grant of lands and money. And while the resolution moved by Sir George Cartier, declaring that the work should be constructed in that way, received the support of every gentleman on this side of the House, the still stronger affirmation moved by Mr. Dorion, that the work should not be done in any other way, received, I believe, the support of every gentleman on the other side of the House. Therefore, I think, I may say that the policy of Parliament—not the policy of any one party—was distinctly approved in the resolutions placed upon the Journals in 1871. Well, Sir, in 1872 it became necessary to state in distinct terms what aid the Government proposed, under the authority of that resolution, to offer for the construction of the Railway. The Journals of 1872 will previously submitted; and, Sir, I have the less hesitation in | show that Parliament, by a deliberate vote, and by a very large majority, placed at the service of the Government 30,000,000 in money, and 50,000,000 acres of land, for the construction of the main line; and an additional amount of 20,000 acres of land per mile for Pembina Branch of 85 miles, and of 25,000 acres of land per mile for the Nepigon Branch of that line. Sir, I may remind the House that it was expected—as possibly may prove to be the case yet—that the line of the Canada Pacific Railway from Nipissing westward would run to the north of Lake Nepigon, and provision was therefore made for a branch, by a vote of twenty-five thousand acres of land per mile, for 120 miles, to secure connection between Lake Superior and the main line. Now, Sir, these terms became the subject of very considerable discussion in this House and out of it. And the Government having been sustained by a majority, placing at their disposal that amount of money and that amount of land to secure the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the term of Parliament having expired, Parliament was dissolved and the country appealed to, and after that question was placed before it a very sufficient working majority was returned to support the Government and confirm the policy which the House had adopted, both as to the mode in which the work was to be constructed and as to the public money and public lands which the Government were authorized to use for the purpose of securing the construc-tion of this work. Well Sir, under the authority of this House, in 1872, and under the authority of the people of this country, confirming what the House had done, the Government entered into a contract with a number of gentlemen, who subsequently selected Sir Hugh Allan as the President of the Company, for the purpose of constructing the Canadian Pacific Railway on the terms that I have now mentioned to the House, and that gentleman, with some of his associates—and I need not at this period remind the House that that Company embraced a number of the most able, leading and influential men in the country, financially and commercially-proceeded to England, at that time, at all events, the great money market of the world, I might almost say that it was then the only money market in the world, and exhausted every means in their power to obtain the support of financial men in such a way as to enable them to carry that contract to completion. If my recollection does not fail me, the hon. leader of the late Government, on more than one occasion, expressed the hope that it would be successful. He always expressed his it would be successful. He always expressed his strong conviction that the means were altogether inadequate to secure the object in view, but I think that, on more than one occasion, he expressed the patriotic hope that these gentlemen would succeed in obtaining the capital required upon those terms. But, Sir, they did not succeed, as every person knows. After having exhausted every effort in their power, they were obliged to return and surrender the charter under which they received authority to endeavor to obtain money for the construction of this great work. Well, Sir, a very unpleasant result followed. The then Government of this country met with a like defeat; and the means placed at their disposal for the construction of the great work which these gentlemen had in hand having proved inadequate, the Government also succumbed to the pressure from hon, gentlemen opposite. It is not a pleasant topic, and I will not dwell any longer upon it than is absolutely necessary to introduce the Administration which followed us, ably led by the hon. member for Lambton. Now, Sir, I have said, on more than one occasion, that in my judgment, inasmuch as the only authority which Parliament had given for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway required that it should be done by a private company, aided by a grant of land and money, and inasmuch as the resolution embodying that emphatically, still m statement, as the hon leader of the Opposition has correctly manifesto. He said:

reminded me, also embodied the statement that it should not increase the existing rate of taxation, and inasmuch as the Finance Minister of the Government at once announced to Parliament the fact that there was a great impending deficiency between the revenue and expenditure, it therefore became apparent that no progress could be made except in contravention of both these propositions. I have said before, and I repeat now, that in my judgment the hon. leader of the then Government would have been warranted in stating that he was obliged to leave the question of the Canadian Pacific Railway in abeyance. The present hon, leader of the Opposition differed with me on that point, as occasionally we are compelled to differ on matters which are submitted for the consideration of this House, and I am free to confess that, although I do not hold so strongly as the present leader of the Opposition opinions as to the duty which devolved upon the hon. member for Lambton, as leader of the Government in 1874, the opinions he formed, the policy he adopted, and the statements he made in and out of this House, as to his position regarding the construction of the Canada Pacific Railway, were eminently patriotic, greatly to the credit of that hon. gentleman. But, Sir, he did commit himself in the most formal and authentic manner to the construction; notwithstanding the difficulties which had occurred, notwithstanding the apparently insuperable difficulties which presented themselves, the hon. gentleman went to his constituents-I will not say he went to his constituents he appealed to all Canada, he appealed to the people of this country in the most formal manner in which it is possible for a First Minister to state his policy, and that was by a manifesto over his own signature. The House will, perhaps, allow me to draw attention to some very important statements contained in this manifesto. The hon. gentleman

"We must meet the difficulty imposed on Canada by the reckless arrangements of the late Government with reference to the Pacific Railway, under which they pledged the land and resources of this country to the commencement of that gigantic work in July, 1873, and to its completion by July, 1881."

The hon, gentleman will see that the term very reckless arrangements is limited by the hon. gentleman to the short time which we had allowed ourselves for the construction of the work, and not to the work itself. The hon, gentleman further said:

"That contract has already been broken; over a million of dollars has now been spent in surveys, and no particular line has yet been located. The bargain is, as we always said, incapable of literal fulfilment. We must make arrangements with British Columbia for such a relaxation of the terms as will give time for the completion of the surveys, and subsquent prosecution of the work, with such speed as the resources of the country will permit, and without largely increasing the burden of taxation upon the people."

Mr. MACKENZIE. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear. The hon. gentleman went on to say:

"They must, in the meantime, obtain some means of communication across the continent, and it would be their policy to unite enormous stretches of magnificent water communications with lines of railway to the Rocky Mountains, thus avoiding, for the present, the construction of 1,300 miles of railway, costing from sixty to eighty millions of dollars, and rendering the resources of the country available for the prosecution of these links, and they should endeavor to make these great works auxiliary to the promotion of immigration on an extensive scale, and to the settlement and development of those rich and fertile territories on which our hopes for the future of Canada are so largely fixed."

Now, Sir, I am sure that the House will excuse me for placing before them, in the strong and emphatic and eloquent terms of the leader of that Government, the opinion he entertained as to what was incumbent upon the Administration, and what was likely to be attained by pursuing that course. Then, Sir, the hon. gentleman, in a speech at Sarnia, followed up the policy here foreshadowed still more emphatically, still more strongly, than he had done in his

"You are aware that during the discussions on the Bill, I objected to the provisions as to the building of the railway within ten years. Nearly three years of that time had been then exhausted, and he being bound by a contract to finish it within seven years and three months. It was essential for the settlement for the purpose of opening up the districts where we have great riches undeveloped."

L presume that he was referring to the undoubted mineral districts of British Columbia.

"Without that communication, great development cannot take place. It will be the duty of the Administration, in the first place, to secure the opportunity for communication from Lake Superior to the Rocky Mountains, and, at the same time," and this speaks for itself, "and thence to the Pacific Ocean and the Western slope.

"If we wish to make these regions accessible, that is British Columbia and the North-West Territory, we must effect this communication."

I do not think it requires any argument to shew that the hon, gentleman proposed to construct a road in British Columbia and one on this side of the Prairie, and that there would be no difficulty in the construction of the communicating sections. He says:

"It will be necessary to complete our great national highway across the continent, and I think it will be the duty, as it will be the desire, of the Government to develop any plan by which these results can be ac-

Now, Sir, there are other means of obtaining the policy of an Administration besides the expressions of the leading members of that Administration, and one is the authentic declaration of the organ of the Administration. If my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, will not permit me to construe the language of the then leader of the Government, perhaps he will not object if I show here what construction the organ of that Government placed upon the words of their leader. I read, in an editorial in the Toronto Globe newspaper, that it had been asserted:

"That Mr. Mackenzie's Cabinet have abandoned the Canadian Pacific "That Mr. Mackenzie's Cabinet have abandoned the Canadian Pacific Railway. Nothing can be further from the truth. Mr. Mackenzie's speech at Sarnia intimated distinctly what was the course which he proposed to pursue, and subsequent statements have all explained and developed the ideas then suggested. There is no question as to whether the Pacific Railway is to be built or not. That question has been settled irrevocably in the affirmative, and there is no statesman in Canada who would commit himself to any negative on such a point. On this all are agreed. Canyass in the affirmative, and there is no statesman in Canada who would commit himself to any negative on such a point. On this all are agreed. Canvass the Dominion over and two things will be proved as settled points. One is that the railway must be built at as early a period as possible, and that everything that can reasonably help that railroad to a completion must be done and given. These two points are emphatically endorsed by the new Ministers, and entirely removed from the region of controversy."

Now, Sir, I have shown not only that the House affirmed that we should have a Canadian Pacific Railway, not only that the House decided as to the mode in which it desired the Pacific Railway to be constructed, but I have also shown that the Government that succeeded that of my right hon. friend committed themselves in the fullest and most complete manner, not only to the construction of that great work essential to the development of our country, but to its construction as rapidly as it was possible, within the means of the country. The hon gentleman himself, on the floor of the House, stated:

"Let me say, so far as the work is concerned, that I have always been an advocate of the construction of a railway across this continent, but I have never believed it was within our means to carry it out in anything like the period of time to which the hon. gentleman bound Parliament and the country. I think that the work ought to be prosecuted in the most vigorous form; but time is an important element."

I have given the House some of the extra parliamentary utterances of the hon. gentleman, and I propose now to invite its attention to some still more formal and distinct statements of policy in regard to this important question, statements made in the capacity of Prime Minister of the country on the floor of Parliament. In 1874 the hon, gentleman introduced a bill for the purpose of providing for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and, in the course of a very able and a very exhaustive speech, he placed very fully on record the opinions which he held, and which embodied the opinions of the Government at that time. He stated, as will be seen on reference to Hansard of May 12th, 1874:-

SIT CHARLES TUPPER.

"The duty was imposed upon Parliament of providing a great scheme for carrying out the obligations imposed upon us by the solemn action of Parliament in this matter. The original scheme was one that I opposed at the time of its passage here as one that in my mind then seemed impracticable within the time that was proposed, and impracticable also with the means proposed to be used to accomplish it."

I wish to invite the attention of the House to the formal declaration made on the floor of Parliament by the late Prime Minister, that the means that Parliament had placed at the disposal of the Government of their predecessors, $30,000,000 in money and 54,000,000 acres of land, were utterly inadequate to secure the construction of the work. Then the hon, gentleman continues:

"I have not changed that opinion, but being placed here in the Government, I am bound to endeavor, to the utmost of my ability, to devise such means as may seem within our reach to accomplish, in spirit, if not in the letter, the obligations imposed upon us by the treaty of union, for it was a treaty of union with British Columbia."

I am sure that British Columbia will be very glad to be again reminded that the leader of the Opposition maintained that this was an absolute treaty of union with British Columbia. Then he continues:

"We had to undertake to vindicate the good faith of the country and do something which would enable this Parliament to carry out, in spirit, do something which would enable this Parliament to carry out, in spirit, if not in letter, the serious undertaking of building the railway as far as the shores of British Columbia. The legal terms are exact, we are bound within a specific time to construct a road to connect with the railway system of Ontario on the east, with the Pacific coast on the west. There is a moral obligation as well as a legal obligation. We thought, in the first place, that after having had time to consider what should be done, that, the best course to pursue, in the meantime, would be to confer with the Local Government of British Columbia, and endeavor to ascertain from them, if any means could be arranged whereby an extension of time could be procured for the prosecution of the work which we were bound to undertake.

to undertake. "With that view, a gentleman was sent as a representative of this Government, to that Province, and in the course of his negotiations with Government, to that Province, and in the course of his negotiations with the Local Government, it became apparent, as it had been apparent in this House from several members from the Island of Vancouver, that it was an exceedingly important matter in their estimation that the road should be commenced at once at Esquimalt, and traverse the Island to that point where the crossing of the Narrows was ultimately to be. I, for one, was quite willing, if the Local Government were disposed, to make some terms for the extension of time, to undertake the construction of the Island portion as rapidly as possible; but, if it became apparent that the local authorities were determined to adhere rigidly to the Terms of Union, and demand the whole terms and nothing less, this House and the Dominion of Canada, I was and am strongly of opinion, would, on the Dominion of Canada, I was and am strongly of opinion, would, on their part, concede to them the terms and nothing more. Proceeding upon the belief that this was a fair representation of the opinions of the upon the belief that this was a fair representation of the opinions of the country, which had to pay for the construction of this enormous work, we instructed Mr. Edgar, who was appointed to represent the Government in the matter, to say that the Government would be prepared to undertake immediately the commencement of the work upon the Island, traversing it northwards in the direction of the point of crossing, prosecute the surveys on the mainland, construct a passable road along the ridge, erect a telegraph line along the road, and, as soon as the work could be placed under contract, we would expend a million and a half a year within the Province. I do not know whether the offer will be accepted or not, and, in the meantime, it is absolutely necessary that Government should have authority to proceed with the commencement of the works in such a way as they think will meet with the acceptation of the country generally, and the reasonable people in British Columbia." of the country generally, and the reasonable people in British Columbia.

Now, I need not remind the House that this question was made the subject of reference by British Columbia to the Imperial Government, and Lord Carnarvon submitted, for the consideration of this Government, his view of what should be done; that was, that not less than two millions, in addition to the railway on Vancouver Island, the telegraph line, the waggon road, and all those other considerations, should be expended annually by the Government within the Province of British Columbia. When the hon, gentleman submitted his resolutions in 1874, as I am now submitting my resolutions, he said:

"We propose in these resolutions to ask the House to agree to these general propositions. In the first place, we have to ask the House for complete power to proceed with the construction of the road under the terms of the Union with British Columbia, because we cannot throw off that obligation except with the consent of the contracting parties, and we are therefore bound to make all the provision that the House can we are therefore bound to make all the provision that the House can we are therefore bound at the same and the provision tast and as far, as we can, in the letter, the obligation imposed on us by law. The British Columbia section will, of course, have to be proceeded with as fast as we can do it, for it is essential to keep faith with the spirit and, as far as possible, with the letter of the agreement. I attribute a very great deal of importance, indeed, to being able to throw in settlers to all parts of the country, and filling it with population, which is the only thing which can give ultimately commercial value to the road or prosperity to the country. It will be observed, Sir, that in the resolutions, as I have mentioned, the Government provides for the submission of these contracts to Parliament. They provide also, that in case we receive no proposals for the building of what are called the sections in the Bill, that is of the four great divisions, the Government take power to issue proposals to build the road by direct Government agency."

The hon, gentleman said that the Canadian Pacific was only to be built by direct Government agency; in the event of there being no proposals, and of there being a failure in carrying out the policy of Parliament, that it should be done by private enterprise, aided by a grant of money and lands. In 1875, the hon gentleman having had an opportunity of considering the proposals which were embodied in his bill, to which I shall invite the attention of the House more specifically, at a later period, obtained authority from the House to go on with the immediate construction of the Railway by the direct agency of the Government, for he could not obtain it in any other way. Having obtained power from the House to give not only ten thousand dollars of money per mile for every mile between Lake Nipissing and the shores of the Pacific, and twenty thousand acres of land per mile, but also he gave $19,000 in cash per mile for the branch, eighty-five miles long, to Pembina, and 20,000 acres per mile, and $10,000 and 20,000 acres per mile for the Georgian Bay branch, of eighty-five miles long; and also, he gave the further sum of four per cent. interest for twenty-five years upon such sum as might be necessary in order to secure the construction of the work. Now the hon, gentleman, the leader of the late Government, stated frankly to the House at the outset that the terms previously provided in 1872, and embodied in the contract made with the Allan Company in 1873, were utterly inadequate, and that it was necessary to the good faith of the country, and that its honor and interests demanded that the Railway should be proceeded with. He asked and obtained from Parliament a large addition to the means that had been previously passed by Parliament for the construction of the work. In 1875, after having had a year's experience, he came to the House and said:

"We only let the grading upon this line (Pembina Branch) because we thought it advisable, while proceeding thus far, not to proceed any further until we could get a general contract let for the entire line where we propose to build it now, which would cover all the more expensive parts of construction. For the same reason, we are only letting the grading and bridging from Fort William and Shebandowan, and the same from Rat Portage to Red River."

Again, it will be seen that the hon gentleman puts forward as his policy, and the policy of the Parliament of 1874, as it had been the policy of the Parliament of 1871 and 1872, that the work should be prosecuted by the agency of a private company, aided by a grant of money and land. As I have already stated, the subject was made a matter of reference, in 1875, to Lord Carnarvon, and he proposed that $2,000,000, and not $1,500,000, should be the minimum expenditure on railway works within the province, from the date at which the surveys are sufficiently completed to enable that amount to be expended on construction. In naming this amount, His Lordship understood, in the language of the memorandum:

"That it being alike the interest and the wish of the Dominion Government to urge on, with all speed, the completion of the works now to be undertaken, the annual expenditure will be as much inexcess of the minimum of $2,000,000 as, in any year, may be found practicable. Lastly, that on or before the 31st of December, 1890, the railway shall be completed and opened for traffic from the Pacific seaboard to a point at the western end of Lake Superior, at which it will fall into connection with existing lines of railway, then by a portion of the United States, and also with the mavigation on Canadian waters."

These terms included, it is true, a considerable extension of the time within which the road was originally to have been completed, but they fixed a definite and distinct limit within which a large portion of the Pacific Railway should be constructed and put in operation. The hon, gentleman himself, in referring to these terms, used this language:

"We shall always endeavour to proceed with the work as fast as the circumstances of the country—circumstances yet to be developed—will enable us to do, so as to obtain, as soon as possible, complete railway communication with the Pacific Province. How soon that time may come I cannot predict, but I have no reason to doubt that we shall be able to keep our obligation to British Columbia, as now amended, without seriously interfering with the march of prosperity."

That is, that by 1890 the hon. gentleman hoped to complete it, "without seriously interfering with the march of prosperity." I am glad, notwithstanding the difficulties which the hon. gentleman encountered, to be able to submit to his consideration the means by which we are to do that to which he pledged himself, and pledged the honor and faith of his Government and his party, so far as the leader of a great party can pledge that party to the accomplishment of a great national undertaking. But, Sir, I am glad to be able to give, not only the authority of the leader of the late Government, but that of the hon. and learned gentleman who is leader of Her Majesty's Constitutional Opposition at the present moment. That hon, gentleman is reported in Hansard of March 5th, 1875, to have used these words:

"The general policy of the country upon the subject of the Pacific Railway was spread before this country anterior to the late general election, and practically and fairly stated."

I have read to the House the words which the Premier of that day, as the hon, gentleman said, "practically and fairly" stated his policy, and I quite agree that it was so stated. The hon, member for South Durham continued:

"In some of the minor details of that policy the hon. member for Cumberland has indicated more or less of change, but the broad features of that policy were, as I have said, plainly stated to this country anterior to the late general elections; the verdict of the country was taken upon it and the result was a decided acceptance of it. It is not reversible by us. We have no mandate to reverse it. Upon the most enlarged consideration of the rights of members of Parliament, I cannot conceive that we could have the right at all to listen to the appeal of the hon. member for Cumberland, and to enter into a consideration whether that policy upon which the country's opinion was asked and taken, and which opinion we were sent here to enforce, should be altogether reversed. I do consider it would be unwise for an instant to consider any such proposition. I do not believe that any other policy in its general effects than that which was so proposed and so accepted is at all feasible."

Now, Sir, I ventured to say, at the outset of my remarks, that we had the means of showing to the House, not only that Parliament, on both these great occasions, had distinctly declared the policy of constructing the Canadian Pacific Railway, but that the people, as stated by the present leader of the Opposition, had given an affirmative to that proposition, and had, as that hon gentleman averred, put it without the power of this Parliament to change that policy. I must remind the House that the circumstances of the country were very different in 1875 from the circumstances of the country at the time at which the previous Government undertook the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway; but notwithstanding that changed condition of circumstances, notwithstanding that the hon. gentleman's Finance Minister was compelled to come to Parliament year after year and ask permission to increase largely the taxation of the country in order to meet the ordinary expenditure; notwithstanding all this, the hon. gentleman held that the honor and good faith of the country were pledged to the construction of this great work, and he came to this House and asked the authority of Parliament for the prosecution of his scheme. In 1876, after longer experience, after having found that the financial difficulties of the country had certainly not decreased, the hon. gentleman was still undismayed, for, in 1876, from the high and authoritative position of a Prime Minister submitting the policy of his Government to the country, after full and deliberate consideration, he enunciated the following views:

"We have felt, from the first, that while it was utterly impossible to implement to the letter the very agreements entered into by our predecessors, the good faith of the country demanded that the Administration should do everything that was reasonable in their power to carry out the pledges made to British Columbia, if not the entire boligation, at least such parts of it as seemed to be within their power, and most conducive to the welfare of the whole Dominion, as well as to satisfy all reasonable men in the Province of British Columbia, which Province had fancied itself entitled to complain of apparent want of good faith in carrying out these obligations. In endeavouring to accomplish this result we have had serious difficulties to contend with, to which I shall presently allude. * * * The Act of 1874 prescribes that the Government may build the road on contract in the ordinary way, or it may be built on the terms set forth in Section 8, which provides that the Government may pay $10,000 in money and grant 20,000 acres of land per mile, with four per cent. for 25 years upon any additional amount in the tenders, to a company to construct portions of the line. The intention of the Government was, as soon as the surveys were in a sufficiently advanced state, to invite tenders for the construction of such portions of the work as, in the judgment of Parliament, might be considered desirable to go on with, and that in the meantime the money that has been spent in grading should be held to be a part of the $10,000 a mile referred to in Section 8. Whether the Government would be in a position during the coming season to have contracts obtained, and submitted to Parliament, for the whole line, at its next session, is perhaps problematical."

So that the hon, gentleman, in 1876, not only contemplated going on steadily with the prosecution of the work, or very important sections of the work, but he had it in contemplation to invite tenders for the construction of the whole Canadian Pacific Railway, on terms which as I shall show more specifically hereafter, were largely in excess of any authority we ever obtained from Parliament, and terms that, as I have said before, he himself held, and I suppose conscientiously held, to be utterly inadequate.

"If we are able to commence the work of construction this coming year in British Columbia, these rails would be required. It may be said to be impossible to commence the construction of the road in British Columbia without having rails on the spot."

And in that I concur with the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The concurrence comes very late.

Sir CHARLESTUPPER. The hon. gentleman will not, I think, find any ground for making that statement. I think he will, perhaps, allow me to interject that they would have been equally useful if they had not lain quite so long in British Columbia. The hon. gentleman further said:

"There are five thousand tons in British Columbia, and if we erred in sending them there, we have simply erred in our earnest desire to show the people of British Columbia that we are desirous of keeping faith with them, that our speeches were not mere empty promises, and that we were resolved to place ourselves in a position they could not misunderstand."

Well, Sir, in 1877, after another year's experience, the hon. gentleman again stated the policy, that still was the policy of his Administration, in reference to this work. He said:

The late Administration, in entering into the agreement for bringing British Columbia into the Confederation, had an express obligation as to the building of the railway across the continent from Lake Nipissing on the east to the Pacific Ocean on the west, within a specified number of years. When the present Administration acceded to power, they felt that this, like all treaty obligations, was one which imposed upon them certain duties of administration and government which they had no right to neglect, and that they were bound to carry the scheme practically into effect to the extent that I have indicated. The whole effort of the Administration, from that day to this, has been directed to the accomplishment of this object in the way that would seem to be most practical and most available, considering the difficulties to be encountered and the cost to be incurred.

The Railway Act of 1874 provides that 20,000 acres of land should be given absolutely as part consideration for the contract, and $10,000 per mile of actual cash—the land to be subject to certain regulations as to two thirds of it which are provided for in the Act—and that tenderers should be invited to state the additional sum, if any, upon which a guarantee of 4 per cent. should be given by the Dominion for 25 years afterwards.

I mentioned last year, in introducing this item to the Committee of Supply, that we had then advertised, or proposed to advertise—I forget which—in English and Canadian papers, that we hoped, about January, 1877, to be able to advertise for tenders and to supply complete profiles of the line.

I think, quite early in July, or earlier. I think it must have been in June. At all events, we desired to send that advertisement to the public in order that it might invite interding contractors to visit the country for themselves. I was personally satisfied that an examination of the prairie countries, if not the country east of the prairies to Lake Superior, would show to intending contractors, in the first place, that there was a companies have visited Ottawa; some have visited the agency of the Government in London, with a view to examine the plans and profiles, and the Railway Act under which the contracts will be let; but the season was an unfavorable one in consequence of the difficulties attending railway enterprise all through the world, and can perhaps, be fairly considered as one not very fortunate for issuing or proposing the prospectus of a huge enterprise like this, in a comparatively unknown country, or, I might say, a wholly unknown country. The Government were not able, as I stated, to have the profiles all ready in Jannary. They were, however, despatched in sections as soon as they could be completed, to the Railway Office in London. They have been on exhibition in the Railway Office here for many months, and the whole of the profiles from Lake Superior to the Western Ocean is, I presume, either completed or very near it, at the present moment; that is, taking the two routes already completed through British Columbia. The Government proposed, as soon as these are entirely completed, to have advertisements issued calling for offers, giving ample time, so that tenders that are received may be received shortly before the opening of Parliament at its next session, in order that Parliament may have an opportunity of deciding upon whatever scheme may be then proposed by the Government under the offers to be received."

So that, down to 1878, the House will see, the hon. gentleman still remained true to the obligation of the rapid construction of the Canada Pacific Railway, and of its construction by the agency of a private company, and by a grant of land and money. In 1878, the last occasion on which the hon. gentleman, with the authority of Prime Minister, discussed the question, he said:

"There can be no question of this, that it was in itself a desirable object to obtain railway communication from one end of our Dominion to the other, traversing the continent from east to west. So far as the desirability of obtaining such a communication may be concerned, there can be no real difference of opinion between any two parties in this country, or amongst any class of our population."

I am very glad on this important occasion, in submitting resolutions of such magnitude for the consideration of this House, to have the authority of the leader of the late Government, after years of close and careful examination of this question, given to the House and the country, that it was a matter, not only of vital importance to the country, but upon which both parties were agreed, not only in this House, but in the population outside of it. In 1878, the hon. gentleman also said:

"I have to say, in conclusion, that nothing has given myself and the Government more concern than the matters connected with the Pacific Railway have given. We are alive to this consideration, that it is of vast importance to the country that this road should be built as soon as the country is able to do it without imposing burdens upon the present rate-payers which would intolerable."

I quite agree with the hon. gentleman in that statement, and I am proud to be able to stand here to-day and offer for the hon. gentleman's consideration, and, I trust, after full consideration, his support, a proposition that will secure the construction of that which he has declared to be not only a matter of honor to which the country was bound. but a matter of the deepest necessity to the development of this country, upon terms that will not impose any intolerable burdens on the ratepayers.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I shall consider it by-and-by.

"On the other hand, it is tolerably evident that the wealth of the country will be much more rapidly increased if we are able to throw a large population into those hitherto deserted plains, which contain so much land fit for habitation, and which have been wholly unproductive in the commercial interests of our country."

Again I invite the hon. gentleman's attention to the obligation that rests upon him to support a plan by which what he designates "deserted plains" may become the abode of an industrions population, not only furnishing a comfortable living to themselves and their families, but increasing greatly the flational wealth of Canada, and upon terms which come quite within those which he has approved as offering no obstacle to the progress of this work. And then the hon-gentleman added:

"And so with regard to this western and more gigantic work, a work which cannot be estimated unless we have given some thought to be such is its magnitude—a road which is four times the length of the Grand Trunk, from Montreal to Sarnia, which is five times the length of the road from Edinburgh to London, which traverses our whole territory. Nething can possibly exceed the importance that is to be attached to the building of such a gigantic work, either as regards the ultimate prosperity of the country, or its bearing upon our several relations to each other in the united provinces."

It requires no comment of mine, Sir, to cause a statement from such an authentic source to carry conviction to the mind of every hon, gentleman present as to the obligation that rests upon all parties, both in the House and out of it, to realize what the hon, gentleman has indicated could be realized by the construction of this work. That, Sir, as I have said before, was,—the hon. gentleman thinks, no doubt, unfortunately for the country,—the last occasion on which it became his duty to speak with the authority of the First Minister of Canada in relation to this great question. But as the hon, gentleman stated, the question of construction, the question of the steady prosecution and completion of the Canada Pacific Railway, was not an issue that went to the country at the last election. had been submitted on two occasions by two First Ministers, representing both the great parties of the country, and on both occasions had received the affirmation of a very large majority of the people; but as is well known, a change of Administration took place in 1878, and the hon. gentleman was called again upon to deal with the question. He had that test of patriotism applied to him, which is involved in considering a policy from the Opposition benches as well as from the Government benches, and I will read to the House the remarks which the hon, gentleman, as leader of the Opposition, made to this House after the change of Government in 1879. He said:

"We recognize the obligations resting upon us as Canadians, and, while I assert, in the most positive manner, that nothing could have been done by any Administration during our term of office that we did not do, or try to do, in order to accomplish, or realise those expectations which were generated by the Government of hon. gentlemen opposite, in their admission of British Columbia into the Confederacy, I say, at the same time, that we endeavoured, not merely to keep the national obligations, but we ventured, to a great extent, our own political existence as administrators; we risked our political position for the sake of carrying out to completion, in the best way possible, the course which hon. gentleman opposite had promised should be taken."

The hon, gentleman also declared after his five years' term of office had ended, that nothing that had been in the power of the Ministry, of which he was the head, to do, had been left undone to carry to successful completion the policy to which his predecessors had committed the House and the country. He said:

"Our proposal was this: We endeavoured, in the first place, to obtain some modification of the terms. We despatched an agent to British Columbia, and Lord Carnarvon ultimately offered his good services, in order to arrive at some understanding with that Province; and we reached the understanding that we would endeavour to build a railway from Lake Superior to the Pacific Ocean by 1890; that we should expend a certain amount per annum in British Columbia, after the surveys were completed and line adopted. The line never was surveyed sufficiently to enable us to reach that conclusion till last year, and, as soon as we had information sufficient to guide us, we adopted the Burrard Inlet route, and immediately advertised for tenders for the construction of that line. The hon. the Minister of Public Works has spoken of our departure from the former terms of the construction of this road. Now, what was this departure? We had precisely the same provision of land, and equivalent as to money; only, instead of $30,000,000, we named $10,000 a mile, which would have amounted to $26,000,000, and two-thirds of the land was to be controlled by the Government in respect of sales and management. We also then provided that, in asking for tenders, we should invite tenderers to say upon what additional amount they would require a guarantee of four per cent for 25 years."

The hon, gentleman also proceeded to say:

"While we let out contracts between Thunder Bay and Selkirk, with a view to get a road opened into that country, it was with the determination to adopt this method, and I explained this several times during my administration. We intended, when we had obtained a full completion of the surveys, and finally adopted the route to the ocean, through British Columbia, to endeavour to place the entire work from Lake Superior westward under contract—the contractors assuming the expenditure already incurred, and allowing themselves to be charged with it as part of the $10,000 a mile to be paid to them on the contracts for the entire line. The hon. gentlemen opposite, and the whole country, are aware that we solicited tenders in England for some months upon this ground, before hon. gentlemen opposite came into office; also that Mr. Sandford Fleming, the Chief Engimeer, was instructed, while in London, to place himself in communication with contractors and financial men, and also to obtain the assistance of Sir John Rose, who, in many things, had been the active, energetic and patriotic agent of the Dominion, with a view to the carrying out of this scheme."

I may mention incidentally, that, while I entirely approve of all these efforts, the hon, gentleman was, I think, never called upon to lay upon the Table of the House any correspondence that took place between his Government and these capitalists and contractors, and which did not result in their obtaining a contract.

Mr. BLAKE: Did he ever refuse?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER: He never was asked anything so utterly at variance with the first principles of Government, as to bring down correspondence that could be attended with no possible benefit to the Government, but be extremely embarrassing to the Government in its future operations.

Mr. BLAKE. That is the true reason.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not hesitate to say that a more unfortunate precedent, in my judgment, could not be set than for a Government to enter into negotiations with capitalists to ascertain how far they would be prepared to take up a great work and carry it to completion, and then bring down the correspondence which could only reflect on the character and standing of the gentlemen interested, and render gentlemen in future, in similar cases, cautious how far they would discuss negotiations with a Government which would later give publicity to those negotiations. The hon. gentleman further said:

"But I am informed that, notwithstanding all our efforts, we signally failed in obtaining one single offer (there was one imperfect offer made) for the construction of the railroad on those terms, which were the grant of 20,000 acres and $10,000 cash, per mile, with a guarantee of 4 per cent. upon such balance as might be represented as necessary. No terms could be more explicit; it would be difficult to mention terms more favorable, and yet the hon, gentleman seems to expect, by his speech, that the colonization scheme, with the 100,000,000 acres instead of the 50,000,000 acres and $30,000,000 current money, is somehow or other to succeed in getting this road built. His own remarks showed to-day that it is utterly useless at present for him to expect British railway contractors, or great financial firms to engage in any railroad enterprise on this continent. Much of this is due to the want of confidence which he tells us is experienced in financial circles in Britain, and a great deal is due to the unwise legislation in Canada and the Provinces, with respect to railway lines, and to the fact that foreign capitalists have obtained little or no return for the money they have laid out in this country. I have made up my mind long ago that it will be exceedingly difficult for a population of 4,000,000 so to conduct financial transactions connected with the building of that railroad of 2,600 miles, across an unknown and almost untrodden continent, in many places extremely difficult. I frankly say now, after my experience in endeavoring to acromplish something in that direction, that I fear we shall be incapable of accomplishing anything in that direction at present.

I need not say to the House that, in what he said and anticipated, the hon. gentleman, I suppose, was sincere. I suppose when he made this utterance it was made in all frank. ness. The House will readily understand the gratification I expected to see spread over the hon gentleman's countenance on learning that all that he lamented he had been unable to accomplish in the official position he occupied in this House, his successors were in a position to present for the consideration of Parliament. I frankly concede, and in doing so I only do justice to the sincere, able and energetic efforts of the hon. gentleman, that he did all that lay in his power during his term of administration to put this great work upon the foundation on which Parliament, on two separate occasions, and the people had affirmed it should be placed, namely, that the work should be done by a private company aided by grants of land and money. But, Sir, the hon gentleman stated, on another occasion, that:

"It would have been very easy to commence to grade the road, and so keep within the terms of the Union Act; but I scorned to practice any deception in the matter."

I assume, throughout, that the hon gentleman was acting with entire sincerity, that in all those statements made to the House as to his great desire to advance this great national work, he was giving candid utterance to his sincere opinion - to the opinion that, whether sitting on one side of the House or the other, he would be prepared to give an equally zealous and hearty support to this policy. But in 1878 there was a general election, the result being that my right hon. friend beside me was again charged with the important duty of administering the public affairs of this countryand again brought face to face with this great national work, this gigantic undertaking, that for five years, had, notwithstanding the efforts of our predecessors, made no very great progress. We found ourselves, then, in this position, of bing called upon to deal with the question of the great Canadian Pacific Railway, upon which a large amount of public money had been expended, and in a way that would prove utterly useless to the country unless measures were taken, promptly to carry, at all events, the work under construction to completion, and so supplement it as to make it effective for the promotion of the objects for which it was designed. We, therefore, were not in a position to effect any change of policy as hon, gentlemen opposite will see. But we came to Parliament to reaffirm the policy with which we had started at the inception of that great work, the Canadian Pacific Railway, involving the policy of utilizing the lands of the great North-West for the purpose of obtaining the construction of that vast work. There was every reason in the world why we should adopt that policy in the first instance, and return to it afterwards. Every person knows that the development of this great territory was concerned in this policy; that day by day it was becoming better known and better understood by people whose interest would be promoted by the carrying out of the designs involved in this gigantic undertaking; that, irrespective altogether of the vital political question of the connecting British Columbia with the rest of the Dominion, the progress and prosperity of Canada were to be promoted to an extent otherwise unattainable by the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. We also felt that inasmuch as those lands were, as the leader of the late Government truly stated, desert lands, notwithstanding their fertility and enormous extent, and practically as useless as if in a foreign country, so far as Canada was concerned, unless they were developed, and, as it was stated their development could only be accomplished by completing this great national work, we should come back to the House with our original policy. We were compelled to take it up as we found it, and go on with it as a Government work to make the work, upon which so much had already been expended, of use to the country. But we asked the House to place at our disposal 100,000,000 of acres for the purpose of covering the expenditure in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway. We felt that, by that means, we should again place ourselves in a position to save the older and outlying Provinces, ultimately, from additional taxation. We de sired, by utilizing the lands of the North-west, to obtain the means of recouping to the Treasury every dollar expended, or likely to be expended, on this work. Hon. gentlemen also know that, in the development of that policy, we proposed to obtain the co-operation of the Imperial Government. The hon. leader of the Opposition occasionally indulges in a quiet sneer at the result of the efforts of this Government to interest the Imperial Government in this enterprise. Now, it is very well known that, armed by this House with the power of utilising 100,000,000 acres in the North-West, if we could so secure the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, my right hon. friend the First Minister, the Minister of Finance and myself went to England in 1879. I do not intend to lay claim to any great results from our mission as regards the Railway, but I think I may claim credit for a fair measure of success that attended our efforts, if not our joint efforts, in regard to the business of our respective Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

if not hostile, to Canada; where it was not hostile it was indifferent, in contradistinction to its spirit in dealing with Australia and the other colonies. Indeed, in many cases, Canada was treated with marked hostility. Very suddenly, however, a very striking, a very marked change, took place. When? When Earl Beaconsfield, the Prime Minister of that day, stated openly, or in public, the enormous value of the great North-West of Canada. I do not mean to say he was entirely accurate in all his statements; but, at all events he was quite correct in the remark that the the most lively imagination could hardly over-estimate the enormous value of the great North-West and the inviting character of the field it presented to the agriculturists in every part of the world desiring to emigrate. From that day to this every person knows the marked and instantaneous nature of the change that took of the change that took place in English public opinion, place in English public opinion, especially in the views of every important paper in the British Islands, and in many in this country as well as in the United States. and also in the amount of attention and interest concentrated on the North-West. The people of this country owe to my right hon. friend this great beneficial change brought about through his personal communication with the Prime Minister of England, and the use made of it in dealing with the people of Great Britain. Hon, gentlemen know we were then obliged to confess we were not able to bring to completion any great scheme for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I ventured to say we thought we had made some impression on the Imperial Government while in England. I think that my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, who has sneered at our statement that we had obtained the sympathy and enlisted the interest of the Imperial Government in relation to the Canadian Pacific Railway, will find a strong corroboration of our assertion in intelligence received to-day with regard to the action of that Government. It can now be believed that our efforts with the Imperial Government will, at no distant day, bear good fruit. The Colonial Office have done what they never did before—published, authoritatively, a document recommending Canada as a field for emigration. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blake) has seen the news to-day or not; but I am quite sure that, as a patriotic Canadian, he will be glad to learn that the London Times announces the Imperial Government has promised to bring down a scheme of emigration, assisted by the Canadian Government. So the hon, gentleman may feel he is not quite in a position to repeat, what I am rather afraid was to him a gratifying intimation, that the present Canadian Government had entirely failed in their negotiations.

Mr. BLAKE. Allow me to remind my hon. friend that the present Imperial Government is Mr. Gladstone's, and the Government with which he and his colleagues had interviews was the Beaconsfield Government.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My hon, friend will permit me to point out to him that he is strengthening my argument. He will permit me to inform him that from this very place last Session, I stated that, instead of this Government feeling anxious in consequence of the change of Government in England, we were advised, and were of the belief, that the sentiments of the members of the new Ministry were of the most liberal character in relation to Canada. My hon. friend will also permit me to inform him that since the advent of the Liberal Government to power, the right hon. the Premier, my hon, friend the Minister of Agriculture, and myself have been in personal communication with a number of members of the present Administration, and have impressed upon their minds the importance to the empire of the Government of Great Britain giving due attention to the resources of the great Canadian North-West as a field for emigration, and as a means of meeting the difficulties of a Departments. We found the press of England indifferent, semious character which have presented themselves in relation to the government of the British Isles. So that I do not think my hon, friend has made a great deal by his suggestion that there has been a change in the Administration. He only strengthens the opinion I have expressed that Canada occupies to day a position this country has never occupied before. I frankly confess we did not find, when we went there in 1879, that the time was ripe for successfully floating the scheme in connection with the hundred million acres of land put at our disposal with a view to securing the construction of the Pacific Railway. But, Sir, we sowed the seed, and we kept our eyes steadily directed to such means those to which I have already adverted—and others by which the position of Canada might be greatly changed in relation to this great work. My hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture, by a stroke of genius; and, perhaps, the most happy stroke of genius ever shown by any Canadian Minister was that which he exhibited when he adopted the policy of showing the confidence the Government of Canada had in their own country, by stating at a time when the agriculturists of Great Britain were very much alive to the unfortunate position they occupied, that parties with means desirous of emigrating to this country, and of cultivating the soil of the great North-West, might select able and independent delegates to come here and examine this country, and that the Government of Canada—so confident was the Government of the favorable character their report would assume -would pay their expenses. It would be utterly impossible to estimate, from an economical and financial point of view, the advantage which has accrued to Canada by that single act. The whole sentiment of Great Britain in relation to the country has undergone a complete change; and, when we went back to England at the conclusion of the last session of Parliament, we found that Canada occupied, in the Mother Country, an entirely different position from that which it occupied a year before.

Mr. MACKENZIE. On Hanlan's account.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hanlan is an agency that I do not at all despise.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He rows in the same boat with us.

Mr. BLAKE. You go by rail.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My_right hon, friend says he rows in the same boat with us. I may say I am satisfied of this, that the interest he excites in the sporting world gives Canada greater importance in England. I stated a moment ago that in 1879, Parliament placed at our disposal 1,000,000 acres of land, and I have already intimated that we were not able with that grant to arrange for any complete scheme for the rapid construction of the railway. In 1880 we again met the House, and we met it with the same policy we adopted the year before, and that was, in good faith to take up the obligations that devolved upon us through the acts of our predecessors. Although we had not propounded the policy of carrying on the work by the Government, we took up the work as we found it. We placed under contract the 127 miles of road which the leader of the late Government had announced-by advertising for tenders-as his intention to build; which he had assured the people of British Columbia we intended to build, and which, under the terms with Lord Carnavon, he was bound to place under contract. When we met Parliament with the statement that we were going on with this work, I think we scarcely met with the amount of aid and co-operation from the gentlemen opposite to which we were entitled. I do not wish to say anything that would seem harsh to any gentleman on the other side of the House, but I really do not think the attitude which the Opposition assumed towards this Government, when we were only carrying out the pledges the prosecution of the eastern link with the Canadian which they themselves had given over their signatures as Pacific Railway, is able now to cheer himself, not

Ministers, by their votes in Parliament, and by their declarations of policy in this House, in the country, and to the Imperial Government, was justifiable. As we were only carrying out what they proposed, we had a right to expect to be met in a manner different to that in which we were met by them; but the attitude hon, gentlemen assumed only afforded an opportunity of showing that whatever change of sentiment may have taken place in the mind of the leader of the Opposition, no such change had taken place in the mind of Parliament in relation to the subject. The leader of the Opposition moved—and in making this motion he submitted a resolution directly in antagonism to the policy of the Government which he supported and to his own recorded utterances on the floor of this House—that we should break faith with British Columbia and with Lord Carnarvon, and that we should give, I was going to say the lie, to Lord Dufferin, who stated on his honor as a man that every particle of the terms of agreement with British Columbia were in a state of literal fulfilment. The result of the moving of this resolution was to place on the records of Parliament a vote of 131 to 49 that good faith should be kept, and that we were bound not only to keep good faith with British Columbia, but that we owed it to Canada to take up this work and prosecute it in such a way as we believed was absolutely necessary in order to bring it within such limits as would enable us to revert to the original policy of building the road by means of a company aided by land and money. And, had we not placed that section under contract in British Columbia, had we not vigorously prosecuted the 185 miles wanted to complete the line between Lake Superior and Red River, we would not have been able to stand here to-day laying before the House the best proposal for the construction of the road that has ever been made to this Parliament. Well, Sir, I will give, in conclusion, the utterances of the hon. the leader of the late Government at the last session of Parliament. He

"I shall not for a moment deny that we intended to carry out the terms of the arrangement with Lord Carnarvon, and nothing but the want of means would have prevented us from accomplishing that object, an object which could not but be desirable to any one who wished to see our trade extended.'

Not merely that the obligation under the Carnarvon terms, but that the interests of the country rendered it desirable that the policy should be carried out.

"No one who looked to the desirable extension of our business across the continent could avoid seeing that if such an extension could possibly be obtained without too great sacrifice it would in itself be desirable."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Who said that?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The leader of the late Government at the last session of Parliament. The hon. gentleman further said:

"Our policy was this: We believed that the Pacific Railway was undertaken as a great national highway from one end of the Dominion to the other, and that whatever termination we make of it, near Lake Nipising, it must be placed in connection with some other lines, and we provided for paying a subsidy to some connecting lines east of Georgian Bay. Our object was to have, as speedily as possible, a railway from the waters of the Georgian Bay, to have a connection with the Quebec lines, through the Canada Central, as a connecting medium."

"Our plan would form a through line to the Ottawa Valley, notably and notoriously the shortest line to the east from our western territories. Hon. gentlemen opposite have given up all the advantages that the Province of Quebec and the Provinces east of that would have derived from our plan, and the President of the Council is not apparently at all disposed to avoid cheering himself because he adopted this course; he deliberately injured his own Province, and now laughs at the injury he has done."

The hon, gentleman will be very glad to find that the President of the Council, who, on this side as well as on that side of the House, invariably pressed in the strongest terms the prosecution of the eastern link with the Canadian upon the attainment of the line to the Georgian Bay, but on the immediate steady prosecution of a line connecting the great Province of Quebec and all the Eastern Provinces by the shortest and most available route with the fertile territories of the North-West. The hon leader of the Opposition has indulged, as is his wont, in a good many sneers on this subject. He taunted our Quebec friends on this side of the House with having been left out in the cold, and with having been sacrificed. I trust, Sir, that now that these gentlemen are in a position to receive these taunts with a good deal of equanimity, they will find that hon gentleman ready to consider what the interests of this great eastern section of the country are, as he was when he supposed that they had not obtained the justice which he thought they were entitled to receive at our hands. The hon. leader of the late Government said:

"I was under the impression I had done for Quebec everything that was reasonable and proper, and I am quite willing to contrast it with what the hon gentlemen opposite have done up to this moment. But I am not to be led off my line of argument by any such side issue. I am speaking, at present, of the bearing of the Pacific Railway scheme upon the interests of Quebec. I am speaking of the plan we adopted to carry trade by the Ottawa Vailey to the great cities on the St. Lawrence, and I have asserted, what no one will deny, that that plan was one which promised well for the prosperity of these cities."

As I have stated to the House, the modifications of the plan of the hon. leader of the late Government greatly extended the consideration to be given to contractors, and as he says, in his own terms, they were all in favor of parties tendering. The hon. gentleman also said:

"I confess that, after the hon. gentlemen opposite had committed themselves to the building of this road, the late Government were bound, as the successors of those hon. gentlemen, to give effect to their plan, if possible, and we tried our best to do so. Our modifications of their plan were all in favor of postices tondours and thousand the standard of the standa were all in favor of parties tendering, and, therefore, should have produced tenders, though theirs failed. The plan of the late Government provided for the payment of $10,000 in cash per mile, extending over the entire 2,600 miles."

It provided more. It provided $10,000 in cash per mile, not only extending over 2,627 miles of road, but also over the Georgian Bay branch and over the Pembina branch as well. The hon gentleman further said:

"This would make the total $26,000,000, to which add $3,000,000 for surveys, according to the hon. gentleman's statement, would make $29,000,000, leaving $1,000,000 still to be devoted to the eastern end to pay the greater portion of the subsidy to the Canada Central Railway. If the late Government could have obtained offers."

"Which would have enabled them to construct the road for $26,000,000,

I think it would have been their duty to have accepted them. They did not have any offers made them, and the hon gentleman knew that he could not get any or he would have asked for them."

I invite the hon. gentleman's attention to this statement, because it clothes us, as far as he could, with his approval in dealing in relation to this very matter. Now, Sir, we have accepted an offer, a better offer than that contained in the hon gentleman's proposal, as I will show the House in the most distinct and conclusive manner, I and I claim from the hon. gentleman that support to which I consider he was pledged to this scheme. I did not suppose that when the hon. gentleman, in his place as leader of the Opposition, stated that if Government would do a certain thing he would support them, that when they did that he would withdraw that support, or hesitate to implement the pledge which he gave across the floor of the House. I read that statement of the hon. gentleman who said he would scorn to use any deception. I believed it, and accepted it, and hold him to it, bound as he is by this declaration. When I have shown the House, as I will show, that our terms, the terms which we have laid on the Table of the House, to be much within the terms he pledged himself to support us in, I will claim from the hon. gentleman the fulfilment of his pledge. The hon, gentleman said the Government did not have any offers made them. Well, Sir, why did provisions of the Canadian Pacific Railway Act, 1874, which he not get any offers? He did not get any offers enacts that the contractors for its construction and working because the position of this country was such for five shall receive lands or the proceeds of lands," Mark the Sir Charles Tupper, years as to make it impossible for hon. gentlemen to obtain any offers in that direction. But, Sir, when under the influences to which I have adverted, the whole tone of the press of England changed; when a large body of people, the best class of immigrants that can come to this country became alive with excitement with reference to the Canadian North-West; when Sir, a movement, such as never previously took place, was occupying the attention of capitalists as well as immigrants in England with relation to the North-West, and when, under the fiscal policy propounded to this House by my hon, friend, the Minister of Finance, the whole financial position of this country was changed; when commercial prosperity had again, under the influence of that change in the fiscal policy, dawned upon Canada,—I say, Sir, when the Government of Canada were able to present themselves to the capitalists of the world, either in this country or the United States or in England, and show, not that year after year they had to meet Parliament with an alarming deficit, and were unable to provide for it, and were adding from year to year to the accumulating indebtedness of the country, not for the prosecution of public works that were going to give an impetus to our industries, but merely to enable the ordinary expenditure of the country to be met by revenue, when that all this was changed, the aspect of affairs in relation to this work changed. When, under the previous When, under the previous condition of things, my hon. friend opposite could not obtain offers in response to the advertisement which he published all over the world, asking financial men to take up this scheme in consideration of $10,000 in cash per mile, and 20,000 acres of land per mile, and asked in vain, not being able to get a single offer; when this advertisement was published, notwithstanding all his efforts in England and in this country in relation to it, and he obtained no response whatever, why, Sir, the hon. gentleman might fairly assume that we could not obtain any offers, either. But as I say, when under a changed policy and when the Government had successfully grappled with the most difficult portions of this great work, and shown to the capitalists of the world, under the authority of this House, that one hundred million acres of land were placed at our disposal for the prosecution of the undertaking, that we were not afraid to go on with its construction, or afraid to show that the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway was a work which, however gigantic in its nature, however onerous an undertaking was involved in the work, or however serious the liabilities it imposed, was capable of fulfilment; when, notwithstanding all this, we showed that we were not afraid to go forward and prove to the capitalists of the world that we ourselves had some confidence in this country and in its development, that we were prepared to grapple with this gigantic work, the aspect of affairs was wholly changed. Well, Sir, under these circumstances the Government submitted their policy to Parliament, and they were met by obstruction last Session; they were met by a complete change of front on the part of the Opposition in this House. The men who had for five years declared that they were prepared to construct the Canadian Pacific Railway as a públic work, the men who had pledged themselves to British Columbia to construct it as a public work, and who had, in the House, in every way that men could, bound themselves, called a halt in order to obstruct the Government when we took the only means by which we could remove the difficulty which had prevented the hon. gentleman from obtaining any offers in reply to the advertisement that he had sent all over the country. I hold the advertisement in my hand. It was published on the 2-th May, 1876, and it says that "they invite tenders to be sent in on or before the 1st January, 1877, under the words "lands or proceeds of lands;" they were not only to receive the lands, but they were to receive, if it were thought desirable, the proceeds of lands.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The hon, gentleman is not fair in stating that. I am surprised he should make the statement, for, if he looks at the Act, he will find that the arrangement was for the Government to sell two-thirds of the lands, and then to offer the proceeds to the contractors.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am glad that the hon. gentleman has reminded me of it, for we leave the contractors to bear the entire cost of disposing of the lands, whilst the hon, gentleman undertook to pay the cost of disposing of two-thirds of the land, and then give the proceeds to them without any deduction in the price. I am glad that he has mentioned it, because it shows how much greater than I am stating were the terms that he offered in this advertisement. Then it goes on to say "or the proceeds of the lands at the rate of twenty thousand acres, and cash at the rate of ten thousand dollars for each mile of railway in the North-West, and at the rate of $10,000 per mile, together with interest at the rate of 4 per cent. for twenty-five years from the completion of the work, on any further sum that may be stipulated in the contract, and the Act requiring parties generally to state in their offers the lowest sum per mile upon which interest may be required." That was adopted, and an advertisement published all over the world, in Great Britain, this country, and the United States. I presume he believed that under the circumstances to which I have adverted that the time had come when we might deal with the matter from a better position. I will frankly state to the House that one of the causes which led to the great change in the public sentiment in relation to the value of land in the North-West, and of railway enterprise in the North-West, was the marked and wonderful success that was published to the world as having resulted from the Syndicate who had purchased the St. Paul, Minneapolis and Manitoba Railway, and became the proprietors of that line. The statements they were enabled to publish showed not only the rapidity with which railway construction in private hands could be carried on, but it showed the value of the prairie lands in the North-West, and the extent they could be made valuable for the construction of such lines. It attracted the attention of capitalists in relation to enterprises of that kind to a degree that had a very marked influence, undoubtedly, upon the public mind, in relation to this question. I may further frankly state to the House, because we have nothing to conceal, that when we decided that it was desirable for us to ask intending contractors and capitalists on what terms they would complete and take over the road of the Canadian Pacific Railway, we placed ourselves in communication with all the parties whom we had any reason to suppose would have any intention to contract for the purpose of getting their lowest possible offer. right hon. friend has stated, Canadian American capitalists made proposals for the construction of the remaining portions of this work. The Government proposed to complete the line from Thunder Bay to the Red River. We proposed to complete the contracts that were made in British Columbia in the canyons of the Fraser River, and to carry the line on-for it was an absurdity for the terminus of the Canada Pacific to be at a place where there was only a depth of three feet of water, however advisable it might be for temporary purposes—and we proposed to complete ultimately ninety miles of a line from Emory's Bar to be constructed down to tide water at Port Moody, the harbor selected by the hon. gentleman opposite as the best terminus for the Canadian Pacific Railway. We are always ready, and are prepared, to give all the credit and praise that we possibly can give to our friends opposite, and we showed it by the adoption of the place which the hon. gentlemen in their wisdom had chosen as the terminus.

Mr. BLAKE. You said that it was premature.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did say that it was premature, and we examined further before we adopted the route. We considered all the routes which, in our judgment, were the best, but thought there was another investigation which should be made before finally deciding. After doing so, we found, notwithstanding some advantages in the northern route, that we were prepared to endorse the wisdom of the hon. gentlemen as to where the port for the terminus should be. We then proposed to complete the line from Thunder Bay to Red River, from Kamloops to Emory Bar, and ultimately down to Port Moody. We asked the parties upon what terms they would undertake to build the remaining portions of the line from Nipissing to Thunder Bay, the distance being about 650 miles; it has been chained for the first time during the past season, and is 652 miles. We asked upon what terms they would undertake to complete all the line from the Red River westward to Kamloops, and take over and own the whole road.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Will you place a copy of these propositions as you laid them upon the Table?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes; I have no objection to do so; but it will give the hon. gentleman no additional information to what I have succinctly stated as having been decided.

Mr. MACKENZIE. And also the names of the parties to whom it was made.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say to the hon. gentleman that it was communicated.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Not by public advertisement, like mine.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It was not; and I think we could have taken no better means of defeating the object we had in view than the very course that the hon, gentleman had taken. It was enough to deter anybody from looking at it, seeing that he had stated on the floor of Parliament that no offer could be obtained. We took a wiser plan, which has been crowned with success. By placing ourselves in communication with parties who were likely to make any propositions, we have the pleasure now of laying before the House a proposition to which, in its character and details, I shall invite more closely the attention of the House in comparison with the proposal previously made. have stated to the House that the contra contract and which which is now laid upon the Table, the resolution asks the House to adopt, secures the completion and the operation hereafter of the Canadian Pacific Railway by a private company, aided by a grant of money and lands, upon the most favourable terms that have ever been submitted to this House, or that have ever been proposed by any person in this country for the purpose of securing that object. I will give the data and the definite information for the grounds upon which I base that statement. I may state first that I have had a careful estimate prepared, and have laid it upon the Table, of the amount of money required to complete all the road now under contract, and those portions of the road that are to be constructed by the Government, and it amounts in round figures to twenty-eight millions of dollars.

Mr. BLAKE. Is that inclusive of all that has been spent?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is every dollar of expenditure that will come out of the Treasury of Canada for the existing contracts and for the completion of the road that is to be built by the Government.

Mr. BLAKE. Are these figures intended to represent the total cost of these works, including what has been spent? Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Every dollar of expenditure. It will be remembered that a year ago I made some remarks on this subject in this House, and I am told that some hon. gentlemen would like to have copies of the speech that I made on that occasion. I can only say, so far as the limited supply in my hands will enable me, that I shall be very glad to comply with that wish, because I am not at all unwilling that they should read, mark, learn and inwardly digest its contents, and hold me responsible for them.

Mr. BLAKE. I think I have heard much of this before.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon, gentleman says that he has heard it before, but I have mainly occupied the attention of the House with the more eloquent and able statements of the hon. gentleman opposite. I thought I had done him some justice, but after that reminder I will give the House directly some further statements which he will undoubtedly receive with more pleasure than anything of a more original character. I may say to the House that we submitted the estimate of the Chief Engineer; it was published in a pamphlet which we used in the debate. The hon, gentleman, a short time ago, repeated the words I used in regard to the character of the road, by stating that it was a degraded road. That was literally and specifically correct, for I stated to the House that in the position the Government then were, with this gigantic work in hand, obliged to deal with it as a Government work; we felt compelled, after constructing the road to the Red River as a first-class road, which we had carried out in accordance with the specifications and plans, very judicious specifications and plans of my hon. friend opposite, to carry the road across the prairie of the very cheapest description of road that would answer for the business of the country, and be in the first instance a colonization road. The House will that that estimate was for $84,000,000 work done in the mode in which we remember the work proposed to deal with it. That included eighty millions as the portion of money required for the road and the money expended upon surveys.

Mr. BLAKE. Does the eighty-four millions include that?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, in the eighty-four millions were included the Pembina branch, which was estimated at $1,700,000, and the surveys. I may state that this estimate which I have laid upon the Table differs in some measure from the estimate laid upon the Table last year, and I will tell you frankly why. We stated that we had made our calculations upon the outside estimates. We determined not to be in a position to have to say to the House that the estimates upon which money had been voted for the construction of the railway had been exceeded.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Which contract?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. All the contracts between Thunder Bay and the Red River.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Does the hon gentleman say that he prepared these contracts, or that they were prepared in his time?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I say that we twice postponed the advertisement in order to get the most specific details.

Mr. MACKENZIE. What I wish to know is, whether the specifications were changed between the issuing of the tenders and the time when they were received.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. All I can say is that before we sent out the specifications or entertained tenders at all, in addition to the time that elapsed between the change of Government and our entry into office, we twice extended the time for receiving tenders so that the specifications might be made with sufficient accuracy. This estimate that is now prepared by the present engineer, and which I have laid on the Table of the House,—the Mr. Blake.

$28,000,000—covers all the money that has been spent up to the present time, and all the money that in our judgment, in the light of the work that is now proceeding, will be required to complete it as required by the contract on the Table.

Mr. ANGLIN. The Yale-Kamloops section?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, the Yale Kamloops section and everything. I have already stated that the amount that is put in for engineering, apart from the construction, is $1,600,000, and I draw that as a distinction between the three millions of dollars extended over the whole range of the Canadian Pacific Railway generally, and which has no relation whatever to the cost of this particular work that we are now handing over. This sum has no relation in this sense, that it does not appertain to the construction of that particular work.

Mr. BLAKE. It was part of the expense of finding the route on which the road was to be built, and therefore part of the cost of it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If the hon, gentleman will look at the Canadian Pacific Railway Act of 1874 of his hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie), he will find that it distinctly states that these surveys are not necessarily to be paid for by the parties entering into the contract.

Mr. MACKENZIE. It says that is a matter to be provided for after the contract is entered into.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I stated frankly that the law provided that it might or might not be a charge on the contractors, but when it was left in that way it was not likely to be a charge on them.

Mr. MACKENZIE. It is a charge on the country at all events.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This estimate which has been laid upon the Table does not include that cost for surveys. That, a year ago, I separated from the $80,000,000 required for the Canadian Pacific Railway, but it does include all the other expenditure, as we believe that had been made, and all that will be involved in order to bring that work to completion. I will now draw attention to the estimates of the contract as laid on the Table of the House. The estimated distance, and the distance which is contracted for, and which is buding on the contractors, is 2,627 miles; and I may state that, suppose the contractors were to change the road—suppose they were to go north of Lake Nipegon instead of south of it, and add fifty miles to the length of the road, they would not receive an additional dollar over and above the amount stated in the contract.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Suppose they shorten it?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If they shorten it, I should be very glad to find that they do, and they will receive the amount stated in the contract if they do so. We have chained the route, as I say, and the distance is 652 miles, but it is not very easy to locate a railway for construction quite as short as the chained distance. I think that will be readily understood. I will now take up in the contract all these propositions in the order in which they have been laid on the Table of this House—the order in which they have been voted by this Parliament. I will take up the propositions of 1873, the authority that Parliament gave to the then Government to secure the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. It was a cash subsidy of $30,000,-000, for the main line of 2,627 miles (I am putting the mileage upon the present route for the purpose of contrast), and the land grant of 50,000,000 acres; 20,000 acres per mile for the Pembina Branch, making 1,700,000 acres, and 25,000 acres per mile on 120 miles for the Nipegon Branch, making 3,000,000 acres; so that Parliament, in 1872, voted 54,700,000 acres. If you estimate the land at some particular value for the purpose of comparison.

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Call it one dollar per acret and I am sure, unbelieving as my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition is, unbelieving and wanting in confidence, as he has induced the leader of the late Government to become in the value of these lands, I am almost sure that, with the help of the Globe, I could work them up to the belief that these lands are worth a dollar an acre. I despair of getting them further than that, even with that potent assistance, but I hope to bring them up to the belief that these lands are worth a dollar an acre. For purposes of comparison, then, we will call it worth a dollar an acre. This Parliament voted in land and money a subsidy of $84,700,000, and placed it at the disposal of the Government for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. How has that proposition been treated? Why, Sir, as I have stated, a company was formed, a contract was made with them under the terms of which they were clothed with all the powers and means that we could give them, to command the money markets of the world, and they could not do it.

Mr. ANGLIN. I thought it was he who spoiled it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. leader of the late Government has ever since poured unbounded ridicule on that proposition; he has always considered those terms inadequate to secure the construction of the great Pacific Railway. The hon. gentleman, on the platform, in my presence, declared—and he could not have poured greater ridicule on the project than by the expression he used—that we might as well offer ten dollars as thirty millions of dollars and fifty million acres of land to secure the Canadian Pacific Railway. From that day to this-not quite to this, but until a few months ago-until the contract was made, every person in this country had been led to believe (our own friends as well as our opponents) that the hon, gentleman was right; that those terms were inadequate, and the experience of our Government and the subsequent five years of the late Administration had gone to prove that they were inadequate; and the hon. gentleman will find that last year, when I was in extremis, when I was met by hon. gentlemen opposite, raising a hue and cry that we were going to ruin this country by the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the necessity was great to reduce as low as possible the construction of this work, the lowest estimate that I could submit to this House, for what I admit is a degraded road, was $80,000,000. I now come to the proposition of 1874. And what does that show? The hon. gentleman got Parliament to vote for the construction of 2,627 miles of the through line from Lake Nipissing to Burrard Inlet, for 85 miles of the Pembina branch, and for 85 miles of the Georgian Bay branch-2,797 miles-all of which are contained in the Act, and all declared to be treated on the same terms, and entitled to the same amount as if they were on the main line-

Mr. MACKENZIE. I was not aware that that Act declared Burrard Inlet to be the terminus.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon, gentleman ought scarcely to interrupt me with a captious objection of that kind, which has nothing to do with the question. He knows that, as a matter of comparison, I must take a definite route, and he knows also that he was dealing with the Barrard Inlet route, because he was dealing with the route that he should decide was best, and he did decide that the Burrard Inlet route was the best. The hon, gentleman should not, therefore, interrupt me with such a frivolous objection which has nothing to do with the subject, but which is calculated to draw me aside from the argument. Well, what did it amount to? It amounted to this, that with the shortest route—

Mr. MACKENZIE. No.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The shortest route, because if he hon. gentleman takes any other practicable route he will increase the distance.

Mr. MACKENZIE. No.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Not the shortest. There are shorter routes.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I come to the Act—the law put on the Statute book by the hon, gentleman himself—the authority that this Parliament gave him to construct the Canadian Pacific Railway and what does it enact? It says that on this 2,797 miles, including the main line and branches, he got voted, not by estimate, but by authority of a statute, to use $10,010,000 for that distance, which is 2,797 miles. And, Sir, he got authority to give 20,000 acres of land for every mile of that distance, which amounted to 55,940,100 acres.

Mr. BLAKE. Not on every mile.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. On every mile, as the hon. gentleman will see by the Act of 1874.

Mr. BLAKE. I thought the contract for the Georgian Bay branch was not based on a land subsidy at all.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This was Mr. Foster's contract, which gave 20,000 acres of land, and if the land could not be got along the line, it was to be taken anywhere else in the Dominion.

Mr. MACKENZIE. We do not own the land there at all. Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It had to be got in the North-West.

Mr. MACKENZIE. That is perfectly well known.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The contract makes it a doubtful question whether it could be obtained from the Province of Ontario or not. At that time the hon, gentleman had some hopes of acting on the sense of justice of the Prevince of Ontario, and he might have obtained some land from them.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Formal application was made.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, but not successfully; that Act also provides for four per cent. on such additional amount as would be required by the contractors in order to build the road. The hon, gentleman published his advertisement for six months without getting any response. Now, how shall we arrive at the amount that was to be paid, in comparison with the other contract? There is a very satisfactory mode. The hon, gentleman let the contract for 85 miles, and although I am prepared to admit that that portion of the road is more difficult of construction than a great deal of the Pacific Railway, still the hon, gentleman will not deny that it is a very fair average.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I do.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Then, Sir, I have lost confidence in the hon. gentleman altogether. Has the hon. gentleman forgotten that when the Foster contract was cancelled, and we stated that he was not as wise in letting this contract as he might have been, he scouted the idea, and said there was no difficulty whatever, and that the contract was not abandoned for any such reason as was alleged.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I could only state what the Engineers stated.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have no doubt, when the hon gentleman made that statement, he believed it to be the truth. If the hon gentleman will look at the line north of Lake Superior and examine the character of a considerable portion of it, and then examine the character of the line from the canyons of the Fraser River or from the foot of the Rocky Mountains and thence to Kamloops, Emory's Bar and on to Burrard Inlet, I think he will agree that the Georgian Bay Branch is a fair average of the whole line. When the hon. gentleman advertised he obtained a tender from Mr. Munson, of Boston, at four per cent. on $7,500, while the Foster tender was four per cent. on $12,500, and the other tenders were vastly beyond that sum. Mr. Foster became possessed of the lowest tender—that is, Mr. Munson's; a contract was made with him, and that contract I have in my hand. You will find that it provides for paying Mr. Foster $10,000 in cash per mile, 20,000 acres of land per mile, and four per cent. for 25 years on $7,500. But I must remind the House that after Mr. Foster had gone to New York and exhausted every effort he could make in England, he found he could not get a capitalist in the world to invest a dollar in his contract; so that when I take that contract as a fair average of the cost to be added to the amount for which the hon, gentleman had authority from Parliament to use, I think I have taken an average which every business man will admit is a moderate one. The interest, at four per cent., on $7,500 is $500 a year per mile, and adding that to the amount I have stated, and on the 2,977 miles we have $20,977,500.

Mr. BLAKE. Why do you not capitalize that sum?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not capitalize it all, but it would have to be paid in money as the other is paid.

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Does the hon, gentleman mean to say that when we incur an obligation under a contract we have not the money to pay?

Mr. BLAKE. The obligation to pay year by year for 25 years, does not mean the gross sum of those payments added together, as everybody knows.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, Mr. Speaker, but it means a very much less sum. Let the hon. gentleman apply that principle to the $25,000,000 we are to pay the Syndicate, and he will find that it means a very much less sum too. The hon. gentleman will find that by the terms under which Parliament, in 1874, authorized the late Government to secure the construction of the Pacific Railway, the amount to be paid in cash was $48,947,500, which, with 55,940,000 acres of land at $1 per acre, would make $104,887,500—the lowest amount, as the hon. gentleman must admit, which could represent accurately the amount to be expended upon that scheme.

AFTER RECESS.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER, resuming, said: Mr. Chairman, when the recess took place, I was dealing with the question of the amount that Parliament had placed at the disposal of my hon. friend, the then leader of the Government, for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and I find, Sir, that I have made a slight mistake, which I take the earliest opportunity of correcting. I stated the distance from Nipissing to Burrard Inlet at 2,627 miles; I must add 40 miles to that distance in computing the amount which, (the Act of 1874) Parliament placed to the disposal of the leader of the Government for the construction of the railway, because, you will remember, the then Government located the terminus of the railway, not at the Callendar Station on Lake Nipissing, where it is now located, and where it was originally located by the former Government, but forty miles south of that point. Therefore, under that Act, the hon, gentleman would not only have been obliged to expend $104,887,500 at the lowest computation, but to provide for the construction on the same terms of 40 miles more, to bring the railway down to the terminus as located by the then Government. That will add $400,000 in cash, $300,000 in money as four per cent on $7,500 per mile, for 25 years, and $800,000 in land at a dollar an acre, or the land at $2 an acre. That was in 1875, and the hon. Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

$1,500,000 annually, to make the estimate strictly correct—in all $106,387,500. Now, Sir, having shown that Parliament had placed at the disposal of the Government of my right hon. friend (Sir John A. Macdonald) in 1872 $84,700,000 for the construction of the work, and that Parliament had placed $104,887,500 at the disposal of the leader of the Government in 1874—to which we must add the $1,500,000 to which I have just referrednow come to the present contract, which is laid on the Table of the House for its consideration. For that portion of the line from Fort William to Selkirk, 410 miles, the Pembina Branch, 85 miles, and that portion from Kamloops to Burrard Inlet, 217 miles—all of which, amounting to 712 miles, when the whole line is completed, is to be handed over as the property of the company—the total amount expended and to be expended by the Government, including everything, is $28,000,000. For the construction of the road from Lake Nipissing to Fort William, 650 miles. and from Selkirk to Kamloops, 1,350 miles—2,000 miles in all—the Government have agreed to pay, in addition to the $28,000,000, $25,000,000 and 25,000,000 acres of land; making a total subsidy in cash of $53,000,000, and in land -estimating the 25,000,000 acres at the same rate that I have estimated the land under the contract of 1873 and under the Act of 1874, one dollar an acre-of $25,000,000; or a total amount to be expended by Canada for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, of $78,000,000. I think this warrants the statement with which I commenced my remarks, that these terms are greatly below any terms that have previously been obtained or sanctioned by Parliament for the construction of this great work. The matter then stands thus: under the contract of 1873, $84,700,000; under the contract of 1874, $104,887,500, with $1,500,000 added to bring the road down to the point at which, under that Act, it was to be commenced; under the contract of 1880, now laid on the Table of the House, $78,000,000. Now, Sir, let me draw the attention of the House for a moment, in order to show that in taking the Foster contract as the base of calculation as to what the cost under the Act of 1874 would have been, if it could have been accomplished at all, it was a reasonable estimate, an estimate, in fact, below the mark, to the words of the leader of the late Government with reference to the character of that section. The hon. gentleman said, as will be found in the Hansard of 1876: - Because he would probably refer to this matter at another time in the House, he would now simply say this: that what was published in many newspapers as to engineering difficulties encountered in this relation was entirely fallacious. No difficulty had been experienced in obtaining the grade that was required in the original contract, the gradient not exceeding 26 feet per mile for the country eastward and 52 for the country westward. In only two places was there any difficulty in securing these gradients; and these the engineers assures me can easily be overcome. The explorations in the immediate vicinity of French river show that the linetraverses a rocky though not a hilly country." This shows that I have ground, from the opinions of the hon: gentleman, for my statement that that would be a fair estimate. I will now draw attention of the hon. gentlemen opposite to an authority with reference to the terms. This may be necessary as the position now taken by the Opposition, as may be assumed by that taken by the Globe, is that it is idle to talk about estimating the land at $1 per acre when every one knows it is worth $2 per acre. Well, I shall be only too glad if that can be established, but it will not do for the leader of the Opposition or the leader of the Government to meet me on that ground, and I will show you why. I draw the attention of the Committee to the statement made by the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Blake) when we were discussing the Foster contract, and I had ventured to value gentleman will find his remarks on page 541 of the Hansard. The hon, gentleman said, in reference to myself:

"We have found him putting a value of his own upon the land subsidy We have found him exaggerating other items to be taken into account, and we have found him thus making a total which I do not think the House will agree is a correct one in that matter. As I understand the figures, the cost of building the Georgian Bay Branch, a distance of 85 miles, is as follows: Subsidy, $10,000 per mile, $850,000; guarantee of four per cent. interest on $7,500 for 20 years, which, I am told, capitalized, is equivalent to $4,000 in cash per mile. That we make $340,900, giving $1,190,000 as the total value of the cash to be expended by the country in the construction of the Georgian Bay Branch. With reference to the 20,000 acres of land subsidy, the hon. member for Cumberlan d calculates it at $2 an acre. I do not believe the House will accept that calculation. I am quite sure, if the hon. gentleman proposed that a calculates it at $2 an acre. I do not believe the House will accept that calculation. I am quite sure, if the hon. gentleman proposed that a negotiation be entered into with the contractor for the release of that land, he would find him quite willing to get rid of it at a much less rate than he has valued the land at. It is an entirely absurd calculation to say that these 1,700,000 acres are worth $2 an acre to this country. Even valuing them at $1 an acre would, in my judgment, be an excessive valuation. But even valuing them at $1 you would then have $2,890,000 as cash and land which the Georgian Bay Branch would cost."

Then the leader of the late Government gave his opinion on the subject. My right hon. friend said: "You are going to give 50,000,000 acres of land away." Mr. Mackenzie said: "Yes, only I do not place their value at $5 an acre, I wish I could say that they were worth one dollar an acre." But whatever the value may be, I am confident I express the views of the committee when I say that whatever value may be obtained for them over one dollar per acre, and I hope it will be greatly over that rate, will be obtained, not in their present position, but in consequence of the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. In 1879, the hon, gentleman said:

"I do not understand why the hon. gentleman anticipates a larger revenue from the lands to be sold, because it is absolutely indispensable, in order to induce settlers to go into the country, that we should furnish them with the lands free of charge. Does the hon. gentleman imagine that settlers will go to the North-west and buy lands at $2 an acre when there are millions of acres of land offered for nothing in the United States?"

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If we are able to make these lands worth $2 an acre, we will do it by the agency now proposed to construct the railway, by the expenditure asked for the purpose of ensuring its construction. The leader of the late Government also said:

"We must, therefore, make up our minds if we are to settle that country, it will be done only at the expenditure of a large amount of money to aid settlers on going in and giving them land free after they get in. That is my conviction. If the hon, gentleman's expectation should be realized of getting $2 per acre for those 100,000 acres, I will confess to him that I have been utterly mistaken in my ideas upon this ubject."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD: Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. So much for the value of the lands. Now, Sir, as to the cost of the work. I have estimated the lands at $1 per acre, but I will assume, for the sake of meeting the present views of honorable gentlemen opposite half way, that they will be worth $1.50 per acre, and we will see then how the account will stand as between honorable gentlemen and ourselves; how far my statement with which I opened this discussion will be borne out when I stated that the terms upon which we now ask this House to secure the construction and operation of the Canadian Pacific Railway are greatly below any terms that have ever been offered in this House or submitted to the consideration of the people of Canada. If you value the lands at $1 per acre, the contract of 1873 founded upon the offer to secure the construction of the Canada Pacific Railway to the Allan company will show a total of $112,050,000. How will the account then stand? Applying the same principle to the Act of 1874, it will show $132,857.500 placed at the disposal of the Government of my honorable friend opposite for securing the construction of the road. The hon gentleman gallantly performed his duty, and did Placing the lands at $1.50 an acre, how stands the contract not shrink from the responsibility, arduous and responsible we have laid on the Table? It shows a total of $90,500,000. If we go the whole length the Globe asks, and I do not say it is unreasonable, if we assume those lands to be worth. after the construction of the road, $2 an acre, how will the account stand as between those various proposals submitted for the consideration of Parliament in former times, and readily accepted by it, and the proposal we now lay on the Table? The first proposition, that of 1873, placed at the disposal of the Government lands and money worth $139,400,000. The amounts placed at the disposal of the late Governments :n 1874, valuing the lands at $2 was $160,827,500 on the acre 2,797 miles. The present proposition, valuing the lands at $2 an acre, reaches a total of only $103,000,000, or less than the amount at $1 an acre, placed at the disposal of the late Government by Parliament for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I think this statement ought to be tolerably satisfactory to any hon, gentleman who wishes to make a fair and just comparison of the proposals previously submitted with the present proposal. I will give an authority on this subject, because that derisive cheer from the member for Lambton intimates that he is not satisfied; that he is still doubtful as to my having maintained the position with which I set out, that the terms now submitted for the ratification of Parliament are greatly below any terms ever submitted and approved of. I will now give hon, gentlemen opposite an authority as to the cost of this work, about to be undertaken, that I think they will be compelled to accept. It is the authority of their own statements, of their own opinions, and I think I will show, from the opinions of the leader of the late Government and the late Finance Minister, that the cost of this work is such as to justify any intelligent man in accepting the propositions now submitted as eminently advantageous in the interest of the country, and as not beyond what the parties undertaking to perform such work are entitled to receive. On the 12th May, 1874, Mr. Mackenzie said:

"From that point westward it is quite clear that there is no means of rapid communication except by building a railway, and this portion in British Columbia alone would take $35,000,000, and from the point which Mr. Fleming calculates as the centre of the Rocky Mountains eastward to the junction with navigation, would probably be $100,000,000 or something like that."

There is an estimate from the leader of the late Government, the then Minister of Public Works, and submitted to Parliament on the authority of his own engineers with all the judgment and experience that could be brought to bear upon it, that $100,000,000 would be required for the road from Lake Superior, at Thunder Bay, to the Pacific Ocean; and yet the present proposition secures the construction of the entire road within ten years from the 1st July next, from Lake Nipissing to Burrard Inlet, at a cost to the country, at the estimate hon, gentlemen opposite placed on the lands, of $78,000,000. One would have supposed the member for Lambton would have stood aghast at such an estimate as $100,000,000 for the portion of the road mentioned, and would have abandoned it as beyond the resources of Canada. But standing as Prime Minister and weighted with the responsibility which rests on such a high officer, he felt he must not shrink from his duty, and he stated of the section in British Columbia, that would cost $35,000,000, "we propose to proceed with it as rapidly as we are able to obtain a completion of surveys." He also proposed to expend $100,000,000, if necessary, to connect the waters of Lake Superior with the tidal waters of the Pacific. The leader of the late Government also said:

"We frankly recognize the failure of the attempt to give a fictitious value to lands, in order to get English capitalists to take up the railway; but we also frankly confess the necessity of building the railway by direct money subsidies, or a combined system of giving both money and land."

as was his position, of discharging the duty imposed.

"We propose to give a specific sum per mile, in the first place of $10,000 per mile, and, in the next place, a grant the same as that proposed by the late Government of 20,000 acres, the disposal of which I will $10,000 per mile, and, in the next place, a grant the same as that proposed by the late Government of 20,000 acres, the disposal of which I will attend to presently; and then we invite intending competitors to state the amount for which they will require the guarantee at 4 per cent. in order to give them what they may deem a sufficient sum wherewith to build the road. We know that some think $10,000 per mile and 20,000 acres of land, supposing they realise on an average $1 an acre, will not build the road. It would more than build it in some parts, but from end to end it is evident it will not build it. I do not know, and have no means of estimating the probable expenditure per mile further than that to be derived from our own experience and that of our neighbors. The Intercolonial Railway will cost about $45,000 a mile, traversing, on the whole, a very favourable country, and possessing the most ample means of access at various points on its course, and with the additional advantage of having procured the iron structures and rails when there was a very great depression in the prices of iron. The Northern Pacific Railway, in the accounts published by the Company, has cost, so far as it has been carried—that is to Red River—$47,000 or $48,000 per mile in round numbers. Well, Sir, that road traverses almost wholly a prairie region, easily accessible and where materials were easily found, and is altogether quite as favourable as the most favourable spot of any part of our territories, with this advantage, that it was much nearer to the producers of supplies than any portion of our fine, except that on the immediate borders of the Lake. The Central Pacific I will not touch, as the cost of that road was so enormous as not to afford any guide at all, because of the extraordinary amount of jobbing connected with it. But, judging from the cost of our own railways, we have no reason to suppose it will be possible to construct this line from end to end at a less price than $40,000 per mile, and it may exceed that by seve be possible to construct this line from end to end at a less price than $40,000 per mile, and it may exceed that by several thousands of dollars. Parts of it will, of course, exceed that very much, though on the whole of the sections east of the Rocky Mountains, something in the neighborhood of that figure will cover the outlay. Well, Sir, we propose to donate $10,000 per mile to the companies, and a guarantee of 4 per cent on a sum to be named by them in their tenders, and whatever sum they may name will be the determining point as to which of the tenders is the lowest, the grant of land being also absolutely in each case 20,000 acres. I have already said I consider the building of this road to be one that has to be borne by the people of this country. It is quite useless to suppose that the road can, for the present time, or for some time to come, be regarded as a purely or even a partially commercial enterprise, because I do not expect that any commercial advantage can by any possibility arise to a company constructing this road, for many years to come; and, arise to a company constructing this road, for many years to come; and, as I believe in a perfectly frank, honest opinion in regard to these matters, as the only mode in which the affairs of the country can be legitimately carried on, I give free expression to my views on that I think almost every word I have read will be, although not entirely new, will be looked upon as frank and fair an estimate as the hon. gentleman ever submitted to the House.

"Well, sir, we now desire the gentlemen who undertook that responsibility to show us how it is possible to construct a railway 2,500 miles long, with a population of four millions, passing almost its entire length through an uninhabited country, and for a still greater portion of its length through a country of very rough character."

I am glad the time has come when, in response to the hon, gentleman, we are in a position to show him how that gigantic work can be accomplished, and upon terms more favorable than any the most sanguine person in this country ventured to look for.

"I believe," continued the hon. gentleman, "there can be no question that whoever builds the road, and whenever it may be built, it must be constructed with money furnished by the people of this country." "We know, sir, that the obligations imposed with the building of the road will not terminate with the conclusion of its construction."

I ask the hon. gentleman not to forget, now that he is sitting on the Opposition benches, that in estimating the cost, as a Minister, he felt that he would not be doing his duty if he did not draw the attention of the House to the fact that when this road is constructed the liability resting upon the country will not be discharged, but just commencing. went on to say:

"Supposing it only takes the minimum amount estimated by Mr. Sandford Fleming, $100,000,000, you have pretty good appreciation of what it would cost the country in the end. When you double the debt of the country you will not be able to accomplish the borrowing of the sum of money required to build the road, paying the attendant expenses of management, and the debt, and everything else connected with it."

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

face of the country, and of the financial world, to an expenditure of eighty to a hundred million dollars for the construction of the railway, we could hardly be surprised if it increased the cost of money we were obliged to borrow in the money markets of the world.

"You will not be able, I say, to borrow the required amount of money at less than six per cent. on the amount."

Not an extravagant statement, certainly, in view of the great liability that would be involved by undertaking to furnish all the money for the construction of the road.

"If you add six per cent. upon the minimum amount to the existing obligations of the country, you will have, in addition to our present annual burdens, six millions of dollars, which, added together, would make a continuous application of twelve millions of dollars before you have a cent to apply to the ordinary business of the country."

A rather startling ground for the hon. gentleman to take, but one which commended itself to all those who listened to the hon, gentleman's address.

"Then we come to the consideration of what would be the position of "Then we come to the consideration of what would be the position of the road after it was completed, supposing we were able to fulfill the obligations which hon gentlemen opposite undertook; and supposing we finished it in seven years, we have Mr. Fleming's authority—assuming him as an authority, and I think he is very much within the bounds—that until at least three millions of people are drawn into that uninhabited territory, it is quite impossible to expect the road to pay its running expenses. Mr. Fleming estimates these at not less than eight million dollars per annum, and they have still further to be supplemented by the proportion of money required each year to renew the road. It is known, moreover, to railway authorities, that considering the difficulties of climate, and with the ordinary traffic, the road will require renewal, that is the renewal of sleepers and rails every eight or ten years on an average. No doubt that steel rails substituted for iron, the time for their renewal would be considerably enlarged, but to what extent I am at present would be considerably enlarged, but to what extent I am at present unable to say."

First we would pay $100,000,000 to build the road; next $8,000,000 annually to operate it, subject to the deduction of whatever traffic the road received, and, thirdly, we would have to renew the sleepers and rails every eight years, unless we used steel rails. This is the pleasant picture which the hon, gentleman himself drew for the consideration of the House and country. And now, it appears, he hesitates to secure the construction and operation of the road for ever at a cost of $78,000,000. When the hon, gentleman arrived at this point I resolved to ask the question "what do you estimate as the duration of the ordinary rails?" The hon. gentleman replied:

"From eight to ten years. That, at least, is the opinion of Mr. Walter Shanly, whom I assume to be a competent authority. Supposing, then, that the road was completed, we would have, in addition to the burdens imposed upon us by the interest of the money, to provide for the working of the railway, a sum at least equal to that amount, or six millions every year, in order to keep it in repair."

My hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, no longer than a year ago, in the light of all the information and experience which the five years' administration of the hon. member for Lambton afforded him, was good enough to give to the House his opinion as to the cost of this road and the liability that would be incurred; and I invite—before the hon. gentleman takes the position of refusing his assent to this contract, which, I venture to say, he cannot afford as a public man to take—his attention to his own estimate as he gave it a year ago. It will be found on page 1441 of Hansard. He said:

"Again, of course, the through traffic depends on the road being firstclass, and we will remember that, after we have spent all the hon. Minister proposes, we shall have, not a Pacific, but a colonization road."

That was true, and the hon. gentleman was only doing his duty in calling the attention of the House to the fact that if, in grappling with this work, we reduced the expenditure to a minimum, we should have only a colonization road. But what else does he say?

of money required to build the road, paying the attendant expenses of management, and the debt, and everything else connected with it."

That hon, gentleman opposite, last session, enforced very strongly upon our attention the fact that if we went on with this work as a Government work, and stood pledged in the "According to the old system of construction, that central section would cost, including the other item I have mentioned, altogether over $42,500,000, leaving out entirely both ends. What are the ends to cost? $45,000,000 is, as I have stated, the cost from Edmonton to Burrard Inlet on the West; and from Fort William to Nipissing on the East. The hon, member for Lambton estimates it at a length of about 650 miles, and a cost of $32,500,000. Thus the ends make up together $77,000,000, the centre and the past expenditure $42,500,000, making a total of $120,000,000."

And yet the hon, gentleman is startled and astonished, and exhibits the most wonderful alarm when he finds a proposal laid on the Table of the House to secure the construction of all that work, which, at the cheapest rate, was to cost $120,000,000, for $78,000,000—putting the outside value on the land that the hon. gentleman is willing to admit is worth. The hon. gentleman proceeded proceeded to say that, "besides this enormous expenditure, to which he had referred, they had to consider running expenses, which Mr. Fleming estimated at eight millions, and which his hon friend estimated at the gross sum of $6,750,000 a year, for the whole line, or, $4,500,000 a year from Fort William to the Pacific. Of course, against this sum was to be set receipts, which in some sections, perhaps, would meet expenditure; but, in the early days, if not for a long time, he believed, the road would have to be run at a loss." I know that this is an authority for which the hon. leader of the Opposition has most profound respect, and I trust that, in submitting such criticism as, in the interests of country every great measure of this kind ought to receive, the hon. gentleman will not lose sight of the position he took in criticising our proposals twelve months ago. I will again revert to a criticism with relation to the cost, of more valuable character than that of leader of the Opposition. No person, perhaps, esteems the hon. gentleman's ability, certainly as a special pleader, higher than myself, or his general judgment when he gives questions the fair candid and unbiassed examination which questions like this deserves, but does not always receive; but I will give the House an opinion, which I estimate more highly than that of the leader of the Opposition, the opinion of a gentleman who, for five years, as leader of the Government of the country, dealt with this question, and was conversant with all itedetails, I mean the hon. leader of the late Government. After all his experience, and after the experience of a year in the Opposition, as well as of five years of Administration, he undertook to give to the House his estimate as to what that road would cost, and I frankly confess that I am not for a moment disposed to question the value of his judgment. He said:

"I will take the description of the engineers themselves, as to the character of the work upon the several sections from Fort William to Setkirk, and carry out figures elsewhere on the same description. Seventy miles were described as heavy, 226 miles moderate, and 114 miles light; and, in order to reach the $18,000,000, which the engineers had recently estimated, they would have to take the seventy miles of heavy work at $75,000 per mile; the 226 miles of moderate might, at $39,000, and the 114 light at $20,000, making altogether, with the rolling stock valued at $1,555,000, $18,000,000. From Selkirk to Battleford, the first 112 miles are described as light, which, with the rails, fencing, etc., might be estimated at $14,000 per mile, or $3,000 less than the Pembina Branch; and the spcond 100 miles I have taken and calculated as to the materials furnished by Mr. Marcus Smith, and I do not believe that any gradient can be obtained on that section to build the road at less than $20,000 per mile."

Subsequent events have thrown perhaps a good deal of light on the tenders sent in and contract undertaken. No progress was made on the contract, as the hon gentleman knows, and judgment which the hon gentleman had given as to cost, had thereby received very considerable confirmation. He further said:

"We have in some miles a quantity of 39,900 cubic yards of earth to move, and all grades steep, only kept fifty-three feet to the mile—many of them are fifty-three feet. The average of excavation is 16,000 cubic yards per mile. We have, in short, 1,600,000 yards of earth to move which, at the lowest price per yard obtained on other roads, say twenty-five cents on the average, this of itself will cost $400,000."

"This was almost the exact value of the earth work alone, leaving nothing for bridges, ties, rails, building fences, and other items."

"Trom the end of the second hundred miles to Battleford we have 377 miles. This is not any heavier on the whole—There are some more formidable bridges, but the line is further off for the carriage of the rails. I place that section at $21,000 per mile."

I draw the attention of the hon, gentleman to this now, in connection with the amount proposed to be paid under this contract for the central section. As I have stated, opinions which the hon, gentleman has formed after long experience, as to the lowest amount at which it could be constructed, are entitled to very great consideration.

Mr. MACKENZIE. You did not give much attention to them a year ago.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon, gentleman says I did not give much attention to them a year ago, but looked at in the light of subsequent events, I am disposed to admit that there is a great deal in the argument of the hon, gentleman. He again said:

"Then from Battleford to Edmonton, it is reported by the engineers as thirteen miles very heavy; this I estimate at $60,000 a mile, being $10,000 less than the other heavy work east of Selkirk."

I hope that when the hon, gentleman has criticised the amount which we propose to pay in the central section, he will not forget that it covers 13 miles, which he estimates at $60,000 a mile, $10,000 less than for the heavy work east of Selkirk. Still further:

"Forty-nine miles more of the line classed as moderately heavy, I put at $39,000 per mile; and seventy miles very moderate, at $25,000, with ninety-eight miles of light work at $20,000 per mile, which makes for this section altogether an average of $27,000 per mile."

The hon, gentleman said we have constructed the line from Pembina to Selkirk, 85 miles. This is a prairie, and a most favorable region, and he stated that the amount I submitted on estimate last year of $1,750,000 for the Pembina branch, but that included more than my estimate now includes for the Pembina branch, and for the reason, as hon, gentlemen will see, the heavy expenditure charged to that branch for workshops, rolling stock, etc., will now devolve upon the company, and consequently now reduce the estimate to $1,500,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Give us a detail of the reductions.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. All I can say is, that I took the estimate of the engineer, charging what was fairly chargeable to that road-buildings in connection with its operation—and the amount of the Pembina Branch was therefore placed at $1,750,000. We now reduce that by $250,000, because, as I say, the expenditure we would have had to make immediately in connection with the work now devolves upon the Syndicate under the contract. But, Sir, the House will see that, according to the estimate which I laid on the Table last year, and which hon gentlemen thought altogether below the mark, the Pembina Branch-a prairie, line from end to end, no very heavy bridging, no serious muskegs, no difficulties really to be encountered, a fair prairie section—according to my own estimate last year was over $20,000 a mile; according to my estimate now laid on the Table of the House, the Pembina Branch will cost the Government of this country, when it is handed over to the Syndicate, The hon. gentleman continued:-$17,270 a mile.

"This would make the entire cost of the road west of Lake Superior, including $1,440,000 for the Canada Central subsidy, $100,000 for the Selkirk bridge, $300,000 for engineering over 1,946 miles, $39,002,000."

Now, there is his opinion. I have shown the opinion of the hon leader of the Opposition that this work, for which we have shown the contract, asks Parliament to place at our disposal $28,000,000. According to the estimate of the leader of the Opposition a year ago was to cost $120,600,000, and, according to the estimate—the more mature and reduced estimate of the hon. gentleman best qualified to judge on that side of the House—was to cost this country $89,002,000 in cash. There was no question of land; we are dealing with the lowest estimate of the cost in cash taken out of the treasury of Canada, and the estimate of the hon. leader of the Opposition was, in round numbers, $90,000,000, after all the information he had on the subject. But I am wrong; I am doing the hon. gentleman a great injustice.

Mr. BLAKE. The estimate I gave was that of the hon. member for Lambton.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. So I see. I thought it was that of the hon. member for Lambton, but the case is a great deal stronger. I am not even to show there is a diversity of opinion between the hon. gentlemen. I find that they worked it pretty nearly to the same figure. I was leaving out that section north of Lake Superior, but the hon. member for Lambton brings that in, and shows that West of Lake Superior, from Thunder Bay to the Pacific, the lowest that we could build it for was $59,000,000 in cash. That is the lowest. Let us see what he says about the railway to the head of Lake Superior.

"While from Fort William to Nipissing, 650 miles, estimating the cost at $50,000 per mile, would make it $32,500,000, or a total of $121,700,-000."

So that these gentlemen are not open to the challenger that on a great public question their estimate differs. After careful consideration, weighing well the responsibility of placing before the House statements that were cautious, judicious, and safe, upon which the people of this country could safely base their estimates, both of these gentlemen agreed a year ago that to build the Canadian Pacific Railway with money borrowed for the purpose, and expended in cash, the correct estimate that this railway from Lake Nipissing to Port Moody, Burrard Irlet, could be accomplished for, was $120,000,000 to $121,700,000. There was only about a million and a half between them.

"It will be observed, if we apply the figures as I apply them, that is calculating the expenditure east of Red River, between Lake Superior and Selkirk, that it would be impossible to obtain the same character of road as to gradients and curvature for less than I have estimated, I amoure I am within the line in stating these figures, and that it would be impossible to construct anything that could be called a railway—nothing better than a tramway, for less."

That amount is $84,000,000, and yet it was only to be a tramway and the only possible means of getting a line that could be called a railway, was by an expenditure of $121,000,000, the amount given by the hon. gentleman. He continues:—

"The hon. Minister of Railways thinks it matters little what grades we have west of Winnipeg. He thinks it will suffice for traffic. I observe that the Chief Engineer, with his usual caution, does not speak of it as the Canadian Pacific Railway at all. He speaks of it as a colonization road, and it is only that. The hon. Minister of Railways is entitled to the credit or discredit of this new plan of degrading the railway into a track that will not be fit for heavy traffic."

I am thankful for small favors and I am willing to take the credit or discredit of having stated frankly to the House, that my idea was not to obtain a first class railway, but the cheapest description of road that would answer for colonization purposes. I have given the House the estimates of the two hon, gentlemen sitting one to the right one to the left of the late Minister of Finance, and I should be wanting very much in my duty to the House, if I did not show them that that hon, gentleman himself did not regard the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway as a very light matter, and held very much the views and opinions of his two honorable colleagues. Sir Richard Cartwright, in 1874, in his Budget speech, said:

"In order rightly to understand the extent of the burden we would be required to take upon ourselves for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, it must be remembered that the lowest estimate for building this road to the Pacific is something over $100,000,000, and this, too, on the supposition that a very much longer time would be given for construction. * * Now, Mr. Chairman, I spoke before recess of the expense arising from the workings of the Intercolonial Railway and other railways of the Dominion, chiefly in the Maritime Provinces. The deficiencies resulting from these sources amount to the extraordinary sum of about $1,250,000. I desire to call the special attention of the House, which must be clear to every hon, gentleman, these railways run for the most part through a country which has been settled for the last fifty or sixty years. I cannot refer, of course, to the fact that these railways entail such an enormous expenditure without its becoming apparent to the House that the cost of maintaining a railway nearly 3,000 miles in length, passing through a country almost entirely uninhabited, must of necessity be very much greater. For a long time after the construction of the rail-Sir Charles Tupper.

I trust I have given to the House sufficient evidence to show not only that the proposition which we have the honor to submit for the approval of Parliament, is one entitled to their favorable consideration; not only that it is greatly within the amount voted by this House in 1873, and subsequently in 1874, for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, but that it is a contract based upon figures low, as compared with those which these hon, gentlemen opposite, after all the experience that they had had in connection with this great work, regarded as altogether insufficient for its construction, without reference to the provision of a single dollar for the purpose of securing the operation of the road afterwards. I trust I have given to the House sufficient evidence to show, not only that the proposal which I have the honor to submit to Parliament is entitled to their favorable consideration, not only that it is greatly within the amount voted by this House in 1873 and subsequently in 1874 for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, but that it is a contract based upon figures which, compared with those which the hon. gentle-men opposite, after all their experience in connection with this work, regarded as altogether insufficient for its construction, and far more favorable to this country. Now, I am bound to say, I never felt more grateful to Parliament in my life than when, notwithstanding the startling statements made by those hon. gentlemen, this House placed 100,000,000 acres at the disposal of this Government for the purpose of constructing the Canadian Pacific Railway. I knew that every intelligent man in this House, and out of it, regarded that measure as of vital importance to the country. I knew they felt it was a duty we owed to the country to grapple with this great work notwithstanding the enormous liability it involved, and notwithstanding the enormous demands made upon the Treasury of the country. I knew that, obliged as we were to some extent to act upon the best judgment we could form, but to act experimentally, I knew it was a great demand to make upon Parliament for the Government to ask for permission to proceed with this great work. But we felt that, inasmuch as the construction of this road was required to develope the great North-West, inasmuch as it was absolutely necessary to make that country what it could be made, and to increase the population and resources of the whole Dominion, that we were warranted in asking, at all events, that the lands otherwise useless should be utilized for the purpose of its construction. The House can understand we felt fully the responsibility of asking for this enormous amount of public money to be expended; but feeling as we did that when we had constructed the work from end to end, and were ready to operate it, the still heavier responsibility rested upon the country of providing the means of successfully operating that road, for no man could shut out of sight the serious responsibility that the operation of 3,000 miles of railway through such a country would entail. But l'arliament felt that the construction of this road was absolutely necessary to the development of Canada, and necessary to the development of Canada, and they generously gave to the Government the assistance we asked for; but they did it under the conviction that we intended to apply those lands in such a way as would ultimately secure the people of the older provinces against taxation for the purpose of constructing this railway. The Government, sensible of this generous feeling on the part of their supporters in this House in sustaining us, notwithstanding the fears and the slarm that it was sought to create in this House by hon. gentlemen opposite when they found themselves in a position to criticise the very measure for which they had asked the House to give them the power of carrying through, I say the House can understand the pleasure with which we meet the people of Canada through their representatives to night, and are enabled to say that, by the means which we were authorized to use for the construction of this work, we are in a position to state not only that the entire construction from end to end, but that the responsibility of operating it hereafter is to be taken off the shoulders of Canada for the insignificant consideration of something like a cost to the country of a little over $2,000,000 per annum, not commencing now, however, but that will be the ultimate cost assuming that we have to pay for ever the interest on all the money already spent and required and what the Syndicate will obtain under this contract. When we are in a position not only to show that, but to show that out of the 100,000,000 acres of land that Parliament placed two years ago at our disposal, we have 75,000,000 acres left with which to meet the $2,000,000 of interest, and that expenditure will be diminished until, at no distant day; we will not only have the proud satisfaction of seeing Canada assume an advanced and triumphant position, but that she will be relieved from the expenditure of a single dollar in connection with the construction or operation of this railway. I may say that I have been greatly gratified at the criticisms that have been bestowed upon the proposition we are submitting to Parliament. Nothing has given me more confidence in the soundness of our position and the impregnable attitude we occupy in Parliament or out of it, than the criticisms to which this scheme has been subjected by the press, as far as I have seen it. First, I may speak of the Ottawa Citizen. I find that in the criticism of that paper, to which, at all events, we were entitled to look for a fair and dispassionate criticism, the proprietor has evidently handed over his editorial columns not only to a hostile hand but to a disingenuous writer who was not willing to put the facts fairly before the country, and this strengthens me in my conviction of the soundness of the proposition we are submitting to Parliament. If that contract contained objectionable features, to which the attention of Parliament might be called, and that were sufficient to condemn it, where was the necessity of the person who wrote the criticism in the Citizen mis-stating almost every clause of the contract that he commented upon, from beginning to end. I say nothing has more strengthened my conviction in the soundness of this measure; whether it was the Ottawa Citizen, from which I had hoped better things, or from the Free Press, from which I did not expect any different treatment, or the Globe newspaper of Toronto; and when I take up these papers and find that every criticism, every serious ground of attack, is based upon mis-statements of what the contract contains, I am confirmed in my opinion that they found that contract unimpeachable, and that a fair and candid criticism would compel them to give their adhesion to it. When I look at those criticisms I am reminded of the position a gentleman would occupy who had made a contract for the construction of a Great Eastern, an enormous ship, greater in extent and involving a greater expenditure than any other ship that ever was built in the world. But, Sir, I am reminded of what would be the position of a man, who, after building a ship, and finishing it complete in every respect, would be told by his employers that the ship was all right in design, material and workmanship, but that there was a little twist on the jolly boat which they did not like, and on that account they did not think they would take her. I say, Sir, that when we come down to Parliament with a great measure like this; when, Sir, we occupy a position in respect to the probable completion of the great work, which twelve months ago the most sanguine man in the country could not have hoped we would occupy—these hon. gentlemen hesitate. They say, although you have found gentlemen with great resources at their command, to can make their enterprise successful. The interest which Canada; although that work is to be completed on a purely commercial basis these gentlemen, turning their backs, as they have been obliged to do, upon their own declarations, again and again recorded—still complain of the arrangement which happily we have been enabled to place before Parliament. But for the remarks of hon, gentlemen opposite, which have led me to believe to the contrary, I should have thought that this was a measure for which I could have confidently asked the support, not only of those who usually support the Government, but of hon, gentlemen opposite, who stood committed by their votes, and by the strongest possible statements of their leaders, to the support of terms for the construction of this work much less favorable than those embodied in the present contract. But, say these hon. gentlemen, we do not like the Company—and remarks are indulged in most insulting to the gentlemen who compose the Syndicate.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Who said so?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The organ of the hon, gentlemen in this city.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Do you mean the Citizen?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Well, perhaps the Citizen is now the organ of hon. gentlemen opposite. I know that in the short space of twenty-four hours they were able to take the Times out of our hands by some means—a human device I believe they called it. But, Sir, I do not feel surprised that hon, gentlemen reject with scorn the imputation that the Free Press is their organ or speaks their sentiments—a journal that attempts to throw obloquy upon gentlemen of high standing in Canada and in the United States and Europe. Hon. gentlemen do not like the Company, but one would suppose that their ideas had undergone a revolution upon that question. The gentlemen who have undertaken this work stand before the people of this country to-day in the strongest position that it is possible for gentlemen to occupy in relation to a great enterprise such as this. The Canadians engaged in the enterprise are men who are second to none in respect of commercial standing and capacity, and by their success in carrying out other great railway enterprises, they have afforded us the best possible guarantee for the manner in which they will fulfil their engagements with the Government and the Parliament of Canada. I may be told that the owners of the St. Paul, Minneapolis and Manitoba Railway, are members of this Syndicate; and, Sir, I am glad to know that that is the fact, and for this reason, I say that standing outside of this Association, they were in a position of antagonism to Canada, because they were the owners of a line of railway to the south of our great North-West, and of large tracts of fertile land contiguous to that railway. We all know that the great barrier to the successful development of the North-West was that in the absence of a Canadian Pacific Radway, our immigration was obliged to filter through the territories of the United States. The great efforts which have been made to secure immigration into the United States, and intercept those who were on their way to the North-West, have not been made by the Government of that country, or by the legislatures of the States, but by the railway companies who have a personal interest in seducing these immigrants into their own territories. Why, Sir, we have annexed a large portion of the State of Minnesota to Canada in this way; and any man with a head on his shoulders will see at once that a company who have engaged to build or operate a road 650 miles from Thunder Bay to Nipissing, and who are to be the owners of one thousand miles of road, from Red River to Nipissing, cannot afford to do anything less than attract, go forward with an enterprise so essential to the progress of these gentlemen will have in the Canadian Pacific Railway will be tenfold greater than any interest they ever had in the St. Paul, Minneapolis and Manitoba line, and I care not what their nationality may be, as the signatories of that contract, Canada possesses in them the most undoubted evidence that they will spare no effort to secure traffic for the Canadian Pacific Railway. The hon, gentleman seemed to think that this Company would not bear the scrutiny and investigation which was desirable.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Who said so?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I hope I did not do the leader of the Opposition an injustice, when I thought that my mention of the Company was received, by him, in the way in which he usually receives a sentiment with which he does not agree.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not quite understand the hon. gentleman.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I say that this Company embraces capitalists, both of our own and other countries, who are men of the highest character; men, whose names are the best guarantees that could be offered the people of Canada, that any enterprise they may undertake will be successful. With regard to the terms of the contract, I do not hesitate to say that no greater injury could have been inflicted on the people of Canada than to have made the conditions of the agreement so onerous that instead of ensuring their successful fulfilment they would have led to failure. I say that the moment that contract is signed everything that we can do for the purpose of obtaining the best terms in our power has been done, always under the impression that we owed it to Canada to make a contract that was capable of fulfilment; to give those gentlemen a fair contract and afford them a fair opportunity of grappling with this great, this gigantic enterprise, that we were so anxious to transfer from our shoulders to theirs. And I would ask this House whether this being a contract involving the great business importance that it does, is one to sit down and cavil over, in the ordinary acceptation of the term, in relation to contracts, and to drive the most difficult bargain that could be driven, and perhaps lead to what occurred when we made the contract in 1873, with terms largely in excess of those that this contract contains? That was not a contract that was capable of fulfilment, because the parties were unable, in the then condition of the country, to raise the capital that was necessary. Now, we approach this question in that spirit, and I would ask every member of this House if we should not be unworthy of representing the Parliament of Canada in the discharge of the public business, if we had not felt, in the interests of Canada, that this arrangement should be one that would obtain the command of the capital that was required, and that would enable the parties engaged in this great work to make it thoroughly successful as I trust it will be. We have reason to know that-all that a command of capital can do they have the advantage of; we have reason to know that all that skill and energy and a knowledge of precisely such work will do, has been secured, in order to make this a successful contract, and I would ask hon gentlemen opposite what more is desirable or necessary? I have referred to the position that those gentlemen occupy, but I would just ask hon, gentlemen opposite whether Canada would be likely to have this contract carried out with the success we all desire, expect, and hope for, if we had made the contract with the strongest body of capitalists that could be found in the city of London? What would you have had? We would have had, the first thing, an English engineer, with extravagant ideas, totally ignorant of the work and the construction of railways through such a country, and we would have had, at no distant day-no matter what their resources might be-a perfect failure in their hands, and, worse than that, you would have had discredit brought upon the country in consequence of Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

obtain that interest which they justly expected from their investment. Whether you look at the American, the Canadian, or at the English, French or German gentlemen associated with this enterprise, I believe that Canada has been most fortunate, and the Government has been most fortunate, in having this work placed in their hands. It is stated that the security of one million dollars for the carrying out of the contract is too small. They say that a paid up capital of five millions of dollars within two years, and a deposit of one million dollars is too small. My opinion of security is this: that provided you get the parties who are most likely to deal successfully with the matter, the less security you demand the better. Because, just in proportion as you lock up the resources of the party, the more you decrease his power to carry on the work successfully.

Mr. BLAKE. In order to improve the situation, let us strike out the clause about the million dollars.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Of course, we are speaking within a certain latitude, and I would ask the hon. gentleman to turn his attention to what was a somewhat similar work constructed on this continent—the Union Pacific Railway—and I would ask him whether the capital of that company was larger, or whether the security given by them for the construction of the road was larger, than is now obtained with this Company? He may examine into the carrying out of some of those great works, and he will find that the security that the Government had was confidence that the parties engaged in the project would carry them out to completion. The hon. gentleman will find that, under this arrangement, we have the best guarantee that these works will be pushed rapidly to completion under the contract as now proposed. This contract requires the parties to complete the road in ten years—that in July, 1891, it will be carried to completion—and I may say, Sir, that, although the leader of the Opposition has forgotten it, he took the liberty, a year ago, of expressing his opinion, and to a certain extent, I suppose, his sympathy, with the deplorable condition in which the members from the Province of Quebec found themselves. The hon. gentleman said that "Quebec had spent eleven millions of dollars, which she could ill afford, for the construction of a provincial railway, principally for the purpose of tapping the Pacific trade. Quebec had stretched out her arms towards the great west as far as this city, for the purpose of securing that trade, and the question is how soon that expenditure is to be made available. Her road is paying, as it is, what Quebec expected it should pay, some fraction of the interest on its construction; but they also expected that it would bear the great tide of western traffic into her principal cities, and bring prosperity to her people, but unless some through connection is made, these expectations, on the part of Quebec, would not be realized; that if the eastern end was not constructed until the western end was finished, he hoped they would all be alive to enjoy it." I will not say that there was any sarcasm in these remarks. I will not say that the hon, gentleman was not shedding tears of sympathy when he was bemoaning the unhappy fate of Quebec. But where are Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island; and where is the Province of Ontario to-day? Why, they stand in a position, to day, that a year ago we would have been laughed at if we had ventured to predict it. If we had said a year ago that by this session we would be enabled to provide a contract by which, in 1891, all the cities of these Provinces would have easy communication with the North-West Territories of Canada, it would have been considered impossible of attainment. What is of more vital importance to this Province and the cities of the east, Quebec, St. John and Halifax, than that they should have ready access to the North-West. The fact is that that great country, with its millions of fertile acres that yield abundant returns to the parties which had purchased their bonds, failing to the industry of the agriculturist, must, for years to come, during the development of those vast territories, depend upon the older Provinces for its manufactures. Therefore, it is of vital importance to every section of Canada, and to no portion more than the North-West, that there should be easy, rapid and cheap communication established at an early day. Now, Sir, I will draw the attention of the House for a moment to what will be accomplished. The road is to be commenced on the first of July next at Callendar Station, near Lake Nipissing, and, under this contract, is to be proceeded with pari passu, at such an annual rate of progress as will secure through connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway by 1891. Now, with regard to the distance, everybody knows that the construction of this line will shorten the distance between all our great cities and Winnipeg, the present emporium of the Northwest, by some 500 miles. But, assuming that we west, by some 500 miles. But, assuming that we could go by the Sault Ste. Marie, in the absence of any line at the north of Lake Superior, the distance, by the Sault and Duluth, would be, from Nipissing to Sault Ste. Marie, 294 miles, from Sault St. Marie to Duluth 410 miles, and from Duluth via Emerson to Winnipeg 464 miles, making the total distance from Callendar Station to Winnipeg 1,168 miles. That was the shortest route which, twelve months ago, the Government were able to hold out any expectation of obtaining. Now we propose to secure the construction of a through line, to be commenced on the first of July next, which will shorten that distance by 1111

Mr. BLAKE: That is 1,057 miles from Winnipeg to South East Bay.

Sir CHARLES I UPPER: It is 1,006 miles from Nipissing, along Thunder Bay to Winnipeg, if you take the Lake, or 1,057 miles by rail; the distance from Callendar Station to Linkoping, the station where the line will strike the Thunder Bay Branch, being 686 miles, and that from Linkoping to Winnipeg being 371 miles. So that the House will see we have the shortest possible line by which to reach Winnipeg. It will also see that the distance from Montreal to Callendar Station is 354 miles, while the distance from Toronto, by the Gravenhurst line, is 226 miles, or 128 miles less than that from Montreal. I may now advert for a moment to some of the objections which have been urged against this proposition. I am told that the standard is too low, that the standard of the Union Pacific Railway, is a very unfavorable standard, and that we ought to have selected something higher. Well, it is very well, after having obtained the opportunity of making a contract, to make severe stipulations; but when I have stated to the House the terms under which these gentlemen have undertaken to construct this road, I think you will agree with me that they were entitled to as favorable consideration as we could give them. I should like to know what position the Government of Canada would have been in, who, after having offered $84,000,000 in 1873, to the company of which Sir Hugh Allan was the president, should ask the gentlemen who were undertaking to do the same work for $78,000,000 to make the terms more onerous than those of the previous contract. If any hon, gentlemen will turn to the contract with the company of which Sir Hugh Allan was president, they will find that it provided that the standard of construction and equipment of the Canadian Pacific Railway should be the Union Pacific Railway, and, therefore, we have gone as far as any member of this House, or any fair-minded man will say we ought to go, with reference to the standard. But what is this standard? Why, there are half a dozen leading roads in the United States to-day of which the standard is more objectionable in grades and curves than that of the Union Pacific Railway. Therefore, I think there is not much operation, and that will be in operation within the course of ground for cavil in that matter. When the Union Pacific the year. After reading the lachrymose statements of the Railway was built, the Government, who gave a much hon leader of the late Government about these lands and greater amount of aid to it than we are giving to this road, agreed that the standard of the Baltimore and Ohio Railway should be put in the contract as the standard of the Union Pacific, and the Baltimore and Ohio Railway, as every one knows, is a road that is doing an enormous traffic and is regarded as a first-class road. The Portland and Ogdensburg Railway and half-a-dozen other American lines, have also a standard that cannot compare with the standard we have selected. I need not I need detain the House, therefore, show that it would have been utterly unreasonable for the Government of Canada to exact from these gentlemen, who were agreeing to construct this road at so much less terms than were agreed to in the Allan contract, a higher standard than we have done. But we have a better guarantee than could be inserted in the contract, of the high standard of the road, and that is that these gentlemen are not constructing the road for the Government of Canada to work, but they are constructing it as their own property, and when it is constructed they have to furnish the means of maintaining and operating the road, and every disadvantage of a poor construction would full upon them and not upon us. And, Sir, what would have been my position in demanding excessive terms in relation to the standard of the road, when they had in their hands my own statement—the statement of the Government of Canada, with all the resources of the country at our backthat we were compelled to lower the character of the road in order to construct a cheap line of railway, and that the lowest estimate we could make of the cost of such a work was $80,00,000, or an excess of the whole amount they were obtaining both in money and land, computing the land at a dollar an acre? I think, therefore, Sir, that I need not detain the House by dealing with the question of the standard of the road. Nor, Sir, will I detain the House very long upon the other point that has been raised, and that is the mode upon which the money is being divided. I have shown the cost of the Pembina branch at the lowest rate at which we can now put it, without all those buildings necessary, and which these gentlemen will have to construct at their own cost. If hon, gentlemen have paid any attention to the deplorable description that the First Minister gave us a year ago as to the difficulties they would have to surmount between Red River and the foot of Rocky Mountains, I think they will come to the conclusion that the amount is not extravagant. I call the attention of the House to this fact. The Government want that road pushed through from Red River to the foot of the Rocky Mountains as fast as it can be done. I have the authority of the leading gentlemen connected with the Syndicate to state in public that they intend the road to be complete at the foot of the Rocky Mountains at the end of three years from the present time. If it be thought a gigantic work to build 300 miles of railway by this powerful Syndicate in a year, I may tell hon. gentlemen, for their information, that within the last year a few of these gentlemen completed between 200 to 300 miles of railway themselves through a somewhat similar country. And, therefore, it is not an extravagant statement for them to make in saying that they intend to construct the road to the foot of the Rocky Mountains in three years, and to build 300 miles of this road during the coming season. What does that involve? It involves the expenditure of an enormous amount of capital at the outset. The very moment this contract is ratified by Parliament, these gentlemen have got to put their hands in their pockets and not only take therefrom a $1,000,000 to deposit with us as security, but they have to put their hands into another pocket the next hour and take out another million to equip the road that is in operation, and that will be in operation within the course of the difficulty of getting them sold, it is not unreasonable to suppose that, with all their energy and industry, it will take two or three years before they can make these lands to any large extent serviceable by a return of money from their sale. These gentlemen have, therefore, at the outset, to lay out an enormous sum of money for equipment, in providing the plant necessary to run that work during the coming three years, and they have, in the next place, to wait for a considerable period before they can receive any return for lands. At the end of the three years all that plant will, of course, be applicable to the other sections. I believe, therefore, the more it is examined injustice has been done, and those who place confidence, late Government, have only to take his own statements which I have read to-night, and that was his estimate of $20,600 per mile for the portion to be constructed was a Pod B. own to be constructed west of Red River, to perceive the advantage of the present proposed arrangement. There is another million they have to put their hands into their pockets to pay us, and that is for the work we have constructed west of Red River and the material we have on hand applicable for the purposes of construction. Under these circumstances, the hon. gentlemen's minds will be relieved to know that we have made the very best division of the money. If the enterprise is to prove anything but a failure there is a great expenditure of money to be made at the very outset in bringing people to this country. I regard this proposal to secure the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway by the agency of the Company as of most vital importance from the point of view that, instead of having to struggle with railway companies in competition for immigrants, we will have a gigantic rail-way company with all its ramifications in the United States, France, Germany, and the British Islands, co-operating with the Government of Canada. But all that will involve a present outlay of a very large sum of money by these gentlemen. The only hope they can have of having any means of sustaining the railway, if it is constructed, is by getting a population as rapidly as possible into the fertile valleys of the North-West and thus furnish the treffic which alone can West, and thus furnish the traffic which alone can support the operation of this railway. I am told that another very objectionable feature is the exemption of the lands from taxation. I have no hesitation in saying I would have been glad if that was not in the contract. If it were only to meet the strong prejudice that exists in this country on that question, I should have been glad if it were not in the contract; but there were two things we had to consider. One was to make the best bargain we could for Canada, and the other was not to impose terms that, without being of any material advantage to the country, would be likely to lead to disaster in the money markets of the world when the prospectus was placed on those markets. Every one will understand that the position in respect to the taxation is not changed in the slightest degree from that in which we were constructing this road as a Government work; when my hon friend was constructing it by direct Government agency, no taxation could have been levied on these lands until they were utilized, until they were occupied. No province, municipality or corporation of any kind existing, or that could be created hereafter could impose the slightest tax on those lands until exempt from taxation because hon gentlemen have only to turn to the laws of the United States, and in reference to has always been that those lines of railway, the road-way, cate, or can sell at prices below the minimum fixed by the Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

the road itself, the stations, everything embraced in the term railway, was exempt from taxation. One of the judges of the courts of the United States declared that as these great lines of road were national works, were public easements, that as they were for the benefit and advancement of the whole country, they should not be subject to any taxation, State or municipal. We have, therefore, only followed the practice that has prevailed in the United States and that which honorable gentlemen opposite will feel was incumbent upon us. What was our position? We were asking these gentlemen to come forward and take a position from which we shrank. I don't hesitate to say that great and imthe more it will be found that in the division of money no portant as the enterprise was, the Government felt it was one of enormous magnitude and trembled almost when not in us, but in the statement of the leader of the they regarded the great cost of construction and the cost of maintenance and operation of the road when constructed. And I ask when we were shifting from our shoulders to the shoulders of a private company all the responsibility, I ask this House in candour to tell me whether they do not think that, as far as we could we ought to have put these gentlemen in as favorable a position for the construction of the road as we occupied ourselves. That is all we have done; and as I have said before, the moment the lands are utilised they become liable to taxation. I have been told that the lands of the Canada Company being free from taxation it was found that they were attended with a good deal that was objectionable.

Mr. MACKENZIE. They were not free from taxation.

Mr. BLAKE. They were only ordinary large landholders.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Oh, it was owned in large blocks. Then the case is not half as bad.

Mr. BLAKE. No; this is much worse.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I suppose it was because they were free from taxation. Well, we have taken care they shall not own, then, in blocks. We have met the difficulty and covered it. But, as I said before, these gentlemen must sell their lands. It is impossible to sustain the road without bringing a population into the country as rapidly as possible. It is said this is a gigantic monopoly. You not only free the lands from taxation until occupied but you create a monopoly. If we have one strong point in our case, it is this, that under the terms of the Allan contract of 1873, 54,000,000 acres of land were locked up, if you call it locked up, by being placed in the hands of a company. Under this contract 25,000,000 acres of land only are to be reserved. Under the Allan contract of 1873, and the terms of the Canadian Pacific Railway Act of 1874, those parties were entitled to have their land in large blocks of 20 miles square, and under this contract the Government have possession of every alternate mile over the whole section and along the whole line of railroad. Can there be any monopely? Why, under the terms of the the Allan contract the Government was bound, as the Government of the United States was bound in relation to the Northern Pacific Railway, to abstain from selling an acre under $2,50. Under this contract, however, we are free to give away every acre that remains in our possession should the public interest warrant it. No policy did the syndicate press more strongly upon us than that of settling the land as fast as we could. They say we could impose the slightest tax on those lands until should be only too glad to plant a free settler upon every pare they were sold or occupied, and when they are sold or occupied now, that moment they are liable to taxation. I will point, that instead of 54,000,000 acres being tooked up in not stop to discuss the question of the road itself being blocks of 20 miles on each side of the road, instead of our being bound to sell at no less than $2,50 sn acre, we can open up to free sottlement the 29,000,600 the construction of those great lines of railway anywhere, to acres the Government retains to utilize in the interest of find that the policy of the Government of the United States | the country, over and above the amount given the Synditerms of 1874. What about the terms of a year ago? Read the resolution Parliament passed here for the appropriation of 100,000,000 acres and you will see how absolutely Parliament placed them at the disposal of the Government, for use in anyway pessible to secure the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Instead of having handed over to a monopoly, as it may be called, those 100,000,000 acres, we held 75,000,000 acres in our own hands to be used for promoting the interest of Canada by free settlement and by sales, to return to us the money required to be paid under the contract, to the Syndicate $25,000,000. As I said before, the question of freedom from taxation of the lands is not new. In 1870 an Act was passed in the United States for the relief of the International Railroad Company, now consolidated under the name of the International and Great Northern Railroad Company, which provides, similarly to what has been enacted as regards other railroad companies in various states of the Union, that the lands of the company shall be free from taxation. The United States Government has given great land grants to railways under what is called the head grant system, and in one case a company was authorized to select any part of the public lands of Texas, that magnificent country that has excited the admiration of hon. gentlemen opposite, the most beautiful and fertile areas, without any hindrance or any responsibility whatever. The company received "20 sections of 640 acres each of the unappropriated lands of the State for each mile of railroad which has been or may hereafter be constructed pursuant to the Act of 1870. The said company, its successors and assigns to have the right to locate the said lands as head rights certificates, without the necessity of alternating the sections; the said lands and certificates to be released from all county, state, municipal and other taxes for a period of twenty-five years." The moment our lands, however, are sold they become liable to taxation. Under that United States law they remain free for twenty-five years after coming into the hands of private purchasers. There is nothing of the kind here. The moment our lands are utilized or sold, and the company cannot afford to keep them from settlement, which will add more to the value of the remainder than is possible in any other way, they fall under taxation. The location of the railway, it appears, is objected But, under the terms of this contract, the location is to be submitted for the approval of the Governor in Council. I do not hesitate to say, that this Company will be much better able to locate the road than the Government. They have a more vital, personal, direct interest in putting it through, and best know how to make it shortest, consistent with its best location. Government cannot give the matter that personal, direct attention within the body of gentlemen as familiar with such works as are the members of the Syndicate. In my judgment, therefore, it is not necessary there should be the restriction this Act provides, that is, that the Governor in Council should have the right of decision; because, I believe, their own interest will compel them to make the best possible location. But, we have provided that, by maintaining a general centrol of the Governor in Council over the work, that not one mile of the road shall be located without their consent. I am told that great objection is made to the power of the Company, to build branch lines. Is the House aware that, in the United States, all the powers given this Syndicate, which comes forward to take the place of the Government and relieve it of responsibility, in regard to this work, are enjoyed by everybody or every company building a railroad. All that such persons require to do, is to organize a company, under the general law, register themselves, and go and build a railroad whereover they like, with such privileges in their favour.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Do the same thing in your North-West. one dollar's aid or one acre of land to construct branch lines Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon, gentleman will see, for the opening up and development of the North-West, that, as to the last objection that can be made to our policy, Well, Sir, it is said that a great enormity has been committed he has anticipated me, because I intended giving him credit for the liberal spirit with which he dealt with the branch lines—I mean by the bill submitted, containing the policy of the late Government, upon which, of course, the Opposition will not go back. In the State of Minnesota—and everywhere else across the line—branch lines can be built by any persons wherever they desire. We have merely given to this Company a power, any and every person can enjoy in the United States. The hon member for Lambton is the last source from which I should have expected opposition to this policy.

Mr. MACKENZIE. What policy?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The policy of allowing the Syndicate the privilege of constructing branch lines in connection with the road.

Mr. MACKENZIE. You prohibit everybody else.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is no such prohibition. This remark is only an evidence of the difficulty, the dilemma in which hou, gentlemen opposite find themselves in. Because they can find no legitimate objections to this policy, they must manufacture them. There is no such provision in the bill-not a line giving a monopoly to those gentlemen, and this Parliament has power to-day and will have power-next year, after they have ratified this policy, to empower any persons whatever to construct lines in any part of the North-West. What did the bill submitted by the Minister of the Interior for the late Government provide with regard to the construction of railroads in the Northwest—a bill which embodied the wisdom of the Government of which he was a member? It first provides that any person may construct a railway in the North-West wherever they choose. They may organize under provisions similar to those under which parties in the United States may construct branch lines. It went further. We have not given these gentlemen a dollar with which to construct branches. We propose to give them the right of way for branch lines free, and shall be only too glad to do so if they run branches from one end of the country to the other. We felt it was in the interest of the country to give them every facility possible for the strengthening of the trunk line and the opening of such volumes of traffic over it as are indispensable to the prosperity of the country, and as must increase the value of our lands beyond any other influence. Not one dollar can they spend in the construction of branches that will not pour large sums into the treasury of Canada, by increasing the value of its lands in their neigh-But the bill of the late Government did not leave borhood. the cost of their construction on the company. The Government generously came to their aid. Everybody could go on and build branches and come with his little bill to the Government for payment. What does the Act say?

"The Governor in Council may reserve every alternate section of ungranted lands to the extent of 10 sections per mile, 5 on each side, exclusive of the sections which, under the Dominion Lands Act, may have been reserved as school sections or allotted to the Hudson Bay Company, for the purposes of this Act."

That was as bonus to these gentlemen for construction of this branch line.

"Or, should the Governor in Council deem it expedient, instead of conveying lands to the Company, the Company may be paid the moneys received from the sales of lands on the line of and within six miles of such railway, from time to time, until the company shall have received a sum not exceeding ten thousand dollars per mile."

Giving a claim to every man who built a mile of it, to come to the treasury of Canada, and demand $10,000, and yet, with this strong declaration uttered on the floor of the House and placed on the public records of the country, they venture to challenge the soundness of the judgment of the Government of Canada to permit parties, without one dollar's aid or one acre of land to construct branch lines for the opening up and development of the North-West. Well, Sir, it is said that a great enormity has been committed by the prohibition to construct lines running in any other direction than a certain one, south-west and west by south-west. Well, Sir, I am a little surprised to hear any such objection, and I shall listen with great interest to the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House if they have any objection of that kind to make. A year ago, Sir, a company with perhaps as strong claims to consideration as it would be possible for any company to have on the Parliament of Canada, came to us for permission to construct a railway. They asked for no money, they asked no aid; they only asked for permission to construct a railway of a certain kind, why did we refuse it? Why, Sir, we were very sorry to refuse it, but, the Government having taken the subject into careful consideration, decided that, inasmuch as Canada was dealing with the construction of the great Canadian · Pacific Railway, and inasmuch as the only hope of maintaining this road, and of operating it after it was built, was to retain the traffic of the Canadian North-West on the trunk line, we came to the conclusion that it was not in the interests of the country, however greatly any section might demand or need it, to construct a line which would carry traffic of the North-West out of our country and leave our trunk line, the Canadian Pacific, which had cost the country such a great sum of money, denuded of the traffic necessary to sustain it Well, sir, that policy was announced and deliberately adopted by the Government, and it was my duty, as the Minister of Railways, to submit it to the small Parliament upstairs, the Railway Committee. That Committee, Sir, embraces a great body of gentlemen on both sides of the House, who are prepared to give great consideration and bring their judgment to bear in relation to the questions. I think that it contains 100 members.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Ninety-five.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The number is 95, I say that is a small parliament, and when I submitted the deliberate judgment of the Government on this point, to refuse, so far as we were able, to allow that charter to pass, the policy of the Government was adopted by that Committee without a single dissentient voice.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I dissented for one.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman says he dissented, then he was greatly misunderstood. I heard no dissent, but more than that, a deputation who came down from Emerson to seek assistance, told me, a short time ago, that they had an interview with the hon. gentleman, and that they could not get any more satisfaction from him than they could obtain from the Government.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I have no power to give assistance.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Then, Sir, all that I can say is, that the hon, gentleman failed in the discharge of the duty of his high position, as one of the leading members of this Parliament, if he, on an occasion when the Government policy on a great national question was submitted before the Railway Committee, retains his opinion to himself, and does not give that Committee the benefit of his judgment and experience.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I firmly expressed my dissent.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Sir, the hon. gentleman does not generally dissent in such a mild way as to prevent me from remembering it; and all I can say is, that if he dissented he did it so gently that it had passed entirely from my recollection, and I hold that this Government, in devolving the duty of constructing the Canadian Pacific Railway on the shoulders of the Syndicate, could not reasonably say, the rights which the Government of Canada maintained and publicly declared they had maintained in the interests of Canada, and in protection of the traffic of the Canadian Pacific Railway, they shall be withheld from you, and now that the possibility of maintaining they became due at four per cent, without a farthing being that traffic is placed upon your shoulders we do not care where the traffic goes. I say that the interest which we have to-day, as Canadians, in that railway in their possession is the same national interest, to bring every pound of the traffic of the North-West which we can bring down through the heart of Canada, and down to the sea board in our own country,—as I trust in no distant day will be the case. Well, Sir, the hon. member brought up the question of rates, the other day, in the speech which he delivered to the House on the Address. I could then quite understand that the hon. gentleman was about to place our anchor to windward, and when the hon gentleman dragged in the question of rates on railways into the discussion the other day, I quite understood that there was a deliberate design in it - to forestall the public mind in relation to this matter. Every person knows the great complaints that have been made owing to the disproportionate rates which have been adopted on railways in the United States running through the praries. But, Sir, what is our position with relation to the matter. Why, Sir, we have taken power by this contract, which, under the Consolidated Railway Act on the Statute book, we do not possess. So far from having yielded anything with relation to rates, the Governor in Council retains power to levy those rates. Not a rate can be collected, not a cent can be collected by that Company for anything on their road, until the Government which is responsible to this House, whoever they may be, have given their sanction to what they believe to be just, and in the interests of the country. And, Sir, having retained the power, what more did we do? Why, Sir, we ascertained that, according to the law, Parliament itself had not the power, after the rate was fixed, to reduce it, unless it could be shewn that the Company were getting fifteen per cent. on their capital. We, in this contract, have changed that, and have deprived the Company of the power, which, under the Consolidated Railway Act, they and every other railway in the country enjoyed, and stipulated a lower rate of profit as the point at which they may be asked to lower their rates. I think, under these circumstances, that the hon gentleman's long discussion on a question that was certainly not before the House was hardly called for.

Mr. ANGLIN. Is the profit to be taken upon the capital of the Company or upon the whole money expended upon the construction of the road, because there is a great difference?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman will be greatly relieved to find that it is not so bad as he had hoped. It is upon the capital they have expended themselves.

Mr. ANGLIN. Under the terms of the contract, for there is a doubt about it?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is a question of law, upon which I will defer to the hon. gentleman. He has the contract before him, and whatever want of confidence I may have in his political sentiments, I have great confidence in his legal ability. I will not require to say anything more about that. I am told that some gentlemen are afraid that difficulty will be caused by the clause of the contract which requires the Government to hold in certain contingencies, which may or may not arise, twenty-five millions of dollars at four per cent. interest. Suppose we had said to the late Minister of Finance a year ago that we expected in twelve months to be in a condition in which, instead of paying five per cent., as we are paying now, we should be able to sell bonds at four per cent. interest without any commission. Suppose we had ventured to fell hon gentlemen that we expect, in twelve months, to be in the condition of being able to obtain all the money that Canada required for its development, and to redeem the bonds issued at five and six per cent. as fast as paid for commission, they would have laughed at us. But it is a fact staring them in the face, and when we entered into the contract we found that we occupied a position that was likely to furnish us with all the money was likely to The ableFinance Minister, we mvtold hethat colleague,  $\mathbf{u}\mathbf{s}$ could handle that twenty-five millions of money in such a way as to be eminently advantageous to the interests of Canada, if he is called upon to hold it, and it was only after learning that that we agreed to take it upon these terms. I think therefore I need hardly detain the House upon that subject. With reference to the telegraph I am told that there is an objection on that point, but surely no person would have expected the Government of Canada to make a contract with a company who were bound to construct in ten years a road from the Red River to Kamloops, and a road from Nipissing to Burrard Inlet, and operate some 3,000 miles of road, without the power to erect and operate a telegraph. Such a thing would, I think, be unheard of, and when I tell the House that instead of having a monopoly the Government of Canada, at this moment, retains the Canadian Pacific Telegraph in their own hands, and that these parties have not acquired a dollar's worth of rights in the telegraph which has been contracted for, at a sum a little in excess of one million of dollars; when I tell the House that we retain the ownership of our own line of telegraph, it will see that unless terms are made for the transaction of general business, and for taking over our lines upon terms in the interest of Canada, we are in a position to carry out and complete our own line and make it a very sharp competition indeed. Now, Sir, I am glad to say that I am able to bring my remarks to a conclusion, but before doing so, I will ask the House to indulge me for a moment whilst I read an extract from the Winnipeg correspondence of the Toronto Globe of November 25th:

"So much has been said and written about the size and fertility of the North-West that it is scarcely necessary to repeat any of it here. Prof. Macoun's recent explorations fully demonstrate the fact that there are about 250,000,000 of acres embraced within Manitoba and the North-West Territories. A mere fraction of this is as yet settled, so that there are still homes in the North-West for millions of people. For two hundred miles west most of the good land has been taken up, but beyond that point there is any quantity of the richestland, much of it not even surveyed. The quality of the soil throughout these territories is almost uniformly good. In many places it is unsurpassed. In the Red River Valley, near Winnipeg, farms have been cropped for fifty years without the aid of manure. Further west the soil is somewhat lighter, but in the opinion of many, better adapted for general farming purposes. There is a considerately the percentage is not large, and much of what is now waste land will be reclaimed by drainage before the country is a generation older."

Now Sir I draw attention to that for the purpose of

Now, Sir, I draw attention to that for the purpose of showing the hon, gentlemen opposite how small a portion of these fertile lands in the great North-West is absorbed by the twenty-five millions of acres which under this contract we give to the Syndicate. I draw the attention of gentlemen opposite to this, because it was one of the subjects of discussion a year ago. I ventured to state from the best authority, for we had expended a large amount of money for surveys, &c., and a number of able men had investigated this subject of the lands of the North-West, that 150 millions of acres of good land lay between the west of Manitoba and the Rocky Mountains, between the 49th and 57th parallels of the north latitude, and hon, members opposite doubted it. Now we find that Professor Macoun, who is one of the most able explorers and one of the best qualified men to form a judgment upon the matter, and who has spent the last season in going over the country, found that that great Missouri section of barren country which was supposed to extend into Canada in the North-West, was in a great measure valuable and fertile land. He found that the idea that it was a desert was an entire delusion and that instead of that a great portion of these lands, thirty millions of acres, which were supposed to be unfit for settlement are largely fit for settlement, and they are included in contract in the lands "fairly fit for settlement." Under these circumstances the House will see that this land has been very much under-estimated. Before I conclude, there is another point that I want to refer to. It is charged against the Government and it is the last charge in the world that I hope any person will ever be able to sustain against them—it is a charge of not being true to the National Policy. If the Government of Canada, with the evidence of the past two years before them, were to be faithless to the National Policy, they would deserve to be driven from power by the execration of every true-hearted Canadian. I say this is about the last charge that should have been made, but I am told that they have given under the contract rights and privileges which are fatal to the National Policy. There is nothing in the law, nothing in the statute book that enables one cent of duty to be collected for anything that has been used for the purpose of constructing the Canadian Pacific Railway. Not one cent.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Did the contractors pay the duty?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Certainly, but they were building the railway for us, and they were paid an amount that it was estimated would pay them for the work they performed, and give them a profit. But every locomotive, every car for the railway that we imported for ourselves, as we have done, could not by any law that is on the statute book be charged with duty. So that there is no ground of complaint upon that point. But, Sir, that is not the contract. The contract provides only for the admission free of duty of all steel rails, fish-plates and other fastenings, spikes, bolts, wire, timber and all materials for bridges to be used in the original construction of the railway and for a telegraph line in connection therewith. Now, Sir, what is the duty collected on now? Steel rails are free under the law.

Mr. MACKENZIE. For how long?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. So long as the steel rails are not manufactured in this country, for the purpose of supplying our own country. The Government felt that the construction of railways was so vitally important to the development of Canada, that they made an exception of steel rails, saying that while steel rails were not manufactured in this country they should be admitted free. Therefore, this limits it to the bolts, nuts, wire, timber and material for Well, Sir, we carefully considered that by admitting iron for bridges free of duty, we would probably have the bridges constructed of iron instead of wood. But is there a member of this House who fails to see that if we had not made such a provision, we only had to import these articles to make them free? I may say that under this contract the position of the industries of Canada and of the National Policy is better than before. The Government intended in this matter, as in everything else, to be true to that great National Policy which lifted Canada out of the condition of depression in which our country was, and placed it in as prosperous a condition as any country occupied, that policy which has increased the credit of our country by changing deficits into handsome surpluses, that policy which has vitalized the industries of Canada, set money in circulation, commercial enterprises in operation and created industries from one end of Canada to the other, to an extent that the most sanguine advocate of the National Policy did not venture to anticipate. We would be faithless to the country and to the position we occupy, if we did not, in everything to which we put our hands, maintain this policy in its integrity that Canada may continue to prosper and flourish as at present. In regard to that question I may say that the Minister of Finance will be prepared to submit a measure to deal with this very point, by which the construction of everything that can be constructed in Canada for the purposes of the Canada Pacific Railway will be provided for in our own country. Now, Sir, I am glad that I shall not be compelled to trespass farther upon the attention of the House. When I rose I expressed the pride Under and pleasure it gave me as a member of the Government of Canada to be able, in the year 1880, to propound to Parliament a measure for its adoption which will secure in ten years the construction of the Pacific Railway, upon terms more favorable than the most enthusiastic friend of the railway had ventured to hope this Parliament would have the opportunity of putting its seal of ratification to. I have read at some length the able and eloquent statements of hon. gentlemen opposite to show that no men are more bound, as honorable and patriotic statesmen, to give this measure their hearty support than those gentlemen themselves. I am glad to know that if ever there were a measure presented for the consideration of this House, worthy and likely to receive its hearty adoption, it is the measure I have the honor of submitting for its consideration. I have the satisfaction of knowing that throughout this intelligent country every man breathed more freely when he learned that the great, enormous, undertaking of constructing and operating the railway was to be lifted from the shoulders of the Government, and the liability the country were going to incur was to be brought within, not over the limit which in its present financial condition it is prepared to meet; within such limits that the proceeds from the sale of the land to be granted by Parliament for the construc-tion of the line, would wipe out all liabilities at no distant day. But this is the slightest consideration in reference to this question. It is a fact that under the proposals now submitted for the Parliament to consider, this country is going to secure the construction and operation of the gigantic work which is to give new life and vitality to every section of this Dominion. No greater responsibility rests upon any body of men in this Dominion, than rests upon the Government of Canada, placed as it is in a position to deal with the enormous work of the development of such a country as Providence has given us; and I say we should be traitors to ourselves and to our children if we should hesitate to secure on terms such as we have the pleasure of submitting to Parliament the construction of this work, which is going to develope all the enormous resources of the North-West, and to pour into that country a tide of population which will be a tower of strength to every part of Canada, a tide of industrious and intelligent men who will not only produce national as well as individual wealth in that section of the Dominion, but will create such a demand for the supplies which must come from the older provinces, as will give new life and vitality to every industry in which those Provinces are engaged. Under these circumstances, we had a right to expect that support, which, in justice to themselves and their position as statesmen, hon. gentlemen opposite should give us. I say, Sir, that looking at this matter from a party point of view—the lowest point of view—I feel that these gentlemen, by following the course they propose, are promoting the interests of the party now in power, just as they promoted our interests when they placed themselves in antagonism to the National Policy, which the great mass of the people desired. But I say I am disappointed at their course. I regret it, notwithstanding that it to the interests of own conduces to the interests of our own party. On past occasions I made the most earnest appeal in my power to those gentlemen to sink on one great national question partizan feelings and to enable both sides of this House and both parties of this country to unite in a great measure that did not require to be dragged down into the arena of party, and which would be promoted, and largely promoted by a combination of both of the great parties in this country. The honorable gentlemen refused to respond to that appeal and, therefore, I will not waste time on the present occasion by pointing out to them how desirable it is now, but I did hope when we abandoned this railway as a Government work, and when it became a commercial under-Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

necessities to place this work on a commercial footing at the earliest opportunity—was that we became aware from the events of the last two sessions that while we dealt with it as a Government railway it was to be dragged down from its high position to the arena of partizan politics. In order to obstruct the Government, in order to prevent our carrying out the policy as we were carrying it out, these gentlemen were driven to assume the unpatriotic attitude of decrying the credit and capabilities of our country and damaging the prospects of this great work. I am glad that we have triumphed over such opposition, and that despite that obstruction we have surmounted the great difficulty—that despite all the obstruction they could throw in our way, the time has come when enlightened capitalists best acquainted with the ressources of Canada are prepared to throw themselves into the construction of this great railway. I say, I was in hope, now that we have abandoned it as a Government work and it is placed on a commercial foundation, that those gentlemen could, without loss of party prestige, unite with us on this great question and on giving to this Syndicate who are charged with this important and onerous undertaking, that fair, handsome and generous support that men engaged in a great national work in any country are entitled to receive at the hands, not only of the Government of the country, but of every patriotic member of Parliament. Sir, I say I have been disappointed, but I hope upon future reflection, at no distant day, when the results of this measure which we are now submitting for the approval of Parliament and which I trust and confidently expect will obtain the sanction of this House, will be such as to compel these gentlemen, openly and candidly to admit that in taking the course which we have followed we have done what is calculated to promote the best interests of the country and that it has been attended with a success exceeding our most sanguine expectations. I can only say, in conclusion, after some five-and-twenty years of public life I shall feel it the greatest source of pleasure that the quarter of a century has afforded me, as I am satisfied that my right hon. friend beside me will feel that it crowns the success of his public life, that while Premier of this country his Government were able to carry through Parliament a measure of such inestimable value to the progress of Canada; so I can feel, if I have no other bequest to leave to my children after me, the proudelegacy I would desire to leave was the record that I was able to take an active part in the promotion of this great measure by which, I believe, Canada will receive an impetus that will make it a great and powerful country at no distant date.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I do not rise, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of following the hon. Minister of Railways either in the way of approval or dissent; but, Sir, I cannot affect to be ignorant of the fact that the allusion which the hon. gentleman made in the course of his speech to some one who had occupied the editorial chair of the Citizen for a day, pointed to me. I have heard some observations of that kind in the lobbies and elsewhere, and from the manner in which the hon. gentleman turned his face, with some fierceness of aspect, in this direction, I assume he meant me.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon, gentleman will perhaps allow me to interrupt him in saying that if I turned my face in that direction, it was with no such intent, and that I had no intention of making a personal application of my remarks to him, as I had not the slightest idea that the hon, gentleman had anything to do with that article.

present occasion by pointing out to them how desirable it is now, but I did hope when we abandoned this railway as a Government work, and when it became a commercial undertaking it would be otherwise; and one of the reasons—one of the great necessities for changing our base – one of the great proprietor of that newspaper, that I should here state that

I did not write a line-indeed have never written a line for that paper, that I am aware of; that I was not cognizant he was going to take the course which he did take, and which, in my opinion, was a very manly one in a newspaper regarded as a party organ. If, in the interest of the country, he thought it right to give the warning he did to his political leaders, it was a manly course to take, but whatever the motives of the proprietor of the Citizen may have been, I had nothing to do with inspiring that article or the criticisms which appeared in its columns on the contract. If they were disingenuous, I did not discover that feature in the comments that I saw. is not unknown to members of Parliament that I do not find myself able to concur in the propositions of the Government with respect to the Pacific Railway. I shall take an opportunity before this debate closes of stating my grounds for that position, and of making such observations as I shall feel it my duty, as an independent member of Parliament, to make. At present there are members on both sides of the House to whom, in the courtesy of parliamentary practice,

Mr. BLAKE. At this late hour of the evening it is quite impossible that I should hope to conclude the remarks which I propose to make in answer to the speech we have been entertained with for some hours, and it is one of the advantages (I do not think altogether counterbalancing the disadvantages) but still one of the advantages of the form of procedure we are now engaged in, that you one proceed a certain distance and can again renew your attention, Sir, to the subject. I shall proceed to such an hour this evening as hon, gentlemen opposite think fit to have an adjournment, and shall not complete the remarks which I wish to make this evening. The hon. Minister of Railways spent two hours and a half of his speech in a discussion in which I do not intend to spend ten minutes. The course of that part of his speech, I venture to observe, was not unfamiliar to us. In fact I heard one of his supporters subsequently say that he always did like that speech of the hon. gentleman, and from his point of view I have no doubt he did. There is, however, one advantage which the hon. gentleman has as Minister of Railways. If there is a certain degree of sameness, in the general line of his speeches on the Pacific Railway, there is always a pleasing variety in the estimates he brings forward from session to session. Whatever flights of fancy fail him in his oratory, he is capable of surprising us by the most extraordinary and alarming performances, whether they be of fancy or of fiction, in the way of estimates for that work. He has not been unequal to himself on this occasion. The hon. gentleman made some variety, as it was proper he should do, in the dressing up of the old dish. He began, upon the last occasion, with an appeal that we should not drag down this debate to the low level of a party discussion, and he ended with that appeal upon this occasion. He reminded us at the close of his speech, this time, of what he commenced it with last time. Sir, I say again that I know nothing in the institution of party which should disentitle any party from taking such a line upon any public question as they conceive the public interest requires; and I say that the moment I am satisfied that the hon. gentleman's notions of what makes a party question, and of the degradation to which a question is submitted by its becoming a party question, are true, I shall abandon the doctrine of party altogether. If I did not believe, as I do in my heart and conscience believe, that the proposal of the Administration, brought down to-day, is not merely fraught with great danger but certain to prove disastrous to the future of this country, which it is principally designed to serve, as they say, I should be glad to give it my support, and it is because I entertain the conviction that the measure is not merely dangerous, but ruinous, that I oppose it at the very outset. The hon. gentleman has said, for his leader and himself, that this is to given two views of the bargain which show that it was one be the crowning glory of their lives. For his leader it is to be the crown placed on the pedestal-though I did not know that it was usual for pedestals to have crowns. The hon, gentleman of whom he spoke, and to whom he attributed this peculiar position of this measure amongst his laurels, has described in still more eloquent and high-flowing terms, his views on the subject.. It seems his interest in the Canada Pacific Railway and his joy and congratulation at the results he achieved in England are by him not expected to end with his earthly career, but that above and beyond, and from, as he modestly said, he hoped a better sphere, among the joys of that life and the avocations and contemplations which will generally engross his attention in that better world, he hoped to be permitted to look down upon his friends the young men of the Club Cartier, travelling from Montreal to the Pacific at the rate of twenty-five miles an hour. Sir, I have read and heard a good many descriptions of the world to come. The Indian's notion of the hereafter and the Mahomeddan's paradise are familiar to us, but it is certainly a new description of one of the joys of the time to come, that an inhabitant of that celestial sphere should be able to look down and see some young fellows travelling on a railway. The hon. Minister himself, speaking of his own share in this great work, hoped he would be able to leave it as a legacy to his children. I hope he will; and that it will be a substantial legacy—one that will enable them, in all time to come, to look back with complacency on this great work of the hon. gentleman's life. But, while these hon, gentlemen are overjoying themselves upon what they have accomplished in bringing down this plan, they seem to me to be rather disposed—judging by the time and the efforts which they have devoted to proving that it does not lie in our mouths to complain, whatever might be the objections to the plan—to doubt whether it be not obnoxious to criticism if only fit critics can be found. They seem inclined to think that something should be said against it, but it is not for us to cast a stone. Well, upon the last occasion on which this question was discussed, I entered upon a history as brief as I could make it, of what I believed was the parliamentary history of the view which had been taken with reference to this undertaking in its financial aspect, in which it has always appeared to me of most importance. I contended that there had been a continuous line decision on the part of Parliament, departed from by no Government and no Parliament, that the work should not unduly press on the taxation of the people, but be proceeded with in a manner which should not increase the existing rate of taxation. That is the keystone of the position so far. That is the view which we have always taken and always sought to enforce. We have contended, and shall contend again, that hon. gentlemen did place this country in a position most unfortunate with reference to this matter; that they did make a bargain the literal obligation of which it was impossible to fulfil, that they did make an arrangement which they ought not to have made, and which events have proved, not merely in letter but also substantially, impossible of fulfilment; because they bargained that the road should be commenced in two years after the time when the bargain was made, in 1870, and finished in ten years—that is, in this year. They bargained that the road should be commenced at the sea-board of the Pacific within two years; and, Session before last, they declared that sufficient information had not even then been reached to decide upon the terminus of the road at the Pacific, which proved that they were utterly wrong in the notion that the road could properly be commenced at the Pacific some eight years ago. They bargained that it should be finished in ten years, and they esteem it the crowning glory of their lives that they produce a contract which indicates that it is to be finished in twenty years. I have thus which, not merely literally but in substance, was incapable of fulfilment. The circumstances so created, and the position in which the country was placed by the making of that bargain, were unfortunate. Enormous expenses were to have been incurred in surveys beyond what would have been necessary, with the view of pressing forward a decision as to the route. It hung over us as a black cloud, and our future was darkened by the idea of the bond to which the hon, gentleman had persuaded a moribund Parliament to sign. We endeavored to adhere to that which had been acceded to in that Parliament—that the rate of taxation should be increased. From time to time, as the hon, gentleman has said, we discussed the subject of the railway. In the first place, until the last Session of Parliament, every statement which has been made, from either side of this House, as to the cost of the Canada Pacific Railway, has been a statement made upon a basis as to the mode of its construction, wholly different from that which is now tendered for our consideration. A first-class road, and not merely a firstclass road in the ordinary sense of the term, but one wholly exceptional in its grades and curves, so far as the traffic bound to the east was concerned, was the object of Parliament and of the country. In so far as my hon. friend, the member for Lambton, proceeded with the construction of that work, he carried out that idea, and he procured for this country, at a very considerably increased expense, and one which. I think, was wisely so increased, a road from Selkirk to Thunder Bay, which, if we can secure that the country and not some monopoly shall have the benefit of it, will give to the produces of the North-West a convenient access to the markets of the world, and give to the manufacturers and exporters of the east a fair ingress to that country. But, Sir, in all the estimates which were made, in all the views which men have taken, in the very theory of the road itself, which was projected as a grand trans-continental highway, which was to carry across this continent the traffic of China and Japan, the idea was that we should have an exceptionally good and high class road. The estimates made for the purpose of ascertaining the cost of a road of that kind are wholly different from the estimates which are proper to the present occasion. The hon gentleman also adverts to some speeches I made. He adverted to a speech I made in 1875, and quoted a portion of it from the "Debates." Well, I am not going to bore the House by reading some of the rest of it. I am very indifferent whether portions of my speeches are quoted without the other parts which are necessary to a proper understanding of them by a Tory land seller or by the Minister of Railways, and I leave to those who take sufficient interest in my proceedings to peruse the speeches, and they will, if fairly read, answer the objections made to them. I have nothing to retract in the speech the honorable gentleman quoted. abide by, as applicable to the then existing state of things—every sentiment expressed in that speech. The honorable gentleman himself, in the course of his remarks, adverted to the wholly changed condition of things. I recognized the other day—if I may be pardoned for following the hon. gentleman's example in alluding very slightly to a previous debate-I recognised, with reference to the changed policy of this Administration, not merely the right, but the bounden duty of the Administration, when conditions changed, to change their policy—to adopt such a policy from year to year as would appear best suited to the conditions as they were existing at the time of the pro-pounded policy. And having acceded frankly to that view, as amply justifying a possible change or vacillation, as amply justifying any proposal the hon. gentleman may make, I am a little surprised that the hon. gentleman may multicating to the public. It seems that the true source of that the brue source of that the true source of the world was from the Minister of the Interior. It is atrange, with that knowledge of the subject which belongs to the and policy, without remonstrance, should propose to apply to this time and these conditions suggestions the Earl of Beaconsfield possesses, that the Minister of the Mr. BLAKE, and observations wholly inapplicable. Sir, we agree with the hon, gentleman that this question has made progress in a number of years. Does anybody suppose that the circumstance that the road from Thunder Bay to Selkirk will be finished in a year or two, is not an important factor in the building of the Pacific Railway? Does anyone suppose that all the work that was done during my hon. friend's (Mr. Mackenzie) Administration, was not important work in the same direction? Sir, I call witnesses—I call the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) himself. I cannot turn to the page in Hansard, but I very well remember the speech he made—aye, it was made since he became a Minister—in which he declared that what my hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie) had done was of more real and practical importance in bringing this work to completion than if there had been work going on in British Columbia. What then? Has the circumstance that this work has been going on to completion nothing to do with the formation of a contract? There is more, Sir. There has been into the Province of Manitoba, not such an immigration as we could have desired, but still a very considerable immigration. There has been a very considerable amount of information acquired as to that territory. Hon. gentlemen will not deny that, because their own estimates of the fertile belt have varied from year to year. From year to year we are getting more news. We find according to the reports that there is a great deal more and a great deal better land, that there are far smaller spaces of infertile land mingled with our fertile land than we found before. Well, this is delightful news. Does it not alter the conditions—make the prospects of the country brighter—make everything connected with the letting of the contract for the Pacific Railway differ from what it was formerly? If it has any effect it must have that Then the attention of England and Germany, the hon. gentleman says, has been more and more directed to the subject of the North-West-circumstances favored that. The difficulties which existed in England in connection with the competition in cereals and in meats, added to the unfortunate recurrence of two or three very bad harvests consecutively, have produced a state of things which have led the people of Britain to look this way. And then the hon, gentleman says, there has been a stroke of geniusthe greatest stroke of genius which any Minister ever displayed—by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Pope, Compton). Well, I am quite free to admit that my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture is a very genial man, but there is a great difference between a genial man and a great genius, and I think he would hardly apply to himself the compliment that has been paid to him. The step taken by my hon, friend was, I thought myself, a very good step, but to apply to it the high-flown epithet of a great stroke of genius, is, it seems to me, rather covering the hon. gentleman with ridicule than placing him in his proper position with reference to that matter. Well, it had a great effect, they say; it placed the country in such a light that we may expect a large immigration into that country. Does that not alter the circumstances; does it not make the Pacific Railway a more promising undertaking, and therefore is not that to be considered when we are considering whether any contract for its construction is to be approved by Parliament? Then there was a great circumstance which now for the first time we are informed of-a conversation between Lord Beaconsfield and the Minister of the Interior. It seems that it was from the Minister of the Interior that Lord Beaconsfield derived that information which he supposed he was faithfully communicating to the public. It seems that the true source of Interior should have been unable to make intelligible to the Earl of Beaconsfield the true state of things, and should have put him in such an unfortunate and ridiculous-such a laughable position as he occupied when he made that statement. This reminds me a little of some other works of Earl Beaconsfield, of some of those fascinating portraits that we find in Endymion, in which things are very much mixed, and you are expected to make of a picture that represents half of one man and half of another, some sort of an incongruous whole. However that may be, it is said that the effect of these statements, accurate or inaccurate, was very great, that they did great things for the country, that they attracted the attention of England and the world, as it never had been attracted before, to Canada; and therefore that the condition of things was brighter and improved, that we were more and more in a position to make a good arrangement for the construction of the Pacific Railway. The hon gentleman seemed to believe that he had laid the foundation of Lord Beaconsfield's permanence in office, but the foundation that he laid was rather overturned by the broader foundation laid by Mr. Gladstone. But, he says, this season at any rate we acted, and he made some informal questions and suggestions, and gave us some desultory information. Well, I have no doubt hon gentlemen opposite would not do anything less when they went across the water than see the Colonial Secretary and other members of the English Government, and do what they could to represent this country in its brightest light, but I am rather inclined myself to believe that Charles Parnell and the state of Ireland have more to do with the announcement of the new policy of the English Government, than Sir Charles Tupper and Sir John Macdonald.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is another Charles.

Mr. BLAKE. Yes, quite another Charles. A complete change, the hon, gentleman said, had taken place in England as to Canada, a complete change had taken place in public sentiment at large as to the value of the lands in the North-West, that change had been largely promoted by the success, the remarkable success, of the enter prising proprietors of the St. Paul and Manitoba Railway. Against these gentlemen I have not a single word at present to say. What I have to say, with reference to that corporation, I will say later on, and it will be nothing that would not apply, so far as I know, to most corporations in similar circumstances; but I am heartily glad to hear such words of laudation and praise and confidence in the proprietors of that enterprise as fell from the lips of the hon. Minister. There are recorded in the "Debates" to which the hon. gentleman so repeatedly refers, some less pleasing sentiments with reference to one of the most important infinential, wealthy, active and intelligent of those corporators. I could find it stated by one hon. gentleman, on the floor that he was a liar, and by another hon. gentleman that he was a coward. Well, now we find he is all that is good. I always thought these epithets were undeserved, not merely violations of the courtesy and dignity of Parliament, but wholly undeserved and unwarranted. I am glad to hear that the hon. gentleman now absent, who was thus stigmatized, is to-day vindicated by the hon. the Minister of Railways, who has given him such a good testimonial, because amongst the lot I do not suppose he is left out in the cold. I suppose in the wholesale compliment that has been paid, no one of these corporators has been left out. Well, I remember a great many other remarks that were made at that time against the proprietors of that railway company, irrespective of the slightly personal observations to which I venture to allude. I remember when we were told that they were unpatriotic, that the late hon member was unpatriotic for interesting himself in an American railway and that he was acting against the interest of Canada in the any means of judging of the hon. Minister's former estimate.

conduct of that railway. I never believed that there was any hon, member of this House, even any hon, member who expressed those sentiments, who would not have jumped at the chance of being in the shoes of the member thus spoken of if he had the offer of getting a share of the fortune which the late hon, member had by his pluck, skill and tact, acquired in this enterprise. I thought those observation entirely unjust. I believe that any of us would be quite disposed to find our fortune, even if it was south of the boundary line, and would not feel ourselves by patriotie motives deterred from making a few hundred thousand dollarso although we could not make them within the limits of thi, country. I believe that in the conduct of their business these gentlemen have acted just as all persons in such business do act. They have acted with reference to their commercias interest; and, I believe, in dealing with them or any othel corporation, we shall have to consider the question or interest, as concerned in the management of human affairsf as a tolerably constant, certain, and important quantity, Now, the hon gentleman declared that he had got some. fresh estimates. Last year we were brought, as I have stated, for the first time, face to face with a new proposal as to the style of the construction of the Canada Pacific Railway, and the hon gentleman brought down his Chief Engineer's report as to what, according to that new style of construction, the different sections would cost. Before the hon, gentleman made that statement I had requested my hon. friend from Lambton, who, as the hon. gentleman has rightly said, was thoroughly familiar with this subject, viewed in the light in which we had viewed it up to that day, to reconsider the whole question of cost, according to the old style of construction, and to come to a conclusion as to what according the advice of the engineers should be the estimate of cost. The hon, gentleman hoped to find some divergence between the views of the hon. member for Lambton and myself; but I stated to the House that my estimates were those of the hon, member for Lambton.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. You are wrong in saying, I hoped to find a difference of opinion. I was delighted to find that you agreed.

Mr. BLAKE. Well, the hon. gentleman foared to find some divergence between myself and the hon. member for Lambton, although I had stated to the House that these estimates were not my own, but those of the hon. member, which I adopted in full confidence that they were as good estimates as could be prepared for the construction of that railway according to that style. But the hon gentleman, reading my speech, and reading the speech of the hon. member for Lambton, made a contrast between that speech, as containing those estimates of that class of road, and the proposal which he brings down for our approval, and we heard from the hon. gentleman quite a disingenuous criticism. I will not apply the word disingenuous—I will not say it is misleading—but I will say that the hon. gentleman fell into an unfortunate error when he forgot, in making that comparison, that the conditions were wholly different. I stated in my speech expressly that I had no material for criticising or forming a judgment upon the estimates that the Minister brought down, that that estimate was one upon which I had no grounds for a judgment, that the statement was that the road was to be made as cheaply as possible to safely carry people over it, with sharp curves, heavy gradients, and as light a system of construction as the works could by any possibility be made. Read the description in the contract, read the description in Mr. Fleming's letter, read the hon. Minister's own statement of the route and contrast its subject matter with my hon. friend's estimates, and you will find that to compare the prices of one with the prices of the other is to propose that copper and gold should be valued by their weight as of equal value. Now, I have not to-day

DECEMBER 14.

I said then that we required to know the details of these estimates before we could form a judgment, various details as to the grades and curves, and details upon the most important question of all-what will it cost after you have built your cheap and unsatisfactory road to convert it in due season into a first-class road. My own approbation, given as it was to the Minister's scheme, was guarded by the declaration that it was impossible to form an independent judgment upon the propriety of that scheme without that knowledge; so that, whether as to the cost or as to the propriety of the scheme, I never have had an opportunity to form a judgment nor to express any accurate opinion at all. It was even less than a year ago I uttered that speech, but even, if it had been, as the Minister observed, a whole year ago, I should be disposed to adhere to it. I find nothing in those estimates at all inconsistent with the views I entertain to-day with reference to the gentleman's statement; and if I did find anything inconsistent, if I did believe that I erred in any statement I had made in that speech, I hope that I know enough of my duty to confess my error and act upon my present judgment, whatever that may be. I have not yet been able to find that there was any error in the estimate I then made, or in any other suggestion of the speech. I did say I thought these estimates had been brought down rather suspiciously and for a purpose. At that time the object of the hon. gentleman was to show that this road could be well constructed by the Government in the mode in which they are proposing to construct it, at a small cost and with but little charge to the country, and with that view he laid before us the two sides of the account. He showed us first of all what money he was going to ask us to expend, and, secondly, what he was expecting to receive from the lands and he proved as I admitted, if his premises were true, that we might safely and cheerfully proceed at once to construct not merely the middle and the west but also the eastern link. I stated that, and I stated also that if the hon. gentleman's views were correct as to the routes and cost, it would be all right to go on with the road as it was. 'Well, the hon. gentleman was satisfied then that he was right; he finds now that he has erred, he finds that having attempted upon that occasion to procure the very lowest estimate that could be procured of the cost, and calling upon the engineer, as he did by the letter of the 15th of April, which is in the report of the engineer, to make an estimate of a very cheap road. the cheapest road that could be built, and pointing out to him the element of reduction in cost which occurred to him to be important, he got the figures down to a point which was surprising to us all. But we had not the materials for judging of the accuracy of the estimate. His estimate embraced the Thunder Bay link, the Prairie link, and the British Columbia section; but we hear him to day informing us that he was all wrong in that estimate as to these links that the estimate was too high. As nearly as I can calculate, at the moment, there is a sum of about four millions and a quarter to be saved from glancing at the figures.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I estimated for equipment as well as for the construction of the road.

Mr. BLAKE. I am quite aware, although the hon. gentleman omitted to mention it in his speech to-night, that that must have been one of the grounds of reduction, although he applied the whole reduction to savings. I was about to call his attention to that fact and ask him whether that was not an element in reduction, but I may add that it could not have been a very serious element in reduction, Mr. BLAKE, estimate was of the most modest proportion. It is declared in the papers that the estimate for the equipment was not for the permanent running of the road but only such as might be necessary for the traffic which was expected immediately on its opening. The hon, gentleman will find that I am correct in saying that the engineer's estimate for the Pembina branch, as found in the letter of the 16th of April, is not based on a full equipment.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. From Fort William to Selkirk, I estimated a full equipment, and a very light equipment from Red River westward.

Mr. BLAKE. The Engineer says: "Whatever the increasing traffic of future years may demand in the way of terminal accommodation and rolling stock, I am confident the line can be opened for traffic between Fort William and Selkirk, and well equipped for the business which may then be expected, at a cost not exceeding $17,000,000." It is quite clear he did not mean a full equipment, but an adequate equipment which would serve a population of a few thousands which were producing hardly any surplus grain for export. I am not complaining of that; I think it is a very business-like arrangment to limit the equipment relatively to the wants of the road. I asked the hon. gentleman then, but he would not vouchsafe the information, what was the cost per mile of the estimated equipment for any of these sections, and I know not therefore how much of the reduction of which he now speaks may be a legitimate reduction But the equipment of the rest of the line was to be of the very sughtest character; it was a nominal sum that had been placed for the equipment of the Yale-Kamloops section, if any sum, and therefore almost all the reductions on that section and on the prairie and Port Moody sections would be on actual ascertainment that these estimates so given, prepared with the view to bringing the cost down to the lowest point, had failed wholly of that object, and had presented a condition of affairs entirely different from the truth. But what amazed me was, that while I found the hon. gentleman, with reference to these portions of the work which the Government is about to construct, triumphantly pointing out the errors in his estimates and taking credit to himself for the proposition that he was able to save four or five millions more, he was rather disposed, with reference to the central section and the eastern section, to adopt the estimates of my hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie) applicable to a high class railway. Now, is the House going to imagine that those engineers who over-counted the cost of the line from Thunder Bay to Selkirk, then in a fair way of being completed, with reference to which it was most easy, one would judge, to have found a just estimate, who over-counted the cost of the Yale-Kamloops section. who over-counted the cost of the Yale-Moody section, is the House going to suppose that they under-estimated instead- of over-estimated the cost of the other portions of the line? Is it true that while Mr. Fleming made a mistake and told us that it would cost us $32,500,000 to do what costs under the new, the revised estimates, perhaps $29,000,000 at the outside—is it true, I say, that while he erred by way of exagthe estimate of the hon. gentleman upon these items out of the sum of $32,500,000. Ido not profess to speak accurately, for I had not an opportunity, except for an instant, of the Government, that he erred by way of deficiency as to the parts that are to be handed over to the Syndicate, or that the engineer's over-estimate prevails throughout the line? Just the same reason applies to those other sections; just the same views apply. He over-estimated as to the east, he over-estimated as to the middle; he over-estimated as between Red River and Kamloops; he over-estimated as between Nipissing and Thunder Bay, just as he over-estimated on the other points; and therefore I think we may fairly say that we have this test of the cost of this line as proposed to be constructed in the minds of the Government, or which was in their minds whenbecause with reference to equipment the hon. gentleman's they let this contract. If it be true, as a matter of fact, that the estimates of last year have proved to be erroneous, not by being too small, but by being too great, then the cost of the whole line is to be reduced by the same amount approximately to by eleven or twelve per cent.; that is the result, and what was to cost, according to the Minister's estimate, in full, including surveys and all, $86,000,000—but as this reduction applied only to those particular parts, we will say $82,000,000—would be reduced by the sum of nine or ten millions of dollars in all. That is the result of the hon. gent'eman's estimates; he has nothing to do with our estimates, even if our estimates had to do with his line. Our estimates have not to do with his line. They have to do with a line of an entirely different character, but if they had to do with his line, his proposition is to be defended, not upon our errors of judgment, but upon his own correct judgment. His proposition is to be defended upon the basis which he himself makes for it, and he cannot prop it up by mistakes—if mistakes there were—on the part of his opponents. He did not believe in our judgment; he did not act upon it; he said it was all nonsense, and pursuaded Parliament he was right, and went on. Now, he says: "It is true I erred;" and he says: "I erred by extravagance of estimate. I did not err in your direction; I erced in the other direction." Now, he suggests that this error applies only to those parts of the road which the Government, under an arrangement not dreamed of at that time, and consummated the other day, is itself to build; and as to the parts of the road which the Syndicate is to build, the hon. gentlemen says: "But I won't talk of my own estimates of last year; I won't talk of my estimates of last year, reduced on the same basis as I reduced this, but I will apply to them the estimates which I ridiculed last year, applicable to the higher-class road of my hon, friend from Lambton." The hon, gentleman says that the Syndicate are to be judged as to their part of the work by the Opposition's estimate of the higher-class road; that the Government is to be judged as to its part of the work by its reduced, and then again reduced, estimate of its part of the road. It will not do. He has got to take his estimate for all or none, and the House and the country will not believe that such an extraordinary fact took place as that these mistakes were made only as to these particular links in the line, and that a different mode of calculation was adopted as to other parts of the line. Therefore, if that applies, that confidence which the hon. gentleman expects and which, I have no doubt, a majority of this House will afford him, in his statements as to the parts that the Government is going to build, will inevitably bring the original to this conclusion that, granted that the part that the syndicate is to build is substantially of the same class, the estimates of last year are to be reduced in the same proportion, and that, therefore, the work which they have to do and the money they have to spend is diminished by several more millions than the work that the Government has to do is diminished by the hon. gentleman's calculations. Now, that is the true situation. What have we to do with any former estimates made by any man or by any Government? We have to do with the estimate which in the belief of the Government, impressed by them upon the House, by them adopted and by them said to-day to err only in excess—the estimate which they brought forward as being the real cost of this work—that is what it is to be judged by. That is what is meant if their action is to be judged by it. Suppose, for example, that the hon. gentleman had brought down a proposal to pay $120,000,000 in cash to the Syndicate for the construction of this road of this class, and said to Parliament, "It is true, gentlemen, that last year I told you this road would cost only $86,000,000; I found I made a mistake, and, in point of fact, it will cost only $76,000,000. I have contracted for its construction at $120,000,000, but my all sufficient defence is mittee, because the hon. gentleman does not appear to that the member for Lambton thinks it will cost $120,000- place reliance on his own views, I will give the Committee

000, and, therefore, you will at once agree with me that I was justified in giving the Syndicate the difference," and that is practically the argument of the hon, gentleman; that is practically his defence, in so far as the question of estimates upon the contract he has made. The hon. gentleman went to work to make contrasts, and here again circumstances wholly differ. He talked of the values of lands. He alluded to speeches which had been made by hon, members at various times with reference to the selling values of lands in the North-West. He referred to a speech of mine made at the time the Foster contract was under discussion, in which I expressed my own opinion then as to the value of lands in the North-West to the contractor at that time. What was the condition of things? This was not a contractor, Mr. Chairman, who was about to build a railway through the lands which he was to receive. This was not a contractor who was about to receive lands through which a railway was presently, or, as far as he knew at all, about to be built. This was a contractor who, at that time, was to receive lands in the North-West where there was no present prospect of there being a railway at all, and it was with reference to that country, at that time, with its then population, with the then estimation as to the fertile area, with the views of English and foreign people about it, with the then prospects of railway communication, with the circumstances that the contractor was not to be able to utilize and make marketable the lands by building the railway through them, that that opinion was expressed. Sir, I do not hold myself bound, to-day, as to the present condition of things in the North-West by any opinion, as to lands, expresed at that day, and on the then condition of things in that country. I have evidence on this subject—evidence which I shall read to the House—evidence which, I think, will convince the House that the hon. gentleman, in this particular, as in the former particular, resorted to a wholly indefensible mode of argument when he proposed to falsify his own estimates of the value of lands in the North-West, by reading the views of other gentlemen, expressed many years before, as to their value, and asking us to assume them to be true for the purpose of judging his contract. Now, Sir, let me, before I go further, point out a gross error in the suggestions which have been made with reference to the value of blocks of railway lands. Both the former propositions which involved the construction of this railway by the money grant and the subsidy of lands, were based upon one common view, that the money should be relatively a small amount, and that the lands should be relatively a large quantity. This proposition differs in that cardinal particular from those, not indeed, as I shall show, that the lands are of a small amount, but the money and the money's worth are of a very large amount, but I am at present concerned simply in elucidating the one proposition. The hon, gentlemen opposite have spoken of 50,000,000 acres to be given under the original proposition of the late and present Government, and of fifty-four and fifty-five millions of acres of railway lands to be given under the Pacific Railway Act of 1874—they have talked of these larger blocks of land as if they were worth, and to be estimated acre for acre, as much as a block of 25,000,000 acres of railway lands, and they have said: "If you value 25,000,000 acres of land at $1.00 per acre, that is $25,000,000; then 50,000,000 acres of land are, of course, worth $50,000,000. No such thing, Sir; far different. $25,000,000 in money you add another $25,000,000, the second $25,000,000 is after all just as valuable. It will buy us as much as the first. But if to 25,000,000 acres of lands, relatively close to the railway, you add 25,000,000 relatively far distant from the railway, you give an equal acreage, but you give by no means an equal value. It does not need argument to demonstrate that, but I will give to the Com-and the country proof that will be satisfactory. In the first Session of this Parliament the hon. gentleman brought down a policy for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway by the appropriation of 100,000,000 acres of land for that purpose, and the Government took authority to sell that tract of land at a price not less than two dollars an acre. During the recess they fully considered the mode by which they would utilize the enormous powers with which this House clothed them, and they came to the conclusion, which, whether its exact figures be correct or not is immaterial, but which in substance was indisputably correct, that they had made a mistake in suggesting a price of two dollars, and that the proper way to realize out of this 100,000,000 of acres an average price of two dollars was to graduate the price of the lands in relation to their proximity or remoteness from the line of railway; to sell those which are close at a high rate, and those which are outside at a low rate. So satisfied were they that this view would commend itself to Parliament, that they took-and I do not greatly blame them for it—the grave responsibility of forming a plan, and actually proceeded to advertise the sale of their railway lands under that resolution, upon terms which handed over very nearly one-half of the whole 100,000,000 acres at a price of one dollar an acre instead of two, and yet, Sir, upon terms which would produce, upon the average of the whole sales, not merely two dollars, but $2.13 an acre for the whole hundred millions. How was that achieved, the hon. gentleman asked? I do not know whether or when the Minister found out he was all wrong about it, but he said that the lands within five miles on each side of the railway were, worth five dollars an acre. Because it was close to the railway. said that the fifteen miles outside on each side of this, making two strips aggregating thirty miles, were worth four dollars. Why not worth five? Because it was a little further off. Why worth four? Because, after all, it was pretty near. He said that the twenty miles belt on each side of this fifteen miles belt, making two strips of twenty miles each, were worth three dollars an acre, graduated according to distance. He said that another belt of twenty miles on each side of the last-mentioned belt was worth two dollars an acre. Why two dollars? Because it was further off; and he said that two belts of fifty miles in the extreme outside were worth only one dollar an acre, because they were so far from the railway. Now, if you go to work, having made your arrangements and assigned your values—having decided what the relative values are, conditioned by the proximity of the lands to the railway-if you go to work to ascertain what is the value of 25,000,000 acres to be taken as close, the alternate block system will allow to the railway, you will ascertain certain figures, and then, having taken those obviously at the higher range, you will have to go to work to get other 25,000,000 to make up the 50,000,000, and you go outside for it; and equally obviously you will have to take them at the lower rate of value, and so I have demonstrate of the contract of the strated without referring to exact figures, that both by reason and by your own determination, 50,000,000 acres of land to be taken in alternate blocks, as close to the railway as 50,000,000 could be found, would not be worth, acre for acre, anything like as much as 25,000,000 acres taken as close as that smaller aggregate could be taken. The precise figures I shall give the Committee presently. Well, then, I prove to you that in this particular the hon. gentleman is wholly wrong when he compares the former proposition for the construction of this road, which involved the cession of very large areas of land with the outer or surplus parcels remote from the railway, with the present proposal. The twenty-five millions added are not equal the two proposals. to Mr. BLAKE.

have to be also considered. Take the one upon which I have already dilated, the class of the road. Were the former proposals to build this kind of road? Not at all. They were to build a high-class railway; and of course we gave the appropriate price, and therefore you cannot compare the proposals for the construction of the one kind of road with those for the construction of the other, unless you decide what the proper difference in the price of the two kinds of roads is. Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, at this advanced hour the Committee would prefer to adjourn as it would take me some time to complete my remarks.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I suggest that when the hon. gentleman has fully dealt with this branch of the subject, we should adjourn.

Mr. BLAKE. It will take me some time to complete my remarks on this subject.

The Committee then rose and reported.

House resumed; and (at 11:45 p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 15th December, 1880.

ADMISSION OF MEMBERS ON CERTIFICATES OF RETURNING OFFICERS.

Mr. LANGEVIN moved :-

That, in admitting Louis Arthur McConville, Esq., elected to represent the Electoral District of Joliette, to take his seat upon the certificate of the Returning Officer, this House still recommends a strict adherence to the practice of requiring the production of the usual certificate of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery of the return to the writ of election.

Mr. ANGLIN said it was about time that the House ceased to make that solemn declaration in cases of this kind. Session after Session, sometimes two or three times in a session, the House solemnly declared it would never again admit members on certificates of returning officers, and if the practice was continued the Journals would be filled with resolutions of that character. It was for the consideration of the House whether it should not omit that solemn declaration, requiring, however, an Order of the House for the admission of the member on the production of the certificate of the returning officer.

Mr. BLAKE said it was desirable that the House should make an Order before the member was introduced. It was putting the cart before the horse for the member to be introduced and ordered by the House to take his seat in defiance of the rule, and then for the House to declare that the breach of the rule was not to form a precedent. He was not objecting to the adoption of the motion, but merely suggesting that a change was desirable.

Mr. LANGEVIN agreed with the hon. leader of the Opposition that it would be better to change the custom of Parliament in that respect, but the course proposed in the resolution had always been followed. The House should adopt the motion in this instance, and, perhaps, the subject might subsequently be considered by the Committee of Privileges and Elections, and on a report being made, the practice might be changed.

Mr. ANGLIN. Another strange fact with regard to the mode of proceeding is this: under our system the members are sworn in before the Clerk. The Clerk in this case, as in many others, must have assumed to himself the right to in value to the inner twenty-five millions common determine that the member was duly elected before he All the other conditions administered the oath and permitted him to sign the roll. In all cases hereafter we should follow the Rules of the House. The House should first order that the member may be admitted on the production of the certificate, and then, the certificate having been produced, the Clerk may fairly administer the oath. I hope the whole matter will be readjusted so that these contradictions may not occur.

Motion agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. VANASSE introduced a Bill (No. 2) to regulate the floating of cordwood on the River St. Francis.

GROSSE ISLAND.

Mr. LANDRY enquired, whether it is the intention of the Government to construct during next season, a semaphore on Grosse Island where the Quarantine Station is situated, with connection at the village of Montmagny and Crane Island?

Mr. POPE (Queen's). The Government has not yet decided to place a semaphore at the place referred to.

CARRIAGE OF FREIGHT OVER THE INTER-COLONIAL.

Mr. RICHEY enquired, whether the statement that goods per S.S. Polynesian, which had arrived at Halifax a fortnight ago, were, on the 7th instant, still undelivered at Quebec, is correct; and, if so, what precautions, if any, have been taken to preclude the recurrence of such inconvenience; also, whether any, and what guarantee is offered as to the time within which, after receipt by the Intercolonial Railway of goods landed by steamships at Halifax, such goods will be delivered at Quebec, Montreal and Toronto, respectively.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I beg to say, in reply to the question of the hon. member for Halifax, that, seeing his notice on the paper, I placed myself in communication with the officers of the Intercolonial Railway, and I will read for the information of the hon. gentleman and the House the answers I received. They are as follows:—

By Telegraph from Moncton, N.B., to C. Schreiber.

OTTAWA, Dec. 14th. 1880.

I have now ascertained that there were no goods for Quebec landed by the Polynesian at Halifax, with the exception of one parcel for Allans, Rae & Co., which was handed to the Express Officer by Cunard & Co. The first portion of the Polynesian's freight for Quebec via Boston, only reached Quebec on the evening of Thursday, the ninth, nineteen days after the steamer had touched at Halifax. None of the Polynesian's freight for Montreal reached there in less than two weeks from Boston.

(Signed) D. Pottinger.

By Telegraph from Moncton, N.B., to C. Schreiber.

OTTAWA, Dec. 14th, 1880.

Mr. Richey has the story wrong end foremost. The detention to the Polynesian's cargo was to that portion landed at Boston for Quebec, and not what was landed at Halifax. All the goods landed at Halifax have been sent through promptly. I am getting the particulars and will telegraph you again.

INTERCOLOGIAL RAILWAY, OTTAWA, Dec. 15, 1880.

DEAR SIS,—Referring to enquiry yesterday respecting alleged delay to Polynesian's cargo, I beg to inform you that the Polynesian arrived at Halifax at 9.50 a.m. on the 21st November, and discharged seven tons of freight for G. T. Ry. stations—no freight was landed at Halifax for Quebec. The steamer sailed from Halifax for Boston on 22nd, reached there on evening of 23rd, and docked on 24th. The first portion of her Quebec freight reached destination on 8th December, p.m., and the Montreal cargo about two weeks after her arrival in Boston. Had the Quebec and Montreal cargo been landed at Halifax, it would have reached destination about the same time that the steamer was docked in Boston, 155 haurs), and the Montreal cargo, under ordinary circumstances, ten hours later.

From these facts you will readily perceive the advantages which shippers would gain by landing the Canadian cargo at Halifax.

(Signed) GEO. TAYLOR.

E. Schungen, Esq., Chief Engineer Government Railways. I trust these explanations will be satisfactory to the hon. member.

SUPREME COURT ACT.

Mr. DESJARDINS enquired, whether it is the intention of the Government during the present Session, to bring in a measure for the repeal of the Act establishing the Supreme Court; and if not, whether it is their intention so to amend that Act as to remove the inconvenience resulting as respects the Province of Quebec, from its present constitution and jurisdiction?

Mr. McDONALD (Pictou). It is not the intention of the Government, during the present Session, to bring in a measure for the repeal of the Act establishing the Supreme Court. As to the second branch of the question, whether it is the intention of the Government so to amend the Act as to remove the inconvenience resulting as respects the Province of Quebec, that subject is now receiving the anxious consideration of the Government.

SMOKED HERRING INSPECTION LAW.

Mr. LONGLEY enquired, whether it is the intention of the Government to amend in any way the General Inspection Law passed last Session, more especially in relation to the inspection fee on smoked herring?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Act was passed only last Session, and it is almost too early to begin to think of amending or repealing it. No applications have been received by the Government or complaints made respecting it during the recess. However, we will be very glad to hear the hon, member on the subject of the fee again this Session.

DOMINION HEALTH STATISTICS.

Mr. STRANGE enquired, whether it is the intention of the Government to insert a sum in the Estimates for 1881-2 for the purpose of establishing a Board of Statistics relating to health for the Dominion?

Mr. POPE (Compton). It is not the intention of the Government to place any such sum in the Estimates this year.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex) called the attention of the Government to the necessity of appointing a Committee on the Official Report of the Debates at an early day. One or two matters had already arisen calling for the intervention or advice of the Committee, and it was inconvenient for the reports to be allowed to run on without some direction by a committee, if it was the intention of the Government to have a committee appointed.

Mr. BOWELL said he would take the earliest opportunity of submitting a motion, and no doubt the House would permit a motion to be made without the usual notice having been given.

PACIFIC RAILWAY MAPS.

Mr. CHARLTON called the attention of the Minister of Railways to the desirability of having a map upon a large scale displayed in a conspicuous place in the Chamber, in order that members might be enabled better to understand the question under discussion.

Mr. PLUMB. So that he who runs may read.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER said there was no place in the Chamber where a large map could be displayed. He thought the position in which the large map had been placed in the Railway Committee room would give every hon, member an opportunity of ascertaining exactly the position of the various lines as far as they could be delineated.

Mr. CHARLTON asked if another map, on a smaller scale, could be hung on the walls of the Chamber.

Mr. PLUMB. We are dealing with this question on a large scale.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER said there was no other map prepared, except the ordinary railway map in the possession of members, which would be altogether too small to secure the object the hon. gentleman has in view.

SURVEYS ON THE INTERCOLONIAL.

Mr. LANDRY moved for copies of the report on the survey made in 1880, by order of the Government, with a view to the construction of a branch of the Intercolonial Railway to lead by way of St. Michel or St. Charles to the terminus at St. Joseph de Lévis, or the neighborhood thereof; and of all plans, maps, petitions and documents in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

DOMINION SURVEYS.

Mr. LANDRY moved for a statement showing, in separate and distinct columns, the names of the several Dominion Surveyors employed between the year 1873 and the 15th December, 1880, on surveys of public lands elsewhere than in their respective provinces; their ages, their nationality, origin and residence (locality, county and province); the number of days, months or years they were so employed; the amount of their salaries, or of the sums received by them, or due them up to this date; the names of the provinces in which such surveys were made, together with a summary showing, by provinces and nationalities, the number of surveyors now working in British Columbia, Manitoba and the North-West.

Motion agreed to.

FRENCH COPIES OF THE PACIFIC RAILWAY CONTRACT.

Mr. CASGRAIN, in moving for the printing in the French language of 3,250 copies of the Canadian Pacific Railway contract, said: In making this motion, I do not believe that I am asking for any exceptional favor for the Province of Quebec. It is well known that in that Province the newspapers, not having as wide a circulation as those of the other Provinces, are in consequence not so generally read. Moreover, the size of the greater part of our papers is so small that the details of the contract are not so easily made known as in the other Provinces, where all these details are published in a great number of journals. That is why I deem it my duty to make this motion, in order to be able to send to the different counties of the Province of Quebec copies of the contract, so as to make it as widely known as possible. It is known that in the Province of Quebec public opinion is led in a great measure by a few persons in each county, and that these persons, on receiving the contract and on taking cognizance thereof, will impart it to others, and thus we will be able to obtain an expression of public opinion in a great number of localities. On the other hand, I have hastened to take the most favorable steps in order to procure these copies as speedily as possible, and I propose, if the Government will consent to it, to follow up this motion with another, by which I shall ask that the rules of the House be suspended so that the House may order the immediate printing and distributing of these copies, instead of referring the matter to the Committee on Printing. I do not think that I shall meet with any opposition to so legitimate a request on the part of the members of the Province of Quebec; on the contrary, I am of opinion that the Government should be the means of dissipating an impression that may have Mr. CHARLTON, contract. I should think that the House would pass this motion without difficulty, as the cost of the printing of these copies will be relatively trifling, for it is likely that the type used in printing the contract is still standing, and consequently, in a very short space of time—say to-morrow or the next day—we could have the copies asked for.

Mr. HOUDE. It often happens that the hon. member for l'Islet, expresses ideas so profound that it is not always easy to get at the bottom of them. But in this case, I flatter myself that I catch my hon. friend's meaning. He no doubt wishes, by this request, to make up for the negligence of the organs of his party which have failed to publish the contract in extenso; or, perhaps, they were afraid of injuring the Government by making their intelligent readers acquainted with all its details. My hon friend and the hon. member for East Quebec (Mr. Laurier) have no such fear, ovidently, since they ask that 3,250 copies of the contract be printed in French. I have no objection to offer against the proposal; I am indeed of opinion that the county my hon. friend represents, as well as his political friends, have somewhat need that a little light should be thrown upon the subject, for together with their organs, they seem to be rather in the dark about the contract. For my part, I would go still farther and would consent to the printing of 75,000 or 100,000 copies with the names of those who will have voted for, and those who will have voted against the contract.

Mr. LANGEVIN. I do not think that the hon. mover of this motion has given sufficient reasons to the House to induce it to pass his motion. The French Canadians occupy the same position as the other races in this country. We have our newspapers, and our newspapers give information to the people, all the information they desire or can desire. Our papers have an extensive circulation, they are numerous relatively to the population, in the Province of Quebec as in any other part of the country. The Pacific Railway contract is published in extenso in several of our journals, whilst a synopsis of its clauses is given in a great many other papers, so that our population is in just as good a position to be informed about the contract as the populations of the other provinces. If the House had expressed the opinion that it was desirable to distribute 100,000 or 200,000 copies of this contract throughout the country, it would have been the duty of the Government to take such a request into consideration, but under the present circumstances there is certainly no good reason why we should incur this expense, which would be, moreover, useless. The discussion will be far advanced before the copies can be printed, and the people are even now acquainted with all the details of the contract. If you go into the reading-room you will find that nearly all the papers have published the contract at length; at this very moment the contract is being discussed everywhere, so much so, that not only the contract, but the speeches made upon it, are before the public. The eloquent speech made yesterday evening by my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals, is already circulating throughout the country. This very day I have received despatches congratulating the Government upon the admirable speech of my hon. friend. If his speech is already so widely spread, the contract, which has been in print for several days, must be still better known to the public. I do not think that this motion should pass.

distributing of these copies, instead of referring the matter to the Committee on Printing. I do not think that I shall meet with any opposition to so legitimate a request on the part of the members of the Province of Quebec; on the contrary, I am of opinion that the Government should be anxious to allow the people of this Province to judge of the contract as soon as possible. Perhaps this would also be the means of dissipating an impression that may have some foundation in fact, to wit: that the Government is not desirous of making known to the public the details of the 3,250 copies distributed throughout the Province would is almost an enormity. I will, therefore, support the motion supply the want of publicity in the press, if such a want exists. I am of opinion that the hon. member for l'Islet would have shown proof of a more onlightened zeal by extending the benefits of his proposal to all the Provinces without distinction of language or race. If the French-speaking population used a certain number of copies, the population of the other Provinces are no less in want of them. I do not see why the hon, member wishes to place us in a position inferior to that of the other populations. This compliment is undeserved, for our French-Canadian fellowcountrymen are just as able as the other inhabitants of the Dominion to obtain information upon this important subject, and they will do so.

Mr. COURSOL. I regret not to be able to share the opinion of the two hon. gentlemen who have just spoken. Without wishing to scrutinize the political motives that may actuate the hon. member for l'Islet, and the hon. member for East Quebec, in making this motion, I believe that it ought to be supported, and for one I will support it heartily. It is true that the newspapers of the Province of Quebec have as a general rule, published the contract, and even the speech made last night by the hon. Minister of Railways, but these newspapers are not within the reach of all, and it is only fair that we should take the means of sending a certain number of copies of the contract to those who ask for them. It is known that this contract greatly excites the public mind, that it is spoken of in all parts of the country, and that the people are naturally anxious to know all details of an enterprise of this magnitude; but a great many electors do not see the newspapers, and I copies throughout the country, especially among the French-Canadian population, would be only doing what is right. It is not on account of the ignorance of our population that this request is made; if it wore on account of their ignorance, they would not require printed documents any more than newspapers. If our people are intelligent enough and well enough educated to read public documents. they naturally need these documents to be sont to them. But why should the French population of the country be deprived of copies of the contract printed in French, when several hundred English copies of the contract have been distributed among members of this House, seeing moreover that the expense would be trifling, as the hon. Minister of Railways stated, when only a few hundred dollars are required to publish a document of this importance in French, I think that the House should not reject such a request.

Mr. BOURASSA. So far, not a single copy has been printed in French; it seems to me that at least each Frenchspeaking member should have a few copies. I think that we have the same rights as the English speaking members. I have been asked to send some copies, but how can I do so if I have none to send?

Mr. FISET. I will take the liberty of offering one or two remarks upon the motion of the hon. member for l'Islet. The hon, member for Three Rivers, stated as an explanation of his opposition to the present motion, that it will entail an expense, trifling indeed, but useless because the people have the papers to inform them. I would have the hon. member to observe that he has not always been so economically disposed, and that not very long since he blamed us for having cut off two copies of the Votes and Proceedings, saying that it was an ill-advised economy, an economy practiced at the expense of the people. He states in the second place that the people have the newspaper to inform them; but it is well known that only a very small minority receive newspapers, and that, consequently, the greater number of copies of the Pacific Railway contract that can be distributed the better, for it is of the greatest importance that the people too long for these should be acquainted with all the details of this contract which draw my motion.

of the honourable member for l'Islet.

Mr. VALLEE. I think that the request of the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Fiset) is entirely groundless. He says that in our parishes only a small minority of the electors read the papers. That may be true. He demands that our farmers should have the privilege of making themselves acquainted with the contract; nevertheless, he only asked for 50 copies for each member, which would give to his county about two copies per parish, which is evidently wholly inadequate. Thus the proposal of the hon. member falls to the ground. The whole press has published this contract, and it appears to me that the printing of a new edition would be a useless expenditure of money.

Mr. LANDRY. I am at a loss to know whether the motion of the hon, member for l'Islet asks for a favor or an act of justice for our Province. If it is a favor that is asked for I think that we can dispense with it; if it is an act of justice, we should all support it. That appears to me to be the only reasonable ground that can be taken. If the Pacific Railway contract has been printed in the English language, and distributed among the members of the House, then it would be only fair that it should be printed in French and distributed. If, on the other hand, it has not been so printed, then I do not think that the hon member for l'Islet has the right to come and request for Quebec a favor that would be denied at the same time to the other Provinces. It seems that the hon. member for Rimouski, in coming to the rescue, has taken advantage of the occasion to lug into the debate a souvenir of his struggle in 1878. He reproaches the hon. Minister of think that the House, by distributing three or four thousand [Public Works for having said, in the county of Rimouski, that the Liberal party, when in power, had committed a fault in reducing the number of copies of the Votes and Proceedings of the House. It is true that the number was small. Each member had only perhaps two or three copies; but in the present case I see no reason for reproaching the hon. Minister of Public Works with endeavouring to save the country as much expense as possible. The 50 copies that the hon, member for l'Islet asks for would be quite insufficient, and the hon, member for Rimouski must know that in the immense county which he represents and which is, I know not, how many leagues in extent, and comprises, I know not, how many parishes, this number would be entirely inadequate. I think there would be a lively time between these two hon. members to get the copies, and that the whole number would be distributed in the county of Rimouski, if the hon. member for l'Islet did not look out for himself. Thus, if it is a favor that is asked, I do not want it, and I will vote against the motion; but if the hon, mover can show me that it is an act of justice that he demands, then I am ready to give him my support.

> Mr. LANGEVIN. In answer to the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Landry), I wish to state that the hon. Minister of Railways has just informed me that when, the other day, he laid the contract on the table, he announced that he would have it distributed among members the following morning, and that it was so distributed. Bach member must have found in his box three copies of the contract in English, besides the Votes and Proceedings. Such being the case, I beg of the hon, member for l'Islet to withdraw his motion, and we will see to it that a number of French copies are distributed to the French-speaking members in the same manner that the English copies were distributed.

> Mr. CASGRAIN. I am ready to comply with the proposal of the hon. Minister, but on the other hand, what we want just now is that the Government should act promptly; that is the main point we wish to gain. If we are to wait too long for these copies, I do not see why I should with-

Mr. LANGEVIN. The hon. member, I believe, has not a much confidence in our goodwill. He can be assured, however, that this matter will be attended to promptly, and that a limited number of French copies will be printed

Mr. CASGRAIN. I understand that my motion cannot be taken as a whole, because, indeed, that comes exactly to the same thing. Since I am granted, in substance, what I ask for, why is not my entire motion granted? It comes exactly to the same thing. On the other hand, in answer to the honorable Minister, who states that a synopsis of the contract has been published in the newspapers, I will say that the hon. Minister of Railways complained, last evening, in the House, that the contract had been mutilated even by one of the organs of the Government. How, then, can we expect the population of the Province of Quebec to accept the synopsis furnished by the newspapers? As to the hon. member for Maskinonge, (Mr. Houde) who believes that the population of the county of l'Islet is as careless of its interests as is the population of his own county, and that my electors are too ignorant to read-especially the paper that the hon. member edits—I will say to him that the county of l'Islet, that I have the honor of representing, has very few newspapers, and that is why I wish to send my constituents copies of the contract, so that they may take cognizance of the details and judge for themselves. If the hon. member would persuade the Government to have 100,000 copies printed for distribution, not only in my county, but throughout the whole Province of Quebec, he would be rendering the country a great service. I trust that we will come to an understanding with the Government as to the number of copies that each member is to receive. The type is still standing, and if we can have a sufficient number I will not insist upon my motion.

Mr. LANGEVIN. I opposed the motion of the hon. member because I was not then aware of what my hon. colleague has just now told me, that is to say, that three English copies of the contract had been put into each member's box. On this account we will not have the slightest objection; on the contrary, we will see to it that French copies of the contract are printed for the French-speaking members of the House. The motion of the hon. member is, moreover, out of order, and consequently I cannot allow it to pass.

Mr. ANGLIN. Mr. Speaker, I have a word to say on this question on behalf of my French-speaking constituents, for I would like gentlemen on both sides of the House to know that there are some French people in Canada, outside of the Province of Quebec. The county I represent is largely inhabited by French people, and I desire that they should be placed upon the same footing with regard to this matter as the French-speaking population of Quebec, so that they may have the pleasure of perusing the contract to which we are asked to assent.

Mr. LANGEVIN. I suppose the hon, gentleman will not object if we treat him as a French member.

The motion was then withdrawn,

PACIFIC RAILWAY CONTRACT.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for a copy of any paper evidencing the contract or agreement which was entered into with certain contractors for the construction and working of the Canadian Pacific Railway last summer, during the visit to England of the First Minister, the Minister of Railways and the Minister of Agriculture, said: Mr. Speaker, the House knows that, during the visit of these distinguished personages to England, there were circulated, from time to time by cable, announcements that arrangements had been made with certain contractors; and these announce-Mr- Casgrain.

statement was published in the Ministerial organs, authoritatively as it was said, but at any rate published, that an arrangement had been made. This last statement, made before the return of the hon gentleman, was confirmed by the First Minister himself who, at Montreal, on the 27th of September last, said:

the 27th of September last, said:

"I have great pleasure in telling you, gentlemen,—though I cannot go into the matter fully, because I am merely the agent of the Governor in Council, sent to Great Britain along with two of my colleagues, and must submit the arrangements we have made for the approval or rejection of the Parliament of the country—that we have made a good arrangement with a number of capitalists, not alone in England, but in Germany, France, the United States and Canada. We have made a combination of forces which will not only be quite sufficient to build the road, but will have additional influence to turn the great current of German emigration from the United States to Canada. We have received security in money—satisfactory security—for the proper construction and running of the road for ten years after its completion, which will be twenty years hence. We have made an arrangement, not that the road shall be built through a fertile district and left untouched in the wilder parts, but that it shall be constructed whether through a wild or a fertile district. We have made an arrangement by which the land will be put upon the market and sold at once, by which means there shall be a continuance of systematic emigration to the North-West. We have secured the running of it for ten years after it is built, and when I tell you that, when the road is finished, it will not cost the country a bit more than the arrangement would that I made with Sir Hugh Allan in 1873, you will, I am certain, rejoice with me.

We have made an arrangement by which the road is to be built; we have caused a desire on the part of a settler to emigrate to Canada; and the road will be built without costing one cent to the people of Canada.

We have made an arrangement by which the road is to be built; we have caused a desire on the part of a settler to emigrate to Canada; and the road will be carried out, the railway will go on whether Parliament meets in November or February. The railway will go on all the same, and we will tru

My object is to obtain the paper which evidences that contract. It is an arrangement which was made, a contract firm, made some day prior to the 27th of September, and, of course, some day prior to the hon, gentleman's departure from England. It is obvious, therefore, that there was some arrangement of some kind or other which had been implemented in some shape by the contract, which was executed on the 21st of October and has since been laid on the Table of this House. The objections made to seeing the offers of unsuccessful tenderers do not apply, of course, to this. This is not a question of offer; it is a question of contract—of a successful tenderer, and, being a contract, or an arrangement of such magnitude as this, we should have some opportunity of seeing the instrument embracing the details which I have read and some of which I do not perceive in the present contract. I know of no reason why Parliament should be deprived of the opportunity of seeing a document which has been so specifically described by the hon, gentleman and with respect to which he thought fit at that day to give so much information to the public at large in advance of the Session of Parliament.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I object to this motion, and I object to it upon the same ground as I objected to the production of the other offers. The hon, gentleman says a number of communications came across the Atlantic. For those communications I am not responsible, and for them no one of my colleagues, who were with me in England, was or is responsible. It was well known in England that negotiations were going on; it was a matter which occupied the attention of the Stock Exchange; it was a matter of the very first importance, and, as one may fancy, every enterprising stock-broker wished to have a hand in ît, and all sorts of rumors were affoat. We had entered into negotiations with one firm after another, but one after another our efforts failed; and it was only with great difficulty that we made any arrangement at all. The hon. gentleman quotes from a speech of mine at Montreal. Well, I cannot vouch for the literal accuracy of the report, but a number of gentlemen came to see me at Hochelaga Station ments were, from time to time, contradicted. Eventually on my way to Ottawa, and the speech from which the hon.

gentleman quotes was afterwards delivered before the members of the Club Cartier at whom the hon, gentleman sneers so much.

Mr. BLAKE. Oh, no. I did not sneer at them.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think the hon, gentleman sneered at them a little when he spoke of my looking down at them.

Mr. BLAKE. It was the hon, gentleman who said he would look down upon them.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. genileman speers at me in the chemin de fer. Let him beware of the chemin d'enfer. At all events, I have no doubt of the substantial accuracy of the report of my remarks, from which the hon gentleman quoted. I told those to whom I spoke the general terms of the arrangement we had come to; that the contract had been made "firm," which, as the hon. gentleman knows, is a technical expression used by the Stock Exchange to denote that the arrangements were not made speculatively, but that the contract was one which, in the phraseology of the Stock Exchange, the parties are legally and in honor bound to carry out. The arrangement was subject to the working out of the details here, and if they could not be worked out here, or if we did not agree to the terms, there was an end of the matter. This, Sir, is the result of the negotiations. We settled all the main terms in England, so far as we could settle them between man and man; but the understanding was, of course, that they must be subject, in the first place, to the approval of the Governor General in Council. The details had to be written out de die in diem, and gentlemen came from England and New York for the purpose of settling all those terms. It would answer no good purpose, and it would answer a very bad purpose to bring down the discussions, the day and day negotiations, the statements on the one side and on the other side while these arrangements were pending; and it is contrary to all rule and precedent that anything but the final result of the negotiations should be brought down. We, Sir, settled the main points of this arrangement in England—the amount to be paid as Canada's contribution, in the way of railway construction, money and land; but, of course, they were all subject to the settlement of the terms under which, as a railway company, they could safely accept an Act of incorporation. I am happy to say, and the House knows now, that we have arrived at these results. We have laid before the House these results, and we decline to lay before the House any other papers.

Mr. BLAKE. For the first time the House has been informed that there was no contract or arrangement made in England. The hon, gentleman says it was an arrangement subject to a number of details which they were to discuss when they came out here, and if they did not agree upon the details there was to be no contract. I am not complaining of the details having been left for settlement. What I am complaining of is, that the Government should, through the First Minister, have made a statement which has not been borne out by his statement to-day. The hon. gentlemen stated at Montreal that an arrangement had been made which was to be submitted to the Governor in Council and to Parliament. He gave us some details, but he did not state that this arrangement was to be conditional on other important details on which its becoming an effective agreement was to depend. He had led the country to believe that he had succeeded. He had not succeeded at that moment, because his successes depended upon these details being settled agreeably to both parties. Having details, he would have shown that his speech was not correct; ment, read by the leader of the Opposition, of the terms which he would have shown that no agreement was made; and he placed himself in a most disadvantageous position for concluding an agreement upon satisfactory terms by announcing that an agreement had been made before it was in fact made. What would have been his position if he had chosen to split on this contract—if, after a certain interval, he had been obliged to say, well, I told the Club Cartier at Montreal, and through them the public, that I had made this arrangement, that the contractor's were men of means, and that they were willing to go on at once, but all that was incorrect, because I bad not concluded the agreement; there were important details to be settled which were not settled between us? During all this time, while the contract was under discussion de die in diem, while stipulations which he had not agreed to in England were being forced from him at the peril of failureduring all this time he had hanging over him this announcement, made prematurely to the country, that a contract had been made when no contract had been made.

Mr. MILLS. The statement made by the First Minister is a very extraordinary one. He says it would be a highly improper thing to bring down the original proposition—to bring down that skeleton of a contract which had been made between himself and the contractors. Well, Sir, I do not know that the contractors were of greater consequence than an independent State. In every treaty we have the original propositions and the counter propositions, and when the whole is agreed upon we have what are called the protocols. If the hon, gentleman will turn up the papers in connection with the treaty made at Washington, when he himself was a High Commissioner, he will see that we had the proposition made by the English Government, the counter proposition made by the American Government, the discussion that took place every day, and the contract agreed to upon them, all brought down to Parliament. If we look at other treaties, we see the same thing. We know what propositions were made by England and France when Lord John Russell was sent to Vienna, we know what the Commissioners did when they met, and we know that the Imperial Parliament ultimately refused to ratify what had been done. With the Treaty of Paris also, we have the propositions made by Russia to France and Great Britain, and the proceedings of the Commissioners from day to day recorded in the protocols. When the Treaty of Berlin, in which several European States were represented, was adopted, what was recorded in the protocols, what was proposed by the different Governments before that Convention met, and what took place from day to day at the Convention; was made public. And the hon. gentleman undertakes to withhold the papers in connection with a contract, every step of which should be in the cognizance of this House, because its fulfilment depends on the public resources of this country, which are peculiarly under the supervision of the House of Commons. The hon, gentleman says that this is a matter of too much public importance that, while great affairs of State which involve peace and war, may properly be submitted to an independent Legislature, such as the Parliament of Great Britain, the House of Commons of Canada are to be denied the necessary supervision over the acts of the Government and of contractors who, for aught we know, may have exercised improper influence over the negotiators.

Mr. CASEY. We have often heard of the injudiciousness of crying out before getting clear of the wood, but it is not often that one injudicious speech costs so much, not only to the individual who makes it, but to the country at large, as the cry the hon. Premier uttered before he saw his way out of the wood.

made this statement to the country he could not afford to fail, or to differ; about the details; if he had differed about the perhaps that is nearer the mark. We have heard the state-Mr. CASEY. My bon. friend says it was a crow, and the hon, gentleman (the Premier) said he had concluded at the time he crew. He had then made arrangements to have all the land put on the market at once, and to secure an immediate and systematic flow of immigrants to the North-He had made arrangements by which this road could be built without costing the people of That was all affirmed as settled at Canada one cent. that time. Several other points were settled at the same time, but, on looking over the contract, we find that the points which were then settled have become unsettled. There is no arrangement in this contract to put these lands on the market, or by which that road could be built without costing the people of Canada one cent, because we have to pay, on the very face of the treaty, without entering into any calculation, $25,000,000; and that is something so very different from one cent that there is no possibility of mistaking one for the other. And these two great changes, not to mention any others, must have been brought about in consequence of this premature crow of the right hon. leader of the Government. My hon. friend (Mr. Blake) has alluded in passing to the series of interviews, of consultations so called, which were held in regard to this contract, and has pointed out that they were scarcely consultations at all, that they were a series of meetings for the purpose of torturing the right hon. gentleman, that the thumb-screws and the boot must have been put on him, and all the other inventions applied by which money has been extracted at one time or another from a tortured individual, who was supposed to be rich, either in the possession of his own money, or the money of the country. Unfortunately, in this instance, it was not the right hon. gentleman's own money that was screwed out of him by these negotiations, but the money of the people, and the motive power of this tremendous transaction was simply this premature statement that everything had been arranged. The right hon, gentleman says he is not responsible for the literal accuracy of these statements as taken down by the reporter. I claim he is responsible for them.

Mr. PLUMB. Hear, hear.

Mr. CASEY. In spite of my irrepressible friend from Niagara, I hold the right hon. gentleman responsible for those statements, for the simple reason that he did not deny them at any time, but allowed them to be used by the organs of his party, as arguments to show that a most satisfactory bargain had been concluded. Having derived all the benefit possible from that statement, he cannot now be allowed to repudiate it. He has had all the kudos, all the glory, of having gone to England and made a contract, and now he says he is not responsible for the statement, because the reporter may have made a slip in taking down his words. If my recollection does not mislead me, the organs of the party made use of those words which, he says, are not correct, and held them up as a literal and correct statement of what had been done. But we are told that it would be contrary to all rule and precedent that anything but the finished results would be brought down. The hon: member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has shown a good many instances in which other than finished results have been brought down. But apart from that altogether, let us look at this case once more as compared with the case of an ordinary contract in which the unsuccessful as well as successful tenders are called for, and the reasons given for rejecting the one or the other are laid before the House. In this case that is not possible, because tenders were not advertised for and received in the usual way. Informal negotiations took place, and because the negotiations were informal, and the usual method of getting at the unsuccessful tenders were not available, the Government refused to bring down the information required. But the House has a right to know all the reasons which led the Government to arrive at a Fleming Mr. CASEY.

conclusion, all the circumstances of the case and all the offers made formally or informally for the contract, and the country will not brook their refusal to make public all their negotiations with reference to this contract.

Mr. PLUMB. The hon, member for West Elgin, in looking back upon the statements that have been made by a newspaper during the last three or four months, has become a little muddled about the Syndicate contract, which every day appeared in a new state in the columns of that paper. The hon, gentleman was unwilling to wait and abide by the statements which would be produced in Parliament in time. We were willing to wait for that statement. We were willing to suppose that any arrangements made by gentlemen in England, on the part of the Government, could not be binding on this country, although the preliminaries of the contract had been made, until the details of such contract had been ratified by the Governor in Council. We were not so anxious to have the contract concluded as the hon. gentlemen opposite seemed to be. We did not find any fault with the Ministers who went to England, after they had made a proper arrangement in coming here and settling the details of one of the most important contracts,—I undertake to say the most important contract in itself—that has ever been made on this continent. We did not suppose these hon, gentlemen would have clothed themselves with such power as it seems the idea of the Opposition they should have clothed themselves with, and made that contract binding in every detail before returning to consult with their colleagues, and without laying their affairs before the Governor General in Council, from day to day, for approval, as I presume was necessary. We did not find any fault with them for having stated they had made a proper arrangement which would be binding if the details were made satisfactory. We did not consider they were bound hand and foot by that arrangement, but considered it was binding on all parties, as any negotiation of that kind is binding between man and man, provided the details can be adjusted upon fair principles; but such negotiation is open, at any time, to be broken off until the contract is finally sealed and signed, and nobody knows that better than the hon, gentleman who moved this resolution. The hon, gentleman who has just sat down has amused us, as usual, with his facetiæ. His remarks have come about quite as near the question under discussion as a certain marksman, not long ago, came to the mark aimed at, when, after firing at a pigeon, he found he had missed, but killed instead his best cow. The hon gentleman may make his game in that way as often as he chooses. We know perfectly well that he usually hits the mark about as near as did the sportsman in question, whose achievement we have lately seen chronicled in the newspapers, and the information which afforded food for his speech is probably quite as reliable as the shooting item chronicled in the papers.

STANDARD OF THE PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. BLAKE moved for copies of all statements, evidence or information on which the Government based their judgment in accepting the Union Pacific Railway, as the same was when first constructed as the standard regulating the quality and character of the proposed Canadian Pacific Railway, its materials and equipment, and of any detailed estimate which has been made by any officer of the Government as to the cost of the works under progress and to be constructed by the Government, and of those to be constructed by the projected Company, according to such standard. He said: I am very much encouraged, as you will perceive by the earnest desire of the House, to obtain all the materials possible, in order to form a deliberate judgment as to the proposals submitted for our adoption.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER: You are referring to a past debate.

Mr. BLAKE said: I am not referring to any past debate. I am not referring to any past division. Surely the hon, gentleman will not suppose my observation alluded to the division that has just taken place. Encouraged by that manifest disposition which the House observation has displayed since the Session began, I ask for some more information. You will observe, if you have read the contract before us, a provision is made, in order "to establish an approximate standard, whereby the quality and the character of the railway and of the materials used in the construction thereof, and of the equipment thereof, may be regulated, the Union Pacific Railway of the United States, as the same was when first constructed is hereby selected and fixed at such standard." The Union Pacific Railroad was, I believe, begun in 1863, and partly constructed within a very short period, and the residue constructed and opened in 1869, although portions of it had been opened some years before. In fact, so far as I am informed, portions of this railroad were nearly worn out before the rest was finished.

years ago, is selected as the standard for our road. taken as it was at the date at was selected, we would have valuable testimony it of the persons connected with Railroad, or of the inspectors. the Union Pacific But I believe such is not the condition of things, certainly as to the time, nor as to the actual state of the road with reference to the Union Pacific Railroad. Indeed we know it is not, but the contract does not say as it now is, but "as it was when first constructed." In determining upon such a standard, it is not, perhaps, unreasonable to conclude that the Administration obtained some evidence or statements, or information on which they based their judgment as to the selection of the standard of that railway as it was when first constructed, for the standard of the great transcontinental highway of Canada. I, therefore, think we may fairly expect, unless there be some reasons of State, unless the information was obtained in confidence, unless it would humiliate somebody, the Government, to produce it, that we may receive some information on this subject on this occasion.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not think there is any objection to the motion. There is no necessity that I am aware of for the Government refusing any information on this matter. The contract made in 1873 for the construction of the Canada Pacific Railway, fixed the standard in, I think, the precise terms of the standard of the Union Pacific Railway, when built.

Mr. BLAKE. It was a very bad contract, but not so bad as that.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think the hon. gentleman will find, if he will refer to the contract, that I am correct. I presume that in fixing those terms it was considered necessary to have some standard adopted in reference to the difficulty of the work, in the same way as when the Union Pacific Railway received its charter, and a very large amount of State aid, under that charter; it was provided that it must be constructed according to the standard of the Baltimore and Ohio Railway, if I remember rightly, and that it was considered a sufficiently high standard for the Government of the United States to fix for the Union Pacific Railway. If we may judge from the expenditure on the work, it ought to have been a pretty good standard, because I think the cost of the Union Pacific Railroad was about $111,000 a mile.

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The leader of the late Government stated it was so enormous that I thought I should refer to it in the remarks I read to the House last night. I am informed the cost averaged about $111,000 a mile. So the cost will be regarded as quite high enough in the way of a standard. There are half a dozen of the most important railways in the United States doing an immense business, all of which are at an inferior standard to that of the Union Pacific Railroad. The Portland and Ogdensburg Railroad standard is not nearly so good. The standard of the Baltimore and Ohio is not at all to be compared with that of the Union Pacific. The Pennsylvania Central, Chesapeake and Ohio, and Central Pacific all possess a standard inferior to that of the Union Pacific Railroad. I think, therefore, that as the Union Pacific is a road on which a speed of 40 miles an hour can be obtained, and is capable of carrying a vast amount of traffic at a very considerable profit, and as a competently constructed railroad would necessarily obtain the best gradients and curves and best description of road, for the reason that, being obliged to operate the road after its construction, it is a matter of the utmost importance to the comyany in a financial and commercial point of view, that they should make their road of as good a standard as possible The Union Pacific Railroad, as it stood in 1869, eleven to their means. That this is a safe standard to adopt, I think, all things considered, we have a tolerably strong assurance that the character of the Canadian Pacific Railroad will be all that we can desire.

Mr. BLAKE. I am not discussing that now, I was only getting information if I could.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am generously explaining to the hon, gentleman all the facts in relation to the matter, and I am obliged to conclude by stating that I am not aware of any documents or papers that can be brought down except those that are accessible to the hon, gentleman. Everything from its inception to the present day, connected with the Union Pacific Railway, is a matter of history, and within the reach of any one who will take the trouble to look it up.

Mr. BLAKE. I wish, at the earliest moment, to correct a little error of memory twice committed by the hon. Minister. I ventured to suggest to him that it was an error upon the second occasion, but he was very positive he was right. He has said the standard was fixed precisely in the same terms as it was in the Allan contract. In this present contract the words used are these: "The standard of the Union Pacific Railway as the same was first constructed." As I have said, the last portion of that road was constructed in 1869, in fact I believe some of the iron was worn out before 1869. The language the hon. gentleman says is precisely alike, upon which he bases, I presume, his defence for not having enquired into and obtained specific information upon the condition of the Union Pacific Railway as it was when first constructed, is this: "In order to establish an approximate standard the Union Pacific Railway of the United States is hereby selected and fixed as such standard." It is not as when first constructed at all, but as it was at that date, in 1873, before which various important changes had been made in the condition of the Union Pacific. It goes on to say: "But in a general way only, and not with respect to any minor details in its construction or working which may be found to be objectionable in respect to alignment and curves, which shall be as favorable as the nature of the country will admit of without undue expenditure." These are the words which the hon, gentleman says are precisely the same as the words contained in the infinitely more favorable contract which we are now to ratify. First of all, we had a standard of the road as it was in 1873, not as it was when first constructed, which, it seems, the wily contractors have got the hon, gentleman to insert, under the belief that he was putting in the same thing as in the Allan contract. Secondly, we have the express provision that the alignment and curves shall be made better than the Union Pacific Railway, as it was in 1873. These are the differences between the two things which, until to-day, the Ministers who, from day to day, were drawing out the contract so carefully, who were considering it line by line and clause by clause, thought the same.

Mr. ANGLIN. I think, in this case, the House will not receive the information, for the reason that the Government themselves are not in possession of it. I think the evidence just laid before the House by the hon. leader of the Opposition must convince every hon. gentlemen that the Minister of Railways, at all events, the man who ought to have special information on the subject, is not himself in possession of any information which will enable us to judge what the Union Pacific Railway was like when first constructed. He tells us it is a matter of history. Well, we can find much matter with regard to that railway, but I think we have all of us as yet failed to find such information as the leader of the Opposition has asked for. We have some vague information with regard to the character of the road, the kind of bridges. The grades, at first, were as high as 116 feet to the mile, used, and some other matters, which information is not at though they were afterwards reduced—the present maximum all of an assuring nature. We would like to get some being 99 feet to the mile. The road had curves of small assurance from the hon. gentleman that on this most important point, we are bargaining for a fairly workable road. One of the arguments the hon gentleman used, was that inasmuch as these gentlemen will build the road for themselves, they will, therefore, build a good railway, and that no security is necessary. We are not of that opinion, we think some security is necessary, and I cannot, for the life of me conceive why, instead of vague general declarations of this kind, there was not inserted in this contract a description of the kind of road we were to get, so that every gentleman here, without having to search through all the musty volumes of the library, may, on reading the contract, form for himself an accurate opinion of the character of the road. The hon gentleman asked about the general public. We are here, say they, to pay no regard to the general public; we are here to judge for them, as we are here to act for them. But we, at all events, should have some means ourselves of forming some opinion on the subject. I have seen railway contracts before now containing a description of the character of the road, in which on certain sections it was provided that the grade should not exceed a certain maximum, nor the curves a certain minimum, that the road bed should be at a certain width or certain level above the country through which it passed, and the bridges of a certain description. All that could have been inserted in this contract without wasting much paper, dividing the road into sections with regard to its difficulties, providing one class of grades for the Lake Superior section, another class for the prairie section, and so throughout, and the whole thing could have been put into this contract, covering but a page or two at most of the paper now before us. But as the matter stands, we are to proceed without information. When the hon. Minister of Railways began to reply to the speech of the hon gentleman who moved the resolution and proffer his willingness to bring down all the information in possession of the Government, I really thought we were to have something before us as this debate proceeded, that would enable us to form a reasonable opinion of the character of the road. But it is not known, I am now quite satisfied, that the hon. gentleman cannot lay the information before the House, for the simple reason that he has not got it.

Mr. CHARLTON. I doubt, Sir, whether there is a single feature of this contract which shows more clearly the folly, and, I might add, the ignorance, of the Government, than the one that sets up a standard of comparison between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Union Pacific as at first constructed. The circumstances attending the construction of the Union Pacific are briefly these: Two great companies were chartered for the construction of a line from Omaha to Sacramento. These companies received subsidies from the Government in money and lands. The arrangements made with the Government were highly advantageous to them; and it was to their interest to rush on the work with the greatest possible celerity, each company being anxious to build as great a number of miles as possible in order to secure as much of the subsidy as they could. The result of this desire was, that the companies built a road without paying the slightest attention to the quality of the materials or the mode of construction, caring nothing but to get a line over which they could run a locomotive. Two or three miles of road were laid down every day. The ties were made of pine and of cottonwood, which was even less suitable for the purpose than basswood, and the road was in place during the winter months, ballasted with blocks of frozen earth. The rails were of interior iron, only 50 lbs. to the yard, and they were out at the eastern end before a junction was effected with the Central Pacific. The grades, at first, were as high as 116 feet to the mile, though they were afterwards reduced—the present maximum.

radius, and its condition at that time was such that even a construction train could not be run upon it with safety. This, Sir, is the standard of comparison which these honorable gentlemen have set up in the bargain they have adopted on behalf of the people of Canada with these astute railway magnates. The members of the Syndicate will naturally have the same interests in pushing forward the construction of this road at a rapid rate as had the gentlemen who built the Union and Central Pacific Railways, namely, to secure a maximum of the land and money subsidy for a minimum expenditure upon the work in construction. They will follow the example of these gentlemen in constructing a flimsy road in the first place, though afterwards they may find it necessary to build a road of a more substantial character. Of course, no one can blame the Syndicate for securing as favorable a bargain as possible for securing terms which practically give them double the amount of money required to build a good road; but I say it was an act of folly which was almost criminal for the government of Canada to make such a bargain. The Minister of Railways was evidently under the idea that the Union Pacific was as good a road when it was constructed as it was in 1873, when the fact is that the Union Pacific, after constructing the road in the manner I have described, found it necessary to perfect their flimsily constructed line, in order to render it useful for the purposes of commerce. They then ballasted their line from Omaha to Promontory Point, with broken stone from the Rocky Mountains, and gravel from the pits along the line, they replaced the old iron with new, and, in fact, reconstructed the road throughout. Have we any guarantee that the proposed builders of the Canadian Pacific Railway, after laying the track in the flimsy fashion in which the Union Pacific Company built that road, will reconstruct it as the builders of the American road found it necessary to do? And if not, all this immense sum of money, and this vast domain of land, will be utterly thrown away. be to their interest to improve the road, but we have no guarantee that they will do so. The whole contract betrays the most astounding stupidity on the part of the Government; they have made a bargain which they dare not submit to the people; for, under the plea of respect for the dignity of Parliament, they have kept this precious contract under seal, fearful of the criticisms which they were sure it would provoke. Now they call upon us to sanction the bargain without the country being allowed to form any idea of its conditions, or of their own interest in the matter. It is premature, of course, to enter into a discussion of this question as a whole, but so far as I have trespassed in this respect I have followed the example of a more illustrious person than myself—I mean the Minister of Railways. I trust, however, that it is apparent to the House that the standard of construction which has been set up for this road is a very low one indeed, and that in this respect, at least, the Minister of Railways has made a very poor bargain.

Mr. PLUMB. I wish to point out to this House that the Union Pacific Railway, to which the hon. gentleman has referred, was not completed until the 10th of May, 1869, and in 1872 the road was reported to be in first-class condition, with good grades and an excellent alignment, running over an admirable soil bottom; in short, it was a sufficiently good road to earn about seven millions of dollars. The Union Pacific was subsidized by the American Government by a grant of $16,000 per mile in cash for that portion of the road between the Missouri River and the Rocky Mountains, $48,000 per mile for a distance of 150 miles through the mountain range, $32,000 per mile for the distance intermediate between the Rocky and the Sierra Nevada ranges, $48,000 per mile for a distance of 150 a course nearly due east from the base of the mountains. Till these are reached this valley presents probably the finest line ever adopted for such a work for an equal distance. The whole line is a very favorable one, when its immense length is considered. More than one half of it is practically level, while the mountain ranges are surmounted by grades not in any case exceeding those now worked upon by some of the most successful American roads.

AFTER RECESS. CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

The House resolved itself into Committee on certain Resolutions for granting and appropriating twenty-five millions of dollars and twenty-five millions of acres of land in the North West Territories, according to the terms of the contract relating to the Canadian Pacific Railway transmitted to this House by His Excellency the Governor General by his Message dated December 10th.

Mr. BLAKE. I proceed, Mr. Chairman, to endeavor to ascertain, by the light of those figures which were presented to us last year, and those figures which were presented to us last night, what the cost of the road, such as we are to obtain it is, what the consideration which the country is to give for its construction by the company is, and what are the advantages to be obtained by the company, pecuniarily and otherwise. I think I have already sufficiently established to the Committee that the estimates of cost for a first class road are estimates which are wholly inapplicable to this structure. But I intend, when I reach that particular point, to give a few more facts and which have louse in ot figures than those attracted House attention of other discussions. the and in this discussion upon that subject. Now, we are not here face to face with anything less than conclusions deliberately reached by the Administration upon the advice of those most competent to judge as to the cost of this railway. It is to these figures that I appeal, and upon those figures the Administration cannot object to be judged with reference to this contract. The cost of the railway in cash, as estimated last year, and including in that cost the telegraph line and the subsidy to the Canada Central, and also fifty miles extra of the line to the north of Lake Superior—because that line was calculated last year at only 600 miles, upon the view that before it was commenced at least fifty miles would be constructed by the Canada Central, and, therefore, it is only fair to add that to the cost now, when it is proposed to commence at South East Bay or near it—I say the cost of the railway, constructed as the Government proposed to construct it, and including those three items, was $88,500,000. From Thunder Bay to Red River, $17,000,000; Pembina Branch, $1,750,000; Red River to Jasper House Pass, $13,000,000; Jasper House Pass to Kamloops, $15,500,000; Kamloops to Yale, $10,000,000; Yale to Moody, $3,500,000; an extra $1,000,000 spread over the British Columbia section; the line along the north shore of Lake Superior, to which I have referred, $20,000,000; the extra fifty miles to which I have referred, $1,666,000; the Canada Central subsidy, $1,450,000; telegraphs, $500,000; surveys, $3,119,000; making an aggregate of $88,485,000, not differing at all from the hon gentleman's (Sir Charles Tupper's) own statement, except to add the two or three items to which I have referred, and which, in considering the cost to the country of this enterprise, must, of course, be added, because we have paid those sums. Of this sum of say $88,500,000, we have already, according to the statement laid on the Table the other day, actually paid out in cash no less a sum than $18,600,000, and the interest miles through the Sierra Nevada. The route for the eastern which we have already paid for the money we have borrowed portion of the line is up the valley of the Platte, which has to enable us to pay that $18,600,000, is about $2,000,000:

so that the Pacific Railway account, in principal and interest, stands at this moment at considerably more than \$20,000,000. Now, the cost of the railway, according to the revised estimates of this year, because, as I have observed, the cost of the Pacific Railway, under the hon. gentleman, is a constantly decreasing quantity in point of estimate, although when we come to the contract with the Company, the results may and will appear to be very different; the cost, I say, according to the revised estimates, brought down by the Minister the other evening, is this: He divided the line into three parcels—from Thunder Bay to Selkirk and the Pembina Branch, the Yale-Kamloops section, and the section from Yale to Port Moody—which were estimated last year altogether at \$32,500,000, and he reduced the cost of these to \$28,000,000. I have estimated that of that reduction \$1,000,000 is properly applicable to equipment and terminal accommodation, the country and to be imposed upon the Syndicate by the terms of the bargain. That would reduce the saving in the shape of excessive estimate to \$3,500,000. There would be a sum of \$31,500,000 of work, now represented by \$28,000,000, there being thus a saving of \$3,500,000 on \$31,500,000, or 11 per cent. upon the hon. gentleman's estimate of last year. Now, the other work, which was estimated on the same principle, in the same view, by the same man, at the same time, was to cost, from Red River to Jasper, \$13,000,000; Jasper to Kamloops, \$15,500,000; half the extra million on the British Columbia section, \$500,000; the North Shore line, \$21,666,000, and the payment of \$1,000,000 for stock, &c., taken off the Government calculation of its part, - making a total of \$51,666,000 to be provided in the same way by the Syndicate. But of that \$51,666,000, I appropriate the \$1,000,000 formerly mentioned and another \$1,000,000 for equipment on the central and western part of the central section, and the estimated saving, applying the same saving to these estimates that the hon. gentleman has found applicable to the other estimates is upon a gross sum of \$49,666,000, or a saving of \$5,463,000, or say \$5,50,000. So that the total cost of the work to be done by the Syndicate, reaches the sum of \$46,200,000, inclusive of equipment; the total cost, which I pointed out a moment ago, was \$88,500,000, is by the hon gentlemen's fortunate economies reduced by \$9,000,000—\$3,500,000 on the Government sections, \$5,500,000 on the Syndicate sections. Thus the grand total of  $88\frac{1}{2}$  millions is reduced to  $79\frac{1}{2}$ million dollars by the operation of the hon, gentleman's economies. That, then, is the cost, as compared with the cost last year, of a cheap road, including in that cost all the expenditure of the exploratory surveys, the telegraph lines, the Canada Central subsidy, and also that extra piece of the North Shore to which I adverted. I say the cost of a very cheap road, and it may be just as well to point out what style of road it is, so far as the Government sections are concerned. The hon, gentleman in a letter to his engineers on the 15th April, said:—"The policy of the Government is to construct a cheap railway, building it rather in advance of settlement, with any workable gradients that can be had, incurring no expenditure beyond that absolutely necessary to effect the rapid colonization of the country." The engineer in answering, quotes in a note to his answer:

"I am convinced, moreover, that by making an extreme study of the final location of the British Columbia section, by sharpening the curvature in some places, by using great judgment and adjusting alignments to the sinuosities and sudden and great irregularities of the ground, by substituting cheaper classes for the more costly, whenever it can be safely done, and by doing no more work than is absolutely necessary, a marked reduction can be made."

That, Sir, is a short account of the style of road to which these estimates of last year referred, to which the hon gentleman reduces the estimates of this year, and it is the style of road which, so far as the Government sections are concerned, we are to expect to secure by the end of ten was Brooks, had himself been bribed with a large sum. He Mr. Blake.

years as our contribution to the transcontinental railway. As to the Company's part, one might naturally expect on such an arrangement that they would have something like the same standard. In fact, unless we get a very long link of railway of a superior standard, there is very little use in interspersing large quantities of superior with large quantities of very inferior work, for you cannot haul a large load over your railway if there are here and there were hed curves and grades. Although here and there very bad curves and grades. Although it is, of course, better that you should have a level road for some part, you still are unable, practically, unless you have a very long link of good railway and then manage to divide the load along the bad railway, to do more than half work. At any rate the standard given by the contract for the Syndicate is as we standard given by the contract for the Syndicate is, as we have already, I think, fully satisfactorily discovered, not a very elevated standard. I have referred to the standard, and the House will remember, without my once again reading the document, that the contract prescribes the standard of the Union Pacific Railway as first constructed as the standard of the Canadian Pacific. Well, the former contract prescribed the standard of the Union Pacific as it was at that day, and prescribed, not that absolutely, but with the reservation of objectionable points in that standard, and a provision that inferior alignments and curvatures should not apply, but that better work should be done wherever it was possible than was done even at that time on the Union Pacific. I was a little surprised to hear the hon. gentleman, in his speech, the other evening, quote the Allan contract as one of the pieces justificatives of the Government. It did seem to me it would have been the part of discretion to have left out all allusion to that contract in this connection. But, the hon. gentleman thinking, from his imperfect recollection of it, that he could vindicate the terms of this contract by a reference to that, lugged it into the discussion, and we now find that, bad as that contract was in many respects, this is, in the particular for which the hon. gentleman cited it, very much worse. However, unfortunately, the hon, gentleman may have succeeded in guarding the public interest in the matter, we know he and his colleague, the hon. Minister of Agriculture, stood upon this occasion, in this particular, in a very much better position than they occupied on a former occasion. We very well remember that, upon a former occasion, Sir Hugh Allan declared in writing, that engagements had been made by his agent with inferior Ministers, of which engagements he did not approve, thinking those Ministers not worth powder and shot. The hon, gentlemen have since received the promotion due to so much merit. They are no longer inferior Ministers, but important, influential Ministers, whom it is quite worth while to make engagements with, and who are eminently worth powder and shot. They proceeded to England in their advanced capacity of important Ministers to make this contract, and whatever they may have been able to accomplish for the country, I hope they have been able, not merely to obtain an ample recompense for their broken engagements of the old days, but to take good security that their like engagements for the future be duly implemented. What was the Union Pacific Railroad when it was first built? In the first place it was an iron road, not a steel one. It was made of such bad iron that, long before it was finished, the rails on the earlier portions were worn out, or almost worn out. It was a road on which almost all, I might say, all the structures were of wood. The reports on this enterprise are to be viewed with suspicion. It was an enterprise which, like other Pacific Railway enterprises, was the subject of great scandal. It was discovered that members of Congress had been bribed; that the Government director, appointed to guard the national interests, I think his -name was the person who inspired and directed the arrangements for Government inspection, and helped to prepare the reports —an excellent arrangement, whereby the interests of the country might be made to harmonize with those private interests which he so admirably guarded by obtaining this large sum of money. Notwithstanding all that, with the very source and fountain of inspection so foul, the report of the Secretary in 1868, before the road was completed, but when constructed for the greater portion of its length, portions having been worked some time, was some thing of this kind: there were gradients of 80, of 66, and numerous gradients of 90. The report says:

"The track has, without exception, been laid on the bare roadway, without having been previously prepared to receive it, by ballast; as a consequence, except where embankments happen to be built, the track is entirely without ballast, the necessary material having had to be brought up for the embankments themselves."

The report proceeds:

"From Omaha to the end of the track the number of structures which were deemed permanent after the road had been completed so far—" and the phrase is important, not structures which were permanent, but were "deemed" permanent

"was a hundred and fifty, of which there was only one in iron."

One iron bridge, but in the same distance, besides a hundred and fifty structures deemed permanent, there were six hundred and ninety-four that even a bribed Government direction could not induce an inspection to deem permanent, and they were called temporary. There were nearly eight miles in length of temporary wooden structures; in fact, it was almost built upon stilts, and of those six hundred and ninety-four structures, nearly eight miles long, no less than six hundred and sixty were then condemned at that early period and ordered to be replaced. a very large sum of money, six or seven millions of dollars was, I think, in the following year estimated by favorably inclined persons to be necessary in order to put this road, which had not then been finished from end to end, but to put it so far as it had been constructed into a reasonable state as a road. Reference has been made, and will, I dare say, again be made, to a report of 1872 which is open to suspicion also, but which speaks of the road in a wholly different condition; in a wholly different condition as to its grades and curves, even still more as to its ballasting, as to its iron, as to its bridging and so forth, from what it was, as I say, when first constructed, which is the specification that our careful Government has acceded to for the standard for our railway. Why, Sir, I think what has happened to day ought to induce the Ministers themselves to propose to withdraw at once the consideration of this contract. It is obvious that they have been deceived or misled. We find they themselves say that they thought they had secured for this country a standard of construction for the railway wholly different from that which it turns out they have secured. I wish, Sir, that we could call to the Bar, upon this and other questions relating to this contract, for examination the attorney of the Company. I wish we could bring him here and examine him, and find out what, in his view, the meaning of this clause was, and if, in addition to the opinion which he should give us at the Bar, we should have the benefit of the able legal opinion, within these walls, as he would give it in the public interest, of the hon. member from Argenteuil, we should in this conflict of opinions, reach the truth, and the truth would convince us that this is no contract that What more fatal we ought to sanction. can there be on the contract than the fact that the Minister of Railways should have supposed that he is obtaining all that the Allan contract secured when he has secured something as different as it is possible to conceive from the Allan contract? Let me give you a little more information about the original arrangements for the construction of Mr. Chairman, allow me to substitute for the words "with the Union Pacific Railway. I will read you an extract themselves" in this extract "with the Government" and from a report on the construction of 675 miles of that road called the Oakes-Ames contract, which was arranged to be transferred to the Credit Mobilier, and which was the origin of that halo of glory which has surrounded the Union Pacific Railway ever since:

"The party of the second part may have the right to change the grade and curvature within the limits of the Act of Congress for the temporary purpose of hastening the completion of the road."

And the same provision exists in a prior contract for one hundred miles, so determined were they to hasten the construction for public and private reasons; for public reasons, because the rapid construction of a railway across the continent was deemed an important thing by the United States Government at that time; for private reasons, because the vast land grant was so arranged that the more miles they covered the more land they would get. So anxious were they to construct that road in any way that they might cover the ground, that they made an express provision for the construction of the greater portion of it on alignments and with curvatures and gradients which were not intended to be permanent, which could not be worked permanently, but which still are the alignments and gradients upon which the Union Pacific Railway was first constructed and which are, therefore, the standard for our railway. The honorable gentleman may be unfortunate enough to repeat an allusion he made as to the cost of the railway, as something proving to us that it is a high standard; I am entitled from the line of his arguments to anticipatesome such suggestion. There were many ingredients in the cost of the Union Pacific Railway. There was a time of war, a time of inconvertible currency, of high labor, a time of very great haste and expedition. One of these contracts provided that on every pleasant working day, two miles of road should be laid; and it was under such circumstances, under such pressure, that the Union Pacific was constructed. But this is not all; there is more behind. Let me read an extract from the report of the committee on the operations of the Company who constructed that road, and the hon. gentleman will see how it was that the Union Pacific came to cost so much.

"The men who controlled the Union Pacific resorted to the device of contracting with themselves to build the road and fix a price high enough to require the issue of bonds to the full extent, and then divide these bonds, or the proceeds of them, under the name of profits on the

This is the report of a committee of the House of Representatives on the Credit Mobilier scandal, and it goes on to say of the United States, what, one may hope, cannot yet be said, but what, one may fear, might be said some day, of Canada.

"This country is fast becoming filled with gigantic corporations wielding and controlling immense aggregations of money, and thereby commanding great influence and power. It is notorious in many State Legislatures, that these influences are often controlling so that in effect they become the ruling power of the State. Within a few years Congress has, to some extent, been brought within similar influences."

Let me read another short historical extract, as the hon. gentleman wants to know more-for we find that he does know but little-about the Union Pacific Railway and the contracts of the company:

"The Union Pacific Railway Company was largely dependent on the aid furnished by Government for its success. The managers of the company, being shrewd business men, succeeded in placing all the burdens and risks of the enterprise on the general government, while they reserved to themselves all the profits to be derived from the undertaking."

Of what road, Mr. Chairman, am I talking? Is it the Union Pacific, or the Canadian Pacific?

"Reduced to plain English the story of the Credit Mobilier is simply this: the men entrusted with the management of the Pacific road made a bargain with themselves to build the road for a sum equal to about twice its actual cost, and pocketed the profits which they estimated at $30,000,000 which came out of the pockets of the tax-payers of the United States."

we shall have a quotation equally applicable to the present state of circumstances. I have shown what, according to he Minister's estimates of last year and his estimates of his year, is the cost of the Canadian Pacific Railway in the manner in which the work is proposed to be constructed, viz.: $88,500,000 or $79,500,000 upon the reduced estimate, including in this the Canada Central subsidy, the telegraph line and the extra fifty miles on the north shore of Lake Superior. Now, I propose to ascertain the cost to the country of the Canadian Pacific Railway by the proposed arrangements for the construction of that work according to each year's estimates. I will first take it up according to the estimates of last year, and see how it works out. According to last year's estimates, from Thunder Bay to Selkirk was $17,000,000, and I deduct for equipment which the Syndicate is to provide $400,000, leaving $16,600,000 to be expended by the country; the Pembina Branch $1,750,000, and I deduct for accommodation, which is now to be provided by the Syndicate, $250,000; Canada Central, $1,450,000, telegraphs, $50,000, the Kamloops and Yale, and Yale and Fort Moody sections a half of the million for the British Columbia section, which is inserted in bulk, which make $14,000,000, less equipment for the British Columbia section, $350,000, $13,650,000. Add for the subsidy $25,000,000, and you get as a total in actual cash—exclusive of interest—of $61,819,000—say $61,800,000. I say, exclusive of interest, there is the cost in cash to the country under the proposed arrangements of procuring the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Well, if the total expenditure, as per last year, will amount to $88,500,000, and the cost under this arrangement was $61,800,000, it will leave $26,700,000 to be provided by the Syndicate. If you adopt this year's estimates the cash to be provided by the country is reduced by $3,500,000, as I have already shown, and that leaves the total cash to be furnished by the country in that view, $58,300,000. The furnished by the country in that view, $58,300,000. The cost of the whole work by this year's estimate is reduced by $9,000,000, so that the total cost is $79,500,000, which leaves the difference between $58,300,000 and $79,500,000, to be provided by the Company—$21,200,000 only. For the sum then, of $26,700,000, according to last year's estimates, and of $21,200,000 this year's, the lands are given. The lands represent the equivalent of certain sums dependent on the estimate which the hon. Minister, after mature reflection, is disposed to take. I am not disposed to permit him to adopt one line of estimate for the Government work, and another line of estimate for the Syndicate work; but whichever estimate he pleases he may take as applicable to both. Say that the standard of construction is the same, and the estimate is the same, he finds that he has made out, by his brilliant operation of the other evening, a saving to the Syndicate of the difference between $26,700,000 and $21,200,000, being $5,500,000. Well, Sir, the privilege of freedom of taxation on the road alone, if you say nothing about the taxation of the lands at all—the privilege in perpetuity of freedom of taxation on the whole Canadian Pacific Railway is worth more to the company owning the road than this $21,000,000 or $26,000,000. I think, if I am not mistaken, and I am open to correction if I am, that the than this taxes paid by our standard, the Union Pacific Railway, are about $270,000 a year, for a much shorter road. If you capitalize that you will get a sum of over $5,000,000, as representing the value of freedom from taxation of that road. I need not say that our road is very much longer than the road to which I have referred. But even if you value the freedom from taxation of the lands at nothing, then, what about the lands? These lands are to be within twenty-four miles of the railway. According to the estimate of the Government made by them in the recess before the last twenty-four miles of the railway. According to the estimate of the Government made by them in the recess before the last public document, something of the value of such a Session of Parliament, and which they published to the world privilege. I have before me the prospectus of the Manitoba as the terms of sale of railway lands, confirmed by them and South-Western Colonization Railway Company, which Mr BLAKE.

during the last Session of Parliament, when they brought it down and declared it to be a moderate estimate; further confirmed by them when they asked Parliament to sanction their going on with the work on those regulations and principles, and still further confirmed, in this sense at any rate, when they announced, as they have repeatedly announced, that the prospects of selling lands in the North-West are infinitely brighter to-day, that the land is worth more to-day than it was a year ago. According to this view, which we may take as a minimum estimate, there is established for lands to be found within twenty-four miles of the railway, an average price of $4.04 an acre.

Hon, MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BLAKE. Well, the hon, member for Niagara, and other members, think that a wholly ridiculous estimate. Mr. PLUMB. We do.

Mr. BLAKE. I did not hear that the honorable member for Niagara thought it a ridiculous estimate when his chief and leader propounded it last year. I did not hear hon gentlemen think it a ridiculous estimate when they rejected, by an overwhelming majority the proposition that this railway could be paid for wholly out of the lands. But now the case is different, and the case being altered alters the case, and the hon. gentleman, the case being altered, and his chief being absent, sneers at and ridicules his chief's estimate of the value of the land. I may explain, Sir, since there appears to be a little incredulity on this subject, how it is. The ten miles range, or rather the two ranges of five miles next the railway, were valued at five dollars an acre; that would give you 5,208,000 acres at the sum of $6,041,000; the two fifteen miles ranges next to this, making thirty miles in depth altogether, were valued at $4, which would give you 15,624,000 acres at $62,500,000, and eight miles of the next range—the three dollars range—would give 4,160,000 acres at $12,589,000 or the total valuation for 25,000,000 acres, of $101,000,000. But, of course, taking the range of distance through which this railway is to travel, and from which this land is to be taken, and considering that it is to be taken only in alternate blocks, and that certain sections are appropriated for the Hudson's Bay Company and for school lands, there are not 25,000,000 acres, at any rate, of prime quality, which this Company will alone condescend to take, available within twenty-four miles off the main line of the Canada Pacific Railway; and, therefore, the observation which I have made so far would extend only to so much land as was to be found on the main line within the twenty-four miles, which I have roughly calculated to be perhaps about 12,000,000 acres. But, although there will not be the whole acreage on the main line, yet these contracting parties who have been struggling with one another for so many weeks to see who could makes the best bargain, saw a solution of that difficulty, and it was this: if the land cannot be found within the twenty-four miles of the main line you can select of the North-West for situ choicest the situation, for commercial prospects, for railway building. You may decide to build a railway to the land so chosen, and you may, on ranges within twenty-four miles of these branch railways, select land of a quality which you are not able to find within twenty-four miles of the main line. And, therefore, I say, we may not unfairly count this privilege, given to these persons, to choose out the choicest spots and run railways through them, as making the remainder of the 25,000,000 acres of a value equal to that which shall be accepted by them, within twenty-four miles of the main line.

is placing on the London market its bonds, and the statement it makes is ment it makes is:

"The length of this railway is 295 miles, of which the first section of 119 miles is under contract, and at least 50 miles are to be opened by the 1st of September, 1881. The Governor General has approved of a report of the Privy Council of Canada, recommending a grant to the company at the nominal rate, mark you, the nominal rate—of $1 an acre of an area of land equal to 840 acres per mile, commencing at the south-west of the boundary of the Province, so that it is outside of the Province of Manitoba that this land lies. It is estimated that a judicious realization of the land would produce to the company the sum of £2,000,000 sterling, or $10,000,000, and the company has refused offers made to them for large portions of that land at $5 per acre. In another part it is stated that this line is to be constructed for £3,000 sterling or $15,000 a mile, and the result is that the fortunate stockholders—and if there are members of Parliament among them, I hope they will share among us all—will have an admirable commercial railway constructed free of cost, and probably four or five millions besides from the sale of their lands,"

Wall Sir you thus find that there are lands of very great.

Well, Sir, you thus find that there are lands of very great value to be had, outside of Manitoba, beyond the range of twenty-four miles of the Canadian Pacific Railway, which can be opened up and made salcable at $7 or more per acre, by railways which shall be, as this railway is declared to be, good paying commercial enterprises. But the least you can suppose is, that the company will not find it advantageous to take that area of its lands which it cannot find within the twenty-four mile belt in the way I have stated, and that they will go on-although they are not bound to do it -spreading out to a sufficient distance to enable them to take the 25,000,000 acres from along the main line of the Canada Pacific Railway. It is obvious that if the Company does not do that, it is because they can make more money by going further off, and building a railway. Tut suppose they do adopt the former alternative, they have to run out, according to the estimates of the Government, fifty-five miles from the main line of the railway in order to get their 25,000,000 acres. They, of course, take the five mile range on each side, the fifteen mile $4 range, the twenty mile $3 range, and 15 miles of the $2 range, and carrying out the same figures and applying them to the 25,000,000 acres so taken, you find them worth, according to the view of the Government last year,—of course they will put a higher estimate on them this year—$79,500,660.

Take them as you can take them along the line of the Canada Pacific Railway, stretching out to a point 55 miles from that line, and, according to the Government's view, the minimum value of the lands is 79½ millions. I think, Sir, I have now proved, by figures, the absurdity of those arguments which have been based upon the idea that a grant of 50 millions of acres along the railway is worth as much acre for acre, as a grant of 25 millions within the 24 miles limit. I have shown you that the Administration has committed itself to the sound, the unquestionably reasonable view that the nearer the railway, the greater the value, and that by consequence the smaller acreage taken from the inside must be worth very much more than an equivalent, and may be worth very much more than a much larger area taken from the outside. Let me illustrate this position. To take 50,000,000 acres as was proposed of railway lands within the limit of the 220 miles range, or 110 miles belt on each side, you had to go, of course, 55 miles further on each side than I have already brought you. You, therefore, take five miles of the \$2 belt, and fifty miles of the \$1 belt, and the value of these fifty-five miles, or a depth of 110 miles, according to these same hon. gentlemen's estimate, was  $27\frac{1}{4}$  millions of hon. gentlemen's estimate, was  $27\frac{1}{4}$  millions of dollars. So that while the whole lands were worth the \$106,750,000, taken as close as the sections would enable you to take them along the line of the railway, the inner outer at \$1.11 per acre, 274 million dollars, or an average estimates and views of the Government of this country result is a net return in ten years of \$11,000,000 to the confirmed to be correct, by an enormous majority of the Parliament of this country at its last Session of Parliament, and by those who are now disposed to dispute them. Well, I pointed out a while ago that the country was to expend in cash, under this arrangement, on the estimate of last year, \$61,800.000, and now at what shall I value the 25,000,000 acres to be taken within twenty-four miles of the main and twenty-four miles of the branch lines? Shall I value it at \$4.04 or \$3.18 per acre? If you take \$4.04 we add to the \$61,800,000 cash \$101,000,000 for lands, making an aggregate of \$162,000,000, land and money, for this enterprise. At the \$3.18 we add \$79,500,000 to the cash subsidy, making an aggregate of \$141,300,000 for the enterprise. And, if you really will insist that 25,000,000 acres of land close to the railway are worth no more than 25,000,000 acres at a distance; if you will turn your back on every view that you have entertained on this subject before; if you will bring down an Order in Council annulling your former declarations, and declare that \$2 only is the value of land close to the railway, we find an aggregate of \$50,000,000 for lands and \$61,800,000 cash, or a total of \$111,800,000 in lands and money. The Company is therefore to get the railway completed and the lands on last year's estimates for the cash expenditure of \$51,660,000 less the \$25,000,000 of subsidy which the country provides, so that, according to the estimates of last year, this work and these lands are to become the property of this Company for the cash expenditure by them of \$26,700,000; so that, according to the estimates of last year, the Company, deducting the Canada Central Railway subsidy and the telegraph line, if they are worth considering in these millions of figures, is to get this \$162,000,000 worth, or \$141,000,000, or \$111,800,000, according as you value the lands, for \$26,700,000. Now I will apply myself to this year's estimates and see how they run. On this year's estimates, the country is to expend in cash and works, \$58,300,000. Add to that the amount for lands of \$101,000,000 and the total is \$159,300,000. Take the lands at \$79,500,000, and the total is \$137,800,000. Take them at \$2, and the total is \$108,300,000, and applying the same reduction for over-estimate, as I have pointed out, the Company will get the completed railway and lands for an expenditure of \$46,200,000, less \$25,000,000 or for \$21,200,000. This subject will bear a little examination in another light, as to the avails of these lands. I may begin my task by convincing hon gentlemen opposite, with reference to the avails of the lands, because I go upon figures to which they have given their cordial assent-no, I do not say I do that, because I do not ask them to accept the enormous figures of last year, the mistaken calculations of last year-I pointed out the errors in those calculations last year amounting to some 26 millions odd dollars, and I am inviting them now only to swallow the reduced figures. Well, the Government's view was that there would be 10,880,000 acres of railway lands sold within the next ten years. Of course, these lands would be spread over all the ranges, the view being that the reduced price compensated for the increased distances. That gives you for the inner half 25,000,000 acres, 51,440,000 acres, and for the outer half the same amount. The result of these calculations would be, giving to the Company the proceeds of the sale of the half of the total lands, allowing their proportion on the true average—not on the average the Government calculates, -which is higher, \$11,269,000 in the ten years. But then that is the gross as to the expenditure; if we adopt in all, for surveys and management \$2,400,000, I shall divide that sum into two parts, assigning \$1,200,000 to the homesteads and \$1,200,000 lands at \$3.18 per acre are worth \$79,500,000, and the to the railway lands; and as the Government bears all the expense of the surveys and management, I attribute to the for both of \$2.13 per acre. I do not enforce these views by Syndicate \$270,000 of the \$1,200,000, and to the Government any arguments of my own. I am simply stating the deliberate the remaining \$930,000 on the railway lands sales. The Syndicate on the railway lands, there becoming due thereafter to it on the same sales, \$8,580,000, making an aggregate of \$19,580,000 actually got in in part and in part due and bearing interest, while the Government having the outer belt only of the railway lands, for their proportion of sales, on an equal area receives only \$3,863,000 within the ten years. It loses \$930,000, the cost of the surveys on the whole belt and of management, receiving a net amount, if it comes in, of \$2,933,000, and to come due thereafter \$2,942,000, an aggregate of \$5,875,000. But that, of course, is not all, according to the calculations of hon. gentlemen opposite, that Government will receive, because we have yet to deal with the homestead fees and pre-emptions, from which Government expected the large sum of \$10,621,000; from which deduct \$1,200,000 as half the expense of surveys and management, and you have a net amount of \$9,421,000 to come in, and \$9,590,000 to come due thereafter, or a total of \$19,000,000 net from homesteads and pre-emptions to accrue to the Government. The sum from railway lands and pre-emptions coming in within ten years is, therefore, \$12,350,000. But \$12,350,000 near enough to not pay  $\mathbf{the}$ interest expenditure. So, adopting the current culations of the hon. gentlemen opposite, and confining them to the bargain, the Syndicate will have realized out of its lands, selling only as much as the Government expect, some \$11,000,000, and have some \$8,500,000 due. They will have been practically able to pay off the whole amount out of 5,400,000 acres necessary to build the railway, in addition to what they have got from the country, while the Government, for its \$60,000,000, will have got in a sum that will not nearly pay the interest on those \$60,000,000, leaving the whole of its capital account untouched. Do you tell me you will get more for your lands, that your prospects are brighter, that you may expect more than the figures I have given? Tell me how much more you will get, and then we will calculate how much more the Syndicate will receive. Because, if you get very much more than your own figures show, it follows that the Syndicate, the owners of the railway, the owners of the choicest lands, and possessing those energies and which the Minister of Railways has and given them so much credit, will get very much more portionately, than you; and, therefore, if you double the figures for what you will receive, you may more than double them for the Syndicate's returns, and show that, in ten years, they will not merely have built the railway without extra outlay, but have more than doubled their receipts from the lands. Do you tell me that I value the Syndicate's gains too high? It is not my estimate, it is Do you tell me your estimates are are too high for their lands? vours. erromuch less, then, may we expect for your lands. If they must expect less for theirs, you must expect less for yours-less than the paltry sum which have estimated, and so much the worse for country which will receive little relief from the sale of its lands—not even a fraction of the interest on the capital expenditure to which I have referred. By the old plan, if we built the railway we had it. By the new, we are to pay for it handsomely, with a very large bonus to the builders, and then they are to own it. The heaviest sections are to be built by us. Hon gentlemen opposite talk of finality. Do we know absolutely what our obligations are? They say that one of the great advanobligations are? They say that one of the stages of this business is, that if the expenditure by the tages of this business is, that if the expenditure by the tages of this business is, that if the expenditure by the country is large, at any rate we know the limit. Well, what was the indeterminate character of the business before? It was that we did not know how much it would cost us to construct the railway. But we are now going to construct a large portion of the railway. We are not limiting ourselves to those very expensive portions under extremely heavy 100 miles from the 1,000 which Mr. BLAKE.

contract, but are undertaking a new piece, and, for ten years to come, we shall be still building on the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the indeterminate character of the transaction in this particular will remain; and, unless we are fortunate enough to possess during all that time a Minister of Railways able to bring down annually decreasing estimates of the cost of the work to be performed, we shall experience no little anxiety in regard to the public obligations and prospects. It is obvious, from the estimates of the Minister of Railways, that the situation under him is not quite so alarming, but still it is tolerably alarming, with regard to the want of finality. If I were, however, a supporter of his Government I would venture to suggest the exercise of that admirable diminishing faculty of his to relieve the question from these serious considerations. It could not be a subject of uneasinesss to us that our obligations were indeterminate when all that we had to do was, on coming to Parliament, to learn how much less the railway was going to cost this year than the estimate of the year before. However great the cost of the British Columbia section, we have to build it, from Kamloops to Port Moody; and as to the finality, otherwise, what is the extent of it? There has been a great deal said as to the financial capacity of the capitalists who are to build this road. The hon. Minister of Railways himself alluded to it in vigorous terms, the other day, pointing out that it afforded a perfect security to the country. From what I observe, then, I conclude that these gentlemen, having some money to risk, are quite determined that if there is to be any question of finality in this business, it should be settled on their side. In the terms of this contract is a special provision that it shall not go into operation unless there is an Act of incorporation, and that the contract is to belong to the corporation, and that the individual contractors are not to be liable. We have got the seal as our security, with the deposit. Well, the hon. gentleman declared, with his happy faculty of making the best of all unhappy circumstances, that, upon the whole, he thought it would be a very much better thing that there should be no security at all; whereon, I suggest that it might be a good thing to allow the Syndicate to amend their bargain, by striking out that deleterious provision as to the security of the $1,000,000. If it is bad to have any security, why should the Government prove such traitors to the country, as to insert the security clause? But, if it is good to require that security, let us remember that it is all we have. We have not even the individual security of those gentlemen. We have not the personal responsibility of these gentlement we have nothing at all event the million. men,—we have nothing at all except the million. Well, now, if security is wanted, that security is inadequate; security will only be wanted on such an enterprise as this, if all the calculations of the Government, all these figures of theirs which I have now been developing, turn out wholly fallacious; if this enterprise becomes entirely disastrous-if there is an utter collapse of some kind or other; and if there is, it is not a million, Sir, that will stop that gap. Extraordinary, Mr. Chairman, as the whole price is, its distribution between the sections is still more remark-The prairie region, nine hundred miles, is the eastern part of the central section. One thousand miles of that region was, last year, estimated at $13,000 a mile, which would be, for the 900 miles that I am now considering, and which have been defined by the contract, $11,700,000. But that would be an over-estimate of the cost of 900 miles. because the western 100 miles which has been lopped off from the 1,000 miles and assigned to the western end of the central section, is confessedly much heavier. It belongs to the mountain region, and, I suppose, that is one of the averaged only $13,000 a mile, you get a lower average for the remaining 900, and I assume that we may take off $1,000 a mile for the 900 miles and add that amount, or $900,000, to the 100 miles as the extra cost of the 100. That reduces the cost for the 900 miles to $10,800,000 in all, or $12,000 a mile. Well, the cash to be paid for the construction of the central section, which, as I have shown you, according to last year's exaggerated estimates, was to be $10,800,000, is $9,000,000, leaving a sum to be provided otherwise than by the country of only $1,800,000 to construct that line for 900 miles. Well, to meet that dreadful deficit upon this section of 90J miles, what is the prudent compensation which an economical Government, regardful of the interests of the country, has provided? Sir, it is 11,250,000 acres of choice lands worth, at $4.04 per acre, $45,450,000; at $3.18, $35,775,000, and at your miserable $2, $22,500,000. The excess over cost is $43,650,000, or $33,975,000, or $20,700,000, according as you take your choice of the estimates of the value of the land. Take the last and you get an excess of over $20,000,000 profit on the construction of the central 900 miles alone. The price then assigned for this section alone is four or five times the cost of constructing the section. The mileage cost, as I have stated, is $12,000, the eash receipt $10,000, leaving a deficit of $2,000 a mile; the lands $50,000 a mile at the $4, making a surplus of $48,000 a mile at that rate, a surplus of $37,750 at the $3.18, and a surplus of $23,000 a mile at the $2 valuation. So that for this section which can be built out of the land itself, which is running through the land, which is the easiest to build, which is the most sure to pay-which is so sure to pay that you propose to throw upon the back of that middle section, the heavy burden of the two ends of the line—for this section you are giving at the very lowest calculation, a profit at the rate of $23,000 per mile to the Syndicate for its construction, that is at last year's estimate. If you take this year's and apply it to that section, you find $9,780,000, the deficit $780,000 only, the surpluses increased to $44,850,000, or $36,550,000, or $23,520,000, according as you value the lands. You find the mileage cost $10,700, leaving a deficit of only $700 per mile. You find the surplus $49,300, or $39,100, or $24,300 per mile, as you take the estimates of the value of the lands. Now, let us get the estimate of the next section from Jasper House to Kamloops, 450 miles. The 100 miles which has been taken off from the central 1,000, 1 take, of course, at $13,000 per mile, the average of the whole of that section, and add to it the $900,000 which I took off the 900 miles, making for that 100 miles $2,200,000. The residue, according to the estimate of last year, would cost $15,500,000 to Kamloops. Add half a million, being one half of the extra million assigned to British Columbia, and you find a total of $18,200,000 as the cost of that 450 miles. The cash to be provided is six millions of dollars; the deficiency to be met out of lands on this section, with reference to this difficult piece of work is twelve millions of dollars. The lands amount to seven and a half millions of acres. At the first rate they would produce $30,300,000. At the second $23,850,000, at the third $15,000,000, leaving a surplus at the first rate of $18,100,000, at the second rate $11,650,000, or at the lowest valuation of the lands, $3,000,000. The mileage cost is $40,414; the cash receipts per mile $13,333. If you add the land at the highest rate, it gives a surplus of over $40,000 per mile; at the second rate, a surplus of $26,000 per mile, and, valuing the land at only $2 per acre, a surplus of $6,222 per mile. The cost to be provided for over the amount of the subsidy for each mile of this road is $27,111. But if you take the new estimate, of course the cost is reduced from $18,000,000 to $16,200,000. The deficit, therefore, therefore, on the subsidy is $10,200,000, cash be $22,500,000, or $16,000,000, surplus would

$4,500,000, according as you value the lands at either of the three sums which I have rated them at. The mileage cost would be $35,600, leaving an excess of $50,000 a mile, or $30,800 a mile, or $11,000 a mile, according as you value the lands, and the cost to be provided out of the lands would be $22,300. So you see here there is a margin, though by no means so handsome as the margin that is to be derived from the construction of the central section The eastern link is 650 miles in length, the cost of building which is estimated at $21,666,000. The cash subsidy is $10,000,000, leaving a deficit on the cash subsidy of $11,666,000. The lands would produce $25,250,000 at the highest rate, giving an excess, after paying the whole cost, of $13,584,000; at the middle rate, $19,875,000 or $8,210,000 of excess, and at the lowest rate $2 per acre, $12,500,000 or $833,000 of an excess. The mileage cost is $33,333; the cash receipt per mile $15,384; adding the land at the highest rate it gives a surplus of $20,895; at the middle rate, $12,626; and at the lower rate, $1,267 per mile. The sum to be provided out of the lands, is $17,949. According to the new and reduced estimate the cost is cut down to $19,300,000, making the deficit on the the cash subsidy only $9,300,000, increasing the surplus, as you estimate the value of the lands, to $15,900,000, or $10,500,000, or $3,200,000. The mileage cost is $27,667; leaving a surplus per mile of $24,500, or $16,000, or $4,650; and the cost to be provided out of the land is $14,300. So that you see that if the Lake Superior line were to be abandoned the Company would get an enormous share of what was attributable to this contract on the whole, and would be able to make millionaires of themselves long before the period of abandonment had taken place. Now, the hon. gentleman says that he wants the prairie portion built fast, and because he wants it built fast, and because it is inconvenient to the members of the Syndicate to provide the funds, he undertakes that the public shall provide them, and, because he wants the prairie section built faster, he takes the cash that ought to belong to the other sections, and should have been reserved for the securing of their construction, so as to make it easier for them to do this work. He says "what thou doest do quickly." Now, Sir, the general result is, that on the old estimates there is but $2,000 a mile deficiency over the cash subsidy on the prairie section; on the western, there is $27,000 a mile, and on the eastern end there is $18,000 a mile. According to the new estimates, there is $700 deficiency only on the cash subsidy on the prairie sections, $22,300 on the western, and $14,300 on the eastern. Can that be explained, can it be defended, even admitting that the intention is, in a business-like manner, to secure the construction of the road from end to end, that means should be given in cash which are properly belonging to the ends of the road, to be used and absorbed in the construction of the prairie section? By this, as each 20 miles of line is built on the prairie, an immense block of land will be handed over absolutely to the Syndicate, which is wanted to secure the end of the line. Well, the hon. gentleman says that they have got a grand security for its construction. He will compel them out of the profits of the prairie line, because they will not dense that the prairie line is going to be by itself an enormously profitable one, build this section of the road. We told that that is to be built within three years. Of course, they will build it fast, because there are fortunes in building it fast. Every 20 miles they build gives them an immediate fortune, and, of course, they will build it with great rapidity upon such liberal terms. They may well afford, for the chance of obtaining the many millions they will secure in four years from the central section, to deposit one million which is expected to be the security for the construction of and the the rest. It is paying one million to get twenty millions or 0,000, or far more. Now, the hon. gentleman seemed to be very much alarmed about the operating of this ranway. I did not observe that there was, last year, any tremor in his voice or any signs of dismay. Upon that subject last year, the Minister stated that he believed that the road would forthwith, after payment of running expenses, pay a considerable return of interest on the money expended on its construction. I was really a little surprised that the hon. gentleman should have become so much less hopeful, seeing that everything else was so very bright and sming. The estimates are reduced, the country is in a more prosperous state, the prospects are very much brighter, and everything has become in a better state, and I was rather surprised to find that he was somewhat dismayed, now as to the operation of the road, instead of believing that it would pay a considerable sum for interest on the capital expended. But the other day he says that he had got the security of five millions of dollars of bonds or acres of lands. Now there is an easy way of arranging about giving security, and I think that the hon. gentleman has devised a patent plan by which his objection to securities may be wholly obviated. I think he should consider whether it would not be well for him to bring it into execution. For example, supposing a contractor is to pay a million and he wants fifty thousand for security, he should say, as in old times, "take thy book and write four score," put it down as $1,050,000 instead of a million and let us have the $50,000 security. That would be rather an improvement upon the present plan, for in this case the hon. gentleman seems to give some ten or fifteen millions in order to get the security of five millions. I recommend him, as an improvement in his policy, not to give so much more than the security he demands. It is an easy thing to obviate the difficulty by increasing the amount of the contract without going beyond the amount of the security you exact. The provisions as to the guarantee of interest, the provisions as to the land grant bonds, are rather complicated, and I do not profess to have wholly mastered them. I should like some explato whom I referred would be useful. They require careful consideration in order that we may understand what they require. So far as the interests of the country are concerned, these financial propositions require careful scrutiny. As to the provision as to the Government being bound to receive upon deposit these indefinite sums, I may say this, the hon. gentleman has stated that the Finance Minister can use them. Well, but the Finance Minister may not always be able to use them. It may be that these sums may be received for a time which is not determined; it may be that he may not know how soon he may have to pay them out; it may be when he goes to his bankers and tells them that he wants to swell his balance by twenty or twenty-five millions, that the bankers may be extremely indisposed to give any rate of interest on that deposit at all. Such things have happened before, and I believe that a much more proper and prudent provision would have been this: to provide that the money should be placed in the banks, or otherwise, under the control of the Government, and in its name, the Company being allowed to make such arrangements as they can with the bankers for interest, provided that the Government may take such sums as from time to time they find they can use, at the four per cent. interest. Such a plan would give the Government the power to take upon deposit at four per cent. what the public needs may require, whilst the Company would be entitled to make such arrangements with the bankers for such sums as the Government did not take. But the absolute obligation on the part of the Government to pay interest at the rate of four percent on the twenty-five millions, is, I think, objectionable. Then, as to the practical operation of the proposed plan, that the subsidy shall be Mr. BLAKE, coupons or interest on Company's bonds. 1 do not know the rate of interest at which the bonds will be issued, or upon what terms, but I have assumed they would be four per cent. at 20 years, or five per cent. at 20 years; and that in either case the Government would allow interest of four or at the rate of five per cent. I need hardly say that it would be necessary, in computing the interest the Government should give in the way of coupons on the interest of the bonds, to assume that a very large sum of the total would not be payable as part of the subsidy for many years. Therefore, it seems to me that should not be bound Government and it interest from an earlier date. to me that the uncertainty which exists, the impossibility of telling beforehand at what time the cash subsidy will become payable in its different proportions, renders it impossible with justice and certainty to ascertain and determine how much should be given in the way of coupons. We do not know when we shall have to pay, it depends upon the progress of the work, 7 and, therefore, it seems to me impossible to ascertain at what time the money should be deemed to be due in calculating the amount of the coupons. But supposing $25,000,000 is to be regarded as presently payable, the results would be these :- At four per cent. bonds for twenty years, the Government allowing four per cent. on the deferred payments, there would be a semi-annual payment by the Government of $913,823, which would represent interest at four per cent. on a bonded capital of $45,694,683, say 45 millions and a half. The Company thus get into their hands 45½ millions in bonds at four per cent. for 20 years, the interest at four per cent. being the Dominion's bond to pay that interest, and not a guarantee, so that the public who are takers of these bonds would know there was no obligation on the Company whatever to discharge the interest, and that all the Company would have to discharge would be 45½ millions of capital at the end of have wholly mastered them. I should like some expla-nations as to them, and the explanations of the gentlemen the bonds, in the present condition of the money market, at something near par. At five per cent, the result would be that the semi-annual payment of interest by the Government would be $995,506, and the capital sum of the bonds, say 40 million dollars. Then you have a capital of 40 millions which could surely be floated at or over par. Now the four per cent. arrangement would give for the eastern link, of bonds which are the representative of the cash subsidy, $18,280,000; for the western end, $10,968,000, for the central or prairie, 900 miles, no less than $16,452,000. This is confessedly an outrageous arrangement, for the contract provides that, in this event, $2,000 a mile is to be lopped off the 800 miles of prairie section and put on to the western end of the central section. I want to know why that $2,000 a mile is not kept at the end to which it belongs. If it is right in the one case, it is right in all cases, and the provision that at least $2,090 a mile should be taken from the prairie section and added to the end, in this event, shows that, in the mind of the Government themselves, they knew they were wrong when they made this arrangement. These are tolerably extensive and valuable privileges which are about. to be given to the Company, as the means of constructing a railway, which that Company is afterwards to own. But these are not the chief privileges. There is in this Bill one of the most extraordinary provisions. I dare say there may be found a precedent in some Act of a State Legislature, but I do not know of any. It is a grant of all powers, not merely necessary, but all powers which may be useful, in order to do all the various things they are authorized to do by the charter, and I do not know of anything they are not authorized to do. This generality of words is not to be derogated the proposed plan, that by from any particular franchises which are conceded, but it placed in the shape of is to be as wide as can be. I suppose it is copied from the pose they would delay a day in selling them because they are exempt from taxation? Do you suppose that the possession of these lands, free from taxation would render them less earnest or less eager to sell? Not so. Their interest would be only to sell, and to sell rapidly. But the interest of the Syndicate is to make as much money as they can, and more money is to be made by delaying than by selling, their interest will be to delay, and to have as little expense as possible meantime. All their lands are exempted from taxation in the North-West Territories for a generation to come. What a discouragement this is to the settlers along the line of railway, to those who are settled on the homesteads, and pre-emptions alternating with these blocks of land which are to be the property of the Syndicate. We know the result of exemption from taxation. We saw it on a small scale in the city of Toronto not long ago. Our lawns there were exempted from taxation because it was supposed that it was a good thing, for the public, that there should be these open spaces in the city. Happily the exemption has now been removed; the proprietors of these lawns have to pay taxes upon them. The result is that they are putting them in the market. They said to themselves before, "We have nice lawns; we enjoy them very much; they are gradually increasing in value as other property in Toronto becomes more valuable, and we are paying no taxes. Other persons who are operating in lands are paying heavy taxes; we turn our land into lawns, we need pay no taxes, and we can afford to wait a long time, and make our profits free from taxes." That is the effect on a small scale, upon a man's mind, of exemption from taxation. That on a gigantic scale will be the effect of exemption on the Syndicate who can hold their lands from year to year for twenty years, without any drawback in the way of taxes. And for that the progress of this country is to be interfered There can be no greater obstacle to the progress of that country by the encouragement of other settlers than that large spaces of unoccupied lands should alternate with settler's farms. We, who are familiar with the early settlement of this country, all know the effect upon farmers holding even smaller areas—farms of 100 or 200 acres—by the intervention of unoccupied spaces between such farms; we know that the farmer's disadvantages are trebled because there is not continuous settlement; he lacks the joint fencing, the road work and the neighbor's assistance, and all those other things which increase his capacity for making his land valuable and productive. Now, add to the difficulty which exists in that respect, which the largeness of that area will enhance, at any rate, in a large degree, the fact that there is no power to impose municipal taxation on 25,000,000 acres of the choicest lands, those nearest to the railway, and you place a bar to progress and render it impossible to get over the difficulty; you say that the cost of roads and bridges, school, and other municipal taxes will have to be imposed on the settlers, to enable the worthy Syndicate to hold their lands until the reduced labors of those settlers shall have sufficiently increased the unoccupied areas in to induce the millionaires, the holders of the lawns of the North-West, to turn them into money. Why, Sir, it was only last year in the discussion of this subject when we objected to the speculator holding land, when we said to the hon. First Minister that settlement would be impeded by areas of land being held by persons who were not bound by conditions of settlement, that he answered us by this very argument. He said: "They will be compelled to sell and settle because they will be taxed into it. Municipal taxes will compel them to do it, and therefore your fears are void." That was his answer to our argument; but where is that answer in the face of this contract? As to the 25,000,000 of the choicest land next to the railway, the only thing the hon. gentleman could bring With the Government in possession of these lands, do you sup- forward to prove that great injury would not be done by not assigning conditions of settlement, is removed in favor of this unfortunate Syndicate. I say, Sir, that if they are going to establish an immigration agency it would probably be to their interest to see the free grants settled, and they could afford to hold over a very large area of their territory until the labor and industry of the free grant settlers had made the roads and bridges and improved their farms, and thus made their untaxed domain valuable. I know that there is another element that is calculated to induce them to settle the land early; I am aware that there is a large element of profit to be derived from settlements by railways. I know that, in the prairie country, we are told that ten miles on each side of a railway will support a railway. Yes, Mr. Chairman, I believe it to be true, but what makes it true? Why it is the rates they charge. It is because they are landlords of the area of twenty miles. That is the reason it is profitable, and unless you have given them power to exact those extortionate rates, they will not have the great interest to which I have referred, to get settlers on their lands. Then there is, it seems to me, a practical privilege of abandonment, for I do not see anything in this contract of reverter of the railway to the Government, or reverter of the lands to the Government, in case they fail to complete the ends, or either end after building the middle. Again, they have great privileges as to telegraph lines, as to elevators, and we know what extortion is practiced by combined elevator companies, and by as to other matters. Again, they have the right to build railways just wherever they please. The hon. gentleman said: "What, do you complain of that? Why, in the United States any man can go and build a railway wherever he pleases." The hon. gentleman has become in the course of this discussion, an ardent admirer of United States legislation. I want to remind him that whatever the virtue of that mode of legislation may be-and it is not now under discussion-we are not contrasting the situation of the Syndicate with reference to the happy inhabitants of the United States who enjoy those privileges; we are contrasting the position of the Syndicate with reference to Canada and Canadians, and their roads, and the legislative policy that exists with reference to private persons building railways in this country. These are what we have to compare, and the comparison is not satisfactory, irrespective of the special provisions of this contract, because it has not been our way to give to any individual or number of individuals the power of making and declaring themselves a corporation and taking possession of lands and building railways wherever they pleased. If the hon, gentleman is disposed to devise a general policy of that kind, let him bring it down and dispose of it pari passu with this measure; but if Syndicate have the absolute unconditional right to build in he gives this railway power in such a manner as to render it difficult to grant charters to other companies, do not let him tell us that he is putting the Syndicate on a level with his fellow countrymen-with other Canadians-when he says that they shall have what no other Canadians have power to do, power to build railways wherever they please. Sir, it is a serious matter to say to all the rest of the world, you must come to Parliament and run the risk of getting a bill through, and getting it on whatever terms the Government may decide, while these people shall have the right to build wherever they may choose. It tends to prevent people from coming to Parliament to get legislation. They will say, "What is the use of us going down to Parliament, moment we find a scheme for a road, make explorations and surveys and prepare our bill, the Syndicate, which is rolling in wealth, will justfyle a plan in the Secretary's office and go on and build the railway;" and if they do take some steps to carry out their project, the Syndicate may step in and run their railway in a way highly prejudicial to their interests. It would not great mass of railways in Canada. The great mass of railonly give the Syndicate privileges and advantages and ways in this country have been constructed out of resources monopolies which are refused to all the rest of the world; but they have the right to build anywhere; they have the right to choose their route—there is no restriction on them as to the course their railways are to take. They may go south with their main line. They may, instead of making it the backbone of that country, instead of placing it in the position approximately in which it is now placed, sweep down very much to the south and take into their main line the whole of the traffic, and thus prevent any kind of competition almost, and greatly deteriorate from the advantage of the railway as a great central line intersecting that country. It is true we have a protection. We have the protection of the consent of that Council which has signed this contract, but what kind of protection that is, Sir, I will leave to you to say. But they may do something more; they may run branches anywhere north, anywhere to the south side of their line. Yes, anywhere to the south or south-west, anywhere southerly, anywhere westerly, yes, no prohibition for them. They can go down, if they please, if it is to their interest, down by the Turtle Mountain to Sault Ste. Marie, or any way which will connect them with the St. Paul, Minneapolis and Manitoba Railway, if only they can get on good terms with that corporation, if only they can agree with themselves, for we know they are in fact and substance the St. Paul & Manitoba Railway Company, and though they are perfectly free to go where they like and make any arrangements they please with American lines, nobody else must. Oh, it would never do, after you pay them a price and a half for building the road and give it to them and allow them to take whatever they please for fares and freights-it would never never do to allow any one else to build south or south-west. No; they must be protected in their vested rights, and there is a prohibition for twenty long years that no one else can construct any line which shall go south or south-west of any line which shall go within fifteen miles of that abominable boundary. But they may go themselves; they only may touch it, they can do no harm. They are the country, they are the Government, and, of course, they can do no wrong; but all the rest of us are prohibited solemnly, by the Parliamentary contract, which binds our descendants as well as ourselves; binds all those who may be induced to go into the North-West; declares that in the constitution of any new provinces to be created out of that vast territory there shall be inserted a constitutional provision divesting the inhabitants of that country of the right to build railways wherever they may think advantageous to them, and leaving them to the mercy of the Syndicate. They have the absolute right; you cannot restrict them; you cannot say others can build with the consent of Parliament, for the a way from which every body else is absolutely excluded. Now, there is in this a practical monopoly of the trade of the North-West Territory secured by law for at least twenty years, and it probably means in perpetuum to this corporation. There is no security for the accommodation-none for the accommodation whatever. Those men are to have the absolute powers, but there is no security as to the class of accommodation they are to give to the public, and there is no practical security for the rates. The hon. gentleman referred to the clause in the General Railway Act, and he glorified himself in the fact that the Government had been so careful of the interests of the country that they had actually imposed certain limitations upon this corporation which did not exist in the Railway Act. That Act says that 15 per cent. profit shall be the minimum below which you shall not reduce the tolls; we have cut it down, he says, to the modest figure of ten. Now I need hardly observe that this corporation stands in a somewhat different posi-tion relatively to Parliament and to the country from the mostly provided by private individuals. Considerable sums have, from time to time, been given by way of aid or subsidy by the Government towards the construction of some lines, but the main portion of the capital of these railway companies is private capital. What restriction you may impose upou private capital so long as you depend upon private capital to take the risk of constructing a railway is one thing; what temptation you may deem it necessary to offer to private capital in order to induce it to enter into that channel is one thing; but the same considerations are not at all applicable to a case in which you say individuals: Gentlemen, we will some you as much and half as much again as is necessary to build this railway, and we will let you own it afterwards. It is not the work of private capital at all. These men will, for a little while, until they make some land sales, invest four or five millions which will be recouped to them within a very brief space of time, and then they will have this enterprise without having sunk a dollar of their own money in it, and will have millions of acres besides. In such persons, so situated, who are to run a railway which has been built by the country for them, we may fairly expect more rigid, instead of less rigid, limitations as to rates and fares, and a corporation, possessing such extensive privileges as these, such privileges for extending lines all through the North-West, and forestalling the construction of competing lines, such statutory privileges for preventing other people from building commercial lines which might interfere with them, on the express ground that their building might interfere with them—on such a corporation, possessing all these advantages, and with no disabilities, we may expect to impose more rigid limitations and regulations as to what they will give to the public for the great deal the public is giving to them. Well, Sir, what have we given them? The General Railway Act, in its 17th section, provides:

Constitutional Act, which, besides giving enumerated powers, gives a general power, with the precise declaration to what I have referred. They have freedom to reject land they deem not fairly fit for settlement, and to choose the best land elsewhere. They have perpetual exemption from taxation of their enormous property, a most monstrous provision in Why! this monstrosity is not to last merely twenty years, which is to be the period of bondage in other respects, but it is to last for ever. No matter how wealthy the Company may be, how enormously lucrative, this insti-tution is to be for all time to come free from all taxation in every place in which this Dominion can free it from taxation. It is to be free everywhere from Dominion taxation in all the territories both from Dominion and from territorial taxation, wherever the Dominion can give it freedom, and that is through all the fertile belt at any rate. It is to get its rails at cost. I am surprised at the hon. Minister. After glorifying himself so much upon that admirable purchase of steel rails, after recounting over and over again how much he gained for the country in the purchase, he says it is true he does not give over to this Syndicate what he wants to lay on his own track, but the balance, he says, I will hand over to you at cost and at four per cent. interest. I forget really how much he made, although we have heard it often enough to impress it on our memory, but certainly it was a very handsome present. But, Sir, why should not the rails be taken over at the market value? should the country not get the benefit of that value, whatever it is. Then there is to be freedom from duty on imports. Here is protection for you! I understand that those interested in some of the languishing industries of the Maritime Provinces and elsewhere have been looking ever since the hon. gentleman announced the speedy construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and hoping for the day to come when they should revive their industries and open their workshops to produce those things required in the construction of that road, and now we hear that the great advocates of protection, the inaugurators and perpetuators of the National Policy, have got this message for their unhappy manufacturers: You shall not be permitted to manufacture these things because you cannot manufacture them so cheaply as the Syndicate can buy them elsewhere, and whoever else may suffer, whoever else may have to pay higher prices that you may live, our good friends the Syndicate may have liberty to buy in the cheapest market and sell us afterwards in the dearest, and, that they may do so, we will give up the import duties on the goods they want. Then, Sir, there is freedom from taxation for the lands for the long term of twenty years. And that term of twenty years is from the time they acquire the lands, and, therefore, it is longer than twenty years from now. It is, perhaps, on the average, twenty-five years-nay, more than that. I am not at all certain that it may not be very easy to arrange to make it longer, because, by a convenient arrangement by which they do not take out the patents until they want to sell, they can keep them free from taxation until they choose to put them in the market, indefinitely, indeterminately-until it suits them to dispose of them. The hon. gentleman says, perhaps, it does look awkward at first sight; but if the Government, who own the lands, were to build the railway the lands would not have been subject to taxation, and why should they be when they are placed in the hands of the Syndicate. It does not seem to me that because the Government, in the interests of the country, and for the public good, could construct the railway, the Syndicate, who are getting the bargain to which I have referred, should have this privilege. Why it is turning the Syndicate into the Government—putting them in their places to a considerable extent. But, Sir, I say there is a difference between a private interest and the public interest.

"9. No tolls shall be levied or taken, until approved of by the Governor in Council, nor until after two weekly publications in the Canada Gazette, of the by-law establishing such tolls, and of the Order in Council approving thereof:

Canada Gazztte, of the by-law establishing such tolls, and of the Order in Council approving thereof:

"10. Every by-law, fixing and regulating tolls, shall be subject to revision of the Governor in Council, from time to time, after approval thereof; and after an Order in Council, reducing the tolls fixed and regulated by any by-law, has been twice published in the Canada Gazette, the tolls in such Order in Council shall be substituted for those mentioned in the by-law, so long as the Order in Council remains unrevoked.

"11. The Parliament of Canada may, from time to time, reduce the tolls upon the railway, but not without consent of the company, or so as to produce less than 15 per cent. per annum profit on the capital actually expended in its construction; nor unless, on an examination, made by the hon. Minister of Public Works, of the amount received and expended by the company. The net income from all sources for the year than last past, is found to have exceeded 15 per cent. upon the capital so actually expended."

I am not aware of these powers of reducing tolls having been used, either by the Governor in Council or by Parliament, and I believe the existence of such powers, in the case of a corporation like this, to be wholly nugatory. I do not believe these tolls ever would be reduced by the Governor in Council if the Governor in Council was given the unfettered power of reducing them when once established. He is, by the Ast, given the unfettered power of reducing them when once established, but the Syndicate, in this respect also, enjoys a limitation of the power of the Governor in Council that no other railway company enjoys. A private railway company, built with private capital, at private risk, and serving the public at the risk of its own capital, may technically, under this section, be subject to have its tolls reduced by the Governor in Council, at the discretion of the Governor in Council. But the Syndicate has this special privilege, granted by the 90th section of its Act of incorporation:

The limit to the reduction of tolls by the Parliament of Canada provided for by the eleventh sub-section of the 17th section of the Consolidated Railway Act, 1879, respecting TOLLS, is hereby extended, so that STC1 reduction may be to such an extent that such tolls when educed shall not produce less than 10 per cent. per annum profit on the capital actually expended in the construction of the railway, instead of not less than 15 per cent. per annum profit, as provided by the said sub-section; and so also that such reduction shall not be made unless the net income of the company, ascertained as described in said sub-section, shall have exceeded 10 per cent. per annum instead of 15 per cent. per annum, as provided by the said sub-section. And the excercise by the Governor in Council of the power of reducing the tolls of the company, as provided by the tenth sub-section of said section seventeen is hereby limited to the same extent with relation to the profit of the company, and to its net revenue, as that to which the power of Parliament to reduce tolls is limited by said sub-section eleven."

So that while the Governor in Council nas, as applied to other railways, an absolute power to reduce the tariff of tolls at any time, the Governor in Council, as to this railway, cannot reduce any tariff of tolls unless to a point at which they will produce not less than ten per cent. per annum profit on the capital actually expended in the construction of the railway. And is it because it is not the Syndicate's money—is it because it is our money—on which the ten per cent. is to be paid, that they are to be secured, while private capital is exposed to a lower dividend? Why is it that they are not to be subject to the Order in Council to as full an extent as all other railway companies are subject? Why is it that the power of the Governor in Council is limited to this ten per cent.? Now, let us discuss this ten per cent. a little. The hon, gentleman ventured the suggestion the other day that this was on the Company's own private capital, but he will not find that suggestion borne out. I shall be very much pleased if the hon. gentleman is able to obtain a declaration from the members of the Syndicate. that what is intended is, that they are to get not less than ten per cent, of the money they themselves put into the railway. That nothing that comes from the country-that the Thunder Bay branch, for instance, is not included—that the railway in British Columbia or the Pembina branch is not included—that the proceeds from the sale of lands is not included—that only that, which, after the public resources are exhausted, they take out of their own pockets, is to bear this ten per cent. If the hon, gentleman will say so, he will remove a large part of my objections to his contract. But he cannot say so; it is not the agreement; it is not the contract; it is not the law. If this contract passes in this shape, the capital, no matter from what source—though it represen's the money we have put in, and the money we are going to put in and the proceeds of the land we give—is the capital spent on the whole of that undertaking called, by the Act, the Canadian Pacific Railway, which is entitled to bear ten per cent. And if you say that I under-estimate the cost of the road: if you tell me, so as to make out that they have got a worso bargain, that the road is going to cost them $120,000,000, then they can take $12,000,000 a year in tolls, and that without expending, even for a brief space, more than $5,000,000 of their own capital. They are first of all to take enough of the profit out of the middle and paying part to work that part, and then they are to take profit enough to work the British Columbia end and the Lake Superior end, and after they have taken enough to pay the working expenses of the whole line, after having taxed the farmers of the North-West with enough money to pay the working expenses of the whole, they are then, after all, to set the profit at what rate they please to put it. Call the cost of the road $90,000,000, that is $9,000,000 direct profit. Call it $120,000,000, that is $12,000,000 a year before you can reduce tolls once established. It is contemplated they shall get ten per cent. interest, You make a provision that their rate of profit shall not be less than ten per cent. in effect so far as you can make that provision. Besides, you will fix these tolls, in the first instance, with reference to the larger running, expenditure that will exist and smaller returns that may at first exist. The Syndicate will reasonably say, fix a toll at a rate which will make the railroad pay or help to pay under existing conditnios. You fix it, and once fixed you can never alter it until the day arrives at which the Company is getting $9,000,000, or $12,000,000 a year profit, after paying all the expenses of the road. Nor is that all. The hon, gentleman has taken the Union Pacific as his standard, and there may be a construction company, there may be a Canada Credit Mobilier, there may be arrangements which would easily swell the nominal capital account to the $150,000,000, so that it may appear that the $150,000,000 had been expended on the construction of this railway, though it may have cost only $30,000,000 to construct it. The hon gentleman has himself shown us how men are deceived. He, the man who is chiefly responsible for the making of this contract, who submitted it to Parliament, who inserted this clause that the Union Pacific should be the standard, actually did believe that the Union Pacific did cost the $130,000,000 he mentioned. I have shown you it cost nothing like that sum, that the amount was a nominal one made up by fraud, by all the devices which can be resorted to in such cases. If the hon, gentleman did not know that the actual cost of the Union Pacific, built as it was, as I have said, was much less than the nominal cost, how will his friendly eyes ever open to the conception that it is possible a similar result may be reached in the case of the Canada Pacific Railway. We have yet to take hold of another, the le sons of experience. A few years have pointed out the roal dangers that exist in this connection. Within a few years past the people of the neighboring Republic, having the greatest development of railway enterprise in the world, having, I suppose, in round numbers, some 90,000 miles of railway running there, have had the opportunity of knowing, and, by sad experience, do know, what the difficulties and evils are which are incidental to those great benefits to humanity, railway corporations, and railway enterprises. The peculiar circumstances favoring with us, the growth of the evils of monopoly, render it still more necessary that we should see what those evils are which are experienced elsewhere, and devise some means of averting them instead of blindly going on as if there were no evils, or as, if there were evils, that were not capable of being averted. Sir, these people will become the landlords of the North-West. They will take such a share of the profit of every farmer in the North-West as they choose to demand, consistently with there being any stimulus on the part of that farmer to raise grain for the market. They are not entitled to ask, Sir, for the privileges given to men who build railways at their own risk. They do not occupy that position. You are giving them the money to build up a monopoly of trade, and giving them statutory security for that monoply, and you are bound to restrain them. Their exceptional position obliges you, if even the general evils did not, to restrain them. Talk to me of this thing standing. It will not stand. If you pass this law, and if the country of which you speak so glowingly is what you depict it, if its prospects of settlement are such as you hope they are, I say you are blighting these prospects by passing this law; and if hose prospects are measurably realized, notwithstanding the passing of this law, I say the people of that country would be less than men if they suffered such a law to exist. Talk of the immigration of Trickmen to the North West You are provening Irishmen to the North-West. You are proposing to them to substitute the scorpion for the rod. You are proposing to those who are suffering under the tyranny of individual landlords, to expose themselves to the soulless tyranny of a gigantic corporation. You are telling them that their chance of profit is to depend on what this corporation thinks they ought to pay as tribute before they can take their produce to market. I have referred to some of the acts of railways that are in this position. I have referred to what the St. Paul and Manitoba Railway miles, 45 cents; for the third, through the happy region to St. do. I do not believe they are an exception. They all Vincent, 390 miles, $1.10, and the fourth, St. Vincent to St. Mr. BLAKE.

do it when they can. I believe it to be the standard of morality of railway men throughout the United States that they are to take whatever the traffic will bear so long as they do not take so much as will prevent the continuance of traffic. I believe they take just as high rates as they can get everywhere, and I will prove that by good evidence in a few moments. I said the other, the quotation for wheat from Emerson to Toronto, was forty-five cents. The rate at a fair paying rate would be  $1\frac{1}{3}$  cent per hundred miles, or  $17\frac{1}{3}$  cents for the distance, 1,300 miles. In point of fact, I believe the rates from St. Paul down to be much lower than  $1\frac{1}{3}$  cent a bushel, and consequently a much larger proportion than that would amount to, goes to the St. Paul and Manitoba Railway. But, assuming there will be, according to that calculation, a just compensation of  $5\frac{20}{100}$ c. you have  $27\frac{2}{3}$ c. per bushel over a fair transport charge; and if you give 25 bushels to the acre, for the early years of the fertile Red River Valley, it means, after paying a fair charge for transports, a tax of \$6.82½c. an acre on the farmer for every acre he puts into wheat. And the rate quoted at the largest mill in Minneapolis, perhaps in the world, on the 14th December last, a special rate, and it is one of the clauses of their creed to do business largely in special rates—the very best available was from Emerson to Minneapolis 21c. per bushel. Ample payment would be 5.20 at the average. The result is, the surplus charged 15.80, for that special rate. would be a rent of \$4 on every acre in wheat after payment of the fair charges for transport, and that is the position of the man at the boundary. In what position will be the man 200, 300 or 400 miles inside the the boundary or further west? Of course the railway men cannot go on charging at this rate for the greater distance, because there is a limitation to their charges, which cannot exceed what the traffic will bear. But that is the only limit. But how does this rate act on the frontier? For a long time a great deal of the furniture needed will be imported—a point not more important to the farmer than the manufacturer. A car load of common furniture is worth, on board, in Ontario, \$700. The freight all through, from any point in Ontario to Winnipeg, will be about \$280, or 40 per cent. on cost. Add merchant's profits on that, \$280, or 25 per cent., and you have an additional cost to the consumer of 50 per cent. That is rather an alarming statement. In addition to this increase of 50 per cent., to get the furniture into Winnipeg, how much will be laid on it to carry it into the interior at those rates? But dealing only with Winnipeg, if the same rates, proportionately, are charged on furniture that are paid by agricultural implements, the settler would be seriously oppressed; the St. Paul and Manitoba Railway, having a monopoly, is charging on the furniture, after payment of fair rates for transport, a tex of 18½ per cent on value. If that rate is not charged, I have no doubt it will be found that one will be charged amounting to  $12\frac{1}{2}$  to 15 per cent on the value of the furniture over a fair rate of transport. No wonder you want a very high duty to keep out furniture made near the border on the American side. I have here quotations of the rates on the general classes of freight, showing the rates of freight between Toronto and Winnipeg. For first-class freight from Toronto to Chicago, 515 miles, 60 cents; from Chicago to St. Paul, 409 miles, 75 cents; from St. Paul to St. Vincent, the monopolists line, 390 miles, \$1.50; from St. Vincent to St. Bonifaco, 67 miles, 25 cents. Second-class freight: from Toronto to Chicago, 50 cents; from Chicago to St. Paul, 60 cents; from St. Paul to St. Vincent, \$1.30; from St. Vincent to St. Boniface, 21 cents. Third-class:

Boniface, 19 cents. Fourth-class freight: first distance, 30 cents per 100 lbs.; second, 35 cents; third, 90 cents; fourth, 14 cents. I dare say these figures will be found tolerably alarming. They show profits very much more than fair compensation. They are monopolists' figures, first compensation and afterwards a tax or duty as large it is thought the traffic will bear-a burden upon the consumer and producer of the most dreadful character. I said I would give some evidence as to the general view of railway men on this subject. It is not confined to absolute monopolists; they are all more or less monopolists. Two of the great railway presidents, Vanderbilt and Jewett, stated, I think, in 1879, the rule of the road to a committee of the New York State Legislature investigating into the tolls conarticle will bear, and at the same time stimulating its production." You see I am not striking at the "." Manitoba Railway only. They all follow the same rule, but some are in a position to charge more than others, all animated by the same virtuous desire. The great mining railways simplify things beautifully. You go to the manager of one and say: I want to send some ore to such a point, what is your freight a ton? He asks how much will your ore assay? You reply, what have you got to do with that? He says: I must know what your ore will assay. If it will yield thirty dollars, then I will charge ten dollars. To the same question, if you have got ore that will assay $300, you will receive a similar answer, and a demand for $100 for freight, or as much as the traffic will bear. The report of the railroad company of the New York State Assembly, of 1879, says, after a year's enquiry:

"The wheat rates from Chicago to New York were raised from 15c. in August—a living rate—to 40c. in November. It cost the road as much to haul the stuff in August as in November. The rate was raised simply because the condition of the market wanted it, and the product could bear it. The wrong consists in not only performing the proper functions of transportation, but, taking into consideration the probable or possible profit of a shipment and adjusting their rates accordingly. If the shipper is likely to make a large profit, they compel him to divide. If the margin is a close one, they determine whether the shipment shall be made or not, whether it shall result in profit or loss, and the amount of profit or loss."

Now those are statements well worth pondering over. This was a committee appointed to consider the subject with reference to the State through which, you know, there passes an enormous tide of traffic, and particularly an enormous tide of that kind of traffic which for a long time to come we expect to export from our own North-West, that is grain. Through the State of New York and to the port of New York, there come millions and millions of bushels every year. They, finding these evils existing, appointed a committee to enquire and a close enquiry, lasting about a year, was made, and they found that to be the principle which the railway companies carried out as far as they were able to do so in the circumstances in which they are placed—if the shipper is likely to make a large profit they require him to divide. Discussing the very topic which is so very important to us they say:—

"The price of cereals is regulated by the demand. European demand regulates the demand at the seaboard, and this, in turn, regulates the quantity to be brought forward. "The price of breadstuffs is governed by the Liverpool market; the Western producer can receive for his cereals the market price thus fixed, less the cost of placing his produce upon that market; and the testimony of men who have been for years engaged in this trade, who swear from actual knowledge, is that a reduction in the rate enures to the benefit of the producer west, and does not affect the price to the consumer, while an increase in the rates would protanto decrease the price of the commodity to the producer."

There is practical evidence of that of which they give examples. There is another very interesting statement on this subject by Judge Black, which is as follows:

"The reasonableness of the freight tolls or taxes that may be charged upon any railway will depend on the expenses of running and repairing it and on the cost of construction. The latter will, of course, be the principal element in the calculation. For the tolls ought to be high enough to give the corporation a fair profit on the capital they have actually invested. But many of these corporations have issued large amounts of stock and mortgage bonds for which the holders have paid nothing, or much less than their nominal value. Another way of enlarging their apparent dimensions is to water their stock under the pretense of increasing their capital, while in fact the additional shares are divided among themselves without putting a new dollar into the business. Of course nobody thinks that the real cost of the road is to be measured by the nominal amount of these bonds and shares. It is easy for a competent engineer to tell how much-any road ought to cost, supposing the work to be honestly done and liberally paid for. That being ascertained you have the true basis of a calculation which will show how much the tolls ought to be

"Most of our Western roads are built with the proceeds of public lands granted mediately or immediately by the United States to the several companies which now have them in charge. They did not really cost the stockholders anything, and in some cases they got lands worth a great deal more than all expenses of making, stocking and running the roads. The two companies between Omaha and San Francisco raised in cash out of Government bonds, lands and mortgages of their franchises four or five times as much as they necessarily expended upon the roads. The stockholders, without paying anything, put the enormous surplus into their pockets. These roads thus built at the public expense, and in some cases paid for by the public five times over, are now claimed as the private property of the companies, and the right of the public to use them as highways is utterly denied; nevertheless, I think the claim of these companies to take reasonable tolls stands upon the same foundation as that of companies whose roads were built by the stockholders themselves at their own proper expense. The grant of the lands invested the grantees with a title which could not be revoked if the conditions of it were performed. If they sold or mortgaged the lands and invested the proceeds in the construction of a railroad under a charter from a State or general government which authorizes them to take a fair profit in the shape of tolls, they have as good a right to the tolls as if the capital to build the road had been raised by themselves—that is to say, those companies which built the railroads with capital donated by the public have the same right as other companies to charge a reasonable toll, but their demand of excessive tolls, though not worse in law, seems in the very of natural reasons a greater outrage.

have the same right as other companies to charge a reasonable toll, but their demand of excessive tolls, though not worse in law, seems in the eye of natural reason a greater outrage.

"If railroad corporations have the unlimited power which they claim, then all business is at their mercy. Agriculture, commerce and manufactures must suffer what they choose to inflict. They may cob labor of the bread it wins and deprive all enterprise of its just reward. Though this power does not belong to them legally, they have been permitted to usurp it, and I need not tell you that they have grossly abused it. They avow that they make their exactions with an eye single to their own advantage, without considering any right or interest of the public. They boldly express their determination to charge as much as the traffic will bear; that is to say, they will take from the profits of every man's business as much as can be taken without compelling him to quit it. In the aggregate this amounts to the most enormous, oppressive and unjust tax that ever was laid upon the industry of any people under the sun. The irregularity with which this tax is laid makes it still harder to bear. Men go into a business which may thrive at present rates, and will find themselves crushed by burdens unexpectedly thrown upon them after they get started. It is the habit of the railroad companies to change their rutes of transportation often and suddenly, and in particular to make the charges ruinously high without any notice at all. The farmers of the great West have made a large crop of grain which they may sell at fair prices if they can have it carried to the Eastern ports, even at the unreasonably high freights of last summer. But just now it is said that the railway companies have agreed among themselves to raise the freight 5 cents per cwt., which is equal to an export tax upon the whole crop of probably $75,000,000. The farmers must submit to this highway robbery, or else keep the products of their land to rot on their hands. They submit, of c

"Common justice imperatively requires that freights be fixed, settled and prescribed by law, and that they be not changed at the mere will of the railroad companies.

Now, Sir, it does seem to me that if it had not been for the wonderful productiveness and expansion of the North-West, the people could not have borne the taxation which the railroad companies have been imposing upon them, and as year by year the average fertility of the soil diminishes, as year by year the crop to the acre decreases, it will be found a burden which will compel a change by the act of Congress or some other power. It will be found a burden wholly intolerable to be borne very long;—this control which these great railway companies have over that great country and over the agricultural interests of the great North-West. And while that state of things is existing in the neighboring Republic, while its people are groaning under the burden, while they are looking all around them for means to redress the evil with reference to existing corporations possessing vested rights, the Government of this country, blind to the lessons which the experience of the Republic teaches, proposes to extend and inaugurate that evil in a ten-fold more aggravated shape in this country. To what end is our splendid road to Thunder Bay? To what end did we sink millions more than necessary to produce the extraordinary grades and splendid provisions with respect to curvature which exist on that road? Why, was it not to cheapen the cost to the head of navigation and enable us to defy competition, having a good port, and being so circumstanced that we can take down freight a little cheaper, as we can from Prince Arthur's Landing to Montreal by the Lakes, than they can from Duluth, and so beat them? Was it not to invite farmers to the North-West by the statement, "Gentlemen, here is a country in which you have not got monopolist rates for freight charged, a country in which the Government itself, in order that you may have your freight brought down cheap, has built, at an expense entirely unnecessary for other purposes, a railway superior perhaps to any other except the Canada Southern, and capable of transporting your freight at the lowest possible rate?" Sir, the grades and provisions as to curvature of that road are such, as you will learn from the report of the Chief Engineer last Session, as to enable us to take within a fraction of twice the paying load the average grades and curves would allow. It will, therefore, approximately carry freights at half rates. Approximately the cost for transportation will be one-half—I do not say actually one-half because there are other circumstances which may require to be considered, but approximately it will take freights at very little more than half of the average rates. That is the means, that is the inducement you have to offer to the people of Manitoba and the North-West within a year or two. But, Sir, to whose advantage are these splendid grades; to whose advantage is this magnificent railway constructed so that it can be run and worked very cheaply, and enormous trains twice the length of those on other roads can be brought down? To whom is the gain to enure, if the practical result is to be that freight can indeed be carried down at a less actual cost, and that you have only given a greater margin on the division of the profit on the crop to the railway company? Then I must say it has been a very unprofitable expenditure. We are bound, in my opinion, by the most obvious duty to our country, to see that the singular advantages which the Thunder Bay road gives, of taking down the wheat of the North-West to the seaboard, and taking up the manufactures of the East to the North-West at moderate rates, shall be used not to give still larger profits to a railway company, but to secure cheap transport to the public, whose money has paid for that road, and who will have, for generations, to bear the burden of the interest due to it. Now there are various remedies. Competition is, of course, an imperfect remedy, because the competitors may combine, but it is better than nothing. Look what it does between Chicago and New York! Look what it does between Chicago and Montreal! Contrast those distances and the rates on these lines with the rates where there is no competition, as in the case I have given you of the St. Paul and Manitoba Railway. And remember that often, though there may be a difficulty in keeping up a competition, and though you cannot ensure that the competitors will not combine, yet the possibility of competition, and the knowledge that extertionate rates may lead to the building of other roads, is a check upon these corporations. But you prevent anybody, who is not in the interest of the Syndicate, from building at all in a way which will produce competition. You not merely do not secure but you prevent designedly the possibility of competition, and the hon. Minister seems rather to congratulate himself that he has secured a consolidation of interests with the St. Paul and Manitoba Railway Company, so that this very line of railway to Thunder Bay which the people of the North-West were looking for, and hoping for, and praying for is closed to them as a means of relief, and the Syndicate is to control every gate-way to the North-relief, though one of those great railway magnates in New York has declared it as his belief that such a commission always must have one of two results: either the commissioners must own the railway or the railway must own the commissioners. Still something might be done in that way. A provision that the rates should be fixed with a due relation to the actual cost of transport and to some reasonable profit—some large profit if you like—on such individual capital as might prove to have been sunk in the undertaking would be a feasible remedy. A provision which gives the Government the machinery for examination and inquiry into what is the actual cost of transportation, from time to time into the actual individual capital sunk, which gave even 20 per cent profit on that amended capital, would be a great relief. A reservation of public rights on the road, a right to give running powers to other corporations, would be a relief; a provision for the reverter of the line to the public; a provision to give power, on the part of the public, to re-acquire the line on reasonable terms, such as are contained in the present Railway Act, would be a relief. A provision, at any rate, which would enable the provinces which we hope to carve out of the North-West, and through which the road is to run, to re-acquire the railway, would be a relief. If they were to be allowed to purchase the road at a valuation, and get rid by peace instead of by war of the monopoly, it would be a relief. And there are other methods such as the fixing of charges by reference to general averages, and by defining minimum rates. But none of all these things has been done, none of all these things has been attempted. We go on, in spite of the oft repeated lessons of experience, to create to-day, in the year 1880, what I venture to say the men to whom the hon. gentleman has referred would not dream of creating in the United States. Sir, I object to this scheme because I believe it to be a scheme not in the interests of the country, on other grounds. The hon. gentleman was right to refer to my speech of last year. I continue to believe in an eastern connection. I believe, Sir. in the eastern connection. I am of opinion that the interests of this country call for an eastern connection, but I am not of opinion that the interests of this country call for the retardation of that connection. I am not of the opinion that the interests of this country call for the postponement of that connection.- I am not of the opinion that the interests of this country call for enormous expenditure in order to secure that connection under existing circumstances. I believe, Sir, that the line by the Sault Ste Marie, in the present condition of railway matters on both sides of the line, affords the practical solution of that problem. A solution perfectly easy, perfectly plain, and possessing obvious advantages of an enormous character over the plans of the Government. The Sault line gives were in the first place of corporation in the Sault line gives you, in the first place, a connection in two years, or at most in three. Do you want an all rail connection with the North-West? The line you propose, offers you that connection in ten years; the Sault Ste. Marie line offers you one in three years at most. It gives you that connection through a country capable of settlement, while the line, so far as we know, which is proposed to be run by the north shore, is through a desolate country, almost entirely incapable of settlement. It, therefore, gives you a line which, so far as the way traffic through-our own country is concerned, will give the power of reducing the expenses, by giving a profitable trade, which will not exist with a north shore line, and, of course, if the through traffic is to bear the full cost of operating the 660 miles of railway, through traffic will have to pay a higher rate than it would if that cost were diminished by the results of the operation of the railway through the settled country. I have not the slightest doubt that it can be done. Such are West. A public commission would give some chance of the commercial advantages of that line that it must be done.

land which you are going to give for the construction of the sixty-three miles from South-East Bay to the Sturgeon River, and grant it as a subsidy to a Company, they will build the whole 290 miles, including the 63 miles; and I have no doubt that you can let the contract in thirty days from this date. I believe that the Canada Central Company would not suffer any other company to go in and take the road if these terms were offered; and 1 am quite certain that other companies would offer to build it on those terms. We know, indeed, that an offer has been made alreadyperhaps the price is too high; but I have no doubt whatever, but that compared with the North Shore plan, it would be infinitely more advantageous. I believe that that offer is some 4,000 acres of land and $4,000 per mile for 290 miles, being a little more than you are going to pay for the sixtythree miles. But I believe that is too high an offer, and that a lower one could be obtained without difficulty. Now, Sir, why do I say that you could get the road so cheap? First, because this road, passing, as I have said, through a country almost entirely capable of settlement, therefore presents prospects in itself of a good remun-erative local traffic. But that is not the only nor the chief reason. Anybody who looks at the map, or who knows what is doing on the other side, must know that that road is the key of the position; that the future of Canada, and particularly of Montreal, is bound up in our having the shortest line by way of Sault Ste. Marie by which the traffic of the American North-West, as well as of the Canadian North-West, shall go to the ocean steamships. And then you get a first-class line because the great traffic will maintain it, because the great traffic will demand it, and you get all the accommodations and advantages and cheapnesses which belong to a first-class line and a great traffic. Sir, that line will give us the trade of about 400 miles in depth, as I estimate, from our boundary all across the continent. It will give us, at present, the trade to a point 60 or 70 miles south of St. Paul, and when shorter connections are made between that region and the South, for a still further distance. But 300 or 400 miles in depth by a continent in width are assured to us by that road. It will give us a trade not in the future. We are told to rejoice, because in ten years we will get a road through to the North-West and be able to do a trade with the people who will then be settled there. I propose that you adopt a scheme which in three years would give you a short route to the North-West, and therefore give you for seven years before your own scheme will do it and for all time thereafter access by rail to the North-West, and within three years and for all time thereafter the traffic of over 1,200,000 Americans on the south of the boundary. It is estimated that the population of the United States which would be tributary to that route, and which would be constantly increasing, would be as follows:—Northern Michigan, 125.000; Northern Wisconsin, 225,000; part of Minnesota, 600,000; Dakota, 135,000; Montana, 39,000; Washington territory, 65,000; Idaho, 30,000; or a total of 1,200,000 at present in these territories who would be tributary to our line. You get the whole trade of the Northern Pacific Railway, that great corporation, which has just started on a new lease of life, which has financed its enterprise and which is diligently spreading its lines, not merely to the west, but to the east, to reach the Sault. It is at Duluth now, and it is being built for 114 miles towards the Sault, from the Northern Pacific Junction, near Duluth. But by this line you get more; you get the shortest line from San Francisco to Europe. If you want to speculate on the future of the North-West I offer you a connection that enables you to speculate on that and on the south-west as well, and which gives you to-day the great west as a present boon. It is doubtful if the best route has been chosen. It is not impossible, but that a better

If you choose to take the sum of money and the quantity of Sault, I go for the shortest route, whether to the north or the south of Nipissing. I proposed long ago that the road should go to the south of Nipissing; if it were proved that that were practicable in connection with the interests of the railway. I thought the interests of my own Province made that fair and just; but the road which was proposed at that time was one of a different character-one which was to go by the Mattawa, and it was isolated from the Province. I ask for the shortest line in the interest of all. But I take, for the purpose of comparing the lines of communication, the distances, not by projected air lines, but by ascertained lines, as far as possible. I differ a little from the figures of the hon. Minister, I believe he gave us 460 and odd miles from Winnipeg to Duluth. I suppose that figure is correct; but it is wrong to take the distance to Duluth for the purpose of the calculation. You go only to the Northern Pacific Junction, which is 22 miles from Duluth, and you get a distance from Winnipeg not by direct line from Winnipeg, but by two sides of a right angled triangle of . 442 miles. At Emerson you strike the St. Paul, Minneapolis and Manitoba to Glyndon, thence by a round about way which could be shortened by 100 miles without difficulty. In fact a line has been surveyed which shows this. The hon, gentleman gave the figure of 410 miles from that point to the Sault. I have found some difficulty in ascertaining those figures on account of conflicting statements, but I accept the hon. gentleman's statement of figures. From the Sault to the South-East Bay I take 290 miles, which is more than has ever been taken before, and I believe more than it will be found to be when it is ultimately ascertained. I am told the sum of the chaining on the circuitous route is 294 miles, and I think 290 miles is a fair estimate. While an air line is only 234 miles from South-East Bay to Montreal it is 364 miles, or a total of 1,506 miles by the circuitous route from Winnipeg to Montreal. That route may be shortened at least 100 miles whenever the necessities of the case require. Now, the Canadian route, as I have made it out, is, from Winnipeg to Thunder Bay, 428 miles; from Thunder Bay to South East Bay, 663 miles; from South East Bay to Montreal, 1,455 miles, or somewhat shorter than the Sault route. The hon, gentleman makes it still shorter. He makes it to be 371 miles from Winnipeg to Linkoping Station. He assumes the Syndicate will follow the line from Linkoping, and he makes out his distance 34 miles shorter. Session he told us he was not certain they would not run straight on to Thunder Bay. No information have we had since enables us to judge of his present suggestion, and the information we had before was that the route was so embarrassed by a lake, I think called Dog Jake, not far from Thunder Bay, as to necessitate such a deflection and such an early junction at Thunder Bay as would make a comparatively trifling saving, if it were designed to join the line further up. But even taking the hon, gentleman's figures of 1,421 miles, and compare them with 1,506 miles, the Sault line is thus only eighty-five miles longer. I make it only 51 miles longer; and I am convinced it can be made 50 miles shorter. You may call the lines for practical purposes of the same length. What more does this route give us? It gives us a great summer route through our own territory; it gives us a route from Winnipeg to Thunder Bay of 428 miles, the cheapest route we can have, from Thunder Bay to Goulais Bay 220 miles, and from Goulais Bay to Montreal 654 miles, or 1,302 miles from Winnipeg to Montreal, taking the Lake Superior stretch. Now, you have got only the north-west winter traffic by the north shore line. The great bulk of the summer traffic will go by water, either to the Sault line, which, I believe, will be built, or down the lakes and not by route may yet be chosen between South-East Bay and the that North Shore route. That road will be constructed as the Union Pacific was constructed originally, and you all know now, I think, something of what that means. It will pass through a difficult country, rendered more difficult by the climatic conditions, without local trade, it will be surrounded by great difficulty of construction and operation, and will not be successful. The Lake Superior water route which you acquire, as well as the all rail route by the Sault, is of the first class. It presents, excepting in one particular, the best prospect of any water route; you have a deep lake, no canalling and good harbors. The largest sized vessels, therefore, can be used, and we know what economy there is in enlarging the size of the ship. You have a longer season; Lake Superior, owing to its great depth, is open much longer than the other lakes, and, of course, we know the longer the season the more convenient to the public, and the longer the season the shorter the dead season for the ship, and the cheaper she can run. There is, of course, one disadvantage, and that is the shortening of the run. There is no doubt a difficulty with reference to the terminal charges and delays in port that might possibly make the freight somewhat cheaper under equal conditions if the run were longer. Î believe these favorable conditions more than counter-balance any difficulty of that kind, and, at any rate, it has been demonstrated that with a large ship, you can carry grain very low upon the lakes. It gives you an admirable emigrant's road. You do not go on you an admirable emigrant's road. You do not go on American territory, which you are so afraid if the immigrants once get on they will never quit; you can take them right along to Goulais Bay, and keep them in your own territory, if necessary having a regiment at the frontier to keep off American agents. You can put them aboard your own boat and take them off, and you have an admirable route during the whole season of emigration, for the emigrants. So, whether you look at the unequalled rail and water route owned by yourselves, or the all rail route, partly within your own territory, you find you have admirable routes, and seven years earlier, but with traffic infinitely superior, and at an expense wholly nominal compared with your own line, at an expense of one-eleventh of your own line. Because, if your own line is 663 miles long, I venture to see with the hor Minister himself, that to say with the hon. Minister himself, that, to use as a basis of credit the funds necessary to construct 63 miles, would insure the construction of the whole 290 miles from S. E. Bay to the Sault. I do not say if you build 63 miles you will insure the construction of 290 miles, but I do say that if you use the cost of 63 miles as a basis of credit for the Company, you will sufficiently establish that Company to secure not merely 63 miles but also the remaining 227 miles, and to get the whole line. Now I have stated that this route is of vital consequence to Canada, irrespective of the North-West altogether. I say the prospects it opens to us are cheering in the extreme. I take as a point which is most reasonable, Glyndon, to which I have before referred, which is, if I remember aright, 132 miles to the south of the border and on the line of the Northern Pacific Railway. The distance from Glyndon to Montreal by the Sault would be 1,307 miles. A line by the Sault running down to South-East Bay, thence on to Brockville, and thence to New York, is the shortest line that can be obtained by any existing or even by any projected or reasonably devised means of communication. Therefore, if the Therefore, if the traffic from that point to New York is going to take the shortest route it will come through our territory all the way from the Sault Ste Marie to Brockville, and it will be 1,556 miles from Glyndon to New York, a saving of 299 miles. But if you suppose, as not unnatural, that the great railway companies via Chicago, Mr. BLAKE.

the distance from Glyndon to Montreal by our line with that from Glyndon by Chicago to New York, you will find that the latter gives a saving to Montreal of 299 miles. If you take Boston, rising in importance as a port, the shortest line to Boston from Glyndon would be down to Brockville, and it would be 1,600 miles, or 293 miles longer than the distance to Montreal. If you take the travelled route, by which the trade would most likely go, by way of Chicago, it is 1,662 miles to Boston; that is a saving in favor of Montreal of 355 miles. Then you must add the 250 miles saving in the ocean passage between New York and Liverpool and Montreal and Liverpool, and you will get, on the whole, in land and water, some 500 or 600 miles shorter distance from Glyndon by the Port of Montreal than by way of the great Atlantic ports in the United States. I believe that is a controlling advantage. I do not assert that it would sceure all the traffic against the gigantic competition, the determined competition, which would, no doubt, be exhibited in favor of the existing roads; but I have no doubt whatever that the Northern Pacific would desire, and it would be to their interests so to do, to take the traffic right along to the Sault Ste. Marie, which would give them 300 or 400 miles more of transportation over their own lines, and all the traffic that they could control would go there. It is also to the interests of St. Paul to send their stuff by the shortest route to market, and seeing we have the combined advantage of 300 miles of rail and 250 miles of water, we are bound, in my opinion, if only we act in time, and stretch forth our hands towards the future that is waiting us, to obtain it. This is the time; these roads are all more or less in process of construction; the Northern Pacific, as I have said, is determined to complete its line eastward from the junction near Duluth to Montreal River, about 100 miles; the line is surveyed, and is now being cut out; a company has been organized to build the next link of about 50 miles, this brings you to the terminus of the Marquette, Houghton & Outonagon R. W., which is to make connection there, and of which 63 miles between L'Anse and Marquette are already built; then you have the Marquette & Maikinaw Railway right down to the Straits, of which one-half is now built and the rest is to be finished by August of this year or next. Then there is also to be built the thirty or forty miles to the Sault Ste. Marie, and there is no doubt whatever that it would be immediately built the moment it was seen that the River St. Marie was to be crossed and the connection to be made with Montreal. Therefore everything is pointing to the completion of the connection on the American side within a very brief time, and we ought to bestir ourselves in order to meet them, and if we do bestir ourselves we shall have, at the earliest moment, the connection made. It is important that we should get it at the earliest moment, and that we should make this connection just as soon as these people are ready to make it, and, therefore, it is a question that is pressing for immediate consideration upon the House. The hon gentleman opposite said last year in Montreal and Toronto, that he quite agreed that the construction of the Sault Ste. Marie line would be to the public interest, because it would give a short route to the North-West and could be presently used to get the American trade. I believe that if we can get the American trade we cannot but hold our own. Do you suppose that if you will go and take the trade for 300 or 400 miles south of the boundary, that the Canadian trade will go by other roads? Do you suppose they will not prefer to go that way when the Americans, from their business point of view, prefer to use it? Every man must believe, as the Minister does, that we will take the American trade by the Sault line, and we must which at present engross that trade, compete for such of it believe that we will keep our own trade. My views upon this as is going to New York, and if you compare subject are maintained by the report of the engineer in the last Session. He pointed out in strong terms that both by land and water the route of this line was admirable; that the railway would command the traffic of all the country north of St. Paul; that was a cautious statement, and my belief is that it would take the traffic of a considerable area to the southward of St. Paul. This is by no means an Ontario question. The road you purpose to take, and I am not saying a word against it, the 63 miles of your projected line, whether you go to the Sault or to Thunder Bay, would not bring Ontario any nearer to the North-West or any further from it, as compared with Montreal. The interests of Ontario are not different from the interests of Quebec; there is the common interest of carrying the great trade of the North-West by rail, at the earliest possible moment, to the sea, and of getting at the earliest moment a first class summer route for emigrants and freight within our own boundaries. Both these objects are common, and in both we have more than a merely local interest. One plan, the north shore line, proposes to build 650 miles of railway in my province whilst the Sault plan only gives 290 miles of road to be built in it; but any person who, for that reason alone would support the first, would be unworthy to be a member of this House. What we are bound to do is to consider which line is the best for the whole country, and I am sure that no man from Ontario would put it upon any other ground. I contend that my province has nothing like the interest of the Province of Quebec in this matter, but we have the general interest, that interest which we have in common with all the other provinces, in the lightening of the general burdens by minimizing the expenses, by not spending money unnecessarily, by not building this 600 miles over a desolate country which will pay little or nothing which will not be finished for ten years, when at the expense of constructing one-eleventh of that distance you can do a great good, and do it in less than three years. We are interested in doing the best for the North-West, and we are interested in common with all in that. We are interested in the trade and commerce of the North-West, being taxed as lightly as possible, and why? Because we are paying millions every year to maintain the North-West; because it is our direct interest—the interest of all of us—to see the North-West self-sustaining as soon as possible; because its being self-sustaining depends upon a population getting in there and thriving after they have got in; and because their getting in and thriving afterwards depend upon traffic facilities being given in the earliest and best way. And therefore the good rail and water route given by Goulais Bay and Thunder Bay, and the short all rail route given by the Sault line and the Pembina branch, are things which on the score of economy and on the score of the interests of the North-West, ought to commend themselves to every man from every province. We all know where the grain from the North-West will go. It will not go to the Province of Ontario, but it will go where it ought to go, to the port of Montreal; and from thence will come again the great mass of the return freights. All the goods to be imported from foreign countries will naturally be sold from Montreal, because the return cars must be brought from there full or empty, and very much better rates can be obtained under these circumstances for traffic to the West. And as to manufactures, that large class of staple articles which are manufactured in Montreal will, of course, go up from Montreal; and sugar, if only the producers of that article will not place it higher than the article will bear, as well as cottons, woollens, and so forth, will principally go up from that section of the country. Our share in the direct advantage of this trade is, in my judgment, comparatively modest and insignificant. I believe it comparatively modest and insignificant. important to my province, that we should obtain a connection and get a share of that traffic, if we can; we are going to do it, I hope; but I believe—I say it frankly, and I do not say it regretfully—that the great and signal naturally our own, but in order to make the hest, the nearest, advantage of the plan I suggest alternatively, goes to the point at which the ocean steamship meets the railway car, and that is the port of Montreal. We will, no doubt, send up some manufactured goods, and we will receive some articles from that country, but the lion's share will go to Montreal. And, I believe, we all rejoice at the prosperity of Montreal. I believe we, from Ontario, are inclined to look at Montreal as our ocean port. For a long time our goods were not only brought, but sold there. We are beginning to do a little for ourselves now; but our relations with that port must always be of an intimate character, and we must believe that anything that advances its prosperity must be of general advantage to all who get and send their goods by that route. Now, I can understand, even if I cannot sympathize with that sort of feeling which, in other circumstances, would be rather apprehensive of trade going south. I could understand the hon, gentleman's putting in a clause saying that no man should build a railway in a particular direction or within fifteen miles from the United States frontier unless he belonged to the Syndicate; I could understand his saying that, if our conditions differed. But, since we have the key of the position, since when the stuff does go south, it must, by the laws of trade, find our shores again by the Sault Ste. Marie, since all that it goes away for is to come back again, since it can only go by another route at a manifest disadvantage, since by that line we are going to tap the American trade, I cannot understand the carrying to such an extraordinary extent the objection to using other people's lines for our own purposes as is implied in the suggestion that it is wrong to have a south-westerly I maintain that we will be able to control the traffic of the North West legitimately, and I do not want to control it in any other way. I do not believe we have the right,-speaking for posterity, speaking for the future of a country which you say contains 250,000,000 acres of fertile and habitable land-a country which contains such an area of fertile and habitable land that the largest of our Provinces shrinks into utter insignificance in comparison—we have no right to say, still less have we the right to expect, that the commercial prosperity of that country shall be kept dependent on any other consideration than what will be to the highest advantage to the producers and consumers of that country—what will give them the cheapest route to market. But it is our good fortune that their and our interests will harmonize, because we can not only give them the cheapest route to market, but we can point out to them that their cheapest route to market takes their stuff to our own ports, and takes their imports from our own ports. All we have to do to accomplish that result is to utilize the American lines. Now, Sir, what do they do? Why, Sir, the western peninsula of Ontario is streaked with lines loaded with American traffic. The Great Western has two lines, the Grand Trunk two lines, and the Canada Southern line, currying thousands and thousands of tons of American traffic. Why do they send it through our country? Because it suits them; because it supplies the best route for them. They do not feel that it is anti-national to go through Canadian territory. They do not feel that there is anything humiliating in it—that there is anything wrong in it. What do we do? Why we send our roads through American territory. The Government the other day proposed to pay £300,000 for the purchase of a line from the Grand Trunk Railway in Canadian territory, on the condition that the money was to be used in such a way that the public interests would be advanced-how? By the Grand Trunk acquiring a line through U.S. territory to Chicago, and properly so, for commerce knows no boundary line in this matter. Commerce seeks to make use of our neighbors' roads-not in order to make connections which might be the cheapest commercial connections between the two parts of our own country. If, Sir, we can annex commercially a part of Minnesota—as the hon. gentleman said the other day: Why not do it? But I want to go further, I want to annex, not only Minnesota, but Wisconsin, Michigan, Dakota, Montana, Idaho, and Washington Territory. I believe they can be annexed to a great extent if you direct your energies and use your scanty resources wisely, and so get rapidly this efficient line, instead of spending ten years and many millions of money in struggling along the north shore of Lake Superior to find your way to the North-West. Of course, everything in reference to the problem of transportation is in a state of transition. Not merely is the cost by railway diminishing and likely to diminish, but also, owing to other circumstances, the cost by water though our routes is likely to diminish. Our water-ways are being enlarged, and it is said by experienced persons that even that measure of enlargement which is being given, will enable grain, under the most advantageous circumstances, to be carried 45 to 50 per cent cheaper than it can be carried at present in the full size Welland canal vessels. The problem, which of the two agencies, rail or water, will win in the competition for transportation, may be said to be in doubt. The actual cost, not including profit, to take the grain from Selkirk to Thunder Bay, 400 miles, would be on an average road 4 cents. I have already said that you can double freights on that railway, and therefore you may fairly count the rate of actual cost, at  $2\frac{1}{2}$  cents, making no allowance for profit at all. It is pretty clear, I think, from what information I have been able to gather, that you can freight the grain in large vessels on Lake Superior at from  $1\frac{1}{2}$  to  $2\frac{1}{2}$  cents from Prince Arthur's Landing to Coulois Rey, the appellor sup being the county Landing to Goulais Bay, the smaller sum being the actual cost, and the larger one embracing a profit; and the average rate from Goulais to Montreal is 61 cents, making a total of 10½ cents. If you go by the lakes, you pay 2½ cents to Thunder Bay and thence to Montreal 7 cents making a total of 9½ cents for actual cost exclusive of profit, so that at present both routes are nearly equal, and at present both routes are very good if only you resolve not to hand over those advantages which you have bought and paid for to others that they may profit by them, instead of your countrymen. I have to advert to another topic of minor, but still of great importance. I do not think that the facilities and regulations as to rates for connection with Ontario line are adequate. I quite agree that the system might perhaps be adequate, if this great corporation had its terminus and the end of its connections at a given point, at Lake Nipissing, but it is obvious from what we know of the position of the Syndicate, from the very contract itself, which contemplates the amalgamation of the Canada Central with the railway company, from the powers given it to purchase other railway companies, that we are or may be dealing with a corporation composed of one gigantic railway stretching all the way to Montreal. If the object is to take traffic from that railway at Lake Nipissing, it is clear there are devices known to astute railway men by which that may be avoided. They may charge to Nipissing a very high rate from the West. It would be no consequence to them if a low rate were charged from Nipissing to Montreal on the line of the Canada Central. You will be dealing with a corporation whose interests will lead it to send the traffic in a particular direction and you must guard carefully against wrong. Now I want nothing for the Province of Ontario except to secure that she shall not be placed at a disadvantage. I am sure no hon, gentleman will refuse her that. What I want is that she shall be so guarded that she shall have a fair chance to compete for that modest share of the traffic that ought to come to her, and I do not believe that this security is given her. Now, I cannot Mr. BLAKE.

brought down to Parliament, how it it is that Ministers who, during the last session of Parliament, told us that they were able without infringing upon or burdening the resources of the country to construct the Pacific Railway, should bring down a plan which does not relieve us from the burden of its construction, which obliges us to go on spending our money for ten years to come, which involves a total expenditure by as of $60,000,000, and the total cession of 25,000,000 acres of our choicest lands, and which hands over to a private corporation the whole profits of that expenditure and a vast monopoly and incalculable boons of various kinds. The hon. gentlemen did go too far last session. They insisted on building at once in British Columbia. They alarmed the country by what they did. Had they proceeded in the business-like way suggested, had they gone on with the Thunder Bay branch and the prairie section, had they agreed that our finances could not stand the strain of building in British Columbia, there would have been no reason for them to do the thing they have done and invite Parliament to pass the contract they have laid before us. But they did that thing, they made those statements which the public mind did not credit, and they felt that they were bound to make some other arrangement to escape from the difficulty into which they had plunged themselves. They go to England and they make the attempt. It turns out that they did not succeed in England. The First Minister said that they had very nearly failed, and that when they left England they had not succeeded in making a bargain at ail, that details which were so vital that disagreement upon them would nullify the whole proceedings were still in suspense when they came here, and remained in suspense some six or seven weeks after they arrived. Prudence demanded that they should simply say that negotiations were going on and that they hoped to succeed in arriving at a conclusion; but the hon. gentlemen would not wait. They announced a triumph; they announced that they had already made their bargain; that the contract was "firm;" and by such an announcement placed themselves in the hands of those gentlemen who formed the Syndicate. They could not afford thereafter to differ from those gentlemen. In what position were they to differ from them. The hon. Minister had announced, and the people had accepted his utterance, that a bargain had been made which would ensure the construction of the railway without cost to the people, and induce a great flow of immigration into the North-West. What in the world could he say if, after being here seven weeks, he should be obliged to give the lie to those declarations and to say: "I had made no bargain at all, I had only agreed upon some certain general lines. All those details remained unsettled when I spoke to you, the Syndicate and we could not agree to terms, and consequently we are where we That would indeed have been a great humiliation. To the chance of that humiliation he exposed himself, and in order to avoid it I do not doubt he has passed many anxious hours struggling with the men in whose toils he had placed himself, and endeavouring to obtain some terms less bad than those to which he has been obliged to submit in the end, struggling from day to day, scrutinizing, considering, and endeavouring to get these gentlemen to take something less than the bargain they insisted upon. They knew that the First Minister could not afford to declare that what he had stated was not correct, and that they could press him to bargain after bargain, to stipulation after stipulation, point after point, additional pound of flesh to additional pound of flesh, until they had their fill; thus it is that this contract has been prepared. A contract might have been presented containing altogether other terms which might have been worthy of our adoption. This contract is worthy, in my opinion, only our rejection. I shall not venture to hope that this House will reject it, but I do not doubt that understand why it is that this monstrous bargain has been an indignant country, although you will not give it time now to raise its voice, will take the earliest opportunity to inflict a summary penalty upon those persons, offenders for the second time, who having once betrayed, when entrusted with power their country's honour, and having been forgiven, have now taken advantage of the opportunity which a too confiding people conferred upon them to betray in the same transaction her most vital and material interests.

Mr. LANGEVIN. At this late hour of the evening, I think hon. gentlemen will agree with me, it would be better to adjourn: I accordingly will move that the Committee rise and report progress.

The Committee rose and reported.

House resumed; and (at 11:45 o'clock, p.m.,) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 16th December, 1880.

NEW MEMBER.

The SPEAKER informed the House that the Clerk of the House had received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery a certificate of the election and return of P.Valin, Esq., for the Electoral District of Montmorency.

The hon. member was introduced by Mr. Langevin and Mr. Ca-on, and took his seat.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD presentel a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message, as follows:—

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I thank you heartily for your loyal and dutiful Address. You may rely upon my earnest wish to co-operate with you in your efforts to improve the welfare of the people of the Dominion.

LORNE.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. BOWELL moved that a Select Committee comprising Messrs. Bechard, Charlton, Colby, Desjardins, McDonald (Cape Breton), Ross (Middlesex), Scriver, Stephenson and White (Cardwell), be appointed to supervise the official report of the Debates during the present Session.

Motion agreed to.

HALIFAX INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL.

Mr. RICHEY introduced a Bill to amend chapter 32 of the Acts of 33 Victoria (1870), intituled: "An Act to empower the Police Court of the City of Halifax to sentence juvenile offenders to be detained in the Halifax Industrial School."

Mr. ANGLIN asked the hon, member to explain the purport of the Bill.

Mr. RICHEY said that, under the Act which it was proposed to amend, the Police Court of Halifax had power to send juvenile offenders to the Industrial School of Halifax, instead of sending them to prison or penitentiary, and to assess for their maintenance. A great difficulty had been occasioned by persons offering inducements to the boys to escape from the control and management of the Industrial School, and it was proposed by the present Bill to impose ducements to boys to escape, or harbored them or prevented them from returning to the School shall, on conviction, be liable to a penalty not exceeding $80. That was the purport of the Bill, and it was found necessary to introduce it in order to give effect to the Act.

Bill read the first time.

SUPREME COURT ACT.

Mr. KEELER introduced a Bill to repeal the Supreme and Exchequer Court Acts and the Act amending the same.

Mr. ANGLIN. Objection was made last year, by myself, to the introduction of a measure of this kind. My feeling then was that the House should have met a proposal of this kind in limine, declaring at once that it saw no reason to entertain it. The leader of the House, however, declared at the time that to permit its first reading should be regarded merely as an act of courtesy to the member intro-ducing the Bill, and in that view of the matter I shall offer no opposition to the first reading of this Bill.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I went a little further last year. I said that all measures should be accepted at the first stage unless they were objectionable on their face, placing as little limit as possible, not merely upon the freedom of discussion, but upon the freedom of any member to bring up any subject for discussion. My hon, friend has strong opinions with respect to the constitution of this Court, and he has a right to be heard. My opinions with regard to it are the same as last year, but I shall listen, as it is my duty to do, to all the arguments my hon, friend will advance.

Bill read the first time.

CONTRACT FRAUDS.

Mr. CASGRAIN introduced a Bill for the better prevention of fraud in relation to contracts involving the expenditure of public money.

Mr. DESJARDINS. Explain.

Mr. CASGRAIN. It has been observed, for a number of years, that contractors for Government works have resorted to many means in order to defraud the Government of getting the benefit of the lowest tender. We have seen, of late, that in some of the public departments private information has been given to intending contractors, in order either that contracts might be withdrawn, or that securities given by contractors might be withheld. In a case which lately occurred it appears that the Government has been the loser, by an exchange of contracts, to the sum of nearly $217,000. This is a fraud practiced against the public Treasury. A law ought to be framed that will reach all such delinquents. The Bill I now propose is intended to prevent a recurrence of such cases as we have lately seen. The Bill also proof such cases as we have lately seen. The Bill also provides that all public contractors shall be forbidden, under severe penalty, to subscribe, either directly or indirectly, to election funds. It is notorious that in recent cases immense sums of money have been subscribed by private individuals in the hope of getting contracts thereafter. The Bill provides for the punishment of such persons, and also of such persons as allow the secrets of their department to leak out in order to favor certain parties—a punishment both by fine and imprisonment in order to attach a mark of odium to persons guilty of such practices. I will willingly resign this Bill to the Government if they will take charge of it, as I think it is their duty to do. If not, I shall do my utmost to pross its passage through the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would apply to this Bill the same remarks as I made with reference to the Bill penalties upon persons who were accessories to their escape. just introduced by the hon, member for East Northumber-The Bill provided that any person who aided or offered in-land (Mr. Keeler). At the same time, I think my hon. friend should have reserved the statements he has just made until the Bill was printed, so that, when we went into discussion on the Bill, those statements might be answered.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I would not have made those remarks had I not been asked by the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins) to explain the Bill.

STANDARD OF THE PACIFIC RAILWAY.

The House resumed the consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Blake for an address for copies of statement, evidence, &c., on which the Government based their judgment in accepting the Union Pacific Railway, as the same was when first constructed, as the standard regulating the quality and character of the proposed Canadian Pacific Railway; &c., &c.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not think I should have taken any part in this discussion but for the extravagant statements made by the hon. member for North Norfolk in relation to the condition of the Union Pacific Railway after its construction. That hon, member said that the Union Pacific Railway-which, it will be remembered, was that part of the road between Omaha, on the Missouri river, and the point of junction with the Central Pacific road—was of the most flimsy description; that the ties were of cottonwood, the ballast of frozen earth, that the rails were of inferior iron, and that the road was built upon stilts. I considered that it was hardly possible that a road of that character could have been capable of carrying its traffic, and I venture to refer to the Railway Manual to show that, in the year 1872, when the road was yet a young road-and everybody knows that roads have their periods of growth and development, and that the ballasting and otherwise strengthening and completing a road, is one of gradual progress — it would not have been capable of carrying the traffic which it did carry, and of carning what the returns show it did earn, if it was such a road as the hon, gentleman has asserted. In that year, the Union Pacific earned no less a sum than $7,500,000, and that large carning must have been mainly on through traffic; it must have embraced the whole of the road; and it was necessary, in order to earn that money, that every part of the road should have been in good condition. The impression which the hon, gentleman gave to the House by the very ingenious manner in which he made his statement, was that the road was not in a position to realize earnings at all. But, Sir, nearly one-half the total carnings of the railway were freight earnings. And this hon, gentleman must know-if he knows anything of railway traffic-that it would have been impossible to have carried freight traffic over a road such as he described. Now in constructing new lines through an uninhabited country, one to which it is intended that the railway shall induce settlement, it is absolutely necessary, in order to reach objective points, in order to get the lumber and the material for ballasting, in order to meet the other necessities of railway construction, such as carrying forward the workmen and their provisions, that the line shall be somewhat hastily constructed at first, and afterwards it is rendered serviceable for the purposes of traffic. In the meantime, however, the necessities of the case may force some business upon the road; but everybody knows it is to the interests of the parties who own and operate the road to make it as safe and firm as possible. And though, in some respects, the terms employed in the clause of the contract may be open to the criticisms which have been bestowed upon it by the hon leader of the Opposition, and by his active and eloquent supporter, the member for by his active and eloquent supporter, the member for permanent roadway without using steel rails; and my hon. North Norfolk, I wish to point out that the word "con-friend knows that no one would now think of building structed" is here used in the past tense; but as I am not a lawyer, I shall leave it to those who are better able than I because the great competition which exists is sufficient Sir John A. Macdonald.

to construe the expression in a legal sense. But I take the opportunity of saying that I am glad that attention has been drawn by hon. gentlemen opposite to the Union Pacific, as it is at present the only completed road which bears any analogy to the road which we are now discussing in this House. The Union Pacific was chartered by the United States Government. The subsidy which it was to receive was not to be paid until the line should have been constructed. I admit, as the hon, gentleman says, that the road was built during a period of great inflation in the United States; that it was a vast undertaking filled with great practical difficulties; but it was, at the same time, an initial undertaking, and could have been built with less difficulty after the gradients and other engineering difficulties had been ascertained. The company was incorporated by two Acts of Congress, one approved on 1st July, 1862, and the other on 1st July, 1864, and they provided for a Government subsidy equal to $16,000 per mile for that portion of the line between the Missouri River and the base of the Rocky Mountains; $48,000 per mile for a distance of 150 mile through the mountain range; $32,000 per mile for thes distance intermediate—the Rocky and the Sierra Nevada ranges, $48,000 per mile for a distance of 150 miles through the Sierra Nevada. The whole distance, as estimated by the Government, from Omaha to the navigable waters of the Pacific at Sacramento, Cal., is 1,800 miles. The company has also a land grant equalling 12,800 acres per mile. The original Act provided that the Government subsidy should be a first mortgage on the road; but by a subsequent amendment it was made a second mortgage, the company being authorized to issue its own bonds to an amount equal to the Government lien as a first mortgage on the line.

Mr. ANGLIN. May I ask if the grant was paid in gold or currency?

Mr. PLUMB. It was paid in bonds, and these bonds, as compared with gold, were atabout 40 or 50 per cent. discount.

Mr. CHARLTON. Were United States bonds worth more than currency at that time, or were they merely standing at par in currency?

Mr. PLUMB. No; I say that gold at that time, in the parlance of the day, was at a premium; but United States currency, as the hon, gentlemen knows, was fluctuating from four and five and ten per cent. up to 270 or 280. It finally fell back to par.

Mr. CHARLTON. But were not these currency bonds?

Mr. PLUMB. Certainly; but I do not think that the position. It was perfectly well under-that the cost of construction was enoralters stood that mously increased by the condition of the currency of the United States, and that that was taken into account in granting the subsidy. I cannot believe that the statement of the hon, gentleman was made in utter ignorance of the necessities which govern the construction of long lines of road such as the one now under discussion. Nor can I suppose that the hon, gentleman, if he had been an impartial observer of this whole question, would have failed to see that the gentlemen who have undertaken this contract must avail themselves of those advantages in building it under which it can be run and operated-must, in fact, build a good road, as it is in their interest to do so. It may be said that the Union Pacific Railway was laid with iron rails. That is true; there were no steel rails in those days; but everyone knows that the economy of running railways is now so defined, that no one would attempt to build a with cottonwood ties and frozen earth for ballast, security against anything of that kind. But I say the Union Pacific Railway, as constructed, must be the Union Pacific Railway which was accepted, and which received the I presume the United States Government understood their business well enough to know that it was a road capable of being operated, and capable of performing the functions for which it was constituted, before they gave the subsidy to it which they agreed to give; and I presume the cases are parallel. But I wish to say that I think it will be found inconvenient to have discussions on the subject which is engressing the attention of Parliament sprung upon us every day, and running in parallel lines, while the same subject is being discussed by the same persons upon the same question. While we shrink from no discussion of this matter, while we think, as the discussion goes on from day to day, that the contract will be strengthened in the estimation of the country, it is certainly desirable, in order that it should be discussed clearly, fairly and dispassionately, as I know hon gentlemen on the other side are desirous of discussing it, that we should confine it to one single discussion. As a private supporter of the Government, I do not venture to make that suggestion in any other sense than as I think it will appeal to the general good sense of the House. We are here to do a very important work,—the most important, perhaps, that has been done in any Parliament of Canada,—and no gentleman wishes, I fancy, to introduce a double discussion merely in order to delay and hamper the public business, or distract the attention of the country. For my part, I am desirous that this question, exactly as it stands, on its own merits, should be submitted to the scrutiny of the people of this Dominion, and I have no doubt about the result. There may be clouds thrown about it, there may be dust thrown in the eyes of the people, special pleading may affect it, but in the end the good sense of the people of this Dominion, to whom we have not appealed in vain within the last three years, will triumph over any special pleadings and sophistries.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). I think it is not desirable, upon the present motion, to enter upon a full discussion of the terms of the contract, and I only rise to call attention to one fact that ought not to be lost sight of in reference to the standard of the Union Pacific Railroad. The words in the present contract, if I recollect rightly, are, "as originally constructed." It is possible that that expression is not sufficiently definite, but when we look at the history of the Union Pacific, and bear in mind one particular fact in reference to it, I think we will be justified in assuming that that expression must be read in this way—"at the time of its final completion." A railroad cannot be considered to be constructed until it is completed, if it is constructed under an agreement whereby a company or a government must accept it, the date of that acceptance must be regarded as the date of its construction. For my part, if the present contract was susceptible of being interpreted in the sense in which the member for North Norfolk desired to interpret it, that we were to have a road such as the Union Pacific was when it was first laid with rails, and when it was first opened for traffic, we would have much reason to be dissatisfied. But and this point having been discussed in Congress, an Act of Congress was passed under which a Commission was appointed for the purpose of ascertaining and defining when the Union Pacific Railroad was completed, and at what date it was to be accepted by the Government. That Commission made its report, which was adopted by Congress, and I find that the date which that Commission decided was the date of the completion of the road was the constructed in such manner as the Union Pacific was on the 30th December, 1868, the hon. gentleman will when it was accepted by the Government of the United States,—that is the 1st of October, 1874.

Mr. BLAKE. I may be permitted to observe, as several hon, gentlemen on the other side have stated that the discussion was inopportune, that in moving for this information I said not one word as to the character of the Union Pacific Railway. I simply pointed out that its character, as first constructed, was important to learn, because it was the standard to be adopted for the Canadian Pacific, It was the hon. Minister of Railways proceeding to discuss what the standard of the Union Pacific was which drew out this discussion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon, gentleman is quite right in saying that he did not promote the original discussion, and I quite agree with my hon, friend from Niagara, and the hon, member for South Victoria, that it is desirable to confine the discussion within its natural boundaries on the main motion which invites the attention of the House. I simply say this—that the House, including my hon, friend who makes this motion, will find that there is full and ample security made for a good standard for the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). My hon. friend from West Durham made simply an ordinary motion. That motion was met in a very peculiar way by the Minister of Railways and Canals. The hon. Minister attempted to justify that particular term of the contract. He referred to the construction of the Union Pacific Railway, and pointed out that it was in all respects, if my memory serves me right, a good railway, that its standard was taken from the Ohio and Baltimore Railway, which was one of the best constructed railways in the United States, and that, therefore, the Union Pacific having been constructed after the model of the Ohio and Baltimore, and the latter being a first-class railway, the Union Pacific must, of course, be of an equally high standard; and consequently the Canadian Pacific Railway would have to be a first-class road as well. Now, hon, gentlemen on this side, were not satisfied with this statement. The hon. member for Niagara rose in his place to contradict the statements made by my hon, friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) as to to the character of the Union Pacific Railway. The hon, gentleman read from a report, a long, able and valuable report which had been presented to Congress, to show that the Union Pacific Railway, when first constructed when first constructed, was an Pacific Railway, admirable road, and, therefore, that the statements of the hon, member for North Norfolk with respect to the road were altogether erroneous. The hon, member for Victoria (Mr. Cameron), particularly took the same ground, practically, he argued, that this road was not finally constructed unti lOctober, 1874. Nobody disputes that in October, 1874, the Union Pacific Railway was a tolerably good railway; and if we take the condition of the Union Pacific, in 1874, as a standard, then, perhaps, on that ground, one might assent to the proposition of the hon. Minister of Railways. But the hon. member for Victoria forgot to state that 890 miles of the Union Pacific Railway, that portion of it extending from Omaha to the junction at Muddy Forks and Black's Forks, were completed and accepted by the United States Government in the end of 1868 or the beginning of 1869; and it was the balance of the road that was not accepted, and was not received until away on in the seventies, in 1873 or 1874. If that is the case, and that it is the case, the hon gentleman will find, on reference to the reports presented to the Senate of the United States. then we are bound to take the condition of that road as it stood in the end of 1868 or beginning of 1809 as the standard of the 1st of October, 1874. It seems to me that the proper inter-Canadian Pacific Railway. On reference to the pretation of this contract is, therefore, that this road is to be report founded on a joint resolution of both Houses find that the character of the road is entirely different to that which the hon. Minister of Railways, the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb), and the hon member for Victoria (Mr. Cameron), say it was. Now, I regret to have to make any observations on the present occasion. Any observations that I proposed making on this question, I intended making when discassing the propositions brought down; but I do not wish that it should go abroad to the country, either out of the mouth of the Minister of Railways, or of the honorable members for Niagara or Victoria, that this road was practically a first-class road as at first constructed, without taking the very earliest opportunity to show that such a statement is entirely erroneous. The honorable member for Niagara, if I am not very much mistaken, read from a report presented to Congress, and which will be found in the Congressional documents of 1873-4, a report made long after the road from Omaha to the junction at Muddy Forks and Black's Forks was completed.

Mr. PLUMB. I am very sorry to interrupt the flow of eloquence of the honorable gentleman, but I did not read from the report of 1873-4.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). Perhaps the hon. gentleman will tell us from what report he read.

Mr. PLUMB. The hon. gentleman will find I quoted from the report of 1872-3.

Mr. CAMERON. It makes no difference. The hon. gentleman will find, in the executive documents of the United States on that subject, the report of 1873-4 in the volume containing the report of 1872-3. But what I contend is, that the hon, gentleman did not read the portions of the report which show the character of the road. If he will refer to that report, he will find it stated that the road bed in many places was altogether too narrow, that the ties on which the iron was laid extended beyond the road bed, that the tunnels were arched with wood, that the wood work after two or three years was found to be defective, that the Commissioner recommended the tunnels to be rebuilt from beginning to end, that the bridges were nearly all of wood, that the engineers reported them wholly inefficient for the carrying trade of the section of the country through which the road passed, that the ballasting was exceedingly bad, that the ties were of an exceedingly defective character from one end to the other, being made of cottonwood, that the curves of the road were too sharp and the grades too steep; and yet this is the road that the hon gentleman said. was a road after the standard of which the Canadian Pacific Railway might well be built. And this report, from which the hon. gentleman read, was a report that was presented, after the United States Government had taken from the hands of the contractors 890 miles of road. It was a report presented to Congress, recommending that 61 million dollars additional be expended to put the road into anything like a good state of efficiency; and this was long after the road had, to all intents and long after the road had, to all intents and purposes, been completed. If the hon, gentleman had taken the trouble to refer to another report presented to Congress on the 9th October, 1868, after the 890 miles had been completed and examinen by the Commissioners appointed to investigate into the condition of the road, he would have found out the exact condition of this portion of the Union Pacific Railway extending from Omaha 890 miles westward. In that report which I hold in my hands, and which is signed by the three Commissioners, Mr. Warren and Mr. Blickensderfer and another whose name I forget, the hon, gentleman will find a statement showing the true character of this road as it then stood, which proves that the statements made by the hon. Minister of Railways and the Mr. CAMERON (Huren).

because I do not want it to go abroad to the country that this Union Pacific Railway, at the time it was first constructed, was a first class road, and that, therefore, hon. gentlemen were justified in using it as a model after which to construct the Canadian Pacific Railway. You will see that, in this report, the Commissioners have gone to very considerable trouble and labour in pointing out the defects and deficiencies of the Union Pacific Railway. At page 24 of this executive document they point out that in six different places, extending over forty or fifty miles, the grades were 80 feet to the mile. At another place the grades were 90, and in another 116-feet. Curves were too sharp, and the road was in other respects altogether defective. report reads as follows:

"Although generally the line is well adapted to the ground, there are points where the full capabilities of the country have not been developed, and others where, in its details, the location is radically wrong. In a majority of these cases the prevailing idea seems to have been to diminish the cost of the work by the introduction of a greater number and sharper curves than the circumstances required, the saving in cost having been very small in comparisom with the permanent injury to the road. In some other instances no very clear motive for the course taken presents itself. We are advised that among these cases are some where, in the construction of the road, the location, as made by the Chief Engineer, was disregarded. In view of the rapid prosecution of the work, this may have been admissible, but cannot justify a permanent adoption of the line as built. True economy and the best interests of the road require alterations and improvements to be made in the line in all these cases, and the probable cost thereof has therefore been estimated."

And under the head of "road-hed" the Commissioners

And under the head of "road-bed," the Commissioners say:

"The road-bed is designed to have embankments 14ft. wide on top, with usual side-slopes and cuts of not less than 16ft. width of bottom, which slopes depend on the material excavated. These dimensions although a minimum, are not specially objectionable when fully attained. In the excavations and embankments of moderate height these dimensions have been generally secured, but the higher embankments are not so well have been generally secured, but the higher embankments are not so well brought to the proper standard, being often incomplete and, in some instances, the width at the top is less than the length of the ties. When the roadway is too narrow and ballast is required, it is impossible preperly to supply the deficiency, for when the track is lifted for the purpose of placing ballast under the ties, the width of the embankment is insufficient to retain the material in its place. It becomes necessary, therefore, to have a sufficient width of roadway before one of the most indispensible requisites for a good track can be secured."

They then refer to the cuts not being all to grade—

"Not having been excavated to the depth designed, in consequence of which the grades at those points are higher than was intended, in some cases reaching 90ft. per mile, when much easier grades are shown on the

They then allude to the cross-ties, as follows:

"The cross-ties are of good quality, with the exception of a considerable portion used in the Platte Valley, which are of cottonwood timber, which although "burnetized" are liable to premature decay, besides being objectionable from the inefficient manner in which they retain the spikes. Many had to be replaced, and all would have to be replaced by ties of better timber before the track would sustain the traffic expected to be thrown upon it."

So the Commissioners go on to point out where defects existed with regard to the road-bed, curves, grades, embankments, ballasting and many other particulars in reference to the equipment of the road with which I will not trouble the House, but the road was wholly defective and inefficient. They made an estimate of what it would cost to make it a first class road with ad urable basis. The report winds up by saying:

"In estimating the expenditure which would be required in order that the road so far as built may be rendered equal to a fully complete first-class railroad, we have considered each class of work required in as much class railroad, we have considered each class of work required in as much detail as circumstances and the desire expressed in our instructions will permit." "Changing the location of the road, to improve the line-$200,000; completing the embankments to the full width, $249,000; completing excavation of cuts to the proper grade, $200,000; reducing grades between Omaha and Elkhorn, to conform with condition on which change of line was approved, $245,000; cross-ties to replace the cotton wood, $525,000; ballasting, etc., $910,000."

And so they go on until they make up an aggregate of $6,489,550, required to put the 890 miles completed into hon, member for Niegara are wholly fallacious and incorrect. anything like an efficient state of repair; and yet this road Sir, I will trouble the House for a moment, with a reference is to be taken as the standard at that time—not in 1874—as to one or two of the particulars contained in this report, the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. H. Cameron) says, for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Why. I was perfectly surprised and astounded at the statement of the Minister of Canals and Railways, and which is reported in the Debates of Parliament, as to the reason, or, rather, want of reason, upon which this term of this contract was based. The hon, gentleman did not appear to have a particle of testimony before him, when framing this clause as to condition of the Pacific Railway, seemed to be wholly ignorant of the condition of the Union Pacific Railway in 1869, and as to what these contractors, this powerful Syndicate were getting under this part of the contract; and when challenged by the member for West Durham, he stated that the terms of this contract were precisely the same as the Allan contract. When the member for West Durham pointed out the terms of the Allan contract, the hon, gentleman found he was mistaken. He then had to fall back on the statement that the Union Pacific was constructed after the model of the Baltimore and Ohio Railway, which, no doubt, has been for the last ten to fifteen years a first class road. But when first constructed it was no better than the Union Pacific Railway was in 1869, when 890 miles were completed. I do not wish the statement to go unanswered abroad that the Union Pacific was a first-class road when completed, when history shows it was anything but that. I wish the fact published to the country that Ministers, who should act with care, and manage the public affairs in a cautious, judicious way, and with all the necessary information before them, did not do so and did not know, notwithstanding the existence of those documents laid before the United States Legislature, that the very foundations on which they based this clause would not sustain them, or justify their position? For those reasons I have thought it right to trouble the House with the present remarks.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Two distinct points have been brought before the House with reference to this matter. As to the legal construction of that clause, I am not going to take upon me to pronounce; but what I want to call your attention to, is the fact that another point of very great importance was raised by this discussion. From the mouth of the Minister of Railways, we had the confession that the Government supposed they were adopting a totally different standard for this road from the standard defined in the terms of the agreement before us. If the terms are strictly insisted upon, it may involve an additional loss of several thousand dollars a mile, or several millions in the whole contract. The two sets of conditions differ very materially indeed; and, unless the Minister of the Interior is prepared to tell us that the attention of his Government having been now called for the first time-as appears from the statement of the Minister of Railwaysto the very remarkable discrepancy between the contract made by Sir Hugh Allan, in 1875 and that made in 1880 with his successors in managing this Canadian Pacific contracthis Government are prepared to take measures to remedy it, or greatly to modify those clauses, so as to guard against dangers of a much greater description than those ordinary dangers in connection with the great transaction the country contemplates, there will be great uneasiness and anxiety in the public mind. We cannot call the attention of the country too strongly to the fact that Ministers had not even taken the trouble to compare the two contracts, to ascertain the character of the standard upon which they regulated this provision. It would be well for the right hon. gentleman to tell us whether the Government is, or is not, prepared, so to guard and modify that clause as to prevent the very dangers to which the member for West Durham has called attention.

PACIFIC RAILWAY CONTRACTS.

Mr. BLAKE moved for copies of all papers shewing any contracts for the construction of any part of the Canadian Pacific Railway, prior to the 21st October last, and referred to in the contract brought down this Session; and of any estimates or statements made as to the result of such modifications on the character and expense of the work. He said: It will be observed, by the contract which has been laid on the Table, that the Government is bound to finish those portions of the railway which are mentioned as being under construction by the Government, according to the terms of the contracts made for the construction of those portions, subject, however, to any modifications which have been made by the Government in the provisions of these contracts before the 21st of October last, the date of the contract laid on the Table. It is important, therefore, that we should know before hand that on which depends the precise obligations of the Government, what the modifications are which were made in the terms of those contracts, before the great contract was signed. On this, as on other matters, I am desirous of getting such information as in my judgment the Government was bound to lay upon the Table of the House, before they asked us to discuss this matter at all. They bring down a contract without laying on the Table the information upon which they acted. They bring down a contract which shows certain obligations of theirs which were dependent upon certain other instruments containing the modifications, but which modifications they do not bring down. It is impossible for us, therefore, to know what are the precise obligations of the Government under this contract, and we cannot ascertain them until we see these modifications. I think it also was the duty of the Government to bring down any estimates or statements made as to the results of such modifications on the character and expense of the work. We have a general estimate made by Mr. Schreiber laid on the Table, of what the costs of those sections will be; but what I want is an estimate of the change made in the cost by the modifications which the contract indicates as having been made in these original contracts before the 24th October. I suppose there can be no possible objection to this motion. I will add that, inasmuch as it ought to be before us, in order that we may ascertain what the obligations are which we are asked to sanction, I think the answer ought to be, not merely that the address is agreed to, but that there should be an immediate response to that address.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. My hon. friend is getting reasonable, and, therefore, I shall have no objection to this resolution, and we will see that the matter is attended to immediately.

Motion agreed to.

SURVEYS FROM SOUTH-EAST BAY TO SAULT STE. MARIE.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for copies of any reports or surveys made since last Session on the line from South-East Bay to the Sault Ste. Marie, or on the line between South-East Bay and Thunder Bay, said: As to the line between South East Bay and Sault Ste. Marie, there was a distinct pledge made by the Government in the other branch of the Legislature, that they would have further surveys made during recess, with a view of submitting a proposition to Parliament this Session to aid in some way in the construction of that railway. Sir Alexander Campbell, in the Senate, on the 21st of April last, in answer to a question, gave a formal pledge, on the part of the Government, that these surveys would be made with the view of those propositions being submitted. I presume they have been made, and I think it material to this discussion that we should have them, together with any reports upon the matter. During last Session the line on the north shore of Lake Superior remained in a very uncertain condition. The distance stated by the modifications made under the provisions of any of the Engineer in his general report, and that stated by his letter of the 16th of April, are by him called "assumed distances." It is obvious that there was at that time no precise or accurate information with regard to that line. This becomes essentially important in the great discussion in which we are engaged in consequence of a fresh statement, as I understand it, made by the hon the Minister of Railways the other evening, in which he shortened the distance between Winnipeg and South-East Bay, by stating that Linkoping station, on the Thunder Bay line, would probably be the junction, a point further removed from the terminus of that line than I had supposed was contemplated. I suppose that idea is based upon further information—I am sure it is, because the hon. Minister, late last Session, said there was every probability of finding a good line right in the present terminus, and it was probable they would run the railway into the present terminus, and not run it to any point along the Thunder Bay line. It is important, in considering this subject, that we should have all the information available with reference to the line on the north shore of Lake Superior, and the probabilities of connection with the Thunder Bay branch. This notice was placed on the paper before the speech of the Minister of Railways in which he adverted to the possibility of a junction at Linkoping station, and therefore, it speaks of the line as one between South East Bay and Thunder Bay. I have no doubt the hon. gentleman, if he accedes to the motion in other respects, will agree that it should be extended to any point on the line from Thunder Bay to Red River, which would embrace the point to which the hon. the Minister of Railways alluded. I only repeat, Sir, with reference to this motion, the statement I made as to the last, that this information should have been placed on the Table of the House as preliminary to our discussion, and that we should not have been obliged to ask for it; and I hope there will be not merely an agreement to bring it down, but an immediate bringing down of the return.

Motion agreed to.

MANITOBA SOUTH-WESTERN RAILWAY LAND GRANTS.

Mr. BLAKE moved for a copy of the Order in Council granting about 1,328,000 acres of land in the North-West to the Manitoba South-Western Colonization Railway Company; together with the application for such grant and all correspondence and Orders in Council connected therewith, and a statement of the lands selected thereunder; also, for copy of any Order in Council as to the route or terminus of the railway, and of any correspondence in connection therewith. He said: I think I am correct in saying that the provisions of the charter of this Company was one which left some discretion to the Governor General as to its course and terminus; at least, that is the case with regard to some of these railways. Independently of the information which is asked for in the latter portion of the motion, it is important that we should understand upon what grounds, and upon what application, and by whom prompted, and upon what evidence it was that the Administration determined to make the grant to which I have referred. The evidence of their having made such a grant is the prospectus of this Company to which I alluded the other day. It states:

"The total length of the authorized railway, which will be divided into Sections, is about 295 miles, of which the first section of 119 miles is now under contract for construction by a responsible contractor at prices favorable to the Company. The works are in progress, and it is confidently anticipated that at least fifty miles will be completed and opened for traffic by the 1st of September, 1881.

• • "The Governor-General of the Dominion has approved the report of the Privy Council of Canada recommending the count to the report of the Privy Council of Canada, recommending the grant to the Company, at the nominal rate of $1 per acre of an area of land immediately contiguous to the line of route, equal to 3,840 acres per mile constructed, commencing from the south-west boundary of the Province.

This grant will thus embrace some 1,328,000 acres, and it is estimated the motion asks. Mr. BLAKE.

by Canadian experts that a judicious realization of these lands will ultimately produce to the Company the clear sum of £2,000,000 sterling. The Company has refused several offers already made to them for the purchase of large portions at $5 per acre. By the terms of the trust deed, hereafter referred to, the proceeds of the sale of all these lands are specifically appropriated to the redemption of the bonds thereby secured, thus placing the same in entire independence of the success of the

"In addition to the aid thus liberally, yet wisely, afforded to the Company by the Dominion Government, the Company have received from several of the townships on the line of route, substantial offers of monetary assistance in the form of municipal bonds, created under the monetary assistance in the form of municipal bonds, created under the provisions of the Manitoba Provincial Municipalities Act, 1880.

"At the Souris River the line will strike the extensive and important coal fields which have recently been discovered at that spot, and which will unquestionably furnish to the Company the means of overcoming the most serious difficulty which has hitherto been experienced in the working of railways through prairie countries, namely, the scarcity of locomotive fuel caused by the absence of large timber of railways through prairie countries, namely, the scarcity of locomotive fuel, caused by the absence of large timber.

"Not only will the Company derive great advantage from being thus able to obtain cheap fuel for its own consumption, but, inasmuch as the Canadian Pacific Railway, for nearly 800 miles of its entire length, the city of Winnipeg, and the various townships in line of route will be dependent upon these coal mines for their supplies of fuel, it is estimated that the Company's mineral traffic alone would justify the construction of their railway, apart altogether from the passenger and grain traffic which must in any event fall to it.

"The railway throughout will run almost on a dead level, and rock cutting will be avoided, thus enabling it to be constructed and equipped at an average of £3,000 per mile. It is proposed to complete the works sectionally in three years, and the engineer's estimates conclusively show that each section will command a remunerative traffic as soon as opened.

"The total amount of bonds authorized under the Act is £1,180,000 sterling, which can only be issued in proportion to the length of the railway actually constructed or under contract to be constructed, nor until at least $250,000 (£50,000) of the capital stock shall have been subscribed; which condition has already been fulfilled, the whole having been taken up in Canada.

"The Corporation of the city of Winnipeg, under their charter of incorporation, undertake the construction, at their sole cost, of a railway and ordinary traffic bridge over the Red River within the city limits, the use of which for their traffic is granted to the Railway Company for five use of which for their traffic is granted to the Railway Company for five years, free of tolls. By virtue of an agreement dated 26th December, 1879, the Corporation agree to transfer this bridge to the Railway Company upon certain conditions, and, further, exempt from all city taxes for a period of fifteen years, the station, workshops, and lands within the city of Winnipeg occupied by the Railway Company."

It thus appears that this railway possesses elements as a commercial enterprise, which should make it remunerative from the start, and, therefore, of course, that it would pay interest on the capital invested. It seems that to assist in the construcltion of this railway no less than 1,328,000 acres of very fine land-I believe they are largely in the Turtle Mountain District—have been appropriated by the Dominion Government as is said, as the Company rightly puts it at the nominal price of $1 per acre; that for large tracts of these lands $5 acre has already been refused, and that it is expected that they will not to the Company no less than $10,000,000 altogether. It seems to me that a transaction of that magnitude is one which should have been submitted for the sanction of Parliament; that it should have been accomplished as a matter of policy by Bill or other procedure, and not by the action of the Executive only. It seems to me that the moving purpose in this is obvious-though, of course, the Government did not sell at less than the minimum price which Parliament allowed them to sell-that the moving purpose was not to provide money by selling lands at $1 per acre to aid the Cana-dian Pacific Railway, but to give substantial aid to this other company. That granting of aid may have been perfectly justifiable. I do not say that it was not-I do not say it was, but, it seems to me, we did not authorize the Executive, so far as I know, to grant aids to railways in Manitoba or outside of it; that we did not put power in their hands to do so, and that they should not have so used powers entrusted to them for another purpose, but should have brought down ascheme last Session—or, if they could not do so last Session, then this Session,—and should have submitted it for our consideration and determination before engaging in an operation so important as this. I think, then, we are fairly entitled to the information for which

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There can be no objection to bringing down any Order in Council respecting the route of this railway, though in the absence of my hon. friend, the Minister of Railways, I cannot say whether there are any to bring down. With respect to this grant of land for railway purposes, it is not correctly described as a grant. It is an ordinary sale to this company, the same as to any individual. The House will remember that the regulations of the Government and the whole scheme respecting the land to be appropriated for building the Canadian Pacific Railway, were submitted to Parliament. Parliament knew exactly what was the policy of the Government in that regard. It was provided that there was to be a series of belts, extending from A to E inclusive of both letters, and that the price would vary according to the distance of the land from the railway. The price of the lands in Belt A, within five miles of the railway, which were reserved for defraying the cost of construction, was $5 an acre, the price in Belt B less, in Belt C less, in Belt D less, and in Belt E, about 40 miles from the main line, *$1 an acre, to any one who chose to buy. Therefore this company stood in the same position as any private person choosing to pay that price. This company had no greater rights than any person in the world who chose, as soon as the surveys were completed, to go and buy in the odd numbered sections, and it is of very great importance to us that, instead of individual speculators going in, we should get a railway company to go there and run a railway to these lands, thus increasing the value of the land in the evennumbered sections belonging to the Government. Without a railway there the land was to be sold at a dollar an acre. and it was right that the Government should give a preference to this company, which took a railway there, so that for pre-emptions in the even-numbered sections the Government would be able to get a higher price. It was an incidental encouragement to this company. It is a Canadian company, and it cannot be supposed to have a very large capital. It has to seek for capital, and yet the Government do not propose to give them a single acre. It was not part of the proposal to make them a present of the land, but we sell it to them at the same price as to everybody else, as an encouragement to build the road, and if they do build the road with this encouragement, they open up a section of country within a reasonable distance of the Souris district, and bring in a supply of coal fuel to the inhabitants of Manitoba and the immediate neighborhood. It is provided that they should receive no land within the Province of Manitoba, but they are to receive it only in the district west of the Province. There cannot be the slightest objection to the motion.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I would like to know, from the Minister of the Interior, exactly how he proposes to give these gentlemen the lands in Belt E under the existing regulations. Does he propose to give them the lands in Belt E for a long distance beyond the terminal point of the railroad, or are they to be between the boundary of Manitoba and the point, about 150 miles west of it, where these coal deposits are found?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The arrangement is that we are to sell them railway lands within sixty miles of their road, to the extent of, I think, 3,640 acres per mile. Then they will have to take the land west of that, and, of course, that is an additional inducement to them to extend the railway in order to make their lands saleable; but it is all within Belt E, and within the railway lands, which are open to everybody who chooses to pay a dollar an acre.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I am not disposed to object to liberal aid being given to colonization roads; but, if I understand the hon, gentleman, 2,200 square miles are given to this railroad. You have got, I think, about 12 miles of Belt E, and no more, and you may not have 12 miles—it depends entirely on the location of the road. My impression is, that this grant will consume the entire portion of Belt E, which is not reserved for settlers, for a distance of 120 miles, more or less, beyond the point at which this road stops. If the hon, gentleman and his Government have made what I may call a firm provision that these gentlemen will go on, well and good; but, if otherwise, the arrangement may interfere very materially with the aid to be granted for the establishment of colonization roads west of this road.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is no reason why the individuals forming this company should not come and buy this land; but there is a provision that the land shall be given to them for purchase, only in proportion as they build the read, otherwise there might be an enormous purchase of land by the company merely for speculative purposes. But even if this were so, there would still be the alternate blocks of 640 acres reserved for homestoad and pre-emption purposes. It is, however, distinctly provided that the land is only to be granted according to the progress of the read.

Mr. BLAKE. Is any of this land in the neighborhood of Turtle Mountain?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is not far from Turtle Mountain. The road runs to the north of Turtle Mountain.

Mr. BLAKE. I suppose the hon, gentleman will be able to bring down these papers, rapidly?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Immediately. Motion agreed to.

LAND GRANTS TO RAILWAYS.

Mr. BLAKE moved for a copy of any Orders in Council granting tracts of land in the North-West to any railway company other than the Manitoba South-Western Colonization Railway Company, together with the applications for such grants, and all correspondence and Orders in Council connected therewith, and a statement of the lands selected thereunder; also for a copy of any Order in Council as to the routes or termini of any such railways, and of any correspondence in connection therewith. He said: This is a motion similar to the last. It has been stated that an Order in Council has been passed, granting lands by sale to at least one other railway company.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I only say this, that from my point of view, and from the point of view of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), if we can get money for the lands we had better sell them, and if any of these railways run through any of the belts we shall be very glad to sell the alternate and odd-numbered sections at the price set for each belt, whether it be $5 or $1.

Mr. MILLS. Without any restriction on the railway company?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have already explained, provided that they shall only get it according to the progress of their work.

Mr. MILLS. The hon, gentleman will remember that when we proposed to deal with that question, we proposed the railway companies should bring their lands to the market within a certain time. That is the rule with regard to the Union Pacific and other railway companies in the United States. When a certain length of time has expired, the railway companies are bound to sell, or are subjected to taxation.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This company intends to raise the money on the sale of lands or bonds issued upon guarantee of the lands, and it is, therefore, its interest to sell the lands as quickly as possible.

Motion agreed to.

THE PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for copies of all Orders in Council, and of all correspondence with the Government of British Columbia, or with the Canadian agent for British Columbia, touching the lands appropriated, or to be appropriated for the construction of the Pacific Railway in that Province, said: It has been stated, Mr. Speaker, that there has been a discussion going on for some time between this Government and the Government of British Columbia, with reference to the arrangements made at the time of the Union of British Columbia with Canada, for a certain appropriation of lands for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I have no authentic information, I need hardly say, as to what the nature of that discussion may be, or what the demands precisely are which have been made by this Government upon the Government of British Columbia; but, as far as I could learn from the sources of information available to the public, it was a demand something of this nature: that inasmuch as a very large proportion of the land which, under the Articles of Union would belong to the Government, was unsuitable in character, there should be a power to obtain still further lands so as to make that cession of some practical value. That is what I have gathered from these sources to have been the nature of the demand, and these same sources of information indicate a refusal of the demand. I think we are entitled to authentic information on that subject, a subject which is also germane to the question upon which Parliament has been called at this time to decide, because it is connected directly with the question of the resources we have for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway—at any rate in the Province of British Columbia. I, therefore, Mr. Speaker, place this motion in your hands.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There can be no objection to this motion. There has been some correspondence on the matter. The hon, gentleman will remember that the British Columbian Government was to grant, on each side of the road, as much as was to be granted elsewhere for the construction of the Pacific Railway-20 miles on each side. There are a good many ways of making these 20 miles, if you measure up hill and down hill-

Mr. BLAKE. That is the way you will have to measure. Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. You may find the 20 miles very little, especially when we get into that inhospitable sea of mountains-

Mr. BLAKE, Order.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Which my hon, friend spoke of as British Columbia. I fancy it will end in the 20 miles being measured from a higher altitude than the highest tops of the mountains.

Motion agreed to.

THE VANCOUVER ISLAND RAILWAY.;

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for any copies of any correspondence with the Government of British Columbia, or with any persons in that Province respecting the Island Railway, said: I observe that there has been some discussion on the subject of the Island Railway, an enterprise in which, as the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Bunster) knows, I have always taken a very great interest, and I think it would be important to know whether there has been any correspondence on that subject. The gentlemen, whom my hon. friend has always regarded as the special friends of his Province, are now in power, and have brought down a scheme for the completion, as they call it, of the Pacific Railway. I suppose my hon. friend from Vancouver will agree with me, though on entirely different grounds, that the scheme is a very Sir Joun A. Macdonald.

attitude of the Government with regard to the Island Railway.

Mr. BUNSTER. I am glad to hear the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Blake) has seen the error of his ways in opposing British Columbia. I am glad to see him take a real interest in British Columbia. I am glad to see he is at last convinced he has made a mistake in opposing that Province as he did in days gone by. I see he is seeking a great deal of information in relation to that country, but whether it is for the benefit of that country, or of his own particular Province, or whether he wishes to overturn the present occupants of the Treasury benches, is a question not yet settled in my mind. Every opposition that could have been raised has been raised by the hon, gentleman against the union of British Columbia with Canada. How many times has he not said he would rather see British Columbia go than remain in the Dominion?

Mr. BLAKE. No, never.

Mr. BUNSTER. Then the press is not as reliable as I believe it to be. What chance would there be of making a nation of this Canada of ours if you allowed British Columbia to go? According to the policy of the hon. gentleman, he would change that policy. I, for one, know the value of British Columbia, and I would again inform that hon, gentleman that it is not the inhospitable country he would depict it to be. If he would only seek information for himself by going to that country, he would find it a hospitable country, and much as he has abused it, he would receive a hearty welcome there, and might be led to change his mind with reference to it, so that he would lend a helping hand to the present Government to build a road on Vancouver Island. I do not approve of the scheme of the present Government, because it does not go far enough. According to the Carnaryon Award we were to have a road built on Vancouver Island. There is not a word in the present arrangement about building that road. But let Vancouver go; let her go out of the Dominion. She will make her own road. We have gained nothing by belonging to this great Dominion. We had been living in hopes that Canada would carry out her bargain with British Columbia, and have been deceived. I would ask hon. gentlemen, has Canada carried out her terms? No; the answer is plain. She has not. The present Government were thrown from power seven years ago; hence the road was stopped. Ten thousand tons of rails were sent out there to raise the hopes of the people that the road would be built in good faith. But what was the consequence? Because the people of Vancouver Island were not loval to that Government, the rails were removed to the mainland, and allowed to deteriorate there, with half an inch of rust accumulated on them, not to speak of the interest accumulated on their price. If they had been utilized on the Island, they would have more than paid for themselves by to-day. Not one is yet laid, and the bad faith of which British Columbia has been made the victim, is not creditable to either the present or the late Government. The road in Vancouver Island will pay from the first, as it will be employed in exporting coal and other minerals, in passenger traffic, and in developing a very rich tract of land. It will pay by bringing to the Custom house a very large additional revenue. Vancouver alone has sent this year $700,000, odd, to the Dominion Exchequer—a great deal more than was expended in British Columbia. Nevertheless, she is abused continually to her injury. When the Americans read speeches made in the House, and denunciations of British Columbia, they say: that is not a country for us to emigrate to. It is not complimentary to British Columbia to denounce her thus, particularly when, on account of imperfect information regarding her, she has not received imperfect one. His reasons will be, the railway does not fair play. I regret very much, for the abuse she has go far enough west, does not extend to the Island received, that we joined the Confederacy so soon. We At any rate, it will be interesting to know what is the should have done better to remain as we were. I say this in all seriousness and in sober earnest. We were brought into the Union by promises of the right hon. Premier which he thought, probably, he would be able to perform, but which have not been performed. We cannot be accused of being too exacting in our demands when we have waited ten years for the fulfilment of her promises; and now the Island, the most important part of British Columbia, is totally ignored, though one of its constituencios was very much pleased to give the Premier a seat, when he wanted one. I do not consider he has treated his constituents as he should have in leaving the Island out of the Syndicate. It is my humble duty to inform him that I do not think he has given that attention to his constituents which they deserved, or treated them as he ought.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon, gentleman complains that the Premier has not treated his constituents; I want to know how many he would have to treat.

Mr. BUNSTER. I do not know what kind of "treat" you mean-whether it be in beer or whiskey, but I have no doubt the right hon, leader of the Government would be equally happy in entertaining his constituents at eitherthat is more than could be said for the hon. member for West Durham at any time. Seriously, however, I think British Columbia should be treated with fairness and justice. As to carrying out the Carnarvon Award, accepted by the late Government, the people of Canada, endorsing it practically, said to the present Government, you can return to power, to treat British Columbia fairly, as she is worth all the rest of the Dominion put together. Our province is rich in minerals, including gold, coal and marble, rich in lumber, fish and agricultural resources, possessing as fine rivers as any in Canada, not excepting the St. Lawrence. Till it is better known to the people of Canada and her statesmen, it will not receive fair play. During the whole period of Confe deration, the only Canadian Minister who honored us with a visit was Mr. Langevin, who was so pleased with our Province, that he has ever since felt kindly to it. In fact, we have looked upon him as a seventh member. We have had other visitors, including Mr. Edgar, who thought we were in the market, as he offered us $750,000 in lieu of certain rights. But money is not a scarce commodity there. As our banking and mining records can bear witness, we have any quantity of the filthy lucre awaiting investment, in the hope that Canada will carry out her promise to British Columbia. How many men have been ruined in that Province waiting till real estate, in which they had invested, would rise in value through the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway? Quite a number, who placed too much confidence in those Then a certain high personage, no longer connected with the Dominion, came to British Columbia and made all sorts of fair promises on behalf of the late Government, not one of which have been carried out. Is British Columbia being fairly dealt with I again ask? The answer must be—No. The answer of the people at the last General Election was that it had not been fairly dealt with, and there should be a classified out. and there should be a change of Government. I have had considerable trouble in convincing our people that if we gave the present Government time, they would try to do better, but it certainly astonishes me to see the leader of the Government leaving out his own constituency, by not building the Island Railway. The Island is the best part of British Columbia, possessing more capital, more population, and more business for the railway than the rest of the Province. The grades on the Island would be easy and the distance short, and last, but not least, we command the finest harbor in the world. No matter where the railway be built, you will be eventually obliged to bring it to Esquimalt, to command the commerce of the world. I shall take up this question again at the proper time, for the Island road must and shall be built.

Motion agreed to.

in all seriousness and in sober earnest. We were brought SETTLEMENT OR SALE OF LANDS IN MANITOBA into the Union by promises of the right hop. Promier OR THE NORTH WEST.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for copies of all notices issued or published since the accession to office of the Ministry, on the subject of settlement or sale of the public lands in any part of Manitoba or the North-West, said: I make this motion in general terms, because the notices issued and published will not be very long notices. They are of a general character, and it would be convenient, even if one or two have been already brought down, yet that we should have the whole series together, and not be obliged to look up those scattered among the journals. My particular object was, of course, with reference to the notices to which I referred on a former occasion. I want to see what connection they have with the operations of the Manitoba and South-Western Railway Company.

Motion agreed to.

LAND SALES IN THE NORTH-WEST

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for copies of all Orders in Council and correspondence touching the sale of large blocks of land in the North-West to Mr. Brassey, or to any other individual, with a description of any such grant, said: I need not do more than allude to the statement made by the Minister of the Interior of a particularly large grant made to Mr. Brassey. Since then a statement has been made in the papers that two or three large blocks have been sold to the same individual. Another statement has been made, that another large block, in the same neighborhood, had been appropriated or sold to some other person. The object of this motion is to obtain any information with reference to the sale of large areas to individuals, as the object of the preceding motions was to ol tain similar information with reference to the sale of large areas to this railway corporation.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There are no Orders in Council respecting this or any other sale, because no sale has been completed. Mr. Brassey has made an offer with the genuine idea of being of some aid in the settlement of the North-West-he takes an interest in that matter-and it has been favorably received by the Government. We will bring down the correspondence. I may say that Mr. Brassey's preference was to get some of the country close to the foot of the Rocky Mountains for grazing purposes. The Government may have to come to the Legislature for new powers for that purpose. Mr. Brassey has no desire, however, to be a monopolist of land. He has been given to understand, that of those portions of land fit for agricultural settlers, he would only get, as anybody else would get, the alternate block, that there should be no change in regulations con-cerning the sale of tracts of land, whether to him or anybody else. The Government has adhered to that without any exceptions. The hon, gentleman should understand, however, that if, as is most likely, larger tracts of land are needed in those portions fit for cattle ranches, it may be necessary to ask for the legislation. It may be proper to say that another hon, gentleman in the Upper House, who is a great cattle breeder, speaks of establishing a large cattle ranche somewhere in the vicinity of Bow River, where, I believe, there are most magnificent pastures. I am glad to find, from the recent surveys, that there are large tracts of land adapted to agricultural purposes as well as for grazing purposes.

Mr. BLAKE. There is some provision, I think, in the Statutes, for leasing lands adapted for cattle ranches. What is the price of this proposed sale to Mr. Brassey?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is no specified price. He is quite willing to pay the dollar an acre, which we suppose will be the price.

Mr. BLAKE. A little like the other arrangement.

Mr. MILLS. Does the hon, gentleman mean that the Government has adopted the principle of selling only in alternate blocks those lands that are fit only for pasture?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh, no. I say that all the land fit for agricultural purposes must be in alternate

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I am glad to hear that explanation, because I thought myself at the time that it was a most astonishing thing for lands fit for settlement to be granted in that way. I would like to know whether any sort of surveys have been made which would enable such tracts of land to be set off. As far as my recollection goes you can hardly set those off without having some rough survey as in the corresponding districts in the United States. In this matter great care ought to be taken not to part with lands which may subsequently prove fit for settlement under the present supposition that they may not be of much value for agricultural purposes.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Every care will-be taken in that respect. A meridian line has been run from Edmonton to the boundary this last year, and it has been found that in the vicinity of Bow River there is most magnificent land for agricultural purposes, which will be reserved for agricultural settlement, according to the ordinary regulations, until they are altered by consent of Parliament. The Government quite understand that the land at the foot of the Rocky Mountains, at the bottom of the slope, is made up of the accumulated debris of centuries, and I anticipate a very considerable immigration from the extreme Western United States into that country, on account of its ascertained richness and its adaptability to agricultural purposes.

Mr. MILLS. Has there been any geological surveys this season, of Bow River, where gold fields have been reported?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No; I think not; Motion agreed to.

PATRICK ULTICAN.

Mr. HADDOW moved for copies of all correspondence, track masters' reports, and all other papers relating to the claims of Mr. Patrick Ultican, of Belledune, Restigouche, for damages to his farm, occasioned by overflow of water and other causes in connection with the Intercolonial Railway.

Motion agreed to.

SAULT STE. MARIE RAILWAY.

Mr. DAWSON, in moving for a return of all surveys made by Mr. Brunel or others, during the past summer, of the country between Lake Nipissing and Sault Ste. Marie, with the view to finding the best ground for a railway between those points, said: This survey has been made in conformity to a provision made by the Government last Session in reply to the question:

"Does the Government intend to take any effective measures during this Session, for ensuring, either by the granting of a subsidy or otherwise, the immediate construction of a railway to connect the south-east end of Lake Nipissing with the Sault Ste. Marie?"

It was stated by a member of the Government that:

"It is the intention of the Government, during the present Session, to examine the route carefully westward from Lake Nipissing, and to aid, by subsidy or otherwise, next Session, the construction of a railway to connect the Canada Central Railway terminus, at Lake Nipissing, with Lake Superior, on a line, and with the conditions to be fixed by the Government, and the route to be settled in such a manner as substantially to aid in the eventual construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, on the northern shore of Lake Superior."

I am glad to see that the Government has not forgotten its pledge. The survey is an important one, and, in the present Mr. BLAKE.

before the House with the least possible delay. I observe that the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), has made a motion which, I suppose, applies to the papers which I now ask for; and if this is the case, I need not put the department to the trouble of making two returns in the same matter, and will, therefore, allow this motion to drop.

Motion withdrawn.

SEIZURES UNDER THE CUSTOMS ACT.

Mr. CASEY, in moving for a statement of all seizures of goods made by the Customs authorities since the introduction of the present Tariff, stating cause of seizure in each case, and also in which cases the goods were sold or still held; in which they were released and on what grounds; in which application was made for appraisement; in which Bills were filed in the Court of Exchequer for restitution of goods; in which application was made for leave to enter suit for restitution; and the result of such applications for appraisement or leave to enter suit in each case, said: So far as the fyling of bills in the Court of Exchequer is concerned, I am aware that I do not, by the terms of the motion, cover all the ground that I should; but my object is to get the details of all such cases of seizure. I know that proceedings with regard to these seizures, might be taken in other courts, whose records it may not be in the power of this House to obtain; but before I sit down I will ask permission to amend my motion in such a way as to include all the information which I desire. I beg to call the attention of this House to the extraordinary powers with which the officers of the Customs, and the department itself, are endowed by the existing law. The collectors of customs and the appraisers and Board of Appraisers, taken individually or collectively, seem to have practically in their hands power to determine the prices on which the duty shall be paid upon any invoice entered at any Custom house. An invoice, it appears, may be authenticated by affidavit or in any other way; but notwithstanding that authentication, it is within the power of the collector and the appraisers, as I read the law, to say that the prices so authenticated shall not be the prices that are to be paid, and that the prices which they consider the fair market price of the particular goods in the market where they were bought shall be the true prices upon which the duty shall be calculated. Still further, in case a dispute shall arise between the collector and the importer, as to what is the fair market value of the goods, all the odds are in favor of the collector-his decision is final unless an appeal is made against it in a certain prescribed manner; that is to say, prima facie, he is correct in his estimate, and the onus of proof lies upon the importer. The first proceeding the importer may take is to apply to have his goods appraised, whereupon the collector may summon to his assistance "any two discreet and well-informed merchants"-I think that is the language of the Statute—in the same line of business as the importer, and residing in the place where the entry is made; and these, with the collector as referee, form a Board of Appraisers. The importer has no voice in the appointment of these appraisers; he is not allowed to appear before them personally or by counselat least has no right in law so to appear and plead his case, or show one. The proceedings of the Board are held to be final unless suit is entered against the Government for restitution of the goods, or the return of duty paid in excess. As I am advised by legal gentlemen, no suit can be entered against the Government in connection with these cases unless by consent of the Attorney-General; that is, the Government themselves have the right to decide whether they shall be sued or not. This, it appears to me, is an extraordinary power to be possessed position of matters in relation to the Pacific Railway, it is by the Government, though, of course, it is not peculiar to desirable that the report of the Engineer should be laid this class of cases, but applies to all cases in which suit may be entered against the Government. The reason which is given for this state of the law is, that it prevents vexations suits against the Crown by persons who would not be responsible in case they lost their suit. I think that purpose would be served by a provision requiring the suitor to deposit security in advance. However, I am not discussing what powers the Crown ought to have in such cases, but I am pointing out powers they have, for the purpose of drawing the inference that the exercise of these powers with regard to Customs, ought to be very carefully watched. In case the importer who feels himself aggrieved, does not take any of these steps, the Customs authorities may retain his goods, advertise them for sale, and sell them. The Board of Appraisers is a new engine put in the hands of the Government, to enable them to control the importations of goods into this country. It consists, I think, of three gentlemen sitting here in Ottawa, and, to whom, I suppose, all doubtful cases are referred, and by whose instructions local appraisers are to be guided. This is an irresponsible court, to which is given power to decide the value of goods entered for duty. We have had, to my recollection, no authoritative report of the proceedings of that court. The simple substance of all I have stated is this: that Parliament, in deciding what rate of duty is to be payable on certain classes of goods, does not really say what duty shall be paid. The amount of duty to be paid is fixed by the collector; although Parliament may fix the rate, the actual taxation is settled by that person who fixes the amount on which the taxation shall be collected. Consequently, the taxation on the importations of this country is practically in the hands of a department—practically in the hands of any novice who thinks his opinion of the value of goods is better than the sworn invoice of the importer of those goods. Under these circumstances, it is necessary that this House, whose special province is taxation, should supervise the exercise of these powers with special zeal. I may be asked how it was that there was no fault found with regard to the exercise of these powers while the late Government was in office. I admit that there was no complaint, and I think the reason is very clear. The operations of the law does not depend so much on the weeks of the Statute as on the administration of that law. Under the late Government the theory of administration was, that trade was something to be encouraged, and that the only duty of the Customs official was to see that no fraud was committed by importers, and that the revenue legally collectable on certain goods should be collected. Now, however, the theory of administration is changed. It is a principle of our system of government at present, declared not only in speech but on the Statute book, to discourage the importation of at least, as those manufactured in by means of heavy duties. This theo of such articles, This theory is not confined to the legislative part of the Government; it is carried out in the administrative part also, because it has led to the practice of the department of Customs, and the employees of that department, preventing, by the technicalities of the law, as well as by the duties imposed, the importation of good, into the country. It has led to something more than this. The principle of protecting home manufactures has been carried a step further by the department, as it appears that it has attempted to protect existing importors against the intrusion of new importers—rivals in the same line of business. I do not say that one idea is more unreasonable than the other, because I think they are both contrary to public policy. It is certainly in the interest of the public that there should be competition in the business of importing as well as in the business of manufacturing goods. No loss would accrue to the revenue of the country by an increase in the number of importers; the same amount would be collected, whether the goods were brought in by one or by correct, and to obtain from the manufacturers affidavits twenty. Such certainly appears to have been the policy of the Customs officers at certain places; and where they could not prevent the starting of new importing firms through the duties imposed by Parliament, they have been enabled to do so by taking advantage of those provisions put in the law for the purpose of enforcing the collection of the revenue, and straining and twisting them in such a way as to weary and harass importers. I may refer to an instance which has been brought to my knowledge within the last day or two. A gentleman hailing from the town of St. Thomas, in my own county, recently established a business as agent for the sale of an American safe. He consulted the Customs officers at once as to the valuation which the safes would have to bear when entered for duty. It was agreed that they would enter these safes at the invoice price, whatever it might be, subject to such appraisement as the Customs officers there might put upon them. In pursuance of this understanding, after having sold several safes, he entered one which, as he tells me, was purchased at wholesale rates from the firm that manufactured it in the State of Ohio, the price being $70. The question of the value of that safe was left in abeyance, in the meantime, until the Customs officer at St. Thomas should communicate with his superior. He received instructions to add to the face of the invoice 50 per cent. of that invoice, thus making the price of thesafe $105. Now, it so happened, that my friend had sold the safe to a person in Canada for $100, or $5 less than the price which this sapient appraiser said it ought to bear in the wholesale markets of the United States. My friend thereupon applied to his principals for documents to show that the price at which he had entered the safe was not only equal to its highest wholesale price, but equal to the retail prices at which similar safes had been sold to parties in the United States; and finding on coming down here, that something further was required, he has obtained an affidavit from the secretary to the manufacturing company in question, affirming the invoice price of the safe to be the correct one, the one at which they sold similar safes to all parties, whether in or out of the United States, that they had no second price, and other words to that effect which I need not here read in detail. The case is still, I believe, before the Commissioner of Customs, but he gave my friend to understand that it could not vory well be settled at present, because the appraiser happened to be out of town, and he did not know when he would be back. Consequently, the safe must lie in the Customs warehouse, at St. Thomas, and the gentleman who bought it must do without it, and in uncertainty as to the ultimate decision respecting it, until the appraiser returns. I am very familiar with a case which created a certain amount of excitement in, Toronto lately, where a gentleman, well known to myselfe imported a large quantity of china into this country for the state of the china and wholesale china store. purpose of establishing a wholesale china store. He brought this china to Toronto and entered it at the invoice price. It happened that the figures on his invoice were lump figures, that this china had been bought in a lot and not at a certain fixed price for each article, as it was a class of china which was not sold regularly in the market, but was generally sold in lots. The appraisers in Toronto, on opening the cases, were struck with the fact that this china seemed to be much better than ought to be sold at the price indicated on the invoice Without calling on the importer for any explanation of this fact, they seized the whole consignment of thirty odd crates, amounting to a considerable value. Very shortly after that the gentleman appeared before the authorities, and, being informed that the consignment had been seized in consequence of this peculiarity in the invoice, offered to explain how it had occurred, and offered to make an affidavit that it was al!

and statements to prove the correctness of the invoice. These affidavits and statements were absolutely refused by the Customs authorities, who told him they did not want any explanation from him. My friend did not choose to ask for an appraisement, knowing that he had no chance under the law to establish his case before the appraisers, as any two rivals in the trade, at Toronto, might be chosen, who would value those goods at any figure they pleased. He took the other course, of consulting a legal gentleman, who instituted legal proceedings. The next proceeding of the authorities at Toronto, was to call in a man to appraise those goods, to get him to value them in a quite informal way-informal transactions between Government and individuals seem to be of frequent occurrence-and that opinion as to their value the Customs authorities accepted. When it became clear that my friend mount fight, that he was going to prosecute his claim for restitution of the goods to the furthest point, the Customs authorities agreed to give up the goods on the receipt from him of the same sort of affidavit they had before refused to accept. A short time after, an invoice of similar goods was entered at the same port, and, whatever was the reason, whether the officials did not care to make any trouble this time, or not, I cannot say, but they were so thoroughly satisfied of the honesty of the importer in question that they sent word down to the Grand Trunk warehouse to deliver these goods, without examination, on the word of my friend. It matters not whether the authorities were satisfied of his honesty, or were afraid of raising a disturbance, the practical result was the same. It proved that these goods should have been passed through the Customs in the first instance, instead of being detained on mere suspicion, and without listening to any explanation, thus putting my friend to serious inconvenience, and almost preventing his obtaining a store and settling in the town. The Customs authorities have, of course, the power in law to appoint appraisers, but have no right to do so except under the terms of the Act, and not in the peculiar manner adopted by them. It would appear that the rival merchants chosen to examine these goods made statements to the Government organ in Toronto, that the goods were a poor lot indeed, that they had not been over valued but undervalued, and that the importer was only a crockery pedler. I suppose this information came from the crockery merchants appointed, because it could not have come from the Customs department; but in any case, the injustice done my friend by that unfair criticism flowed directly from the peculiar course taken by the Customs authorities. I do not intend to throw the blame of all this entirely on the Customs authorities at that port. I have no doubt they were acting under directions of the Customs department here, and it is to obtain the important facts in this case, as well as in others, that I ask for the information called for by my motion. I need not go into any further instances. I will simply summarise the drift of my argument: that the Customs department of this country has extraordinary powers under the law; that these powers are exercised by the employees of the department, who are not persons directly responsible to this House; that these powers virtually confer upon those employees the power of taxation, which is a power that should belong only to this House; that while the administration of these laws was managed by an Administration which only looked for a revenue from the Customs, the operation of these laws did not call for any special comment; but when the administration came into the hands of a Government who looked upon the operation of the Act as a means of protection, the operation became oppressive. Certain importers were favored at the expense of others; new importers were hardly treated as compared with old established importers, Mr. CASEY.

as will enable the House to understand the whole case The hon gentleman added that he would trust the hon. Minister to bring down the full papers, and he was bound to say that in every case of which he had been personally cognizant of the hon. gentleman's action, he has shown himself personally inclined to interpret the law in a liberal and proper spirit,

Mr. JONES suggested that the motion should be amended so as to cover cases in which goods had been sold and invoices allowed to be amended.

Mr. BOWELL said the Government had no possible objection to bringing down all the papers, but he suggested that the motion should be amended by adding the words "cases in which application was made for appraisement and the result of such appraisement." There were many cases brought before the department where applications were made for appraisement after the goods had been seized for undervaluation, and it was in the power of the Minister of that department to say whether that should be conceded or not. The hon, member had no doubt, in his mind's eye, a case similar to the one which he (Mr. Bowell) had referred.

AFTER RECESS.

It is not my intention to enter into Mr. BOWELL. any full discussion of the extraordinary powers to which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casey) referred as given to the collectors and other officers of the Customs Department. have simply to remark that that hon, gentleman is equally responsible with any other member of the House, during the late Administration, for the law now on the Statutebook, and for the powers which, to use his own language, give the "right of taxation" to appraisers, irresponsible in their character. Any hon, gentleman who will take the trouble to look at the law, will not come to the conclusion that appraisers have any such powers as they are accused of exercising. Their powers are very simple: to ascertain as correctly as possible the fair market value of any article imported in the principal markets of the countries in which they were bought; and if they find the invoices lower than that fair market value, it becomes their duty, under the law, to compel the importer to raise the prices given in the invoice for duty. This is the duty imposed by the law, which resembles all the Customs laws that have come under my notice. The powers used in the neighboring Republic, in carrying out the Customs law, are much greater than those exercised in Canada; and I venture the assertion that very few offenders against the law on the other side the line escape so easily as offenders on our side. The duy of the Board of Appraisers is not what is supposed by the member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey). They have not any more power under the law than any other clerk in the department. When an appropriation was asked in the House, for the establishment of a Board of Appraisers, to secure uniformity of valuation in all parts of the Dominion, and prevent the entry of goods at less than their value, it met with the general approval of the House, there being, if I recollect right, not a discenting voice. Honest merchants who had suffered from the dishonest undervaluation of imports by rivals, were gratified at the proposal to appoint as appraisers gentlemen who had been in trade, and were acquainted with the value of the different articles imported. The only point to which I shall now refer is, the manner in which they have performed the very onerous and responsible duties imposed upon them. Their particular duty has been to ascertain the exact price of every variety of goods in the different countries whence they are imported into the Dominion; and when difficulties have arisen at the different ports as to the precise value of the goods, they have been referred to this Board at Ottawa. The appraisers compare and these evils have caused me to ask for such information the prices with the list of prices they have obtained, upon which they decide what the fair market value of the goods are, when instructions, through the Commissioner, are sent to the different collectors and appraisers. As to the case to whichmy honorable friend referred, particularly the crockery case, that of his friend, who considered himself aggrieved, I may say that with neither of the cases of detention of goods, whether in Montreal or Toronto, had the Board of Appraisers anything whatever to do, until the scizure had been made and the report submitted to the department in Ottawa, upon which they were asked to ascertain whether the invoices presented were correct, and whether there had been undervaluation. After the investigation instructions were give to the officers to act in accordance with the law in that particular case. In the Montreal case, when it was represented to me that the party was a stranger in the country, and, through ignorance of the law, had allowed the time to elapse, which gave us the right to claim the value of the goods, I stated that no advantage should be taken of him. Two experts were appointed, and they raised the value of the goods to such an extent that, under the law, we were compelled to impose the penalty of 50 per cent. of the duties, additional. When the papers come down, I am convinced that any gentleman who reads them will acquit the appraisers and collector at Montreal, and the Board in this city, of any intention to do wrong, and will say, on the contrary, that they did, under the law, precisely their duty and nothing more.

Mr. CASEY. I did not allude to that case, or find any fault with it whatever.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon, gentleman referred to it as that of a friend of his.

Mr. CASEY. It was a similar case; the same person, but another case.

Mr. BOWELL. I will come to that in a momentHe said there were two occasions on which this gentleman was interfered with and harassed in the importation of cortain qualities of goods.
The hon, gentleman acknowledged that, when this entry was made in Toronto, the invoice was not such as to enable the appraiser to judge of the quantity or the quality of the goods, that were detained. It was, if I may use the expression, a sort of lump invoice, so many crates at a certain rate. The appraiser at Toronto asked the opinion of those who were well acquainted with the prices of such articles, gentlemen who had been in the habit of buying from the same firms in England, and they told him that no doubt the price as given for the quantity represented in the memorandum was much below the market value, and upon that the appraiser detained the goods. He did not soize them, if my memory serves me right.

Mr. CASEY. Yes, they were seized.

Mr. BOWELL. He detained them anyway, and the matter was reported to the department in Ottawa. soon as it was received there, the same mode of proceeding was gone through as in the other case, with the exception of the appraisement. They were instructed to ascertain, by personal inspection, the quality of the goods, and to decide whether the appraisers were really justified in retaining them, or whether the circumstances would justify the giving up of the goods. The department in that case took the only course open to it, that was to ascertain the quality of the goods and the prices at which they were entered, to see whether they were correct. My impression is, that after a full investigation, I ordered them to be given up at the prices at which they were entered. The hon. gentleman is altogether mistaken when he says that any extraordinary powers are given to any of the officers who, he says, are irresponsible. All officers are responsible to the department, including the Board of Appraisers, and the political head of the department is responsible for their action. I do not desire the hon. the price at which he sells that article in the United States gentleman, or the country, to understand that the Government desires to shirk the responsibility in any way of the actions of their officers; but if it be pointed out by merchants, or by any gentleman in this House, that these officers have gone beyond their duty, then it will be the duty of the department, and of the head of the department particularly, to see that they are removed. I may say that any gentleman who has had anything to do with the administration of the Customs must be aware that the appraisement of goods is a very difficult branch of the department. Appraisers have a difficult duty to perform, and I can appeal to my predecessor that when we are having constantly false invoices presented to us by various classes of dealers —I do not say the established merchants of the country—but when we find manufacturers in foreign countries sending their goods here at a much lower valuation than they sell them for in their own country, when they write to the department confessing their ignorance of the law, but expressing their determination to have their entries made upon certain prices, any one will see how great are the difficulties with which that department has to deal. The hon. gentleman says, it is the administration of the law; that, during the late Government, few faults were found in connection with this matter. If my recollection serves me right, for five years while I was sitting on that side of the House, upon every occasion when the Tariff was discussed, or any question came up involving the administration of the Customs law, the constant complaint was that the law was not enforced, that a system of undervaluation was constantly going on from one end of the country to the other. So convinced of that fact was the late Minister of Customs, that, year after year, and almost month after month, he was constantly sending out circulars to different ports, calling their attention to the fact that certain articles were being entered at an under-valuation, and that they must add to the invoice price 20, 30, and even as high as 50 per cent. I have in my hand a large number of those circulars that were being constantly sent out. Now, the only difference between the administration of the law by the late Government and the present Government is this: the late Minister constantly issued these circulars; the appraisers in the different ports in the country not having any one to whom they could apply to furnish them with the value of the goods, were not in the same position to carry out the law as they are at the present moment. Circulars would be issued probably, calling attention in some port to the fact that an article had been imported into different parts of the country at 25 or 50 per cent. less than its value, and to keep watch upon that particular article. I do not say the appraisers did not do their duty as far as they could do it; but the moment a circumstance of that kind is brought under the notice of the department now, the Board of Appraisers will at once set to work and ascertain the fair market value of that article in the different markets of whatever country it may be imported from, and the different appraisers and collectors throughout the Dominion are at once made acquainted with the fact. I think it is quite right it should be so, because it protects the honest merchant and the man who will not resort to trickery to defraud the revenue. I will mention one or two articles as an illustration. Scyther, for instance, were entered into this country at six dollars per dozen as the selling price, and the importer wrote to the Government to that effect. In the United States the price was eight dollars and a half per dozen. The importer objected to the extra two dollars and a half being added to the invoice price, because, said he the six dollars per dozen is the price in the United States, for export. It is no matter of the Government what price may be paid for the article in the United States, the merchant or manufacturer may give his goods if he pleases; but what the Government has to do is to see that the price for duty is for consumption in the United States. Beyond that we have nothing to do. Many entertain the idea that if they enter the goods at the cost to them at the manufactory, they are within the law. Cases of this kind constantly come under my observation. Men have come to the department, saying: We have entered the goods at the actual bona fide cost at the manufactory, and we have added ten per cent for contingencies. I asked: At what price do you sell that plough, to the merchants and dealers of your own town? He replied: "At $9.50." "Then," I replied, "Under the law, the value for duty is $9.50." That is the principle upon which we have acted. We find also that there are men who sell their goods at what they term export prices, and they arrive at that price upon the principle I have mentioned. In the United States they have a regular system of drawbacks; that is to say, if a man manufactures for export he is allowed a certain amount upon each article which he exports, hence he can afford to sell them in Canada for the regular prices less the amount of the drawback. But we have nothing to do with the price at which the manufacturer sells to the merchant here, for the law which was passed by the late Administration, and which, I think, is right in that particular, provides that the value shall be, not what has been paid for the goods, but what they will sell for in their own market. There is one other point to which I desire to call attention. I have seen it stated in the newspapers that the department favors one importer at the expense of another. I have no hesitation in saying that the charge is false, and I challenge the hon. gentleman, or any merchant in this country, to prove the accusation. It may possibly be, when we have thousands of officers all over the Dominion connected with the Customs department, that some differ from others in their opinions as to the duties of certain articles, for it has occurred that we have had to educate our appraisers to enable them to judge of the value of articles which are imported; for the system of appointing appraisers in the past, and more particularly under the late Administration, has been such that it has been almost impossible to educate these mon so as to give them any idea of what their duty is. Since I took charge of the department, I have felt bound to remove some of these appraisers on that account. We have been accused of doing so from political motives, but the real reason was their utter want of knowledge of the business for which they were appointed. Any person who gives the slightest attention to the matter, must know that when there are so many appraisers all over the country, it will occasionally happen that one merchant will get his goods passed without a proper check, while the invoice of another is subjected to a more rigid examination. There is another difficulty—one that has increased to a very large extent within the last few years. We all know the extraordinary character of the rise in iron, which recently took place in England. The result of this rise has been that those who sent orders for iron in the autumn, before the rise took place, and had it shipped afterwards, think they should pay duty only upon the price which ruled when they ordered. This is a mistake; for the law distinctly says, that the value for duty must be the price at the time of the exportation from the country whence it was purchased. I am not going to argue whether or not that is the correct principle, but it was the law which we found, on the Statute book, and which we are bound to administer. It has been my invariable practice, since I was appointed Minister of Customs to see, that the provisions of the law were rigidly enforced when there was any attempt to evade it. The complaint has been in the past that frequently, when seizures were made and fines imposed, representations were made and the fines were remitted; and for that reason I think it would have been better if the hon. gentleman's motion had gone back for five years, so that we might get at the number of the seizures, and Mr. BOWELL.

the number of cases on which these remissions and mitigations took place. If I or the Government have erred in this matter—if it can be called an error—it is because when we have imposed a fine we have seen that it was collected, no matter whether friend or foe might suffer. If that is not to be a practice, the so oner the law is repealed the better, for you might dismiss the appraisers and have just a clerk or two to accept the invoices without objection or comment. It would be a great deal better to accept that principle than to place a law on the Statute-book for the protection of the honest importer, dealer or manufacturer, and allow it to be disregarded without imposing punishment on the offenders. Any one who has been connected with the Customs department knows the difficulty there is in administering the law; but I have determined that so long as I shall have charge of the department, those who violate the Customs law shall be punished in the same manner as those who violate any other law; and unless the House and the country are prepared to sustain that mode of administration, the sooner we repeal all the penal clauses of the law, the better for those who have to administer it, and the better for the morality of the commercial community of the country. I thought it necessary to make these few remarks, particularly in defence of officers who I know are very arduous in the discharge of their duties, and in order to disabuse the mind of those who fancy that any attempt has been made to harass importers or dealers in any way. All we desire is, to have the law administered fairly, and those who commit breaches of the provisions of that law should not complain. Neither do I believe they would complain to the extent they do, if they were not backed up by the Opposition press of the country in their efforts to make capital, and by those members of the House who think they have a little grievance because their friends could not obtain concessions, and who attempt to make the law unpopular by encouraging a feeling which is certainly not based on justice.

Mr. CASEY. I am sorry the hon gentleman closed, an otherwise admirable speech, by insinuating that members of Parliament and the press were encouraging law-breakers. I have, as indignantly as possible, to deny that charge as applying to myself, because he seems to apply it to me.

Mr. BOWELL. No; the hon. gentleman said he had no cause of complaint.

Mr. CASEY. I said, in my former remarks, that I think it is our duty to call attention to what seems to us to be ar unfair exercise of the power given to the Custom house officers. I did not charge the department with favoring one trade more than another; I said it was reported in the papers, and to a large extent believed, that the Customs officials favored one party more than another; which might occur without the knowledge of the department, and which ought to be brought to the knowledge of the department by an enquiry of this nature. The hon, gentleman misunderstood me as referring to the Montreal case. I did not refer to that case, but to the safe and the crockery cases; but as he has referred to it, I will also. The facts are that this gentleman brought out a small quantity of goods as an experiment, which he entered at the actual price paid for them in Ireland, not being aware that, under the provisions of the Canadian law, he was obliged to enter them at the ordinary wholesale value; he entered them below that value, having bought them at a bargain, and, therefore, technically, in the eye of the law, made an under-valuation. As soon as his attention was called to this, he declared his willingness to submit the goods to a valuation, and have them so entered in the Montreal Custom house. The collector, however, seized the goods; but, on the case being represented to the Minister of Customs, he consented to have the seizure annulled and the goods appraised; in which, I think, he was acting within the law. In the Toronto case, my hon friend is misinformed. says the collector detained these goods, while while my friend says, they were not detained, but seized. The efficials seized the goods on more suspicion, and, in doing so, caused a great and unwarranted damage to the gentleman's business; and this is just one of those cases in which the officers of the department favor one party more than another. I am glad to hear that the appraisers, here had nothing to do with the case—that everything was done strictly according to law, without any irregular interference by the appraisers, The hon., gentleman says he finds it hard to educate the local appraisers up to a knowledge of their duties. I think that is no doubt true, and that is one reason why I think it very dangerous to trust these local appraisers with the tremendous power they have. I think some logal process should be required before goods can be finally confiscated on the word of any appraiser. I think the onus should be thrown on the Government, to prove that the goods were not valued at their proper figure. I do not know why the importer, rather than any other member of the community, should be a suspected person. I must dispute the claim of the hon. gentleman to more vigilance than his predecessor, because there have been more seizures since he has been in the office. That is not a sign of vigilance; it may be a sign of vexatious interference; it may be a sign that the enormous duties imposed by these gentlemen have led, in many cases, to attempts to bring in goods under their value.

Mr. BOWELL. Would it be vexatious to attempt to stop that fraud?

Mr. CASEY. No; I do not say that at all. I say that some of these seizures may be due to factious interference, and others may have been fully warranted; but it may be that the temptation to commit fraud has been given by the hon, gentlemen themselves. The hon, gent'eman said these appraisers had no power to impose taxation, because they had simply to fix a fair market value on the goods in a foreign market. That is the power to impose taxation, because the power to establish the price for duty implies the power to say how much duty shall be paid on the goods. I have not been directing my speech entirely to show that these powers are improper or undue. I have been chiefly desirous to show that special watchfulness should be exercised over men who possess such powers; but truly, if I am called upon to express an opinion as to the judiciousness of giving these powers, I must say that they are greater than should be conferred on any class of men such as the lower class of custom employees must be, however painstaking and zealous they may be. It reminds me of a story a friend of mine told me of an old negro whose children had been excluded from school, under some strained reading of the school law. The old negro complained: "It is lemancholly human nature should be entrusted with such supernatural powers as them;" and I think these are powers with which custom house officers should not be entrusted.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John). The hon. Minister of Customs said truly that the Act was passed by the late Government, and the complaint he made of the difficulty of carrying out that law, was just and proper; but, at the same time, he made two or three remarks, casting reflection on the manner in which the law was carried out under the late Administration, that were entirely unwarranted. He said that circulars were sent, at that time, to the collectors at various ports, calling their attention to the under-valuation of goods. That is true; but a circular, containing similar information, was sent by the hon.

Minister. We sent the best price list we could Minister. We sent the best price list we could Mr. ANGLIN. My impression is that the gentleman get of the different values of goods in different who gave me the statement, voted at the last election for 16 markets. We adhered to the principle that the value of the goods in those countries was the true value for duty. The hon. Minister spoke of the fair market value of the goods at the time they were shipped. I say that the section of the law referred to did not mention the time the goods were shipped. I know that when the fluctuation of prices to k place in the several classes of goods, the department took the value at the time of shipment instead of the invoice, that might have been mude out a month or two previous, because the goods had risen in value very much in the meantime. I said, last year, this was an improper construction of the Act, and I do not see in the section which refers to the importation of goods any authority for such a course. Sometimes goods come into one port purchased months previous, and are raised in value; o'hers come in from other ports at the same date and are not raised in value. I have seen instances in which similar classes of goods were raised in value at one port for the imposition of duty, and not changed in other ports, though bought at the same time. With regard to the appointment of appraisers, the hon. Minister said that an appraiser appointed by the late Government, was so unfit for the duty that he had to dismiss him. I know of one case of the dismissal of an appraiser by the hon. Minister who was recommended to us as a most experienced man. The person who recommended him may have led us astray, but we never appointed a person who we knew was not qualified for the position. I know of several instances in which the Tariff has led to trouble in the Department through the mixed way of collecting duties, and I am quite satisfied that if the hon. Minister would get from the merchants generally of the country, their expression of opinion as to the administration of the law, and the collection of duties, he would find many instances of serious and just complaint. I only rise to say that the administration of the law, under the late Government, was carried out as effectually as the law required, and to call his attention to the fact that he misunderstands the sections with regard to the valuation of goods as contemplated by the late Government.

Mr. BOWELL. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that, in the administration of these sections to which he has referred, he always took the invoice price as presented for duty?

Mr. BURPEE. We always took the invoice price as a fair market value in the country from which the goods were imported.

Mr. BOWELL. At what period of time?

Mr. BURPEE. If the invoice was made out a month previous to importation, we took the invoice value as a fair market value in the market of purchase.

Mr. ANGLIN. We hear a great deal of grumbling, and, apparently, there are many causes for complaint in various parts of the country, and more particularly in St. John, where I reside, judging from the complaints I have heard from merchants of both parties, during the past year. People complain that the prices are very arbitrarily fixed. that the representations they make to the department are very little heeded. Just now I can call, in particular, to two cases, one with regard, I think, to iron tubing. A merchant in St. John assured me that he entered a quantity of tubing exactly at the cost price in the United States, and found he was met by a decision of the court of arbitrators, who really seemed to be rather a court of legislators, that that was not the proper price, and the value was made to agree with a price list which gave the retail and not the wholesale price.

Mr. BOWELL. That is incorrect.

the hon. Minister of Finance, and if we had an election tomorrow, would be one of the few who would vote for that hon, gentleman again. He complained bitterly, indeed, of the annoyance given him, and the fact that he was compelled to pay a higher rate of duty than he believed he should pay. Another case is that of an importation of vinegar. The invoice was, I believe, a perfectly honest and fair one. I have entire confidence in the gentleman who imported the vinegar; but the officials at St. John, acting, I believe, under direct instructions from the Board of Appraisers at Ottawa, determined there should be a price put upon the barrels, and, as the barrels were very substantial, they determined to put a high price on them; not such a price as could be obtained for those barrels if sold in St. John, but such as they believed would be charged for them at the place where the vinegar was put into the barrels. That was believed to be a very harsh case. From the statement made to me I was quite satisfied that the price of the barrels would be included in the invoice price of the white wine vinegar itself. These are two of a great many cases I have heard of. There has been a great deal of complaining. I do not know if the fault is with the Minister of the head of the department. He is, perhaps, over zealous or over eager to prove to the country that he is determined to do his whole duty. That is a very good motive, but it will sometimes carry a man too far; and to approve of the decisions and conduct of his immediate subordinates, will sometimes place him in their hands and allow himself to be guided by those whom he should control. A great deal of annoyance and trouble is being caused by the acts of this Board, sitting in Ottawa, who, it was alleged, when appointed, were to settle all disputes and end all troubles of this kind, and establish all over the country a system of appraisement which would ensure a uniform valuation of all articles of the same class entering the country, and the collection of a fair amount of duty from all. The Minister of Customs may say that there are no longer different valuations at different points. If so, this would be compensation to a great extent for the trouble caused by the appraisers overdoing their duty, but as to the fact of a great deal of annoyance and trouble in very many cases to respectable men, who have just cause to complaint, there can be no doubt whatever.

Mr. DOMVILLE. Coming from New Brunswick, I cannot allow any blame to be attached unnecessarily to our provincial appraisers, particularly to the appraisers in St. John. I believe them to be officers who have no other wish than to do their duty. The Chairman of the St. John Board is one of the finest men in the Dominion. I would like to remind the late Minister of Customs (Mr. Burpee) of what was done one time in the case of a cargo of molasses. Where was the honesty in that valuation? It was entered at 10c. or 12c. which was far below its value, the party running the risk of being detected, because he knew he could only be subjected to a fine of a few hundred dollars. I would also refer that hon. gentleman to the importation of a quantity of oil that would not stand the test.

Mr. ANGLIN. When was that?

Mr. DOMVILLE. I refer to the time when the hongentleman's friends were in power. Such difficulties must be expected to occur when we see the same kinds of goods sold at different prices at different places. Of course, traders wish to get their goods entered as low as possible. Those not conversant with the laws of the Dominion, imagine they can enter goods at the prices for which they can purchase them. I do not think any one should cast any slur on the St. John appraisers.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John). I do not think any member can say I ever cast the slightest reflection on any customs' officer in St. John, or made any complaint against the appraisers.

Mr. Anglin.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I did not say you made any, but that you should not make any.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John). I made no complaints. I know that the head of the office in St. John is a very worthy, respectable man, who knows his duty thoroughly. The hon, gentleman moved for the papers in the case of the molasses referred to, and saw the result of the investigation. I think, if he refers to the papers, he will find there were no molasses imported at the prices named.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I have never seen it; but I have understood that a cargo of molasses was brought into New Brunswick at a low valuation, seized and given up on payment of a trifling fine.

Mr. ANGLIN. I hope the House will pardon me if I appeared to throw any blame on the chief appraiser in St. John, which I certainly did not intend. I think I stated that what was done was upon instructions from the Board at Ottawa. I, too, cheerfully bear testimony to the respectability of the gentleman referred to by the member for King's (Mr. Domville), and the high regard in which he is held. I would be the last person to attack him undeservedly.

Mr. BOWELL. I think the press of St. John made no little noise about the question to which the member for Gloucester has referred. I had the great gratification of meeting, last summer, a large number of the merchants of that city, and, when complaining of the matter, I asked them, is this anything new? They replied—No. I asked: how long have you been paying duty on casks containing vinegar? and he replied, ever since Confederation. I remarked, this, then, is simply a question as to whether the imposition of the duty upon the casks is a correct system. I at once gave instructions, if the duty was imposed on barrels, instead of a quarter cask, as was directed by the appraisers, being taken, they must be accepted as barrels and not as quarter casks. The member for Gloucester says a very respectable merchant told him he entered his goods at the purchased prices. I have not the slightest doubt of it.

Mr. ANGLIN. He said, the regular wholesale purchase prices.

Mr. BOWELL. They may have been the regular ordinary wholesale export prices of that merchant of the United States, but not the fair market value, as provided in the law; honce the appraiser, if he stopped the goods and asked for an increase of their value, did precisely his duty under the law. I am a little surprised when the late Minister of Customs, the hon. member for St. John, says, the principle now carried out was not enforced by the late Administration. I have a score of returns, under my hand, in which the same principle is laid down, and where arbitrary prices have actually been put on a variety of articles, from a wash-tub to a piano, and wherein positive instructions are given to the appraisers and collectors to collect on prices laid down in this circular, and not upon the invoice prices. What more has the present Government done? How can the hon. gentleman complain of my over zeal in endeavouring to carry out the law that he and his colleagues placed on the Statute-book? I think it would be better, in the interests of the revenue and of morality, if opposition, in cases of this kind, should not be employed for party purposes. I think the hon, gentleman should endeavor to assist any officer of the Customs, of any Government, in carrying out this law, instead of endeavouring—I will not say to turn into ridicule—but to make political capital out of everything done by officers appointed by himself. Now I know the case to which the hon, gentleman referred in the city of St. John. I do not know who is interested, but at the very same time the entry—it was an importation of iron, I believe—was made at St. John, another entry of iron of the very same quality managed to get in at another port at a lower rate. Either the appraiser in St. John did not do his duty, or the officer at the other port did not do his duty. My investigation showed that it was the officer who did not allow the invoice to pass in St. John, that did his duty. That is one of those cases that will arise in any port, particularly in one that collects five or six million dollars in one season. These errors will occur. I do not believe that in this particular case the error was intentional. The whole desire of the department and their officers is to place every importer upon precisely the same footing.

Mr. BURPEE. I admitted, in my-remarks, that we did ascertain in every possible way the market value of the goods which were imported, and we very often had to add to the invoices to bring them up to the market value. I would put before the hon, gentleman a case like the following: here is a Liverpool invoice that had been laying in port for three months, during which time the goods have gone up 25 per cent. When the goods arrive here, is the importer to pay duty on the additional price? We will suppose a contrary case, where the goods have gone down 25 per cent. in value; would the hon, gentleman give the importer the benefit of the reduction?

Mr. BOWELL. I could not do that, because the hongentleman has placed in the law a clause to the effect that an invoice shall not be lowered for duty.

Motion agreed to.

DOMINION APPRAISERS.

Mr CASEY, in moving for copy of proceedings of Dominion Board of Appraisers since their appointment, and of all instructions as to the appraisement of goods sent to officers of the Customs since the introduction of the present Tariff, said: Perhaps I should have expressed myself better if I had said, all regulations made as to the appraisement of goods, for I find that is the term used in the Statute, as any regulations formerly made by the Governor in Council, I suppose are now made by the Board of Appraisers. I wish to add to the motion "all regulations made under section 10 of the Customs' Act in regard to appraisers." I wish to get at the true inwardness of this Board of Appraisers, to know exactly what they do in their secret councils, what regulations they have advised to be made, what instructions they have given, and on what evidence they base their advice and opinion as to the value of goods. It is evident that there is room for a difference of judgment in all these cases. No man can say absolutely what is a fair market value for goods in any market; that is a matter of individual judgment. The appraisers should have, then, a mass of evidence before them before they tender any advice on such a question. They must have price lists of all sorts of manufactures, and must exercise great care in striking a sort of general average between these price lists. I think it is of great importance that the proceedings of this Board, which is practically a small legislative chamber in itself, should be made regularly public along with other returns. In order to make a start in that direction, I move for these returns.

Mr. BOWELL. I scarcely think the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey), comprehends the extensiveness of his motion. If he means all the proceedings of the Board of Arbitrators, it would necessitate the bringing down of the result of their investigations in some thousands of invoices in all parts of the Dominion. Their duty is this: that all invoices are sent to the department where they are checked by a class of officers appointed for that purpose. If any doubtful case arises, as to the value of the invoice, the Board investigates it, correspondence takes place, investigation is made in the different markets of the world in which these articles are purchased, and a decision is thus arrived at as to the correctness of the invoice. If the hon, gentleman had added to his motion "all the samples the appraisers had received," it would have made an interesting show for this House, in addition to the invoices, which, perhaps, would make two or three cart loads; he might have added, also, the different samples they had received, from a needle to a small anchor. I have no doubt it would be very interesting; but if the hon. gentleman will go over to the department with me, I will have much pleasure in introducing him to that secret conclave, and he will have full liberty to investigate all the books and papers, providing he will give his word, as a gentleman, that he will not go and expose the private business of every merchant in this country. To bring down all these proceedings would be to lay before the world the invoices of some thousands of importers, and expose prices at which they purchased their goods. I think, probably, all the hon, gentleman requires is the instructions given to the appraisers at the different ports. These appraisers, I may say, issue no orders; they simply report to the department their investigations, and the conclusions to which they come, and the department either approves or disapproves of the action. While I have no desire to withold proper information, I do not think it would be desirable that all the proceedings of the Board of Appraisers should be brought before this House. also prefer that the motion should be so amended as to go back, say to 1874, as I find that the instructions issued to appraisers are very much the same now as they were under the late Administration. For example, I find that one appraiser is instructed as to the prices of wash tubs and pails, another as to the value placed on pianos, while another is given instructions to raise the price of cortain articles arbitrarily 50 per cent. In bringing down these instructions it would be desirable, also, that the names of the persons mentioned in them should be omitted.

Mr. CASEY. Certainly. As I said before, I have no desire to expose anybody's business. I am aware that my motion is rather vaguely framed, and the reason is, that the proceedings of these appraisers have so far been kept such a mystery that one finds a difficulty in knowing exactly how to shape a motion to get information regarding them. I should have thought, however, that the Board would have kept minutes of their meetings, and I should like to know if they get evidence and information from their agents, say at Manchester, Philadelphia, and other places, as to the prices at which goods are sold.

Mr. BOWELL. I will supply all that.

Mr. CASEY. I should like to know, also, what means are adopted to work up that information, and the instructions which have gone out at their instigation as to the valuation of different kinds of goods.

The motion, as amended, agreed to, as follows:-

"That an Order of the House do issue to the proper officer for a copy of all instructions as to the appraisement of goods, sent to officers of the Customs, from January, 1874, and all regulations made under section 10, chap. 15 and 42 Victoria, in regard to appraisers."

SURVEY OF INDIAN RESERVES.

Mr. CASEY, in moving for a statement showing what progress has been made in surveying Indian Reserves under the Indian Act of 1880, said: I have been told by some of the Indians, upon a reservation on the borders of my county, that great inequality exists in the distribution of the land; that some rich Indians have more than their share, and that the poorer ones suffer accordingly, as the rich Indians make their influence so felt that the others cannot get surveys made. It has been suggested to me that it would be well to find out what progress has been made in the surveys, and to call the attention of the department to the matter.

markets of the world in which these articles are purchased, and a decision is thus arrived at as to the correctness of the rumors which the hon, gentleman mentions are well founded or not, but I will see that the statement is brought

Motion agreed to.

THE CASE OF MR. E. V. BODWELL.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex) moved for copies of the correspondence and other papers on which was based the Commission issued in the case of Mr. E. V. Bodwell, then Superintendent of the Welland Canal; of the Commission and all instructions in connection therewith; of all correspondence and papers touching the appointment of Counsel on the Commission; of the report and evidence; of all correspondence thereon; of all Orders in Council on, or other disposition by the Government of the matter; with a statement in detail of all the expenses connected therewith, including the amount paid to Mr. Bodwell or his Counsel; also, for all papers in connection with Mr. Bodwell's transfer to British Columbia, and a statement of the salary and allowances attached to each appointment, and any allowance made for travelling or other incidental expenses. He said: It seems that Mr. E. V. Bodwell, the late Superintendent of the Welland Canal, shortly after the elections in September, 1878, was removed from that position, and transferred, at very great inconvenience to himself, to a position on the Pacific Railway in British Columbia. The House has not yet been informed of the charges preferred against Mr. Bodwell, or the nature of those charges. It was generally supposed by the public that he was an excellent officer. He received testimonials at different times from those immediately affected by his services. Those who used the Welland Canal and came in contact with Mr. Bodwell, reported him to be a very efficient and painstaking officer. For some reason, which is unknown, charges were preferred against Mr. Bodwell, which resulted in his exculpation—because, although he was dismissed or considered unworthy of occupying the position of Superintendent of the Welland Canal, he was not considered unworthy of another position under the Government. The facts con-nected with the charges investigated, and the determination of the Commission, so far as this House is concerned, are still unknown. I am anxious to get at the facts, and also to get a bill of the expenses. I do not know whether the prosecution was a vexatious one or not-whether Mr. Bodwell was unfairly treated or not. If he was a good superintendent of the Welland Canal, I fail to understand why he should be removed; if he was an unworthy officer, I fail to see why he should hold any position under the Government. I wish to get at the facts to learn whether he was treated as a public officer should be treated, or, whether at the back of this investigation, there was some improper interference, and, therefore, I submit this motion.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am a little surprised at the motion of the hon. gentleman. I have no reluctance whatever to bring down all the papers to which this motion refers; but I call the attention of the House to the very extraordinary circumstance that this motion, or a very similar one, was put on the paper a year ago. Mr. Bodwell was then in the lobby of the House on public business, he was here for the purpose of acquainting himself with the duties of the office to which he was transferred in British Columbia; and that motion, placed on the paper by one of his political friends, was removed from the paper, I have no doubt, at Mr. Bodwell's own request. I have reason to believe that Mr. Bodwell was complaint from making any far verv with reference to my action as head of the department. I he was employed, were anxious to do all we could to now confined to this statement was not prompted by any Sir John A. Macdonald.

promote his interests. The hon. gentleman cannot understand why, if these charges were sustained against Mr. Bodwell, he was not dismissed from his office, and why, if he was not competent to perform the duties of Superintendent of the Welland Canal, he could be competent to perform the duties of an accountant in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway in British Columbia. 1 may state very trankly to the hon. gentleman, that when the report of the Commission and the evidence are brought down, it will be made quite apparent to him why Mr. Bodwell should not be thought able, with advantage to the country, to discharge duties involving the expenditure of a great amount of public money. He might not be able to discharge those duties with advantage to the country, and yet, being a gentleman in whose integrity the Government had no reason to feel any want of confidence, he should be quite equal to perform the duties of the very important and responsible position which he holds in British Columbia. I found, from the report of the Commissioner and the evidence, that it was not in the public interest to retain Mr. Bodwell in the position he occupied, and turned my attention to the means by which as good a position could be found for Mr. Bodwell, and one in which he could satisfactorily discharge the duties incumbent on him. I acted, as the head of the department, with the sincere desire to do justice to Mr. Bodwell, and, at the same time, efficiently provide for the performance of duties which, according to the report of the Commissioner, he was not equal to performing. If the hon, gentleman insists, I will present the papers, but I think it only right to make this explanation frankly to the House.

Mr. BLAKE. I hope my hon. friend will press for the papers. Of course, it is quite possible that while the charges which were made against Mr. Bodwell may have turned out wholly unfounded, still the Minister may have come to the conclusion, as he now declares to the House he did, that Mr. Bodwell was not a suitable person to continue in the duties of Superintendent of the Welland Canal. It is quite consistent with the fact that no impropriety, such as was charged against him, was established, that that result may have impressed itself upon the mind of the hon-Minister, but I will learn with surprise, from all I have heard of Mr. Bodwell's administration of the canal in my time, that such is the result of the investigation. I am sorry that the hon. Minister did not wait until the papers came down, and, with the papers before us, make the statement which is calculated to be so damaging to Mr. Bodwell's reputation for ability and capacity as that which he has made. The case, I hope, in that particular, will remain in suspense in the minds of the House and the public until the materials, which the hon gentleman says will prove his proposition, are placed before the House. I was not in Parliament when these proceedings took place, but I observed an account of them in the public press, and it had been my intention, during the last Session of Parliament, to have moved for these papers on public grounds and for the reason which I am about to explain. I did not move in the matter last Session because I found my hon. friend (Mr. Ross) had a notice on the paper. That notice was not prosecuted, and when it was dropped it was too late for me to put a notice on the paper. Then, as now, I had no communication whatever with Mr. Bodwell on the subject. I abstained from speaking with him, though he was an old personal political friend of mine, when he was down here. I abstained from inviting any discussion whatever of his position or removal, or anything connected with his case. I have abstained from corresponding with have reason to know that he was disposed not to make any him since that time, because I was determined, if no other complaint at all, but rather to consider that the Government and myself, as the head of the department in which be able to say, as I do now say, that my action which is information sent me by or on behalf of Mr. Bodwell. The ground on which I wished to attract the attention of the House to this subject was that it seemed to me that in the proceedings taken there was a very great departure from the usual and the correct course. From what appeared in the public press, I judge that some complaints were made by some persons against Mr. Bodwell and forwarded to the hon. gentleman. It was perfectly correct that the hon. Minister should take cognizance of any charges perfectly correct made against a public officer, and if he thought, after explanation had been rendered, that they demanded investigation, provide machinery for an investigation; but what does appear to me very extraordinary—and I call the attention of the First Minister to it, not in Mr. Bodwell's interest, for the matter is past and done, but in the interest of the public service generally—was this: that the Commission being issued offering an opportunity to those persons who had complained of Mr. Bodwell's conduct to prosecute their complaints, the Government should, as the public prints intimated that the Government did, retain a prosecuting counsel to conduct the enquiry into charges against their own servant. I do not think that that circumstance can have attracted the First Minister's attention. I do not mention it in order to make a point against the Government, but rather with the view of having a settlement of what I think is a very important question. Now, as I said, it appears from the evidence in the public prints, that somebody or other was appointed a prosecuting counsel to conduct the enquiry before the Commissioner. He called witnesses. He called Mr. Bodwell himself, put him in the box, examined, cross-examined, and examined him again in the most severe manner with the view of proving out of his own mouth that he was guilty of some offence or other; and I presume, though I do not know, that these witnesses who were summoned were summoned at the expense of the Government. What does that amount to? If that course is to be pursued, it establishes a general course to be followed with reference to any civil servant against whom charges may be made which the Minister thinks are worthy of enquiry. Now, it seems to me there ought to be no obstruction to enquiry into such charges, that the Minister ought to submit them to the officer, obtain the officer's declaration with such corroborative evidence as the officer can give, and, if after looking at the two sides of the question, he thinks there is something to investigate, he should put the matter into a train of enquiry; but I do think that the civil servant is entitled to have it said that the Crown should not prosecute that enquiry. I think those who made the charge should have an opportunity of comirg before the tribunal, represented by counsel, if counsel be required. The civil servant should be equally entitled to have himself defended by counsel from his point of view, and the Government should stand entirely neutral between the accuser and the accused, not lending a helping hand to protect its officer from investigation, but not lending either a helping hand to further the efforts of the prosecution. I think the Government should stand in that independent position, seeing that no injustice is done, in the conduct of the transaction to either side. If, as stated in the Opposition prints, the Government appointed a prosecuting counsel, the enquiry was turned into a Government prosecution. I submit to the judgment of the First Minister whether that is a wise, just and proper way of dealing with the public service. I should be the last to defend Mr. Bodwell, or any one else, from proper investigation, but I think the Government ought to occupy the position I have intimated in regard to those matters, and not assume the position of prosecuting counsel. The expenses of the prosecution were paid by the Government and Mr. Bodwell's expenses also. I think it was very proper, if the Govern-should have paid his expenses; but the whole thing seems to have proceeded on a false basis, in reference to the particular to which I have referred. With reference to the result, Mr. Bodwell having been, as I suppose, from the public prints, acquitted of these charges—as from what I have read in the papers, he ought to have been—having been suspended as he was, and upon this I do not presume to offer an opinion-I can see cases in which it would be proper to suspend an officer—having been, after suspension and acquittal, restored to his office, he is afterwards changed to another place. Well, we know what use has been made of the Welland Canal, and of the patronage of that canal in old times, and it appeared to me there has been a dead set against Mr. Bodwell by those who made use of that canal patronage in those old times; that there was a determination—I do not say on the part of the hon. gentleman—but on the part of over zealous supporters of his to obtain control of the patronage of the Welland Canal and use it as it was used in former days; and that having for this object, by this Commission and prosecution, assailed Mr. Bodwell, and he having been acquitted and restored, pressure was brought to bear on the Minister of a kind which I presume obliged him to make a transfer. If that transfer was made upon the grounds the hon, gentlemen states, I am not to sit in judgment upon it and condemn it, because, as I have just admitted, he might have been convinced that Mr. Bodwell though not guilty upon this charge, and being a man of high integrity, was yet not competent to fill this office. I should be very much surprised if that was the result. But it is satisfactory to know that the Minister of Railways and Canals gives high testimony to his character, because every one of us who knows him will be convinced that he is a person of high integrity and unblemished character quite fit, in my opinion, to fill a high office in the public service. Unless his removal was justifiable, it was a dangerous infraction of the independence of the Civil Service, because you may compel a man to accept an office in British Columbia, very much inferior, relatively to the one he held in the province in which he has always resided, and he may be obliged to accept your proposal and keep his mouth shut-to make no complaint for fear a worse thing may yet come. I do not know if that was so in this case—but if so, it would be a sort of punishment, a course of conduct with reference to a civil servant, wholly unjustifiable, to say, I transfer you from the Welland Canal to British Columbia, upon those terms. There are circumstances which might justify it, and if the Minister's judgment is justified by the evidence, that will, of course, sustain this transaction. But it does seem to me to be rather a determination on the part of friends of the Minister that Mr. Bodwell should cease to be Superintendent of the Welland Canal, which has led to his transfer from the honorable and important position he held to the much less stand entirely neutral between the accuser and the accused, not lending a helping hand to protect its officer from investigation, but not lending either a helping hand to further the efforts of the prosecution. I think the Government should stand in that independent position, seeing that no injustice is done, in the conduct of the transaction to either side. If, as stated in the Opposition prints, the Government as Government prosecuting counsel, the enquiry was turned into a Government prosecution. I submit to the judgment of the First Minister whether that is a wise, just and proper way of dealing with the public service. I should be the last to defend Mr. Bodwell, or any one else, from proper investigation, but I think the Government ought to occupy the position, but I think the Government and Mr. Bodwell's expenses also. I think it was very proper, if the Government undertook to prosecution failed, that the Government the prosecution failed, that the Government of the expense, and the prosecution failed, that the Government of the employee but for the public interest. If it be for the public interest that a Minister, under his responsibility, should desire the removal of an officer, he has a right to remove him, and may refuse to be accountable to Parliament for his act. Of course, he is accountable in this sense: Parliament may say we have no confidence in your judgment; but, being responsible for the management of his department, he may say it is for the public interest that the officer should be removed. The House of Commons in England always assents to such action of a Minister. But if the hon, gentleman would look back to the circumstances under which Mr. Bodwell was appointed, he must know that a Mr. Smith held office as deputy when Mr. Mackenzie was at the head of the department, that the late Premier removed him and refused to give any reason therefor, or examine into his conduct. He never got any satisfaction, and, as I am told, the whole of the people in that part of the country, without reference to political proclivities, petitioned for the restoration of Mr. Smith as a worthy deserving and efficient officer. As I understand it, certain complaints were made against Mr. Bodwell and sent to him for an answer. On the face of the paper the Minister of Railways thought that a case for enquiry was made out. An enquiry was held; Mr. Bodwell retained counsel, counsel being also retained by the Government in order to marshal the evidence and keep the examination within the limits of the charges. The papers will show the result, and hon. gentlemen will see from them that the Minister of Railways acted with every sort of kindness in transferring Mr. Bodwell to an office of accountability, affording him an opportunity of rising in the service. He now enjoys an advantage not possessed before, of being a civil servant. I may say this, that the salary he now draws is not equal to the salary he drew as Superintendent of the Welland Canal, though it is equal to the salary his successor draws now. The Government thought that the salary paid to the Superintendent of the Welland Canal was too large for the duties he performed, and it has been reduced. It is true my hon. friend may say it is more expensive to live in British Columbia than near the Welland Canal. That may be; but, on the other hand, Mr. Bodwell, by being employed as he is now, is a civil servant and will rise in the world, but he could not rise where he was. At all events, I can assure the hon. gentleman that the aggrieved person did not consider himself aggrieved, as he told me that he was very well treated.

GOVERNMENT EXPENSES TO ENGLAND.

Mr. CAMERON (South Huron), in moving for a return showing the expenses in detail incurred by the several members of the Government and any other person or persons in the service of the Government, or paid by the Government, sent to England or elsewhere on behalf of the Government, or in the service of the Government, from the 10th February, 1880, said: I would like to enquire why it was that the returns for this same subject were not brought down last year. On the 15th of February last a motion in the same words as this motion precisely, was passed by the House, and, as far as I have been able to learn, the returns then called for have not been brought down to this day. I find also that, on the 23rd of February of last Session, a motion worded in the same way precisely, but covering a different period, was also adopted by this House, and, so far as I have been able to learn, the returns have not yet been brought down, although ten months have since elapsed.

Sir JOHN A MACDONALD. I can tell my hon. friend that the returns asked for last year, as well as those asked for now, shall be sent down at once.

SUPREME COURT JUDGMENTS.

Mr. KEELER moved for detailed statements as follows:

1. All judgments rendered by the Supreme and Exchequer Courts, since the 1st day of January last.

2. The amount of claim in each suit.

3. The amount of costs in each suit.

4. The amount of fees paid to the Registrar in each suit.

Motion agreed to.

EXPORT OF CATTLE TO ENGLAND.

Mr. DOMVILLE, in moving for a return giving a comparative statement of cattle and sheep exported from Canada to England, during the years 1879 and 1880; the return to be made up by months, showing from what ports in the Dominion they were shipped, said: My view is that these returns will show that we have not yet done much in the lower provinces in the way of exporting sheep and cattle. I shall endeavor to prove by these returns that we require proper communication, and I shall endeavor to bestir the Government to turn their attention to the port of St. John, and lend us some aid in order to re-establish direct steam communication with Europe.

Motion agreed to.

POST OFFICE AT PARKHILL.

Mr. COUGHLIN moved for copies of evidence taken before the Post Office Inspector, in the course of the present year, with reference to the affairs of the Post Office at Parkhill.

Motion agreed to.

NEWSPAPER POSTAGE.

Mr. CHARLTON moved for a return showing postage paid in each month of the year ending June 30th, 1880, by daily newspapers of Ontario and Quebec, including in each case their weekly edition.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would like the hon. gentleman to explain why he makes this motion. It is not a matter in which the House or the country can have any interest in the world. It has always been refused in England, as well as by the Post Office Department in the Dominion. It is a matter of the private business of the newspaper. What interest, can anyone have to know whether the Woodstock Review or the Brantford Courier has the greatest circulation? It is an interference with private business. I am quite sure it would not be granted in the United States, and I do not think it ought to be granted here.

Mr. CHARLTON. The Prime Minister is quite incorrect in saying that this information has been refused in the United States. It has always been granted in the United States. I do not see any impropriety in making public a matter which is of public interest, as this certainly is. In dispute between parties as to their circulation, it may be a matter of interest to the public to know which is right. It is a method which is adopted in the United States, and it supplies information to which, I think, the public are entitled.

Mr. MILLS. I suppose a court of justice could compel a publisher to give the information as a basis for the rates which he may be charging for advertisements, so that the hon. gentleman would be only giving information which could be obtained by a court. Merchants or traders who advertise in newspapers, have a right to know whether the representations which are made to them by publishers are true. I think the information sought for would be to the public interest.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. And if a merchant should advertise that he has the largest, best and cheapest stock in the world, we could bring him up in court, I suppose, and make him prove whether his statements are true. We would not likely have bought his goods unless we thought he had a good stock. I fear it is impossible to satisfy the unlaudable, but, perhaps, excusable curiosity of my hon. friend from Norfolk.

Motion negatived.

DRAWBACKS ON EXPORTED GOODS.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant), in moving for a return of all claims presented for drawbacks on goods manufactured for export since March 14th, 1879, showing the names of all applicants, their place of business, the articles on which the drawback was claimed, and the amount of each claim, distinguishing between the claims which have been allowed and those which have been disallowed, and those under consideration and not yet decided, said: I find from the 136th section of the Customs Act of 1877, that—

"The Governor in Council may, under regulations to be made for that purpose, allow on the exportation of goods which have been imported into Canada, and on which a duty of Customs has been paid, a drawback equal to the duty so paid; and in cases to be mentioned in such regulations, and subject to such provisions as may be therein made, such drawback may be allowed on duty-paid goods manufactured or wrought in Canada into goods exported therefrom as aforesaid; and the period within which such drawback may be allowed, after the time the duty was paid, shall be limited in such regulations."

I trust the Minister of Customs will not think I have asked too much information. I do not know how bulky the return may be, as I have no idea of how many claims for drawbacks have been presented. My objects in making the motion are, first, to show the extent of our export trade, and, secondly to get some information in which my constituents are interested. If the return should prove to be a very heavy one, I should be glad to restrict the terms of the motion, so that the return might be brought down at an early day.

Mr. BOWELL. I would ask the hon. gentleman to insert in his motion after the word "disallow" the words "and the reasons for such disallowance," as I think it is well to know these reasons.

Mr. PATERSON. I am quite willing, and I would ask the Minister to allow me to add to the motion the words "and copies of regulations which the department may have made."

Mr. BOWELL. I have no objection.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

RETIRING ALLOWANCES OF JUDGES.

Mr. BLAKE moved for a statement of the number of Judgeships in each Province at the time of the Union of such Provinces with Canada, the incumbents of which were under the law entitled in certain events to retiring allowances; and the number of Judges in each such Province actually receiving such retiring allowances at such time; and a like statement for each year since Confederation, as to each Province during such year in the Union down to, and inclusive of, the year 1880. He said: Those who have looked at the Public Accounts, which show year by year the number of persons drawing retiring allowances, who have been occupants of the judicial bench, must have observed some very extraordinary results, if they contrast the number of judicial offices in each Province whose incumbents could possibly have been retired with the number of judges who actually are so retired. Take the number of judicial officers in the Province of Quebec. Take the number of persons who are drawing retiring allowances, and you will see that unless there is a most extraordinary piece of ill luck on the part of the Dominion in that Province, there must have been some very great mistakes in the appointments, or ticular cause; but I think the results are so disproportionate that it would be worth while to tabulate them and ascertain whether this is a sudden rush of annuitants, or whether it is a permanent state of things in one Province as compared with others. The rule ought to be observed—I do not just now say it is not—that a man appointed to judicial office should be of such an age that the public may expect to realize from him a very considerable number of years of active service. He ought to be a person certainly not decaying in years, one who has strength and vigor and ambition to make a place for himself on the bench, who is likely, in fact, to mature and become a better lawyer than when he was appointed to a judicial position. I do not mean to say that that rule is invariable—the condition of the bar at times may be such as to oblige a departure from it; but I think that ought to be the general object of the Government, under these circumstances, and I think the people of this country, always impatient of a system of pensions, would become very restive under a system of pensions which produced for any very long series of years the results which are to be found in Quebec at any rate. Now, I have never at all yielded to the popular prejudice against pensions in respect to the judicial office. I believe it to be necessary to the proper administration of justice, that there should be these retiring allowances. Nothing could be more calamitous than that the House should be in a position to be forced to consider whether a man was so incompetent to discharge his duties as that he should be retired, without something wherewith to maintain his declining years. And if you properly apportion the salary with reference to the obviously great advantages which are derivable from the circumstance that there is to be a retiring allowance, there is in that case a public gain. But while I believe the system to be defensible, there is no doubt a considerable jealousy as to retiring allowances, and we ought to take care that there is no abuse of that system. It seemed to me, on looking at the list to which I have referred, that the results are so very extraordinary that I thought it proper to move for this statement.

Mr. McDONALD (Pictou). The return will, of course, be brought down. I have just one observation to make. Not knowing what the object of the hon. gentleman was in moving this return, I was not able to place any facts at my command; but I am not aware that any judges in Quebec or the other Provinces-I can speak with more confidence of my own Province-have been retired improperly.

Mr. BLAKE. I-do not make any charge at present. I say nothing on the subject one way or another.

Mr. McDONALD. In that case, I suppose, there had better be no discussion.

Mr. BLAKE. I may make it the subject of observation afterwards.

Motion agreed to.

JUDGES IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for copies of the Orders in Council appointing two new Judges in British Columbia, and of any correspondence touching the residence and judicial duties of any of the Judges of that Province, said: The House will recollect that last Session provision was made for the appointment of two Judges for British Columbia, and in the course of the discussion, which then took place, a question was raised as to the provision for the residence of those Judges, and also for the residence of one of the existing Judges, the Local legislation in accordance with which we were acting, providing, if I remember rightly, for such a distribution of the Judges as to residence, some very great improprieties in the retirements. I am not as would necessitate the change of the residence of one of blaming any particular Government, or assigning any part the Judges from Victoria to some part of the mainland; and I am not sure whether, of the two Judges to remain on the island, one was not to be stationed at some other point than Victoria. I observe by the Gazette that at a very late period, within a few days of the opening of this Session, the appointment of two Judges was made to the Bench in British Columbia, and I should like to obtain the papers referred to in the motion.

Motion agreed to.

JUDICIAL WORK IN QUEBEC.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for copies of all statements, or representations, or correspondence on the subject of the distribution of the judicial work of the Province of Quebec, said: I observe that there is a proposition to add to our judicial staff by appointing a judge or judges in the Province of Quebec. This subject was under discussion during the time I held the office of Minister of Justice, and it came up in more than one shape-upon representations made at one time by the bar, at another time by some of the judges, and, I think, at another time by the Local Government. Considerable attention was given to the subject, and I certainly came to the conclusion that a re-distribution of judicial work amongst the staff of judges in the Province of Quebec would render it entirely unnecessary to make any accession to their numbers. I believe that there was, at one time, in the district of Montreal, a very considerable pressure upon the judges. That pressure ought, to some extent, to have been since relieved, because it was very largely caused by the operation of the Insolvency Act, and one proposal before us—which I didnot feel at liberty to adopt—was, that we should invite legislation for the appointment of a special insolvency judge for the city of Montreal, in order to relieve the judges of a share of their judicial duties. That difficulty has been got rid of by the repeal of the Insolvency Act, and the administration of the estates of debtors, under the law of Lower Canada, is Lunderstand, managed through the Lower Canada, is, I understand, managed through the Sheriff. Well, it seemed to me then—and I have heard nothing to induce me to depart from that view-that there ought to be a reconsideration of the whole question of the distribution of the judicial work of the Province, before proposals were made to the Legislature for an increase in the staff of judges at the expense of the country; and I believe the hon. Minister of Justice will find on record in his office—and if he has not got it, I hope he will obtain it—information of the fact, that in several districts, the judges have, I might say, almost literally, nothing to do that there are districts in which the work is almost nominal, and in which it will be extremely easy to arrange the work so as to obtain all the advantages of a local judge, and yet to utilize his services for a considerable period in other places. I remembered to have read in the public prints -where this question has been for some time agitated, not long ago, a letter from a very acute judge, Judge Ramsay, upon the subject. I think it will be found this letter states distinctly—I speak only from a distant memory of it—the opinion that there is, upon a proper re-organization of the judicial work, quite sufficient judicial strength to discharge the whole of that work. It is material, in view of the proposed legislation, that we should have before us all the information possible on this subject, because I think the public mind may well view with alarm the increases which are taking place, year after year, in the cost of the administration of justice. As I have observed more than once, we have to be unusually jealous with regard to this expenditure, because the fact is that it is not the authority which pays that creates the office. If the provinces had to pay the salaries of the judges whom they legislate into existence, there would be, of course, that check upon their Mr. Blake.

be, by courtesy, the duty of the Dominion to provide the salary, so long will you have a tolerably lavish creation of judgeships by the province and an intolerably enerous expenditure by the Dominion. I repeat the argument that I have formerly advanced, and it seems to me conclusive in favor of our being entitled and of its being our duty, on any occasion of this description, to investigate into the necessity of the creation of the office, and not to take it as a matter of course, that the funds of the Dominion are to be burdened with the payment of a large salary, because any particular province chooses to create a fresh judgeship. I do not desire to anticipate the discussion which will take place on the hon. gentleman's measure, but to lay a basis for an intelligent discussion of that subject by obtaining the information necessary for that discussion.

Mr. McDONALD (Pictou). Of course, it is obviously better in every way, that the discussion to which the hon. gentleman referred should take place, on the resolution of which I have given notice. I am not aware whether there is any correspondence of the character referred to in the hon. gentleman's notice, but whatever correspondence there is will be brought down.

SURVEYS OF THE RIVER THAMES.

Motion agreed to.

RONDEAU HARBOR OF REFUGE.

Mr. STEPHENSON moved for returns showing the names of parties who tendered to perform the work advertised during the present year in connection with the improvement of the Harbor of Refuge at Rondeau, together with the prices named by said tenderers for the performance of said work.

Motion agreed to; and (at 10:40 o'clock, p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

FRIDAY, 17th December, 1880.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. COURSOL. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to bring before the House a matter personal to myself. I call attention to the report of Mr. McDougall. the Auditor-General, which has just been distributed to hon. members. In that report 1 find a letter signed by him and addressed to the Speaker of the House, under the date of 24th November last, in which it is stated that three members of this House, Messrs. Coursol, Mongenais and Ferguson, had received their full indemnity, although they had been absent during a portion of the Session. Another inaccuracy on the part of the Auditor-General is, that Mr. Ferguson's name is mentioned in his letter instead of that of Mr. Ryan, showing that this official was not well informed in regard to the hon, members who had been absent. If I left this letter unchallenged it would evidently imply that I had received, from the Treasurer of this House, an creating the offices; but so long as a province believes that official cheque to which I had no right; and those who read all that it has got to do is to create a judgeship, and it will the Public Accounts only might be under the impression that the three gentlemen named had received from the country a larger allowance than they were entitled to. I am sorry to say that the Auditor General seems to have taken very little trouble to inform himself about the proceedings of this House. I believe it is well known to many of my hon colleagues that during minesten days, including Sundays, in the first part of the last Session, I was absent from this House on account of illness. I came here on the 2nd of March, I believe, and was therefore not entitled to any indemnity during that time. When the House rose on the 7th of May I received from the cashier the amount I was entitled to, deducting the number of days that I had been absent. While I was temporarily absent from the House, a motion was made by the hon member for Quebec County, seconded by the hon member for Kent, which was carried, and which authorised

"The Accountant of this House to pay to C. J. Coursol, Esq., member for Montreal East, J. B. Mongenais, Esq., member for Vaudreuil, and Michael Patrick Ryan, Esq., member for Montreal Centre, the full amount of their indemnity as if they had been present in this House on the 12th of February last, in consequence of the severe illness which prevented those hon members from attending their parliamentary duties."

Two or three weeks after this order was passed, I received a regular cheque from the department for the balance of the pay which I had not received when I left the House to go to Montreal, and I saw no reason why I should not accept a cheque which this House had ordered to be paid. Now, I think it would be unfair to any member of this House that a mistake of this description should be allowed to go unrectified. Whether the House had a right to pass that motion I know not; but it was done, and it was done in my absence. I had heard that similar cases had occurred, and I had no reason to refuse that allowance when it was sent, three weeks afterwards.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I am very glad the hon, member has called the attention of the House to this matter. I imagine the difficulty has arisen from the fact that the Auditor was not cognizant of the resolution that was passed by the House.

Mr. BLAKE. I have not seen the report of the Auditor-General, but if he has reported the report must mention that the payment in question was not made in accordance with the law. An Act of Parliament, and not a resolution of this House, prescribes the mode of payment of the Sessional indemnity. It is the Statute which provides the circumstances under which, and the amount which, a Member of Parliament shall receive, and a resolution of the House cannot alter that law. It is true that such resolutions have not unusually been passed, but they are none the less a violation of the law. If it is desirable to make provision for the payment of the indemnity in any other manner than now provided by Statute, the law should be altered.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. There are several cases where a resolution of the House has authorized special payments. If the Auditor was aware that the House had passed this resolution, though it was at variance with the law, it was proper for him to have made a note of the fact that it was by order of the House the payment was made.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex). Of course, the rule laid down by the leader of the Opposition is correct, and I would remind the House that in the Session before last some members on the Opposition benches were recipients of their full indemnity on a similar resolution, and the Auditor-General failed to call the attention of the House to that fact.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon gentleman is quite incorrect. It was not until this year that the Auditor-General was authorized to deal with the accounts of the sessional indemnity.

Mr. COURSOL. I believe the Auditor-General, at all events, ought to have mentioned that the cheque which was sent to me, at Montreal, had been ordered by this House.

FACTORY LABOR.

Mr. BERGIN introduced a Bill (No. 6) to regulate the hours of labor in the workshops, mills and factories of the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes.

Bill read the first time.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RATEWAY.

The House again resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Pacific Railway Resolutions.

Mr. LANGEVIN. Mr. Chairman: on rising to speak to the motion before the Committee, I confess I feel more than usual the responsibility that rests upon me, in treating this question and answering the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake). This question of the Pacific Ruilway is one of the greatest, and, porhaps, the most important, that could occupy the deliberations of this House—perhaps the most important question that has ever been submitted to Parliament. Its importance is derived from the fact that this great subject has occupied the attention of this Parliament for the last ten years, and that the construction of this railway must lead to the greatest consequences, and, as I believe, the most happy consequences to this country. Its importance is also derived from the very magnitude of the subsidies in money and land to be given towards this undertaking. Its importance is derived from the fact that, although tenders were asked for some years for the same undertaking, no offers were received; but, to-day, we find capitalists that are bold enough to undertake the construction of this work, concerning which the Government, Parliament and the people themselves had great apprehensions, fearing that the amount of money required for the building of this road, in accordance with the old plan, would so cripple our resources that, for years and years to come, we could hardly undertake any other great work in this country. Its importance is derived from the fact that gentlemen of standing, of respectability, of large means, backed most likely by others of equal means, have come forward and have said to the Government: "We are realy to put ourselves in the position of the Government and to undertake the building of the Pacific Railway, and we will, moreover, work the railway, for all time to come, according to the terms we now submit to you." These terms have now been laid before Parliament by Message from His Excellency the Governor General, and they are the subject-matter of our present deliberations. Before I enter into the consideration of the details of this measure, let me briefly go back to the time when this great undertaking was first mooted, and let us see what has been done from that moment up to the present time. Ten years ago, when British Columbia was admitted to the Confederation, one of the conditions of that union, according to the treaty between British Columbia and Canada, was the building of the Pacific Railway from the shores of the Pacific Ocean across the continent to connect with the Canadian system of railways. That measure was submitted to Parliament, and, after long discussion and deliberation, the scheme was adopted, and it was decided that British Columbia should be admitted into the Union on the conditions therein mentioned, of which the building of this railway was one. In 1872-3, the Government of Sir John A. Macdonald, presented to Parliament a measure providing for the building of the railway by a grant of $30,000,000 and 50,000,000 of acres of land. The contract was given to a number of gentlemen who undertook to build the railway, but they failed in their negotiations, and, therefore, nad to give up the contract. After the accession to office of the hon. member for Lambton, that hon, gentleman and his colleagues considered the question of building the Pacific Railway by some other measure than that offered by their predecessors. They wished to build the railway with land, money, and a guarantee. They advertised for tenders during a long time, and the result was that no offer came—none, at all events, that I am aware of, or that was laid before Parliament. Therefore, the Government of that day with the Parliament at their back, concluded that the only means of building the railway was for the Government to undertake it themselves, taking care that it should be done without increasing unduly the taxation of the country. Two portions of that railway were begun by the hon, gentlemen, that is to say, the portion from Thunder Bay westward and the portion from Winnipeg eastward, leaving between the two a gap of about 185 miles to be constructed afterwards. These were put under contract, and the contracts were being executed, some portions of them being nearly built, when the Government-the second Government of my right hon. friend-came back to office. Previous to that time, the hon. gentleman, who was then leader of the Opposition Government-I mean the member for Lambton-had asked for tenders for a part of the railway now covered by a portion of the contracts in British Columbia. This is the condition in which we found the question of the Pacific Railway when we came into office in the month of October, 1878. Considering the matter with great anxiety, we came to this conclusion: that, unless the gap between the two portions of the railway, from Thunder Bay westward and from Red River eastward, was filled up by building the railway between those two points, we would not derive any revenue or other advantage from the railway under construction; and, therefore, my hon, friend the Minister of Railways, with the consent of the Governor in Council, called for tenders for the construction of that portion of the road. We thought that even after having contracted for these 185 miles, it was due to British Columbia-it was our duty to British Columbia-and we were bound by good faith to perform that duty-to see that the work of construction was begun in that Province without losing a single hour, if possible; and, therefore, tenders were asked for the construction of four sections of the railway from Yale westward. Tenders were accepted and the contracts awarded. This policy was the policy; this action was the action, which was submitted to Parliament last Session. But although the country stood by us, and a large majority of the members of this House sanctioned the action of the Government, nevertheless, it would be childish to conceal that there was a feeling in the country, as well as in Parliament, of apprehension for the future. The feeling was this: that the uncertainty about the amount of money that would be required to build the railway was disturbing the public mind; nobody could say positively what would be the liabilities of the country, or how many millions would be required, not merely to build the road, but to work it, and to work it for all time to come. A great many, remembering the first years of working the Intercolonial, were frightened at the prospects of working the Pacific Railway. They thought that the deficit on the working of that road would be such, that it would be a great burden on the revenues of the country for years and years to come. The Government was not blind to this. They thought they should try to meet the public mind, and dispel the apprehensions which were felt; they should try to put this great undertaking on such a footing that it would be accepted with confidence by Parliament and by the people. This is the reason why they matured the present scheme during the recess, and why they now submit that scheme to Parliament—one which, I hope, will commend itself to the support of a majority of this House. Last year, Mr. Chairman, when we presented to the House the results of our action during the 12 months, we were met by the present leader of the Opposition with these words:

"If it be true, as your High Commissioner said on the same occasion that 'it is impossible for us, with our limited means, to undertake alone the settlement of the North-West; that we have neither the people nor Mr. LANGEVIN.

the money to do it;' if this be true, how much less are we able to add to that intolerable task, the Columbia section of the railway? Is this indeed the way to develop even such a poor and attenuated actional spirit as is attainable by a people who are not permitted, who, perhaps, do not even aspire to their legitimate participation in the management of the concerns of the great family of nations? Is this, indeed, the way to infuse among us the spirit of unity and brotherly love, to make us one and a contented people? You may, perhaps, partly satisfy the 12,000 souls in British Columbia, but only because your action is the pledge and hostage to them for the completion of this gigantic work, to the ruin of the whole."

I am sorry to see that the hon gentleman, even at so late a period as this, should raise the question of the small population of British Columbia. This was not a question of whether British Columbia had 10,000 or 12,000 people, but one regarding a great undertaking for a great nation and a great people. True, British Columbia is only a Province, but that Province will be filled with a large population in a few years, and that population will be composed of Canadians as we are, and will form a portion of a great nation, which, of course, must grow as other nations have grown. And when we see that our neighbors on the other side of the line, who had only a population of 4,000,000 when they separated from Great Britain, have now a population of nearly 50,000,000, we have no reason for despairing, or for believing that, with the same energy and determination, and with as good a climate as any other country, we should not increase as rapidly as the United States. The hon gentleman goes on to say:

"Such is your reckless, your inconsistent, your vacillating, your impractical policy."

Having so characterized our policy, he goes on:

"Do you ask for mine? I will tell it. Set free the springs of legitimate revenue, by removing the obstacles designed to choke them. Open the avenues of legitimate trade, by lowering the legislative bars designed to close them. Free the people as soon as may be from the extortionate taxation by which you oppress them."

One would think the hon. gentleman had forgotten the five years of office of his friends, when they increased the taxation year after year, to the extent of five millions a year, and yet ended their Administration with a deficit of eight or ten millions of dollars. The hon. gentleman continues:

"Return to a moderate revenue Tariff, the only practicable plan in our circumstances, and a necessary incident in whose operation is to give some of the so-called advantages of protection to some of your native industries. By an earnest and searching plan of economy and retrenchment, directed to every branch of the public service, help to redress the balance between revenue and expenditure, while you lighten the people's burdens."

Why did they not do that themselves during the five years they were in office, and when they had the opportunity?

"But if you will do none of these things; if you will, in all else, persist in your mad career, at any rate in this be wise. If, in all else you be rash, in this, at any rate, be discreet. Learn that our position is grave and serious, and that our future is dependent on present prudence. Complete the railway to Red River.

"Go on with the prairie section as fast as settlement demands. For that, risk something; since, as I have said, the die is cast. But, in order to succeed in that, in order that you may have a chance later to do more, deal with that alone now. Bend to that great effort your undivided energies, your whole available resources. Postpone, meanwhile, the western work, and do not, by your present action, based on airy dreams and vain imaginations, risk the ruin of your country."

Well, I hope it will not be the ruin of the country. It is exactly to avoid the ruin of the country that we have come down with this scheme. It is to dispel the misapprehensions of the public and of Parliament that we have submitted it, and I hope, when the vote is taken, that hon, gentlemen on the other side will see that we interpreted rightly the sentiment of Parliament and that a large majority of this House will sanction this great measure. This was the way the hon, leader of the Opposition met us last year. Let us see how he meets us this year. According to the contract, the amount of money to be given to the Syndicate is $25,000,000, and the amount of land 25,000,000 acres, worth.

say, one dollar an acre. To these two sums, you have to add the cost of the sections completed or now under construction, as far as Burrard Inlet, amounting to $28,000,000; so that the whole amount of money that will have been expended by this country for completing the Pacific Railway is $53,000,000, to which you must add the value of the land at a dollar an acre, making altogether, $78,000,000

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Mr. LANGEVIN. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman means to say that the valuation of the land at one dollar an acre is too low. If so, we will have to consider the question of valuing it at a higher rate, and not do, as the hon. gentleman did the other night, apply that rate only to one contract, but to the contracts of hon. gentlemen opposite, as well as to those of this Government. Thus, according to our plan, we shall have the whole Pacific Railway completed for $78,000,000, and with the guarantee that the company now to be inaugurated, will work the road for all time to come. If we applied that valuation of one dollar an acre to the lands proposed to be given under our contract of 1873, and added the subsidy of $30,000,000, we should have $80,000,000, plus, I suppose, the surveys, costing $4,000,000, making altogether $84,000,000.

Mr. BLAKE. Why do you not count them in this contract?

Mr. LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman will see that, in this sum of $28,000,000, for the constructed portions of the road, a portion of that is included.

Mr. BLAKE. Only a portion?

Mr. LANGEVIN. As my hon. friend on my right (Sir Charles Tupper) stated the other day, the whole of that sum could not fairly be added to the cost of the railway, because it was expended not only for the railway, but for the purpose of exploring the country, ascertaining its wealth, dividing it into townships, and so on, and, therefore, I add a portion of that to this amount.

Mr. BLAKE. But you added four millions when you counted up the cost under the Allan contract. You ought to add the same amount now.

Mr. LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman will allow me to proceed to show how this valuation of a dollar an acre applies to the work as undertaken by the late Government in 1874. I will not weary the House with long columns of figures, but will show that, under the present contract, the railway completed and in working order, and with the condition that it will be worked for all time, will cost but $78,000,000. Under the contract of 1873 it would have cost $84,000,000, and, under the scheme of the hon. gentlemen opposite, valuing the lands at $1 an acre, $104,000,000.

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Mr. LANGEVIN. If my hon. friend opposite, by his cheer, intimates that he thinks $1 an acre not sufficient, let us take $1.50 an acre, and you will have this result: The contract of 1873 would have required $112,000,000, the contract of 1874, $132,000,000, while the present contract would demand only $90,000,000; so that, even putting the price at $1.50 an acre, you will save $22,000,000 on the scheme of 1873, and $42,000,006 on the scheme of hon. gentlemen opposite, by the present contract. But, perhaps, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blake) is not satisfied with $1.50 an acre, and would prefer $2. I hope the lands will sell for that price, or $4 or $5 an acre. But if we go into a calculation of this kind, hon. gentlemen must remember that $2, $3, $4 or $5 an acre must be applied, not only to the lands we give the contractors, but to those the hon. gentleman would have given the contractors, and to the 5,000,000 acres held as a guarantee for the working of the railway. The hon gentle- the measure, as I shall show presently. He sneered at my man (Mr. Blake) took good care not to speak of those 5,000,000 acres when applying his rate of $4 or $5 to the 25,000,000 acres we give the Syndicate. But, if he wishes to show to the country that we are giving a very large sum, by means of these lands, to the contractors, he should also show that we have a substantial guarantee by keeping 5,000,000 acres that he values at $5 an acre.

An hon. MEMBER. They are our lands.

Mr. LANGEVIN. These are our own lands, no doubt; but the other lands will remain there also. Not only will you have the railway as a guarantee of the good faith of these gentlemen, but besides the substantial guarantee of one-fifth of their lands in your possession. Estimating them all at $2 an acre, by the contract of 1873 the work would have cost $139,000,000; by the scheme of the late Government, $160,000,000, while, by ours, the amount should reach but $103,000,000, or a difference in favor of the present scheme of $36,000,000 compared with that of 1873, and of $57,000,000 compared with the scheme of 1874-75. Hon. gentlemen opposite should not complain, but they should remember that referring to the bargain of 1871 they have declared, themselves, that it was a treaty of union with British Columbia. The present leader of the Opposition said, "this policy is not to be reversed by us." Therefore, hon. gentlemen, opposite have accepted this policy with its consequences, and they have worked it themselves. They were in office five years, and tried their best to build the railway. They did not succeed. We had tried our hand, also, without success; but I trust by the present scheme with these wealthy, able and honorable men, and with all the guarantees we possess in the contract, we shall be able to construct the railway without burdening the country to too great an extent. My hon, friend the Minister of Railways showed, the other night, by facts and figures, in expounding this scheme, that the railway would, in land and money, cost but $78,000,000. How was that met by the leader of the Opposition? He said it would take him only ten minutes to answer a two hours portion of the labored speech of my hon friend. Well, it is very good for the leader of the Opposition to speak of doing so much in ten minutes only. We have yet to witness such a feat. When he speaks, he speaks forcibly and with great eloquence, and, though we do not agree with him, we are always glad to hear him; but his speech on this occasion was no exception to his other speeches, as regards the matter of length. He said, he would in ten minutes answer all the arguments of the Minister of Railways.

Mr. BLAKE. I said I would take only ten minutes with the first two and a half hours of the hon. gentleman's speech.

Mr. LANGEVIN. Well, the hon. gentleman adds a half hour to the two hours I was mentioning, so that the hon. gentleman said, that in ten minutes he would answer the arguments of my hon friend. But what was the result? The hon, gentleman spoke, at all events, an hour and a half, in reply to this two hours and a half speech. I do not think the hon, gentleman came best out of the argument.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. We, on this side, think differently.

Mr. LANGEVIN. The fact is, the hon. leader of the Opposition did not meet the arguments, and the historical statements of the hon. Minister of Railways. The historical portion seemed to be particularly unpleasant to the hon. gentleman. He thought evidently that the history of the old scheme, and of all the transactions with reference to this railway, was not such as would warrant his meeting the arguments of my hon. friend. The truth is, he did not meet them, but reserved himself to go into certain details of scheme which he treated, in the first instance, as a matter of badinage, but the Minister of Railways came best out of the argument. How did the hon, member for West Durham end his speech? He called the great scheme a sacrifice of our country's honor.

Mr. BLAKE. What I said was, that the last time you were in power you sacrificed our honor. This time you are sacrificing our interest.

Mr. LANGEVIN. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon-He said this was the second time we were sacrificing the honor of our country.

Mr. BLAKE. No.

Mr. LANGEVIN. It may have been a lapsus linguæ, but I heard the hon, gentleman and took down his words. Of course, if he does not wish to stand by his words, as in another part of his speech, he said he was not bound, by any expressions of opinion of his, as to the value of the lands well, if he does not wish to stand by those words

Mr. BLAKE. I stand by the words I spoke.

Mr. LANGEVIN. I will not insist on the hon. gentleman being bound by words he may have uttered in the heat of discussion. It was, I think, at the end of his speech, when he may have forgotten that he was applying these words to this scheme. At all events, Mr. Chairman, we are, by this great undertaking, working for the extension of our country and for the consolidation of our institutions. We wish to have those British institutions that we have been enjoying from year to year consolidated. We want them to be the inheritance of our children and our children's children. But the hon, gentleman wishes to know-I will not say so-he has taken back those words.

Mr. BLAKE, Which words? If the hon, gentleman will look at the official report, he will see he is quite wrong.

Mr. LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman may say the official report is different, but I repeat I took down his words because they seemed to be so strange.

Mr. BLAKE. I understand it to be the invariable custom of Parliament to accept as true an hon gentleman's statement. I told the hon gentleman what I did say. The official report, which was unrevised by me, bears out my statement, and it is extraordinary that the hon gentleman should set up his own recollection of what I said against my statement and against the official report.

Mr. LANGEVIN. I did not set my own recollection against the hon. gentleman's statement. I say I took down these words as the hon, gentleman uttered them.

Mr. BLAKE. You misheard.

Mr. LANGEVIN,

Mr. LANGEVIN. The hon, gentleman says he did not utter those words, and I must accept his statement; but I say I took down these words on hearing them, so that I must have misheard the hon gentleman, and, therefore, I stand corrected. But, Mr. Chairman, how could we be surprised to see hon gentlemen opposite opposing this measure which is sure to give us the railway from one end to the other, from the shores of the Pacific to our system of Canadian railways, when, at all other periods, they have always opposed all the great schemes that were brought forward by this party to Parliament, and assented to by a large majority of its members? The Grand Trunk Railway was opposed by these hon gentlemen; the Intercolonial Railway was opposed by them. The House will remember that they thought the Intercolonial Railway was one of those measures that would ruin the country. "Twenty million dollars, said they!" And, besides that "why do you not put this railway on the frontier, between Canada and the United States?" That was the scheme of these hon, gentlemen with reference to the Intercolonial Railway. Well, we thought Why, after thinking over the matter for eight or ten months, hon. friend. He sucored at his arguments, and at the otherwise, the country thought otherwise, Parliament thought otherwise, and the result was—what? Did they not say that railway would not give revenue sufficient to pay the grease for the car-wheels? Well, the other day, my hon. friend the Minister of Railways declared that, by all appearances, this year this railway and the Island railway would be self-sustaining. The National Policy is another measure that hon gentlemen have opposed. They would not consent to that. For years, during their term of office, we were insisting that they should give protection to our industries and manufactures. But they were deaf to our representations. They said: "No; you are a small minority"—we could hardly obtain a hearing at co-tain times in that Parliament-" you do not represent the people; we know better; we want Free Trade in this country. Well, the elections of September, 1878, settled that point; and when we came into office, we came with a National Policy. And how were we met by hon. gentimen opposite? Did they not oppose that also? And, if the Pacific Railway were left to their tender mercies, I have no doubt we would not see it completed for thirty years to come. This Pacific Railway will be built in a comparatively small number of years, for it is a necessity for the country, not only because we made a treaty with British Columbia, but because the necessities of our position here in the north, north of the United States, require that we should have complete communication with all parts of the Dominion. Now, Mr. Chairman, I will undertake to answer some of the specific objections that were taken by the hon leader of the Opposition to the speech of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways, and to the scheme. The first objection, the first remark he made about my hon. friend was, that there was a great variety in the estimates presented by him to Parliament; that, last year, my hon. friend had brought down an estimate for the building and completing of the road for eighty-eight millions of dollars, while, this year, he came down with a corrected estimate of $78,000,000. Why he should complain of that, I cannot imagine.

Mr. BLAKE. I said that it was pleasing.

Mr. LANGEVIN. I am glad to find that the hon. gentleman is pleased, for I could not understand how he should take any objection to the altered estimate of my hon. friend (Sir C. Tupper). I should rather think he would accept that estimate, and believe that it would be pleasing to the country, seeing that, instead of an expenditure of eighty-eight millions of dollars the cost will be only seventy-eight millions. If instead of this the Minister of Railways had said, last year, that the cost would be seventyeight millions, and that, this year, he had said that it would be eighty-eight millions, ten millions more, then I could have understood it; and I have no doubt that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance would have been a little shocked to find that the estimate was ten millions more then last year. But it is not so. My friend on my right, the Minister of Railways, has been able to reduce the expenditure, and the reason for that is this: my hon. friend, after studying the subject more closely, and after having the whole data before him, has been better able to judge of the cost. The hen. member has admitted himself that we have every day better information about the fertility and wealth of the country; we are thus better able to judge. But the leader of the Opposition, instead of doing as he did last year—pooh-poohing the calculations we made last year, when he thought these lands were not worth a dollar an acre—says now that they are worth four or five dollars an acre. He goes on to say that, with the acquisition of population, we must change our position, as it gives us the idea that these lands will sell for more. If that is so, why should not my hon, friend the Minister of Railways have the same advantage?

after revising the estimates, should be not reduce this amount? But Mr. Chairman, to whom is this acquisition of people due? While I am on this point, I will call the attention of the House and the public for a few minutes to this: to whom is this acquisition of population in the North-West due? Is it due to the policy of the hon. gentlemen on the other side? is it due to their exertions? You all remember the speech of the hon. leader of the Opposition last year on the same question, and how he decried and disparaged the country, and how he praised the United States of America. Was that the means, was that the way to induce settlers to come to this country? was it the channel through which immigration would flow into our country? I think not. Let us take the exact words of the hon, leader of the Opposition, for, he says, he has nothing to retract, nothing to recall of his speech last year. How can you wonder that a report of the speech of the hon. gentleman, with his beautiful photograph at the head of it, should have been circulated by the railway companies of the United States by thousands all over the continent of Europe? No, Mr. Chairman, the acquisition of population in the North-West is not due to the hon, gentlemen on that side of the House. The present Government-have made great exertions in that direction, and I have no doubt that if that speech had not been circulated, as it has been all over the world, if that speech had not been found at the very doors of any intending emigrants, we should have had a much larger immigration into the North-West. Nevertheless, we have had a fair share, and I have no doubt that with this scheme carried into effect, with the interest that the new Company, the Syndicate, must have in the peopling of the North-West, through that agency and the renewed exertions of the Government, we may expect a very large immigration to the North-West, a large acquisition of population, and a large increase in the revenue of this country; for, every man that comes into this country will pay so much into the Treasury for goods imported and goods consumed; and the more numerous are the settlers who will come and settle there upon the lands either of the Company or of the Government, the greater will be the revenue of the country. If they settle upon the lands of the Company, they give an increased value to the lands of the Government, which will be alongside; and if they settle upon the lands of the Government, the price of the lands will flow into the public treasury, and will recoup us for the twenty-five million of dollars we will have to expend to pay the subsidy to the Company. But, Mr. Chairman, there are other causes for this flow of emigration into our country. I do not forget some of the eloquent speeches of Lord Dufferin, when Governor-General of Canada. These speeches were masterpieces of eloquence, and they showed the country in its true light. These speeches have attracted special attention by their literary merit, by the facts contained in them, and by the position of the nobleman who uttered them, and they must have done a great deal to bring immigration into the North-West. I will not speak further of the speech made by Lord Beaconsfield, but that speech was one that must have done a great deal to attract the attention of the British public and intending emigrants, and must have done a great deal of good which is calculated to continue for years to come. Then, the present Government of England, the Gladstone Government, have shown, by the news that we had the other day from the article in the London Times newspaper, that they, not more than their predecessors, are deaf to the appeal of the intending emigrant, and that they intend to co-operate heartily with the Government of Canada in bringing emigrants to our shores and in settling them upon this part of the British Empire. The hon. leader of the Opposition says these are not the reasons for the immigra-to do with the proposed policy of emigration than Sir John Macdonald, Sir Charles Tupper, and so on. Mr. Chairman, there is no doubt about this: if the Irish people were content in their country, in their beautiful island, they would not emigrate; but, as it happens, a large portion of them are not satisfied and want to emigrate. If they will emigrate, is it not better that they should come to our shores, that we should give them land here and settle them amongst us, than that these emigrants, who are a part of the great nation of which we ourselves form a portion, instead of going to the United States should settle in the North-West? They are good citizens, they are good farmers, they are men who will make the country wealthy, and will be able to bring up their families; and why should we not encourage them to come to this country? We encourage Englishmen, Scotchmen, Frenchmen, Germans and Scandinavians to come to this country; and these other people belong to the same race as a large portion of our own, and why should they not come and settle amongst us? Why should they not come here to enjoy the same laws, the same rights as we have? And, with the same opportunities, they may become ministers, judges, members of the liberal professions. and obtain any positions in this country, the same as any other men in the Dominion of Canada. The country is open to them, and I hope that these immigrants, these Irishmen, who are not satisfied with the treatment and laws they have in Ireland, will come here and settle. The hon. leader of the Opposition says that the estimate of the Minister of Railways for works to be built by the Government was, last year, $32,500,000, whilst this year it is $29,000,000, which shows that the previous estimate was wrong. Well, I am very sorry that the hon. gentleman is not satisfied with that reduction. This is a reduction in the right direction; it saves the money of the people, and will satisfy the country and satisfy this House that the Government are considering constantly how the revenues of the country may be saved, and how the debt of the country can be reduced. In order that the hon. gentleman may have the answer to his question, as to how the reduction is effected, I shall now give him all the details-

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Will the hon. gentleman permit me to ask a question before he goes any further? He said that $18,600,000 was the cost of the Canadian Pacific Railway up to to-day. Does that include the three millions of surveys?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The $18,000,000 cover all expenditure of every kind, even to the Fort Francis lock—every charge that can be made against the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. MACKENZIE. It ought to.

Mr. LANGEVIN. Unless the hon, gentleman wishes me to give him all the figures composing the twenty eight millions, I may say—

Mr. BLAKE. I should like them very much.

must have done a great deal to attract the attention of the British public and intending emigrants, and must have done a great deal of good which is calculated to continue for years to come. Then, the present Government of England, the Gladstone Government, have shown, by the news that we had the other day from the news that we had the other day from the more than their predecessors, are deaf to the appeal of the intending emigrant, and that they intend to co-operate heartily with the Government of Canada in bringing emigrants to our shores and in settling them upon this proposition says these are not the reasons for the immigration, but that Mr. Parnell and the state of Ireland have more in location and modification of design, $1,385,000; by reduction in rolling stock, $745,000, and in the cost of workshops, etc., $200,000; total, $2,330,000. Deducting the cost of the Prince Arthur Landing and the steel rails, $35,000, it leaves a reduction of $2,295,000. On the Pembina Branch the reductions are: in rolling stock, $193,100; from Kamloops to Emory they are, by alteration of design, $1,663,200; by reduction in rolling stock, $250,000; and from Emory to Port Moody they are, by alteration of design, $133,700; and in rolling stock, $180,000. After hearing these figures the hon. gentleman and the Committee must see that these reductions were fair and proper reductions, that they were made for the purpose of saving the money of the country and the supplies at our disposal, and that my hon. friend should not be found fault with, because he saw, after his estimate of last year, that he could still further reduce the expenditure. On the contrary, I think he is deserving of praise, not for doing more than his duty, but for doing his duty and doing it well. The hon. gentleman says he is not bound by any expression of his about the value of lands in the North-West. then, should my hon. friend be held bound by his estimates of last year, when he has managed to make a saving for the country? The leader of the Opposition complains that the Union Pacific Railway has been adopted by us as a standard of comparison. The hon, gentleman says such and such was the condition of that road, of its grades and curves and material under the contract, and, therefore, it should not be adopted as a standard by the Parliament of Canada. But the hon. gentleman is entirely wrong. It is not the contract of the Union Pacific Railway that we are bound to take; it is the railway as built, and that railway is a good one. It is a railway on which the grades and curves were a great deal better than upon many other railways which are considered good railways—first class roads. The Union Pacific was opened for traffic in May, 1869, and I passed over it myself in 1871, and it is a perfectly good road. It is a road on which, though the speed was very great, there were no accidents when I travelled over it from one end to the other on my way to and from British Columbia, though with such a length of road it would not have been surprising if accidents had occurred. We all know that we have had accidents on the Intercolonial Railway, which is a good road, one in which we all take pride. With regard to the curves and grades on the Union Pacific, I find that they are less than those upon either the Portland and Ogdensburg, or the Baltimore and Ohio. Some of the grades on the Union Pacific are high, of course, but we are not to suppose, because there are on that road grades of 80 or 90 feet to the mile, that there will be similar grades upon our own road. We know full well the country through which the Canadian Pacific Railway is to pass; the explorations and surveys have been numerous and costly, and though the line may have to pass through some heavy parts of the country, yet, compared with the country through which the Union Pacific road passes, it is much more favorable for construction. The Union Pacimore favorable for construction. The Union Pacific winds up and around the mountains, so that, at times, when the traveller imagines he has gone a long distance, he all at once discovers that only one-half or three-quarters of a mile has been travelled, owing to the circuitous nature of the route among the Rocky Mountains and the Sierra Nevadas. But upon our line we know by actual surveys, that, instead of the railway ever attaining an altitude of 8,000 feet, its greatest altitude will not be over one-half that height; so that we may reasonably expect that the curves and grades of the Canadian Pacific Railway will be better than even the best portions of the American road. Besides, Mr. Chairman, we must see that it is not to the interests of the Company to build an inferior railway. If the Syndicate were a company formed for the purpose of building the railway and then handing it over to the Government, well-known men-ready to build this road for less than we Mr. LANGEVIN.

like most of the public works for which contracts are made, they might have some interest in building a road of an inferior character. But, Sir, it is to be their own railway, to be worked by themselves, and surely they would not be so foolish as to build a poor railway for the pleasure of rebuilding it within a short period. It is said these gentlemen will not use the best material, and will not adopt proper grades and curves, in order that the road may be worked with advantage. These men are not going to work that railway for the mere pleasure of doing so. They are not undertaking it for the sake of patriotism. They are undertaking it to make money, and they will make money, because they know that a railway through that beautiful country, settled with a large and thriving The hon. gentleman population, must give large returns. says it will be an inferior road, built with iron rails. If the hon gentleman had read the contract, he would have seen that the exemption from customs duties of the material to be used in the railway applies, not to iron, but to steel rails, and, therefore, steel rails are the rails to be and must be used, because the Company will not be fools enough to buy iron rails and pay duty on them for the construction of this road. They will necessarily use steel rails that are exempt from taxation. The hon, gentleman and the House may rest assured that there is not the least danger on that score. Another objection made by the hon, gentleman is to the freedom from taxation for all time of the railway and its appurtenances. Suppose we had insisted on having the railway taxed; in that case the Syndicate must have told us: "we must have more money, because that item is undefined; We cannot know what the taxation will be, it may be a very heavy tax; we may find municipalities, when established in the North-West, taking care to pay all their expenses from the taxation on the railway." Surely the hon. gentleman would not press railway." Surely the hon. gentleman would not press that idea, when he complains that we are already giving too much money for the building of the railway. What teo much money for the building of the railway. What then does he want? Does he want to drive a hard bargain with these gentlemen? What reason would there be in attempting to cut them down to as small a figure as possible, in order to make the Company a poor company? It is to our interest, and to the interest of the country, that the Company should be able to construct the railway and to work it afterwards, so that they should not come back to us year after year and ask us for new terms. We want once for all to settle the whole question, so as to say to the Company: "This is the settlement; you build that railway for that amount of money and land, and work it, and we must have a guarantee for the working of it for the first ten years after the building of the road, because, if you work that road for ten years, we may be sure that you will work it afterwards, as there will, by that time, be population enough in the country to secure a profitable trade for the road." More than that, I say that Parliament and the Government must show the Company that they are not our enemies, but that they are the friends of the country, and that we must treat them in the best way possible, taking into consideration the interests of the country at large. If we starve them now by giving them a small subsidy in land and money, and then tax them after they have built their road, the result will be that they will come to us afterwards and say: "We cannot go on." We do not want that; we want a strong company that will be a credit to the country, and be competent to carry forward that great national work, the Pacific Railway. The fact is, this Company is called upon to do what was expected to be done by the Government itself. And what was expected of the Government? That we should make this a good road, and work it. But the country became apprehensive that we could not do it without running deeply into debt. In the meantime we have found contractors-men of means and believed last year it could be done, by $11,000,000. But it is not a new thing to relieve a railway company of taxation. I will read a telegram which will show what has been done by the United States with reference to the Northern Pacific Railway. The General Manager of that road telegraphs, under date of the 15th December of this year, as follows:—

"Right of way, 400 feet wide, and all improvements thereou, exempt from taxation under charter."

So that the Northern Pacific Railway, is exempt from taxation, not for a width of 100 feet, as is the Canadian Pacific Railway, but for a width of 400 feet. In the United States they were not afraid of that. They knew perfectly well that the Northern Pacific Railway was not a road inimical to the country and the people; that it was for their good and use, and that, therefore, they should put that road on a proper footing for all time; they knew it would be a great highway of the country, and should be dealt with liberally. We expect that our country, which is great in many ways, will be as great in certain respects as the United States; and we want a good and great railway, and also to put it on a proper footing, so as to prevent its owners coming back to us and saying: "You starve us to death, and we want more money."

Mr. CASGRAIN. We have the guarantee.

Mr. LANGEVIN. We have the guarantee no doubt; but, perhaps, the hon. gentleman would prefer to see them come to ask for better terms. I am not of that opinion, nor is the Government.

Mr. BLAKE. They could not find better terms.

Mr. LANGEVIN. The hon, gentleman thinks we could do better; he says the terms are too good for the Syndicate. In what way are they? He says: "You have no sufficient guarantee for the eastern section; how will you build it: you are giving too much for the prairie section." I will show the hon, gentleman presently that that portion of the railway was alluded to by him last year, as well as this, and that there is a very notable difference between the two allusions; and that if Ministers may change their estimates from one Session to another in the way of reduction, the leader of the Opposition can change his policy in toto, with regard to the eastern section

Mr. POPE (Compton). He is not responsible for what he said last year.

Mr. LANGEVIN. The next point the hon. gentleman alluded to was this: he says we have exempted the lands of the Company from taxation for 20 years. Well, in the same way as he finds fault with our scheme by saying we are giving too much money away, I reply to him, if the lands are to be taxed, you must consider at once what would be the result. The Company which has stated to the Government that the amount of money and lands required by them is only a quid pro quo for the work they undertake, and the working of the railway will say, if we tax their lands: "You must come to our relief; we have not money enough. It will take ten years to build the road, and, till completed, we can have only a certain number of emigrants yearly; and until it is in operation, after ten years, we cannot derive the benefits recessary as compensation for its construction. So, if you tax our lands, you will have to give us more money." If we were to revert to the scheme of last year, and to that of hon. gentlemen opposite, what would be the result? We should have to tax the people to the extent of $78,000,000 or $88,000,000 on the estimates of last year. The lands would be in our hands, and only those sold would be taxed by the municipalities. Therefore, there will be no more taxation under the present scheme than if the Government were amount every year." In that case, these lands will, at once, to build the road. Why should we compel the Company to be subject to taxation, and, therefore, there is no fear of these lands remaining, even two or three years, without

You must see that their interest is to settle these lands. They would not be so blind as to retain them long for future enhancement. The value or price of an acre is not the point so much looked to as the benefit the railway must derive from the settlement of the lands, and the carriage of produce to market. We have seen that the Minneapolis and Manitoba Railway Company sold their lands at, say, $5 an acre, but with the condition that if the settler put under cultivation so many acres within a year. the price should be reduced to $2 or $2.50, showing the Company considered its main advantage lay not in the first price of the land, but in its settlement and cultivation. This Syndicate will have the same interest in selling their lands for early settlement. Every settler should be taxed as well as every other inhabitant of the country. Why not? Besides, this railway is not to be built for Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, Quebec, Ontario, or any other Province particularly, although the trade of the North-West will come down by it to all. But the great, immediate advantage of the road will be to the settlers in the North-West; and, whilst we are giving our millions to build it, and paying interest on the amount, why should not those settlers contribute something to it? What will their contributions amount to? It will be the difference between the taxation of a few acres in the municipality and the amount they would have to pay for those lands being free of taxation. That would not be for all time, but only for the first twenty years, until the lands are sold. For the first few years the settlers cannot suffer, because they would naturally try to settle on the lands in the immediate neighborhood of the railway; and, therefore, those lands would be sold lot by lot. The Government, having the alternate blocks, would be too glad to sell land also, and all the settlers would find them out very shortly. Very little land, after a little time, would remain uneccupied in the municipalities, and, therefore, the settlers would not suffer. Any man desiring land may have it there. He has only to say: "I require this lot of land," to have it; and every settler that goes into that country and settles there will write home to his friends and bring them out. Therefore, in a very short time the parish or municipality will be settled and the exemption of taxation on these lands will not be felt, because really, the lands remaining to be sold will remain there only until the settlement can be extended in that direction, so that, after those twenty years, what will remain exempt from taxation will be just the 100 feet in width on the length of the municipality. I think the roads in the North-West are about 100 feet wide. Is it worth considering in the settlement of that country, that 100 feet in width on the length of the municipality should be exempt from taxation? I think that is a very small contribution on the part of the settlers towards the building of the railway. I am sure if we were to ask the people of any portion of old Canada that is deprived of railway communication: "Will you consent to have a railway on condition that you will neither tax the track of that railway nor the stations?" they would be only too glad to have the railway; but because the Government brings this scheme forward, hon. gentlemen opposite object to it. I have not made the calculation out, which, perhaps, some of my hon. friends who will follow me, will make, as to how many acres, 100 feet in width, on the length of a municipality, will make. It will be a very small amount, and that will be the only exemption in the whole township. Besides that, if some of these lands remain unoccupied and unsold, the neighbors will take care to make of these lands pasture grounds. But the hon. leader of the Opposition will say: "Oh the Company will take precious care to make those settlers, who use these lands as pasture grounds, pay a certain being taxed. The next point the hon, gentleman has found fault with is the amount that we are giving the Company. He says that, last year, the hon. the First Minister stated in the House, that the regulations of the Department of the Interior were to this effect: the policy of the Government was, that along the railway the lands would be divided into so many belts, there would be Belts A, B, C, D and E, and the first belt alongside the railway would be sold at $5 an acre, the next $4 an acre, the following $3, the next $2, and the last $1 an acre. The hon. gentleman, last year, I may observe, ridiculed the idea of having those lands sold for $4 and $5 per acre, and thought that after such an exhibition the hon, the First Minister should disappear and make place for him. Well, the country thought otherwise. We passed our schome, and this year here we are with this new Well, last year the price was $5 an acre, and the hon, gentleman says: "now you are going to give this Company blocks one mile in frontage and twenty four in depth. He adds: "Apply to them the rate of $5 or $4 per acre, as the case may be, and you have an immense sum for the 25,000,000 acres of land. But if the hon, gentleman applies those prices of $1 and $5 an acre to our scheme, he should apply them likewise to the proposed scheme of his hon, friend next to him (Mr. Mackenzie). If it is too high a rate for us, it must be far too high a rate for his hon. friend. He knows that 55,000,000 acres of land—he was in the Government then-

Mr. BLAKE. I was not in the Government.

Mr. LANGEVIN. If the hon. gentleman was not in the Government, he was not opposed to the scheme. He was in favor of it. He supported it. He never separated himself from his friends on account of it. At the rate of $5 an acre for 55,000,000 acres, you will have $275,000,000. It looks a big sum. The hon. gentleman smiles at it, no doubt it is laughable, but he must remember that he made the same laughable calculation about our old scheme, and if he laughs on one side of the mouth he must also laugh on the other side. My hon. friend at my right has passed me a calculation to show that a strip of land 100 feet through a township would make 72 acres altogether as the whole exemption in the township for all time to come. Well, let the hon gentleman take the roads in all our townships, and he will find many times 72 acres in each that are not taxed, and why should this highway, this railway, be taxed? I was observing that this rate of $5, or $4 should have been applied by the hon. gentleman to the three different schemes. He should have shown that the $4 or $5 or $3 per acre applied to the scheme of 1873, made such an amount; that applied to the scheme of his hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie), it made so much; and that applied to the present scheme; it made another amount; and that comparing the three with each other, the amount obtained by the scheme of 1873 was less than that given by the scheme of 1875, and that the present scheme was less costly than either. My hon, friend at my right (Sir C. Tupper), did not apply the rate of $1 an acre to our own scheme and $5 an acre to the scheme of the hon, gentleman. He acted fairly by applying the dollar rate to both schemes, and he found that the amount was exactly what I stated in the beginning of my remarks, that is: In this case, $78,000,-000, while it was a much larger sum in 1873, and a still larger sum according to the scheme of the hon, gentleman. Nevertheless, the hon, gentleman declared, and he tried to make the House and the country believe, that our scheme was a bad one. I have no doubt that when the country becomes acquainted with the speeches made on both sides, the people will judge us as they did in 1878; they will see that we have brought forward a scheme for the good of the five dollars an acre, and that settlers will be glad to pay Mr. Langevin.

country, and the best that could be made under the circumstances. Hon, gentlemen ask us: "Is there not something in that scheme you would prefer not to see in it—you would prefer to see changed?" I will answer the hon, gentleman in the same way as we did in 1866, when we came down with the scheme of Confederation. We said to the House that was the best scheme we could present under the circumstances. We said to the country, we have not to deal with an uninhabited country, which will be settled in the future, and to which we will have to give laws and institutions. We have not to deal with a country settled by only one race, and that race having but one religion; we have to deal with a country settled by different races, by Englishmen, Frenchmen, Scotchmen, Irishmen and Germans. We have to deal with a country where the Protestant religions and the Roman Catholic religion, are each professed by a large number; we have different institutions, and special institutions in one of the Provinces, and those special institutions are for the French race, who are attached to them, and wish to keep them—a loyal people, as loyal as any other in the Dominion—and, under these circumstances, we have to consider the interests of all; here is a scheme of confederation, and we ask you to pass it as a whole. It is a question of compromise; it is a treaty between the different Provinces; and though there may be in that scheme-and there were certain things that, for my own part, I would have preterred omitted—nevertheless I accepted it as a scheme of compromise, as one that would secure the future greatness of this country. Why did the Government do that? Because we were not alone to settle this question. We were four Provinces, and we had to take into account the prejudices and the difference of races of each. But there was something else. We knew there were outlying provinces, west and east, as well as territories, which would sooner or later ask for admission into the Confederation. Did we treat them as foreign countries? No; we said they should have the same institutions and the same laws as ourselves. Well, Mr. Chairman, in this ease, in this contract, we are not only one party; we have to deal with the Syndicate. These gentlemen are one party and we are the other. We have to make a contract with these gentlemen for the building of this road. Shall we say to them: "You must take that or nothing?" That is not the way contracts are made. You have to give and take; you have to take into consideration the exigencies of the case; you have to see whether your terms are acceptable to the other party, and, after reasoning the matter with him you find that he is right and that your proposal is not sufficient, and you have to give more land, or more money, or other conditions; the result is that you have to agree to give and take on both sides, to prepare the contract and sign it. That is what we have done. Here is a contract, and we say that is the best we can do. I believe it is to the advantage of the country. We shall save money to the country by adopting it, and I hope the answer will be "yes;" from all our friends. The next point the hon, gentleman has alluded to is the sale of land by the Company and by the Government. The hon, gentleman has gone into a very learned and very elaborate calculation to show that, while the Company is going to make a great deal of money with their land, the neighboring blocks belonging to the Government will scarcely sell at all. The Company, he says, will sell their lands for $5 an acre, while our lands, lying alongside, will not sell for more than a dollar an acre. That must be the inference from the calculations of the leader of the Opposition, because he applies his five dollar calculation to the Company's and not to the Government's land. But if the Company are able to sell their lands at this price, we are justified in expecting that the Government's land will sell just as well. I hope the Company will sell their lands at that price; for, then, the Government will be able to sell their lands alongside at the same price, and so recoup themselves in a short time. The speech of the hon, gentle-man leaves us no other conclusion. I think I may say that the fair inference from his speech, as published in the "Debates," is, that the Company will obtain $10 per acre, while the Government will not obtain more than $5. I do not know how he reached that conclusion. I tried hard to follow him through his calculations, but they were so minute and so abundant that, with all my effort and with all my desire to do the hon. gentleman justice, I could not follow him all through. But I was able to gather enough to understand that his calculations were not as fair as I would have expected from the hon, gentleman. In connection with this land question he also spoke of the surveys. Well, that is something that cuts both ways. These lands had to be surveyed into townships, correct alignments of the land had to be drawn, for that purpose the Government required money. The Department of the Interior, I have no doubt, will be able to tell us the cost of the surveys. The hon. gentleman finds fault because the Government will have to survey a portion of these lands. But how will they be surveyed? If we are to give blocks of land to the Company, we must give the outside line of the blocks. But in any case the surveys would have to be made. They would have to be made by the Government if we kept the lands. And when we grant these 25,000,000 of acres to the Company, they will, of course, have afterwards to make their own surveys to divide the lots; so that portions of the expenditure, which otherwise the Government would have had to incur, will be paid by the Company, that is, if they are to make the railway profitable, and I, for one, hope they may do so. It is to the interest of the country that they may be able to work the road advantageously and profitably, and if they should not be able to do so, it would be better that the Government should work the road themselves. But we all know that a company can work a railway at a less cost and with a greater profit than a Government can, better even than so good a Government as the present Administration. The hon, gentleman has referred to the obligations and liabilities of Canada in connection with the railway. He says that they are undetermined—that they have no finality. I generally find the hon. gentleman very logical, but I fail to see his logic in this case. My hon friend the Minister of Railways says to the House: the portions of the road which we have built and the portions which we are now building cost $28,000,000, and then adds the $25,000,000 which we are to give to the Company, and the value of the 25,000,000 acres of land. I think our liabilities in the matter are as well determined as they could possibly be. Taking the land at $1 per acre, we have a total of $78,000,000 as the sum we have to pay. Surely there is sufficient determinativeness and finality in that calculation to suit hon, gentlemen. But there would be no finality in the scheme of the hon. leader of the Opposition. I cannot conceive what the people of Ontario or Quebec have done to the hon, gentleman that he should say to them that they shall not have a railway. He says: do not build the railway; leave it to the future to determine the liabilities of the country. He adds: that the region north of Lake Superior is so wild and inaccessible, that it is such a wilderness that we cannot build a railway there, and that we must leave it for future consideration. One hon. gentleman -I think it was the member for Algoma, who knows whereof he speaks-informs us that that country is by no means so bad as it is represented; that we would be agreeably surprised at its condition if we went through it. Surely the hon. gentleman cannot complain of the lack of determinativeness in the matter, when he can arrive at the cost by so simple a calculation. The hon. gentleman, who evidently wanted to be facetious, says, that there will be a final relief for the country—and the relief will be that the Minister of Railways will be in his place to present new and reduced estimates. I have no doubt it will be a relief to hon gentlemen on this side of the House to see my hon. friend in office, as Minister of Railways, for those twenty years; and I have no doubt that the country as well will be pleased with the prediction. At all events, I think it will be better to have my hon friend here to prepare reduced estimates, which he may have exaggerated, than to have hon. gentlemen opposite in office promising increased revenues and all the blessings of a golden age, only to disappoint a waiting people. We must remember that when these hon, gentlemen occupied the Government benches they were found to be not quite equal to the promises they had made. They say our obligations and liabilities are undetermined; but I should like to ask if they were otherwise when these hon, gentlemen were in office. We had every year a speech on our finances; sometimes very able and very interesting to the country, and we were promised that there would be an end of deficits if the House would only submit to increased taxation. But after waiting year after year for five years, the result was not a surplus—not the liabilities determined, not both ends meeting, but a deficit of several millions of dollars. I think the country will agree with the leader of the Opposition, that it is a great relief to the country that the Minister of Railways and his friends are on this side of the House.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. LANGEVIN. Before six o'clock I was coming to the eighth objection which the leader of the Opposition urged against this scheme. He stated that the division of money and lands into three sections was not a fair one, and did not offer a sufficient guarantee to the country, This matter was well weighed by the Government when we were discussing the conditions with the Syndicate. By referring to the contract, we find that there are three sections, or rather two sections, with one section divided into two sub-sections; of the central section, 900 miles, go to the Rocky Mountains—to Jasper House,—and 450 miles from Jaspar House to Kamloops; the eastern section, of 650 miles, is that north of Lake Superior. By the contract, the first portion of the central section, 900 miles, is to receive $10,000 per mile, in money, making $9,000,000, and 11,250,000 acres, which, at a dollar an acre, are equal to $11,250,000, making $20,250,000 in money and land. The second portion, 450 miles, is to receive $13,333 per mile, or $6,000,000 in money, and 7,500,000 acres of land, which, at a dollar an acre, are equal to $7,500,000, making $13,500,000 in money and land. The Lake Superior section of 650 miles, is to receive in money, $15,384 per mile, or $10,000,000, and in land, 9,615 acres per mile, or 6,250,000, equal to $6,250,000, making $16,250,000 in land and money. If you take the land and money subsidies together, you have for the 900 miles to Jaspar House, $22,500 per mile; for the 450 miles, through the mountain region in British Columbia, $30,000 per mile, and for the 650 miles of the eastern section, $25,000 per mile. Nevertheless, the hon gentleman says that this division is not a proper one, and does not offer a sufficient guarantee to the country for the building of the road. Well, the hon, gentleman should remember that he, himself, last year, gave us a speech on this question, in which he brought forward figures to show what would be the amount of money required for these three sections. Of course, his object at that time was to show that the railway would cost a very large sum of money. The hon. gentleman was answering the Minister of Railways, and said:

including the other items I have mentioned, altogether over $42,500,000, leaving out entirely both ends. What are the ends to cost? $45,000,000 is, as I have stated, the cost from Edmonton to Burrard Inlet on the West; and from Fort William to Nipissing on the East, the hon. member for Lambton estimates at a length of about 650 miles, and a cost of $32,500,000. Thus, the ends make up together $77,000,000; the centre and the protection of $120,000 miles. the past expenditure, $42,500,000, making a total of $120,000,000."

The hon, gentleman gave us these figures to show what the road would cost. It was, of course, the object at that time to show that it would cost an enormous sum of money, to let every elector in the country know that it would cost $120,000,000; that we were unable to go on with the road, and that it would ruin the country to attempt to do so. That was the cry then. This year we come and say: we are able to build the whole road for $78,000,000, although only last year it was to cost, according to the hon. gentleman, $120,000,000. The fact is, hon. gentlemen opposite do not want the Pacific Railway at all. If we apply the hon. gentleman's calculation to the eastern and the western sections, we will find that every mile of railway in the mountainous section would cost $100,000, and every mile in the eastern section $50,000 a mile. Well, under our calculations, the western section would cost $30,000 a mile instead of $100,000, and the eastern section $25,000 a mile. The proportion here given is more favorable to the eastern section as a guarantee to the Government than that according to the figures given by the hon. gentleman last year. But what is the use of giving them $100,000 and $50,000 a mile if that money is not required? The hon. gentlemen opposite must see that the estimate of the Minister of Railways, if that was his estimate, could be changed this year, as in the case of the reduction in the contracts which brought down the estimate from $38,000,000 to $28,000.000. Therefore, the Government have ample security in this amount of money for the building of the eastern as well as the western section. By the contract these three sections must proceed simultaneously and vigorously. On 1st July next the work must begin on the eastern as well as on the central section; this is a condition of the contract, the bargain with the Syndicate, and, at the end of ten years, the whole railway, the eastern as well as the central and western sections, must be completed. The prairie section may be built faster than the others. If so, so much the better. It will open up the country sooner; emigrants will flow in, and our lands, as well as the Company's lands, will be the sooner taken up. It is a specific condition of the contract that the two sections be finished within ten years. For this eastern section we have reserved 16,250,000 acres to build the 650 miles, and $25,000 a mile. As I stated before recess, it is now known that the country north of Lake Superior is not the barren region many people imagine. It appears a large portion of it is a good country that will furnish traffic to the railway. Fortunately for Ontario it is within its boundaries, and the railway will open up the country; but that does not prevent our being sure that this fact was not quite sufficient to secure the building of that section. The next objection of the leader of the Opposition is, that the Company may build railways where they please; that other Canadians have not the same privilege, but must come to Parliament for power. Well, the Company may construct branch lines in the North-West; what harm is there in that? Do we ever refuse gentlemen who wish to form a company permission to build a railway where there is no other railway, and where one is wanted? Never; we always give them a charter, and they are very often subsidized by the Federal or local authorities. In this case the Canadian Pacific Railway Company does not ask a dollar subsidy either in land or money to build those branch lines. They say, we want that power. We give them 25,000,000 acres, a great deal of which will not be near the road; much of the land may be 50, 100 or 200 miles distant. How are they to reach those lands? They have a great interest in those lands. Why? Not only because they must be sold to give them capital then what becomes of the affirmation of the hon, gentle-Mr. LANGEVIN.

to recompense them, but those lands settled will give traffic to the main line. So, it is their interest to construct side and branch lines; and why should it not be so? This road is not to be a sham, but a railroad or highway from one end of the country to the other; and why not offer all facilities for the opening up and settlement of the country? But the Company's blocks of land 100 or 200 miles in the interior will have on each side blocks belonging to the Government, and the Company's branch railways will benefit the Government by opening up its lands and enhancing their value. People will not settle 200 miles in the interior where there is no railroad. I am surprised at the complaints of hon. gentlemen opposite on this head. I am sure that the settlers in that country, 10, 20 or 30 years hence, will not thank them for trying to prevent the Company from constructing branch railroads to open up the country. The leader of the Opposition says that Canadians do not stand on the same footing as the Syndicate. No doubt, and it is because other people will not belong to the Company, or assume the same obligations. Not only the Company, but the country is interested in having branch lines. It is for the good of that region that such powers should be given to the Company. Any other company that will come to Parliament, will not, I am sure, be refused an act of incorporation. Suppose some of the gentlemen living in Winnipeg wish to have a railroad to the Peace River; does any one believe there will be any difficulty in giving them a charter? This Syndicate could not stand in their way They could not prevent other citizens building that road if they chose. Do we not remember the famous Bill of the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills)? It favored the construction of all railways in the North-West, not only by a Bill we propose, but by giving projectors aid in Therefore, if it was then good under the money or land. Government of the hon, member for Lambton-and the present leader of the Opposition must have favored its policy—to aid railways to that extent, it cannot be bad in us to aid them when we are giving neither money nor land. The next objection the hon, leader of the Opposition has made is this: that the Company will invest only $5,000,000, and will recoup themselves soon by the sale of their lands. Well, Mr. Chairman, what objection is there to this? These lands will be their lands, and they will sell them, and the money will come into their coffers to recoup them for the money expended or subscribed by them for the road. That is the case with every other company that has lands to sell and a railway to work. The receipts from the sale of lands and traffic go into railway companies' coffers, and are devoted to paying expenses and dividends, and I suppose this Company will be allowed to do the same. But if these lands are sold, the Syndicate will not carry them out of the country. These lands must remain in the North-West, and, if sold, to whom must they be sold? They must be sold to settlers, and if they be sold to settlers, we will have obtained exactly the object we had in view; that is, to bring settlers to settle in that country, to open it up, to make it a great country, to have new provinces in that region. We will have new British subjects there, men who will have the same objects in view that we have, who will elect their representatives, whose representatives will sit in this hall, if this hall is large enough to hold them, who will, at all events, sit in Parliament with us. They will come here and legislate with us, and they will have the same rights that we possess. But, the hon. gentleman complains that this Company will have the advantage of selling these lands and settling these The object we have in view is to build the settlers there. road. We do not wish to spend $55,000,000 in cash, but $25,000,000 in cash and 25,000,000 acres of land; and why should we not do so? If the hon, gentleman is correct, if the Company will recoup themselves by the sale of these lands, man who calls this a monopoly that will shut out people from the North-West. How could they shut them out if these lands are to be sold to settlers and bought by them? You cannot have both things. It cannot be a monopoly that will close up that country and yet recoup themselves by the sale of their lands to settlers. The hon gentleman said they would become the landlords of the North-West. Well, that cannot be the case, because in the first place, they will be obliged to sell the lands in their own interest, and, according to the hon. gentleman, they would recoup themselves very soon by the sale of those lands. Of course, the Company may, if he uses the word monopoly in another sense, be a monopoly in this way: that it is a railway company which will have the traffic of this country over their railway; but in any case, such power must be given to a company, and it is better to give it to a powerful than to a weak company. But the hon, gentleman, following his argument, said, as I stated a moment ago, that the Syndicate would be landlords of the North-West. Well, as I have stated, they cannot be the landlords of the North-West, for the very good reason that, out of 250,000,000 acres of land there, they will have only 25,000,000, or one-tenth of the whole. But the hon. gentleman, in his fear, has forgotten that, in his position as leader of the Opposition, in that high position which his talents and the confidence of the Liberal party give him, a threat should not be thrown here to Parliament. He told us that the men who will settle there would be less than men if they allowed such a law to stand. "You talk, said he, of sending Irishmen to the North-West!" The hon. gentleman would wish those men to do—what? To prevent this Company having the power that they possess under this measure. He says the settlers would be less than men if they allowed such a law to stand.

Several Hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. LANGEVIN. That law would stand as long as Parliament wished it to stand; and if Parliament wished to abolish the law, I suppose the Company would be treated as any other company, or as any individual, and be indemnified for the loss of their rights.

Mr. MILLS. Hear, hear.

Mr. LANGEVIN. If you go and take from that Company a portion of their lands, of course, you must give them compensation for that. Perhaps the principles of the hon. gentleman who says "hear, hear," are different from these.

Mr. MILLS. Hear, hear.

Mr. LANGEVIN. I would be very sorry that in this country we would ever say: property is robbery. Property is not robbery. Property is one of the great foundations of society, and, therefore, I am astonished that the hongentleman, who holds a prominent position in his party, who has been a Minister of the Crown, should propound such a doctrine here. I have no doubt that Parliament will never assent to such a doctrine in any case, whether it is this Company, or whether it is an individual, or whether it is a man who is an agent of a company that is disliked. Parliament will always do justice. Parliament always does justice. It is one of the great features of our legislation that, whenever an acquired right or a right of property has been put in danger, Parliament has always indemnified the parties that have suffered.

Mr. MILLS. Not always.

Mr. LANGEVIN. Of course, the hon. gentleman will persist in his views; I cannot change them. His views are very advanced, but I doubt very much whether, in this Parliament, he would find many supporters in a course of that kind. Let him try it.

Mr. MILLS. Question.

Mr. LANGEVIN. Let him come with a motion, and see whether Parliament will assent to such a doctrine.

Mr. MILLS. You have such a Bill before the House.

Mr. LANGEVIN. If the hon, gentleman will allow me to return to the subject which is under consideration, then, when he brings in the bill he speaks of, I will be ready to meet him. The last portion of the remarks of the new leader of the Opposition on this point goes further than we might believe. He says, in effect, speaking of the sending of Irishmen to the North-West, that no Irishmen are required, 'No Irish need apply." They are not to go to the North-West; that is reserved to the hon. gentlemen on that side of the House, and no Irishmen are to be allowed there. We generally find Englishmen, Scotchmen. allowed there. We generally find Englishmen, Scotchmen, Frenchmen and Irishmen working together on the railways, trying to do their part there; and we know perfectly well that the Irish are not less industrious, less useful laborers than the others. But what does the hon, gentleman want? I have no doubt you remember his speech in 1874. He would prefer Chinese labor. He would prefer the Chinese to the Irish. I do not object to the Chinese, when they are here in the country, so long as they respect the laws and are good citizens; but what I say is this, let our own fellow countrymen, the Irish, who leave their beautiful island, come here by all means. There is plenty of labor and land in this country for them, and they will be received as friends, and not as foes. I now come to a very important point—a very important remark made by the hon. leader of the Opposition. He says he is in favor of an eastern connection, but not at an enormous expenditure. He does not want the Lake Superior section at all events for the present, and prefers the Sault Ste. Marie line. He says that the line would be 87 miles longer than the proposed line by the north of Lake Superior, but that we would have it seven years sooner. Well, Mr. Chairman, that is not exactly in accordance with the views of the hon, gentleman last year. Now, he says, here is the eastern connection to the north of Lake Superior, it is too costly; don't let us have that; let us have the Sault Ste Marie line that will bring you through the United States to Mani-The hon gentleman will remember that the policy of this Parliament has not been to have a railway going through a foreign country, nor to expend millions upon an Intercolonial railway to the east and a Pacific Railway to the west for the purpose of having a road through the United States of America. We want a road on British soil; we want a road of our own, for the maintenance of British institutions upon this continent. We want a road that will be a benefit to Canada and the Canadians; but we do not want a road that will lead our emigrants through the United States, and have them then carried away to the western prairies of the United States, and lost to Manitoba and the North-West. If the leader of the Opposition wants a road of that kind, why did he not, when he was on these benches, come with his Sault Ste. Marie scheme, if he had that intention? But, no; he was not sure. He knew that he could not have that eastern connection by the north of Lake Superior; he could not get a company, he had not the means at his disposal, and he never spoke of the alternative. But now let us see what the hon. gentleman stated last year. It is very interesting, because it shows what the policy of the Opposition was towards the east of Canada, and when I speak thus I mean the region from Lake Nipissing to the east, including Ontario, Quebec and the Maritime Provinces. Let us see what was the policy of the hon. gentlemen on the other side as to the east, and what we might expect from them if they were on these benches. I do not wish to be too long on a matter of this kind, but I think that the House will bear with me while I read some extracts from the speech of the hon, gentleman. I do not ask the permission of the hon, gentlemen on the other side, because it is a speech of their own leader, and, of course, they will be glad to hear it again. The hon, gentleman said:

"We must not altogether forget the eastern connection. The hongentleman has not been altogether oblivious of that part of the through line. It was politic on his part to throw out some faint hopes of the construction of that link. Quebec has spent some $11,600,000, which she can ill afford, for the construction of a railway principally designed to tap the Pacific trade. Quebec has stretched her arms out towards the great west, as far as this city, and the question is, how soon is she to get further, how soon that great expenditure is to be productive of the benefits expected? I am glad to know her road is paying something as it is; but what Quebec expected was not simply that it should pay, while it is new and cheaply worked, some fraction of the interest on the cost of construction, but that it would pour a great tide of traffic into her principal cities, and bring prosperity into her midst. But unless and until an eastern connection of some kind is made, those expectations of the Province of Quebec, on the faith of which she proceeded to construct her railway, cannot be realized. My hon friend felt that. I should not be surprised—I do not know anything about it—but I should not be surprised if my hon friend had been told something of that sort in private. I should not be surprised if some hon member from Quebec had forcibly expressed to him, in private, the same observations which I have now made in public. I should not be surprised if it had been indicated to him, in language as strong as was consistent with the politeness due to a powerful Minister, him, in private, the same observations which I have now made in public. I should not be surprised if it had been indicated to him, in language as strong as was consistent with the politeness due to a powerful Minister, that it was essential that he should throw out, at any rate, some ray of hope, however faint, that at some early day the Quebec Railway should be connected with the through line; that he should say to the members from Quebec: 'Gentlemen, at the present 'time we can only burn the candle in the middle, and at the western end, but the time will come sooner than you expect when we will be burning it in the middle and at both ends, when it will be alight in the east also.' That is in fact, what the hon, gentleman has vaguely suggested to us to-night. But my hon, friends from Quebec will consider how nearer they will be to the attainment of a connection with the Pacific Railway by engaging immediately to construct the western end, and to spend, according to the revised estimates, $30,000,000 in British Columbia. They will consider how much it is going to hasten the day in which our surplus cash will enable us to make the connection for which they long, to fling $30,000,000 into that 'Brown Country,' which is depicted in the hon. Minister's map. They will judge whether our purse is like the widow's cruise of oil, in which, however much you may draw from it, there will always remain enough. They will consider whether even out of our abundance, even out of our prosperity, even with our large capacity for raising loans and obtaining moneys, we will be all the better able to deal with the eastern end, because we are commencing now to build the western end. They will reflect upon the possibility, nay, I will say the strong probability that the effort to build the western end, if so precipitately engaged in, may crush this country, destroy the whole scheme, and render impossible for all time, or, at any rate, for a very long to build the western end. They will reflect upon the possibility, nay, I will say the strong probability that the effort to build the western end, if so precipitately engaged in, may crush this country, destroy the whole scheme, and render impossible for all time, or, at any rate, for a very long time, to attempt an eastern connection. According to his fashion, the hon. gentleman was not quite consistent in this matter. He was at pains to point out, in order to soothe the anxious fears of his friends and supporters, that the Government was in a position to go slowly. This contract, he says, contains clauses which give an absolute power to stop the work at any time; and if we find the resources of this country are going to be too heavily weighed down by building this 125 miles in British Columbia, depend upon it we will stop. We are not going fast; we are going slow. We expect, however, within ten years, having saved that ten millions I have spoken of, to do this much, at any rate; but we will not engage to do it within ten years. We do not consider ourselves bound to British Columbia to do it by 1890, and we will not do it within ten years if it presses too heavily on our resources. So much was necessary in order to soothe the fears of those who dreaded that the taxation would be too great and the expenditure too rapid. But then the honorable gentleman had to draw back, and in order to show that even all that expenditure would not indefinitely postpone the work at the eastern end, had to show 'the silver trimming' of the cloud; and he said in effect; 'So confident am I of the success of my scheme that I will not name the day in which the blushing East shall be married to the rosy West, but it will be very much sooner than any of you expect.' One moment he said: 'I will go slowly in the West, because the work may be too heavy for us—don't be afraid.' Such were the hon. Minister's consistent statements. Well, I say that these suggestions are intended, no doubt, to be satisfactory and consolatory, and, perhaps, th may be found out of the question to commence the eastern end until we have got through the centre and the western end, if the work is to be curried on according to his scheme and his views, which, I believe, as they stand, are beyond the resources of the country. Quebec may expect the eastern end to be commenced when the western road is finished—that i, that it will be begun in 1890, and may be finished in 1897, and I hope they will all be alive to enjoy it."

That is what the hon: gentleman said last year, when he was speaking to the Quebec members. He was looking for their support, and he told them that the Quebec members were not properly treated by the Government of Mr. Langevin.

Manitoba. We know full well what is occurring every day in connection with the western provinces and tarritories of Canada: that we are obliged to send our immigrants through the United States, and that at every station we find Mr. Langevin.

the country, that their interests were neglected, and that the eastern connection of this section to the north of Lake Superior had been postponed, because they wanted to expend thirty millions of dollars in British Columbia, and the revenues of the country were not sufficient; that our purses were not large enough to do more than the British Columbia line, therefore poor Quebec was left in the back ground. The east was being neglected, said the hon. gentleman; but if he could only have the chance of coming back to these benches, what would be not do for poor Quebec? By all means, said he, bring me back, give me another chance for five years, and I will do what I have not done for the last five years; give me the chance to give you the railway that this bad Government will not give you. Let us see now, Mr. Chairman, what the hon. gentleman tells us to-day. We have this proposed railway, and we come before Parliament with a contract and a Syndicate, and what do we find? We find that not only the central section, not only the western section, but the eastern section is secured. The hon, gentleman sees at once that this section being secured, Ontario, Quebec and the east will have connections with the Pacific Railway. He sees, at once, that his speech of last year will be quoted here, and that it would be known to all that the bad Government which was not favorable to the east had secured the connection for which these poor Quebecers had expended their $11,000,000. But the hon. gentleman is a cunning fox-I hope that is not an unparliamentary expression—I think that it is a proper one, but I do not mean it to be unparliamentary.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not object to it.

Mr. LANGEVIN. I am pleased that he does not object to it; he says that he does not object to anything that I say because it will not hurt him. He is not so invulnerable as he thinks he is, or would appear to be, and though my blows may not be so hard as the blows of some other members of the House, I may say, without presumption, that some of my blows have been felt by the hon gentleman. At all events the hon. gentleman is a cunning fox, and seeing that he would be called upon to support the policy that he propounded last year, he says: "No; do you not see that it is not to your interest as Quebecers; do you not see the true policy is to leave that out and build the Sault Ste. Marie line?" Why he, an Ontario man, putting himself above all party consideration, above all local consideration, says: "You see that the railway will bring down all the trade of the west and the trade of the United States, North-West,— where? To Montreal. And, therefore, you gentlemen of Quebec, will you not lend me a hand and support my measure when you see that by my project of the Sault Ste. Marie line I am urging the trade to Montreal and Quebec. Therefore, you must stand by me and not support the Government. And you members coming from Quario do you not see that this Government is not looking after your interests, that if you follow them you will follow them to your loss? But come with me and I will take care of you. I will guard your interests." I tell the hon. gentlement that he need not expect that they will do anything of the kind. Hon. gentlemen and a large majority of this House know perfectly well that this is as good a scheme for the construction of the railway as could be laid before Parliament. It is a scheme which will secure the construction of the roadscheme which will subserve the interests of all sections of Canada, and give us a railway on British Canadian territory, instead of one which would carry a portion of our trade through the United States, and carry away immigranta from We know full well what is occurring every. Manitoba. day in connection with the western provinces and territories of Canada: that we are obliged to send our immigrants runners from the American land and railway companies calling upon these immigrants to go to beautiful Kansas and those other western territories of the United States. They tell them to get upon the cars and go to a country where they will find friends, but not to go to Manitoba which is an inhospitable country. They say: "Do you not see this little pamphlet? It contains a speech from one of your most prominent men in Canada, the leader of the Opposition; we do not deceive you for there is his photograph." So they go to the United States, and hon. gentlemen call their conduct patriotic! I think, Mr. Chairman, I have dealt with most of the arguments brought forward by the hon. gentleman, but as there are others to follow they will doubtless take up any points which I may have omitted. I believe, at all events, that I have shown how we were induced, in the first place, to undertake the building of this railway, that the different Governments which have succeeded one another have adopted a policy for its construction. I have shown what exertions have been made, the plans which have been submitted, and the sacrifices which have been demarded from Parliament and the country in each case. I have shown, by taking the price of the lands at $1 per acre, that the amount in cash and land which we ask Parliament to agree to give the Syndicate—this amount expended and to be expended is $78,000,000—is the smallest by far of any of the sums which have been mentioned in the past as the probable cost of the railway. I have shown, moreover, that not only will the railway be built by the Syndicate, but worked for all time to come, and that we have sufficient guarantees in our hands to ensure both these objects. I have shown, with regard to the exemption from taxation, that it is only a temporary matter, and that the quantity of land which is to be exempt for all time to come is equal to about 72 acres per township; that in those townships we have in ordinary roads ten or, perhaps, twenty times as much land that is in the same position, and will never be taxed, and that, therefore, this great railway which will afford the settlers a means of access to the markets of the world will cost them nothing but the amount they would derive from the taxes of those seventy-two acres of land in each township. I have shown that this contract is one which should as a whole receive the assent of Parliament, though there may be some of its conditions which some hon. gentleman would have preferred to have seen omitted. When the great scheme of Confederation was before the House we found that one member objected to one clause and another to another, but the promoters of that scheme said: Is it not a beneficial change, as a whole, a great improvement upon the present state of things? The assent of Parliament was given to it, and people have benefitted largely by the institutions conferred upon us in 1867. The leader of the Opposition asks, why so monstrous a contract as this was brought down to Parliament? I tell him that it was to secure our institutions, to increase our population, to enrich this country.

Mr. RYMAL. Hear, hear.

Mr. LANGEVIN. Yes; I say to enrich this country. The hon. member who came to Parliament at the same time that I did myself, knows that a farmer who borrows meney to build a house or barn is certain that, though he goes into debt, his loan must soon be repaid by the products of the land. The same principle holds good in building the railway, for it must open the country for settlement. It is often asked why more people do not settle on our lands in the North-West, but every one knows that the tide of emigration will not flow into that country, that its resources will not be developed, until a railway gives its people communication with the markets of the world. We want to people also the North-West. We cannot people the North-West otherwise. With all our exertions, and with all the powerful machinery the most rightly call one of the greatest questions which has

Government can have at its disposal to bring emigrants to this country, we cannot bring more than 15,000 or 20,000 a year; but with this powerful Syndicate, having all their interests for the future in bringing emigrants to this country, to co-operate with the Government, we shall certainly secure an immigration which will at least be equal to the immigration which we have seen flowing for years into the United States of America. In fact, Mr. Chairman, we intend, by this railway, to make, this country one of the most prosperous and powerful on this continent. With our small population, the time has not yet come when we may speak of our country as a powerful nation. Not many years ago the United States had a population not larger than ours, but now they are one of the most powerful nations of the earth; and why should we not have an equally brilliant career? We have as good a country as theirs; our population is composed of as good elements as theirs; our population is as prolitic as theirs, and the immigration from the British Isles has not diminished that quality. Before many years we shall have, in Canada, a large population, and with population we shall have wealth, and with wealth and population we shall have power. This continent is not to be entirely in the hands of the United States. Providence has ruled that there should be another great power in the north of this continent, that our institutions should be different from theirs, that they should be modelled on the great, free and beautiful institutions of England, that we should hold forth these institutions as a model for other nations, and that, with these institutions side by side with those of the United States, we should show the world that we can prosper, live happy, and possess all desirable liberty under the British flag. Of course, hon. gentlemen may or may not rise above mere partizanship. Hon. gentlemen may or may not see that this is one of those great measures that a party even in Opposition should not hesitate a moment to support. This is one of those rare opportunities that public men have to show how they can appreciate great measures, and how they can foresee the future of their country. This is a measure which we, at all events, as public men, as the representatives of the people of this country, as the representatives of the representatives in Parliament, consider will be the crowning act of our lives; and for my own part, having taken a prominent part in the bringing about of the Confederation of these Provinces, and having contributed my mite to the present condition of the country, I shall be proud to have contributed also, as a member of the party, as a member of the Government, to the bringing about of a settlement of this great question; and when the day shall come for me to retire from Parliament and go back to private life, I shall be happy that, this day, I had the good fortune, not only of holding a seat in this House, but also of being one of the members of the Government that were called upon to submit this great measure to this Parliament.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, for seventeen years, more or less, I have had the honor of sitting in Parliament, along with the hon. the Minister of Public Works. During that period I have often had the pleasure of hearing that hon, gentleman address the House, and it is but common justice to him to say that, on the great majority of those occasions, he was not only clear, but often forcible in his presentation of the subject. If, therefore, on the present occasion, I cannot congratulate the hon. gentleman on having attained his wonted lucidity or his wonted force. I am bound to believe that the difficulty is not in him, but in the unhappy character of the subject with which he has been forced to deal. We have heard, at very great length indeed, the views of two important members of the Ministry-the hon. the Minister of Railways and the hon, the Minister of Public Works-on this, which they ever engaged the attention of the people of this country Mr. Chairman, it is instructive, and it is interesting, too, to observe the rather remarkable difference in tone and mode of treatment in a great measure adopted by those two hon. gentlemen. I allow much for the difference in character between these two ornaments of the Ministry, but the fact is that, whereas, when the hon the Minister of Railways brought this measure before us, three days ago, no words were too strong, no language too glowing, to describe the prize which the happy people of Canada were about to obtain; although we were told that this was absolutely and in itself the best possible bargain that could be made—and, if he had only inserted the words "for the contractors," I would wholly agree with him—although that hon gentleman, with all the force of language and all the volume of voice for which he is remarkable, enforced upon us that we were the most happy people under the sun, not merely to enjoy such a Government, but to have an opportunity of ratifying such a measure; although he told us-and the hon. the Minister of Public Works, perhaps, has borrowed a little from his hon. colleague—that it was the proudest moment of his life when he came to lay this measure before us; although he told us, if I understood him aright, that the fact of his being a prominent party in conducting this negotiation would enable him to leave a substantial legacy to his children after him, and, perhaps,

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gontleman stands in this House, Mr. Chairman, making a statement which he knows is as utterly at variance with that which I made as it is possible for language to convey. I am astonished that even that hon, gentleman should be willing so to lower himself.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I take the opportunity of saying that we are not dealing with men whose characters and antecedents in managing Pacific contracts are not wholly unknown to us. The hon, gentleman must stand here and must bear to be reminded of all those circumstances which attended the inception of a former Pacific Railway contract, and I am strictly in my order and in my right in referring to them. What he said was that: "If he had no other bequest to leave to his children, this would be the proudest legacy he could desire to leave." If I am to understand, Sir, that it is not a substantial legacy, but merely a legacy of fame, I admit the correction; I am sorry for my mistake, and I am sorry for the poor children. However, Sir, one hon. gentleman tells us that this is a wise plan, carefully matured, carefully considered, deeply studied, with the aid of my hon. friend from Argenteuil (Mr. Abbott). The other hon, gentleman insinuates that, after all, it was rather a necessity forced upon the Ministry, that it was a question of compromise, a matter of give and take. If the compromise, if the give and take, had been fairly apportioned, I would not object, but this has been wholly and entirely a question of concession and grant from the people of Canada to the gentlemen of the Pacific Railway Syndicate, We must swallow it whole; we must swallow it without notice, without that due information which my hon. friend demanded and had a right to obtain; and why? The resson is, Sir, lest the people of Canada might come too soon and too early to a conviction that their rights were being trampled on and their property wasted. But, Sir, whence the difference in tone between these two hon. gentlemen? Why is it they talk in this depreciating style of a bargain on Friday, which, on Tuesday, was lauded to the skies. What has happened they talk in this in the interval to cause this wonderful change? Well, Sir. this has happened. My hon, friend beside me (Mr. Blake) has addressed to this House winged words, which have best in my power to give it a careful perusal, and I have arisen gone abroad, from one end of this country to the other, and from that perusal with the firm conviction that it would be Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT.

which are now going abroad from one end of this country to the other, and, following up his argument, he has shown the House how grossly ignorant, how grossly incompetent, how grossly unaware of meaning of very important clauses contained in the construction of this contract, is the hon. the Minister of Railways, in whose especial charge it was. Now, there were certain matters which the hon. Minister of Public Works was called upon to show. He was called upon to show why the construction of the Sault branch, at the present time, would not answer all the ends of Canada, and particularly of Quebec. He was called upon to justify the extraordinary monopoly which, by this contract, he proposed to give. He was called upon to show why, if we ever desired to free ourselves from the monstrous bargain we are entering into, we should be asked to pay such an enormous ransom. He was called on to show how the Government, containing men of such experience and knowledge of public affairs, could have perpetrated the extraordinary error to which my hon friend alluded. On not one of these points could we get any distinct or accurate information as to his views or those of his Government. It was almost as hard to find out his real opinion on these points as to find out what had become of that mysterious $32,000 of which he became possessed at the time of the last Pacific contract. I can very well understand that these gentlemen do not like to be reminded of the crime which eight years ago hurled them from power, although it is appropriate to this discussion to show the mode and manner in which the last Pacific contract was managed; but as it appears to be unpopular with the intelligent and virtuous supporters of hon. gentlemen opposite, I shall not waste the time of the House in reviving it. The hon. Minister of Railways said that, looking at this matter as he did, he was surprised that members on this side of the House should oppose this contract. Looking at it on party grounds, and in his anxiety for the welfare of the Liberal party, he has most earnestly advised us to preserve a judicious reticence in treating this question. He was so anxious that the Liberal party should not put themselves absolutely in the wrong, that he advised us to let this measure pass with the merest perfunctory criticism. Now, Sir, for once in my life I wholly agree with the hon gentleman. Were it possible for me to regard this from a purely party standpoint, and were it possible to treat this not as as a question involving the interests of Canada, but simply as involving the interests of the Liberal party, I would quite agree with the hon. Minister of Railways and would say: let this measure pass; let the country understand what it is these men are about to inflict upon it. This Bill, to us, would be a real election bonanza. I have no doubt that some, at any rate, of these gentlemen may expect to find it an election bonanza in quite another sense. But, Sir, I say that this Bill, in every clause, every important feature, appears to me to have been so drawn as to offend every honest instinct, every wholesome prejudice, of every important class from one end of the Dominion to the other. I do not care whether you appeal to the farmer, the merchant, the trader, or to the judgment of the advanced political thinker, each and all will, from his own standpoint, find that there is enough, and more than enough, to induce him to condemn the agreement to the uttermost. We have land monopolies and railway monopolies, and, more, we have, to all intents and purposes, the control of four-fifths of the territory of the North-West handed over to a corporation which, if not directly hostile, has at any rate conflicting interests with ours. This is to be done with a country which, for geographical reasons, it would be extremely difficult for the people of Canada to retain in the Dominion if any serious disaffection should occur there. We have been asked to give a careful and attentive perusal to this remarkable document. Well, Sir, within the last few days I have done the.

utterly impossible for those gentlemen to have made it worse in any one particular. I must say it is a question of some considerable wonderment to me how those hon. gent emen could have been induced to come down and lay this measure before Parliament at all I have been accused, I need not say how unfairly, of not rating the hon. gentlemen opposite very highly either mentally or morally; but I have always admitted that there were among them at least two or three men of unquestionable ability, even if they were of still more unquestionable unscrupulousness. I say, that I cannot understand on any reasonable hypothesis, how these gentlemen were induced to bring this agreement down. I may say there are three alternatives, or three hypotheses, which present themselves to my mind, and which alone can, it seems to me, account for this most remarkable document. One solution of the difficulty would be that the Ministers had become temporarily demented. I cannot understand, Sir, how any gentlemen, having their experience, their knowledge, knowing, as I must presume they know, something of the past history of this country, could have brought this down if they really were in their sound senses. There is a second hypothesis. Perhaps it might be said of them as a certain lady in Don Juan said of her husband, "They were not so much mad as bad." Recollecting their antecedents and past history, I say we cannot wholly dismiss from our minds the hypothesis that this contract may have been obtained by improper means. Knowing what has happened in the past, we know too well what may possibly have happened now. I do not say that that is my own opinion, but undoubtedly that theory is not one to be lightly dismissed, particularly when from one end of the country to the other we find wise and experienced business men asking themrelves whether the name of the Minister of Railways which, I see upon the last page of this document, really means the agent of the party of the first part or the agent of the party the second part thereto. There is a third hypothesis, very ably and eloquently put forward by my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Blake), viz: that this document is introduced because these men, by their own exceeding folly, had rendered themselves utterly helpless to deal with the other parties to this contract. For myself, Sir, I say frankly that I incline to this view. Look at the position in which these hon. gentlemen had placed themselves. They had gone to England; they had made repeated declarations, when in England, that they came in a position to complete the contract on advantageous terms. We were told by their organs, from one end of the country to the other, that when these gentlemen appeared on the scene in London, the Rothschilds, Barings, Glynns, Mills, and other noted capitalists of England and France, who had money to invest were jostling and crowding at the doors of the Ministers begging and praying for permission to construct the Canadian Pacific Railway. The hon. Minister of Railways was good enough to tell us a good deal of the extraordinarily favorable impression which he and his colleagues had made in England. He was good enough to tell us much respecting that remarkable and most accurate piece of information which the hon. Minister of the Interior had communicated to Lord Beaconsfield, touching the great influx of American settlers from Minnesota, Dakota, Wiscons'n and Michigan, who were going into our territories in the North-West, to fill and people those desert plains, as he calls them. But, Sir, I fear that, if the truth were known, the impression produced by that right hon. gentleman and his friends in England was hardly quite so favorable as the lovers of their country could desire. Sir, we know what the London Economist, a paper of very high standing, said of the doings of those gentlemen. Here is an extract from the London Examiner, a paper also of influence:

"The Dominion Ministers have grossly mismanaged their mission. They have repelled confidence when they ought to have nourished faith. They have created distrust when they should have cultivated hope, and they have been mysterious and fussy at the same time. They have flourished about their object, and have inspired communications that have proved to be misleading. The upshot is that, with the best intentions, perhaps, they have cast no credit on the Canadian Pacific Railway."

That is the account of the great credit which redounded to the Dominion of Canada from the actions and conduct of these hon, gentlemen during their long mission to Europe. I will show them, before I sit down, that their conduct on this side of the Atlantic has in no degree detracted from the opinion formed of them by eminent and impartial persons on the other side of the Atlantic. In this contract. we have the result of the greatest ignorance and incapacity, to say no worse, brought into contact with practical ability and experience. Now, Sir, I do not care which of my three hypotheses you adopt, whether you say that these hon. gentlemen were, as in my first hypothesis, crazy; or, as in my second, bought; or, as in my third, sold. Pessibly, there may have been a little of all three. I do not pretend to say that any cash passed between the high contracting parties, but if they do hereafter extend an alms to their Ministerial bondsmen, who can say it has not been well earned. I say, Sir, that this document is not a bargain, but a capitulation, and a capitulation without the honors of war, the terms of which were dictated to those hon, gentlemen by the agent of the the Syndicate. Now, let me be understood distinctly. 1 attach no blame whatever to the gentlemen of the Syndicate for their part in this transaction. Quite the contrary. They have shown themselves most capable business men, and I wish to heaven the interests of Canada had been half as well served by our agents as the interests of the Syndicate were by theirs. Of the Bill itself, I find it difficult to speak with patience. Like my hon. friend I regard it as simply a monument of folly. I say that, in this Bill, every lesson which ought to have been drawn from the past experience of the United States has been deliberately disregarded; that every lesson which ought to have been drawn from the past history of this country, whether as exemplified, by the dealings with land questions in a great part of Lower Canada, or in the Province of New Brunswick, or Prince Edward Island, or the Province of Ontario, has been set at naught. What have we done? We have bought out, at a considerable cost, one great monopoly, and at a hundred fold greater cost we are about to create another and far more dangerous monopoly. Every reasonable protection which the history of late events in the United States have taught us, appears to have been deliberately neglected; every danger which we ought to have taken care to avoid seems to have been invited; every clause appears to have been drawn against us; and it is quite apparent, from what happened the other day, that the Minister who brought down the document did not even take the trouble to compare the clauses which he cited. I say, that the price which we are called upon to pay to these gentlemen for the task they have undertaken, is a most extravagant price, when we take into consideration the present actual value of the lands they are about to receive. I say, further, that a vory large amount of this expenditure is utterly useless, and will be rendered still more useless by certain extraor-dinary provisions of this contract, to which I shall, before I sit down, call your special attention. I say that they have taken no care whatever, as we did, to ensure that those lands should be sold at moderate terms to actual settlers; that they have delivered the whole of the North-West, tied hand and foot, to this Company; that they evade altogether the most important question of rates to which my hon. friend most properly called attention; that they have weighted us down with a most tremendous future obligation, which will cost, not one, but hundreds of millions should the people of Canada pass this Act, and, at a future time, try to relieve themselves from its burden. This can only be considered as a most fitting sequel to the original bargain by which we bound ourselves, for sake of some petty political ends, to gratify some petty personal vanity to execute a bargain which every man of sense in Canada knew to be utterly impossible of fulfilment at the time it was made. This is an abdication of all the rights and duties of Government throughout the best portion of an favor of a private com enormous territory apany. We are al favor of a private company. We are about, virtually and substantially, to give up the control of the North-West. Only one thing is lacking, and possibly my hon. friend oppesite will, at his leisure, as we have practically given away our civil r this country, construct a clause which rights will give to its new masters power of life and death over every one in the North-West. Now, I will proceed to descant on the chief and leading blunders which appear to me to have been committed in this document. I may be accused possibly of indulging in repetition. It is not easy for any man, after the exhaustive speech of my hon. friend (Mr. Blake) to go over this ground without appearing, to some extent, to repeat what he has already said, and said better than I can say it. But I say this is a case in which we should not be afraid of repetition, in endeavoring to make every man, woman and child, in Ontario, and the Dominion at large, as cognizant as we are ourselves of the crimes and errors of which this document is full. Now, I say that the first and greatest blunder is the blunder which my hon. friend pointed out, of needlessly and uselessly attempting at this moment to construct the line north of Lake Superior, when a vastly more easily constructed line at a vastly smaller cost would supply all possible needs of Quebec and of Canada. I say that is a most grave and serious blunder. I am not myself wholly indifferent to the sentimental question on which the hon. Minister of Public Works has dwelt. Other things being equal, I would greatly prefer to see this road running from end to end through British territory; but when we are called upon to expend $20,000,000 or $25,000,000 for the purpose of building this road entirely through British territory, and when we see, by other provisions in this document, that if we spend this money, subsequent provisions will render the expenditure almost entirely nugatory, when we know, at the same time, that by expending what would construct the first sixty miles of the road we are about to build, we would attain all the advantages for Canada, all the advantages which could ever flow from the construction of the north shore line, and, at the same time, bring to us the trade of an enormous portion of the most fertile part of the United States,—it does seem to me the very perfection of stupidity and blindness to insist on throwing away $20,000,000 when $1,000,000 would give all the trade you could compass by the larger expenditure Moreover, there is the strongest internal evidence in this document that, whatever the Government may say, the gentlemen of the Syndicate do not intend to construct the line north of Lake Superior. When you look at the enormous proportion of land and money which is assigned to the central section and the comparatively very small proportion assigned to this same north shore line, you see quite clearly that if the time comes when it is convenient and desirable to abandon this line, it will cost the Syndicate very little indeed to throw aside altogether whole task of constructing this road on the north shore of Lake Superior. That, I say, is one very prominent blunder. Another is the most exorbitant price which hon. gentlemen opposite propose to pay the Syndicate for the construction of that central section. For that 1,450 miles the Company are to receive $15,000,000 cash and 18,750,000 acres of selected land, worth, to-day, as Government can those monstrous monopolies, with their Sir Richard J. Cartwright.

lands are selling in the North-West, at least $37,500,000, in all $52,500,000 of money or money's worth for the construction of the 1,450 miles. Now, let us see how this monstrous grant compares with the sums which have been paid by other roads for the construction of at least equally difficult and equally long lines, and lines, Mr. Chairman, which are constructed, I am given to understand, on far more favorable grades, and far more favorable alignments than those which are provided in the extraordinary clause to which my hon, friend called attention. I have here a detailed account, and it was obtained from parties who had no notion whatever it was going to be used as a stand of comparison with the cost of constructing our 1,450 miles. I take the road which, among all the main roads, is the nearest to our road and affords the fairest chance of comparison. I take the cost of the construction of the Northern Pacific Railroad from Bismarck to Puget Sound. There are 557 miles from Bismarck west which are but partly built, and which are expected to cost about $12,000 a mile. There is a mountain division of 198 miles, a very difficult country, which is expected to cost $25,000 a mile; there is another section of 282 miles at $15,000 a mile, and one of 210 at the same rate, besides one of 250 miles at $25,000 from Columbia River to Puget Sound. This 557 miles at $12,000 a mile is equal to $6,600,000; 198 of the mountain division, at $25,000 a mile, is equal to $4,950,000; 250 miles, at $25,000 a mile, is equal to $6,250,000; 492 miles at $15,000 a mile, is equal to $7,380,000; in all, for the construction of 1,497 miles over a country, to say the least of it, decidedly more difficult than our 1450 miles, from Selkirk to Kamloops, they are to pay in all $25,260,000 in round numbers, being an average of about $17,000 a mile. We, Sir, for our 1,450 miles, are to pay $15,000,000 in cash and 18,750,000 acres of selected lands, worth, at least, $37,500,000. Therefore, our 1,450 miles will cost us fifty two and a half millions, being an average of $36,200 per mile. The Northern Pacific will get their road, 47 miles longer than ours, for an average of $19,200 a mile less, and we will have to supply all the cost of building the entire road and give the contractors a bonus of $27,000,000 bosides. Now, I had occasion very recently enquire from a friend of mine connected with the Kingston and Pembroke Railway-a road well known to some of the members of this House, constructed through a rocky country, and by no means easy to construct—what was its average cost per mile. There I found that at a time when iron was dear and the cost of construction greater than it is now, the total cost was barely $15,000 a mile, though the grades were considerably better than the standard of the gradients which are prescribed for our railroad. I think that comparison will show the House that I am thoroughly justified in saying that the cost of this central section of 1,450 miles is so exorbitant as to call urgently upon the House for a thorough and immediate revision of the same. Then I take objection, in the third place, to this most extraordinary provision whereby a monopoly of constructing all roads in a particular direction, is to be granted for 20 years to the gentlemen who construct our main line. Now lot, us remember that we are dealing with a country the growth and development of which are out of all proportion to the rate prevailing here, that in a prairie region five years will do the work of 20 years here, and that 20 years in the history of that country means a much greater growth than 20 years in the history of a country like ours. I say nothing at the present moment of the stopping of other roads which, if they are not violently interfered with, are ready and willing to extend themselves through our territory from one end to the other, and to give to the people of the North-West what above all things it is important they should have-numerous independent competing lines, by which means alone, except indeed, by a very rigorous interference on the part of the extravagant charges, which have done so much harm on the other side of the border, and to which my hon. friend referred at such length and with such force, by any possibility be avoided. I do not think that many members of this House fully understand that at this moment some five or six important and powerful corporations in the United States are looking forward, if we do not violently interfere, to making a connection with the North-West, thus giving our people who settle there the opportunity of conveying their produce, not to a foreign country, but—if we have the wisdom to take the advice given by my hon. friend-to a line which would pour the whole produce of that country and of other countries, by Sault Ste. Marie, down the valley of the Ottawa, and into the City of Montreal. Moreover, it is known to every mercantile man whom I address, that whenever you give a road like this the power of determining where lines of traffic shall go at the outset, you enable it to fix for a very long time where the traffic shall go in the future. There is nothing harder than to divert traffic from well-established roads into which it has once got the habit of going. I think that is one of the main reasons why this monoply is insisted on, as it is one of the main reasons why no intelligent Government, understanding the situation, should ever have given to one single company, no matter how powerful, the opportunity of controlling a matter so vital to the interests of the country. But there is another grave blunder to which I wish to call the special attention of this House, and afterwards of the people of this country. I noticed that the hon. Minister of Railways passed over very lightly that important provision by which almost unrestrained power to fix the main line of the Pacific Railway, wherever the gentlemen of the Syndicate please, was given them. He told us that the railway company would know best. I do not, in the least degree, doubt that the railway company would know where it was best that the main line of the Pacific Railway should go to serve their interest; but I doubt exceedingly if the House I doubt exceedingly if the Ministers themselvesknow what is contained in this apparently trifling clause giving power to direct the location of the main line of the Pacific Railway wherever these gentlemen see fit. Sir, I wish with all my heart that the wise suggestion of my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) had been followed, and that magnificent map which is now adorning the Railway Committee room, could have been placed here so that we might all see it. I admit that it is a valuable map—I admit that, perhaps, the mechanical resources at the command of the Government may not be sufficient to transport it safely from one room of this building to another. But, valuable as it is, I submit that the territory it represents is of a good deal more value to the people of this country, and that that territory is likely to be most seriously prejudiced by the power which it is proposed to give the Syndicate. Now, as we could not get that map, I have taken the trouble to have a map constructed which might show us this matter for ourselves, and, although it may be somewhat contrary to our practice, I will ask, with leave of the House, to use one or two of our pages here to extend that map for me while I endeavor to point out what a grievous blunder, in my judgment, is likely to be committed by the impolitic course to which these hon. gentlemen have committed themselves by allowing that Company to locate their line as they see fit. I have very good reason to believe that the St. Paul and Manitoba Company are prepared—

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Does the hon, member pretend to state that it is not subject to the approval of the Government?

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I am now calling object that we should give $80,000,000 of money and attention to the great importance of the question which will arise in connection with the location of this road, and after branch line to divert for all time to come the traffic the remarkable statement made by the hon. the Minister of of that Company along the line of the St. Paul and Railways, that the Compay were the best judges of the location, I had a right to assume that the Government did not, at any rate, whatever they may do hereafter, propose to interfere.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. That is an assumption in direct contradiction to the terms of the contract.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. It may be, Sir, but it is in direct conformity with the language of the Minister, whose name appears as a party to this contract. At any rate, no possible harm can follow my venturing to point out to the House a certain danger which, I think, is likely to occur, unless strong steps are taken to prevent it. Everybody knows that the original intention was to cause the main line of the road to be located at a distance of not less than 100 miles, and generally a great deal more from the American frontier. We have heard that that line is to be deflected southward, first at the Portage, thence to the rapids of the Assiniboine, and so south of the Moose Mountains, south of the Assiniboine, and by such pass as the Company may choose across the Rocky Mountains. Now, I understand that the St. Paul and Manitoba Railway Company are contemplating the construction of a line from Duluth to Crookston, 90 miles south of the point where their present line enters Manitoba. From that place, the line extends to Grand Forks. They talked, when I was there a few months ago, of extending to the Turtle Mountains, and then through about 50 miles of very favorable country to a point a little beyond the rapids of the Assiniboine. Now, I wish to show the House what will be the practical result if that plan is carried out. I have not said that the Government is going to permit this; but, as I said before, I shall take the opportunity of requiring the Government to give a formal statement of what their intention is upon this point. From that common point the distance to Selkirk is about 180 miles; the distance to Grand Forks, in the Red River, is 210 miles; from that place to Crookston is 261 miles; while from Crookston to Duluth is supposed, by the projected line, to be 234 miles. The result to which I wish to call the attention of the House is, that if the main line of the Crookston Position Positi Canadian Pacific Railway be deflected southward to within 50 miles of the American boundary, as I have reason to believe it is intended to be deflected, at that common point the road is nearer Duluth than Thunder Bay by at least 116 miles. And as the outside difference between the line north of Lake Superior-going by Linkoping-and the line passing by way of the Sault, thence through our own territories, and down the valley of the Ottawa is less than 100 miles, it is quite apparent that unless and, indeed, even if we had a first-class road contrary to the provisions of this contract passing north of Lake Superior, still all the traffic of that immense region lying west of the point of junction, must of necessity flow to Duluth along the southern shore of Lake Superior, and to other points through our own territory or elsewhere; and, consequently, that the road north of Lake Superior, if this divergence is taken, will be rendered practically useless in competing for the traffic of anything west of that point, though it may compete for a small strip of country between the Assiniboine and Selkirk. I would not have ventured to dwell on this point, but for the extraordinary statement of the Minister of Railways, that he considered that the Company were the best judges of where the road should be located. Now, Sir, I have not the slightest objection that that road should ultimatly be constructed by the St. Paul and Manitoba Railway Company at their proper cost, or even with some reasonable assistance, if it be useful for developing that country. But I do most strongly object that we should give $80,000,000 of money and of money's worth to construct a very excellent branch line to divert for all time to come the traffic

Manitoba Railway. Suppose it does take that course-I put it simply as a hypothesis—what will be the result to us? I venture to say that its certain result will be that a very small portion, if any, of the north Superior section will be built, and that we will stand in this position. We will have given a bonus over and above the cost of the road of $27,000,000, we will have given a road of 2,000 miles, 700 miles of which will be a first-class road, through a very different country, for the purpose of giving an excellent branch line to the St. Paul and Manitoba Railway. We will have given them a twenty years monopoly besides, and perhaps then the Company would permit us, after all that is done, to build at our proper cost a line of 800 miles from Portage la Prairie to Jasper House, so as to secure for our Thunder Bay line a portion of the trade of the Pacific Railway. Fifthly, Sir, I take issue entirely with their omitting to fix such rates as would prevent the future population of the North-West from being put under the power of these grinding and terrible monoply tolls, which have proved such a tremendous detriment to the progress of the country on the other side of the border. Now, Sir, these gentlemen tell us that this need not, in the slightest degree, disturb us, because, say they, the Government can fix the rates. Well, as my hon. friend pointed out, the Government can fix the rates. The Government must fix the rates in the could provide of the recibe of the reci early periods of the railroad, and at a very high point. I think every reasonable man will admit that. But, Sir, by the provisions of this contract, you take away from the Government, for ever, the power of revision; you do not permit these rates, once fixed, to be altered until there is a profit of 10 per cent. on the total cost of the railway, which will be, according to the estimate of the Minister of Railways, $78,000,000; according to my own estimate, and that of my hon friend (Mr. Blake) at least $100,000,000, because I say the lowest figure at which you can estimate the value of these lands to-day is $2 an acre; and that sum not provided by these persons, but provided by us out of our own pockets, and out of our own lands. We are, if I understand the terms of this contract and my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Blake)—the first lawyer in the Dominion—gives the same interpretation as I do, we are to pay ten millions of dollars, or ten per cent. on whatever the road is to cost, before we are allowed to lower a single toll; and I suppose if this road develops a vast traffic, if there be a profit of $10,000,000 a year, if we thought well to acquire control of this road, the lowest sum we should have to pay would be two hundred millions of dollars before we could deliver ourselves from the monopoly which these gentlemen ask us to-day to establish. I have spoken before of the sixth error of omitting to compel sales of the land. Now I am inclined to believe that a very consider. land. Now, I am inclined to believe that a very considerable amount of the land may be sold, very likely will be sold, and on liberal terms, in the first instance, by the gentlemen of the Syndicate. But this exemption from taxation will induce them, I fear, to hold very large tracts of land indeed until the progress of the country will enable them to dispose of the land at a very high figure; and I say, that is a fatal blunder that ought to have been guarded against, that hon. gentlemen are inexcusuble for not guarding against, because it had been guarded against by my hon. friend the member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) in the measure he brought down. As to the seventh error, that of giving the road in perpetuity under the pretence that it is unlikely, if not impossible, that the Government can work it profitably, it is, I admit, a question on which there is fair scope for argument: whether or not it is wise for the Government to attempt to control a great railroad? But, I say, if the Government does decide on that course, that departure should be carefully guarded and power of resump-Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT.

tion should be reserved, so that if the railroad became a profitable and lucrative concern, the Government could resume it on favorable terms. I do not object to large and liberal provision being made to compensate the Syndicate for the money which they themselves put into the road. I should not object to 15 per cent., if you think fit, being allowed to them for the money they expend on constructing the road. But it is a monstrous thing that hereafter, if we are likely to require to resume the road, we should be compelled to pay 10 per cent. on the profits of our own money invested in it. Moreover, it is well worthy of the House to consider whether, after all, it may not be possible, in the condition of a country such as the North-West, for a Government road to run profitably. I do not doubt that hon gentlemen, on the other side, are aware that on the continent of Europe-in France and in Spain-it is not the custom to grant roads in perpetuity, even when no Government aid is given. The roads in these countries are granted for short terms of years -fifty, sixty, seventy, eighty-I believe ninety-nine is the longest period. They ought to know that in the Australian Colonies and in India, where the conditions are similar to those in the North-West, Government roads are run and worked at a great profit; and I say they are too precipitate in giving this road in perpetuity to anybody who will take it off their hands, and giving also, as they do, a monstrous premium on on its construction. Now, Sir, I call attention, in the ninth place, to the extraordinary degradation of the road, and to the remarkable ignorance which the hon. Minister of Railways displayed on this essential item of his own contract. Now, what is the consequence of this? Well, Sir, there is one very remarkable consequence. We know perfectly well that, in dealing with this Syndicate, we are, to a great extent, if not altogether, dealing with a certain powerful corporation on the other side of the line. If that road be deflected—as I believe it will be deflected, let Ministers say what they please to the contrary—one consequence will be this. It will, I admit, be very much in the interest of the Syndicate—very much in the interest of the St. Paul and Manitoba Railway—to construct well, perhaps, with a very high standard, the greater part of the central section of 1,450 miles; but it will not be for their interest, in the slightest degree, to construct, according to any higher standard than that prescribed, any portion of the other sections, or at any rate that section which runs along the north shore of Lake Superior. I do not myself believe, as I said, that if this contract stands, that section will be built at all; but it would be very easy to build it, literally in the terms of that contract, and yet leave it perfectly worthless for the conveyance of heavy freight. Now, Sir, there is a tenth objection, and a formidable objection, I think. The hon, gentleman was good enough to tell us that he had enlisted the aid of a very powerful corporation, and that he expected great benefits in working the road and in promoting immigration in consequence. Sir, that is very well, but this corporation has interests not necessarily hostile, but which may be conflicting with ours, and even hostile, in certain aspects. Consider this whole position in conjunction with certain facts to which I have called attention. Sir, it is not the interest of that Company, it never can be the interest of that Company, that there should be free competition in railroads in the North-West. It is not to their interest that the tolls should be reduced; it is not to their interest that settlers in the North-West should be allowed to get their produce to the sea-board at the cheapest possible rate. It is distinctly the reverse; they are bound to take the highest toll they can get. I do not doubt they will get it, nor do I severely blame them for so doing; but the result of that will be, that if you pass this Act and take away the power, which, as soon as you have constructed the Thunder Bay Branch, you would have in your own hands of establishing direct competition with the St. Paul and Manitoba Railway, you will deprive the people of the North-West of the only practical security they will ever have of getting their produce to market in this generation at a fair and reasonable rate of toll. Now, these ten objections are all objections on which, I think, the time of the House would be well spent on separate motions, and are objections on which, I trust, every man in the House, whether he be an opponent or a supporter of the Government, will be compelled to record his vote. All these, I say, are very great objections, but not by any means the whole of the objections which lie against this scheme. Sir, what are we to say about the very curious and intricate provisions for the reception of the twenty-five millions of dollars on deposit? I forbear, partly, because my voice to-night will not allow me to enlarge upon the point, and partly because I desire to hear what the Minister of Finance, whose special duty it is to expound these clauses to the House, has to say upon them, what he proposes to do with this money should it be taken advantage of, and should the present condition of the money market continue such as to induce the Company to float a large loan. I desire to know from him how he proposes to deal with the objection taken by my hon. friend, that, as you do not know when this $25,000,000 are to be paid, there would be undoubtedly a considerable difficulty in deciding how much of it the gentlemen of the Syndicate ought to be allowed to receive under the condition which enables them to exchange the cash payments for the payment in guarantee bonds, or rather the guarantee of certain bonds. I do not say that this may necessarily prove a bad arrangement, but I do say there are certain considerable risks here, and that we ought to have a very full explanation from the Minister of Finance, both as to what he intends to do with regard to this matter, and as to how he construes these several clauses. But, Sir, what are we to say of the provision for the issue of $25,000,000 of stock? There are certain curious provisions here which certainly deserve some publicity. I think, when the stock is issued, we ought to know, and the public of Canada ought to know, into whose hands it goes, and who holds it. We have not forgotten, some of us on this side, though I suppose that I shall be told I am insulting these virtuous gentlemen, by recalling the fact to their recollection, that there still exists an arrangement, signed by a late colleague of theirs, binding them in honor to recoup Sir Hugh Allan for certain moneys that were once advanced by him. Perhaps, in the administration of these $25,000,000 of stock, some means may be found for recouping that disinterested gentleman for the losses and risks he ran. There was a propriety, as my hon. friend pointed out, in choosing the Union Pacific as the standard of this road, in more respects than one. I think, when that clause was drawn the hon, gentleman ought to have remembered what the records of the United States revealed as to the mode and fashion in which the Union Pacific was constructed. Let us consider the excuses these hon. gentlemen bring down. Their argument is this: they say there may be some defects in this wonderful measure, but they tell us that if there are defects the Syndicate will be controlled by a due regard to their own interests. Which interest? Its interest in running the Pacific Road or its interest in running the St. Paul and Manitoba Road? I think it is an unworthy excuse to make, to be told when granting extra-ordinary powers and franchises, that we can safely divest ourselves of rights which we now hold, because it will be to the interest of these people to administer properly the affairs that are entrusted in their hands. Why, Sir, there is not a despot in the world who might not say that he desires to administer the affairs of his subjects well; there is not a single plea which could be advanced for this, which might not be advanced on the part of the benevolent slaveholder, that he took good care of the interests of his slaves for his own sake. These hon, gentlemen think it is hardly worth their while to say anything in defence of the accusation that they are about to create a monopoly. There was a time, not so long ago, when these hon, gentlemen held quite a different view of this subject. They have given us unlimited extracts from Hansard of the speeches of my hon, friend the present leader of the Opposition. Let me read what their present leader, the former chief of the Opposition, said in discussing a strictly analogus question. In page 1691 of the Hansard of 1878, you will find that the right hon. Sir John A. Macdonald spoke in this wise:

"The arguments used by his hon. friend from Lisgar and Marquette were unanswerable when they said it was unavoidable that one line should have a monopoly of the traffic for ten years. He considered that to give such a monopoly was not only an injustice, but a fraudulent measure. The article which had been so often quoted was printed, because it was deemed proper to disabuse antagonistic parties of misapprehension, and thus save valuable time. The hon. gentleman said it was not necessary for him to refly to the question which had been put to him. He (Sir John A. Macdonald) thought it was desirable to do so, because this article seemed to say, in behalf of the bondholders of the St. Paul line: 'We have made a bargain; we have got ahead of you; do not throw away valuable time; we have a monopoly of ten years.'"

And, Sir, no less a person than the present distinguished Minister of Railways, in the course of that debate, re-echoed the views of his then and present chief. He said:

"The question no doubt is surrounded by difficulties, but the discussion would come better before the House when the lease was brought down. He was sorry to hear that it was necessary to extend the lease for ten years, because it would be a virtual monopoly. It would not be an uncontrolled monopoly, but it would be a monopoly. He thought it was very unfortunate that, with the work so far advanced, it should be found requisite to grant a ten years lease to a line which would be a formidable competitor to our own line of railways."

There is, Sir, a deal of difference, as hon. gentlemen will perceive, between the views they hold now on the subject of monopoly, and the views they held a very short time ago—only two years ago—on that important subject. I, for my part, only see one possible chance for the people of the North-West. I have a very high opinion of several members of this Syndicate, with whom I am personally acquainted, and of several of their sleeping partners, whose names do not appear formally in this document. I think it quite possible that these gentlemen may not abuse the extraordinary, the enormous, powers entrusted to them so much as it may be in their power; that they may rise to a high level and take a much more wise and statesmanlike view of the position than did the men who entrusted them with those powers. But this is a most precarious position. It depends on the lives of some two or three men, and on the chance whether they may choose to sell out or retain their present interest in the management of the road. If the hon. gentlemen opposite want my own opinion on the subject, I will say, frankly, with the utmost candor, that if it was to be a choice between the gentlemen of the Syndicate in perpetuity and the gentlmen on the Treasury benches, my voice is for the Syndicate, at all hazards. But it is not so. Establish the Syndicate, and you establish an irresponsible and irremovable body, over whom you have no control by any means that would stop much short of revolutionary measures. But in the case of Ministers, although they have a great majority at their back, in this House—though not so strong in the support of the people outside the House—I take leave to remind them that one or two contingencies might occur. It might occur to a certain distinguished personage that it is expedient the people of Canada should be consulted before their heritage was finally away; and whether that were to happen or not, in a little more than two years, the people will have an opportunity of pronouncing whether or not these gentlemen have been faith. ful defenders of the public interest. It is very interesting, indeed, under the present circumstances, now that we are about practically to create a set of new masters for a very great portion of this country, to learn as much as we can about the character of these same new masters. Fortunately, Sir, that same volume of Hansard, to which I have referred, contains some means of information as to the opinion of gentlemen on the Treasury benches, of one at least of the most prominent and important of the gentlemen about to be charged with those great and extensive powers. It will be in the recollection of members that my esteemed friend, Mr. Donald A. Smith, having been very unfairly assailed in his absence, by gentlemen on the Treasury Benches, took, on the last day of the Session of 1878, the only opportunity in his power of vindicating himself. Let us see how that hon. gentleman who, we are now told is one of those honorable and able men-and I do not dispute the assertion for a moment-whose character, standing, experience and general ability are so great that the Government with a light heart are about to entrust to them the most extensive powers ever entrusted to any set of men within my experience, in this century—was described by members of the present Government. It will be interesting to know how some of those hon. gentlemen then regarded that hon, member to whom I have He had been defending himself from a very unjust and very unfair attack made upon him. Here is what the present Premier of Canada was good enough to say of that hon. gentleman. I quote from page 2561 of the Hansard, Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is not one single word of truth in that statement—not one single word. The hon. gentleman is now stating what is a falsehood.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That fellow Smith is the greatest liar I ever listened to.

Now, Sir, I give these hon. gentlemen their choice of this dilemma. It is perfectly well known that one of the most prominent member of this St. Paul and Manitoba Railroad Company, and, by consequence, of the Syndicate, is that honorable gentleman, termed by Ministers, the late member for Selkirk. I entertain for him, as I always entertained of his friends with him in this member for Selkirk. contract, a very high opinion indeed. But I really think that unless the statements made last night by hon. gentlemen opposite are intended to be received as, perhaps, they will be received by that gentleman as a full and ample apology—considering that he and they are now to be entrusted with sovereign power—some formal apology ought to be made to them, or those pages should be expunged from the Hansard of 1878. The sins of hon. gentlemen opposite will find them out. Let this be a lesson to them to keep their tempers under control in this Chamber. This affords the very best proof of the substantial correctness of the contention of my hon. friend the member for West Durham. It is quite clear they have very imperfectly comprehended the remarkable strides and development of the American railroad system. When brought in contact with men of great practical experience and ability, who thoroughly understand all the workings and developments of that system, I am not astonished those hon. gentlemen proved quite unequal to the encounter. I think it is remarked by the late Mr. Kingsley, in one of his works, that where savages and civilized men come in contact, a very curious result ensues. The savages are apt to be overpowered and dazzled by the wonderful achievements of civilized men, and to fall into the not unnatural error of mistaking the very vices which are a blot on civilization for the things which give that civilization its strength. to me the hon gentlemen on the Treasury benches are somewhat in the same position in dealing with the extra-ordinary development of the American railroad system. I admire, as much as any man can, the great enterprise, talent, inventiveness, and practical resources which the Americans have displayed in pushing and extending their railroad system; but I call attention to the fact that the great virtues of the American system are these, mainly: they have provided, to the utmost of their power, for unrestricted competition in railroads, and their policy is always liberal both as regards the general Government and the States in dealing with actual settlers. These hon. gentlemen deliberately turn their backs on these features of the American system which are good, and deliberately select those which are bad. They deliberately select or favor, so far as lies in their power, all those grinding monopolies which, in cases where competition is restrained, have proved detrimental to a very considerable portion of the United States. And they deliberately mould their land policy so as to discourage to the utmost the actual settlers. There is another aspect of the question. not giving to those hon. gentlemen of the Syndicate things that cost us nothing. I would like the House to reflect what is the sum total the North-West has cost Canada up to this time. I doubt very much whether it would be wise for us to take the latest standard of cost furnished to us by the Minister of Railways. I prefer to take the standard furnished to us a few months ago by Mr. Sandford Fleming, who, I suppose, it will be admitted by everyone, is at least as competent a judge as any other engineer; but, Sir, I will not insist on this if the hon. gentleman objects, but will strike off two or three millions from that estimate. According to Mr. Fleming's previous estimate the railway we give would cost $33,000,000. According to his later and revised estimate the amount is $29,000,000. The shrveys, purchase money, etc., may be put at $5,000,000 more.

The subsidy which is proposed to be given is $25,000,000. But besides that, we have incurred annual obligations forever for the extinction of the Indian title, of at least $600,000. which sum capitalized will give $15,000,000. Then if we include the extraordinary expenditures up to date, such as those for the survey of Dominion Lands, the maintenance of the Mounted Police, the payments to Indians, the cost of the Red River expedition, and the subsequent maintenance of a garrison in Manitoba, the construction of the Dawson route, and so on, all incurred expressly and specifically for the benefit of the North-West, taking Mr. Fleming's former estimate, we have expended, or will have engaged to expend, up to the 1st July, 1881, the sum of $87,683,000 for the acquisition of the North-West, or, taking the lower estimate, $84,683,000. We paid a million and a half to get rid of the Hudson's Bay Company, and we are now called upon to pay nearly $100,000,000 to create the Canadian Pacific Railway Syndicate and monopoly. You will observe, Sir, that, in taking this matter into calculation, I have not counted the past interest which has accrued, amounting to a large sum. have not counted the charges on account of the establishment of government in Manitoba, or the many annual sums we will have to pay before the railway is completed for such purposes as the completion of the surveys, the maintenance of the police, and, perhaps, further contingent charges on account of the Indians. My hon. friend was perfectly correct in saying that all the possible land sales you can make during the next 10, 20 or 30 years will not, in all human probability, clear you of the annual interest you will have to pay on these amounts alone, and that, as on the 1st July, 1881, you may put the cost of the North-West Territory to the people of Canada at probably not one penny less than eighty-three or eighty-four millions of dollars. I say, Sir, that our demand, our reasonable and most moderate demand, that time should be allowed to the people of Canada to consider what all this thing involves, ought, for many reasons, to have been granted to us, and that not merely for political reasons, although even on that ground I have a opinion indeed. strong It has been my practice, and I believed it to have been my duty, whenever great new questions which had not been before the people at the time of my election or the election of any individual members were brought up, to take all reasonable means to ascertain what the views and feelings of my constituents were, in order that I might fairly represent them on the floor of the House. No man can say that, when, on the miscalled National Policy, the last election carried hon, gentlemen to power, this question which we are now considering was, to any considerable extent, before the minds of even a fraction of the people of Canada; and, Sir. as it is the duty of hon. members to take this course, in my opinion, so it is the duty of Ministers in a still higher degree. In England, where these things are better understood, and where more real deference is paid to the rights of the people in a great many very important respects, it is always the custom for leading members of the Ministry to explain to public meetings, or in such other way as may seem to them most convenient, any important matter affecting their policy, at the first convenient season they can obtain; and I say that these hon. gentlemen ought to have taken an early opportunity of doing this, so that the public might have had a fair chance of considering this question before it was thrown suddenly before them in the way it has been thrown. I am not going to deny that possibly cases may arise where it is vitally necessary, in the interests of the people, that a government should act promptly, and when a government, in the interests of the people, acts promptly and comes interests of the people, that a government should act promptly, and when a government, in the interests of the people, acts promptly and comes before the House, and asks for an Act of indemnity, it is not likely that the representatives of a free people will refuse to grant it. But there are more practical reasons why there should be delay in this matter. I say that the position and practice of old Canada, in railway matters, is in a very slight degree indeed, a guide to us to the true policy to be adopted in the North-West. When our railway system was introduced in old Canada, our position was totally different from our present position in the North-West. We had to deal with an old settled country, with a forest country, and the consequence was that our development was of necessity vastly slower than it might be expected to be in the treeless prairies of the North-West. Moreover, it was our good fortune to have to deal with a country which was accessible by water at almost every possible point. I cannot call to mind any important part of old Canada which was more than 50 miles distant from water communication. We had thus wonderful natural highways provided for us, and in a situation so widely different as this, it is a matter of extraordinary difficulty for us to realize fairly and properly what is involved in the construction of railways in the North-West. There is but one excuse that I can see to be made for Ministers and that is that, belonging as they do to an older school than a great many other gentlemen in the House, their minds have not been properly opened to the development which has taken place in a great portion of North America. But, nevertheless, although all the conditions were different, every man knows what an enormous influence railways and railway policy have exercised in this country. Now, try to imagine, if you can, what the situation will be in the North-West. Try to imagine the magical effect which the introduction of railways involves in a country like that. Here the introduction of a railway is a matter of convenience and speculation. There the introduction of railways is a matter of life and death—a real vital necessity. What cannot railways do there, where they fix the value of every man's farm and every man's land, where they decide where towns and villages shall be, where railways, or more correctly, the rates levied upon those railways, do practically fix the limit of cultivation, decide the standard of comfort among the people, say where these people shall be, and how many there shall be. Sir, I say as a statement of literal fact, that the railways and those who control them, are the supreme arbiters of the whole material interests of such a country. To such a corporation you purpose to give an absolute monopoly—a monopoly, it may be claimed, for 20 years only, but really and practically, a monopoly in perpetuity. And for what country are you about to give the monopoly? If the estimates of it and brought down by these hon, gentlemen-are even approximately correct, we are creating a railway monopoly which will completely control a country as large as France, Spain, Italy, Germany, Austria, the British Isles, and half a dozen minor continental kingdoms to boot. I have my doubts, and very serious ones, whether it is wise for the Government of a free country, in this age, to divest itself absolutely of power even here. I know, from the examples I have pointed out, that a very different course to that which we have adopted has prevailed in various continental, and some of our own colonial dependencies; but I say, Sir, that what you propose to do now, would be inexpedient even in this country, and would be most utterly disastrous if applied in the North-West. I say, Sir, there are hon. members here who, if they pleased, could confirm what I say; that were you to propose such a Bill as this in a western state, you and those who introduced it would have literally to flee for their lives, because there the people

Well, Sir, all I can say is this: that when you get half a million of people established in the North-West, you will find it extremely difficult, indeed, to maintain the provisions of this Bill. I believe, when there is a quarter of a million there you will be confronted with extremely formidable demands for the repeal of many of its most important provisions. I tell you, Sir, not as a threat, but as a warning, which you will do well to heed, you are providing ready material for a most formidable and dangerous agitation throughout this country. You know that by your blundering you have caused one Red River Rebellion, and do you now wait to provide material for a dozen with such a Bill as this. Now, among the other charges brought against my hon. friend (Mr. Blake) was this: that my hon friend used different estimates at different times for the prices of lands. Most undoubtedly he did, most undoubtedly it was his duty to do so. There is nothing plainer than that the whole situation has been radically changed within the last six or seven years. I say, Sir, that terms which might have been perfectly justifiable for the construction of the road in 1872, or even as late as 1874, would be monstrously extravagant and entirely without warrant in the condition in which we now find ourselves. I repeat that every single individual element which can affect the condition of this country has been radically changed, and, that, within the last ten years there has been a perfect revolution in the rates of transport over all the railroads in America. I believe I am within the mark in saying that one-half the rate which appeared only a good working rate ten years ago is cheerfully accepted now by the largest railroads in America. Do we not know that there is a great risk that all the enormous sums that we have expended and are expending on our whole system of canals will be rendered worthless by reason of the enormous changes which have taken place in the cost of transportation by railroad? Do not we know that there has been an enormous change in the cost of construction of the most difficult parts of railways, and also in the cost of materials? I say, Sir, everybody knows that the improved system of rock drilling, the steam shovel, and other mechanical appliances, have effected an enormous reduction. Take an instance in which the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) has greatly glorified himself, the enormous reduction which has been effected in the cost of steel rails alone, and see how enormously all these new conditions have reduced the cost of any railway that may be built. Sir, I say nothing of the future possibilities of still further reduction in the rates of transport or the cost of construction; but I do say this: that I believe $60,000,000 would go quite as far to day in the construction and equipment of a railway of first rate grades as $100,000.000 would have gone ten years ago, when this project was first under consideration. And not merely has the value of land and the cost of construction changed, but, as everybody knows, there has been an enormous reduction in the price of money. There has been an enormous increase and change in the value of land in the North-West. Sir, the hon. Mirister of Railways called attention to the case of the late Mr. Foster. Now, I can give him and the House some little information on that case from my own personal experience. He correctly states that Mr. Foster, five years ago, in vain endeavored to construct some 85 miles of railroad on a certain subsidy, getting, with 25 years' interest, I think, on $7,500 and 20,000 acres of land Now, to show the enormous change that took place, I can say this, and I dare say there are some hon. gentlemen here who were acquainted with Mr. Foster, and can say the same, that Mr. Foster in the same year, I think, 1875, in discussing this proposal in my own office, I being then Minister of Finance, offered to me to surrender the whole of Sir Richard J. Cartwright.

not deem it wise to accept it, nor was Mr. Foster, as was perfectly well known, able with that subsidy to go on and build the railway. Sir, there is no possible ground for comparison between the value of land in 1871, 1872, 1873, 1874, or even 1875, and the value of land to-day, in 1880. These lands which Mr. Foster would have gladly sold at 20 cents per acre, or the privilege of taking other similar lands, would be gladly bought to-day, as the hon. Minister knows right well, for $2 or $2.50 per acre, in those portions of the North-West in which Mr. Foster would have been then perfectly welcome, and had an opportunity to select them. And, Sir, these hon. gentlemen ought to delay for another cause. Not only the cost of the lands, but our own power to construct the road is far greater. There is a very good chance of keen competition springing up among rival roads for the trade of the North-West, and, under these circumstances, I cannot conceive why the hon. gentleman should not allow the people to be consulted, that time may be taken to communicate with our constituents, time to learn what they really do think of these proposals which they are only now beginning to understand in their purport and meaning. These are not the only changes by any means. The position of whole peoples on the continent of Europe has most materially changed, to their loss and our advantage, since 1872 or 1874. All over the British Islands there has been a succession of bad seasons, amounting almost to famine in some cases, which has rudely shaken the whole fabric of society from one end to the other, and which, as the hon. gentlemen truly said, was likely if well used, to afford us the means of securing a valuable immigration to our own shores. All over Europe the people are groaning under the enormous expense of their excessive armies, and many men dreading that the war volcanoes, which are slumbering there for a time, may suddenly break out, are looking abroad for another country where they will have reasonable expectation of enjoying the fruits of their industry in peace, without being subject to the excessive exactions which they have to submit to at home. Permit me, Sir, in illustration of what I have previously stated, to illustrate it by a fact or two with reference to the prices of land. I believe that the St. Paul and Manitoba Railway, up to 1880, have disposed of 634,000 acres of their land for the sum of $1,334,338, very nearly $7 an acre; and I submit that that is a tolerably good proof that my hon. friend (Mr. Blake) was perfectly justified in saying that you have no right whatever in estimating the amount you are about to give these people for the construction of the railroad, to estimate the land, not at the real value which they bear to-day, but at any imaginary value which either he or you, or anybody else, chose to put on them, four or five years ago, before there was any practical means of communication with the North-West at all. Now, you have got one means of railway communication, thanks to the enterprise of the gentlemen who form the present Syndicate. You have several other roads in the hands of other corporations which would have been completed in a very few years, probably, in a very few months, if you did not deliberately take away from the people of the North-West the only chance they have of obtaining fair, unrestricted competition in the matter of rates to the sea-board. By the measure you are now proposing, you are not merely debarring them from getting these other rival routes into Manitoba, but are practically nullifying the value of the road you have nearly completed. Our intention was that when the Thunder Bay branch was completed, the people should have a direct competing route with the St. Paul You are now about to place, and Manitoba road. to all intents and purposes, that competing road in the hands of its competitor. What chance will you have then to regulate the rates of traffic by any other standard that 29,000 acres which he was to get, for a cash payment than that which my hon. friend laid down—the extreme of $4,000 per mile, or 20 cents per acre; but we did amount the traffic will bear. Moreover, our knowledge of that country is greater now than it was before. I can tell the hon, gentleman there is a very great and intelligent interest all over Canada, particularly in Ontario, felt in this question. There is hardly a single county, township or concession in Ontario, in which you will not find several men who have themselves travelled over the North-West, who have an interest in the North-West, who have friends or relatives there, and who are keenly alive to the dangers with which this measure threatens them. Hon. with which this measure threatens them. Hon. Ministers, I must say, have very little personal knowledge on this question. I am not going to condemn hon. Ministers for this, for even when they go, in their ministerial capacity, into a country, they find it difficult to obtain accurate information. I know what are the conditions under which a Minister visits this part of the Dominion. I know he is overwhelmed with business, is surrounded everywhere by persons whose interest it is often to prevent him obtaining convect informainterest it is often to prevent him obtaining correct information as to the real interests of the country; but that ought to be a cause for proceeding with greater caution than these hon, gentlemen have shown in their proceedings. I regret to see the hon. Minister of the Interior has not been in the House on either occasion when hon, gentlemen on this side were discussing this question at length. We can understand that the hon, gentleman may have shirked the severe castigation to which it was the duty of my hon friend (Mr. Blake) to submit his bautling; but he is hardly treating his party and the country fairly in not being here to listen to, to answer if he can, the objections which were taken by my hon. friend, and those which may be taken by myself, or other hon. members, against the scheme for which, in his double capacity as Minister of the Interior and leader of the Government, he is mainly responsible. In one respect, I am bound to admit I have a high opinion of the capacity of that hon gentleman, namely as a politician; but, however able and intelligent he may be, it must be remembered that he himself is absolutely without any personal knowledge whatever on this subject. Unless I am greatly misinformed, he has never been beyond the confines of Canada in that direction. I am quite sure he has never been in the North-West country, the country over which he at present presides. Sir, before I close I desire to call attention to one or two of the attempted replies which have been made to points taken by my hon. friend. I see that the Minister of Public Works attempted to make a strong ground of objection to my hon friend, that whereas a year or two ago he told us that $120,000,000 would, in all probability, be the cost of the construction of the road now about to be built by the Syndicate. It appears by the figures submitted by the hon. Minister of Railways, that $78,000,000 will be sufficient I take objection to that statement on two grounds. First of all, I say there is an enormous underrating of the value of the land about to be given, and that the true cost, at any rate, taking the very lowest estimate, will be $103,000,000 and not $78,000,000. But, I say, the hon. Minister of Public Works must know quite well that my hon. friend's estimate was based on the idea that we were to construct a first-class road in every respect, not a road degraded to the standard provided for in the present contract. There is no fair common ground of comparison between these two hon, gentlemen's statements, and no fair ground of reproach to my hon. friend that he should estimate for a first-class road an amount considerably higher than what the Minister of Works now estimates for a road so seriously degraded as the one to which he refers. Sir, I had intended making some reference to the Minister of the Interior, but as he is not in his place in the House, I shall defer the remarks the discussion of so great a question requires, he finds it which I had intended to have made with regard to him until a more fortunate occasion. But I desire to say this. We ask for delay now. We know perfectly well what was the of Finance says it is his nature and that he cannot not in his place in the House, I shall defer the remarks which I had intended to have made with regard to him until a more fortunate occasion. But I desire to say this.

result of the decision of the House at the time of the bargain for the original construction of the Pacific Railway. I ask the members of this House, Mr. Chairman, to recall to mind the repeated protests which were presented by members of this House—not merely from the Opposition benches, but from members holding an independent position—the entreaties which were preferred by us, that time should be taken to obtain information, to ascertain what the people thought of this question. Sir, we were compelled to rush blind-fold into that bargain; we found ourselves as we find ourselves now, hampered at all points, for the reason that no time was given, no due precautions were taken, in completing that bargain of 1871. Our task would be child's play if we were not fettered by the obligations we then so recklessly incurred. There is every indication that there will be a repetition of that same folly now; that indeed there will be even worse than that folly committed. I recall the warnings which were given then-by Sir Alexander Galt, by myself, that were given-to do him. justice—I regret that he is not in his seat—by the member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall); the warnings that were given by the late lamented Sandfield Macdonald. And I might recall the doom which, two years later, in 1873, overtook the men who treated with scorn the warnings we had uttered. I think the country is likely to repeat its vengeance, and that if these gentlemen do not take great care, the doom which overtook them in 1873 will be visited upon them in 1883. And, Sir, I might, with your permission, recall one remark which I heard drop from your own lips, whether in this House or on the public platform I cannot now remember, but it made a deep impression upon my mind. You were at that time, if you will allow me to say so, rather a political babe, but from babes and sucklings, accordby the late lamented Sandfield Macdonald. And I might a political babe, but from babes and sucklings, according to the opinion of some wisemen, wisdom is elicited which their later and riper utterances do not always confirm. At any rate the remark you made was, that you believed that confounded—I think that was the word you used—Pacific Railway was likely to be the death of half a dozen Ministers before it was done with. I fear you will prove a pretty true prophet in making that prediction. We see the same men on the eve of committing the same orror, the same crime I I must call it; and I believe that if they persist in this, if they will force their followers—as I believe, with regard to a good many of them, against their better judgmentwithout delay, without reasonable discussion, without communication with their constituents, without attempting to ascertain what the true opinion of the people of this country is-if they force them to vote for their folly-force them again, as they did before, they will rush upon the fate which awaits them so soon as the people have an oppor-

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The House having treated me with so much indulgence when I addressed them at such great length the other day, I shall not, at this stage of the debate, interpose myself at any length before those hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House who intend to speak upon the subject now under consideration. But I rise for the purpose of noticing a remark with which the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat opened his observations. I know, Sir, that I am within the jndgment of the House when I assert at once that the hon. gentleman was obliged, by reading the remarks that fell from me on a recent occasion, to convict himself of having attempted to place a gross misconstruction upon those remarks. I am in the judgment of the House when I say that that hon. gentleman finds himself in a position in which, unable to deal with this great question in a manner and spirit which

Well, I am free to confess that deeply as I regret that the dignity of the House should have been infringed upon by base and unmanly insinuations coming from an hon. gentleman who ought to be superior to the utterance of such insults, there is no source from which any such remark, bearing upon myself. could come more harmlessly, or from which I should be more pleased that such a remark should come than from the lips of the hon. gentleman. I do not forget that during the last five years that hon. gentleman offended the dignity of Parliament and the proprieties of parliamentary debate, to an extent which they never before were violated on the floor of this chamber, by the vile insiduations which he made with reference to the leader of the present Government. What did the hon. gentleman accomplish by the unmanly course he chose to adopt? Did he injure the right hon. gentleman whom he thus attacked. Sir, when the independent people of this country had the opportunity of judging between them they consigned him to oblivion, so far as they were able, as well as the administration of which he was a prominent member. They left him without a seat in Parliament, and they left the party with which he was connected, and the Government of which he was a member, with a mere corporal's guard in this House. So. Sir, I repeat if there is any source from which I should prefer to have had a reflection thrown upon myself, or an unmanly insinuation against me to emanate, that source is the hon, gentleman. I can make a great deal of allowance for him. Men generally judge of other men by their own hearts. The man who is dishonest himself, is the man who suspects dishonesty in others. It is the man who, looking into his own heart, says, what would I do if I had that opportunity, who suspects others of doing that which is base, unmanly and dishonorable. Sir, what is my position in this matter? The hon, gentleman has ventured to refer to the Canadian Pacific Railway contracts; what is my position with regard to them, before this Parliament, and before this country. If there was ever a Minister of the Crown, or a Minister of Public Works, who occupied an impregnable position, it is myself. Before this Parliament met, the duty had devolved upon me, of letting the contracts upon the Canadian Pacific Railway, to the extent of $6,000,000, and when Parliament met, two years ago, at the instance of hon. gentlemen, I brought down every document and paper they asked for, bearing on the question, and with every opportunity at their command. Not a single word of insinuation, not a single question was raised among those hon. gentlemen. The House rose, and the editor and progentlemen. prietor of a public newspaper, the Toronto Globe, who, I am glad to know, is within the sound of my voice, drawing venom from the depths of his own black heart, said that, in the columns of his paper, which if there was a word of truth in it, convicted the leaders of his party of being unworthy of public confidence. If there was a word of truth in the false and libellous utterances of that paper, it only went to show that the party of which he was the organ had the misfortune to have men representing them in Parliament utterly unfit to discharge their duties. The utterances of that newspaper showed that, with all the documents before them, these hon. gentlemen who were acquainted with public life, men second to none in ability, to scan with clearness and accuracy the acts of Members of Parliament, had no fault to find with them. Then, I say, how dare any journalist so insult the intelligence of the public, as to fill his columns with lying and slanderous utterances after Parliament had risen, and when, after all the facts were before the House, no man could be found in the party to venture an insinuation against me.
What happened? We were told to wait till Parliament

information and more papers—the information was given, and the papers laid on the Table of the House. They had these documents in their hands for weeks, and yet after all these denunciations in the press, Parliament rose without a man being found to endorse the contemptible utterances of that lying and slanderous paper. That was my position in this House. That is my position in this Third Session of Parliament. And goaded on to desperation by my challenge on the public platform, to any hon, gentleman to venture to formulate a charge against the integrity of my conduct as a public man—a challenge to discuss my conduct in the House or out of it-or to investigate it before any tribunal; it is only now that the hon. gentleman ventures, not to formulate a charge, but to do that which is the most unmanly act which one man can do to another—to throw out an unworthy insinuation. Suppose that instead of standing in this impregnable position, fortified as no public man ever was fortified, in regard to public acts upon which he was assailed-I say, instead of standing in that position, suppose this had been my position; suppose I had been entrusted as a public servant with the sale of public property; suppose that £3,000,000 of public bonds had been put into my hands to sell; and suppose that I had gone to England; and suppose that I had adopted a new and different mode from what my predecessors had adopted, and instead of placing them open to public competition I had sold them by a secret and private bargain; and suppose that when I came back I was not able to show the amount of money they were worth, and on being asked to whom I had made the sale, I refused to disclose it down to this hour. Why, Sir, I should have excused the hon. gentleman for venturing such unmanly expressions-I should have excused him for forgetting, not what is due to me, but what is due to himself.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I do not wonder, Sir, that the man who has only got to look on his right hand, when his friends and colleagues are in their seats, to see the man of the other ten thousand, and on his left hand to see the man of the thirty-two thousand, should not like to have called to his mind that most infamous passage in the history of Canada, when the honor of Canada, the interests of Canada, were sold and sacrificed by these men, as far as it was possible for them to do it, for Sir Hugh Allan's three hundred thousand or two hundred thousand of money; and, Sir, I have to tell this hon. gentleman that, although I could have excused him for not having deserted his chief in his hour of need, yet, Sir, after the facts were proven and disclosed, and after his daring to justify and defend that most outrageous transaction, I hold him at the least to be an accomplice after the fact, and very nearly as guilty, in intention, as the man who was himself the criminal. As for the insinuation which he ventures to throw out against me, Sir, every man in London acquainted with the Stock Exchange, every man acquainted with the financial history of Canada, knows perfectly well that a more untrue statement or insinuation, whichever you like to call it, that I instituted a new mode of selling the bonds of Canada, never was made. I adopted the plan adopted by my predecessors, which was approved by the authorities in London, and which, I believed, was most in the interests of the country. And if there had been a shadow of suspicion arising out of that transaction, that suspicion would have attached to Messrs. Baring & Glyan or to Sir John Rose, rather than to myself.

gence of the public, as to fill his columns with lying slanderous utterances after Parliament had risen, and n, after all the facts were before the House, no man could ound in the party to venture an insinuation against me, and then see where the Minister of Railways would Parliament met; the hon, gentleman asked for further Mr. PLUMB. I think I am justified in rising at this moment to call the attention of the hon, gentlemen on both sides of the House to the unseemly exhibition made by the hon, gentleman who has just sat down. I have sat in this House for many years, and I do not remember, in the whole course of the stormy period of four or five years during which we sat on that side of the House, and in which these gentlemen indulged in vituperation of the grossest kind, that I ever heard any gentleman so violate the proprieties of debate, or so insult the decorum of this House, as that hon, gentleman who has just sat down; and I say the cause must be poor indeed that that gentleman has to advocate when he has to resort to the kind of argument he has used to-night. I say the cause must be desperate when he draws into a cause must be desperate when he drags into a debate like this—a debate so important—a debate which should be approached by the man who has been Finance Minister of this country with gravity—when he drags into such a debate such personalities, such gross accusations, such slanderous insinuations. If there could be anything calculated to unite any who in the slightest degree hesitated in regard to this question, it is the language used by that hon. gentleman. Much as I have heard of that which I may call his vitriol throwing from public platforms all over the country, I never listened to anything so gross as that which I have been compelled to listen to to-night, and I believe that in rising now to express my indignation, I express the feelings of both sides of the House. I say language like that will not be tolerated, either by this House or the people of Canada, and I hope every word of this debate will go forth to the people, and that they will judge of the kind of argument that is used by a gentleman from whom, from the position he has previously held—a position more responsible almost than that held by any other member who sits on the Opposition benches - we might have expected better things. I was glad to hear my hon, friend rise in his place and challenge the gentlemen on the other side to formulate, like men, the charges they have been insinuating against him. I was glad he rose in the hearing of the man who has been pouring out his venom upon him in the public press week after week and month after month with diabolical ingenuity that just stopped this side of libel and that has never been equalled in the press of this country, licentious as it may be. Yes, it was a fitting opportunity, and I hope every gentleman within the sound of his voice has profited by his experience to-night. We are not in a temper, nor do I think this is a proper time, to enter into a discussion of this question in answer to the hon. gentleman, who has not only, I may say, degraded the debate, but he has introduced in almost every word of his argument fallacies that can be answered even by the most casual hearer. Point after point made by that gentleman can be refuted by the simplest reference to the statute. He stated a little while ago that this company which was to be chartered might have such tolls as it chose, when he had only to turn to the statute to find that, whereas the General Railway Statute permits a railway company to charge until it makes 15 per cent upon its paid-up capital; in the case of this Syndicate the restriction had been brought down from 15 to 10 per cent The hon. gentleman could easily have seen that no location of that line can be made unless it is approved by the Governor in Council. He could easily have seen that the standard by which that line was to be accepted was the standard of the Union Pacific Railway, as first constructed. It was the only line at that time which was analogous to this, and the hon. gentleman knows that in dealing out those vile insinuations with which he has interspersed his speech—those flowers of rhetoric by which the hon. gentleman is distinguished—the hon. gentleman lashed himself into such a passion that when he rose his voice was almost inaudible. But I must say that, apart from the venom with which his speech was charged, I never heard, even from him, a speech so devoid of argument, and I believe that the hon. gentlemen to whom he seemed specially to address himself, who sat behind him, another person over his shoulder—was real. I say that it is defelt themselves disappointed in every possible way, first by grading to the dignity of this House that we should find hon.

the manifestation of temper with which he approached the subject, and next by the weakness with which he handled his points. I am willing that his arguments shall go to the country uncontradicted. I do not think anything that has been said in this House is better calculated to strengthen our case. I do not think that any utterance which can be made on our side will be better calculated to draw the attention of the public to the strong points of this contract. I believe we only need a few more speeches like that for us to allow the question to be submitted to the country. When the proper time comes the judgment upon that hon. gentleman and his confreres will be similar to that which was given in September, 1878, a judgment for which he, in his campaign speeches, is mainly responsible, and which he has largely brought upon his party. It is notorious that that hon, gentleman, with the aid of the newspaper which published his speeches in extenso, were the main causes of the delusion by which a bright and intelligent party was so utterly wrecked, that they came back to Parliament with but, to use an expression which I quote with pleasure from the hon. leader of the Opposition, a corporal's guard.

Mr. BLAKE. I rise, not to speak on the subject of debate, but simply to express my great regret that we have heard the language which we have heard from the last speaker and the hon. the Minister of Railways. If the hon. the Minister of Railways had aught to complain of in my hon. friend's allusion, I believe he would have better served his own cause and conserved the dignity of this House and inspired us with more confidence in his repudiation of the charge, by keeping himself within the limits of parliamentary language. I think it is a very great mistake in any member, because he conceives himself to have been aggrieved to put himself in the wrong by the use of language, which the hon. gentleman did use, language which was unquestionably of the most unparliamentary character. We heard from him the words, "base," "unmanly," "lying," "slanderer," "most dishonoráble."

Mr. BOWELL. Quite true, quite true.

Mr. BLAKE. We heard from him, also a repetition, as against the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright), of the very same thing which he was so indignant at the hon. member for . Centre Huron imputing to him. Now, if it be wrong for the hon. member for Centre Huron to suggest an insinuation against the hon. gentleman, which he publicly withdraws a moment afterwards upon reading the speech in the Hansard, and accepting the hon. gentleman's explanation, is it right for the hon. Minister of Railways to make an incinuation against the hon, member for Centre Huron. The hon, Minister of Railways said that the hon. member for Centre Huron had made a sale in secret, by private bargain of £3,000,000 of bonds on the London market, and that he had never disclosed and refused to disclose the names. There was but one result of the insinuation, that there had been some personal and corrupt transaction on the part of the hon. member for Centre Huron in that matter. Now, the hon. Minister of Railways does not make his own attitude before the House or the country any better in replying to insinuations against him by making insinuations against other people. I venture to say that this House would be much more respected in the future if we abstained during the rest of this session from a repetition of the unparliamentary language which has been used this evening. I say another thing: I do not believe myself that all that outburst of indignation which the hon. gentleman—and we know he is very good at outbursts of indignation—in this case, directed against the hon. member for Centre Huron-because he believed he had an opportunity of hitting members attacking persons who are not permitted to reply, and using towards them language so grossly offensive, I must say, as that which was used by the hon. gentleman. I do not object at all to his having and expressing very keen feelings at his public conduct being assailed, but I think it will be better if we shall make an effort on both sides to maintain the dignity of this House, and preserve better feelings amongst us by abstaining, at any rate, whatever charges we may find it necessary to make in the discharge of our public duty, to one side or the other, from the use of offensive and unparliamentary language, such as proceeded from the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb), and from the hon. Minister of Railways.

Mr. BOULTREE. It is very kind of the hon member for West Durham to lecture this House on the proprieties, and I dare say it will do a great deal of good. It will, no doubt, do us a great deal of good if we follow the moderate tone with which he has just laid down the rule as our guide. It is certainly an objectionable thing to give way to abusive language. People of strong feelings and impulses, when goaded by attack, are apt to lose their sense of the dignity of their position for the time being and to say things they should not say. I would suggest to the member for West Durham, if so humble a member as myself may be allowed to give a little advice to a gentleman holding so high a position, that, if he wishes to produce the effect he says he does, if he is honest in the matter, he will exert his influence upon some of his supporters. I thought myself, while the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) was saying some very bitter things, that the member for West Durham was inspiring him. If I was mistaken, I withdraw the remark. I am very glad the hon. gentleman shakes his head in dissent, and to know that I was wrong. If the hon. gentleman is honest, however, and wishes to bring the debate to a proper state, he can do so effectively and quietly and without teaching us, on this side of the House, how to debate, if he would turn his attention earnestly and energetically, but privately, to the hon, gentleman who sits beside him. He may do a great deal of honest labor in this way and make good use of his time if he can reduce that hon, gentleman to such a shape as will induce him to rise and insult the good feeling of the House less frequently. If he succeeds in this, he will have accomplished solid good. It certainly did not look well for a gentleman holding the high position which the hon member for West Durham holds, to make the remarks we have heard about the Minister of Railways and the member for Niagara. It was not right for him censure those hon. gentlemen when they had been goaded into retaliation by the attacks of the hon. member for Centre Huron, without passing one word of censure on that hon. gentleman. It seems as if he was willing, when, from his side of the House, comes the severest language, conveying the worst kind of insults and injuries, such as go down against a man, are published and never forgotten, to tolerate it without objection. Much indulgence must be allowed men attacked on the floor of the House in base insinuations, which, if they contained a scintilla of truth, would degrade a man not only in the estimation of hon. gentlemen among whom he sits, but would condemn him in the eyes of the public as unfit for his high position. Much must be forgiven men so attacked. I think I may fairly say that, if the member for West Durham is honest in his desire to have our debates conducted properly, to prevent speakers descending to personalties which lead minds away from the true subjects of debate, he had better address his whole energies to the work of amending the habits of the hon, gentleman who sits beside him, with that worthy object.

Mr. BUNSTER. This debate is highly injurious to the Canadian Pacific Railway. I think that the Minister of ment to make any change in the regulations. I may add Mr. BLAKE.

Railways forgets that the member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) has an object in trying to injure this railway. Hence, probably, his reason for trying to gain a little advantage by riling the Minister of Railways by saying what he did. I would therefore ask the House to adjourn till such time as it comes to a better state of mind. for dealing with the Canadian Pacific Railway. This would be more in the interest of the country than to continue the debate in the present fashion. I therefore move the adjourn-

Monday, 20th December, 1880.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. GAULT introduced a Bill (No. 7) to incorporate the Wrecking and Salvage Company of Canada.

CONTRACT FOR THE MAILS FROM WINNIPEG TO ST. ALBERT.

Mr. ROYAL enquired, Whether it was the intention of the Government to enter into a new contract for the carrying of the mails from Winnipeg to St. Albert, in the North-West Territories, and if so, whether the new contractor began the execution of his contract on the 11th of October, as he was obliged to do according to the advertisement of the department on this matter?

Mr. LANGEVIN. In view of the proposed extension of the Pacific Railway in this direction, the Postmaster General entered into a contract for the space of one year only, from the first of November, 1880, for carrying the mails between Edmonton and Winnipeg, with Mr. James McLean, of Winnipeg. This contract was continued until the 31st October, on the representation of the former contractor, the Hon. James McKay.

CAPE TORMENTINE RAILWAY.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to make provision during the present Session for the construction of the Cape Tormentine Railway?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The Government have not yet decided to make provision this Session for the construction of the Cape Tormentine Railway.

THE CUTTING OF TOBACCO.

Mr. STRANGE enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to amend in any way the Excise regulations at present in force prohibiting the cutting of tobacco by retail tobacconists, and the sale thereof?

Mr. MOUSSEAU. It is not the intention of the Govern-that there are no Excise regulations that prevent the use of small lever knives for cutting tobacco, such as have been commonly used for cutting single plugs by hand. But many tobacconists, who hold no license as manufacturers, have had in their shops large cutting machines capable of cutting several hundred pounds in one day. The use of such machines is clearly a breach of the law, and, if permitted, would facilitate the cutting and sale of tobacco that had not paid duty.

REPAIRS IN THE CHAMBLY CANAL.

Mr. BENOIT enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to grant the funds necessary to effect repairs of great extent in the Chambly Canal, in order to place it in a condition to afford the facilities of transport necessary for the carrying on of a considerable trade between this country and the United States?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The question is now in the hands of the Chief Engineer of Canals, and I have awaited his report before deciding what is necessary to be done.

RESIDENT JUDGE AT RIMOUSKI.

Mr. FISET enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government, at an early date, to appoint a resident Judge at Rimouski, in the stead of the Hon. Mr. Justice Maguire, deceased?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is the intention of the Government.

LIFE-SAVING STATIONS.

Mr. KEELER enquired, Is it the intention of the Government, in view of the great loss of life by shipwreck of late, to establish any life-saving stations on Lake Ontario?

Mr. POPE (Queens). It is not the intention of the Government to establish any life-saving stations on Lake Ontario. The Government would be quite willing to supply boats at dangerous points, provided individuals or municipalities would agree to man them. Nothing of the kind is done in England.

THE PUBLIC DEBT.

Mr. CHARLTON enquired, Will the Government inform the House what is the net increase of the public debt for the fiscal year ending 30th June last?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I cannot give the hon. gentleman the exact figures, but I can state the amount within $1,000 or so. It will be found that $9,453,000 is about the amount.

DUTY ON SALT.

Mr. FARROW enquired, Is it the intention of the Government to deal with salt as they have with other manufactured products of Canada, by giving a moderate protection to salt against the large quantities of foreign salt brought into Canada yearly, always excepting that for the curing of fish?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It is not the intention of the Government to ask Parliament to change the duty on salt this Session.

MONEY ORDERS.

Mr. WHELER enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government, at an early date, to reduce the charges for money orders issued in Canada, payable in Canada, Great Britain or the United States?

Mr. LANGEVIN. Correspondence is going on; I cannot just now give a positive answer to the hon. gentleman.

STEAM COMMUNICATION BETWEEN ST. JOHN, N.B., AND ENGLAND.

Mr. WALLACE (South Norfolk), for Mr. Domville, the transportation of grain and other commodities over the enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to Intercolonial Railway, and by steamship or other vessel from place a sum of money in the Estimates to assist a line of steam communication between the Port of St. John, New Brunswick, and England.

INSOLVENT ESTATES.

Mr. WELDON enquired, Whether the Government intend to bring in any measure relating to the disposition of bankrupt or insolvent estates, or for the relief of bankrupt or insolvent persons?

Mr. McDONALD (Pietou). It is not the intention of the Government to introduce any such measure this Session.

THE POSTMASTER OF DOMINION CITY.

Mr. ROYAL enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to remove the Postmaster of Dominion City, or otherwise improve the management of the post office of that locality?

Mr. LANGEVIN. It is not the intention of the Government to remove the Postmaster of Dominion City, but arrangements have been made to improve the management of the post office there.

ADJOURNMENT FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

Mr. BLAKE. I renew the enquiry I made on Friday, and ask what arrangement the Government intend to propose to the House as the period of the adjournment, and its length?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will, on Wednesday next, move, when this House adjourns on Thursday next it shall stand adjourned until the following Tuesday at Three o'clock p.m., and that when it adjourns on Thursday, the 30th instant, it shall stand adjourned until the following Tuesday at Three o'clock p.m.

FREIGHT AND TICKETS ON THE INTERCOLONIAL.

Mr. LANDRY moved for a statement shewing, since the 1st December, 1879, and up to the 30th November, 1880, these two dates being included, and giving the names of the various stations:—1st. The number of tickets which have been sold at the several stations on the whole length of the line of the Intercolonial Railway; 2nd. The amount in tons, of freight despatched from each of the stations along the line of the Intercolonial Railway; 3rd. The number of tons delivered at each of the stations aforesaid; 4th. The amount of annual salary given to each of the station masters at the respective stations along the line of the Intercolonial Railway.

SIR CHARLES TUPPER. There is no objection to bringing down the information contained in this motion, but if the hon, gentleman would call at the department he could be very easily furnished with the means of making a comparison between the amount of work done at any station and the salaries paid to the station masters. I would ask my hon, friend to adopt that course, as the preparation of these returns would involve a good deal of trouble and expense, and, unless there is some public advantage to be gained by it, I think it is not desirable that trouble and expense should be multiplied.

Motion withdrawn.

THE PORT OF HALIFAX.

Mr. RICHEY moved for all correspondence, whether by letter or telegram, between the Department of Railways and Canals or its officers, and the owners of steamships or their agents, and others, relating to rates of freight for grain to England via Halifax, or touching in any way the question of the transportation of grain and other commodities over the Intercolonial Railway, and by steamship or other vessel from the Port of Halifax to Great Britain. He said: The object I have in view in making this motion is to elicit information regarding the efforts which have been put forth to realize the expectations of the people of Halifax with respect to the shipment of grain to England by way of that port. This is a question which has, for a long time, been of great interest to the constituency I represent, and that interest has of late been greatly intensified. I do not bring it forward as a matter of merely local concern, unless, indeed, that be a local question which affects every locality in the Dominion as regards its facilities for trade; I look upon it, not as a mere local question, but as one of great national importance, and I am sure every member of this House will feel that I am justified in this view when he recalls the speeches which were made prior to the union of these Provinces, the glowing anticipations in which the gentlemen who promoted that union indulged, the fond hopes which they raised, and I may go further and say the promises which, on that occasion, were made. glancing over the debates on the Confederation of the North American Provinces this morning, I was struck with the large extent to which the maritime element entered into the discussions of that great scheme. I will not weary the House with any long extracts, but I must turn to two or three references. On page eight of those Debates I find that the late Sir E. P. Tache, after referring to the great advantage which would result from a union of the Maritime Provinces with Canada, depicting their various resources in minerals and in fisheries, and alluding to their ship-building industry, goes on to say:

"As to their harbors, he had had the good fortune to visit them personally, and would say they could not be surpassed anywhere; in fact, he believed they were unequalled in the world. He would especially refer to that of Halifax, and would ask hon. members to imagine an extensive roadstead protected by several islands, standing out in the sea so as to break the waves and quiet the waters in the worst of storms. This most beautiful harbor could accommodate, in perfect safety, more than one hundred of the largest vessels; but this was not all, for, at the east end, where it diminishes into a gully, but with very deep water, you enter into a large natural basin, rounded, as it were, by the compass, and of an extent sufficient to take in all the navies of the world. The entrance to this magnificent inner harbor was rendered inaccessible to any foe by the fortifications erected at the mouth, and the entrance could, moreover, be so barred that no hostile fleet could ever get through. * * Well, under the union, Canada would become a partner in these advantages, and with the harbors of Halifax and Quebec, they might well feel proud of their country."

And that great statesman, Sir George E. Cartier, comprehensive in his views, formed a just estimate of the benefits which would result from a union of these Provinces. Having visited Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, he said:

"He had stated before audiences in the Lower Provinces that, as far as territory, population and wealth were concerned, Canada was stronger than any of the other Provinces, but, at the same time, was wanting in one element necessary to national greatness—the maritime one; and that, owing to the large trade and commerce of Canada, extensive communication with Great Britain, at all seasons, was absolutely necessary. Twenty years ago our commerce for the year could be managed by communication with Great Britain in the summer months only; at present, however, this system was insufficient, and, for winter communication with the sea-board, we were left to the caprice of our American neighbors, through whose territory we must pass. He had also alluded to the bonding system, which, if the Americans were to withdraw, Canada would be left in winter without any winter harbors. Canada, having two or three elements of national greatness—territory and population—wanted the maritime element; and, as he had said,—the Lower Provinces had this element and a sea-board, but not a back country or large population, which Canada possessed,—and for the mutual benefit and prosperity of all thee Provinces, all these elements ought to be united together.

Then another statesman, whose views are always received with respect, Sir Alexander Galt, first dealing with the question of how the material interests of the Provinces could be promoted by the union, proceeded to offer the following remarks on the resources of British North America:—

"Possessing, as we do, in the far western part of Canada—perhaps the most fertile wheat-growing tract on this continent,—in central and eastern Canada facilities for manufacturing such as cannot be surpassed,—Mr. RICHEY.

and in the eastern or Maritime Provinces an abundance of that most useful of all minerals, coal, as well as the most magnificent and valuable fisheries in the world, extending, as this country does, for two thousand miles, traversed by the finest navigable rivers in the world, we may well look forward to our future with hopeful anticipation of seeing the realization, not merely of what we have hitherto thought would be the commerce of Canada, great as that might become, but to the possession of Atlantic ports which we shall help to build to a position equal to that of the chief cities of the American Union."

I wish to emphasize this last statement—that the possession of Atlantic ports which we shall help to build to a position equal to that of the chief cities of the American Union. The late lamented Mr. George Brown, whose name I would mention with all honor, though differing from some of his political views, which he enforced with great power, and whose remarks upon this subject were those of a statesman, said: "As a commercial enterprise the Intercolonial Railway has not, I apprehend, any considerable merit." We have heard a good deal about that railway being run upon commercial principles, after it was built. It was not intended so much as an enterprise likely to result in revenue to the Dominion. It was regarded as a road desirable to open up inter-provincial trade, and offer facilities for the traffic of this great Dominion from its most western limit to the terminal port on the Atlantic. Mr. Brown said:

"As a commercial enterprise, the Intercolo" ial Railway has net, I apprehend, any considerable merit; as a work of defence it has, however, many advocates; but if the union of the Provinces is to go on, it is an absolute necessity; and, as the price of union, were there no other arguments in its favor, I heartily go for it. The advantage it will confer on the Maritime Provinces can hardly be overrated. It will make Halifax and St. John the Atlantic seaports of half a continent—it will ensure to Halifax, ere long, the establishment of a line of powerful steamers running in six days, from her wharves, to some near point on the west cost of Ireland—and it will bring a constant stream of passengers, and immigrants through those Lower Provinces, that never otherwise would come near them."

These are among the anticipations which were indulged in and the promises offered to the Lower Provinces. The project essential to the realization of the purpose which those statesmen contemplated was made a condition precedent to the passing of the British North America Act itself. The 145th clause recites:

"Inasmuch as the Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have joined in a declaration that the construction of the Intercolonial Railway is essential to the consolidation of the Union of British North America, and to assent thereto of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and have consequently agreed that provision should be made for its immediate construction by the Government of Canada: Therefore, in order to give an affect to that agreement, it shall be the duty of the Government and Parliament of Canada to provide for the commencement within six months after the Union, of a railway connecting the River St. Lawrence with the City of Halifax, in Nova Scotia, and for the construction thereof without intermission, and the completion thereof with all practicable speed.

It may be said that the conditions have been fulfilled in the construction of the Intercolonial Railway to the harbor of Halifax. I may here remark that the results of the construction of that railway are not such, I think, as to spread dismay among hon members regarding expenditure, or those further facilities which I propose to advocate to-day. It has, indeed, more than fulfilled the anticipations of its most sanguine promoters, and disappointed the expectations of those who indulged in lugubrious predictions in regard to When the question of the Intercolonial Railway came up, there were men who endeavored to pooh-pooh it entirely, who spoke loudly and long regarding the expenditure which it was to involve. That millions of dollars per annum would be lost upon it was asserted by men alleging the impossibility of ever making it our avenue of trade from the Upper Provinces. It was said that flour could never be carried over that railway. One gentleman spoke of the impossibility of carrying flour over it, stating that the whole value of the flour would be eaten up by the expense of carriage; and another hon. gentleman responded "Yes, all but the hoops." But what are the facts? To-day those productions are carried over it as cheaply as over any rival route, I have to acknowledge, while claiming that something still remains to be done, the great strides made towards the accomplishment of the objects we have at heart through the management of the Intercolonial by the present Minister of Railways. We have the rates for grain so established that, to-day, were the necessary terminal facilities afforded, and the necessary arrangements made with the steamers crossing the ocean, the rates would be in favor of Halifax. Grain can be carried to Halifax now, over the Intercolonial, at not more than 8c. to 9c. per quarter over the rate to Portland; and we have the authority of Sir Hugh Allan that it can be carried from Halifax by steamer, to Great Britain, at 6d. sterling, or 12c. less than from Portland. If the proposed arrangements were carried out, there would be an advantage to the shipper from Halifax of, say 3c. or 4c. a quarter. There has also been provided excellent accommodation at Halifax for the shipment of cattle. I believe there is not on the continent, to-day, a port possessing greater facilities for the shipment of cattle and produce, generally, than Halifax. A number of railroad men visited it last summer, and expressed surprise at finding those facilities to great, and complimented the General Superintendent of the railway on the complete arrangements for business that had been made. Then, we have arrangements for the speedy delivery of freight. When I asked the question the other day, regarding the transmission of goods over the Intercolonial, whether the statement in the Montreal papers, telegraphed from Quebec, that great complaints were heard there, that goods landed at Halifax a fortnight before, were still undelivered at Quebec, I certainly supposed that when Halifax was mentioned in that connection so distinctly, the detention had occurred on the Intercolonial. The question, according to the rules of the House, could not then be considered. But I take the present opportunity of referring to the fact, that that telegram created the impression that goods brought over the Intercolonial from Halifax to Quebec were detained on that road. What is the fact? So far from this being the cause, they were the goods from Poston that had not arrived in time; and we were assured that had they been transhipped over the Intercolonial, they would have reached their destination in 55 hours from the time they left Halifax, and before the steamer which brought them to that port was docked at Boston. I have also other information by telegraph, showing that this has occurred since; that in the case of goods brought to Boston and goods brought to Halifax, the goods by Halifax arrived at their destination in Quebec before the same steamer could land them in Boston. For the energy displayed in providing those facilities and ensuring this speed, I desire to make acknowledgment to the hon. Minister of Railways. Of these advantages, the western portion of the Dominion reap, as we desire they should, the benefit. But, although it may be said that, by the construction of the Intercolonial Railway as it exists, these great facilities are afforded, although the condition in the Act of Confederation is fulfilled in the letter, I have to contend here, to-day, that it has not really been fulfilled in spirit. Something still remains to be done to give us a continuous and through line of conveyance to England—a continuous line upon which shippers can, at all times, depend; and, in asking that this should be done, I am not asking for that which concerns the Maritime Provinces alone, but for that which, I conceive, concerns the western provinces perhaps still more. I am asking for that which is in perfect consistency with the National Policy that has been inaugurated in this Dominion. That National Policy does not consist solely of a Tariff; it comprehends all that will tend to the promotion of the welfare of this Dominion, all that will tend to give it a national status, and that which will create trade within our own borders and facilitate in every way both interprovincial trade and trade with foreign countries. I have reserved for this part of my statement a quotation from the speech of another eminent statesman of Canada, at the time of the debates on winter, the difficulty will have been overcome, as I think it

Confederation. I refer to Hon. Mr. Rose now Sir John Rose, who said:

"My hon. friend seems to think that the Intercolonial Railway is an undertaking of doubtful advantage, if it is not one of positive uselessness. But does my hon. friend think we can safely continue in our present position of commercial dependence on the United States? Shall we be denied access to the sea-board for a bale of goods or a bag of letters? Are we to be for all time to come dependent on the fiscal legislation of the United States? Is it to come to this, that in the winter season the Upper Canada farmer shall have no means whereby he can send a barrel of flour, or the Lower Canada merchant a bale of goods, to the sea-board, without the leave of the United States? Is my hon. friend disposed to leave us in this condition of commercial dependency for ever? • • • I do not hesitate to say that if the bonding system were done away with half the merchants in Canada would be seriously embarrassed, if not ruined for the time. In the winter season you could not send a barrel of flour to England. You could not receive a single package of goods therefrom." "My hon friend seems to think that the Intercolonial Railway is an

We have comparatively quick despatch already secured over the Intercolonial Railway; we have the rates so adjusted and arranged as to promote the object we have in view. What further then is required? We contend that all these fall short of the requirements of that trade; we contend that it is absolutely necessary there should be erected an elevator, in order to provide proper facilities for the shipment of grain at Halifax as a terminal port. It is not enough that we should have a mail winter port. The enough that we should have a man winter port. The expenditure will have been a useless one if the course which is now being pursued by the Messrs. Allan, of carrying freight beyond Halifax to the port of Boston, be continued. Preparation had been made at Halifax this winter for the reception of a large quantity of freight from these Allan steamers, and yet the first that came landed but twenty-one tons of freight. Though rates have been adjusted and facilities provided for ample shipments and quick despatch, all these will be of little avail unless we have provided also quick despatch for the grain which may be brought to Halifax to be shipped from that port. It devolves on the Government, as the owners of this railway, to provide whatever facilities are required for the shipment of produce brought over their line to be transported to another country. The railways of the United States, I believe, generally provide these facilities. I have under my hand a copy of a letter addressed to one of the merchants of Halifax, by a gentleman in Baltimore, in which he gives us an account of the manner in which these shipments are made, showing that they are taken care of entirely by the railway, brought to their depot, put into the elevator and shipped by steamer, the shipper in the West having nothing whatever to do with the tranship-ments, and knowing nothing of the cargo until it is landed at its destination in England or Germany, or wherever it may have been intended for. But, although the elevator should be erected, we shall have to go ot e step farther. There must be a stated through rate for grain and other commodities, so that the shipper may know exactly the rate which he has to pay from the place where he puts his goods on board the cars to the point of delivery. To tais end it is absolutely necessary that some arrangements should be made with a line of steamers by which rates could be constantly known and quoted. I firmly believe that when the papers are brought down, and when the delays which seem so strange to us come to be accounted for, it will be found that a great deal of the inconvenience has been occasioned by inability to find the ships to carry grain upon anything like the terms proposed by Sir Hugh Allan a year or two ago. It will be found that whilst steamers, plying regularly between Halifax and a port in Great Britain, could carry it at the low rate which has been quoted, ships cannot be obtained to carry experimental cargoes at such a rate. I have seen from correspondence with the owners of steamships, that the same rates have been demanded from Halifax as New York; but I am hopeful that, in the course of the present should have been before. I know that the Minister of Kailways has given instructions that experimental cargoes shall be provided, but I do not know what the difficulties are which have prevented that being carried out before. At this moment, we have a line of steamers constantly plying between Liverpool and Halifax—one of the best of the ocean steamship lines, one which is largely controlled by a firm of known enterprise and ability, and one which has been largely subsidized by the Government of Canada for the conveyance of the mails. Unfortunately, however, that line has made its terminal point at Boston this winter, conveying its freight past Halifax to a foreign port. This is done to the injury of the Intercolonial Railway, and the injury of the trade of the Maritime Provinces and the whole Dominion. It is a matter which should certainly engage the attention of the Minister of Railways. At present, if a merchant of Halifax wishes to send a quantity of freight by steamer to England he does not go to the agents of the line at Halifax and obtain the necessary room, but he has to communicate with the agents at Montreal, who, in turn, have to correspond with the Boston agents, contend that it is in the interests not of Halifax, but of the whole Dominion, t not only of Halifax, but of the whole Dominion, that the Intercolonial Railway should be so managed as to promote the shipping of grain by way of Halifax, and the carriage of goods for the western Provinces over that railway. It is not sufficient that we should promote the carriage of freight in one direction, we should also arrange for the carriage of return freight. Unless this is done, the cost of transmission in one direction will be very much greater than it would otherwise be; the merchandize forwarded from Great Britain to the western Provinces, should be carried over that route as well as the products of the Nova Scotia coal fields. I think it behooves us to consider whether or not the subsidy to which I have referred should not be withdrawn, or, at least, that the one year's notice, which is required, should be given, in order that arrangements might be made, either with the present line, or with some other line, to bring present line, or with some other about a verification of the pr about a verification of the predictions which I have quoted from the speeches of Mr. Brown. I do not believe that, if this course were adopted we should find it necessary to increase the subsidy which is now paid to the Allan line. On the contrary, I feel pretty certain that if the Government were to ask the owners of that line to respond to our requirements, they would make Halifax their terminal point. I believe that if the subsidy were made conditional upon the owners of the line stopping at Halifax, and, if the Government provided proper facilities, and through their properly appointed agents were to put forth their energies to induce traffic to Halifax, so that the Allan steamers would be able to receive full cargoes there, the object we have in view would be accomplished. But if the Allan line did not choose to meet our wishes in that respect, others would do it. I believe there are parties to be found even in Halifax, though the enterprise of the merchants of that city is sometimes assailed, but unjustly I think, who would establish such a line a city which has produced a Cunard with a brain power to conceive the project of an oceanic steamship line, one of the earliest and the most successful that has engaged in the Atlantic trade. I do not think, however, that that would be necessary; but that the Messrs. Allan would be found willing, themselves, to enter into the necessary arrangements. Indeed, I have heard it rumored that these gentlemen volunteered proposals to the Government not long since, by which the object in view could be fully attained. I have heard that these gentlemen were willing to make Halifax the terminal port of their line, if the railway were extended to Dartmouth, and that they themselves would provide the other necessary facilities by the acquisition of property and the erection of elevators. So Bremner, a gentleman who has taken a deep interest in Mr. RICHEY.

that, either way, whether by the action of the Government in subdizing another line of steamers, or by their continuing subsidies to the Messrs. Allan, and entering into such arrangements as those I have indicated, I believe the object we have in view can be accomplished. I think its cost need not occasion much hesitation. Indeed, I think the cost would be infinitessimal in proportion to the greatness of the work with which it is connected. If the proposals of the Messrs. Allan were accepted, it would be found, I think, that they were themselves prepared to incur an expenditure equal to that which would be required on the part of the country. If, on the other hand, the conditions should be the continuance of the present subsidy for a term of years, together with the erection of an elevator at the present railway terminus at Halifax, and energetic operations on the part of the agents of the Intercolonial to influence all the traffic in that direction, the $126,000 that are now paid would, I believe, suffice; at all events it would not need to be largely increased. What then is asked? First, the erection of an elevator in order to complete the equipment of the Intercolonial Railway, and give the full facilities which are required, with through rates established from the west to Great Britain or foreign countries. The next essential to this end is a line of steamers making Halifax their terminal port, to be attained by the use of the subsidy we are now asking for. At a very modest outlay, one which shrinks almost to nothing in the consideration of the great object to be attained, you will be able to complete the measure of your railway facilities, to consolidate our national interests, to confirm your National Policy, and to fulfill those predictions and those promises which were held out to our people by the sen, and which are now felt by them to be broken to their hope.

Mr. DALY. Before you, Mr. Speaker, put the motion which I have much pleasure in seconding, I would like to ask the attention of the House to a few very brief observations upon the subject to which it refers. For many years past the question of opening a trade in grain from Halifax has engaged the attention of the commercial people of that community. Many suggestions have been made and many schemes have been proposed for the purpose of attaining that object, but hitherto success has failed to crown such efforts. A deep interest has been felt in Halifax, and I may say in Nova Scotia at large, with regard to this question. It may be somewhat a matter for regret that this question should be obtruded upon the time of this House at a moment when its attention and the attention of the public mind is so deeply absorbed with the consideration of so vast a scheme as that which has lately been presented to us with regard to the great Canadian Pacific Railway. But it must be borne in mind that while the western part of this great Dominion is of vast proportions, and of great importance, still the older portions of the east should not be overlooked nor forgotten—I view this not as an eastern or as a sectional question, but as one of a national character. It is of such interest and importance to the Dominion that I think I may call upon all the representatives of the people, upon whichever side of the House they may be, to join with us in considering it as one worthy of their deepest concern. Possessing, as Halifax does, a magnificent harbor, second to none in the world, open and easy of access at all times of the year, it must necessarily follow that if the advantages of that harbor, and of the railroad that connects it with the great railroad system of the west, be turned to the best possible account, Halifax will assume greater commercial importance and standing than it has ever hitherto reached. Now, what is really at the present moment required is easily summarized. It has been referred to at a public meeting of the citizens of Halifax, and it has been put into very few words. I think I cannot do better than quote from the remarks of Mr.

this question, and who is practically acquainted with every branch of it. Mr. Bremner expresses what is felt in Halifax as essential to the object we have in view. His essentials are as follows:

"1st. A grain elevator, and every suitable accommodation at Richmond, or, in other words, that the equipment of the Intercolonial Railway be completed.

"2nd. That any line of steamers subsidized by Government shall have its terminus at a Dominion port.

"3rd. That for the purpose of making the Intercolonial Railway available for the object for which it was built, the Government shall arrange ane for the object for which it was built, the Government shall arrange freights with other railroad lines and steamboats, and grant through rates of freight on as favorable terms as by other routes and that they shall employ sharp business men as freight agents at the principal grain depots of the west."

The first essential, then, is one easy of accomplishment, it is the erection of an elevator. The necessity for giving every facility for every possible trade is so obvious that it needs no argument. One of the greatest boons offered to Nova Scotia, at the time of Confederation, was the construction of the Intercolonial Railway-not a road partially finished or incomplete, but a road which would draw to the waters of the port of Halifax a large portion of the products of the great and rich western country, with which we were then about to be both politically and commercially united. Some five or six years ago, it was found that the accommodation afforded by the depot at Richmond was inadequate for the increasing demands of trade, and a sum of money was generously voted by Parliament to extend the road further south into the city of Halifax. I think a mistake was made at that time—a mistake which we feel to the present day. However suitable for the purposes of passenger traffic, the present railway depot at North Street, in the city of Halifax, may be—and I do not wish to detract at all from the credit due to the hon, gentleman who caused that depot to be erected—a mistake was made in not extending the railway further into the city, and nearer to the harbor, in the neighborhood of West's Wharf, where the proper facilities might be obtained for the development of the trade I am now speaking of. Since that time, the Government has improved the shipping facilities required by the railroad at Richmond, by the erection of wharves and cattle-sheds. I said that every facility should be given for every possible trade. That the grain trade by way of Halifax is not only possible, but is likely to prove a profitable one, I think was shown very clearly by the commercial men who spoke at the meeting in Halifax to which I have referred, and also by the hon. gentleman who spoke last. But I would like to add one piece of evidence which, I think, will satisfy the House that this trade is possible and may be profitable. Take the rate for grain from Montreal to Europe as 42 cents per 100 lbs., or $2 per quarter. The portion of that amount to which the Grand Trunk would be entitled for carrying the grain from Montreal to Portland, a distance of 282 miles, would be seven-tenths, or exactly 70 cents, leaving a balance for the ship of $1.31, or 5s. 4d. sterling. Now if the rates were the same on a cargo of grain taken from Montreal to Europe via Halifax, the proportion to which the Grand Trunk would be entitled for carrying it to the Chaudiere Junction, a distance of 164 miles, would be 41 cents. The rate which the Government has fixed for carrying grain to Halifax is 30 cents; add that to the 41 cents, and you will have 71 cents, so that $1.31 would still be left for the ship, exactly the same amount as is received by a ship from Portland. The distance from Portland to Halifax being 36 hours by steam, there would be a difference in favor of Halifax to that extent. This year, Allan Bros. offered to make Halifax their terminal winter port at a considerable cost to themselves by the erection of grain elevators and wharves, if the Government would afford them the opportunity of doing so by extending the Intercolonial Railway into the town of Dartmouth. I mention this to show that there must be some ground for the hope of our being able to carry the great inducement held out to the people of Nova Scotia the winter trade through Halifax profitably, or such offer would not have been made, and also to show that there must be some ground for the belief that return cargoes could be obtained at Halifax. The successful working of the Intercolonial Railway was alluded to in the Speech from the Throne at the opening of the Session. I rejoice at the present position of that road, not so much on account of the saving that has been effected, or because the receipts counterbalance the expenditure, as because such a state of things must necessarily lead to a further reduction of rates on the railway. We must look upon the Intercolonial in its proper light as a great highway built for the express purpose of being a powerful instrument in developing the trade and resources of the country—not as a commercially profitable enterprise. In respect of its revenue, it is now doing more than its most sanguine prejectors ever anticipated; and if still lower rates should be required, in order to start a trade which eventually will prove largely remunerative, and a slight loss should result, Î still believe the railway would be only serving the express purpose for which it was built. It has been most unfairly alleged that the failure of the export trade from Halifax is largely due to the want of enterprise on the part of its commercial men. I must say, in justice to my constituents, that no such accusation can be fairly made. Let the Government do their share and supply proper facilities for the trade, and if they have not sufficient enterprise to develop this export trade, then the fault as well as the loss will be theirs. The sugar tariff has given the opportunity for refining sugar in Halifax with profit, and the result has been the opening of two refineries there. With a grain elevator I believe that the same enterprise which has been devoted to sugar refineries would be directed to the grain trade with similar satisfactory results. With regard to the mail steamers to Europe, I may say, that steamers in receipt of Government pay should enter Halifax weekly, and there land mails and but a very small portion of their freight or cargo, taking the bulk of their Canadian cargo to Boston, or any other American port, is a state of affairs that certainly ought to be remedied at once. True, the agents of this line advertise the same rate of freight from the West by both routes, but while it has been clearly proved that the freight landed at Halifax can be transported to Quebec at about the same time the steamer reaches Boston, it seems strange, indeed, that the latter route should be preferred by shippers and importers. Arrangoments could, and I believe should, be made, with a subsidised line of steamers such as would establish Halifax as a winter port. The experience of the Allan line shows this may be done, and that return freights by Halifax to Europe can be found. I believe such a trade, if opened up, would grow to very large proportions. Efforts have been made by some of our political opponents to make political capital out of this question-by men who, when in power, did little or nothing towards advancing our present object, and who, now that they are out of power, refuse to give any credit to the present Government for much that has been already done; and they now seem desirous of clamoring for impossibilities. But more could and shoul I be done in the direction I have indicated. I believe I am now pressing this question upon a friendly and well disposed Government and Parliament; and I trust that such action will be taken as will lead to the development of our trade in the interest of the country and of its great national route, and such as will satisfy the just and proper demands of the people of Nova Scotia.

Mr. FLYNN. The motion of the hon, member for Halifax is certainly one of very great importance, not only to that city, but to the whole of Nova Scotia. I understand the hon. gentleman to say that, at the time of Confederation, to enter the Union was the completion of the Intercolonial. There can be no doubt of it. The building of that road was held out to the people of Nova Scotia and of Halifax as one of the greatest boons that could be conferred upon them by the measure. The citizens of Halifax were told that the great trade of the western part of Canada would flow into that city on its way to Europe, the moment the Intercolonial Railway was constructed. That consideration induced a large majority in that city to favor that measure. But, so far, the benefits expected by that city from the railway have not been realized. While we have continued to export very large quantities of the produce of western Canada-I think the figures have increased from half a million at Confederation to something like three and a half to four millions-the whole of the produce of the Lower Provinces, taken, has scarcely increased to any appreciable extent. It is of no use for the Government to say that, in order to carry out this object, to make Halifax a winter port, freights cannot be reduced to such rates as would enable produce to be carried across the Atlantic as from American ports. I believe the great object of constructing the Intercolonial was not so much commercial success, but that it had a similar object to that of the canals of Upper Canada, constructed, to a great extent, for the opening up and development of the resources of the country. It has not realized that object. Again, what has been the policy of the present Government? They have, of course, adopted the National Policy. The cry has gone forth, Canada for the Canadians, and if that is a good cry then all they can do to foster our trade and send it by way of Halifax, and make it a winter port, should be done. If Canada is for the Canadians alone—I am not discussing whether that principle is a wise one, but it is the policy of Ministers-everything should be done to make Halifax a winter port, that the grain of the continent may by it find an outlet. It will be remembered that fault was found with the late Government that it did not use every exertion to effect that object. The hon, member for Halifax (Mr. Richey) said he hoped no political capital would be made out of this question. may say that, so far from wishing to make any political capital out of it, I have only one desire, and that is the good of the Province. Halifax being the capital of Nova Scotia, in which I have the honor to represent a constituency, and knowing that the interest of Halifax is that of all Nova Scotia, I am here advocating the interest of Halifax, because I believe it is the interest of my constituency; and it is for that reason I have no political motive in view. It was complained that the late Administration did not do enough in order to realize the original intention of the construction of the Intercolonial Railway. Now, what the people of Halifax complain of, and what others outside of Halifax complain of, is that members of the present Government made promises and pledges to the people of Halifax which have not yet been fulfilled. They made them on the eve of the General Election, and the people are yet awaiting their fulfilment. It will be recollected that a very important meeting was held in Halifax, about two years since, at which the hon. Minister of Railways was present. The meeting was held in the Temperance Hall. I think the hon. gentleman made a very lengthy and able speech. At that time the question of a winter port at Halifax was being agitated. The hon gentleman read a letter from the right hon. leader of the Government, of which I will read a portion:

to this geat object, and that they may be induced to make an extra effort for the purpose. If they do not, they will fail of their duty, and will be reminded of their failure at the next general election."

So far as the city of Halifax was concerned, the late Government failed to carry the elections, because the people believed it did not do sufficient for the people of Halifax, and was not willing to realize their expectations as to the benefits to be derived from the railway. Consequently the supporters of the late Government were defeated; but now, these hon. gentlemen, who gained their election on the strength of these promises, have failed, as the people have felt, to realize their promises. It is well known that a very large and important meeting was held in Halifax at a very recent date. That meeting was not confined to any one class of the community. It was attended alike by business men of both political parties. I do not propose entering into the question of rates, but I feel it very clearly that some extra effort should be made to increase our shipping. If a grain elevator were built at Richmond, freights could be carried across the Atlantic as cheap as from any of the American ports. We pay, I believe, $125,000 to the Messrs. Allan, and they have now made Boston a winter port. Certainly if any benefit is to come out of this Intercolonial Railway, is it not fair that the people of Nova Scotia should have a right to complain when they see a steamship line subsidized to a large amount by the people of the Dominion, and that line make a foreign port their winter port? The people of Halifax complain that the promises made them have not been fulfilled. Not three or six months have elapsed since those promises were made; they were made as far back as the spring of 1878, and now three years have nearly passed and nothing has been done. I only trust the Government will take this matter into their serious consideration, and, at all events, fulfil the terms made with Halifax on this question.

Mr. KILLAM. I do not propose to detain the House for any length of time, but I wish to call attention to one or two points that I think have been omitted in the speeches of hon, gentlemen from Halifax. The mover of the resolution referred particularly to the hopes that had been held out before Confederation to the supporters of that measure, and dwelt with some effect on the glowing promises made at that time; but he did not give so much attention to the promises made before the elections of 1878 by hon. gentlemen in the city of Halifax, when they were holding out to the citizens of that city, and the people of the Province generally, the hope that Halifax was to be made a sort of New York if they were only placed at the head of affairs again and have the management of the Intercolonial under their control. Well, considering the steady support which the hon. gentlemen from Halifax have given to the present Ministry and to the National Policy, which is still hanging upon us like a millstone, and considering the entire failure to fulfil the promises made by the Government, it is not at all surprising that these hon. gentlemen, at a meeting held in Halifax on the third of this month, should have met with the cool reception they did receive from the people of that city as compared with the enthusiastic reception accorded to the gentlemen who opposed them at the last election. I do not complain at all of the speeches of the hon. gentlemen, as far as the question laudable desire to do what they can to make Halifax a great "I have been much pleased to see the energy with which the people of Halifax have taken up the interest of their fine harbor. No effort, in my opinion, should be spared to build up an Atlantic port in the Maritime Provinces, with the trade and traffic of the Dominion, rather than a foreign one. I feel a personal interest in this matter, as being responsible, with my colleagues, for the construction of the Intercolonial Railway and its location, for which I was so heartily abused. I am, therefore, naturally anxious to see that railway a success financially and otherwise; and that can only be secured by directing, as large a volume of traffic as possible towards and over it, and thus developing and extending the trade of its great terminus at Halifax. I hope the Government will not be blind Mr. Flynn. of the use of the Intercolonial is concerned, and I applaud their to induce the Government to do whatever is reasonable and proper to make the Intercolonial Railway what it was expected to be in the first place, a great line of communication. I fancy the principal difficulty in the way of the success of the intercolonial Railway is not the length of the road or the sparse population along its extent, but the National Policy, which hon gentlemen opposite have introduced, and which is a policy not calculated to promote trade, to increase the imports and exports of the country, to promote railway industries or industries of any kind, but a Chinese wall policy calculated to shut us out of communication with all nations, to destroy shipping, divert trade from proper channels, and reduce our general pros-With respect to the Intercolonial Railway itself, the length of the road is, of course, somewhat against it, as compared with other lines leading to the sea-board of America. Taking Montreal as a central point, we have about 300 miles to Boston and 800 miles to Halifax. 500 miles is a serious obstacle in the way unless the ocean freight can be made small enough to make up the extra cost for carriage on the railway. The hon, members for Halifax, since this great meeting, seem enabled to give clearer ideas on this point, with which I perfectly agree. But I say that if the Intercolonial Railway were managed by men with the ability of those gentlemen which managed the great railway corporations leading to the principal points of shipment in the United States, Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, Boston, and Portland, there would have been something done in this shipping line long ago. These hon gentlemen should have made a strong effort to see if something could not be done to get the grain trade to go through Halifax. It might not have proved a success; but it seems to me these gentlemen have done nothing whatever in that direction. It looks rather strange to see goods for Canadian merchants in western Canada either going Star by the White Star line, or by the Allan line wa Boston, instead of by the Intercolonial. I personally have no objection to using goods which come through the United States, and I am glad to trade with our neighbors on fair terms at any time; but it must be galling to hon. gentlemen supporting the National Policy to be obliged to wear clothing, to use goods, or take anything English which has been tainted by coming through the territory of the United States in transit to the west. The question of ocean freights has a bearing upon this. Naturally, other things being equal, the trade would go through the United States; but I am inclined to think that, if the proper facilities were afforded, grain could be carried from Halifax at an average price of about 6d. sterling per quarter less. That is a matter for the Government to arrange with the same ability that is used by the railway contractors to whom I have just referred in making arrangements for through freights, and it is a matter which the Government seems to have entirely neglected. Many of the ships carrying grain from the United States, large wooden ships, return in ballast. It would be just as easy for them to get chartered at Halifax, the distance being less than from American ports, secure their grain there, and return in ballast, the question of return cargoes being, under the circumstances, not a matter of much consequence for those vessels. The rates of freight on iron to New York and Boston, 12s. to 14s. are not looked at with much favor by shipowners, who would rather their vessels came out in ballast, and make quicker passages. In this respect, therefore, Halifax, if proper facilities were afforded, would have the advantage over American ports. The hon, gentlemen from Halifax will, no doubt, get an abundance of promises from the Government. I believe it is a cardinal doctrine of a leading member of the Administration that he is a poor man, indeed, who cannot make promises; but next year these hon. gentlemen will find that nothing has been done. The proper and only Intercolonial must be run as a national enterprise, under-certain way in which they can get what they require is to taken under compensation for national purposes. I have leave the party they are now supporting, to assist in turning them from the places they occupy, and, by putting others in their places, at once secure an immediate and energetic settlement of the winter port question, and, at the same time, get rid of the so-called National Policy, which is doing so much to destroy our industries. Mr. DOMVILLE. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down certainly makes an admirable advocate of the interests of Halifax, but as he was elected to promote the interests of Yarmouth, why should he not advocate the claim of that place to be made a winter port? I wish, however, to call attention to the fact that when the late Government were in power the hon. member for Yarmouth was silent on the question of making Halifax a winter port, and when I complained of the condition of the Intercolonial Railway, I had not a word of sympathy from that hon. gentleman. In that day, though the railway was falling behind to the extent of several thousand dollars, its management, according to that hon. gentleman, was perfect; and now, when it is in splendid condition, both actually and financially, he is of opinion that there is something wrong. I have heard a story of a man who said that if he had the chance of being born again he should like to be born a Scotchman. If I had the opportunity of being born again, I think I should like very much to be born a Nova Scotian, because the people of that Province get pretty much everything they want, while we New Brunswickers are too often sent away empty-handed. You would scarcely think that there was such a Province as New Brunswick, but that the whole of the other Provinces of the Dominion existed for the purpose of ministering to the wants of that fine little peninsula, which is so brilliantly marked out in copper, brass and gold upon a map, in one of the Committee rooms of this House. Why, you have only to cut through the Baie Verte Canal and the whole little Province would be sent adrift upon the waters of the Atlantic. The hon. members for that Province say that the Intercolonial was built to send the products of the far west to Halifax. I contend that we never went into Confederation with any idea of that kind. We were told that we should engage in manufactures, alongside of Nova Scotia, and that there should be an interchange of trade between them and the Upper I maintain that when the Megantic Railway is built - and there is not a great deal of it to build now-I maintain that St. John will be the proper place for the winter port. I fully sympathize with those hon. gentlemen who complain that our trade is carried by way of Boston. I think, when a line of steamers receives a subsidy from the Government, they should be compelled to carry their freight from a Canadian port, and if they refuse to do so, the subsidy should be given to a company who will meet our wishes in that respect. My hon. friend, the member for Yarmouth, speaks of the Intercolonial Railway in a tone of derision. We all know that that road is now doing well. Those who travelled with me over that line on our way to Ottawa, will agree with me when I say that we found its condition as nearly perfect as possible, the road-bed being as smooth as a billiard table, whether from the frost being in the ground or from the recent improvements made upon the road by the Minister of Railways, I cannot say. I do know, howexcellent condition ever, that its subject of general remark by members of both sides of politics, the motion of the cars being so smooth as to be almost imperceptible. At the same time, I wish to say to the Government that I do not think they should ever regard the Intercolonial as a purely commercial enterprise— a mere means of making profit. While we are building railways in the North-West which will, in all probability, cost large sums of money, we should bear in mind that the Intercolonial must be run as a national enterprise, under-confidence that the Government, whom I have supported strength as time goes on. There are circumstances in for a long time, and whom I hope to support for some time longer, will do what is right in preserving our interests in this matter, even if the results should not in every case meet our most sanguine wishes. But I wish to impress upon them the advantages of St. John as a winter portadvantages which I could paint in colors equally glowing with those which have been applied to Halifax by the member for that city, were I possessed of his eloquence. We have no ice across the river, and we have a generous tide to carry vessels in and out of the harbor. I hope that, while the Government are forming schemes to bring the wheat and cattle of the west, from Yale to Kamloops, from Kamloops across the prairies to Winnipeg, and thence by Montreal to the sea-board they will not forget the interests of St. John as being the nearest point at which to reach the Atlantic ocean, by Canadian territory. While I do not blame the members for Halifax for seeking to enhance the interests of their city, I must urge the Government to deal fairly by St. John, and as that city is the nearest point at which the commerce of the west can be put upon the ocean steamships, I think it is entitled to be made the winter port. I hope that the Ministry will look into this matter and not ignore St. John entirely, because it seems to me that between the upper stone and the nether stone we are going to get crushed. Mr. BOULTBEE. I do not know sufficiently of this question to treat it as well as it has been treated, but I cannot help feeling that many of the arguments put forward are correct. The object, as I understand it, of building the Intercolonial Railway, was not only the development of an intercolonial trade, but also to enable us to trade with ourselves through our own country entirely. If anything can be done by the Government by which our own trade with St. John or Halifax might be legitimately extended, I think it would be well, and I believe that we, in Ontario, would be willing to bear our share of any burden that might attach to us in giving any proper development to the trade which finds its issue through those ports. I wish I understood this matter a little better so as to be able to discuss it more intelligently. No doubt the hon. gentlemen from Richmond, Nova Scotia (Mr. Flynn), and Yarmouth (Mr. Killam), understand it much better than I do, but the trouble is that I do not know whether the present Government have been more favorable to that project or the late Government. The hon member for Yarmouth, who is a nautical man, and thoroughly understands these things, seems to think that the only way of getting this measure is for members on the Ministerial side of the House to turn against the Government and lend their adversaries a hand. Well, if those hon. gentlemen are more favorable to opening up those ports, and if that was a matter so absorbingly important to do it to the exclusion of all other considerations, then, of course, a few members on this side of the House would not mind voting with them to bring about such a desirable change. Unfortunately, the hon member for Yarmouth, in urging gentlemen to vote against the present Government, gave as a reason that these gentlemen are lying in wait to destroy the National Policy. If such a defection did take place, even for so great an object as opening up Halifax and St. John, we might, in the end, place those gentlemen in power and succeed in upsetting the National Policy. Then, again, we have got to give very careful consideration, whether a set of gentlemen, who deliberately set at any other the opinion of a yest resistant. deliberately set at naught the opinion of a vast majority of people, are possessed of sufficient judgment to deal with even such a question as the opening up of Halifax and St. John; because those gentlemen who have been so desirous power of this connection with the tenure of Government. There have been many bye-elections since they came into power, but instead of losing power as is usually the case as the years go rolling on, they have steadily gained, so that the Government is now numerically stronger in this House than it was when the present Parliament was elected. For these reasons, I think that, with all deference to the hon. member for Yarmouth, we would have, even in a matter like this, to stick to the Government, even though they are not as favorable to opening these ports as the Opposition. The hon, member from Richmond fairly characterized this Government as desirous of having Canada for the Canadians, but he seemed to express a doubt as to whether that was a wise policy, while he admitted that it is the policy of the present Government. For that reason, then, because they wish to have Canada for Canadians, because they wish to foster and carry out this National Policy, which is adding to our wealth and comfort and business position, I think we must, despite the alluring inducement offered by the hon. member for Yarmouth, stick to the Government still.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne). We have an illustration in the debate to-day of the good that public meetings in constituencies occasionally do. For the past two Sessions the hon. members for Halifax sat in this House, and this is the first occasion on which the winter port question has been brought under the consideration of this Parliament. They are driven to it by the action of their constituents at the public meeting held there only a few weeks since. At that meeting expressions of disapprobation at the course of the Government were publicly made by men who had, for many years, been identified with the Conservative party. As I listened to-night to the hon, member for Halifax, I thought that, in one particular at least I had been disappointed. I had always thought, until now, that the members of the Government, judging from their published statements, were friendly to this project, that they took a deep interest in it. The letter which was referred to, written to the present Minister of Railways, on the 9th of June, 1878, by the present Prime Minister, contained the following remark :-

"I would have liked to have had the opportunity of discussing the burning questions' of the day, and especially those affecting the trade and commerce of the Maritime Provinces."

For nearly two years these hon, gentlemen have sat on the Treasury benches, and not one promise made prior to the election by the present Minister of Railways, or by the members for Halifax, or by the organs that represent them in that city, has been fulfilled by the Government. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Daly) was the first to introduce politics into this question. He wanted to have a slap at the Mackenzie Government, on account of the location of the depot at Halifax. I believe that throughout Nova Scotia, the people have placed this question above politics, and for this reason: the representatives from that Province should unite in urging upon the Government the importance of taking such measures as will make Halifax the winter port of the Dominion. As was stated by the hon, member for Halifax (Mr. Richey) prior to Confederation, the promise was made, that after the union of the Provinces, the Intercolonial Railway would be built, and that Halifax should be the terminus of that road for all the trade the terminus of that road for all the trade from the west, and that Halifax should be built up and become a great city. The promise was made that ere this time the population of that city should be doubled and tripled. But what is the fact? The population is hardly as large as it was prior to Confederation. The Intercolonial has not in any way proved the benefit to Halifax that was promised; latterly of having appeals to the people, through petition or otherwise, are deliberately setting at indeed, the Intercolonial is of more benefit to Toronto, Montuter defiance the clearly expressed opinion of a vast real and Quebec than it is to Halifax, for it places to present the control of the control majority of the people, an opinion that keeps gathering merchants of those three cities in ready access to one million of consumers in the Maritime Provinces. This matter has been thoroughly discussed in the press of the country and at annual meetings of the Board of Trade for many years past. I will refer, for a moment, to a speech delivered by Mr. Dwyer, of Halifax, a gentleman occupying a high position in commercial circles in that city. The speech was delivered at the annual meeting of the Board of Trade, held in that city in January, 1878, and these were some of the reasons he gave for directing the attention of commercial men to the importance of Halifax as a winter port. He says:

"To show you that the road is worthy of your attention, worthy of all the favors you can bestow upon it, you will pardon me if I take up a few moments of your time in describing its usefulness. As your old winter mail route, to and from the Atlantic ocean, or to and from Europe, it has been referred to in terms of much approbation by your President in his opening address. For the conveyance of passengers from Europe or elsewhere who may land at Halifax, it is a safe and pleasant route, and it will not be the fault of the Intercolonial Railroad if they do not arrive at their homes with promptitude and comfort and perhaps a saving of their homes with promptitude and comfort and perhaps a saving of valuable time. As a carrier or distributor of your produce and manufactures to your maritime customers, either in summer or winter, the railroad is very far in advance of former routes, for rapid delivery and for the fine condition in which goods are delivered. This fact alone is increasing our trade with you by diverting a portion of that which has always existed between us and the United States, and for certain manufactured goods which formerly came from Great Britain."

From a return that was laid on the Table of the House last year, we find that the late Premier agreed to carry two cargoes of grain at 30 cents a quarter or $15 a car load of twelve tons, which met with no response from the shippers of the west. When the present Government came into power the rate was very slightly reduced, the present Minister of Railways offering to carry grain at 26 cents a quarter, or $13 a car load of the same weight, 12 tons. The Engineer of the Intercolonial Railway, Mr. Schrieber, stated that if return freight could be secured at 90 cents a ton, grain could be carried at 13 cents a quarter, or 63 cents a ton, without loss. If that rate were adopted on the Intercolonial I believe the grain trade of the west would be diverted to Halifax, and goods coming from Europe to the Dominion of Canada would find their way through Halifax and over the Intercolonial to the west. This matter is of the greatest importance to the people of the Maritime Provinces, and to the people of Nova Scotia and Halifax especially, and I believe that if the Government would erect a grain elevator at Richmond, and subsidize a line of steamers, making Halifax their terminal port, the expectations of the people of that city would be realized. We are told that a good deal has been done already for that city, and that the merchants should exert themselves; but I contend that Halifax has not received as much from the Government as Montreal or Quebec, which have been directly benefitted by the subsidies which have been given to western railways, the erection of canals, and the improvement of the navigation of the St. Lawrence, not only at a great original expense, but a large annual cost to the revenue. It is only within recent years that Halifax received a depot worthy of the name from the Government, and that was given, not by this Government, but by their predecessors. As a representative of Nova Scotia, I join with the members for Halifax, in urging the claims of that city upon the Government, and I hope we shall see some practical benefits arising from this agitation.

Mr. OGDEN. I think the members from Halifax and from Nova Scotia, generally, have been moderate in their request that the Government should erect an elevator at Halifax, and that freight rates should be so reduced that grain from the West could be carried over the Intercolonial, as Halifax is at present the most available winter port. I also regret the merchants of Halifax have not displayed more energy and enterprise in building up the trade of their own city. The hon. the honor to support the present Government to go over to the | very deepest possible personal interest in the success of man how his late leader acted last Session when the members from Nova Scotia made a claim for their share of the Fishery Award. I think our interests are quite as safe in the hands of the present Government as they would be in the hands of the Opposition. But I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that there is another, and a much better port than that of Halifax, which is 115 miles east of Halifax by water, and which can be connected with the Intercolonial by the construction of a road about forty miles long. I refer to the harbor of Whitehaven. Admiral Owen, who was sent out by the British Government, says in his report:

"Whitehaven is a most splendid and commodious port, at the nearest available point of North America to England, its natural facilities greatly exceeding those of Halifax or any other point upon the coast. The nature of the coast and entrances preclude the possibility of packed or drift ice accumulating, so that the ingress and egress are always free and open. In case of fog the attainment of Halifax harbor requires twenty miles of pilotage navigation; for Whitehaven, never more than three or four."

This port is 115 miles nearer Europe than Halifax, and can be connected with the Intercolonial Railway by the construction of a road forty miles long, which would give us a route to the sea-board, eighty miles shorter than is provided by way of Halifax. I, therefore, make a claim that, White-haven be made the winter port of the Dominion. I do not ask that it be done immediately, but, I think the Government should survey a line, tapping the Eastern Extension Railway, which is now completed, then afterwards build a road, say from Moncton to Whitehaven, running through the county of Pictou, represented by the hon. the Minister of Justice, and through Cumberland, represented by the hon. the Minister of Railways. who, I think, must be favorable to this scheme. When that is done, and the Megantic Railway is built, the distance to Whitehaven will be reduced very materially. This route will be something like 500 miles by rail and 100 miles by water shorter than the present route to Halifax. It should have been built long ago. I am surprised that the late Administration did not leave such a legacy when they went out of power as even a promise that an elevator should be erected. I do not wish to raise any sectional cry as against Yarmouth or St. John. Complete the Intercolonial by erecting an elevator, and then place in the Estimates of this Session a sufficient sum to survey this railway, which will ultimately make Whitehaven the winter port. We will not ask you to buy cargoes of grain or to speculate for us. We have enterprising men who will do this themselves, and strive to make this one of the largest and most prosperous towns in the Dominion.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair. AFTER RECESS.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This question is one of very great importance, but I think it would be better to postpone a full discussion of it till the papers asked for are before the House. It is quite impossible for hon. gentlemen on either side of the House-I think I may say on this question there is only one side—to discuss it properly without the papers detailing the various steps taken in reference to this measure. There is probably no gentleman in the House who does not fully realize the great importance to Canada of having a winter port within our own Dominion, and of making every reasonable effort to realize all that is possible in this direction. I am quite certain that any measure the Government can propose with that object will meet with the hearty support of hon. gentlemen on all sides. It is true that the experiments that have been made so far have not been so successful as might have been anticipated. Not only as Minister of Railways, member for Yarmouth (Mr. Killam) advised those who have but as a representative of Nova Scotia, I feel the Opposition, who, he said, would do more to advance the this enterprise—the obtainment of a winter port within the interests of Nova Scotia. I would like to ask the hon. gentle- Dominion; and, as Minister of Railways, anything that can increase the traffic over that line and its receipts must commend itself to me as worthy of the fullest and most attentive consideration of the Government. There is, however, a great difficulty, which was encountered by the late, as it has been by the present, Government—that Halifax, the natural outlet and trans-Atlantic port of the Dominion, has to contend with an open American Atlantic port which can be reached by a very much shorter journey by rail. All that could be done, by placing the Intercolonial in first-class condition, has been done by this Parliament. They not only provided for a first-class line from Truro to Rivière du Loup, but generously voted money to purchase the Rivière du Loup section of 127 miles, relay it with steel rails. and make it a first-rate road, so as not only to save time. but to reduce the cost of transit and freight coming into and leaving the country, to a minimum. The Government, also, have considered whether it was not possible to reduce the cost of the carriage of grain very much lower than it was under their predecessors. This being a national question, we felt it was not necessary that the rate should be a paying one—that even if grain was carried at some loss, we still should be warranted in incurring a certain amount of loss, if we could thus make Halifax a winter port, and draw return traffic over the line, that would yield paying rates. Under this impression, the very lowest rate we considered possible was fixed, in the hope that it would induce the trade to send their grain over the Intercolonial to Halifax. Every person connected with the trade, frankly admitted that the rate was as low as it was possible to ask, as seemed necessary to accomplish the object. True, we did not ask Parliament for an appropriation for the construction of an elevator at Halifax. Of course, we quite understand you cannot ship grain with the facility and cheapness necessary for successful competition with other ports, unless you have an elevator. But there are two reasons why Parliament has not been asked for an appropriation for an elevator at that port. In the first place, we were in hopes that, having fixed a low rate for the transit of grain, private capitalists would take up the business of shipping grain, provide the necessary storage and means of cheap and easy shipment. One reason was, we thought it right at first, to see how far private enterprise would supply what was required; and, in the second place we wished to satisfy ourselves, in case private enterprise did not supply the want, whether, provided there were an elevator, the cheapness of handling grain and other facilities obtained, would be sufficient to accomplish the object of Parliament. We have been exhausting the means of satisfying ourselves whether, by the construction of an elevator, we could make Halifax our outport for the shipment of grain in winter as a preliminary to asking that supply from Parliament, which, I am quite sure, it is entirely ready to give, to any measure promising the accomplishment of so desirable an object. I am not at all surprised that the people of Halifax should feel disposed to come together, irrespective of party, to press in the strongest possible way this question on Parliament. But it is not a Halifax question alone, Ontario and every part of the Dominion is equally interested in obtaining, if possible, a winter port in Canada, capable of doing as cheaply and efficiently the business of the country as a foreign port. I am quite sure, therefore, that every hon. gentleman will give the question his carnest consideration. I am glad to see the spirit in which the member for Richmond (Mr. Flynn), approached it, and to hear the assurance that he will be quite prepared to deal with it irrespective of party considerations. The member for Yarmouth (Mr. Killam) said some things with which I quite agree, and some from which I dissent. He said the reason why we have not succeeded in making Halifax a winter port was, that the Government were not able to deal with this question in the vigorous and enterprising commer-Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

cial spirit which could be exhibited by a private company. I hope that in the consideration of a still larger question than this, the hon. gentleman will appreciate the fact that a private company will be able, not only to construct, but operate the railway more efficiently and more in accordance with commercial principles than is possible to any Government. I have no hesitation in saying, from some experience of my own, and from the consideration I was able to give this question during the existence of the late Government, that it is not possible for a Government to engage in such enterprises with advantage. They cannot become great speculators and merchants as railway companies can, purchasing large cargoes of grain and other things with a view to getting business. There are a great many ways in which it is quite possible for a private company, I believe, to deal more energetically and more successfully with such a measure than it is possible for a Government to de. Well, I agree with the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Killam) on the question that a vigorous private company would be able to accomplish more in establishing a winter port, that a steamship and railway company combined would probably accomplish a great deal more, than could be done by a Government. There is another subject, on which I am not prepared to agree with him, and that is that the National Policy has been a difficulty in the way. I am at a loss to know from what statistics that hon, gentleman has formed his opinion that the Intercolonial Railway, or the traffic of the Intercolonial Railway, has suffered from the introduction of the National Policy. I would like the hon, gentleman to compare the returns of traffic at every way-station and at every terminal station, and at any point on the entire line, from end to end, with the receipts for traffic and the business done before the introduction of the National Policy; and I do not think he will find any reason to bring him to the conclusion that the National Policy has in any way interfered with making Halifax a winter outport of Canada. The papers laid on the Table to-day have some bearing on the subject, and that bearing is very much at variance with the conclusion at which the hon. member has arrived. The paper laid on the Table to day shows that the National Policy, due directly to the present Tariff imposed in accordance with the National Policy, has had the result of raising the amount of sugar carried over the Intercolonial Railway from 7,809,364 lbs. in 1878, to 16,071,316 lbs. in 1879. I think the hon. gentleman will hardly find that the National Policy is interfering with making Halifax a winter outport, in giving new vitality to the West India trade. A great deal has been accomplished in the way of drawing traffic over the Intercolonial from every possible source, and on making the magnificent harbor of Halifax the entrépot for the West India trade as well as an outport for ocean traffic from this Dominion during the winter. I may tell the hon gentleman that the papers laid on the Table of the House to-day, show that, during the three months of 1880, 8.181,380 pounds of sugar were carried over that road more than in the whole year of 1878, which will show that the facts bearing upon this question go to establish an entirely different view from that which the hon, gentleman has given. As I said before, the hon, gentleman stated some things with which I heartily agree, and I have explained them to the House. He has also taken this ground, in which I do not concur, and he closed, I think, with some advice to my hon. friends from the county of Halifax, with reference to which I tell him frankly he is better qualified to give advice than I am. He says these gentlemen having been sent here to support this Administration, having given a hearty support to this Administration, should lie in wait for an opportunity when the Government would be engaged in some great measure, and throw their weight into the scale by going from one party to the other, and see how much they will obtain for their constituents. The hon gentleman is a better judge of the wisdom of that line of action than I am. I have had no experience in that sort of thing, and I must leave my hon. friends from Halifax to take the advice or not as they think it wise or not. It is certainly an advice which the hon, gentleman has fortified by his example. He says, however, that my hon. friends from Halifax are not so popular as they were—that there is a good deal of anxiety amongst them. I can only say that, while I believe all parties in the city of Halifax are alike anxious to have this important question satisfactorily settled, and anxious to strengthen the hands, in every way possible, of their representatives here, I do not gather, from the careful consideration I gave the question, anything that would warrant the hon, gentleman in arriving at the conclusion that their constituents were at all uneasy, or that they had given them any reason to suppose they did not consider it fortunate that at present they were represented as they are in the House. When these papers are brought down, and the Estimates subsequently submitted to the House, there will be an opportunity of dealing with this question in all its bearings, and I am quite certain every hon. gentleman will be prepared to give his hearty support, to any measures the Government may submit that will have so desirable an end as the securing of a winter port in Canada. The hon, member for Guysborough (Mr. Ogden) has brought a competitor into the field. He is only discharging his duty to his constituents and the members of this House in taking the opportunity of reminding the House that there was another and a very important port, that might, at no distant day, become a winter outport for Canada. I have no doubt at all that, when this great national line of communication is completed, as it will be, in a few years, from the Pacific to the Atlantic, the attention of the country will be attracted with great force to the question as to how the distance may be shortened between the old world and the new, what means may be adopted to shorten the distance, and whether by the construction of a comparatively short line of railway, the harbor of Whitehaven which, as that hon, gentleman has told us, was reported favorably on by Admiral Owen, when sent by the Imperial Government for the purpose, will attract the attention it has hitherto received. There is also the hardor of Louisburg to be considered. The time is not remote when the attention of Parliament and the public will be strongly drawn to the means by which we can bring more closely together, than by any existing means, communication between the most remote part of the Dominion and Europe. In the meantime, I do trust, and I may say I am still hopeful, that the means that can be adopted will have the effect of securing the accomplishment of so important an object as the making of Halifax a winter port of Canada. The statement which I was able to submit to the House a few days ago, as to the manner in which the Intercolonial Railway had been enabled to meet the efforts that had been made to bring the traffic of Quebec, Montreal and Toronto, the greater saving in time there was in placing the freight aboard at Halifax rather than Boston, will give us still greater encouragement to use all our efforts for the purpose of securing the transmission of Canadian trade over the Intercolonial Railway. When we are considering the Estimates, by which time the papers will be on the Table, there will be the fullest opportunity for discussing this important subject in all its bearings.

Mr. ANGLIN. The Minister of Railways and other speakers have laid down principles on the discussion of this question, from which, I for one, must dissent. The Minister takes it for granted that the only port which can possibly be the outlet of the winter trade of the Dominion in the near future, must be the port of Halifax. I would gladly render any assistance in my power to the city of Halifax in its endeavor to obtain that share of the trade of the Dominion, winter and summer, to which it is fairly entitled, by reason of its being one of our principal ports, as well as by its peculiar position on the Atlantic. But that is not the only city to which it was promised before Confederation that a large tide of commerce would flow to it, and through it, after the Provinces were united. We, in St. John, were told in language just as glowing, and promises quite as brilliant were held out to us, that the flour and the pork, and the butter, and the cheese and all the other productions of the Upper Provinces of Canada and the great North-West would pour down to our city; that storehouses and elevators would be built at our harbor, that the city would resound with the busy hum of those engaged in sending to Europe the principal productions of the Upper Provinces, and forwarding to those Provinces the goods imported from the outer world. We have a right to claim that those promises shall be fulfilled. True, these promises were not very distinctly reiterated immediately before the last General Elections; other modes were found of addressing the electors and inducing them to prefer those who were out of office to those who were in; but the oldstanding promises have not yet been fulfilled, and they are peculiarly binding upon the Government who are now in power, because they were made by hon. gentle-men who are now on the Treasury benches. peculiar advantages, While Halifax has benefits of which it is fairly entitled-while standing, as it does, on our Atlantic front, it ought to be made, as it has been made, a port from which the mails should be sent to, and received from Europe and the West Indies—we, in St. John, too, have advantages for carrying on a large trans-Atlantic trade. We could supply cargoes for shipment which Halifax could not supply, and, owing to the great decadence of the trade of our port, it is absolutely necessary for the prosperity of the city, that something should be done by some competent power to establish a regular line of steamers between St. John and some port or ports in Great Britain. I believe that application will shortly be made to the Government, by the City Council, the Board of Trade, and other bodies in St. John, for assistance for such a line, perhaps not at present a weekly but a monthly line, connecting St. John with some British port or ports. The hon. Minister of Railways is mistaken, I think, in supposing that he can, by such an experiment as has been proposed, ascertain whether it is possible to send grain profitably from the upper country by way of the port of Halifax. That can be ascertained as well without making such an experiment. It is an easy matter to ascertain at what rates large quantities of grain can be carried to the terminus of the Intercolonial, at the Chaudiere, how much the carriage of grain from that point to Halifax will cost, how much it will cost to put it on board ship, and I submit that it is scarcely necessary to build elevators in order to ascertain the cost of loading grain, as these rates are perfectly well known. Every item of the cost of such a traffic, supposing vessels could be permanently and largely employed in the trade, are ascertainable without making the experiment which has been spoken of. I believe a large number of Halifax merchants, not long ago, repudiated, in very strong terms, the proposal to make such an experiment, as they felt that if the experiment were made the result would be to afford the Government an excuse for not going any further, or, to use a form of expression, which would, perhaps, be preferred by those more friendly to the Government, the experiment would satisfy the Government that the trade could not profitably be carried on. The other experiment of permanently making Halifax or St. John the terminal port of a line of steamers the only one which would fairly test their respective advantages as a winter outlet. I know that for some time back it has been almost impossible for persons desirous of Steamers whether such produce could be shipped or not. The export trade of Halifax has been made entirely dependent upon the trade from the terminal port from which the steamers start which touch at Halifax, so that the trade from that port could not possibly be fairly developed. One of the advantages possessed by Halifax, is that it ought to be the port of outlet and inlet for the mails during the winter, at least; but anything which is paid beyond the sum, which would be a fair equivalent for the conveyance of the mails, must be held to be paid in the carrying out of the policy of protection. Protection works in two ways. Men are compelled to purchase articles of domestic manufacture which they may not care to buy, by means of imposing a high duty upon similar articles imported into the country. The other way in which it works is, by the system of bounties, and, taking it all in all, the latter is the more honest system of the two. If we in the Lower Provinces are hereafter to be content that the farmers of Ontario shall be protected by having a duty of some 15 cents a bushel imposed upon all wheat that may be imported into the country, and corresponding duties imposed upon the oats and barley imported, and we are compelled to pay a higher price for our flour in the Lower Provinces, as is said, for the benefit of the tarmers of Ontario, then, if the farmers of Ontario believe that they are Provinces, as is said, for the benefit of the tarmers of Ontario, then, if the farmers of Ontario believe that they are protected to that extent, they should not complain if have seen nothing done. The hon Minister of Railways, they, in return, are called upon to pay out of the Treasury a sum sufficient to afford protection to the business of Halifax and St. John as ports and harbors of this Dominion, and if they are to be compelled to send all their products to the world outside, and compelled to receive, through those ports, all the products of the rest of the world which they may require. The hon, the Minister of Railways has spoken of sugar. Why has the import of sugar to Halifax increased? Put in pounds it seems a very enormous increase; put in tons it does not seem remarkable. I looked at the papers sometime ago and found that before this National Policy came into operation, Halifax imported nearly 4,000 tons of sugar during the year, while during the year 1879 she imported a little over 8,000 tons. The quantity was not quite double the former quantity, but it was imported at an enormous cost to the general public. If it be right to force this Dominion to receive its sugar through Halifax alone in the winter season, surely there can be nothing wrong in compelling it to receive its other merchandize through the ports of Halifax and St. John.: surely there can be nothing wrong in compelling the Dominion to send its products to those ports by so cheapening the exportation as to render it to the interest of the other Provinces to use those ports. If this Protectionist system is to continue in operation, it must not be a partial system as it is to-day. It is not only the cotton lords of this Dominion who must derive benefit from it and the owners of weeller mills and other lorge. from it, and the owners of woollen mills and other large factories; but the other interests of this Dominion must get some benefit from it, although it would be exceedingly difficult indeed to discover any mode of rendering material service to the great lumber and fishing interest. But, here is a case in which very material service indeed can be rendered to a very important interest, the commercial interest of Halifax and St. John, or of any other ports on the Canadian sea-board which may show a disposition to compete for this trade. Now, I think it is fair to enunciate these principles as those which I hold with regard to this matter. The hon. member for Halifax, I think, rather indiscreetly made an attack upon the Mackenzie Government, alleging that they had done very little to promote the interest of the port of Halifax. All that has been done from the time we entered into the Confederation up to the present moment, to promote the interest of Halifax, and to make it the winter port of Canada, was done by the late Administration—racinc Manway Syndicate have retained almost a monopoly of building branch railways south of their line, there is no restriction whatever on the building of railways on the north side of it; and the scheme Mr. Anglin.

everything. For years and years the gentlemen opposite strove, I believe, rather earnestly to get the railroad extended into the city of Halifax, but for some reason they failed. The Mackenzie Administration did extend the railroad very far in toward the city of Halifax—as far as they could well reach—and erected there a magnificent railway station at the public cost. The hon, gentleman complains that they did not go further, and extend that railroad down to the wharves. We know they were making earnest efforts to extend the railroad down to the wharves; the hon. gentleman knows that the Mackenzie Administration compelled the Allan line of steamers to land their mails at the city of Halifax, and so convert it to a certain extent into a winter port. He knows, too, that when application was made to the Mackenzie Administration, with regard to the grain trade. that Administration made what seemed then to be a very liberal offer indeed, as to the rate of grain freights, and I think the Administration offered to send two full cargoes of grain over the road to ascertain whether the trade would bear the cost or not. No doubt, for a revenuetariff-Government all that was going very far; and I have no doubt, that had the Mackenzie Administration remained in power, they would have continued to make all reasonable efforts to confer upon Halifax the benefits to which it ought I think, proposed to reduce, somewhat, the rate which Mr. Mackenzie, in his time, proposed to charge on grain transmitted over the Intercolonial. That, however, was but a trifling reduction, and it has not led to any practical result. To-day we stand face to face with the fact, that, although this Intercolonial is a magnificent railroad magnificent because so thoroughly constructed—that, although it is almost the shortest route from the Upper Provinces to the city of Halifax, that, although it does a very large trade in conveying goods from the Upper Provinces down to the Lower Provinces and to the city of Halifax, it does very little, indeed, in carrying back anything produced in the Lower Provinces, and it has ceased to do much in conveying from Halifax any portion of the merchandize imported from Europe. These facts are disagreeable facts. They are facts with which the Government, I think, is bound to deal, not languidly or remissly, but actively and earnestly. I do think the Government which professes to protect all the struggling industries of this country should also endeavor to protect the industries of the Lower Provinces, which have almost ceased to struggle because they have almost ceased to have the strength to struggle any longer.

Mr. ROYAL. It may appear somewhat strange for a member coming from a prairie province to take part in a debate which seems to affect only the Maritime Provinces. It is true we have no maritime ports in the North-West, but I believe the day is not distant when Manitoba, enlarged, may become a maritime province. A very important fact was lost sight of when mention was made of the carrying trade between Canada and Europe. I believe that, with due deference to the members from the Maritime Provinces who have enumerated the old ports of Halifax and Yarmouth, and, I might add, Louisburg—I think we can do a little better by the establishment of a port in Hudson's Bay. As my opinion on this subject might not go very far, I will with your permission, read an extract from Professor Hines on this subject. When the discussion on this important subject takes place in this House, and when these papers are brought down, I hope the House will not lose sight of the future importance of utilizing the relations between the Hudson Bay and the ports of Europe. In fact, while the Pacific Railway Syndicate have retained almost a of the navigation of Hudson's Bay may furnish an escape for the people of the North-West from any monopoly that may be organized under this contract. My experience and the experience of every member from the Prairie Province is, that Canada has been year by year discovering the North-West. Ten years ago it would have been impossible to convince any assembly in this country that there were 250,000,000 acres of fertile land in the North-West Territory; and it may be that the importance of the navigation of Hudson's Bay will be equally slow in impressing itself upon the public mind. Professor Hines, in a letter to the Surveyor General, of the 22nd March, 1878,

"During the past few years my views on the subject have undergone a progressive change, all tending towards confirming the opinion of the adoption ultimately of the Hudson Bay Route as a great commercial highway between Central British America and Europe. The facts which have led to this decided opinion are briefly as follows:—

"1st. The general and successful employment of large steamers properly constructed for ice encounter, by the Newfoundland, British and Norwegian sealers. The safety of these vessels, and the experience acquired in the management of a steamer in ice-encumbered seas.

"2nd. The present cheapness and easy management on board a steamer of the magneto-electric light, for use on such steamers, and for temporary powerful lighthouse purposes.

"3rd. The alleged discovery, on high authority, of Lignite coal over wide areas, from Cape Walsingham to Frobisher Bay, just north of Hudson Straits, as well as on the West Greenland coast.

Hudson Straits, as well as on the West Greenland coast.

"4th. The better knowledge now possessed of the proper mode and time for navigating Davis Straits in approaching Hudson Straits.

"5th. The great fishing resources of Davis Straits in and towards Frobisher Bay.

"6th. The sources of the ice drift on the Labrador coast, its course in Hudson Straits, and the mode of avoiding it in summer and autumn, or crossing it where it is narrowest.

"7th. From all I have gathered respecting the navigation of Hudson Straits and its approaches from the east, there appears to be no difficulty

Straits and its approaches from the east, there appears to be no difficulty in navigating them from July to October with a sealing steamer, especially if provided with a magneto-electric light for use in September and October.

"When we consider that York Factory is actually nearer to Liverpool "When we consider that York Factory is actually nearer to Liverpool than New York, it surely becomes a question of the greatest moment to determine how far existing information would warrant minute enquiry into this very important subject. As the result of a prolonged but desultory study of the question, I have no doubt that continuous and safe navigation by steamers constructed as sealing steamers are, can be carried on between Port Nelson and Liverpool for at least four months in the result is from Liverpool to Liverpool are in leaving three possible or year—that is from Liverpool to Liverpool again, leaving three months or perhaps a little more for Hudson Bay."

My object in making these few remarks, is to bring to the attention of the Government, the probable large part in the development of the North-West, which is likely to be performed by the navigation of Hudson's Bay.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It is very inconvenient to enter into a discussion of questions bearing upon the Tariff, or of the subject now immediately under the consideration of the House, in the absence of the papers asked for, and the returns that will be submitted to Parliament, before we take up the question of the Tariff. Probably, when these papers are brought down, the hon. member for Gloucester will find that the ports of New Brunswick are not in as stagnant a position as they are represented to be; but, on the contrary, in a much more active condition. I do not desire, nor do I intend, to be drawn into a discussion on the Tariff at this time; but I rise to thank the hon. member for Gloucester for his unselfishness in uttering the words he has spoken in favor of St. John. We all remember the urgent manner in which, in the Parliament from 1871 to 1873, be pressed upon the attention of the House the claims of a port in his own county --

Mr. ANGLIN. That is a summer port

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. To which he desired to have a railway track laid, and how he contended that it was the nearest port to Europe. On this occasion he ignores it entirely, and comes to the rescue of the city of St. John, for which I tender him my sincere thanks, and trust that when the papers asked for are laid before the House, he will find the Canadian Government and the Imperial Government that that section of the country is not so much neglected as he imagines it to be.

Mr. LONGLEY. I am not disposed to doubt the inclination of the Government to do all they can to make Halifax the terminal freight port of the Dominion, and I think the time has arrived when something ought to be done in that direction. Not only the citizens of Halifax, but I am sure every Canadian, would desire that all the freight intended for Quebec and Montreal should, in the winter time, be landed at Halifax, instead of going to Boston, and being shipped from there to Montreal and Quebec. The people of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and the people of this Dominion should, I think, concentrate their efforts upon the accomplishment of the two objects brought prominently forward at the meeting at Halifax the other day. I believe the Government will do everything that can be done in reason; but, at the same time, I do not think it would be amiss if the Government gave some indication of their intention, or of their willingness, first to make Halifax the terminal winter port, and, second, to make an experiment whether grain can be profitably exported by way of Halifax to Europe.

WRECKING IN INLAND WATERS.

Mr. BUNTING for Mr. PATTERSON (Essex) moved for copies of all correspondence between Sir Edward Thornton, British Ambassador at Washington, and the Secretary of State for the United States, relative to wrecking and towing in Inland waters which has been forwarded to the Dominion Government, and copies of all other official correspondence and of all Orders in Council of the Dominion Government relating to the same subject.

Mr. BOWELL moved the adjournment of the debate. Motion agreed to.

GEORGIAN BAY BRANCH.

Mr. COCKBURN (Muskoka), moved for copies of all correspondence in connection with the Georgian Bay Branch (of the Pacific Railway) contract since the 9th day of February, 1880; also particulars of settlement, if any settlement has been made, of the claims preferred by Smith, Ripley & Co., or Heney, Charlebois and Flood, in connection with said contract. He said: I make this motion in order to obtain some information supplementary to that asked for in a motion I made last Session with reference to the Georgian Bay Branch contract, which was cancelled. Since last year the country in the neighborhood of that line has undergone considerable development, and, if the Government will reconsider the matter, they will probably find that they will meet the wishes of a great mass of people, if they will return to the scheme which was introduced by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), in 1874, and adopt the Georgian Bay Branch route, which runs to the south of Lake Nipissing, and which would form a direct route to Sault Ste. Marie, or Lake Superior, if it is the policy of the Government to go there. The papers brought down last Session are not complete. The latest information on the subject is in a letter from Mr. Sandford Fleming of the 10th February, 1880, and I am anxious, for my own information and the information of other interested parties, to learn how the matter stands.

THE GRANT FOR IRISH RELIEF.

Mr. ANGLIN, in moving for a return of copies of all Orders in Council, telegrams and correspondence between respecting the expenditure of the sum of one hundred thousand dollars, voted by the Canadian Parliament last Session for the relief of those in Ireland who were threatened with famine, said: It may perhaps be remembered by hon, members, that when the right hon, gentleman at the head of the Government proposed in this House an appropriation of $100,000 for the people of Ireland who were suffering from famine or threatened with famine, I felt it my duty to ask the right hon. gentleman to take sufficient means to ensure that the money should be employed for the purposes for which this Parliament voted it. There was no doubt then, and there can be none now, as to the intention of Parliament. It was our intention, as was expressly stated, that the money should be used, and used immediately, for the supply of food to the hungry. I ventured to suggest that it would be well that the amount should be placed at the disposal of the two great bodies which devoted themselves to the noble work of ministering to the wants of the suffering in Ireland: one known as the Duchess of Marlborough's Committee, and the other as the Mansion House Committee, both of which were entirely worthy of confidence. The right hon. gentleman, however, considered that as this was a Parliamentary appropriation, and made at the instance of the Government, the proper channel for its distribution would be the Colonial Office. I was sorry to find that he came to that conclusion, and although I confessed that the course he preferred was perhaps proper, I feared that the moneys would not be used quite in accordance with our wishes when they were sent through that channel. Just at that time, and for some months before, it seemed to be the policy of the Imperial Government to do all in its power to create the impression in all countries outside of Ireland, that the distress in Ireland was not so grave or so serious as it was represented in the newspapers, that, in fact, there was no danger of famine, although there was a considerable amount of distress in various parts of the country. That was sufficient to excite my apprehension as to the manner in which the money would be disposed of. The hon. gentleman intimated that he was in communication with the Colonial Secretary, and that he believed that the Colonial Secretary would, as we desired, place the money at the disposal of those two committees. He led us to believe, and I do not doubt even now, that he desired to carry out the wishes of this Parliament, but we have since learned that that money was not used in the manner in which we desired it should be; that although we were eager to send money at once for the suffering, several months were allowed to elapse before anything was done with the money. Then it is said the Government invited these two committees to appoint some two or three members of each to form a sort of joint or sub-committee for the purpose of supervising its distribution, telling them at the same time to expend it in procuring boats and fishing apparatus for the fishermen on the coast of Galway. That was a very desirable and laudable object, but we did not vote the money of the people of Canada for any such purpose as that, nor do I think that the Government, now in power, or any other Government, would come down to this Parliament and ask it to appropriate $100,000 of the hard earnings of the people of this country, for the purpose of purchasing boats and fishing gear for the distressed people in Ireland or any other part of the Empire. We thought the people wanted food; we believed they were on the verge of starvation and we desired to rush to their relief. We wanted the money expended at once, in giving food to the famishing; but the Colonial Secretary did not choose to expend our money as we wished, but chose to appropriate it for purposes for which an Imperial grant should have been made, and for which we should not have been expected to provide. have presented what I believe the facts of the case, and I beg to move the resolution.

Mr. ANGLIN.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY ROLLING STOCK.

Mr. ANGLIN moved for a return shewing the number of locomotives, passenger cars, freight cars or other railway rolling stock purchased by the Government under contract or otherwise, during the year, the places where they were manufactured and purchased, and the prices paid. He said: It will probably be in the recollection of the House that, last year, we had much discussion with regard to the mode in which the Intercolonial Railway was being managed, and the working of the Rivière du Loup section then lately added to the road. It was alleged by the Minister of Railways that he had taken all the precuutions in his power to provide for the proper working of that additional portion of the road, yet, in reply to the statement that he had allowed the rolling stock of the entire road to fall into a very lamentable ment that he had allowed the rolling stock of the entire road to fall into a very lamentable condition indeed, he pleaded that his locomotives overworked, particularly and cars were because he had not locomotives, sufficient rolling stock for the additional length of the road, and because that portion of the road was then in a very rough condition, and any rolling stock that passed over it was very much shaken, if not shattered. When pressed to state what provision he had made for the additional rolling stock required, and why, in view of requiring that additional rolling stock, he had chosen to discharge so many men from the Government works at Moncton, he stated that he did not feel warranted in providing rolling stock until the transfer of the Rivière du Loup road had actually been made, and that after that transfer had actually been made he found it necessary to devote a considerable time to the providing of a particular plan for the locomotives so that they would be all built on uniform models, and a portion of any one would answer for any other, and those sections most liable to damage could be kept in stock, so that repairs could be easily made at any time. That, probably, was a very prudent course to take, but if it required so much time, surely much could have been done before the actual transfer of the road took place, so that the furnishing or equipment of the road might have been hastened. In my part of the world we believed that it would have been a wise policy on the part of the hon. Minister to have moved a little sooner in this matter, to have availed himself of the skilled workmen he had at Moneton, and the valuable machinery prepared just for this purpose, rather than allow all that machinery to remain idle. We thought it strange, indeed, that a Government professing to be a thoroughly Protectionist Government like the present should have dismissed its own workmen, have determined to allow its own machinery to remain idle, and go to the United States for the locomotives and other rolling stock which might so much better have been manufactured in our own country. I am not prepared to say that a locomotive could have been built as cheaply in the Moncton works as it could be imported from the United States, but my impression is that were those works, successfully and carefully conducted as, I believe, at one time they were, and as perhaps they are still, the cost of a locomotive built there would not exceed the cost of a locomotive imported from the United States, with that duty added, to which that locomotive would be subject were it imported by a corporation. We thought it strange that a protectionist Government should prefer to dismiss their own workmen, knowing at the time they could not get a sufficient quantity of locomotives built in the time required elsewhere, in the Dominion, and that they should have placed themselves in a position which required them to send to the United States for a large number of locomotives. It has been quite seriously asserted in St. John-I do not know how truly—that some of those locomotives were actually built by the very men who were dismissed from the works at Moncton, and who, in the United States, were paid as high wages as ever they received at Moncton. I believe a large amount of rolling stock was imported last year, which, if it had been ordered in this country would have afforded employment to a large number of our people. A contract was given to Mr. Fleming, who, although he can build locomotives equal to any that can be imported, was not prepared to build them, as the hon gentleman must know, with sufficient rapidity, to meet so extraordinary a demand, and, I think, he has not vet delivered all the locomotives contracted for.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is no objection at all to the motion being adopted, and I will have great pleasure in bringing down as early as possible all the information asked for in this motion. I may state, however, to the hon gentleman that if there was any departure from the National Policy it was not because it was desired on the part of the Government, but because it was a matter of necessity. Every possible effort was made to secure the construction of this rolling stock-of these locomotivesin the Dominion, and it was supposed that the amount of duty imposed upon locomotives going into the Dominion, and which was added to the tenders of the parties outside, for they were required to deliver them in the Dominion, would be quite sufficient to accomplish that object. I might say it would have been sufficient, but from the fact that the National Policy had not been in operation long enough to furnish us with equipped machine shops and places at which locomotives could be rapidly and readily constructed according to the demands of traffic. Therefore, we were obliged, reluctantly, to go outside for the purchase of some of these locomotives through not being able to get contracts filled in the Dominion. The papers will be brought down and the matter will be fully reported.

PICKLED FISH RETURN

Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne), in moving for copies of the returns furnished the Department of Marine and Fisheries for the present year by the Inspector or Deputy Inspectors of Pickled Fish for the County of Shelburne, together with a statement of the fees collected by the said officers, said: The object I have in making this motion is to draw the attention of the Minister of Inland Revenue to the manner in which the Inspection Act has been carried out in the county of Shelburne. The fact is, that the law as now enforced in Nova Scotia bears very heavily upon the mackerel fishery in this way: that the brand of our inspectors is of no value whatever in the American market. I also desire to point out to that hon, gentleman that his representative in that county last year visited one of the most important fishing stations in the county, and entered into an agreement with the packers by which they were to pack their own fish, not in his presence, as required by the law, and that afterwards the brand should be affixed. I trust that, in the course of a few weeks, when petitions will be presented to the House, asking for an amendment to this law, by which it shall not be compulsory to packers to submit their fish to the inspection when intended for the American market, the Government will adopt the proposed change.

FINES IMPOSED BY FISHERY OFFICERS.

Mr. BOBERTSON (Shelburne), in moving for a return of all fines imposed by the Fishery officer of the county of Shelburne, upon whom, for what offence, and a copy of the evidence taken, furnished the Department in each ease, said: I desire also to call the attention of the Government to the manner in which fines are imposed in the county of Shelfrom the principal lobster packing establishments in the county, that he visited the Wood's Harbor district after the 1st of August in the present year, and inflicted a fine upon the proprietors of the first establishment he visited, for violation of the law, after having inspected their fish. He made no inspection of the second, and the third was closed. What I object to is, not the imposition of the fine, but the manner in which the inspector undertakes to perform that part of his duty. I would suggest that in future he be instructed to inflict fines with impartiality whether the violaters of the law be Liberals or Conservatives, instead of making the marked difference in favor of the latter which he has been in the habit of making in the past.

FISHERY STATISTICS.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne) moved for a copy of the instructions issued by the Department of Marine and Fisheries to their officers throughout the Dominion as a guide in the collection of statistics as to the annual production of the fisheries, with copies of the forms used by said officers, and also, copies of the returns by districts furnished the department for the present year by the Fishery Officers of the county of Shelburne. He said: This is a matter of considerable importance. During the past summer, a gentleman in this city, connected with the Fisheries Department, addressed a letter to the Toronto Globe, in which he made statements that are deserving of the attention of the Government. He took the view that, after the fishery clauses of the Washington Treaty were abrogated, the people of the Maritime Provinces would not suffer much as the home consumption of fish and the sale in markets which can yet be found, would compensate them for the loss of the United States market. He based that information upon the statistics actually submitted to Parliament in the reports of the officers of the department. I have reason to believe that some of the most important documents bearing on this question, and laid on the Table of the House, are of little value. I find it quite impossible to obtain reliable statistics from these reports, and the motion which I now make is for the purpose of ascertaining the plan upon which those statistics are collected. The figures which I propose to submit to the House are taken from the return of last year, and they include three of the most important fisheries in the Maritime Provinces. With regard to the herring fisheries, I find that the total yield for the Provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island was 274,657 barrels; the total export only 108,339 barrels; the value of the total yield $1,098,628, and the value of the quantity exported only $380,378. I find that the total production of mackerel was 182.524 barrels, valued at $1,188,532—an average price, according to the statistics, of $6.51 per barrel. I find that the quantity said to have been exported was 576,474 barrels, at an average price, according to the Trade and Navigation Returns for that year, of $4.45, instead of $6.51, the price according to the statistics supplied by the Commissioner. The total production of codfish, pollock and haddock was 871,916 quintals, valued at $3,548,365, or a average value of $4.06. The quantity exported was 656,102 quintals, valued at $2,505,229, or an average price of $3.81. When we look back at the trade a few years ago we find that in 1874 there were imported into Nova Scotia 1,612,560 pounds of fresh mackerel from the United States. That certainly is a new business to me, and one of which we know nothing in the Maritime Provinces. In 1875, according to these returns, there were imported into Ontario 294,575 pounds of fresh cod; into Nova Scotia 19,325 pounds, and into New Brunswick 5,165, and, according to the Trade and Navigation burns by the gentleman who had been appointed to the Returns of that year, the average prices paid respectively for office. I may say that that gentleman resides some 40 miles those quantities were 4½ cents, 11 cents and 18 cents per pound. I trust the Government will be able to give me the information asked for by this motion, and that, in addition, I trust the Government will be able to give me the they will pay some little attention to the manner in which the fishery statistics are collected, so that they may be more reliable in the future than they have proved to be in the past.

Mr. MILLS. I think this subject is deserving of the serious consideration of the Government. I dare say that we have all read the communications in relation to these statistics which have appeared from time to time from Professor Hind since the award of the arbitrators was made, calling attention to the unreliable character of the statistics collected by the Department of Marine and Fisheries. Ao one who has taken the trouble of looking into these statistics since these communications have appeared, can fail to see that they are wholly valueless, and that no reliance can be placed upon then, either as to the quantity of fish caught or the value which is placed upon those consumed at home or sent abroad. At the present time this matter is a very serious one. We all know that the period of time for which, according to the award made by the Commissioners at Halifax, the Treaty of Washington has to run will soon have expired. The whole subject will come up again for consideration unless otherwise disposed of between the Government of the United Kingdom and the Government of the United States, and it is of the last importance that when we are called upon to go into the discussion of this subject again with the authorities of the United States, the information which would be available should be wholly reliable. This is not the case at present, and when the papers now asked for are brought down it is to be hoped that the Government will be prepared to communicate to the House the steps they have taken, or propose to take for the purpose of correcting the errors which have hitherto existed in regard to the matter.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Of course, when the papers are brought down, the Government, with those papers before them, will be prepared to discuss the whole subject, on motion, after due notice of what the subject is, and the ground of attack. I am not at all prepared to say that the returns which are made to the department are incorrect, because Professor Hinde has said so, and I think, when the hon, gentleman sees the papers, he will agree with me. If he had, he would see, from that statement itself, that the information we have before us contained in these statistics, is reliable information.

MAJOR-GENERAL LUARD.

Mr. DESJARDINS, in moving for a copy of the correspondence with the Imperial Government in relation to the appointment of Major-General Luard as Commanding Officer of the Militia of Canada, said: Before moving the motion I desire to make a few remarks in order to explain its particular object. It is simply this: That in 1875, when the position of Deputy Adjutant-General was replaced by that of Commanding Officer, it was not well explained at the time what was to be the character and extent of the duties of this officer. In fact, the law itself does not make it plain whether section 28, which says that "an officer holding the rank of colonel, or superior rank thereto, in Her Majesty's regular army, shall be charged, under the orders of Her Majesty, with military command, &c." is to prevail over section 29, and whether this officer is to be considered as being under the immediate orders of Her Majesty, that is to say, receiving his instructions from British headquarters, or whether he is merely an officer dependent on our Department of Militia, as section 29 would seem to imply:

"The Governor in Council shall, from time to time, make such orders as may be necessary respecting the duties to be performed by the officer commanding the militia and others."

Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne).

This uncertainty exists in the public mind, and I am not sure but that it exists in the minds of those who are from time to time called upon to perform this duty. I would not be surprised if they were under the impression that they came here rather as military governors, having no connection with anybody but Her Majesty or her representative, and with the power of treating our Ministers somewhat as subalterns; do these high personages understand that they are salaried officers under the orders of the Minister of Militia? I believe that if this question could be settled, if explanations could be given so as to satisfy public opinion upon this point, a certain uneasiness which now exists would disappear, and it would be so much the better for our military organization. I remember that when this measure was brought up objection was taken to the first clause that I have alluded to, because it was thought that the exclusion of all but officers holding a superior rank in the British army would virtually shut off, from this very enviable position for a military man, our most competent officers, who, by their sacrifices, their special studies, had, perhaps, a right to expect more encouragement from the Government. Objection was also made that the choice of an officer unacquainted with our institutions and with the particular character of our diverse bodies of volunteers, over which he would have to exercise some control, might bring about unpleasantness, perhaps for himself, but more particularly for the volunteers. Now I am inclined to believe that the experience of the last five years has shown that these objections were pretty well taken; that these officers, after having, perhaps, served in the colonies of Africa and Asia, were apt to consider those whom they had the right to command here, as natives of these colonies. They were also apt to ignore the special rights that some classes of our population may possess. Thus, for instance, the newspapers of our Province reported lately and I have seen no contradiction of the statement—that the present commanding officer, on receiving from a French Canadian officer, a letter written in French, had seen fit to send it cavalierly back, writing in a corner: "Please translate in English," implying thereby that in the communications between our volunteers and the Department of Militia or the commanding officer, the English language was alone allowed, and that in one of our departments we must submit to seeing our language put in the back ground. I deem it necessary to draw the attention of the Government to this incident, if already it has not been done, for it is important to know what treatment our French Canadian fellow countrymen, who offer their services to the country, are to expect from superior officers brought here from England to command our militia. Under these circumstances, in order to dispel all doubt, and in order to know exactly whether we have to deal with an Imperial officer directly dependent on the British army, or with an officer who is to receive his orders and the explanation of his duties from one of the departments of the Federal Government, I thought it my duty to move for these papers.

Mr. CARON. I am exceedingly happy to give my hon. friend all the information he asks for by this motion. I can state, in the first place, that the commanding Major-General is a Colonial officer, chosen among the Imperial officers, but receiving his instructions from the Government of Canada. In making his motion, my hon. friend has drawn the attention of the House to the fact that the choice of a British officer, of an Imperial officer, to command the forces here, would have the result of excluding Canadian officers from the high position that the British officers occupy in Canada. Well, Mr. Speaker, if we take into consideration the circumstances that brought about the appointment of the first General who came here to replace the former Adjutant-Generals that we had in the country, it will be readily admitted that in changing our system, as we were then doing, we could not do better than to ask for an Imperial officer to come and train up officers amongst us. The new system has succeeded perfectly well, since it has formed a nucleus of officers who, in the future, will be able to occupy any position in the volunteer forces of the coun-try. My hon friend has, moreover, drawn the attention of the House to the fact that a letter sent to the Department of Militia, written in French by a French volunteer officer, had been sent back, with a remark from the General in the corner of the letter, requesting that it should be translated into English, so that he could read it. Well, Mr. Speaker, I need hardly say, what every body knows, that the commanding Major-General is a distinguished officer, and that he has come to this country in order to perform his duties as well as he possibly can. It is easy to understand that, having just arrived from England, and being desirous of making himself as well acquainted as possible with all that would be required of him, and not being quite as familiar with the customs of the country as he is now, and wishing especially not to commit any mistakes, when this letter was handed to him, he requested an officer to be so kind as to translate it for him into English. I am convinced that no one will have cause to regret the misunderstanding to which my hon. friend has drawn the attention of the House, and I am also satisfied that such a misunderstanding will not again occur. I might add that as soon as I became aware of the notice of motion, I hastened to give instructions to have the correspondence prepared so as to be able to bring it down as soon as possible.

CANADIAN TOBACCO.

Mr. GIGAULT moved for a statement showing the names and places of residence of all persons who, since the 1st May, 1880, obtained licenses for the manufacture of tobacco cultivated in Canada, under section 32 of the Act 43 Vic., chapter 19.

INDIAN INSTRUCTORS.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) moved for a return showing the name and nationality of each of the instructors to the Indians in the territories of Canada; the residence and former occupation of each such instructor at the time of appointment; if any removed, the date and cause of removal; the salary or allowance paid to each, and a detailed statement of all expenses connected with the instruction of said Indians; also a copy of any report or correspondence to the Department of the Interior from any such instructors. He said: I would like to add, with the permission of the Minister, "also a statement of the various articles supplied to each of the instructors when sent to the It will be remembered that during last Northwest.' Session, in response to a motion of an hon. gentleman, a return was submitted to Parliament containing an Order in Council recommending the appointment of Mr. Dewdney, Superintendent of Indian Affairs, and of Mr. Taylor and Mr. Thos. Wright, as instructors; and a copy of a report of the Privy Council, dated, I think, the 9th of October, 1879, with the names of 17 practical farmers, who were sent to instruct the Indians in the North-West Territories in the pursuits of agriculture. It will also be remembered that during last Session an appropriation of, I think, $64,999 was asked, for the purpose of assisting in this landable object. How much more was expended I do not know, and one of the objects of my motion is to get information on that subject. This is a very important question both to the country and the Indians. The natural occupation of the Indians is the chase; but as the country becomes settled that source of livelihood will be gone, and the Indians will have to depend upon the resources of the Dominion unless they are induced to engage in agricultural pursuits. In order to accomplish this object, a peculiar class of men are required, and I doubt very much, from the names contained in the report brought down last year, if the hon, gentleman at the head of the Department of the Interior has succeeded in engaging the services of men who are competent to properly instruct the Indians. It is pretty well known that most of those persons are from the eastern portion of the Dominion. Very few, if any of them, are from the North-West Territories or Manitoba, and not more than one or two of them understand any of the Indian dialects. It is pretty clear that men who do not understand the Indian language, or know anything of the customs, or habits or prejudices of the Indians, cannot succeed in imparting instruction to them; and so far as I have been able to learn, during a visit of three or four weeks in Manitoba, the men appointed by the hon, gentleman are hardly of the class possessing this necessary knowledge. I am desirous of knowing how far this laudable and desirable experiment has succeeded. I was informed, when in Manitoba, by one of the first men in the Province, who thoroughly understands the Indian character and Indian capabilities, that he was very much afraid that, owing to the facts I have mentioned, the experiment would not be successful, and that the proper kind of man to instruct the Indians is he who knows something of the Indian language, customs and habits; in such a man they have unbounded faith, which they could hardly be expected to possess in the class of men sent up. I am not reflecting upon these men. They were, no doubt, good, practical farmers, perhaps, from Ontario; but I doubt very much if they were the sort suited to the purpose. I am desirous of obtaining information as to how far this experiment—an experiment in the right direction -has been crowned with success. I should like information also as to the expense of this experiment, and the outfit and materials supplied to the Indian instructors. I should like to add a clause to the motion with this object.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not think the return asked for by the hon. gentleman will give the information he desires. The report of the Indian Department will conhe desires. tain most of the information asked for, especially as to the progress made by those farmers, and the progress of the Indians under their instruction. On the whole, I believe the selections have been very successful, there being, at the same time, two or three failures to a certain extent, and two or three changes. As to the teachers knowing the Indian language, there are several Indian languages in that country. I think that, instead of sending persons thither for the purpose of continuing them in their habits and prejudices, the teachers should instruct them in farming, as practised by white men. It would have been very difficult, some time ago, to get in that country, men able to act as farming instructors. Now it is different, and in any changes made hereafter, and some are about being made, Mr. Dewdney, the Indian Commissioner, has instructions to try to find men on the spot, practical farmers, who have acquired, to some extent, some acquaintance with the Indians. As to finding teachers able to speak the Indian languages, I am afraid you will have to wait long for them. Those who understand those languages are principally hunters, who are not the men qualified to make this Indian experiment successful. I understand the experiment has been largely successful; that the wilder and more nomadic the habits of the Indians, the more readily have they taken to the cultivation of the soil. I believe they fully appreciate the difficulties of their position—that their former food supply has disappeared, and that they must, ex necessitate, become agriculturists and settle on the reserves. I have no objection to the motion, with the addition desired.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

GOVERNMENT LAND GUIDES IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron) moved for a return showing the names and nationality of all the Government land guides in the Province of Manitoba and the North-West Territories, the residence and former occupation of each such guide at the time of the appointment; how long they had been residents in such last named place; if any removed or their services dispensed, with the date and cause of such removal. The salary or allowance paid to each; a detailed statement of all costs and expenses connected with this branch of the public service; the particular locality assigned to each guide for the discharge of his duties; together with any Order in Council or instructions respecting the duties of such guides. He said: I do not object to land guides. 1 think it is wise and politic to appoint them; because in that country, where there are no roads, but trails over the prairie, it would be impossible for the emigrants to find their way to any given locality unless they had the assistance of some guide. But what I object to, from my experience in the North-West, is the kind of men the hon. gentleman selected for the purpose. A guide is perfectly useless unless he knows something of the country through which he proposes to conduct the emigrant, the trails and various localities. I was credibly informed in Manitobaand I cannot doubt my information—that some of the guides knew nothing of the country or of the localities to which they were taking the emigrants, or of the trails by which they wished to reach their destination. I, myself saw, about twenty-five miles west of the Portage, on the South Saskatchewan Trail, a number of English emigrants in charge of a guide supposed to know something of the locality and of the country; but he had taken them on the wrong trail, and when I saw them there were two large waggons in a bog, utterly unable to get out. I was told that this guide had never been in that locality before. A few miles further west, I met a number of Scotch emigrants, whose destination was south of the junction of the Souris with the Assiniboine. They were sent round by way of Winnipeg and Portage la Prairie, to the South Saskatchewan tract, a roundabout way of at least 150 miles, to reach their destination. They ought to have got off at Emerson and gone south-west, and so avoided this long, useless detour. I asked them why they took that route, and they said they were sent that way by the guide. If so, that is a system that should not be allowed to continue. A very serious loss in time and money was occasioned these poor people by this unnecessary travelling under the instructions of one of the Government guides. Instructions were given last spring to take a party of English emigrants to the border of Pelican Lake. The guide never had been there before from all I could gather. In the first place it took him two weeks to reach the Pembina crossing 50 or 60 miles from Emerson, and some 30 days to get from Emerson to Pelican Lake, some 100 miles distant. So ignorant was the man of the outfit that was suitable for emigrants that the waggons were loaded with twice what they could carry, and every mile or two they were stuck in the slews and the mud holes there and detained at very considerable expense for a very considerable length of time. I assert from information I have received, whether true or not I do not know-I hope it is not true-that when these emigrants reached their destination each family was charged $12.50 a piece. It may be all right. I do not know how these men are paid. He may be paid so much a head. I do not know how that is, but I was informed by one of the emigrants that they had to pay $12.50 per family for being guided out from Emerson to the shores of Pelican Bay.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Can you give the name of the guide?

Mr. CAMERON. Yes.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Will you give it? Sir John A. Macdonald.

Mr. CAMERON. Yes; and the name of the person who gave the information. This guide was instructed—I do not know whether he was instructed or not by the Government, but I presume he was-to prepare some small buildings and have them stationed at given distances, out in the open plain, where the emigrants might lodge through the night, instead of camping out in the open prairie. The idea was not a bad one, if properly carried out; but, instead of procuring the lumber at Nelsoeville and building at the localities, the houses were built in the city of Emerson, taken out in the depth of winter in a sleigh. A storm arose, a regular blizzard, and the result was that four of these shanties, six feet by twelve, which should have been stationed at distances of from twelve to twenty miles apart, were all stationed at Pancake Lake. I suppose the Government has had to pay the expense of constructing these houses and taking them down there. I was also informed that every man who has to sleep on the floor of one of these houses has to pay 10 cents a night -I do not know if this is with the sanction of the Government. I know, as a matter of fact, that a charge was exacted from these emigrants, and was so exacted last spring. That is not exactly as it ought to be. If it was by order of the Government that the houses were constructed I have no objection to it, but I object to having four of them placed in one locality and that the poor emigrant should pay a charge for sleeping on the floor of one of them. The information I want by this motion is for the purpose of ascertaining, to some extent, how these guides are paid, what their duties are, whether they have a right to exact these charges or not, whether they are the kind of men who ought to be there. As to my own opinion, I saw one or two of them, and fear very much the Minister has been unfortunate in the selection or rather unfortunate in acting on the recommendations made to him, for I presume he knew nothing personally about the men, but acted on the recommendation of some of his

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I know nothing of the circumstances stated by the hon, gentleman here now for the first time. Certainly I must state that if there have been any charges made of any kind from the emigrants for having been guided in any place, way or direction, which was improper, it will be enquired into without delay. There were no guides for the purpose of assisting the emigrants until 1880. It was represented in Parliament that it was a for lorn sort of thing for emigrants going to Winnipeg to have to set out alone to find their locations, as they could not be expected to find their lots by only looking at the maps in the office of the Crown Lands Agent, and the task of the guides was clearly to aid them in finding their lots. The gentleman who was chosen for the purpose of acting as superintendent of the guides and managing the whole organization, is a gentleman known to hon, members on both sides of the House—I mean Mr. Hayter Read. He has been in that country for a good many years—since it was first occupied as a portion of the Dominion. He is a gentleman of education and standing, he is a member of the Ontario Bar, and he speaks the Indian language freely. He has made himself so universally popular there, from his high standing and character and his knowledge of the country, that there has been an application signed by all the Catholic hierarchy and all the Protestant hierarchy, asking that he should be appointed Stipendiary Magistrate from his acquaintance with the country and the people. He was entrusted with the duty of organizing a small body of guides in that country, he being the only man sent from the eastern portion of the Dominion; all the others were found on the spot, and I shall be very much disappointed if I find, upon examination, that Mr. Read has been so unfortunate in the selection of his guides in that part of the country, as from the hon, gentleman's speech one would be led to believe. I have known Mr. Read for many years, and I do not think a more zealous or intelligent man can be found for the purpose of performing the duties which have been entrusted to him, or of organizing that little corps of guides.

SALE OF HAY ON THE INTERCOLONIAL.

Mr. FISET moved for copies of the notices directing the sale of hay along side the track of the Intercolonial Railway, the names of the tenderers, and the amount of the tender or tenders in each case, names of the persons to whom one or more of the contracts have been granted, and also all correspondence, applications, telegrams, &c., respecting the sale of the hay. He said: My object in making this motion is to show how very unimportant it is for the Government to sell by auction the hay growing along the line of the Intercolonial Railway, and how advantageous it would be to leave it to the farmers whose lands are crossed by the road, especially in the county of Rimouski. Towards the end of June or the beginning of July last, the officers of the Intercolonial Railway asked for tenders for the purchase of this hay; but whether through ignorance of this call for tenders, or whether through the habit they had contracted during the preceding years without being molested, several of our farmers risked cutting the hay for themselves; others, in order to be more sure, wrote upon the subject to the hon. Minister of Public Works, who hastened to answer them that they might cut the hay as they had done the preceding years. Hence a conflict sprung up between the officers of the Intercolonial Railway and the Minister of Public Works. Actions at law were taken, and unfortunately for those who, in good faith, had followed the advice of the hon. Minister, they not only lost their hay, but were moreover condemned to pay the costs of an action, or else settle the matter for a much larger sum than the hay they had cut was worth. It may be said, as an objection, that these good people should have applied to the Minister of Railways. It is true. But let it be observed that that hon. Minister was absent, and I will add that people generally apply to those with whom they are best acquainted, and that is probably why they preferred to apply to the hon. Minister of Public Works. However that may be, I am sure there was a misunderstanding for which the hon. Minister is not, perhaps, responsible, but by which several farmers suffered, as I have just stated. Now, what amount has the Government received for this hay in the county of Rimouski? I am convinced that it is but a trifling sum, which will, moreover, be made known when the papers are brought down; but I very much doubt whether it exceeds twenty or twenty-five dollars. On the other hand, what discontent has been created among the farmers from whom this privilege has been taken away. I admit that, strictly speaking, this hay does not belong to them; but since the Government obtains so little benefit from it, would it not be better to let them have it? I must remark that, with regard to this hay, it is not the same thing in the county of Rimouski as in many other counties. With the exception of one or two parishes, waggons cannot go alongside of the track on account of the unevenness of the ground, &c., and yet that is the only means those who buy this hay from the Government have of gathering it, and it is doubtless on account of this great inconvenience that the Government received, and always will receive, such very low offers. On the other hand, the farmers having been deprived of the privilege of cutting this hay, are not very eager to grant the new proprietors of the hay the right of way over their properties; so it often happens that the purchasers of the hay are obliged to carry it on hand cars, which constitutes a new danger for the traffic of the Intercolonial Railway, whereas by leaving the hay to each farmer whose farm is crossed by the railway, this danger is obviated, steps being taken should be removed. As I said last Session the farmers merely cutting the hay and throwing it upon their properties, where they gather it afterwards, without being obliged to go along the line with their waggons. Another reason is because hay is often searce in our part of the country; again, this year, it is likely that the hay cut will not be sufficient for local wants. For these divers reasons, I request the Government te be good enough to let the farmers keep the privilege they have had during preceding years of cutting the hay that grows along the railway; and in so doing, I am convinced that they will not only meet with the approval of the electors of the county that I have the honor of representing, but also the approval of the electors of my hon, friend from Temiscouata.

Mr. LANGEVIN. Whilst I was charged with the administration of the Department of Railways during the absence of the hon. Minister of that department, representations were made to me-I think they came from the county of Rimouski or Temiscouata, I do not remember which, perhaps from both—asking if it were the intention of the Government to allow the cutting of the hay along the line of the railway, opposite each property, and to let the proprietors of the farms bordering on the railway have that hay. The intention of the Government being so to do, I gave instructions to the department to inform the petitioners that, in the future, they might cut the hay, but that they should understand that they were not to leave their fences open so that the animals might stray upon the railway. That was the only objection that was made to the request. I understood that there had been some conversation on the matter with the officers of the Intercolonial Railway, and perhaps there has been some misunderstanding on the part of those who furnished the information to the hon. member. The papers asked for will be brought down.

Mr. KEELER moved for a return of the iron ore and gold ore exported from Belleville or the county of Hastings during the last year.

EXTRADITION.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for copies of all correspondence not already brought down between the Canadian Government and that of the United Kingdom, on the subject of extradition and of the last Canadian Extradition Act, said: It will be in the recollection of the House that a motion for an Address to Her Majesty, praying that she would be pleased to take the steps necessary to bring that Extradition Act into force, was brought forward by me last Session, and was ultimately withdrawn on the statement of the hon. Minister that the correspondence was proceeding. It seems to me of pressing importance that whatever steps are required to bring that Act into force should be taken, and that whatever difficulties—I cannot understand their nature—there may be in the way of these

I repeat this, the law on the subject, as it exists here, is in an extremely unsatisfactory state, and there does not seem to be any reason why there should have been so much delay in taking those steps which were urged by the unanimous addresses of both Houses of this Parliament, now a long time ago, and which were the only barriers to the Canadian Extradition Act being brought into force.

RESERVE LANDS OF THE COLONIZATION SOCIETY OF MANITOBA.

Mr. ROYAL moved for copies of any reports, letters, memoranda, petitions, telegrams and documents whatsoever which have passed between the Department of the Interior at Ottawa and the Dominion Lands Office at Winnipeg, or the President of the Colonization Society of Manitoba, respecting the grant to or the exchange of the Reserve lands of the said Society in Taché Township, and the indemnity claimed from the Dominion Government by the said Society. He said: In 1875, the Dominion Government undertook the repatriation of Canadians settled in the United States, and took steps to have our fellow-countrymen sent to the fertile regions of Manitoba and the North-West. This repatriation was at first conducted on a pretty extensive scale, and a Colonization Society was formed with the object of receiving the immigrants gratuitously, of showing them the new lands, of giving them the information that every immigrant requires on arriving in a new country, and likewise of affording them protection in case of need. This society has succeeded in colonizing two townships, which to-day are the most flourishing settlements in Manitoba. This society giving its work, its support, its help gratuitously to a Government undertaking, had naturally a right to expect that its efforts and its just demands would not be ignored by the Government; nevertheless, though I do not wish to make accusations before the papers are brought down, I must say that, to make use of a moderate expression, on account of certain difficulties, certain misunderstandings, which were not, how-ever, misunderstandings for everybody, the society has been unjustly treated by reason of a decision of some of the officers of the Department of the Interior. In the first place, there were four or five townships reserved for settlement by Canadians coming from the States, and the society, finding that two of these townships were of inferior quality, applied to the Department of the Interior, as well as to the Department of Agriculture, to have them exchanged for two better ones. Before we were aware of the exchange, certain officials in Manitoba, well known for their ill-feeling against a certain portion of the population, took upon themselves to inform the authorities at Ottawa, that the Colonization Society did not longer want these townships; so directions were given to offer them for sale in accordance with the provisions of the Homestead Law. Consequently, these townships being refused us, and immigration still continuing, we had to concentrate our efforts on the two remaining townships. In 1878, another misunderstanding arose, on account of the interference of certain officials of the Department of the Interior, who had spread the information among another class of immigrants, that these townships were of superior quality and ought to be opened up to settlement. The society experienced great difficulty in removing those who settled in the new townships, except those who had been eye-witnesses to what had taken place. The society, who had gratuitously undertaken to work with the Government, had to disburse $1,300 to remove the squatters, or those immigrants who had settled in two reserved townships, on account of certain information obtained officially, or officiously, from the department. We have grounds for holding the Government responsible for the sums thus spent by the society in order the Government of Canada and the Government of Quebec to repair the wrongs it has received. I wish to lay before in reference to the timber limits north of the boundary of Mr. BLAKE.

the House these facts, which, though they may not interest the whole House, will certainly be of interest to those who love justice. From this point of view, I think, unfortunately, that Manitoba has a right to complain that justice was not rendered to her in this matter, as in many others. I hope that when the documents asked for are brought down, there will be a debate that will result in the triumph of justice.

INSPECTION OF SMOKED HERRINGS.

Mr. LONGLEY, in moving for any correspondence that has passed between the Inland Revenue Department and the Chamber of Commerce of Halifax, on the subject of the inspection of smoked herrings, said: The subject to which my motion refers is more of a local than a general character, and that is one reason why I feel it my duty to move in the matter. It will be recollected that last Session, while an amendment to the Inspection Act of 1874 was being discussed, very strong objection was taken to the foo imposed for the inspection of smoked herrings. The Minister of Inland Revenue proposed that two cents per box should be the inspection fee, and it was strenuously contended, by those who represented the men who caught the fish, that the fee was too high, and, after the discussion had gone on for a considerable time, the Minister of Inland Revenue consented to waive further discussion, with the view of obtaining fuller information on the subject. After that, I placed myself in communication with the Minister, and I thought I received an intimation from him that the fee would be reduced to one cent per box, and one half cent per half box; but when I came to look at the Bill as finally passed, I found that the fee had been left at two cents per box. It is no doubt important that smoked herrings should be inspected, but I see no reason why so high a fee as two cents per box should be imposed, as it will not improve the character of the fish or furnish any additional guarantee to those who buy them. Under the Inspection Law, ten boxes represent 100 boxes, and at two cents per box the inspector gets $2 for inspecting not one hundred boxes, but ten, and he gets $20 for inspecting one hundred boxes. Now, the catch of this particular kind of fish, in my country, has reached as high as 25,000 boxes in a single year; but if we assume the average catch to be half of that quantity, we shall see how large a sum is derived by the inspector for precious little labor. The right hon. Premier intimated, the other day, that no petitions had come in against this law. I beg to inform him that, while this amendment was passing through the House, I received a petition, numerously signed by the men who catch the fish, asking to have the fee reduced to one cent per box, and that the inspection be not compulsory. Although I am willing, if the House so desire, that the inspection should be made compulsory, I most strenuously oppose this most unreasonable and burdensome taxation, because it is taking money out of the pockets of the fisherman, who does all the work, and putting it in the pockets of the inspector, who does nothing.

Mr. MOUSSEAU. It was last Session the intention of the Government to comply with the wishes of my hon. friend, and an amendment suggested, I think, by him, was inserted in the Bill when it was before the Committee of the Whole. Through a clerical error it was not carried by the House, but it is now the intention of the Government to bring down a measure to comply with the wishes of the hon, gentleman by reducing the fee.

TIMBER LIMITS NORTH OF QUEBEC BOUNDARY.

Mr. MILLS, in moving for any correspondence between Quebec as fixed by the Royal Proclamation of October, 1763, said: My reason for moving for this correspondence is, that the Government apparently intend to take a particular line with regard to the demand made with reference to the boundaries of the Province of Ontario. It is well known that the late Administration had the question in dispute between the Government of Canada and the Government of the Province of Ontario, in reference to the boundary, submitted to arbitration. It was not a matter of high public policy; it was simply a departmental matter. There was no proposition that a conventional boundary should be established. The arbitrators had simply to ascertain where the law places the boundary between Ontario and the territories of the Dominion. The Government of that period came to the House and asked for an appropriation for the purpose of enabling them to give effect to the arbitration. The House voted the necessary money. No gentleman on the other side took any exception to the course proposed. The investigation was carried on the arbitrators sat and an award was made; and from that hour to this the present Administration, who succeeded us, have not seen proper to submit to the House an Act for the purpose of giving effect to that decision. The right hon, gentleman and his colleagues have not seen fit to recognize the principle of continuity in Government. They have not felt themselves called upon to give effect in this particular to what, as it seems to me, the good faith between Ontario and the Dominion required at their hands. A Committee was appointed last year to further investigate this question. The Committee, too, hurriedly reported; and, in my opinion, the report exhibited many omissions, misapprehensions and departures from what would be recognized by competent authority as correct principles of interpretation. But the Committee came to the conclusion that, under the provisions of the Quebec Act, of 1774, the western limit of Quebec was a line drawn due north from the junction of the Ohio and Mississippi. I have myself given a good deal of attention to the consideration of this subject, and cannot understand how it was possible to put such a construction upon the words of the Imperial Statute.

Mr. DAWSON. Will the hon, gentleman allow me to correct him. The Committee analyzed the evidence, but gave no decision on that particular point.

Mr. MILLS. The impression I have expressed was what, apparently, the report was intended to convey; and it certainly was the opinion expressed by the majority of the Committee. I now wish to call the attention of the House to some historical facts. Hon. gentlemen, who have looked into the early history of this continent, know very well that, for a long time, a considerable stretch of territory, lying between the basin of the Alleghanies and the great lakes that belong to the system of the St. Lawrence, was in dispute between the Government of France and the Government of Great Britain; but in 1755 the question was discussed, and the River Ohio proposed as a compromise between the claims of the respective countries. The Government of Great Britain agreed to accept the Ohio as the boundary if the French would consent to destroy the forts lying along that river and retire from that river to and beyond the lakes. This they declined to do, and each Government stood upon its extreme rights. We know that by the surrender of Canada, within the chartered limits of the French territory known as Canada, the whole country north of the Ohio and Mississippi and westward to the Rocky Mountains, was included in the Government of Canada, with the exception of the country known as the Illinois country, which lay between the Wabash on the east, the Mississippi on the west, and the Ohio on the south; that, after the fall of the city of Quebec, when the Governor of Quebec, surrendered it to Sir G. Amherst, a boundary was indicated on the map left in the possession of Col. of the Mississippi River, and a proclamation was issued Haldimand, and that the boundary on the west was the line along the highlands that separated the Mississippi from Lake Michigan. That boundary was the subject of dispute between the French representative in Great Britain and Mr. Pitt. The result was that the negotiations with a view to peace were broken off, in consequence of this failure. Subsequently, under negotiations carried on by the Duke of Bedford, the territories west of the Mississippi, and which had been claimed as part of the French territory known as Canada, was retained by France as far north as the sources of the Mississippi, and were included in what was called the Louisiana country, and that portion of Louisiana called the Illinois country to the east of the Mississippi was included in the territories of Canada surrendered to the Government of Great Britain. So, if hon, gentlemen look at the terms of the Treaty of 1763, they will see that while Canada was limited on the west by the Mississippi, to its source, that all that country known as Canada, when you reach a higher latitude, extending to the Rocky Mountains, was surrendered by France to Great Britain; and among the papers of Lord Shelburne, in the Lansdown manuscripts, published within a year or two, a map has been published indicating the territory I have mentioned, known as Canada, and surrendered to Great Britain. Throughout the Quebec Act of 1774, although it is an Act constituting the Province of Quebec, there is another Province spoken of, the Province of Canada indicating the territory that had been surrendered to Great Britain, by France, under the Treaty of 1763. Shortly after this surrender, the King issued a proclamation for the purpose of dealing, not only with this territory, but with certain West India Islands, also surrendered, and, by his prerogative authority, he constituted the Government of Quebec. He carved out of the Province of Canada, the Province of Quebec, in which certain limits were set forth. The remaining portion of the territory was left without any organized Government. Difficulties arose between the scattered French' settlements, in what was known as the Territory of Canada, and the traders of the old British Colonies. The question was frequently under the consideration of the Indian Department of the North, then presided over by Sir William Johnston, and frequent communications took place between him and the Lords of Trade and Plantations in reference to this country, and the best mode of governing it. It was found that English traders frequently made incursions into the country; that they purchased supplies from the Indians, and were disposed to purchase property from them at various points in this country. It was the policy of the English Government not to permit settlement to extend beyond the limits which the King had assigned to the country opened for settlement in this very proclamation. It was stated by the Lords of Trade and Plantations, to Lord Shelburne, who was well known to have been a free-trader, and anxious to favor settlement, and who proposed several new colonies in this district, one of which was to be established at Pittsburgh, and another in the Illinois country, that if the settlers were sent far into the interior the products of the colony would not reach the English market; that England had spent a large sum for the protection of the colonies against the French and the Indians, and it was desirable that they should be settled in such positions as would enable the English to profit by their industry. They favored the settlement of Nova Scotia to prevent its reconquest by France, and the settlement of Florida to prevent its reconquest by Spain. The chief of the Lords of Trade and Plantations, Lord Hillsborough, favored the expulsion of the French from this territory. There were two French colonies, two villages, each containing several for the purpose of excluding these people from the territory. A large number of those, when this proclamation was issued, crossed the Mississippi and settled at that point now known as St. Louis. Others were settled at other points. It was found that the course recommended was one likely to offend the French people of Quebec. Further difficulties were growing up between the English colonists proper and the Imperial Government, and it was felt that it was desirable to pursue towards the population of Quebec a policy of conciliation instead of the harsh policy which had been pursued during the earlier years immediately succeeding the conquest. With this object in view the Government proposed to extend the limits west of the River Mississippi on the west and the Hudson's Bay territory on the north. I need not refer to the various views put forward at this time, but there was strong objection taken to the proposition of the Government by Mr. Burke, who was at that time agent of the Province of New York. Mr. Burke's objection was founded on this condition of facts. The English Government, shortly after the war with Pontiac, in which nearly all the Indians of the North American continent were allied against them, sought to satisfy the Indians who lived in Western New York, known as the Six Nations. With this object in view they sought to exclude the settlers from the land that the Indians desired to hold, and entered into treaty with those Indians, through Sir William Johnson, which is known as the Treaty of Fort Stanwix. It drew a division line through the country open for settlement to the Indian settlers of west Pennsylvania, extending from a point near where the present city of Oswego is situated, south along the Oswego river, then up the branch known as Canada Creek, then across the country to a branch of the Susquehanna, then from the nearest point to the Ohio River. Any one who will take a map will see that the whole of western New York was reserved for the Indians, and the white population excluded from that territory. What Mr. Burke feared, when this Act was submitted, establishing the provinces by an Act of Parliament, when the Act said that the boundary should be extended to the old provinces on the south, was, that under that provision the territory recognized as Indian territory in the western part of the State of New York would be included in this new Province of Quebec. It is very obvious, from the observations made by him at the time, that it was his intention that should be done, because, he says, until you reach the highlands south of Lake Ontario and the St. Lawrence, you do not come to any English settlement, but you do meet with French settlements; and it is desirable that all those who speak the French language should be embraced in the Province of Quebec. This made Mr. Burke all the more obstinate in insisting on the southern boundary being defined. There was no attempt to alter the proposition made by the Government to extend the boundary of the Mississippi, nor to give more narrow limits to the north, but a proposition requiring the Government to lay down in the Act precisely the line on the south otherwise we might find British subjects living under a system of Government, wholly unsuited to Englishmen. Mr. Burke insisted that the boundary on the south should be clearly defined, so that, with a view to meeting his object, important alterations were made in the phraseology of the Bill. Now, I make this statement for the purpose of making it perfectly obvious why it is that the boundary is minutely described on the south of the Province of Quebec, in this Act of 1774, and no boundary is indicated anywhere else. The whole country is described as extending northward from this southern boundary to the limits of the territory of Hudson's Bay. I wish to state this fact to the House that, when you look at the logical subject and predicate in this section of the Act, you will see that the word northward does not apply to the western boundary but to the whole of the territories, countries and islands between the Baie des Chaleurs on the east, and the banks of the analyze that long complicated sentence, describing the Mr. MILLS.

Mississippi on the west. From that southern boundary northward to the shores of Hudson's Bay, the country is to constitute the Province of Quebec. It is clear that the word northward can only mean a due north, line when there is no reason for varying the line east or west; but if there is the slightest reason for varying to the eastward or westward, that reason must govern. I will mention one case in point, decided by the King in Council many years ago, in the case of the Province of New Hampshire. In that case it is stated that the easterly boundary of that province was extended north-westward to the highlands which separate the waters that flow into the St. Lawrence from those that flow in an opposite direction, and it was to be of a certain length. New Hampshire contended that the boundary should be drawn not due north-west, but only one or two degrees west of north, and the decision of the Commissioners was in accordance with that construction. An appeal was had to the King and Council, who held that looking at the terms of the charter, that was a proper construction to be put on those words. The strong point against you, if you assume northwards to apply to the western boundary, is this: That the object of the Bill was to include certain French settlements and colonies that were not embraced in the Province of Quebec. Look at the words of the Act. In the preamble it says: "And, whereas, that by arrangements made by the said Royal Proclamation a very large extent of country, within which there are several colonies and settlements of the subjects of France who claim to remain therein." The object of the Bill was to embrace these colonies. Where were they situated? Fourfifths of them were situated on the eastern bank of the Mississippi, and four-fifths at points where, if a line were drawn due north from the junction of the Ohio and the Mississippi they would not be included, and so would defeat the object the Government had in view. according to all rules of interpretation, you must interpret an Act to give effect to the object of the legislature. territory west of the Mississippi belonged to a foreign country. It is a well settled rule of public law that, when you reach a boundary, which is a boundary between nations as well as between provinces, you are to follow that separating line unless there is some clear reason for a departure from it. Is it reasonable to suppose that the Imperial Government, seeking to provide a Government for the French population, not included in the old Province of Quebec, would draw a line that would leave three-fourths of them along the territory 600 miles in length and 50 in width, excluded from the domain of any Government whatever. I wish to call the attention of the House for one moment, to the words of the first section of this Act. It is said that "all the territories, islands and countries in North America, belonging to the Crown of Great Britain, bounded on the south by a line from the Baie des Chaleurs," etc. Now, when I come to the Mississippi, it says to the banks, "along the bank of the river Ohio along the bank of the St. Lawrence, along the bank of the Lake," and so on "to the banks of the Mississippi." You have the plural form in Mississippi, and the singular form in other cases. It is not reasonable to suppose that this was done without an object, but I will not trouble the House about that, but will call their attention to a point I was about to submit to them. Northward is not a word that applies to the western boundary. There would be no sense in saying, bounded by a line on the south, northward. The subject is not a line, but all the territories, countries, and islands, bounded on the south by this particular line, extending between these particular points, the point of the Baie de Chaleurs on the one side and the point of the Mississippi on the other, northward to the Hudson Bay Territories. That territory, so indicated, is to be included in the Province of Quebec. This is perfectly clear. You cannot southern boundary and make sense of it in applying that word "northward" to anything else than the countries, territories and islands. Suppose you apply it to the banks of the Mississippi, what follows? This follows, and it is the only construction you can use upon this assumption to make the sentence intelligible: that the word "south" applies to the Mississippi as well as the Ohio. If there is a boundary described, it is the southern boundary, for the Mississippi is south of a part of the country. There is a large extent of territory; when you go north to our territory you find that it goes from Thunder Bay to the North-West angle and that territory is bounded on the south by the Mississippi by a line extending from the Baie des Chaleurs to the banks of the Mississippi, and northward, from the banks of the Mississippi as well as from the Ohio to the territories of the Hudson's Bay. Suppose, however, you assume what is perfectly obvious you cannot assume and have an intelligible construction of the section-that the word "northward" applies to the western boundary, then you have no boundary defined on the north. Northward to Hudson's Bay would be simply the north-west point of the western boundary indicated but nothing else. What follows? It follows that the boundary given to the Province of Quebec by the Proclamation of 1763 is still the boundary of that Province. That is not my view, but I apprehend that if the Government are prepared to put so extraordinary a construction upon the Act as the one indicated, that they are going to draw due north a line from the junction of the Ohio and Mississippi, which would defeat the object of this Act, and say that the western boundary is limited by that meridian, they must also logically adhere to the other consequences which would follow: and one of these consequences would be that the Province of Quebec has still as its northern boundary the boundary indicated by the Proclamation of 1763. proclamation draws the northern boundary of Quebec by a line from the source of the St. John River to Lake Nipissing, which line, in many places, approaches near to the St. Lawrence. I observe that the Government of the Province of Quebec is granting lands, promoting settlements north of this boundary line, and within the territories which, according to this view, are still the territories of Canada; that they are granting timber limits, and are receiving moneys for the issue of timber licenses. If the Government are prepared to resist the claims of Ontario, to disregard the decision given by the arbitrators, and withhold from her what I think are her just rights—rights which could be established before any judicial tribunal where the question could be fairly argued and fully considered by the Courtthen I say they ought to be prepared to act consistently throughout. I assume that they have been so acting. I assume that they are proceeding upon the principle that there is no boundary line laid down on the north, by the Act of 1874, and that Quebec has still the boundary given to her by the proclamation which has never been changed unless it has been changed by that Act. I assume that that they have not dealt out to Ontario one measure of justice, and another measure of justice to Quebec. I assume that they are disposed to act on certain legal and intelligible principles and are not acting with a view of taking vengeance upon the Government of Ontario by setting aside what was done by their predecessors.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. All I can say is that one would not have supposed, from reading the motion of my hon. friend, that he was going to bring up a discussion on the boundary line. He moved for correspondence between the Government of Canada and the Government of Quebec, in reference to the timber limits north of the boundary of Quebec, as fixed by the Proclamation of October, 1763, and upon that the hon, gentleman has given us a learned dissertation, not for the first time, on the southern boundary and the western boundary of Quebec, and therefore, he says there must be something wrong about the northern boundary. I think that is rather a non sequitur; but if there is any correspondence it will be brought down.

Mr. DAWSON said the hon, gentleman (Mr. Mills) had given what might be an interesting historical sketch, but he failed to see its application to the motion. The hon, gentleman held peculiar views in regard to the boundary, but there was a high authority in Ontario who held very opposite views in some respects. The Attorney-General for Ontario, than whom there was not, perhaps, a more able lawyer in the Dominion, held views the very opposite of those expressed by the hon, member who had just spoken. However, he (Mr. Dawson) observed that the hon, gentleman had another motion referring more particularly to the boundaries of Ontario on the paper, and when it was reached he would offer some remarks on the subject.

Mr. MILLS. In reply to the right hon, gentleman, I would say that I do not think my remarks were irrelevant, for this reason that if the word "northward" is applied to the western boundary there is no boundary described on the north. I do not see how I could bring before the House the probability that that northern boundary might still be in force, except by pointing out the facts which I have brought to the attention of the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not mean to say that the hon, gentleman's remarks were irrelevant, but they were certainly unexpected.

Motion agreed to.

CHAUDIERE RAILWAY BRIDGE.

Mr. HAY, in moving for all correspondence, reports and documents relative to the seizure of the bridge iron for the Chaudiere Railway Bridge, said: I am in favor of the National Policy, and also in favor of protecting our National Policy. I am satisfied, from what I have seen and heard that, notwithstanding all the precautions taken by the Customs Department, under-valuations of goods coming into this country amount to a very large sum: My motion refers to a gigantic fraud perpetrated within a few hundred yards of this House. I hope the matter will be thoroughly sifted, and the parties implicated treated as the law directs.

Mr. BOWELL. There is no objection to the motion passing. The Appraisers at the port of Ottawa having placed a higher value upon the iron than was represented by the invoice, the importer objected and claimed the appointment of experts under the law to value the iron which was imported for the construction of that bridge, those experts are now sitting. As soon as their decision has been given as to the actual value under the law for duty on the iron used in that bridge, I shall be able to complete the return. I can assure my hon. friend that though the importations have been numerous during the summer for the construction of that bridge, the officers in this city have had their eyes upon it the whole time, and it was distinctly understood with the importers that as soon as the importations were completed the proper steps should be taken to ascertain the fair market value of the iron in that bridge for duty. Under the law the importer claimed the right to appoint two experts. Those gentlemen have been appointed, one from Montreal and one from Ottawa.

Motion agreed to; and (at 11:30 o'clock, p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

TUESDAY, 21st December, 1880.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock. PRAYERS.

THE CHRISTMAS ADJOURNMENT

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. After the conversation that took place last night about the adjournment, I have spoken to my colleagues, and, with a good deal of gentle pressure on both sides, I have resolved to alter the resolution of which I have given notice for to-morrow; and in order that hon members may know exactly how long the Christmas holidays may be, I had better move it now, with the consent of the House. I move:

"That when the House adjourns on Thursday next, it shall stand adjourned until Tuesday, the 4th January, at three o'clock."

Mr. BLAKE. I only hope that the hon, gentlemen, to whom the hon. Minister has alluded as having exerted so much gentle pressure, will exert a stronger pressure with as successful results in a large matter.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think that my hon. friend is a little out. I made, on Monday, a proposition to him.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Proposition; I think that the House is entitled to hear the proposition.

Sir JOHN A MACDONALD. I have resisted, on greater occasions, pressure to get information about conversations before the results are attained.

Mr. FLYNN. While the time of adjournment is enough for the Ontario and Quebec members, it is not sufficient for the members of Nova Scotia and the Maritime Provinces.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. DREW moved a resolution admitting petitions for Private Bills up to the 1st February.

The motion, amended as to the date to read to the 15th January, agreed to.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

The House went again into Committee of the Whole, to consider certain proposed Resolutions, granting the sum of Twenty-five millions of dollars, and appropriating Twenty-five millions of acres of land, according to the terms of the contract relating to the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. McLENNAN. What I desire to say on the subject of the resolution, I shall endeavor to put in as few words as may be consistent with the importance of the subject, and the magnitude of the interests that are involved. I think the House will agree with me that it is impossible for us to over-estimate the importance of this subject. It is one that concerns an extent of country, of which we can only form a very vague conception, and the probable future in their material and social interests of a multitude that no man can number. The importance of the subject is established by the fact that, for several years, it has been before this and the preceding Parliaments in various forms for settlement. It comes before us, to-day, a stage forward, by the right hen. leader of the Government and his colleagues presenting it to us in a form so fair for solution, that it becomes our duty to give it our best consideration. I think, Sir, it becomes our duty to deal with it with all the wisdom, the common sense, and the highest patriotism we can apply. The contract that is before the Committee is not a contract for building a house or a sewer, or even a short line of railway, every factor and condition in relation to which dition, he will generally say that he has nothing to complain Mr. Bowell.

we can fully comprehend and provide for in the terms of the written contract, which we can fully estimate and fully guard against. On the first reading of this contract we notice the absence of such ordinary guarantees and conditions, but upon reading it again we discover that the subject is one to which such ordinary guarantees and conditions will not apply, that its features are upon such a scale that these guarantees can only be supplied by the higher guarantees of a firm, mutual interest, and dependence of the contracting parties. Without such conditions it is quite evident that no progress could be made on either side. Bearing in mind these considerations, I shall not trouble myself to consider the questions of lines, barleycorns, and inches of gradient and curve, nor of fractions or cents in rates of toll. Nor shall I, curve, nor of fractions or cents in rates of toll. Nor shall I, on the other hand, undertake to formulate fanciful estimates of the value of the land which forms a consideration to the builders of this road. The value of that land has been stated at various figures up to, I believe, four dollars an acre, and a very formidable amount of money has been stated as the sum that the construction of the railway was to cost. My idea is that, in dealing with this subject, we must deal with the lands in the North-West in the way in which they have been dealt with under corresponding circumstances in the United States. I find there that by common consent the general purpose for which land grants are made is to facilitate settlement and advance the general prosperity, rather than to make the lands a source of revenue. With this understanding, I believe that, to this day, the public lands of the United States are held and sold to settlers at $1.25 an acre. But if we undertake to establish fanciful estimates of the value of land, I do not know why we should not say $40, as well as $4. It is impossible for us to say what the land is worth. Land is not like the food in our larder, or the raiment upon our back, or the creation of our handiwork, that perish with use. We might as well undertake to put a price upon the light of the sun, upon the rain that falls from the clouds; we might as well undertake to set a price upon the liberty which is birthright, upon the privilege of using our energies, and our faculties, as freemen. The value of the land is in its use by the husbandman, and its development and occupation by a free, industrious and well governed and contented people. Again, the question arises in connection with this contract, as to the advantages of the other party to it, and the possibility of their acquiring great wealth. I think this Committee will agree with me that no men of substance or character could be found to undertake such a contract without, in the first place, freedom of action, freedom from those ordinary conditions and restrictions to which I have referred, and with the further prospect of a very great reward. In coming to the discussion of this question, we must not be dismayed by the flowers of rhetoric to which this contract has been subjected in its introduction to this House. We are familiar with such terms, terms that have lost their force here, at all events, such terms as madness, insanity, incapacity, national ruin, suicide. These adjectives have lost their force to us, they are too familiar. They have been applied for the last two years to a subject which, I think, is a fair demonstration of what I say. There is not one of those adjectives that has not been repeated over and over again in application to the National Policy, from the Opposition side. Well, I am glad to see in the Minister of Finance the smiling condition of a man with a full purse. The anathema in connection with the National Policy was, beyond any other, in the interest of the farmer; but I can safely appeal to every representative of this House as to the condition of the farming community at the present moment. I believe that every hon. gentleman in this House who comes from the country will tell us that if the farmer—one of whose great privileges as a Briton is the privilege of grumbling-is asked at the present moment about his con-

of. When the farmer, the inveterate grumbler, has nothing to complain of-I mean no offence to the farmers; I am one of them myself, and can therefore speak with the more confidence and freedom—I say when the inveterate grunbler has nothing to complain of, we may be quite sure there is no matter for complaint against the National Policy, so far as he is concerned; it does not pinch him at all events. I believe we might go further, I think there are a great many moderate Reformers who have nothing to complain of, though, at the same time, there is a body of inveterate Reformers whose full barns and larders turn to ashes when they reflect that those terrible Tories are in power. The hon, member for Centre Huron, after exhausting his own vocabulary, offered us a morsel from a London journal, to establish beyond doubt that his statements were true. What was the substance of that quotation? It does not prove quite so much as the hon. gentleman proved bimself; but it proved one thing which no one will gainsay, and that is, that a London journalist can follow the descent of a Canadian ex-Minister at a very considerable interval. I think the hon. gentleman has established further, that a gentleman who has entered upon public life in Canada under circumstances and conditions so favorable that I regret very much that there are so few of our public men possessing such advantages, has consigned himself, or will consign himself in the natural tide of time, to that condition in which he shall not merely be known as the Minister of deficits, but as the Pasquino of debate—the sayer of bitter things. I shall endeavor briefly to show that the old ladies of both sexes, who have been very much alarmed by the opening of this debate, may lay down their heads in peace during the holidays-no longer Gorgon heads of terror and despair. In the many phases through which this question has passed, and in the frequent recurrence of these forms, I think nothing has been more fully established in this House and in this country than the general desire that the construction of the Pacific Railway should be carried on by private hands; that the Government of the country should not be responsible for a public work involving so much expenditure and so much action. The little experience that has been had of the Pembina Branch, a line only, I think, about 65 miles long, managed, I venture to say, under the direction of a chief who is economical and careful to the last degree—the many complaints that beset members of this House from day to day as to the running of that very small branch line is a slight indication of what might happen if we had 2,600 miles of road in the same position. I believe that the difficulties of such a scheme as that would destroy any Government. At the same time it is quite understood, and, I think, most completely admitted on both sides of the House, that this road should be built. It is the only way in which this Dominion can have the railway facilities we require—the only thing which will make us one people, and bring about a real union of this Dominion, so that we shall be something more than the proverbial bundle of sticks. The able leader of the Opposition, in dealing with this subject, in one of those pleasant moods in which he mingles wit and wisdom so charmingly, drew a very nice picture of my right hon. friend looking down upon his subjects—his children one might call them-whirling over that road at the rate of 25 miles an hour. There is a good deal in this of practical use and value, as I have no doubt was fully intended by that hon. gentleman when he drew the picture. I think that Whatever the uses of this road in a material or social point of view, they will be much greater with the entire line upon our own soil. When I come to deal with some other questions I think I shall be able to show that in some other connection—the connection with the rates of charges and the question of monopolies which has been started—it is still more important that the line should be been objected that, with the lands now proposed to be given some that there is no difficulty in a Government building and owning a railway. It is a well-known fact that railways are run in the southern countries of Europe, in France, Germany and Italy, by the Government, and are kept under effective control. Two things may be said in this connection: in the first place, those are very short roads and very small countries. In the next place, the Governments of those countries are very different from the Government of a free people extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Many things can be done in a compact State like France or Germany that cannot be done in our country of more free institutions, with the great freedom of action that prevails; and many things can be done that we should not desire to see done in our country. I shall not be at great pains to reply to the arguments from the Opposition side, and to show that almost every member of the Opposition who has dealt with this subject, has committed himself to the precise terms of this contract. I believe that fact is so clear on the face of it, that I expect, fully, the adhesion of the member for Lambton, whom I am glad to see in his place, and who, I hope, will support the Bill. I am sorry that the leader of the Opposition is not in his place. I should like to call his attention to the maxim of a great legal authority, which may come in here. Capt. Bunsby says very frequently that "the bearing of this observation lies in the application of it." I should like to call the hon. gentleman's attention to the proposals made in 1874, very similar to the terms of this contract, with this simple difference of the "application" by the gentleman who then led the Government. I find that in 1874 he offered to all the world the sum of $10,000 per mile and 20.000 acres for the whole length of 2,600 miles of railway, without any limitation, or conditions to be applied, to the prairie or any other lands in choice or preference. That was not all: although this sum, a very considerable amount, judged by the arithmetic of to-day, for, valuing this land at the lowest sum they have conceded, $2.00 an acre, we have here $50,000 a mile, for the 2,600 miles, we are not done with the consideration offered by the late Government. Nor can we tell when we are done; for there is lurking in the back-ground of their proposal an invitation to the contractors to say upon what further sum they will take 4 per cent interest: we were to have had the Georgian Bay Branch tacked on to the 2,600 or 2,700 miles we are considering to day, which would still further have increased the amount to be expended. There were some things in the way of safeguards to be attached to their Bill. Two-thirds of this great quantity of land was to be sold at prices to be agreed upon, and the proceeds to be paid to the contractors apart from any charge of administration. If my theory is right—and I maintain it is—that the use of those lands is for settlement - I do not think it would serve that great purpose that the sale of those lands should be hampered by the unnecessary condition of a contractor naming a price for them. Nothing could more seriously interfere with the proper and necessary use of those lands than that condition. Then, again, a question has arisen upon the location of those lands, and I venture to refer to some of those points because they have been made a subject of difficulty in connection with this contract. Among other things the proposal of 1874 provided that the Government should have the right of repurchase, that is of resumption when this road was built, by paying the contractors 10 per cent in addition to the money expended upon it. I think that one of the merits of the contract of to day is, that there is no such provision in it for embarrassing the Government with the applications, the persevering and persistent require-ments of people that in a change of Government are always asking for favours affecting the great interests of the country. I think it is very much better that a way should not be the Company alienated, no public domain will be left—that all the lands will be taken up for the purpose of the railway. Well, we have a report from one of the most reliable geologists who has examined that country, in the service of the Government, which shows that there are 250,000,000 acres of land in that country available for cultivation or as pasture land, lands that will yield substance to man. This contract is precisely similar to the proposal that was made in 1871, in the provision that the lands taken by the railway company, shall be lands of fair average quality for settlement, and hon, gentlemen who have been in that country know very well that there are large tracts of available land there that might not be considered of a fair average value for the settler who is entitled to the settlement of a quarter section of land. The settler, in such a case, has to make his living, he requires arable land, he requires land every acre, every foot of which he can cultivate. There are, on the other hand, sections of country interspersed with lakelets and belts of wood, and presenting among other things a very fine landscape, very desirable for the residences of men who are not bound so closely to the soil, and very well adapted for the purposes of grazing, and for a variety of purposes that cannot be reached by an ordinary settler who requires 160 acres of land from which to make his living. There is a difference between the provision in this contract, and that in the proposal of 1874, in respect to the selection, and the quantity of land offered, and its position in regard to the main or branch lines of railway. In the proposal of 1874, the offer was made broadcast that this quantity of land would be given to any extension or any branch that might be projected from the main line. There is no such provision in the contract before us to-day. The contractor may select, subject to approval of the Governor in Council, to the extent of 25,000,000 acres in all, but the grant of land is confined absolutely to the limit of 25,000,000 acres. I state this, particularly, because I have heard the question proposed, and I have seen it stated with such persistence by parties opposed to the undertaking, that I find it is desirable to explain so simple a matter as this. Disposing then of this land question, therefore, we find that the limit is 25,000,000 acres, which, upon any computation of the length and breadth of that country, is but a very small portion of the lands there, that are available for use in some form or other. Leaving for the present the question of lands, we come to the question of the money, that the road is to cost us. That, in its entirety, is the sum of $53,000,000. This is really what we have to deal with, upon which we can put money value, because I maintain that whatever we may call the nominal value of the lands, they really do not enter into the question in computing the cost to us of this railway. I maintain that they are elements apart, connected with the settlement of the country, which we cannot reduce to figures in estimating the cost of the railway. The amount of money then in question is $53,000,000. About $18,000,000 of the grant has already been expended or provided, leaving the sum of $35,000,000 to be provided, or a charge upon the country, at four per cent, of $1,400,000 per year. Why, it is a sum that is no greater than one of those deficits of the previous Government, which we have paid so easily under the influence of our National Policy. If we get increased receipts from our present Tariff, I think we can see where this money is to come from, leaving us a surplus to be applied to other and more general uses. I think I can show, in a very few minutes, where we may expect to get this money without any reference to the present financial aspects of the country. I do not count on lands in this estimate, because, as I have said before, I do not take this into question; but, in 1879, the receipts from

It may be in five years or it may be in ten years, but I do not think it requires great stretch of imagination to suppose that in these five years, we shall have a million of additional people in this Dominion, through the settlement of the North-West; and if you add 25 per cent. to these collections you will find, not merely the $1,400,000 that we require, but a sum of about $4,600,000. I do not think that this subject requires to be dwelt upon. I think it is clear that it will satisfy every candid member of this House and every reasonable man in the country at large. Well, there are some other objections made to the contract, and I shall not detain the House long, but I shall refer to a few of them. One of these is, the freedom from duty of certain things that are to be brought in for the construction of this road, and I call attention to the fact, that that freedom is limited absolutely to the material required for the construction of the road. And that in this special exemption are not included steel rails, which are not manufactured in the country, but the smaller articles which are required, such as nuts, bolts and fish-plates, a good many of which, I believe, are manufactured in the country, and that the policy of the Government would require that imported goods of these descriptions should be subject to the duty imposed upon them in the Tariff. But hon. gentlemen should bear in mind that this is a contract between two parties, and that the contractors who are to build this road were not responsible for the National Policy. On the contrary, they may be Free Traders for all I know, and it is rather difficult for men coming from England, where the Free Trade system prevails, to appreciate the conditions that make the National Policy a good one for us. I can, therefore, very easily understand that these gentlemen should adhere tenaciously to their Free Trade policy, and I think it would have been a weakness in the Government to spoil the prospect of this contract upon so small a condition, and I believe the country will sustain them in this concession. Objection has been made to the standard adopted for this road, and we have heard a good deal about the dangers of locomotion on the Union Pacific Railway, when cars first began to run upon it. Well, it is well known that cars are used upon all roads during the process of construction, and before their completion. The course of the Union Pacific Railway was no different from this, and I believe there are gentlemen in this House, as well as my hon friend the Minister of Railways, who are tolerably conversant with the history of the Union Pacific Railway, and who are well apprised of the fact that the Union Pacific Railway, when constructed, became a good, substantial road, as it is at this day. As to the objection to freedom from taxation of the roadbed and stations of the Company, it should be remembered that this road will be the great highway of this Dominion, and I would ask any gentlemen in this House what the result would be of an application to any or all of the municipalities into which that great extent of country will be divided for freedom from taxation of such a highway. Why, there can be but one answer. No municipality or community would tax a highway of inestimable benefit to themselves, and the very point in this matter, it seems to me, is that this question is disposed of once for all in the contract, instead of being relegated to the hands of the different municipalities with which the Company would have to deal, and involving great labor, expense, and delay, with no different result from what we have in the contract. Then we are told, and it has been repeated over and over again, that we shall have no control over this road to guard against exorbitant tolls and charges, and instances have been given to us of railway companies charging exorbitant rates. These instances are of railways in the United States, and Customs, Excise and Stamps, amounted to $18,476,000. we are told in the same breath that if we were only making Now, there is a little uncertainty as to when this railway connection with the railways in the United States, we may be completed, when we shall require these $35,000,000. should be able to guard against the monopolies. I think,

Sir, it does not require much logic, to show that we should be subject to the monopolies several times over. We have also a very complete general Railway Act upon the Statutebook to provide against these excessive charges. I was rather surprised to hear the hon. leader of the Opposition read the other night the distinct provisions leader of the of that Act to protect the prices of tolls and rates to the effect that no toll should be levied or taken until approved of by the Governor in Council, nor until after two weekly publications in the Canada Gazette of the by-law establishing and of the Order in Council confirming it. It is true the hon. gentleman gave it as his opinion that that law was nugatory; the expression is his own. I do not know exactly what it means, but my impression as a layman is that if we enact a law in this House, and it is placed on the Statute-book, it is applicable and remains in force. I do not know what would happen if the hon. leader of the Opposition were the administrator of the law. Perhaps he means that he would not put it in force; but we have a very efficient provision for the enforcement of this law. I believe every gentleman in this House recognizes the great energy of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways, and I believe that, under this Act, as well as under the General Act, one part of his duty would be to see that this law is carried out. I believe this corporation would be under his particular care, and, I think, we may be satisfied that, under the present arrangement, it will receive his care, as he will have time to devote to it. He will be relieved of the enormous strain and burden which has been put upon him by this very project, leaving him with scarcely any time to devote to the other great interests of his department. I make this statement in justice to the Minister of Railways, because I believe this House and the country have scarcely appreciated the labor which that hon gentleman has been compelled to assume in the present condition of this undertaking. Then we have been told, in very expressive language, that the North-West country is handed over as a perpetual monopoly to this great corporation. Well, the hon leader of the Opposition the other day told us in his loftiest style, that modern commerce knows no such limitations, his idea being that we should have competition for the carrying trade of the North-West. Well, Sir, I believe he was right; I agree with him. Modern commerce has always found the means of overriding anything in the form of a monopoly, and if there were no provision in this Bill to guard the public interests, I think the considerations of mutual interest and independence of the interest of the corporation in having the country settled, and in providing every facility for carrying traffic, would of themselves be a safeguard in this respect. A great point is made in this connection of what the contractors might possibly do in holding lands for advanced price and then charging high rates of freight. Well, I think the statement made the other night effectually meets that objection. We were told that there were instances on the railway that crosses Minnesota of cultivated land, from which a revenue equal to $4 an acre was derived by the railway company in the way of freight. That is an excessive case, but the best proof that there is much done in that way is the well-known fact that the company has returned purchase money to the extent of $2.50 per acre to the farmers after the lands were in a state of cultivation. I do not think it would injure the comparison if we took the land as yielding one dollar to the acre to the company to show that it will not be in the interest of a land holder to keep his land tied up for ten or twenty years without cultivation. But this Company will not be without competitors in the There are already existing charters for important lines of railways which cannot be interfered with by this contract. One of these lines will open a road to the coal fields of the South-West, and I believe the Government which made the arrangement for granting land to this great wheat fields of the Saskatchewan as Winnipeg, I think we corporation retains power to reserve coal fields or any other lands that it may be desirable in the public interest to reserve. But we have something more in the North-West, and the Providence that has given us such a vast extent of valuable land has not left it without a fair supply of water. There is reasonable provision for communication by water in the North. West. I do not mean to say that there are mere water stretches, I do not mean to refer to anything so futile as the policy of the preceding Government, but there are water stretches as wide as the Atlantic, and giving to the North-West communication to the great Hudson's Bay. We have been told lately by Professor Bell, who has been employed by the Government, that there are five or five and a half months of navigation in the Hudson's Bay. We shall probably have the report before long, but if there are five and a half months navigation to Port Nelson, I think we are secure in the competition that will protect us against any monopoly of carrying to or within the North-West. It is well known that there are charters for two companies to extend from Winnipeg to Hudson's Bay, and if gentlemen will look at the map they will discover that the distance from Winnipeg to the settlement of Prince Albert, near the forks of the Saskatchewan, is about the same distauce as from Winnipeg to Port Nelson, that is about the same distance from this central point where there is a considerable settlement in the great fertile belt upon the Saskatchewan. If gentlemen will consider that here we have a sea-board brought to this great fertile belt, brought within the distance of Winnipeg, that there are two charters in existence to connect the base of this triangle, that is, from Winnipeg to Port Nelson; that there is water communication for half the distance, requiring the construction of only 250 miles of railway to form an independent connection with Winnipeg; that there is the same facility for independent connection with the fertile lands north of the Saskatchewan, making communication and stretching away into the great Peace River; I think we may relieve our minds of any apprehension of a monopoly, of which we have been warned in such emphatic terms. Some gentleman may doubt whether the sort of competition to which I have referred is a sufficient safeguard. I do not think we need to look beyond the St. Lawrence to establishthat fact. We have here one of the best routes of communication with the great Province of Ontario, and drawing supplies of freight from the great North-West as well, and upon terms that enable us, as the trade of the port of Montreal for the last year will fully establish, to compete fully and successfully with the great Atlantic ports of the United States; to compete with them in the face of all their advantage of large lines of vessels controlled by wealthy merehants and enormous capital, that have a great deal to do with the direction of the traffic and its control; that in the face of that competition, the route of the St. Lawrence has been established and improved from year to year. And why? Because this water way is open to all the world, and although it is closed for six months in the year, the facilities are sufficient to enable the carriers and dealers in this great merchandise that travels over the country, to resist monopoly and to establish freedom of action and such guarantees as are necessary. I need not dilate upon this point: every man who has paid the slightest attention to the great waterways of the country, knows it perfectly. If it were not for this it would be impossible that the great lines of steamers, owned, controlled and run by Canadians, should be kept upon this road, in the face of the smaller business of our own country with four millions of people only to compete with forty millions, and with the smaller capital we have to control the direction of trade. and with a smaller importation of goods, as compared with the Atlantic ports of the United States. I think if we consider these points, and if we consider that Port Nelson is 60 or 80 miles nearer to Liverpool than the port of New York, and, that it is as near to the great need not be afraid that the monopoly of the freight of the products of that country creeping for 1000 or 1500 miles over a railway is going to destroy the power of the producer to carry them to the sea. Now we have heard a good deal about what these contractors might do. They might gobble up these lands, they might put them in their pockets, they might sell them and go to the world's end, and spend the money, and all this kind of thing. I am glad to say that in this contract I see the hand of my right hon friend and his colleagues in their best form. They have dealt with this question in the true spirit of statesmanship. They have assumed that men would act fairly and honorably. have assumed, that under ordinary circumstances or under extraordinary circumstances as the case may be, the interests of the contractors would keep them right in connection with this work, and that men, whoever they may be, who have the energy and the ability to carry on this work, will have wisdom enough to discover their great interest in acting in common with the interests of this country by which means alone their project can be made profitable to themselves as well as valuable to this country. I think it is to the credit of my right hon, friend that he has exhibited his practical knowledge of this method of dealing, that he has not distrusted or doubted, but has left the spitting of hairs to the dreamers and speculators who ascend to the clouds or descend to the depths. I have no doubt that the House will justify the course taken by my right hon. friend. I believe the contract has been made in the interests of Canada, and that it will secure the settlement and development of our great North-West, and that that achievement will be added to the many public services rendered to the country, by the leader of the present Government. I believe this so fully in every respect that, discarding all those little doubts and difficulties and fears, I have no hesitation in saying that I shall give the resolutions my firm support.

Mr. IVES. The Government having entered into a contract for the construction of the Canada Pacific Railway, have submitted that contract to the House for its approval or rejection. The question then, Sir, has become a matter of business rather than of politics, of patriotism rather than of party. And although I have not shared in those feelings of alarm to which such forcible expression was given during last Session of this House by the leader of the Opposition, and the member for Lambton, although I have not looked upon our North-West Territory as so worthless, comparatively speaking, as they depicted it, and although I have anticipated a larger return from the sales of the lands in the North-West than they expected, although I have not placed so high an estimate upon the cost of constructing and operating the Pacific Railway as they placed upon it, yet I am free to concede that this question is one of very great importance to the country, and that a mistake made at this point will result very disastrously and seriously for many years to come, to the future welfare of this country, But, although this is a question of business and not of politics, we find hon. gentlemen of the Opposition attempting to make it a question of politics. We find hon, gentlemen of the Liberal party undertaking to lay upon the Liberal-Conservative party of this country, the whole blame of the obligation to construct this railway, and we find among them a disposition to get up an excitement in the country against the contract which has been submitted to this House. And, although I regret that the question is not discussed purely and simply as one of business, yet, if hon. gentlemen will make a question of politics out of it, I think there is no difficulty in showing that both political parties are responsible for the obligation which rests upon this country to construct the Canadian Pacific Railway, that both parties were united in determining that that railway shall be constructed by a company subsidized by the Government, and not by the Government directly, and that both Mr. McLennan.

obligation is an inviolable one, one which must be carried out. I shall endeavour, briefly, to demonstrate those three propositions. The policy of constructing a Canadian Pacific Railway had its origin as far back as the Quebec Conference, the time when our public men on both sides of politics met together to discuss a new departure. I do not mean to say that the agreement to construct the Pacific Railway was agreed upon in as binding a form as was the undertaking to construct the Intercolonial; but I do mean to say that both parties at that Conference settled upon the policy for the future: namely, one which looked to the acquisition of the North-West and British Columbia, and looked to the construction of this great railway. The Administration of the right hon. Leader of the present Government, which was in power in 1871, was only carrying into effect the policy of the new departure, the policy which was inaugurated at the time of Confederation, when he introduced into the Parliament of Canada the resolutions under which British Columbia was admitted into the Confederation. Now, the railway resolution, which was introduced by Sir George E. Cartier, on 28th March, 1871, was in these terms:

"The Government of the Dominion undertake to secure the commencement simultaneously, within two years from the date of the Union, of the construction of a railway from the Pacific to the Rocky Mountains, and from such point as may be selected east of the Rocky Mountains towards the Pacific, to connect the seaboard of British Columbia with the railway system of Canada, and further to secure the completion of such railway within ten years from the date of the Union."

This resolution was introduced in presence of several hon. gentlemen who now occupy seats to the left of the Speaker, and who took part in the debate which followed. And, what do we find? Was there any concealment at that time of the opinion as to what the cost of the railway was likely to be? No. Sir George Cartier, in the opening sentences of his speech, estimated it would not be less than $169,000,000. The hon. Finance Minister of that day, Sir Francis Hincks, also estimated the cost-would not be If there was ever going to be any opposition to the Canadian Pacific Railway, per se, to the acquisition of British Columbia, upon the terms of constructing it, that was the time to declare it, and to take ground against this resolution. But, what do we find? The first speaker who followed Sir George Cartier, was Sir A. T. Galt, who was then acting with the Opposition.

Mr. MACKENZIE. No; he never acts with the Opposition.

Mr. IVES. Well, he was certainly occupying a very independent position at the time.

Mr. MACKENZIE. He was Independent till he went to London.

Mr. IVES. Sir A. T. Galt said the admission of British Columbia into the Union was desirable, but objected to the time fixed for the completion of the road. The hon. leader of the Opposition, Mr. Mackenzie, declared for his party its policy. He said, he believed it was essential to the future prosperity of the Dominion, that British Columbia should be admitted into the Union. What did he object to? He deprecated the violation, as he termed it, of the principle of representation by population. He claimed that too large a representation was given the new Province in this House. He objected also to the annual subsidy of $100,000, given British Columbia under the resolution; but, as to the railway itself, and the admission of British Columbia on the condition of its construction, he offered no objection, except that he thought the undertaking of the Government to build it in ten years and commence it in two, was unwise and beyond their power.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Hear, hear.

Mr. IVES. The hon gentleman's objections were not to the undertaking itself, but to the terms or details of the parties have agreed, time after time, in declaring that that scheme and to the period within which the Government undertook to build the road. What do we find further? That Mr. Mackenzie, for his party, introduced an amendmen to the resolution, and surely that must be taken as its policy on that occasion. What was the amendment? Have we a direct resolution against the annexation of British Columbia or the construction of this railway? By no means. It was in these terms:

"That the proposed terms of Union with British Columbia pledge the Dominion to commence within two years and complete within ten years the Pacific Railway, the route for which has not been surveyed, nor has the expense been calculated. The said terms also pledge the Government of Canada to a yearly payment to British Columbia of the sum of $100,000 in perpetuity, equal to a capital of $2,000,000, for the cession of a tract of waste land on the route of the Pacific Railway to aid in construction, which British Columbia ought to cede without charge in like manner as lands of Canada are proposed to be ceded for the same purpose. This House is of the opinion that Canada should not be pledged to do more than proceed at once with the necessary survey, and after the route is determined to prosecute the work at as early a period as the state of its finances will justify, and that the further consideration of the said terms be postponed with a view of obtaining some modification thereof."

Mr. MACKENZIE. A very good resolution.

Mr. IVES. If the hon. gentlemen opposite can construe that resolution into a stern and determined opposition to the admission of Britith Columbia upon the condition of the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railroad, they are quite capable of explaining the inconsistency between their course last Session and this Session. On motion for the reception of the report by the Committee, Mr. Mackenzie said: "it had been stated the other evening over and over again during the debate, that he had stated he regarded the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railroad as a pressing political necessity. He denied having made any such statement." He thus continued:

"He would admit, however, that he would be willing to subject the "He would admit, however, that he would be willing to subject the country to some inconvenience in order to obtain communication with the Pacific through Canadian territory. He was in favor of opening up communication immediately through the country lying between the head of Lake Superior and Red River. From that point to the Rocky Mountains the way was comparatively easy, and quite clear enough for the use of immigrants passing into the North-West country. On the Pacific slope there was no doubt, but that it would be necessary to expend large sums from time to time as the financial condition of the Dominion permitted, in expening up a good route to this side of the Rocky Mountains. but this opening up a good route to this side of the Rocky Mountains, but this country should not be bound to construct within so short a time such a gigantic work."

The present member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) also declared his views on that occasion. What were they? They were presented in the form of an amendment in which he proposed that, instead of absolutely agreeing to build the road inten years, that the Government should agree to use their best exertions to complete it in ten years. When the Pacific Act of 1872 was introduced, the Liberal party did not take ground against the construction of the road. They merely objected to the details, especially to the powers taken by the Government with reference to the location, the chartering of a company and other details. But nowhere, from first to last, do I and any determined opposition to the construction of the road, or to the commencement of the construction as soon as the surveys should But we are not confined to this, although I think the best indication of the policy of the present Government is the resolution and Bill of 1872 and subsequent enactments. When the Liberal party came into power in 1873, what do we find them doing? The Premier introduced a Bill in which he provided for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railroad, and in which he passed through this House, the first resolution in favor of the work being undertaken by Prior to that time, the country and the Government. neither party had assumed that responsibility. But he went further than the leader of the Conservative party had ever gone, so anxious was he that that work should be constructed. He undertook, in case he could not find a company to undertake it, to construct it by the country and a dozen sentences in his speech introducing the resolution for the country. He made a second treaty with British before he declared that it was the intention of the Govern-Columbia, under which, so far as the Government ment not to undertake it as a Government work, but to were able, he agreed to spend not less than $2,000,000 on the mainland of British Columbia every in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. He purchased large quantities of rails, which he transported at great expense to the Pacific coast, for the purpose, we must presume, of building the Pacific Railway in the Province of British Columbia. Further than that, he asked for tenders for the construction of that whole line, on a basis of $10,000 in money, and 20,000 acres land per mile, and he asked also for tenders for that particular section, from Yale to Kamloops, about which we heard so much last session. Even in the motion of the present Leader of the Opposition, which was made in this House last Session, and argued at such great tength, he did not dare to attack the policy of constructing the Pacific Railway, but simply proposed to defer the construction of it for a certain period of time.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Hear, hear.

Mr. IVES. Therefore, I say that I have proved, boyond doubt, this position which I take, that both of the great political parties are equally responsible for the obligation, under which the country rests, to construct the Canadian Pacific Railway. Now, can the obligation to construct this road be avoided? I find that in the same debate to which I have referred, the debate of 1871, the hon, the present leader of the Opposition declared his opinion upon this point. I find him saying as follows:—"If this measure should become law, the faith of the Dominion of Canada would be pledged, and without the consent of British Columbia we could never break one jot or tittle of these cast iron obligations." I also find Sir A. A. Dorion, then leader of the Liberal party in the Province of Quebec, gave his opinion on this subject. Referring to the statement that it would be found impossible to build the road within the time fixed. that Canada could not be expected to ruin herself, he said : "He regretted the humiliating proposal that after the pledge had been given, it might afterwards be reconsidered." Later on, on the motion for the report, the member for South Durham (Mr. Blake) made a further declaration on this question. He said:

"The argument seemed to be that they could not be compelled to perform impossibilities, but an honest man would fulfil an obligation, even if the result might be bankruptcy. If rashly the national credit and faith were pledged to build that road in ten years, any one who voted for that obligation with the mental reservation that they would not be compelled to fulfil the obligation unless such should be desirable, was a base man.

The bill is not one that can be repealed, but is an irrevocable engagement to build the road."

I will not pause to compare the language of the hon gentleman in 1871, with the course he took during the last Session, but the inference is very obvious. Then, there is only one honorable course which we can follow and that is, to proceed with the construction of this road as rapidly as our financial position will justify.

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Mr. IVES. And a refusal to do so is not only a breach of public faith and honor, but furnishes a good excuse for the dismemberment of the Union itself. If both parties are equally pledged, and there is no way out of the obligation, the next question is how shall the obligation be performed, Shall it be by subsidizing a company to construct the road. or by having the work done by the Government, as a Government work, a course which the Opposition in this debate seem inclined to support? The constant policy of the Conservative party has been to have the road built and operated, when built, by a company. The form of the original resolution is in these words: "To secure the commencement and to secure the completion of the road: and you will find that Sir George Cartier had not proceeded a dozen sentences in his speech introducing the resolution secure a company that would undertake to build and operate the road. The House was so unanimous on this point in 1871 that resolutions were offered by both sides placing it beyond the power of the Government to expend money as a Government in the work of construction. The Pacific Railway Act affirms the view I take; the charter of Sir Hugh Allan & Co. also affirms that view; resolution of 1879, which set aside 100,00 100,000,000 acres land, equally affirmed it; the constant efforts which the present Administration have made, since they came into power, to find a company supports the position I have taken, that it has always been the policy of the Conservative party to build this road by means of a subsidized company. The views of the Liberal party on this point seem to concurentirely in the position taken by the Conservatives in this respect. Almost nine-tenths of the Railway Act of 1874, is taken up with providing machinery for the construction of the road, by means of a company; and in the last clauses of the Bill, power was taken, in case nothing else could be done, to proceed with certain sections of it as a Government work. We find, however, the policy of the Liberal party on this question is declared by the present leader of the Opposition in his speech last Session, reported on pages 1428, and 1431 of the Hansard. He said, as reported on page

"It has been repeatedly explained by my hon. friend, the member for Lamhton, that his intention was, as soon as the surveys were completed, to submit the whole of the road to tender, on a land and money basis, the contractors taking over as cash on account the works meantime executed by the Government."

And further on, he said (see page 1431):-

"But meantime further progress was made, and to some enquiries the Government answered that it hoped to be able shortly to advertise for tenders for the whole work on the land and money basis. It was the policy of the Government, at the earliest moment at which the condition of surveys would permit, to take that step and so to give a fair trial to the plan—the only plan by which the road could be constructed in any short time without increasing the rate of taxation."

Now, I think we may at once admit that the three positions I have taken are fully and clearly made out, that both parties are equally responsible for the undertaking, that both are agreed it is better to construct the road by means of a company than by the Government, and that this obligation to construct the road is irrevocable. But independent of the declaration of every party in years gone by, it commends itself to the common sense of every hon, member of the House, that it is preferable this work should be constructed and operated by a company. In the first place, the contract, such as it is, reduces to a comparatively defined amount the expenditure which is hereafter to be made by the Government. In the next place a contract of this kind, puts the matter out of the domain of party politics which, to my mind, is one of the strongest reasons why we should prefer that course to any other. In the next place, the road can be constructed more rapidly by a company than by the Government; in the third place, it can be constructed and operated more cheaply by a company than by any Minister of Public Works, no matter how watchful he may be. We all know what strong pressure is brought to bear on a Government to induce them to take employees into their service that are unfit for the position they ask for, and perhaps not at all needed. We all know how difficult it is for a Government to operate a great railway such as this will be as cheaply as a company could operate it. But over and above all this, is the fact that the arrangement proposed would render the Government the very greatest possible assistance in the way of attracting immigrants to this country. If you consider the average cost per capita of inducing immigrants to settle in the older provinces of this Dominion, and the great additional cost of inducing them to settle in the North-West, and then estimate the number likely to Well, Sir, that is not all the interest, we must add to the Mr. Ives.

settle there, you will obtain some idea of the several millions of dollars which will be saved to this country in the expense of immigration alone. The only objection to this scheme worthy of consideration which I have heard, is that it will place in the hands of a company a large lot of land which they may retain on speculation. This objection would be a very natural one for us if we were in a position to build that railway and present it to the North-West; if we were in a position to deal with these lands entirely as free grants and homesteads. If this country possessed a population of thirty millions, if we had an overflowing treasury and no public debt, we might very fairly be asked out of our abundance to construct the Canada Pacific Railway, and to take immigrants there and give them those lands free. But, unfortunately, we are not in that position. No one expected that the older provinces of this Dominion would undertake the cost and the burdens of taxation necessary to build that railway, and open up those lands for settlers. That is not our position, and, therefore, we are not in the position to object to the sale of lands for the purpose of constructing the railway. I believe there are thousands of people in this Dominion who would say: Take as much of the land as is necessary for the purpose of building the railway, and free us from the burden, even if the land must be excluded from settlement forever. I believe there are thousands of people in this country who would say: If it is necessary to consecrate one half of the fertile belt for the purpose of constructing that railway, then take it, rather than impose on the older provinces of this Dominion the burden of taxation, which otherwise must fall upon them. Having disposed, Sir, of what are, as it were, the political aspects of the case, I must ask your attention for a few moments to the question as to whether the bargain proposed in this contract is a fair one to the country. The hon, leader of the Opposition, in discussing this same point, has quoted very largely from the estimates made during the last Session by the leader of the Government and by the Minister of Railways. He has taken his estimates of population, as well as lands likely to be sold, from the leader, and he has taken his estimates of cost from the hon. the Minister of Railways. Now, suppose we take his own estimates and apply them to this question, and ascertain from them what is likely to be the advantages or disadvantages of this bargain. We find that, during the course of last Session, in his celebrated speech, he estimated the cost of the road from Selkirk to Edmonton at $17,650,000; from Edmonton to the Summit $9,000,000; from the Summit to the Pacific $36,000,000, making a total of $63,550,000. Now, the costs from Kamloops to Yale is estimated by Mr. Fleming at $10,000,000, which figures are a great deal more than the present estimate, and from Yale to Port Moody $3,500,000, a total of $12,500,000. Deduct this from the $63,550,000, and you have the idea of the leader of the Opposition as to the cost of the work to be done by the Syndicate in the central section, making in all $50,050,000. Now, to that add his estimates of the cost of the road from Fort William to Nipissing, $32,500,000, and you have a total of $82,550,000. That is the total cost of the work which the Syndicate have undertaken to do. Now, deduct $25,000,000 in cash which the Syndicate are to receive and you have a balance of $57,550,000. Now let us add the interest during the time of construction. We heard a great deal more last Session from the leader of the Opposition about interest during construction than this Session. I have not heard a word from him this Session with regard to interest during the course of construction. Now, I propose to add five years interest as an average on the whole amount, at 4 per cent, and it makes a total of estimates of the leader of the Opposition. He has always argued that this road would not pay running expenses, at all events, during the first years of its operation, and if it will not pay running expenses it certainly will not pay interest on capital account. Suppose we add ten years interest at the same rate for the period during which we may fairly say, according to the hon. gentleman's estimates, that there will be a loss of interest on capital account. Add the interest for the first ten years of the operation of the road, $27,420,000, and you have a total of $95,970,000 as the cost of the work to be done by the Syndicate, including interest, which they must lose. Now I am not able to give the hon. gentleman's figures of loss for operating expenses, but he stated it would be no doubt a large sum. He stated that the hon. member for Lambton had said that Mr. Fleming estimated it as high as $6,000,000 a year.

Mr. BLAKE. No; the gross, not the loss of operating.

Mr. IVES. Out of it would be deducted the receipts, but I have added to this amount as the total of loss—I have been very modest in the matter—I have added as the total loss of operating expenses, $4,030,000, and we have here a grand total of $100,000,000 which the Syndicate have got to get out of 25,000,000 acres of land, or, in other words, we sell it at four dollars an acre which is slightly better than $3.18, which the leader of the Opposition said that the right hon. leader of the Government had estimated it to be worth. Now, perhaps, the hon. gentlaman will not approve of those estimates, perhaps he will not like to see them applied to the present state of affairs. We will take the estimates of the hon. the Minister of Railways of last Session, and I must say that I believe that in one particular these estimates will be found to be under rather than over the mark, and that is the cost of construction of the prairie section. His estimates were, from Selkirk to Jasper Valley, $13,000,000; from Jasper Valley to Kamloops, $15,500,000; from Nipissing to Lake Superior, $13,000,000, making a total of $46,500,000. To this you must add for the equipment of these sections, which the Government construct but do not equip, the following figures: from Lake Superior to Selkirk, $800,000; from Kamloops to Port Moody, $430,000; from Emerson to Selkirk, $120,000, making a total of $47,850,000. Deduct from that cost $25,000,000, and you have a balance of $22,850,000. Add to that interest, as in the other case—because I do not suppose any one will contend that there will not be a loss of interest during construction, and during the first ten years of operation—say 15 years interest at four per cent., and you have a total of $36,560,000, that is taking the sale of the land at $1.46 per acre. But I have every reason to believe that the cost of this prairie section will prove to be more than $13,000 a mile. That part of the road will have to be constructed almost entirely with rolling stock, that is, by drawing the ballast on to the road by means of rolling stock. A large amount of rolling stock will be required, and it must not be lost sight of that the rails and supplies for the workmen will have to be transported a long distance. Ties will be far more expensive on that central section than anywhere else on the whole line. If we take the cost of construction of that portion of the road at $18,000 a mile, we have the following figures: from Selkirk to Jasper Valley, $18,000,000; from Jasper Valley to Kamloops, $15,500,000; from Nipissing to Lake Superior, $13,000,000, making a total of $46,500,000 to be expended by the Syndicate; add for equipment of the other portions of the line $1,350,000, and you will have a total of $47,850,000; deduct the cash and there is an expenditure by the Syndicate of $22,850,000; add fifteen years interest as before, $13,710,000, and you have a total of $36,560,000. This would be the sale of the land at $1.46 per acre, and if you call the land worth one dollar an acre, the Syndicate would lose $11,500,000. To offset this they would have the of maintain portions completed by the Government. So much for the taxpayers.

estimates upon this branch of the subject. I cannot help here, although the ground has been gone over by the hon. the Minister of Railways, making a comparison between this bargain and the Allan charter, and the arrangement proposed by the late Government. Comparing the work with the Allan contract, taking the distance at 2,627 miles, and calling the land worth one dollar an acre, you have, under the Allan contract, cash $30,000,000; main line of land, $50,000,000; Pembina Branch, $1,700,000; Georgian Bay Branch, $3,000,000, making a total of $84,700,000. Under the present arrangement the total to be expended by the Government, exclusive of subsidy, is $28,000,000; cash, $25,000,000; land, $25,000,000, making a total of $78,000,000, which would be a saving under the present arrangement over the Allan contract, of $6,700,000. There is another point to which I have not heard any previous speaker allude, and that is the rate per cent. which money was worth then and is worth now. The same rate per cent., at the present day, would pay both interest and sinking fund on a 33 years bond. In other words, making our financial arrangement for the construction of the Pacific Railway now, there would be a sufficient saving of interest to wipe off the whole obligation of the whole money portion in 38 years. Then, if you take the land at $2 per acre, you find the advantage to be still more striking. There would be cash, $30,000,000; land, $100,000,000, for the main line, and $3,400,000 for the Pembina Branch, and $6,000,000 for the Georgian Bay Branch, or in all $139,400,000. Under the present contract there will be a cash expenditure of $28,000,000; subsidy, $25,000,000; and for the land, $50,000,000, making in all $103,000,000, a saving of $36,400,000. compare this with the amount suggested by the late Government, leaving out of consideration the offer to guarantee the interest upon the bonds. The main line is 2,627 miles long; the Pembina Branch, 85 miles, and the Georgian Bay Branch, 85 miles, a total length of 2,797 miles. The amount of cash, under the offer of the late Government was, $27,970,000; and in lands, at $1 per acre, $55,940,000, making a total of $83,910,000 as against $78,000,000 by the contract under the present Government, a saving of $5,910,000. If the land be reckoned at $2 per acre, the figures will be as follows: under the arrangements of the late Government, $27,970,000 in cash and $111,980,000 in lands, making a total of $139,950,000, as against $103,000,000 which would be the amount of the present contract if the lands were taken at $2 per acre. This would show a saving of $36,930,000, without taking into account the guaranteeing of the bonds. As to the value of the lands I agree very much with the speaker who preceded me. I do not care whether you call the price $1, $2 or $3.18 per acre, so far as the arrangements are concerned, but I cannot resist the temptation of giving a few quotations from the remarks of hon, gentleman opposite as to the value of these lands. In the course of the debate of 1871, the member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) said:

"A company had been spoken of but where was the company? How could any company raise $75,000,000 on 50,000,000 acres of barren waste land?"

The Hon. Mr. Joly, then a leading member of the Liberal party, said:

"For years to come the line could not pay one-tenth part of its cost, and no company would undertake it unless they received every assistance, for the line would not obtain anything like the traffic that the Union Pacific obtained."

The Hon. Mr. Smith said:

"No one could suppose that even after the road was built it would pay one-tenth of its working expenses, and how, therefore, could British capitalists be expected to undertake it."

The present member for South Wentworth (Mr. Rymal) said:

"Added to this there would be the yearly and ever-increasing burden of maintaining the railway, all of which would fall on the poor taxpayers."

In a second speech, the hon member for Gloucester (Mr. as they have proved to be for the United States north-Anglin) used the words:

"In addition to this amount for cost of construction there would be the working expenses to add to the burden."

The leader of the late Government, according to Hansard, 1874, page 92, estimated the running expenses at $6,000,000 per annum, out of which would, of course, have to be deducted the receipts. I think, Sir, that it has been pretty clearly shown that, independent of those objections which have been raised to matters of detail, the main features of this contract are more advantageous to this country than any other proposal yet made to this House. The next question we have to consider is whether the Dominion can safely assume the burden imposed upon it by this contract. As I understand the matter we shall have to provide about $35,000,000—that is $25,000,000 of a subsidy to the Company and $10,000,000 for expenditures hereafter to be made. It seems to me that it would not be necessary to undertake the construction of the 90 miles from Yale to Fort Moody, for perhaps a period of five years, or at all events until the railway from Kamloops to Yale has been completed. If that course were adopted I find that the expenditures for each year would be as follows: first year about $6,275,000; the second year about the same amount, while the 3rd, 4th and 5th years would be about $3,900,000 annually, and the 6th, 7th, 8th, 9th and 10th $3,060,000 annually. But I do not think it would be necessary for the country to borrow all of this money, or even the larger portion of it. I believe that in the era of prosperity which has dawned upon this country, and which under the liberal expenditure of money which must be made for the next ten years, the present Tariff may be counted upon to produce a large and yearly increasing surplus. I believe that with the present Tariff it will never be necessary to borrow an additional dollar for the purpose of constructing the road, more particularly if there should be a portion of the money derived from the sale of the bonds, which, as seems to be indicated by one clause of the contract, are to be deposited with the Government. There is one point which is important in connection with the consideration of our resources to meet this obligation, and that is the probability of immigration. During the last Session of this House we had a very long and able discussion of this subject. The leader of the Opposition gave, as his opinion, that we could not expect anything like the immigration into our North-West, which had occurred in the case of the north-western United States, and that for two reasons. In the first place, the hon. gentleman said, we had nothing like the recruiting ground which those States had enjoyed. I beg most respectfully to differ from that view. He argued that our recruiting ground had only 4,000,000 people, whereas the recruiting population of the north-western States amounted to 30,000,000. I must differ from those figures. In the United States, only the New England and Central States furnish emigrants to the western States. No one ever heard of emigration from the Southern States, or from the Pacific slope to the north-western States, to any appreciable degree. Therefore, when considering the extent of the recruiting ground of the north-western States, you must deduct the south and the far west. But the same New England, and Central States, which have furnished a recruiting ground for the north-western States, will furnish one for our own North-West. I believe it is capable of demonstration, that the large blocks of land available for settlement to emigrants in the United States are yearly growing less, and have been nearly exhausted. I do not mean that there is no good land left for settlement, but that the United States have not at present anything that will compare with our own North-West. If that be true, and if, as I believe, our own North-West has become thoroughly advertised, and its merits are beginning to be thoroughly States as much as a recruiting ground for ourselves able exodus of our population to the United States. The Mr. Ives.

west. The Yankee is not very particular under what flag he lives, provided you furnish him with good land; he is not very particular as to his residence provided he can make money. I do not believe that the fact that the Union Jack instead of the Stars and Stripes floats over our North-West will deter American emigration when its merits become fully known to the American people. Another argument advanced by the member for West Durham was, that if we analysed the increase of the population in the United States north-west from 1860 to 1870, we should find a very large percentage of it was born within those States, and that, therefore, we must take that into consideration in estimating the acres of our land which will likely be taken up and purchased. He made this mistake, that children under 10 years are not, as a general thing, likely to purchase land, and such children born between 1860 and 1870 could not have purchased land in the north-west States. Therefore, we must conclude it was the class that entered that country either from the New England and Central States, or the foreign immigrants that purchased its lands. Only think for a moment what has been the tremendous increase of population in those north-west States from 1860 till 1870. Take, for instance, the several States which certainly have not better land or a better climate than our own North-West. The following figures will show the increase:

Nebraska	28,841	122,993
Minnesota		439,706
Wisconsin	775,881	1,054 679
Michigan	749,113	1,184,059
Iowa	674,913	1,194,020
Increase	2,507,917	4,350,847
Increase	1,851,870

Oh, but hon gentleman opposite will say, that is in the United States. They do increase there, whereas in Canada we always go slow; we cannot expect anything like the increase witnessed in the United States. Well, let us turn our attention to the New England States, and see what was their increase during the same decade, and compare it with that in the older provinces of the Dominion. These figures will show the result:

Population.	1860.	1879.		• •
sine	628,279	626,615	loss	.22
ew Hampshire	326,073	318,300	64	7,38
ermont	315,098	339,551
assachusetts		1,457,351		18 38
node Island	174,620	217,353		24.47
onnecticut	560, 147	537,454	*4	16 60
	,135, 283	3,487,924
Gain	352,641	11.24 p	er ce	nt.

The Canadian Census returns for the decade from 1861 till 1871, show a gain of 395,200, or 12.78 per cent. But the very fact that the great gain in population in the United States has been in the west—that there has been a falling off in the New England States, ought to teach us the importance of our own North-West to the growth and development of our country. We cannot expect a very large incresse in the population of our older Provinces for any decade. • As the lumbering interest becomes exhausted, we shall experience a loss of population. As our agriculturists become more wealthy, they will buy out their neighbors, and the population will diminish. But if, under a wise fiscal policy, manufactures and commerce are fostered and developed, we may expect a large increase in our cities and manufacturing towns, and a great development of wealth, as there was in New England from 1860 to 1870, although there was only a small increase of its population. There is sure to be a large increase of wealth in our older Provinces if such a wise and advertised; and its merits are beginning to be thoroughly beneficial fiscal policy obtains, hereafter, as I believe is understood, we may look to the New England and Central practised at present. But it is said there is a most remark-leader of the Opposition, the first day of the Session, gave us some figures to show that, during the last years of the Administration of my right hon. friend there was a yearly increasing number of Canadian emigrants to the Republic; that during the five years of the late Government, the number annually decreased, and that since the accession of the present Government, the number has again been increasing. I take those figures as giving the best possible proof, that a large portion of this so-called emigration represented the movements of business men going to the United States on business. During the good times, before the change of Government, in 1873, when people had occasion to go to the United States to purchase goods, and had money to travel with, there was a very large amount of this so-called emigration to the States; and now, again, that better times are come, and the people have money for travel and business in the States, you find a very large reported emigration, which consists of business men going to and coming from that country. But during the five lean years of the late Government, the number constantly decreased, because our people had no business to do in the United States; but even if they had had business, they had no means of travelling to and from the Republic. I believe that those figures prove that this supposed large exodus consisted of business men travelling, and of emigrants passing through Canada to the States, and through the States to our own North-West.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. IVES. When the House rose at six o'clock, I was addressing myself to the question of immigration, and, if you will pardon me, I will add a few words to what I have already said on the subject. I look upon the matter in this light: That we have the only large block of good land, prairie land, now remaining unsettled in America; that our lands are becoming well known to the immigrating world, both in Europe and in America; that good lands in the United States, although not entirely exhausted, are rapidly becoming exhausted, particularly in large blocks; and that the Government, in its efforts to promote immigration, working in accord with the Syndicate, will naturally bring about, in the course of the next ten years, a very much larger immigration to our North-West, and also to the older Provinces of the Dominion. This is a matter of the very greatest importance to us. I look upon it as the salvation of the country, and as a means of raising from the shoulders of the present population the burden of taxation which now rests upon us. I now propose to address myself for a few moments to the objections which have been raised by hon. members to the minor details of the contract. The first of these objections is that the lands are to be selected by the Syndicate themselves. Now, as this point seems to be objected to with great seriousness, it may not be out of place to compare the provisions of the contract with those of the Act of 1874, introduced by the late Government. In the contract it is provided that, should any of the sections consist, in a material degree, of land not fairly fit for settlement, the deficiency may be made up by lands to be selected by the Company in similar blocks along any branch line, or line to be located by the Company, or any common front line, or lines agreed upon between the Government and the Company; and the Company may, with the consent of the Government, select in the North-West Territories, any tract or tracts of land not taken up as a means of supplying, or partially supplying, such deficiency. The provisions in the Act of 1874, section 4, are these:

The said lands to be of a fair average quality, and when a sufficient that our Local Government not only gives the right of way the same quantity or as much as may be required to complete it, shall be appropriated in such other portions as may be determined on by the Gevernor in Council."

By the present contract, 25,000,000 acres of land, fairly fit for settlement, are appropriated; by the Act of 1874, 52,000,000 acres of land, of fair average quality, are appropriated. Now, I appeal to the House whether there is any serious difference between the terms of the contract and the terms of the Act of 1874, with respect to the quality of land which the Syndicate, in the one case, and the contractors in the other case, were to-receive from the Government, except that, in the one case, the quantity to be appropriated was very much in excess of the quantity to be appropriated in the other. Then, the one proposition makes the selection of the land necessary to supply the deficiency along the main line, a matter of agreement between the Government and the Company; whereas, in the other case, the Governor in Council may designate the land which the contractor was to take, but was bound to designate land of fair average quality. I ask whether there is any serious difference between the terms of the Act and the contract in this particular. But there is this very great difference: that whereas the terms of the contract are no more onerous, but, on the contrary, are quite as favorable as those of the Act, yet they make the scheme, as a financial scheme, much more satisfactory than by the terms of the Act. Under the contract it would be impossible for capitalists to say to the Syndicate that they would be obliged to take inferior land. The next objection is that the Syndicate may choose their own route. Here, too, we might compare the language of the contract with the language of the Act of 1874. The termini of the eastern section are fixed, the one at Callander station and the other to connect with the line from Lake Superior to Selkirk, and the termini of the central section are fixed, the one at Selkirk and the other at Kamloops; and, inasmuch as 100 miles of the road from Selkirk west has been nearly constructed, inasmuch as the line has been surveyed and located by the Government, I do not think there is any likelihood there will be any great deflection made by the Syndicate from the line actually selected. In the Act of 1874 the following are the provisions, and I may say they are much less definite than the provisions of the present contract. Section first of that Act provides:

"That a railway to be called the Canada Pacific Railway shall be made from some point near to and south of Lake Nipissing to some point in British Columbia on the Pacific Ocean, both the said points to be determined and the course of the line of railway to be approved by the Governor General in Council."

In both cases the location is subject to the approval of the Governor General in Council; but to the people of the older Provinces what great difference does it make whether the line goes ten miles north or south of a given point. We know that the interests of the Syndicate will be to locate that line where it will be likely to receive the largest traffic, where it may be the most direct and the most cheaply constructed. Provided these terminal points are connected, we have no reason to find fault with the way in which the work is done, and there is more definiteness in the terms of the present contract than there was in the terms of the Act of 1874, which hon gentlemen opposite found to be perfectly satisfactory. Objection is taken that the Government give the Company right of way and ground for stations, sidings, workshops. &c. Now, I am surprised to hear objections taken to a provision of that kind, I am surprised to hear hon, gentlemen, who represent constituencies of the older Provinces, taking exception to that provision. Does not every hon, member from the Province of Quebec know that nothing is more common than for Governments to aid the construction of railways in that Province? Does not every hon. member from Quebec know a subsidy of so many dollars per mile to aid in its construction, and not only that but our own people assist with money bonuses the construction of our railroads in that Province?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hear, hear.

Mr. IVES. And I presume it is the same with other Provinces in the Dominion; yet we find hon. gentlemen, whose constituents are in the habit of putting their hands into their pockets to assist railroads at home, object to committing this House to this measure which gives a company the right of way to the North-West, built for the special purpose of the settlers there.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Hear, hear.

Mr. IVES. I am surprised to hear this objection raised when we are about to make a definite arrangement which will relieve us of the obligation to build the road, an obligation which those hon. gentlemen have often declared to be an onerous one. Then, Sir, there are three other objections. It does not do for hon. gentlemen to urge their objections consecutively, because they are inconsistent with each other; they first urge one and then throw in an interlude, and then another, and then throw in another interlude, and then urge a third. These three objections are: first, that the Company need not invest any of their own capital in the undertaking, since once they have paid a million security, and subscribed five millions and paid up 30 per cent. of it, the individuals signing this contract are personally discharged, and the liability becomes a liability of the Company; second, that the exemption of the Company's lands from taxation for 20 years after their grant by the Crown, will cause the Company to hold these lands at large prices, to the retarding of settlement and the injury of the settler on the remaining Crown lands; third, that the Company have entire power to fix, and will fix, very high freight rates, amounting to a tax of $4 per acre on the lands cultivated by the farmers of the North-West. Now, let us look at these objections. I take it that the Syndicate will either fulfil their contract and complete and operate the road, or they will not. If they fulfil the contract, the security is fully met; if they do not, they will not hold the lands and will not have the fixing of high or low rates for traffic. If they carry out their contract, they must either sell the lands to obtain money to do so, or else put their own money into the work. If they put their own money into it we shall have security for the building and operating of the road, and we shall have security that they will not do it at a rate that will retard traffic or discourage settlement. We can thus easily see the foolishness of the arguments that hon, gentlemen have arged upon these points. As to the objection that these lands will be exempt from taxation for 20 years— I am speaking of this undertaking as an obligation of the older Provinces of this Dominion to construct this railway, -I ask hon, gentlemen in what way they could carry forward that enterprise, which would cost the older Provinces of the Dominion so little, as the way which the contract suggests. If you reject this contract on that ground, what follows? This follows: that we revert to the old state of things. The Government do not thereby become absolved from the obligation of building the road; they must neces the construction of the railway and telegraph line, are to sarily take it up and carry it on as a Government have hitherto they done. Would these lands about exemption from taxation? be exempt from taxation in that case until they were sold? Sir, I look upon the argument that was urged by the hon. leader of the Opposition, that the Company have the very greatest interest in the disposing of these lands—that the transportation of the grain raised from these lands was that to which they have to look for a revenue, as being a most important argument. I believe it will be the interest and policy of these gentlemen, who are on all sides quantities are not to be admitted free of duty, and they also r. IVES.

acknowledged to be gentlemen of good sense and business ability, to dispose of those lands on easy terms and as rapidly as they are able to do so. But it is said they may not take the lands from the Government, even when they have a right to them, until they find an opportunity of selling them, and in this way may prolong this period of exemption indefinitely. Surely the Government can compel these gentlemen to take an assignment of these lands when they become entitled to them. When we consider that this is the one particular in in which we can make the scheme a taking one, financially speaking, without costing us a dollar, I must say I am surprised to hear this objection raised, especially by members representing the older Provinces of this Dominion. As to the security for the construction of the road, the hon. leader of the Opposition, in the course of his speech the other evening, furnished us with the most conclusive argument that the Syndicate would complete every section of this road. After showing us that the Syndicate were likely to make a good deal of money out of the construction of the central section, he went on to show us that they would make $3,000,000 more by constructing the western and difficult part of the central section, than they would by not constructing it. Surely, if these men are the hard-hearted men they are represented to be, they will not drop that three millions. The hon. gentleman also showed us that they would make $833,000 more by constructing the line north of Lake Superior than by not constructing it. Now, we do not want any better argument that the Syndicate will build these portions than this argument, turnished by the hon. gentleman himself. Then we are told that there may be very high rates fixed, and that the settlement of that country may be retarded, and the prosperity of that country prevented thereby. Sir, it is admitted on all hands that the Government of this country have the fixing of the rates for traffic on this road. But even if the Government had not the fixing of the rates, surely it would not be contended that men of their business capacity would fix such rates of traffic as would prevent the raising of wheat in that country. But I ask hon, gentlemen to-state the rate per mile they would fix on the different classes of freight. I ask them if this contract prescribed rates which the House would approve of, whether any company in the world could possibly float the scheme. The Government might have agreed to very high rates, to rates which the Syndicate could have satisfied capitalists were paying rates; but we could not have approved of such rates. We would have said: these rates are prohibitive, these rates will retard the development and settlement of that country; and we could not have agreed to them. But suppose the contract had fixed rates which would, perhaps, be paying rates after the country became settled with a population of two or three millions, then the project would have been entirely unsuccessful, for no capitalists would have been found to invest in the scheme, as, for many years to come, the road must have been operated at a loss, or, at all events, there must have been a great degree of uncertainty about it. Then it is objected that steel rails, fish-plates, other fastenings, spikes, bolts, iron, timber, material for bridges to be used in be admitted free of duty. Suppose we reject this contract on that ground, what follows? As I said before, the Government must proceed to construct the road, and in that case all these articles come in free of duty. But, hon gentlemen argue this matter, as if the admission of everything had been made free of duty under this contract. We forget that locomotives, cars, picks, shovels, carts, waggons, harness, horses, axes, steel for drills, powder, boots, ready-made clothing, food supplies, and a thousand other things, that will be used in the construction of the Pacific Railway, in immense forget to tell the House that steel rails are now admitted free of duty for everybody. I ask whether it is not possible for the manufacturers and business men of this country to make enough out of the operation of that contract, by the enlarged trade that must ensue in such things as are not free of duty, as must necessarily be manufactured in the country, whether they cannot make enough to compensate them for the loss upon nuts and bolts? Then objection is raised that the Government are going to let these people have the whole advantage of that exceedingly good bargain, which the Minister of Railways made with respect to the purchase of rails, but they forget that another bargain was made some years ago, which was not so good a bargain. They forget that the Syndicate are obliged to take all the rails that the Government do not want at cost.

Mr. BLAKE. No; only rails bought since 1879. Sir LEONARD TILLEY. There are no others.

Mr. IVES. During the early part of this Session we heard a noise as of distant thunder. It was impossible to tell for a day or two what it meant or what was coming, but, early on Friday last it became manifest that we were to expect a manifesto from the Liberal members of this House, that that manifesto was to be signed with the hands and scaled with the scal of the great leaders of the party in this House, and that it would be sent to every voter in the Dominion, and would strike terror to every Conservative heart. Well, it has come, and, to the surprise of everybody, it is not signed with the hand of the great leaders, and it is not sealed with their seal. In fact, it belongs to the noname series, it is issued anonymously.

Mr. PLUMB. Anonymously, but not unanimously.

Mr. IVES. No one in the House could be found who would take the responsibility of fathering it. I do not wonder because it is deformed offspring, it is one of those children to whom it is unnatural to tell the truth even from the cradle. Now, why is this manifesto disowned? It is disowned, I have no doubt, for this reason: that it may be necessary, within a week or within a month, but certainly it is probable within a year, to say something entirely different. It may be necessary for the leader of the Liberal party to put forth views entirely and diametrically opposed to the views set forth in the memorandum. Therefore. although I must say those gentlemen are not very particular about consistency, still it would not do to issue a manifesto and acknowledge it, and then to issue another diametrically opposed to it so soon afterwards. Let us look at this celebrated manifesto. It says this:

"It has generally been conceded by all parties that, with proper restrictions in the working of the road, and the power of resuming ownership, it would have been in the public interest to have the Pacific Railway constructed and worked by a private company."

The statement sounds very queer after the expressions of opinion which were given in this House only last Session. Why, Sir, we were told that the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway would ruin the Dominion of Canada, that the operation of this road, by the Government, would be an annual charge of millions of dollars upon the treasury of the country, and now, for sooth, it is discovered that, perhaps, it would be better if the country could get rid of the obligation and shove it off upon a company. Then we are told in this manifesto that it would have been better on all hands had there been a provision inserted in the contract that the Government might take it back in some future period and operate it as a Government work. Now, upon that point, I propose to read to the House a statement made in the Toronto Globe of November 8th, and headed "Impossible Bargain:"

would be given to the Company for risking a loss in the meantime. But, the World correspondent says, that the road will be thrown on the hands of the Government as soon as finished. We can hardly believe the assertion, though it is consistent with the statement that a guarantee of only $1,000,000 is mentioned in the contract.

"The avowed object of negotiating with a company for the completion

"The avowed object of negotiating with a company for the completion of the work in ten years, was that the Government of Canada should escape all responsibility for the enterprise by making a definite payment. escape all responsibility for the enterprise by making a definite payment. The people are, perhaps, not opposed to granting a subsidy in excess of the sum for which the line can be built, if by such grant the line can be finally got rid of. But, to pay $20,000,000 more than the estimated cost of the railway, and, after doing so, assume the enormous responsibility of running and maintaining it, never occurred to any advocate of the Syndicate scheme. Such a plan would unite nearly all the evils of the contract system, with all the evils of pushing forward the enterprise much more rapidly than could be done on that system. Absolutely nething would be gained by it except that one set of contractors instead of several would undertake the construction of the road. Add to twenty million dollars the great sum which will be annually lost in running and maintaining a line 2.500 miles long during the years which must elapse after taining a line 2,500 miles long during the years which must elapse after 1891 before a traffic sufficient to pay running expenses can be created, and we have the amount which the country will be called on to pay in and we have the amount which the country will be called on to pay in excess of the cost of building the railway as rapidly as the development of the North-West warrants. The amount is too great to render advisable a scheme recommended only by the fact that it would take from Sir Charles Tupper the power of letting contracts. The possible loss by corrupt administration is as nothing to that which would occur if such an agreement had been entered into as that set forth in the columns of the New York World We cannot believe that even Sir John's Ministry has entered into such a bargain."

That is the opinion of the Globe newspaper on the regret expressed in this manifesto: that the Government have not taken power to take back the road into their own hands. Surely the hon. gentleman does not mean to say that any body of capitalists would undertake to construct this road and then operate it, during the period when it must be operated, at a loss, giving the Government the right to take it back when it began to pay, without allowing them for their disbursements? Here is another queer statement in this manifesto:

"According to the valuation of Sir John A. Macdonald and the Department of the Interior, the lands to be received by the Company are Department of the Interior, the lands to be received by the Company are worth $3.18 an acre; a sum less than the price realized by the Railway Companies of the United States. This will make the Government subsidy in land, for the construction of the central section of the railway, equal to $59,625,000, or in lands and money, $74,625,000, for building a road worth $28,500,000, and which the Company are to own when completed."

I beg to call attention to the very guarded language of this paper: "According to the valuation of Sir John A. Macdonald and the Department of the Interior." In this manifesto, to which no member of the Liberal party dared attach his name, the statement is not made that the lands are worth even $1 per acre. And why not? Simply because it might be necessary in the time to come to take up the old line of argument, that the country is good for nothing and the lands are worthless. Then we have this statement:

"The terms of the contract give the Company a monopoly of the entire trade of the North-West until the year 1900. A territory larger than the settled portions of the whole Dominion, fertile, and in every way well suited for colonization."

I must say that that is the first declaration of the kind I have heard—that those lands are fertile and larger than the whole extent of the Dominion, and every way suited for colonization; and I regret that some hon. member did not put his name to the manifesto, so that I could have the opportunity of congratulating him upon so sensible and patriotic a declaration. Again it is said:

"The Company are thus made the proprietors of a road built for them by the country, and will receive from the people, not only the railway, but also a bonus, in excess of what the road costs of $56,000,000."

That statement is true thus far, that the contractors will build 2,006 miles, and the Government will build 621 miles, and, according to my estimate, they will have to pay at the rate of $1.46 per acre for the land they get. We are told that the subsidy given in this contract to the Syndicate is "The engagement to pay so much was, of course, understood to imply that the Company would take the risk of running and maintaining the line for all time. Ten years after completion, in 1891, the road may posssibly pay running expenses, and the large sum in excess of its cost this year; and I must say that in this article the Globe correctly gave the amount of the subsidy in land and money, whether by a good guess or by information supplied by the Minister of Railways I cannot pretend to sav :

"We do not contend that, large as these sums are, they are too much to reimburse the Company at the present time for building such costly sections and working them at a loss. What we do say is that for the present the whole of this enormous expenditure might be avoided by simply confining the scheme to the completion of the works under contract and the extension of the road westward from the Ked River to the Bocky Mountains.

The next statement of this manifesto is, that the construction of the line north of Lake Superior is unnecessary. There is the same advocacy of the Sault Ste. Marie Branch which we heard from the leader of the Opposition the other evening. I would like to give the opinion of the Globe on this subject as on the 21st of February 1873, when Sir Hugh Allan suggested that that route might be an advisable one to follow:

"A very cursory examination of the country to be traversed by the American road from the head waters of Lake Superior will show how failacious all such arrangements are, and how, not only the line through British territory may be carried through, from strictly commercial considerations, but must be, if British authority is to be maintained on this continent, and our new Dominion made practically as well as in theory a great fact. Apart from all other considerations, the very fact theory a great fact. Apart from all other considerations, the very fact that the line under consideration is through American territory would be a fatal objection to its being made the grand trunk line for the Canadian North-West. Those who had the command of it would in a very few years command the country. All the intercourse, both social and commercial, of the people of the North-West region would be directly with and through a foreign people, and what might at any moment become a hostile country. By a mere stroke of his pen a foreign ruler might lay an embargo upon the whole intercourse of that part of Canada which lies o the east. The bonding system, as we have lately had hinted at in connection with a region nearer hand, might be stopped capriciously, and on very short notice; the tide of emigration might be turned away from our border to a certain extent at any rate, while everything would conduce to make the absorption of the whole territory by the States a mere question of time, and of time very short at the longest."

The Globe adhered to that view until very lately; in fact, it did not change it until the hon. leader of the Opposition delivered his speech in favor of the Sault Ste. Marie route. No longer ago than the 27th of November of this year the Globe had the following article:-

"Instead of the Northern Pacific being likely to take from Canadian routes the trade of the district north of the boundary line, it seems probable that the Canadian Pacific, east of Selkirk, will be able to take some trade from the districts immediately south of the boundary line. We may leave out of consideration the freight that will take water either at Duluth or Fort William, in competing for which the Canadian port will certainly get the Canadian trade. Let it now be supposed that both the Sault Ste. Marie Branch and the line around the north shore of both the Sault Ste. Marie Branch and the line around the nerth shore of Lake Superior, have been built. For all-rail freight seeking the ocean, the Sault Branch must get the whole traffic of the Northern Pacific, because it offers a route shorter by 439 miles than that via Chicago to New York. Montreal will certainly become the eastern port of both the Northern and the Canadian Pacific. It has been supposed, however, that the Sault Branch will enable the Northern Pacific to take from the line around the north shore a portion of the trade of the North-West. This opinion is not warranted by an inspection of the table of distances. Produce delivered at Selkirk would have to travel over 100 miles farther Produce delivered at Seikirk would have to travel over 100 miles farther to Montreal by the south shore than by the north shore of Lake Superior. Again, take a point on the boundary line due north of Bismark, and it will be found that a bushel of grain grown there is more likely to go to Montreal by the Canadian north shore line than by the Northern Pacific and Sault Branch. A railway has been projected from Winnipse to Souris River, and westward from the Souris to the Bow River district, near the Rocky Mountains. That road will surely be built at no distant day, as a commercial enterprise unaided by a Government subsidy. Freight situated on the boundary line due north of Bismark and destined for Montreal, would have to travel about thirty miles farther it want for Montreal, would have to travel about thirty miles farther if it went south to the Northern Pacific than if it went north by the Souris line to south to the Northern Pacific than if it went north by the Souris line to Selkirk. The Canadian Railway west of the Souris will run nearly parallel to the boundary line, and about the same distance frem it as the Northern Pacific; it follows that if branch lines were constructed from the boundary line north and south the Canadian route would offer to all freight on the boundary line shorter transit to the ocean than the Northern Pacific. In fact the Bow River, Souris, Selkirk, and north shore route ought to take the traffic of a strip of American territory some fifteen miles wide. Of course branch lines will not be constructed on mathematical direct routes, but I fear that if the gentlemen on the other side of this House were to be so judged, that the miseries the people suffered at their hands for five years would load to their consignment to a place in which, were they conscious of the motion of that train, it would be merely by hearing the rumbling of its wheels.

Mr. LAURIER. The contract now before us, and which the House is asked to sanction, is the last and crowning Mr. IVES.

tapped by the Canadian railways. If both Governments grant charters freely, the result will probably be that some Canadian produce will go seaward by Duluth and more American traffic by Selkirk. At any sate Montreal will get traffic from both roads, as all points on both are many hundred miles nearer Montreal than any American ocean port.

Now that has a very important bearing on this question of monopoly. If the Canadian Pacific Railroad constructed to the north of Lake Superior, would not only hold its own in competing for the trade of all the North-West, but would also, if branches were constructed into the States, attract from the northern States a portion of the traffic of that country, we have not very much to fear from the cry of monopoly. Certain political leaders before to-day have published manifestoes, and have often been surprised to find the people did not get more excited over them. I am inclined to think that the Liberal members of the House of Commons, who put forth this manifesto, will find it has not created such a tremendous sensation as they expected. But supposing we reject this contract, not because its major provisions are unfair to the country-because no one seriously argues that-but because we do not approve of this or that little detail connected with it, what is to be the result? I am now addressing more particularly my political friends. The result would be the defeat of the Ministry, and the strangulation of all those industries that have sprung up and been fostered by the now fixed policy of the present Government. The leader of the Opposition says the people will speak when they have an opportunity. I believe they will; and what will they say? They will say that the Liberal party taught them to believe that the construction of the road was almost beyond the financial power of the Dominion, and that its operation would prove to be an annual burden on the Treasury. They will say they believe that the subsidy given this Company is a moderate and reasonable one; that, as to the minor details of this measure, they do not propose to throw it overboard, and assume the great burden they have happily got rid of merely on account of those minor details; also, that this question of exempting the Company from taxation is one that ought not to weigh with the people of the older Provinces, who, I believe, will not regard this contract from that ground merely, and take upon their own shoulders again the burden of constructing and operating this railway. The people of this country will speak when they have an opportunity, and, if I mistake not, their verdict will be this: that they prefer to expose the Government of this country in the hands of those men who have had the honor and pleasure of introducing almost every good and useful measure that has ever become law, rather than entrust power to the hands of the men who, during their term of office, seemed to have done more towards depressing the industries of this country than any other Administration. The leader of the Opposition referred in terms of derision, to a fancy sketch made by someone, of the right hon. leader of the Government looking down from the realms above upon a train with the Club Cartier going west over the Canadian Pacific Railway. I hope, and believe it is the wish of every hon. member that he will have the pleasure in his own lifetime of seeing that realization of his hopes. I think that, after the time and labor he has devoted to the service of this country, he deserves to live to see accomplished the greatest work of his life. This much I feel convinced of, that if he were judged by the people of Canada, he certainly would be in a position to look down upon such a scene; but I fear that if the gentlemen on the other side of this House were to be so judged, that the consequence of the principle laid down ten years ago by the Government then in power, when they introduced the Canadian Pacific Railway scheme, and which was: that this railway should be built immediately and without interruption until its completion. It must be clear, from the remarks of the member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives), with regard to the position of the two great parties, that, at the outset, the ground taken by the Conservative party was this: the railroad should be built immediately, and without interruption till finally completed; whereas the policy of the Liberals was that it should be built gradually as the wants of the country should require, and its resources permit. The reason urged by the leader of the Conservative party for the immediate completion of the road was, that it was a necessity of Confederation which would otherwise remain incomplete. If it was, it was not a necessity of Confederation as primarily established; nor was it a necessity that sprang from any natural cause. If it was, however, such a necessity, it is perhaps the severest commentary upon the policy followed some years ago of creating whole Provinces out of the wilderness, and of endowing them with all the institutions and luxuries with which Provinces with large populations must be supplied, while in these cases there was scarcely any population. Hon. gentlemen opposite will remember that they received ample warning not to create that state of things which would bind this country to the immediate completion of the road. They were reminded that if they did so they would be putting a burden on this country too heavy for its strength to bear; but they did not heed these warnings, they forced their followers to vote for this policy, and now, as a crowning consequence of that policy, their followers are asked to consent to the enormous sacrifices involved in this contract. If I recall these facts it is without any intention to recriminate. This is not the time of recrimination, it is the time of all others when every man should apply himself to discharging his duties to the best of his lights and conscience.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hear, hear.

Mr. LAURIER. If I recall these facts it is simply to say once more, if such evidence is necessary, that the great principles of a country are never to be trifled with; that the true principles which should guide the policy of a nation should never be deviated from, because, if once deviated from, the country will be led from consequence to consequence ending in a most fatal conclusion. In my humble judgment it was in 1871 a fault—I will not say it was a crime, though I might say without severity it was a political crime—at all events it was a fault to bind this country to the immediate construction of the road. It was a fault, last Session, after the experience of the previous ten years to persist in that policy. It was a fault, not then to have adopted the policy suggested by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) of commencing in the east, and building this road gradually as the resources of the country would permit. That the undertaking to build this railway until final completion within a short term was a vicious policy, to say the least, is fully proved by the conduct of the Government since they have entered office. It is proved by their hesitation and vacillation in carrying out their scheme when the necessity of carrying it out was forced on them, and it is further shown by the present contract. What has been the policy of the present Government? In less than three years they have changed their policy three times. The first year after they had resumed power, they came before Parliament with a grand scheme—a new idea—and the idea was that this road should be henceforth considered as an Imperial work, that the Imperial authorities should be asked to contribute to it, because the surplus population of the Empire would find homes in the North-West. This idea was accepted by the followers of the hon, gentleman as a masterpiece of policy. It was represented as such by the party orators and the press;

yet, good as the idea was, it did not last. It withered as the flowers of summer, but was immediately replaced by another scheme which was submitted last Session. The principle of this scheme was that the lands should pay for the building of the road. This scheme was accepted by the followers of the hon. gentleman with the same enthusiasm as was the first, yet it also met an early fate. It did not last, and no wonder. When the Government brought down this plan, a feeling of anxiety was felt throughout the country, and that feeling found vent in the resolution moved by the present leader of the Opposition. That resolution, it is true, was voted down, but I think we can survive it. Many hon. gentlemen opposite, when voting down that resolution, strove hard to conceal under a smiling face a heavy heart. I think we can survive that, because the Government, immediately after the Session was over, abandoned the very policy which they had called on their followers to support. Yet something had to be done. The Government were in a dilemma, for if they went on to carry out the work they might cripple the finances of the country to a degree almost beyond remedy. If they did not go on with the work they would be going back on their old policy. What was to be done? Like the wizard in the tale who found his own life in constant danger from the fangs and claws of the strange progeny which he had reared, they, too, had created a monster that threatened their own destruction. What was to be done? They went to Europe. They offered their white elephant for sale in the markets of Paris and London, but no one would accept it even as a gift. Finally, they had to take the beast home, where they gave it a vast territory to roam over, made it impossible for any other being to go into the pasture, and then they found somebody who was willing to relieve them of this ever recurring cause of anxiety. That this proposed arrangement is a vicious policy is well proved by the language which the Government used to induce their supporters to accept it. What are the reasons they gave their supporters for voting in favor of this contract? What was the answer they gave to the numerous objections raised against it? It was simply this: do not criticise but accept the contract; it is the best we could get. In order to show this clearly I cannot do better than quote on this subject the very words which were used the other day by the hon. Minister of Public

"Well, Mr. Chairman, in this case we have not to deal with only one party, we have to deal with the Syndicate. Those gentlemen are the one party and we are the other. We have to make a contract with them for the building of this road. Shall we say to them, you must take that or nothing? That is not the way contracts are made. You have to give and take. You have to take into consideration the exigencies of the case. You have to see whether your terms are acceptable to the other party, and after reasoning the matter with the other party you will find that he is right, and your proposal is not sufficient, and if you have to give more lands or more money, or other conditions, the result is that you have to agree to give and take on both sides to prepare the contract and sign it. That is what we have done. Here is a contract, and we say it is the best we can do."

Is that the language of a free Government, of the executive power of a free nation? What has seized the Government of this country that they have been compelled to accept this contract from the Syndicate? Who in the world compelled the Government to negotiate with the Syndicate? What great calamity has befallen this country that the Government should be compelled to surrender unconditionally to the Syndicate? If there had been a war and we had been defeated, and the Government forced to accept from the victor such terms as suited him to enforce, and if the Government came here to have the treaty ratified, would their language have been different to that used in order to induce their supporters to accept the contract? When, in the year 1871, at the termination of the disastrous war with Prussia, the Provincial Government of France met the newly elected National Assembly and presented to it the treaty concluded with Germany by which France ceded to that country two of its best provinces, some of the members protested against the clauses of that treaty. And what was the language of the French Government in reply? It was exactly the same as used to-day by our Administration: accept the terms, they are the best we could get. France had been defeated in war and lay crushed under the iron heel of the victor; our Government had not been defeated, but were bound in the shackles of their own vicious policy. After having spoken the language which I have just quoted the hon. Minister of Public Works went on to say: "I believe it is to the advantage of the country that we should save the money of the country by adopting these resolutions, and I hope the answer will be 'yes' from all our friends." This is the crowning consequence, and the followers of the Government are this time asked to give the final "yes" which will plunge this country into an unknown expenditure. Yet I am free to confess, since the Government are determined to go on with the construction of this railway at once until completion, the idea that it should be built by a company is one which has a great deal in it to commend itself to the people of this country. But for the very reason given by the hon. Minister in the early part of his speech, there were difficulties in the way. He said:

"But although the country stood by us, and a large majority of the members of this House sanctioned the action of the Government, nevertheless, it would be childish to conceal that there was a possibility of apprehension for the future. The feeling was this, that the uncertainty about the amount of money that would be required to build the railway was disturbing the public mind. Nobody could say positively what would be the liabilities of the country, or how many millions would be required, not merely to build the road but to work it, and to work it for all time to come."

The hon. Minister might have added that the public mind was also disturbed by the necessity of the Government having still to go on letting out contracts, and seeing that contracts already made were carried out. Such were, Mr. Chairman, the reasons why the country favored the policy of handing this work over to a company. But have these expectations been fulfilled by this contract? This contract is a policy which does not meet any of the reasons advanced in its favor by the hon. Minister. The country expected that by this contract the Government would be relieved of the necessity of letting out new contracts, and of seing that old contracts were carried out. Instead of the Government have still to let out new contracts and see that old ones are carried out. For ten years to come they have to pursue the same system which they pursued in the past, and which caused anxiety in the public mind. The people of this country expected that their liabilities for constructing this road would be settled. But this, I believe, also is denied. That cannot be settled for this very reason that the Government must pursue the same course which it pursued before. For ten years to come it must go on letting out contracts, and the liability will be settled only when ten years hence the work has been completed. So that this is a hybrid engagement which fulfils none of the engagements it was expected to fulfil. It would in fact so appear, as it were, a sort of partnership between the Government and the Company. There are four sections of the road to build, the Company build two sections, and the Government two sections, and those the most difficult. The Company completes in ten years, and the Government completes in ten years, and at the end of the ten years the whole is to be handed over to the Company. Not only that, but while the Government is doing the work of the Company, the Company is to have all the privileges of the Government. The Company can import as free as the Government can. The Company is exempted from taxation as the Government is. The Company has the further privilege of fixing its own tolls almost without the possibility of hindrance or interference on the part of the to be given to this Company, and are to be locked up at the Government. I say almost the possibility of interference, option of the Company. The result of that policy must be Mr. LAURIER.

for I confess that under the letter of the contract there is a possibility of interference. But when is the Government to interfere? Only when the Company has realized ten per cent. on the cost of constructing the road, which cost is estimated on the other side at $78,000,000. As to the privilege given to the Company of importing their materials free, that has perhaps more the nature of a family quarrel among hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, and, therefore, I shall have nothing to say upon it. As to the exemption from taxation, that is a far more serious matter, and one which should engage the attention of this House. It has been contended on this side of the House that this exemption from taxation, coupled with the other advantages and privileges given to the Company, will give almost a monopoly of the North-West Territories into the hands of this Company. This assertion has been replied to by gentlemen on the other side. But under this contract the road-bed, the station grounds, rolling stock, capital of the Company, are to be for all time, for all generations to come, exempted from all sorts of taxa-From federal taxation, if ever such a contingency should happen, from local taxation when Local Governments are organized, from municipal taxation when municipalities are established. If we consider that this Company is thereby given an unfair advantage over every other Company who try to compete with them, it will be seen that it will be difficult to secure competition with them. Thus the Company have, therefore, the privilege to hold these lands, and, like the dog in the manger, to prevent anyone using them except themselves; and they have also the privilege of fixing their own tolls so as to obtain extortionate profits out of the settlers of the North-West. It must be evident, Mr. Chairman, to every dispassionate observer, that this is a monstrous monopoly, and one that will make the Company landlords of the North-West. I use that term advisedly. It is true that it is not in the power of this Company to establish such institutions as would amount to feudalism, in the sense in which it exists in Europe, and which it needs almost a convulsion to get rid of; but feudalism is not the only mode by which populations can be enslaved by a combination, it is not the only mode by which the many can be made the toy of the few. Nor can it be contended that, on this continent where we claim to be free, where we claim to have got rid of feudalism, no large combinations can be attempted whereby men can get dishonest terms out of the toils of others. We have the fact already before us; we were told the other day by the hon. leader of the Opposition, that at this very day, the railway magnates of the North-West extort such enormous profits from the settlers of the country for carrying their goods to market that it practically amounts to their having proprietary interests in their farms, and the settlers are thereby deprived of the best part of their profits. This may not be feudalism in name, but is it not feudalism substance and  $_{ m in}$ fact. Then, Sir, here is òf the policy which has another feature vicious been followed hitherto. Without venturing any expression of positive opinion, it may be a question, whether, if the road, instead of being built, as it is now contended it must be built, had been gradually and step by step constructed, as the necessities of the country might require, it might not have been a consideration whether it should be built by a subsidy of lands and money, or whether the Government of Canada should proclaim to the world that the needy and poor of the whole world could find free lands and free soil throughout the whole of the North-West, and that they should be enabled to obtain the best market prices for their products. Perhaps, if that system had been followed, there might, in a few years, have been a few less millionaires in this country, but there would have been a much greater number of happy and contented homes. But another system has been followed. Twenty-five million acres of land are the same in the North West as it has been in every place where we have had land companies. The immigrants will first settle upon the lands of the Government, upon the homestead and the pre-emption lands; but after a certain while, when they commence to be crowded, both from outside and within, they will squat upon the lands of the Company, and then one of two results must follow-either they will be ejected by the agent of the Company, or they will be compelled to submit to the extortionate terms that will be forced upon them by the Company. We know well that the majority of the settlers will be poor, that the majority of them will have no other means, no other capital, than their able bodies, and we know well, by experience in the past, what exertions it requires for such settlers to pay up the instalments on their farms, when they have to supply the requirements of their families and to furnish their farms. Moreover, by-and-bye, municipal Governments will have to be organized in that territory, roads will have to be laid out and opened, and yet this Company cannot be taxed for these roads, which will be a constant source of litigation and bitterness in the country. Against all this, what have we? What is the safeguard, what is the guarantee that we have against the possible, I should rather say the certain, evils of the proposed system? We have, as a guarantee, only the good will of the Company itself. It has been asserted, on the other side, that the present members of the Company are men of the highest character, and certainly every one may assent to this; but if the men who now constitute the Company are men of the highest character, who knows who will be the members of the Company ten years hence, five years hence, or even six months hence? Who can say that six months from to day, this Company will not have gone to New York, and, for a money consideration, bartered its interests to foreign capitalists, giving them the privilege of locating the line themselves, and of still further oppressing the settlers on the Company's lands, in order to recoup themselves for the consideration they have given to the Company? But, Mr. Chairman, whoever may be the members of this Company, we know that they are of the human race, and it is a well known fact, and one illustrated by the whole history of mankind, that men in every station of life, where they are not checked by positive laws and regulations, will abuse their position to the detriment of others, if they can gain any advantage by it. And we have an example of the way in which this Company will treat the settlers by the manner in which they have treated the Government. They have driven a hard bargain with the Government. They have obtained the most onerous terms from the Government; and if they have extorted these onerous terms from the Government, what is it for? Is it for the pleasure of gaining a moral victory over the Government, and making no use of it, or is it not to make the best use they can out of these onerous terms, to make the land they obtain worth to them all they can make out of it? On the whole, therefore, the position of the settler in the North-West, will be, under this contract, the position of a Tantalus, before a well dressed table, at which he cannot satisfy his appetite. The settlers cannot settle on the lands which are close to them, without submitting to the terms of the Company.

Mr. PLUMB. They will settle on the Government lands, alongside.

Mr. LAURIER. But I presume the hon gentleman does not suppose the population of this country should be confined only to the Government lands. Look at this matter in any way, and it is this: that you create a most monstrous monopoly. We, from the Province of Quebec, know what a monopoly is, and I call the attention of my colleagues from that Province to our experience under that monopoly. In that province we had a bitter experience of the seigniorial rights, and we had to try hard before we could get them abolished. There was a monopoly of the right to establish mills held by the seigneurs, and we wanted the right extended to the people at large. I am free to say that if that privilege had been refused us by legislation, it might have caused a rebellion. I think every Province of the Dominion has had its land company. There has been one in Ontario, one in New Brunswick, one in Quebec, and one in Prince Edward Island; and I am quite certain I can appeal to the experience of every hon. member of this House from these Provinces to say that the results of these monopolies have been everywhere and at all times the same, namely, to retard settlement and press heavily upon the energies of the settlers; that they have everywhere been a curse and a bane. This has been the case with regard to land companies which have not onetenth of the powers which have been granted to the Syndicate by the present contract. It is said, and I have been reminded by the hon member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb), that there are blocks of land reserved between those which have been granted to the Company. We have reports to the effect that we have 250,000,000 acres more land in that country, though we have not such accurate information as yet as will enable us to be absolutely certain upon that matter. However, I am quite ready to believe that we have 200,000,000 acres space in that country; but when we deduct from that the land covered with lakes, streams and marshes, the mountains and hills, the barren lands, and those which are unfit for settlement on account of climatic conditions, lands which are only fit for grazing purposes, and we further deduct the portion which belongs to the Hudson's Bay Company and those reserved for school purposes, what will remain for our settlers over and above the 25,000,000 acres allotted to this Company? Looked at from whatever point of view you choose, there is not a single redeeming feature in the gigantic monopoly which has been given to this Company. There is another objectionable feature in this contract—not perhaps objectionable per se, but rendered so by the nature and condition of the country at the present time. This contract forces us to go on immediately with the construction of the road along the north shore of Lake Superior. We are all agreed that a Canadian Pacific Railway must be built on Canadian soil. We all agree on the point.

Mr. LANGEVIN. Hear, hear.

Mr. LAURIER. I do not think there are two opinions in regard to that matter.

Mr. LANGEVIN. Your leader differs from you.

Mr. LAURIER. No; he says that we should go on with the building of the road as the requirements of the country may demand. I have never heard expressed here the opinion that the Canadian Pacific Railway should not be built. The only point upon which there is any disagreement is as to the expediency of building the whole road at once, or only as rapidly at the wants of the country may require. I think it must be perfectly manifest that this section on the north shore of Lake Superior is not required at the present time, that its construction might be advantageously postponed until some future period, and thatit would be quite sufficient, at present, to build the eastern section as far as Sault Ste. Marie. The fertile plains of the west are separated from the east by an extent of barren territory in the region north of the Lake. while it happens that the route along the southern shore would pass through some of the best lands on the continentthrough several of the most important States of the Union. Would it not be better, under those circumstances, to bring the road immediately to Sault Ste. Marie, tap the American system of railways, and secure not merely the trade of our own North-West, but a large share of the traffic from those before the House at the present moment. The policy of the Government is: that the road shall be constructed at once on the north shore of Lake Superior. What would be the consequence of carrying out that policy? There would be no communication by that road with the eastern railways for ten years to come; and though we may secure the incipient trade of our own territories, we would lose the traffic from the north-western States of the Union. The other policy would be to bring the line at once to Sault Ste. Marie, thus securing us immediate connection, not only with the North-West, but with the American railways. Can any one hesitate for a moment in the presence of that policy? What reason can be urged for the adoption of the route along the north shore of Lake Superior? Though the question has thus far been discussed entirely in an unsectional spirit, I think I might well enquire which of these two policies will be of most benefit to my own Province. The immediate construction of the road to Sault Ste. Marie would at once carry over the railway system of Quebec the trade of our own North-West and of the American north-western States as well-a state of things which would prove of immense and obvious benefit to the cities of Montreal and Quebec. But this is not the primary reason for the adoption of the line by way of Sault Ste. Marie. This road would help our Province to get out of the financial difficulties by which it is at present beset. That Province has now a debt which exceeds $15,000,000; this year it has been compelled to borrow $4,000,000 more, and this with the pressure of constant and annually increasing deficits. It is a matter of anxiety to every inhabitant of Quebec how these deficits are to be met, but so far it has been found impossible to devise a means by which they can be wiped out. Our resources have been pledged to the fullest extent, and they have not that elasticity which will enable us to avail ourselves of them in the near future. Our only resource will be the direct taxation of our people unless we are so happy as to find a means of increasing the traffic of our railways. Unless that relief comes within a short period, the financial prospects of Quebec must be held to be critical indeed. If the road to Sault Ste. Marie was constructed, instead of having to wait for ten years we should have, within a period of two or three years at the utmost, the benefit of the trade of northwestern Canada and the United States; and it must be evident to every hon, gentleman from Quebec that that traffic would be of material assistance to our Province in its present financial condition. I do not say that that assistance would be sufficient to lead us out of our present difficulties, but it would leave the present and future of our Province not so dark as it is at the present moment. I would appeal upon this question to my fellow countrymen from Quebec who are supporting the Government. We have often been told, by the supporters of the Government in Lower Canada, especially by the press, of the immense influence which these hon members have with the Administration, that they have only to come and what they want and they will receive They would almost have us believe that the at once. Government occupy the position of the servant mentioned in Scripture, who came when he was told to come and went when he was told to go. If these gentlemen have so much influence with the Government, now or never is their opportunity of exercising it to the great benefit of their Province, and for the purpose of averting injury to the Dominion, for I hold that the adoption of this contract would be a great calamity to the Dominion at large. It is a delusion, because it would not remove any of those inconveniences expected to be dispersed; because it leaves this Government with the same inconveniences that were experienced in the past with the former system, and adds to them other and greater. It is a danger, because it threatens to create, upon the free soil another be a cause of trouble to the peace and harmony of this country. This is the contract of which Ministers are so proud, that the mere remembrance of connection with its inception and execution they feel proud to leave as a legacy to their children. My wish and hope is that the legacy may be as pleasant to their offspring as to the parents. I am quite sure it will, because we know it is a law of human nature that where the affections are strong and love prevails even faults are accounted merits. I think it was the Minister of Public Works who stated that this contract was calculated to enrich our country, increase our population, and secure our free institutions. How it is to achieve all these results is not to my humble perception quite visible. As to its securing British institutions in this country, I would be sorry indeed for my country if they were dependent upon the construction of a railway, whether of gigantic or diminutive proportions. British institutions rest in this country upon a surer foundation; they impressed the minds upon and hearts of people, because this land, inhabited as it is by men differing in creed and origin, and whose fathers were once separated by deep national feuds, have secured under those institutions, freedom, equality, amity and good will. But Ministers should remember the fact, which they seem to forget, that those institutions that have secured us our present blessings, are those of the 19th century, and not those of an earlier time, the relics of barbarian days. If hon. gentlemen opposite are desirous of securing British institutions, they must infuse into the legislation of this country the broad spirit of modern England, and not seek to establish those monopolies which at this day prove so many thorns in the side of England, great as she is. Let them look at the country they pretend to admire, and they will see what deep and firm roots abuses will strike into the soil, and what toils, labors, miseries and sufferings, such abuses can produce to the people of that country. They have examples of this kind before their eyes at this very day. If this contract is to be judged in the light of modern British ideas and principles, it carries with it its death warrant, and the only duty that remains for the House to perform, is simply to reject it on the first opportunity.

Mr. CIMON. I rise to say that it is with the greatest pleasure that I endorse the contract that the Government has entered into with the Syndicate, and which secures the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway in ten years. I quite understand the ardor with which the Liberals attack this contract. You see, Mr. Chairman, they are being disarmed. Since 1874, when I first had the honor of taking a seat in this House, every year we were obliged to vote several millions of dollars for the construction of this railway; every year our liabilities were increasing. We were in doubt. The Liberals declared that the road would cost the country $150,000,000 and even $180,000,000 in cash; we were told that the lands of the North-West were of no great value. They added that once the road was built it would be necessary to equip and work it, and that that would cost the Government several millions annually. We had, therefore, reason to fear and tremble. And when the Liberals rolled out these mighty figures before the people, it is easy to conceive the dread that they created. But now, Mr. Chairman, the Government brings down a scheme that puts an end to all that uncertainty. Once the contract is ratified by this House, the Syndicate will go to work, and the Pacific Railway will be speedily and efficiently constructed; the works will be immediately carried on at both ends, and in the centre, of the road at the same time. As these works progress, the North-West will be developed and the whole Dominion enriched, and in ten years this great railway will be completed and opened to traffic from one end to the other. Then the obligations of the Governis a danger, because it threatens to create, upon the free soil ment will cease, and we will no longer talk of this great of this country, a monopoly which may at some time or undertaking, which will at length be realized, except to rejoice over its completion and to praise the distinguished statesmen who have carried it out. Henceforth, Mr. Chairman, we know the extent of our liabilities in respect to this railway. It is not $180,000,000, nor even $150,000,000, with several millions a year to equip and work it, that we will have to pay. We will only have to pay $25,000,000, besides the works yet to be done for $14,000,000, in all $39,000,000, or about $3,900,000 a year for ten years, and then we are free for ever. We will not have another penny te pay either for the construction or the running of the road. But they tell us: "You give, besides, 25,000,000 acres of land." Yes, but it is so much taken off the burdens of Canada. We should all then be glad to learn that we can, with these lands in the North-West, pay a part of the cost of the construction and working of the railway. Moreover, by this arrangement the Syndicate will be interested in the development of the North-West; and as we have alternate lots of land, we are sure that when the Syndicate sells an acre, the Government will sell as much, and the proceeds of this sale will help the Government to pay the interest on the moneys that we are spending on this great work. We, the representatives of the Eastern Provinces, should be delighted to find that the Government has succeeded in making the North-West pay a considerable portion of the cost of the Pacific Railway. They add: "You give the Syndicate an unprecedented monopoly." Is it for us, of the Eastern Provinces, to complain of that? We build a railway which will be an immense benefit to the future inhabitants of the North-West. This monopoly was one of the considerations that secured and hastened the building of the road. It is, therefore, only fair that the people of the North-West should pay the working expenses of the road by submitting to the monopoly of the Syndicate, which, moreover, is not excessive. I represent, Mr. Chairman, the electoral division that will profit the least by the Pacific Railway. Yet I do not hesitate to say that my constituents will hasten to ratify the vote that I am about to give in favor of the Government on this question. My constituents would be so glad to have a railway themselves that they are not jealous when railways are built elsewhere. And if my constituents were asked: "Would you be willing to give a like monopoly to a company that would build, in ten years, commencing at both ends and in the centre, a railway from Quebec to Lake St. John?" I assure you, Mr. Chairman, that they would promptly answer: "Yes, by all means grant the monopoly." This monopoly may exist to-day. The hon. member for Quebec East has just likened it to the tenure seigneuriale which existed in Lower Canada, and which created such uneasiness. Yes, but it should also be said that when the people of Lower Canada became rich enough to get rid of these rights, by paying an indemnity to the seigneurs, they did so. Now, one of the considerations for which the Syndicate undertakes the construction in ten years of the Pacific Railway is precisely this monopoly; but the North-West will have the price of this monopoly in the railway that we are giving it. It is to be supposed that the North-West will fill up rapidly, that in twenty years it will contain perhaps 3,000,000 souls. Well, this population will then have its local legislature, and will be rich and flourishing. If the Syndicate's monopoly presses too severely, they will buy it off by paying an indemnity to the Syndicate, and nothing could be fairer. We are not going to pay alone all the costs; we want the North-West to pay a considerable portion of them. That is why I do not complain of this monopoly. So you see, Mr. Chairman, that the monopoly granted to the Syndicate should not alarm us. What most pleases me in the contract now before this House is that in ten years this railway will be in operation from one end to the other; in ten years Canada will profit by this gigantic nudertaking. That is another consideration that should induce us to accept the contract. Even were I told: "Granta delay of twenty-five years for the construction admit that the gentlemen composing the Syndicate are of the read, and it will cost you one quarter less," I would say, "No." It is better to pay dearer and have the benefit fifteen years sooner. Since we must build the road let us have it as soon as possible. Let this road contribute, as quickly as possible, to the wealth and prosperity of Canada. The contract cutered into with the Syndicate brings the liabilities of the Government to an end. We can, therefore, at once examine our financial situation, and look around us to see what other improvements the country requires. We have secured the development and the prosperity of the North-West, and we know that by so doing we have not exhausted our resources. It will be for us to turn our attention henceforward to the east. We have a "North-West" in the Province of Quebec. We have an immense region extending from Three Rivers and Quebec to Lake St. John, where we find a magnificent valley containing more than three million acros of arable land of superior quality. We have, besides, between this valley and Quebec, more than a million acres of arable land of fair quality. We have, moreover, very rich forests and all kinds of mines. I say to the west: "We have secured you the Pacific Railway, now give us assistance. Help us to build a railway to Lake St. John." I am, therefore, full of hope and confidence in voting for this measure. I am sure that, henceforth, our statesmen will turn their attention to the east, and I am satisfied that in a few years Lake St. John will have its railway. Our statesmen have just secured the construction of the Pacific Railway, a road a thousand leagues in length; it will not be difficult for them to secure the building of the Lake St. John road, which is only fifty leagues in length. I am, therefore, in favor of the Pacific Railway, because I want a railway to Lake St. John; I am especially in favor of this latter road. We will have it, because the Government is desirous of developing the east as well as the west. I thank the House for its kind attention.

Mr. FISET. Mr. Chairman, the hon, member who has just spoken so eloquently pretends that, on the hustings and elsewhere, the Opposition maintained that the cost of the Pacific Railway would reach $150,000,000, or even $180,000,000. That is an exaggeration. I do not believe that our party ever uttered such an opinion. We may have said that the cost of this great undertaking would reach $120,000,000; and with the conditions of the present contract, and all the other privileges granted to the Syndicate, I think it will not fall far short of that sum. The hon, gentleman also stated that the monopoly granted to the Syndicate was one of the reasons that induced him to vote for the scheme brought down by the Government, and that he would pledge himself to obtain from his constituents the same privileges for any company that would undertake to build the Lake St. John Railway. Perhaps he might do so, if he contented himself with making known to his constituents only a part of the dangers of such a monopoly; but if he were to tell them that the company, once the road was built, would charge them double the prices charged by other railways for carrying their produce to the nearest market, I very much doubt whether they would accept my hon. friend's conditions. That is, however, the privilege that the Government grants to the Company that is undertaking the construction of the Pacific Railway. The hon, members on the other side of the House talk of the construction of the road in ten years, as if it were an accomplished fact; in their minds there is no doubt, no uncertainty, that the road will be built. But in 1871, these gentlemen promised us to build the road in the space of ten years; these ten years have almost elapsed, and yet the line is hardly located, and only a few miles are completed. Therefore, instead of being as certain as these gentlemen are that the road will be built in ten years, we are justified in fearing that it will not be then completed. I am willing to honorable, that they have the necessary means, &c., but who can assure us that these gentlemen will remain in the Syndicate? Who can assure us that in six months they will not have transferred to others the rights and privileges that we are about to grant them? Have we a sufficient guarantee that the road will be built when we require, as security, only one per cent. from the Syndicate, whilst ordinary contractors are obliged by law to deposit with the Government five per cent. on the price of their contract? That is an injustice that we are committing to the detriment of those who have contracts with the Government. Now, I am not opposed to the construction of the road along the north shore of Lake Superior, but I do say that the Government should subsidize a line of railway passing by Sault Ste. Marie. The road to the north of Lake Superior has the advantage of being on Canadian territory, and it is for this reason that I am not opposed to it; but, on the other hand, as this road will not be completed before ten years, the Province of Quebec will be debarred, during these ten years, from the profits accruing from the western traffic; whereas, by subsidizing a line passing by the Sault, this railway would be in operation before the end of three years, and being the shortest route, traffic will necessarily take that direction. Then Montreal and Quebec, which are our nearest ports, would enjoy, seven years sooner, the immense advantages of the western trade. And what will prevent us from carrying on the construction of the road to the north of Lake Superior, especially when we shall have succeeded in drawing the western traffic away from the American roads, to the benefit of the Province of Quebec more particularly? We will then be able to complete this immense railway on Canadian territory. scheme of the Government being opposed to the few remarks I have just made, being, in my humble opinion, contrary to the best interests of the people whom we have been prevented until the last moment from consulting, I will vote against the Bill.

Mr. ANGLIN. The importance of this subject is manifestly so great that I am sure hon, gentlemen will not display very much impatience if I occupy the time of the Committee for a few hours, perhaps, in stating as briefly and tersely as I can the reasons why I believe the proposals submitted should not be approved. In the course of the debate, so far as it has gone, a great deal of matter very irrelevant indeed has been introduced, almost entirely, however, by hon. members who spoke in tavor of the resolutions now before the Committee. That was probably owing to the fact that they had little indeed to say in favor of the resolutions. They spoke to us of former schemes and propositions, and quoted at length from speeches made at various times, and under somewhat different circumstances, by leading men on this side of the House. They strove in this way to divert attention from the question which really should have occupied the attention of this Committee, and to persuade hon. members that the present bargain is, in some respects, a better bargain than any that had been previously submitted to Parliament, and that, therefore, without any regard whatever to the merits of the case, they thus should support it. This would not have been so very objectionable if the quotations had all been properly used, and if the statements which hon gentlemen supposed they were sustaining by those quotations had not been so extremely inaccurate. It is not true that this is the best bargain that was ever submitted to Parliament. It is not only intrinsically a bad bargain, but it is the worst bargain, the worst mode of constructing the Pacific Railway ever proposed to Parliament. Some hon, gentlemen have alleged that it is a better bargain than that made with Sir Hugh Allan several years ago. I think the right hon. leader of the Government, in that now famous speech of his made at Halifax to those young gentlemen with an address, declared that it was a much better bargain made than that made with Sir Hugh Mr. FISET.

Allan, that the terms were very much better than those which Mr. Mackenzie had proposed, and that Mr. Mackenzie himself would be compelled to admit, in his place in Parliament, that this was the best bargain ever yet made for the purpose of constructing this railway. The hon, Minister of Railways attempted to persuade the Committee that this was indeed a very much better bargain than any of the previous ones. Why, he said, with regard to the standard of the railroad, it was precisely the same as that stipulated for in the Allan contract. There, as we found out. he made a most egregious blunder, a most extraordinary blunder for a gentleman holding his position, who had taken so large a part, it is to be presumed, in the negotiations leading up to this contract, who was the chosen mouthpiece of the Government, to state to this House what the terms and the merits of this extraordinary bargain were. The leader of the Opposition took occasion to set him right on that point very quickly indeed. We find that the standard to-day is very much lower than that set forth in the contract with Sir Hugh Allan. This is not a contract for building the road such as the Union Pacific was in 1873, but a contract to build a road of a very inferior character-to build such a road as the Union Pacific was when first constructed. Sir Hugh Allan, on the contrary, was to build not only as good a road as the Union Pacific was in 1873, but further provision was made that the grades and curves should be superior to those of the Union Pacific, as it was in 1873, whenever the character of the country would permit of their being superior; so that we have to-day the very lowest conceivable standard for this railroad, and yet the hon. Minister of Railways proceeded as coolly as if there was of Railways proceeded as coolly, as if there were not this marked difference, to compare with the railroad which the late Premier proposed to build with the one which this Company are to build if this contract goes into operation. Why, it would be as reasonable to assert that a well furnished dwelling-house would cost too much, because it could be shown that on exactly the same piece of ground, covering exactly the same area, a barn might be built for one-half or one-third the cost. The hon. gentleman then made various comparisons to show that the hon, member for Lambton, when Premier, had brought down an estimate which showed that the whole road would cost somewhere about $120,000,000, and that the present leader of the Opposition introduced another estimate. The hon, gentleman proceeded to argue very gravely that there was a monstrous inconsistency in this, until the hon. member for West Durham took occasion to correct the hon, gentleman, and to show him that he had used exactly the same estimate as the member for Lambton—that the figures he quoted were taken from Mr. Mackenzie's estimate for a portion of the road. The Minister of Railways also asserted that this was the very best proposal that had ever been submitted to Parliament. He even went a great deal further than this, and asserted that the proposal to postpone the construction of that part of the road running north of Lake Superior was in some inconceivable way or other a proposal to do some serious injury to the Province of Quebec. What, he said, will the hon. leader of the Opposition never allow the Province of Quebec to have its railway? Are we to be shut out from railway communication for all time, or something to that effect. The hon. Minister of Railways, I think, had no cause whatever for his extraordinary display of zeal on behalf of the Province of Quebec. The late Ministry showed how truly they had the interest of Quebec at heart when they made their bargain with the Canada Central Railway, and their bargain for the construction of the much-abused Georgian Bay Branch, both of which would have the immediate effect of placing the whole Province of Quebec in direct and immediate communication with the great North-West. The Georgian Bay-Branch was a work particularly intended to promote the interests of the Province of Quebec. In former times, one of the arguments frequently used by the hon. Minister of Railways against the Georgian Bay Branch was: that there were other existing modes of reaching Lake Superior more direct, and more easily availed of, and which would cost the country nothing. Then the interests of the Province of Quebec were not so much regarded; then it was contended by that hon. gentleman, on behalf of the whole Opposition, that the Georgian Bay Branch was to cause an immense expenditure, that it should not be built at all, but that we should go by way of Toronto up to Collingwood, and so reach the waters of Lake Superior. There never was anything said, either by the present leader of the Opposition or by the leader of the late Government, that would at all justify the extraordinary outburst of the hon. Minister of Railways on that occasion; and, let me say, en passant, that that hon, gentleman indulged in some other extraordinary pieces of declamation. I do not know exactly what it was that the hon. leader of the Opposition said, which the hon. Minister of Public Works chose to regard as a basis for all he said about the Irish people in the North West. I did not hear the hon. member for West Durham raise any objection to the settlement of Irish people in the North-West. I never heard him utter a word that would imply, in the most remote or indistinct way, that Irishmen have not the same rights in this Dominion as men of any other nationality-never a word that would imply that they should be prevented, or discouraged from settling in the North-West; and yet the hon. Minister of Public Works spoke as if the hon, leader of the Opposition had avowed himself as strongly opposed to the settlement of Irishmen in the North-West. What the hon, member did say on that point, if I recollect rightly, was, that there was now some talk of bringing out Irish people to settle in the North-West; that if this monstrous monopoly went into operation those people would find that they had changed the rod for the scorpion, that if they were scourged in Ireland, through rack-rent, they would find themselves more bitterly scourged in the North-West at the hands of this monstrous monopoly. An hon, gentleman, I think the representative of Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ive.), took, I think, a very extraordinary course with regard to this question. He treated us to a very large number of figures, some of which he stated to the House were the figures of the hon. member for West Durham, and from these figures he certainly drew some most extraordinary conclusions. Taking a higher estimate made by the hon member for West Durham for the whole railway, he chose to extract from that a lower estimate for the western portion of the road, and so he obtained a large balance as the price of the central section; and that he chose to say was the estimate of the hon. member for West Durham for the central portion of the railway. I cannot imagine what the hon member intended to effect by the use of such figures. I certainly am satisfied that he did not persuade any hon gentleman that the railroad would cost the Syndicate the very large amount which he alleges they will have to expend in order to perform this work. But, Sir, if after all, we come down to the consideration of the contract itself, putting aside all these extraneous matters, and ask ourselves whether we should accept this contract as it stands or not, I think we shall find this question a much more supple one than anyone could suppose who merely heard the statement of the hon member for Richmond and Wolfe. The Minister of Railways, and other hon. gentlemen, have chosen to say, that this is a better bargain than the one with Sir Hugh Allan. In one point I have shown that it is not so good. Fut they say Sir Hugh Allan was to get $30,000,000 in cash, and 50,000,000 acres of land, which, estimating the land at $1 an acre, would make $80,000,000; while, under the present contract, we are fair average quality would be the fair average quality of paying $28,000,000 in works, $25,000,000 in cash, and land in the country over which the railroad will run, and no $25,000,000 in land, making altogether $78,000,000. other reasonable interpretation could be put upon that

But Sir Hugh Allan was not to get the privilege of selecting the lands where he pleased all over the North-West. As the hon, member for West Durham proved, even if you select all the lands in the fertile belt, these lands more remote from the line cannot have anything like the marketable value of those adjacent to the railway; so that the land to be given to the present Syndicate is much more in value than that represented by the 50,000,000 acres which were to be given to Sir Hugh Allan. The hon. member for West Durham, accepting the value that had been put upon the lands by the leader of the Government, showed that 25,000,000 acres lying next the railway would be worth $79,000,000, while 25,000,000 acres lying beyond would be worth $27,500,000. But, Sir, that is not all, for Sir Hugh Allan was bound to take those 50,000,000 acres from all along the line of railroad, from the boundary of the Province of Ontario right through to British Columbia. Under the present contract the Syndicate are virtually allowed to choose land where they please. The present Syndicate are not bound to take any land except they choose, and they can select the very best land along the line of railway, and, therefore, lands that will be of the very greatest value. I think anybody, who knows anything about the lands in other parts of the Dominion, would believe—and it may be reasonably believed that the lands in the North-West are not on the whole different in character—that the 25,000,000 of acres to be selected by the Syndicate, as this Syndicate has a right to select it, will be equal in marketable value to the 50,000,000 acres that Sir Hugh Allan was to receive alongside of the railway. There are other points in Sir Hugh Allan's contract, which, I think, made it a better contract than the present. But it was alleged also that the terms embraced in this contract were very much superior indeed, to those that were offered in the Bill introduced by the late Premier in the Session of 1874. Why, it was said that Mr. Mackenzie offered to give 20,000 acres of land per mile all along the line of the railway, and not only that, but also a large land subsidy for the Georgian Bay Branch, and also a large land subsidy for the Pembina Branch, so that the calculation was that it would amount to 55,000,000 acres of land. The hon. member for West Durham states that the land was worth, according to the Premier's estimate last Session, $5 an acre. Oh, says the hon. Minister of Public Works, how monstrous it would be to estimate the value of such land at any such rate as that. It applied to the 55,000,000 acres that Mr. Mackenzie was to have given, and which would have amounted to $275,000,000. And, then, as if he had said something very clever, he was loudly applauded on the other side. Somebody has made a calculation, I think, that it would require a line of railway some 17,000 miles in length to turnish the 55,000,000 acres within the five mile belt A. But, Mr. Chairman, when we come to examine that so much misrepresented and possibly so much misunderstood proposal, we find how superior, in many important particulars, it is to the contract now before the House. It is quite true that Mr. Mackenzie took authority to make such a bargain as that, and to give a company 20,000 acres per mile and $10,000 in cash subsidy, and, besides, a possible further cash subsidy for which, how-ever, he would have required to receive the approval of Parliament; but the 20,000 acres of land per mile was to be land of fair average quality and not the pick and choice of the whole fertile belt. Hon. gentlemen when upon this subject have, over and over again, spoken of it as if fair average quality meant that the very choicest land was to be the standard; but surely no reasonable or rational interpretation would justify such a conclusion as that the fair average quality would be the fair average quality of clause. More than that, Mr. Chairman, if sufficient lands of fair average quality are not to be found within the distance of the line of railway, the Company were to be entitled to receive other lands in other parts of the fertile belt, but not other lands selected by themselves, but other lands selected by the Government. Moreover, they were not to receive the absolute title to that land as is now provided; they were not to be permitted to hold those lands as long as they pleased without taxation, as is now provided, they were not to be allowed to speculate on their lands as now provided, but the Government took the power to themselves to dispose of two-thirds of the whole of the land to be allotted to the Company on such terms, to be sure, as might be agreed upon with the Company, but on such terms unquestionably as would have promoted, to the greatest possible degree, the settlement of that country. But, Sir, these are not the only points in which the measure was far preferable to that we are now asked to consider as the best ever offered. There is one very important point of which we have heard much; and we shall, no doubt, hear more about the extraordinary provision which gives to this Syndicate a monopoly of the whole of the business of the north-western country, and virtually leaves them free to charge what rates of freight they please. Under the much derided, much maligned, and much misrepresented measure of the late Government, the Government reserved to themselves the absolute right to fix the rate of freight all over the railway, a most important point in which their measure was incomparably superior to that which is now before the House. Now, Sir, I think if any hon. gentleman will take the trouble to look into the contract of Sir Hugh Allan, and compare it with this, they must come to the conclusion, especially if he compares it with the Mackenzie Bill, that it was a much more reasonable measure than this most unreasonable one. It protected and guarded most carefully the rights of the people, and provided most carefully for the early and complete settlement of the great North-West. This one utterly disregards the rights of the people, and is not calculated in the slightest degree to promote the settlement of the North-West, but rather to frighten people from settling in that country. It is alleged that it will be to the interest of the Syndicate to induce settlement in the North-West. Well, Sir, it is by no means certain. We leave them free; we leave it entirely in their power to calculate for themselves what will be the most profitable for themselves, and in making their calculations, they will, no doubt, take into account that there still remains a large number of acres of Government lands, and they will be quite willing to allow the Government to bestow its energies in settling up its own lands, whilst they retain theirs, because we have heard of 25,000 people a year going into that country; but if, we say, 50,000 people a year, the Government will have enough land to give them, whilst the Syndicate will still have its own lands. The settlers on the Government land will contribute quite as much to the support of the road, by the business they do over the road, as those settling on the Syndicate lands. Take another 50,000 people, and still another, and the Government will still have enough land, whilst the market value of the Syndicate lands which they hold will be greatly increased. Therefore, it is by no means certain that the Company will find it to their interest to settle up their own lands rapidly. They will, no doubt, in an indirect way, invite immigration to the Government lands, but it must by no means be supposed that they must necessarily settle up their own lands. If we were land speculators we should want some thousands of people to go into the country, because their presence would increase the value of the land. There is no doubt about that. Now, Mr. Chairman, the first grave objection to the scheme now before the House is that, by it, we are bound to pay for a certain work more than the work is worth. We are bound to pay for constructing a piece of railway, or impossible, in a country of that kind, to make a thoroughly two pieces of railway, rather more than a railway of just the good road. The grades at one time, I think, were to be Mr. Anglin.

same character would cost if built even under the present Administration. Let us look at this point, because the hon. gentleman from Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives); labored very earnestly for nearly an hour to render it obscure. It is a very simple point and very easily understood. The road which the leader of the late Government, the late Minister of Public Works (Mr. Mackenzie), intended to build across the country from Lake Nipissing, and ultimately to the Pacific Ocean, was such a road as he believed the people of this Dominion desired to see built. It was to be a road of the very first-class—a road with the best possible gradients, with the easiest possible curves—a road which would be calculated to do that great trans-continental trade which very many people in this country believed, and probably some still believe, we may do on a great Canadian Pacific Railway, were that railway properly constructed. More than that, Mr. Chairman, he had in view the importance of affording the people who settled in the country the cheapest, the easiest, and the readiest access to the markets of the world. To insure them that, Sir, it was necessary that the railway built should be a good road, and that the grades upon it should be as easy as possible. The boast of the Chief Engineer of that railway was that he had succeeded in obtaining, between Lake Superior and Winnipeg or Red River, a Lake Superior and Winnipeg or Red River, a road of such a character; that the grades upon that road, when running eastward would nowhere exceed 25 feet to the mile, and that it would be, or might be, possible to do a very large traffic over that road on the cheapest possible terms. He contemplated that a similar road would be built across the prairies—a thoroughly good road, with an elevated road-bed, running as directly as possible across the country, with iron bridges; in fact, in every way a road of the very best character, and that was estimated to cost about $120,000,000. now, Sir, that the character of the road is utterly degraded. The hon, the present Minister of Railways began this work of degradation nearly a year ago. Last Session we had, I think, three several estimates before this House, each lower than the preceding; and when the Minister of Railways brought in what I believe was the third estimate submitted by members of the Government during the Session, we believed certainly on this side of the House that he had degraded that road until he had brought it into as low a condition as possible. But this year we have it further degraded, and at present we absolutely do not know to what depth of degradation it has been reduced. I think the hon, the leader of the Opposition has a notice on the paper asking for a return showing what modifications have lately been made in the sections now under contract; for we have been told that modifications have been made in these sections so as to reduce the cost very much, and that in the far western section the result of the reduction has reached an amount of even so much as $1,600,000. If I remember aright, last year the Chief Engineer stated that, in order to cheapen the western portion of the road, he was obliged to make considerable changes, either in the alignment or in the grades and curves, at all events in the character of the road. Now, Mr. Chairman, of all parts of this railway, there is none in which it is so absolutely necessary that we should have the best possible work, if we expect a large traffic across our part of the continent, as in this western section. A road running up through these mountains, passing along the verge of canyons, almost everywhere dangerous in its character, ought to be as good a road as it is possible to make. The very best road we could make up in that part of the country, even with a very large expenditure of money, even with an expenditure as large or larger than the highest estimate made by Mr. Fleming, would nevertheless not be a very safe or a very good road. It is almost think, efforts were made to find a better route than that, and the grades were reduced, but they still remained very heavy and the curves remained very sharp, and the slightest accident there would entail destruction to a train and all its contents. Yet we have found further modifications which tend very largely to degrade the character of the road. Notwithstanding this, the road is to cost now, according to the lowest estimate, $80,000,000; but if, as the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) argued some evenings ago, this system of degradation is to be carried out in the other sections which are not so difficult of construction as this, in the eastern section, and in what is now called the central section, the estimated cost would be found to be very much lower than $80,000,000—how much lower it would be hard to calculate. Probably $75,000,000 would be in the neighborhood of what the estimate should be. But even taking the amount at the $80,000,000 stated by the hon. Minister, what do we find remains to be done? We find that the Government propose to give for a work which is only to cost $80,000,000 an amount in works executed and being executed and paid for, equal to $23,000,000; besides that we are to give $25,000,000 in cash, making a total of $53,000,000 in cash, not to speak at all of the interest account to which the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe, speaking on the other side, attached so much importance. We are also paying a large amount of interest on the money already expended on that road, and that never appears in any compilation of the cost. However, putting the interest account altogether out of view, we are to pay $53,000,000 in eash, besides 25,000,000 acres of land lying close to the railway, as far as lands can be found around the line of railway, and where they cannot be so found they may be selected where the Company please. Now, Sir, hon. gentlemen opposite say that the land is worth only $1 per acre, and that the 25,000,000 acres at this rate, added to the sum of $53,000,000 would make $78,000,000 in cash as the very lowest estimate to be paid by this country. Taking it at this estimate, we pay $78,000,000 in cash and land for a road which at the outside would cost only $80,000,000. Now, Mr. Chairman, we were told that this whole country experienced an inexpressible sense of relief on finding that the Government intended to entrust the construction of a portion of this road to a Syndicate instead of conducting it themselves. Why, Sir, was that sense of relief experienced? Why should anybody experience a sense of relief when they are told that the Government is to pay $78,000,000 for a work which was to have cost only $80,000,000? Sir, if there is to be any doubt about the estimates, if the estimates are to be overrun anywhere, will they not be overrun in those sections which the Government have undertaken to complete? Not on the prairie section will it be at all necessary to overrun the estimates. On the prairie section it will be entirely for the Company themselves to determine what sort of road it will be to their interest to build. They can make the line as cheaply as they please along the prairie, but on the sections between Thunder Bay and Red River the works are heavy, and no matter what modifications are introduced I think this House will find, bye-and-by, that the cost will greatly exceed the estimate. So, when you come up into the Rocky Mountains, where you have to swing men in baskets over the sides of the canyons in order that they may get on the face of the cliff, and where you have to tunnel for miles, you will find, bye-and-by, that, notwithstanding the recently introduced modifications, the cost will greatly lands was fully ascertained, we find that the Government exceed the estimates; for, Sir, I think this country will pledged themselves, solemnly, to say that not one acre of that land should be sold for less than $2.50 without the express bargain, and bound not to slight the work, but bound to construct a fair and proper railway. Perhaps not what we would call a first-class railway, as we intended

116 feet to the mile. Under Mr. Mackenzie's direction, I it, perhaps not even a second-class railway, but still. a good substantial railway, that will cost the country a very large amount of money. But we agree to give them $78,000,000 for what is not the but $80,000,000. Now, Mr. Chairman, that is we are to give for the construction of the line, land that is close along the line of the railway; land carefully selected, not swamps, or barrens or hills or rocks and how is it that swamps, or barrens, or hills or rocks, and how is it that this land is valued at no more than $1 an acre. When, or how, or why is it that the value of the land in the North-West has depreciated in the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite. It is not nine months since the hon, leader of the Government brought down a formidable bill of calculations to this House, to show that the land was worth, in Belt A, five miles on each side of the railway, $5 an acre; Belt B, 15 miles outside of the railway, $4 an acre; that, in the next Belt C, was worth $3, and that in the belt outside of that again, far, far away from the railway, was worth $2 an acre; and now we are asked to take, as the basis of our calculation, that the very best and choicest lands in all the North-West is worth only $1 an acre. If the choice land lying close to that line of railway will be worth but $1 an acre, the sooner we abandon the idea of opening up the country, and of settling it, the better. The sooner we cease inviting our own people to go in there the better. One dollar an acre! prairie land, fertile, as we are told; rich, as we are told; the best wheat land in the world, as we are told; and worth but $1 an acre! $3.50 I find was the average price according to the Premier's calculation last year, in a belt of 220 miles wide, and now, within a few miles of the railway, we are asked to say that the land is worth but $1 an acre. Now, Mr. Chairman, did the hon. Premier believe himself last Session when he submitted that calculation to this House? Did his hon, colleagues believe him when he submitted that calculation to this House? Did the large majority of hon, members who voted against the motion of the hon. member for West Durham, that we should proceed with this work only as our means would justify, did they, Sir, believe that that statement was correct? If they believed that statement last Session, what has occurred since to alter their views and opinions? If they believed the statement of their Premier, made solemnly from his place in the House last Session, why do they now say that it was inaccurate and misleading. If that statement, so carefully and elaborately prepared and submitted to this House last Session, was a correct statement, why was it hon. gentlemen opposite felt that there was a sense of relief when they got this contract out of their hands. If the country believed the statement made by the hon. gentleman, or half believed it, why was the sense of relief experienced, and how did hon, gentlemen opposite feel that there was a sense of relief when the whole country was anxious to get rid of the construction of a road which, last year, the Premier proved conclusively was not to cost this country a cent, but was to be abundantly paid for by the sales of those lands; and moreover, we were to receive many untold millions in future years from the sale of those same lands. or 15 years we were to have money enough actually paid in to pay for that railway, and large sums yet due and secured by liens upon the land sold, besides millions of acres yet undisposed of. Now, the country would like to know more distinctly and clearly than is now known, why the value of those lands has depreciated in the hands of hon gentlemen opposite. Looking at the old Allan contract of 1873, before that country was fairly opened up, or the value and character of the culties, extinguishing Indian titles, making surveys, increasing, as we fondly supposed, their market value, why is it that the hon. Minister says now that they are worth but $1 an acre?

Mr. PLUMB. You said so yourself last year.

Mr. ANGLIN. I am not now speaking of my own opinion, but I am asking now why it is that hon. gentlemen on the other side repudiate the statement made by their leader in this House a few short Why is it that they ask us now to months ago? conclude that that statement was utterly and grossly inaccurate? If the prairie lands lying close to the railway are worth but a dollar an acre, then lands lying twenty, thirty or forty miles away, of what market value are they? Sir, the object of this depreciation is very palpable. If the hon the Minister of Railways, in making his statement before the House, were to admit that the statement made by his leader a few months ago was a correct statement, then he must say to this House and the country that this is a monstrous bargain. Taking the average value of these lands, even at the corrected estimate—the hon, member for West Durham did correct, in a material point, the calculation of the Premier last year and so reduced the general average of the price of the land-taking even that reduced average these lands must be worth at least $3.15 an acre; but at $3 an acre you would have $75,000,000 paid to those gentlemen, or $126,000,000 in all to build a railroad that is at the outside to cost but $80,000,000. That is the reason why the estimates of last year are so coolly repudiated. Why do those gentlemen taunt us with inconsistency? We can proudly point to our past record; we can defy them to take up every line of our speeches and to point out the slightest inconsistency. They may find that we may have had reason, after acquiring further information, to correct our views on some minor points, but where principle is concerned they will find that our views and opinions are thoroughly consistent upon the whole question. Some gentlemen say that perhaps two dollars an acre would be a fair average price for those lands. If the land is worth anything, if the country is worth settling at all, two dollars must be a low average indeed; but at that price the bargain would give $50,000,000 in addition to the $53,000,000, or $103,000,000 for the building of a railroad that is to cost but $80,000,000. But there is no certainty whatever that it will cost that sum. The standard adopted leaves it entirely in the choice of the Syndicate whether the portions of the road they build shall cost $80,000,000. The extent to which the railroad can be cheapened is something hardly conceivable. The hon member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) informed us a few evenings ago that a very difficult piece of railroad running out of Kingston was constructed for $15,000 a mile. A gentleman connected with that road has since assured me that though it ran to a rocky country, it was actually built for $15,000 a mile, and was, when constructed, a first-class road. It is well known that a road can be built very cheaply if we are only contented to have heavy grades and sharp curves, and poor road-beds and wooden bridges. A very important feature of this bargain is that for a portion of the road which can be constructed most cheaply the Syndicate are to get the largest quantity of land per mile. One would suppose that when you come to what is admittedly the most difficult section of the : oad, the Lake Superior section, the allowance of land and money would be much larger than in the eastern and central sections. Nobody has explained why more land per mile is to be given on that central section than on the eastern section. If the Syndicate chooses to convert the $25,000,000 of cash subsidy, as they are authorised to do, into bonds on which the Government will be obliged to pay 5 per cent. per annum for twenty years, it is calculated that Mr. Anglin.

The Government provides that of the money so raised the Syndicate shall be paid pro rata, withholding only $2,000 a mile for 800 miles, to be applied for the construction of the more difficult portion in the far west. Even taking off that $2,000 a mile you find there remains a sum of $14,500 a mile. Last year Mr. Fleming's estimate of the cost of the whole railroad through the prairie section was but $.3,000 a mile, and we know that the hon. Minister of Railways, last year, boasted that he had let one or two sections at a rate so low that the total cost would be much less than $13,000 per mile if this contract had been carried out, so that the road might be constructed for $10,000 a mile. Now, I venture to say that no one who knows any thing of the mysteries of railway construction can deny that a railroad of some kind or other, equal, at all events, to the Union Pacific, as first constructed, can be built across the Prairie section for $8,000 a mile. But let us suppose it will cost $13,000, yet we undertake to pay $14,500 a mile, or $1.500 a mile more than the road is to cost, and to give besides 12,500 acres per mile of the choice lands. Now, you will find, if you take 12,500 acres of lands for a thousand miles—for the Syndicate may possibly find it to their interest to build a hundred miles beyond Jasper House-at this rate you have 12,500,000 acres of land, and that is as much good land as can be found in either of the twenty-four mile belts along the railroad. So that you positively give them $1,500 a mile more than the outside estimate of the cost of the railroad in cash, and besides 12,500 acres of land throughout the whole length of the road, and you convey that to them absolutely, you cease to have any control or right over it, and they may convey it away any day they please. What security have we to have, if they find it is not to their interest to build the more difficult sections of the road?

Mr. PLUMB. What has the country to do with that?

Mr. ANGLIN. Why! The country is to give all these millions in money and millions in acres of land, and if the country gets nothing back again, are we to be asked what has the country to do with that? Mr. Chairman. such a question put to me from the other side of the House at this stage of the debate, shows what little attention the hon. gentleman has paid to this question, and shows what their feelings are in regard to interest. The country is everything to us. But I fear much that the majority of the hon. gentlemen on the other side will put the matter in such a position that they can, with much propriety, bye-and-by ask, what the country has to do with it! They will take everything away from the country, and leave us nothing in return—no security. A million dollars is to be lodged in the hands of the Government. What is one million compared with the profits they will make in this transaction? They would forfeit a million even if the security was real, instead of being sham and bogus, and take this $1,500 a mile cash profit, and all the fertile land in the twenty-four mile belt along the 1,000 miles in that fine country. It has been said there is another security -that the Syndicate are bound by their contract to commence the work on the eastern section within a month after commencing on the western, not proceeding exactly pari passu, but at a rate that will satisfy the Government. They intend to complete it within the ten years. We are told they will build the central section within three years. No doubt they will. There is no great difficulty about constructing it. Whether they intend to remain in the country, and use the extraordinary powers as a monopoly which this Bill will confer on them, or be content with the profits realized and abandon the whole scheme, still they will build that section within the three years. Well, how much of the other sections will they have built in the three years? Three-tenths, if they carry out the contract faithfully. Then, if they build a road not better than the Union Pacific they can in that way convert $25,000,000 into $40,000,000. they will receive money enough to cover their whole expenditure, and so they will have given us no security for the completion of the road. They will have received money enough for the land north of Lake Superior to pay them for all the work done. By this contract we are putting them in this extraordinary position: that it is for them to choose whether they will complete the railroad and exercise all the powers of a monopoly or abandon the whole thing after building the central section, and a portion of the northern section, and receiving all their millions in cash over and above what it has cost them; and all those millions in cash are conveyed to them beyond the reach of any Government We are to have no the reach of any Government We are to have no personal security. We have heard much since the Hochelaga speech of the right hon. gentleman, of the introduction of great English, American, French, German and Canadian capitalists into this work, men with the means of building ten such railroads at their disposal, and that they were all united; that their interests were to be so concerned in the work that they were to become great emigration agents who would bring a vast tide of emigration into this country from Germany-probably some such tide as Earl Beaconsfield described as likely to flow into the great North-West. Where are all these great capitalists now? Have they all vanished into thin air? The gentlemen whose names are prominent in this Company, and whom the Minister of Railways told us we had either attacked or intended to attack, are men for whom we on this side of the House entertain the highest personal esteem. If it were merely a question of personal friendship or favor, we would do all in our power to meet their views. Many of them are entirely in political sympathy with us. They are gentlemen we never reproached or denounced as unworthy of public confidence or public esteem. But we have a great duty to discharge to this country, in the light of which all personal considerations, private friendships and bonds and party ties and sympathies must disappear when men mean honestly to do their But we have not even the guarantee of the personal character of these gentlemen in the fulfilment of these obligations. It is expressly provided that, so soon as the Company shall have been formed under this contract, all private obligations shall cease, and we shall have nothing but the Company we ourselves created; and as to the capital not all the capital even the Company are bound to raise, for the $5,000,000 will be entirely beyond our reach. There is no provision by which we shall be able to lay hands on it to make it security for a breach of the bond. They will pay up this capital as such companies are wont to do. It becomes something intangible. They might just as well, for all the security given to this country, have no security at all; one million dollars is all the security lodged for the working of this road? There is a little more—the Minister of Public Works thinks it a great deal more, namely, the provision that, instead of getting 25,000,000 acres if they fail, we reserve 5,000,000 acres. We practically say, you will get 20,000,000 acres for doing so and so, and at the end of ten years 5,000,000 more. Nobody would consider that security. The color of security is given by transfering 25,000,000 acres to these gentlemen, and saying we hold 5,000,000 of your lands as security, lands which are ours in reality, for the performance of the work. This is no security. There is another point to which I would like to address myself as a representative of New Brunswick. There was a time when a great many people in the Lower Provinces were induced to believe that if we were all Confederated, and had a certain system of railroads created, we should enjoy vast benefits from participation in the trade and commerce of the north-western States, and particularly of our own North-West. That illusion has, to a great extent, been dissipated; and to-day a great majority of our people in the Lower Provinces, while taking an growth, and willing that portions of the lands in the North-West should be used for the purpose of building railroads in that region, and securing the future greatness and happiness of that country, feel particularly sensitive on one point, that is, that they have had to pay so large a share of the interest on all the money expended in opening up that country and building the railway. New Brunswick, from which I come, pays, I think, one eleventh of the whole revenue of this country. We have to pay one-eleventh of the whole revenue of this country, and here we are about to assume a debt of about $5,000,000 cost for the construction of this railroad. Last year we were told that this was a mere temporary loan for which we would be recouped in a few years, both principal and interest, by the sale of all those lands. We would like very much to be able to believe that, to be able to feel that we have not been paying towards the expense of opening up that North-West without hope of return. We believe that if the North-West had been acquired in a way that it should have been acquired, that if the Imperial Government had been required to contribute a fair share as was due from the Empire to a portion of the Empire towards opening up and settling that country, and if we had proceeded in the opening up and the settling up of that country with moderation there would have been no deficit, even during the last four or five years. If we had not to pay the cost of the Mounted Police, the Indian annuities, and all the other extraordinary expenditure in the North-West, besides the interest on those $15,000,000, now $18,000,000, expended on those railroads, we would have had no deficits and no increased taxation would have been necessary. Every time the subject came up for serious consideration in Parliament we protested that whatever we did must be so done as not to increase the rate of taxation, and yet, refusing to see the plain evidence, we have gone on year by year increasing the rate of taxation until it has reached its present proportion. We in the Lower Provinces feel that, and would like to know how this money is to come back to us. The right hon. Premier told us last year a very fine story. According to his calculation the money would be all repaid within a few years, but this year we find his own colleagues, nay, his very self, declaring in effect that that calculation was an erroneous one, unwarranted by the state of the country, and that, in point of fact, neither himself nor his colleagues ever believed it, because within a few short weeks after that very statement was made these hon. gentlemen set to work to devise a new mode of constructing this great railway and have now told us they did so because it was necessary to dispel the apprehension of the country, and relieve it from the doubts which everybody, even they, entertained. Now, how are we to get back this expenditure of $53,000,000? Take this whole twenty-four mile belt, and you will find it a very liberal calculation, to say that there are 12,500,000 acres of available good land in the 24-mile belt for the Company, and there will be as much more for the Government; but the Hudson's Bay Company have the right of 5 per cent. on every portion of the land apportioned off. That 5 per cent. must be paid in both cases by the Government, which will make 10 per cent. on our 12,500,000 acres. Hon. gentlemen opposite told us that this land was worth a dollar an acre. We have, therefore, at this rate, deducting the 10 per cent. eleven and a quarter millions acres of land and the same amount of dollars. Where, then, are we to get the other $42,500,000 of expenditure from? We are told now there are 250,000,000 acres of magnificent land out there. It is amazing how the area of fertile land has grown in that country. When we proposed to give 50,000,000 acres to Sir Hugh Allan & Co., some doubted whether there was so much good land out there. Well, it was asserted, not with very much confidence, that there was probably 100,000,000 acres there. Then it had grown to 150,000,000. After interest in the North-West, and while desirous of seeing acres there. Then it had grown to 150,000,000. After anything done, anything likely, to promote its settlement and that some faintly ventured to assert we had 200,000,000

Now this last week we are told we have 250,000,000 acres there. I would like to be able to believe anything of the kind, that there was 250,000,000 of acres there fit for settlement in every respect, where the climate is not too severe and the frost not too early. This is a recklessly wild assertion; we have no evidence to show anything of the kind. Professor Macoun has done his. utmost to extend the area of fertile lands, to persuade us all that lands formerly considered barren and useless are among the most fertile in the North-West. But no one man could in two, three, five, or ten years so examine the country as to be able to say there was 100,000,000 acres of good land in it. It is simply physically impossible. But even if it were all fertile land, that which is close to the railway is estimated to be worth only a dollar an acre, what then would be the value of land from 200 to 500 miles off? The older Provinces will, therefore, have to pay the whole of this $53,000,000 in cash, and the chances of their ever receiving $1,000,000 of it back again is very small indeed. The very interest upon the amount we have already paid would absorb the product of a great many million acres of land to be sold every year. The last returns show an expenditure of about $18,600,000. which, at five per cent., give an interest of nearly $1,000,000 a year. This would require, according to the best estimate, a million of acres to be sold and not repay a single dollar of the principal. I regard the prospect of getting back the money that we will expend utterly out of the question. Had we any reason to expect that tens or hundreds of thousands of people would flock into that country within a few years, we might possibly try to be content with having to pay so large a sum towards opening up that country. But the monopoly we are about to create will effectually prevent the settlement of that country. There were very serious obstacles already to its settlement; it was difficult to persuade people, that a country where the average temperature during the whole winter was very low, and where in many parts early frosts were experienced, was a very desirable country for settlement, no matter how rich its soil might be. But we are about to create an obstacle greater than any that nature has placed in the way of the settle-ment of that country. The monopoly which we endeavored to extinguish in that country, was not essentially so odious and detestable as that we are now asked to create. Why, if the gentlemen associated with the Syndicate in the Company, do choose to construct all this railroad, just see what a position that country will be in. The hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan), this afternoon, in the effort to prove that we were not about to close up all avenues and lock up all the gates of that country, and hand over the keys to the Syndicate, said that there were other modes of getting into the country, and I think I heard him speak of water stretches—those water stretches so much despised and scorned for many years by which another avenue could be made. suppose the people in that country become numerous and wealthy enough to be able themselves to open some sort of communication in the way the hon. gentleman indicated, what would it amount to? It would be but a summer route, after all. But the possibility, not to say the probablity, of any such a route as that being open for many years to come, is very faint indeed, and the very fact that a gentleman of the experience in business and in public affairs of the hon. member for Glengarry felt obliged to argue that such an avenue could be opened, proves in itself how extraordinary are the powers we are about to confer on this Company. Having already access to the great railway centres of the United States, and being in such a position that we may, in a year or two, have easy access to the waters of the great lakes, why should we place that country in such a position that the day after this Bill is passed, it will have no means of communication any line; and it is to be expected that this Company will with the outer world except such as are provided by the so lay out their branch lines as virtually to give them for all Mr. Anglin,

Syndicate, that we shall have deprived these people of all power to help themselves, save such power as ever rests with a people determined never to submit to oppression? We give this monopoly the power to build railways wherever they choose—in one instance between points a thousand miles apart. True the consent of the Governor in Council must be obtained for such works; but what guarantee is there that the Government who entered into such a bargain as this will ever use its power to prevent the Syndicate from doing what they consider best for themselves? Why, we have heard it argued that these men, who are commercial men, know best where to locate the road. If they know best, where should they be restrained? If the true intent of this policy is to enable these men to do the best they can for themselves, why should we expect the Government to interfere? They will locate that road wherever interfere? They will locate that road they please—there is no doubt about that. Government may make some show of insisting that the line must go one way or must not go another way, but even for that little show of independence, let me tell them, they will get no credit. The public will not believe in their sincerity, will not believe that, after having sacrificed so much, they are likely to insist on such trifles. The Syndicate can select lands and positions where they please, which will for all time virtually give them the command of the whole country. They fyle their plans in one of the depart, ments here and forthwith their route is established, and they build railways wherever they please, and for such railways they get the right of way anywhere and everywhere, and along such lines they get such lands as they please. This monopoly presses down upon the population in that country until it makes them its perfect slaves, cramped, cabined, confined, utterly unable to help themselves; and we are depriving ourselves of the power to help them, so that appeal to us for assistance or redress would be useless. All that, Mr. Chairman, for the long period of twenty years. We hand them over the Pembina Branch, the line of railway from Lake Superior to Selkirk, and with a strange infatuation we provide that no other company shall build any line of railway south of southwest, or shall build any line of railway approaching within fifteen miles of the American frontier for twenty years to come. We divest ourselves of the power, as far as it is possible for this Parliament to divest any future Parliaments of such power, to authorize any company, no matter what the circumstances of the country may be, no matter how monstrous we may find this monopoly, bye-and-by to be, to connect with the railway system of the United States for twenty years. And so we surrender absolutely and entirely the whole carrying trade of all that vast region to this Company. It has been argued that other companies, if they choose, can build branches to the north of this line. So they can, if companies can be found foolish enough to invest their money in any works of the kind. It was all very well when the Government owned this road, that some restriction of this kind should be made. It was not absolutely unreasonable, because it was supposed that the Government would use that road for the public benefit, and would also pay due regard to the interests of the people living in the North-West. It would have been perfectly safe if the Government owned the main trunk line, if companies were allowed to build branches running east, north-west or north-east, as they might then be in a position to obtain reasonable terms for any freight that might be brought down over the Government line of 'railway. But under this scheme the owners of such lines become merely the contributors to this Company, and if they bring their merchandize over this road they must expect to pay just such rates as the Company choose to impose. It is not to be expected that private companies, under these circumstances, would build time to come the control of the carrying trade of a great part of the North-West. At some time afterwards when they have all their lines laid down, when they have selected the best lands in the North-West, when they have the people who go into that country surrounded in such a way that they can scarcely shake off the yoke, if there still remains any energy in the country, if there remain any probability of opening new avenues of trade, if any capital remains in the country, it may be possible to build other branches which may make remunerative returns. monopoly is a thorough monopoly; it has no redeeming feature whatever; there seems to be in it no legal or constitutional escape for the people of the North-West. It is a monopoly to which has been practically transferred all the sovereignty and property of the whole of the North-West —a monopoly which will, as has been well said, make them not landlords, in the ordinary sense of the word, but the owners of the country. Every cent that can be extorted from the people, without actually driving them from the country, will be extorted; every cent that can be exacted from the wheat trade, without preventing the growth of wheat, will be exacted by this grinding monopoly. It is folly for any one who knows human nature, or has studied the history of the world, to expect anything else. And we are asked to ratify this monstrous bargain. We are asked to say that it is in the interests of the people of this whole Dominion, that the great North-West to which many were looking forward anxiously as likely to be the centre and the seat of our Canadian Empire, we are asked to believe that it is in the interests of the whole people to hand over these territories absolutely to the control of men, some of whom we know to-day, but none of whom we may know in twelve months hence. We are asked to place things in such a position that those men may have the chance of building only the productive and profitable portion of the railway, and receiving, therefor, a price far in excess of what it would cost the Government to build the whole work within the time specified, and to hold that whole country absolutely for twenty years, but practically, and in point of fact, for all time thereafter. I, for one, am not prepared to assent to any such bargain. My assent may be of very little value; my woice is but the voice of one, and we know that the majority on the side of the Government is strong. We have reason to conclude that the Government know well how to lead and control their majority, and there are few of us who venture to hope that this measure will not pass, and perhaps pass without alteration or amendment. Nevertheless, it is our duty to protest against the bargain. I confess that when I first received the summons to attend this meeting of Parliament to consider this question, I hoped that the Government had somehow or other made a bargain of which I could approve. I read the speeches of the hon. Premier; I read very carefully the utterances of other hon. Ministers, and I looked very closely into those newspapers which are regarded as the organs of the Government, and I tried to form some opinion of this bargain about which there was so much mystery. I never did believe, nor do I believe now, that the dignity of Parlia ment required that the bargain should be kept secret. Ifthe dignity of Parliament did so require, it would have so required that the secret should have been an absolute one; but the remarkable feature of the whole affair is that those portions of the contract which were, perhaps, regarded as not likely to create much objection somehow or other all leaked out. We all heard that there was to be paid over to the Company $25,000,000 and 25.000,000 acres of land, and we heard that the portions of the road under contract were to be handed over to the Company. It was not inconsistent with the dignity of Parliament that we should be told these particulars, though it was quite inconsistent with the dignity of Parliament that we should be told that the Government | under the Sir Hugh Allan contract, are to be chosen at the

had engaged to finish these sections which they are to build. and to build another section of 90 miles, which has never been commenced. I am satisfied that no hon, gentleman on this side of the House ever suspected or dreamed that there was any such stipulation as that. That was carefully kept back from us; the dignity of Parliament was most carefully guarded. But, Sir, we were not told that this monopoly would be so guarded; that all competition would be prevented; that this Syndicate were to obtain absolute control for 20 years of the carrying trade of the North-West. Now, though I do not go so far as some who say that no railways ought to be built or owned by a Government, I think that under a wise and prudent administration it might be possible to adopt a policy whereby the great trunk and central lines of railway that are now becoming so common might, to a great extent, be built and owned by the Government, and I was quite pre-pared to assent to any proposition for the transfer of this work to a company. In fact, Sir, I was gravely calculating how the Government was to be re-constructed, for I thought the vocation of the Minister of Railways was about to cease, and that there would be nothing more for him to do except, perhaps, to administer the affairs of the Intercolonial Railway. I did not think that a gentleman of his energy would care to preside over a department having no other duties than that; and I was thinking we would have to pass a Bill for the re-distribution of seats in the Cabinet. But I never thought we were to have all the binding and objectionable features of building Government railways continued for fully ten years to come; and I can assure you if I had, I would never have dreamed of supporting the measure introduced by the Government. I also puzzled my brains a good deal to know why a Commission was issued into all matters relating to the construction of the Pacific Railway, and after having read all the evidence given before the Commission, tried to come to some conclusion on the subject. If its purpose was to convict the late Minister of Public Works of having acted corruptly or improperly, or without a reasonable degree of care and ability in the discharge of his duties, then the Commission was an absolute failure. I saw that great efforts were made by the Commissioners to bring out evidence that would have the effect of reflecting upon the member for Lambton, and I felt quite satisfied that they must fail, as they did fail. If the object was to remove some suspicions that hung about the letting of recent contracts, in that also the Commission was a great failure, and I can hardly expect that any Minister of the Government expected that anything else could be proved. I was forced to the conclusion that the object of this Commission was to disgust the public so thoroughly with the building of railways by the Government that they would be prepared for the ready adoption of this bargain, which, I supposed, was about to be laid on the Table of the House. I think it would have gone far in that direction if the contract had not been a monstrous job, unjustifiable as we find it to be. But the contract renders it more difficult than ever to guess the object of the Royal Commission, for I find that the construction of railways by the Government is to be continued for at least ten years longer. hope that the whole of these unconstructed portions of the railway were to be handed over to the Syndicate, and that more provision would be made for the work being done without the Government binding itself to pay for those sections to be finished, or to have anything further to do with them, than to employ an engineer to see that the specifications were fairly carried out. But we have not only to hand over this work to the Syndicate, but we have to give them, besides, $25,000,000 and 25,000,000 acres of land. and these lands, instead of being taken in the same way as option of the Company. If such a proposal, as I first expected, had been made to us, I would certainly have felt it to be my duty to give it my serious and thoughtful consideration, and it is quite possible that as a dernier resort, as the only escape from a worse state of things, I might have felt it to be my duty to approve of it. But as matters are, I found it impossible to approve of this bargain, and I cannot help expressing my wonder that hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House—business men, men of experience, men who really and truly, for I believe there are such in the party-have the interests of their country at heart, would allow party feeling or party prejudice, or a desire for a party advantage, to overcloud their better judgment and their patriotic feelings to such an extent as to force them, contrary, I believe, to the convictions of many of them, to vote for such a bargain. I cannot fail to express my surprise upon that point. It has well been said that this is not essentially a party question. It ought not to be a party question. It would be well for the country if all such questions as this were regarded irrespective of party. But I am afraid it will be treated as a party question—afraid, not for the interest of the party to which I belong, but afraid for the interest of the country. If the Opposition were called upon to-night to devise any means or scheme by which public odium could be heaped most lavishly upon the party in power, I cannot conceive any means more effectual than the forcing of a contract like this through Parliament by mere party influence and party force. It is not as a member of my party that I have any cause to regret the passing of these resolutions; it is simply as one who feels so free from all party bias that I would much prefer that the country were saved from such an infliction rather than that the party to which I belong should regain power sooner than it otherwise would. It is only for that reason that I sincerely regret the passage of a measure of this kind. I might have presented many other weighty considerations, at least in my mind, against the adoption of this measure, but I forbear on account of the lateness of the hour, and thank the House for the attention with which it has listened to me.

Mr. CHARLTON moved the adjournment of the Debate. Motion agreed to.

Committee rose and reported.

House resumed.

NEW MEMBER.

Mr. SPEAKER announced that he had received from the Returning Officer of the North Riding of the County of Oxford, a certificate that James Sutherland, Esquire, had been duly elected to represent that district in this House.

The hon, member was introduced by Mr. BLAKE and Mr. SKINNER.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved that in admitting James Sutherland, Esquire, to take his seat upon the certificate of the Returning Officer, this House still recommends a strict adherence to the principle of requiring the production of the usual certificate of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, of the return of the writ of election.

Motion agreed to; and (at 12:05 o'clock, a.m.) the House adjourned.

Mr. SPEAKER presented the Return of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery of the election of Mr. Sutherland, for the Electoral District of North Oxford.

EXCHANGE BANK OF CANADA.

Mr. DESJARDINS introduced a Bill (No. 8) to reduce the capital stock of the Exchange Bank of Canada, and otherwise to amend the Act respecting the said bank.

Bill read the first time.

EMIGRATION PAMPHLETS.

Mr. MERNER enquired, Whether those pamphlets which were written in the interest of emigration to the North-West Territories have been translated and printed in the German language, and whether they have been sent to Germany, as was contemplated by the Government last year, and how many copies have been distributed for that purpose?

Mr. POPE (Compton). The pamphlets were translated into German, and 20,000 copies were sent to Germany for distribution.

ENGINEER'S REPORT ON THE CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. BLAKE enquired, When will the Engineer's annual report on the Canadian Pacific Railway be laid before the House? Is it intended this Session to follow the course pursued last Session, and to provide for the use of members during the discussion of the Canadian Pacific Railway contract, advance sheets of the report?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I expect to be able to lay the report on the Table of the House, and have it distributed as soon as we meet after the holidays. I shall be happy to give the hon. gentleman advance sheets as soon as they are through the press.

RAILWAY TO LAKE ST. JOHN.

Mr. RINFRET enquired, Whether the Government has come to any, and what decision on the subject, which they had under consideration last Session, of aiding the construction of the railway to Lake St. John?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The Government has not yet come to any decision upon the question of aiding the construction of a railway to Lake St. John.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACT.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex), in moving for a return showing all appointments or dismissals made under the Weights and Measures Act, from the 1st day of July, 1879, to date, and the receipts and expenditures under the said Act, from the 1st day of July, 1880, to the 1st day of December, 1880, said: I am induced to make this motion by statements contained in the report of the Minister of Inland Revenue. We were promised, when the change was made in the Weights and Measures Act, in 1879, that there would be a great reduction in the expenditure under that Act. The report of the Minister of Inland Revenue covers, of course, the last fiscal year, and it does not contain anything to indicate that the promised reduction in expenditure is likely to follow. I am hoping, when I receive a reply to my motion giving the expenditure since last July, that we will have stronger indications of the fulfilment of the promises made a year ar two ago than anything contained in the report for the last fiscal year. I notice that in the first and last two years of the administration of the Weights and Measures Act, under the late Government, each Inspector of Weights and Measures collected an average revenue of $813, but under the inspection as conducted at present, each Inspector has collected an average of $466. I notice, further, that during the last two years of the administration of that Act by the late Government, the expenditure averaged for each Inspector $2,096, whereas, the expenditure under the present Act has averaged $2,275. Instead of an economy promised by the change in the Weights and Measures Act we have something that looks like the opposite. I find, also, that the receipts previous to 1879 averaged 39 per cent. of the expenditure, but the receipts for the last Weights and Measures Act, now being managed, averages only 21 per cent. of the expenditure. It is also remarkable to notice the variety in the amounts collected in the different districts into which Canada is divided under this Act. I find, for instance, that in the district the head quarters of which is Belleville, each inspector collected an average of $3,008; in the Hamilton division each inspector collected an average of $564; in the London division each inspector only collected an average of $170. I find, moreover, that in the London district the amount paid for salaries was $1,534.70, and the entire collection of three officers in that district during the whole year amounted to only $510.45, or one third of the sum paid for salaries. I notice that still greater anomalies prevail elsewhere. Take, for instance, the district, the centre of which is the city of Quebec. There they have eight inspectors, and the collections average $70.56 per inspector; that is to say, the collections for the whole of that district amounted to $564, and the salaries paid to $2,370.70, or a little more than four times the entire receipts. In the Sherbrooke district some circumstances still more remarkable occurred. The entire collections there amounted to $161.06, and the contingencies to $106.94. Again, I find in the district of which Cape Breton is the centre, that there were paid for salaries and contingencies $861.54, and the collections of revenues amounted to $25.37. In the Halifax district there were paid for salaries and contingencies $1,854.91, and there were collected as revenue $440. Yarmouth is even worse, for the entire revenue only amounted to $90.18. In Prince Edward Island the receipts for the whole province for the inspection of weights and measures only amounted to $59.42, and there was paid for manage-In Victoria the receipts ment of the office $839.93. amounted to nothing, and the expenses and managing the office, $164.81. Now, I have called attention to these facts in moving my resolution that the Government might, if they have information more gratifying than what is contained in the report of Inland Revenue, bring it down that hon. members may see whether the administration of the Weights and Measures Act now is more satisfactory, either in point of revenue or management, than it was formerly. The com plaint generally made heretofore was that this Act was an expensive institution and vexatious in its administration. I admit it was to a certain extent expensive, but in proportion to the expense for the inspection of weights and measures under the old regime the collections were proportionately much larger than they are at present. Secondly, I hold that as the Weights and Measures Act was administered heretofore, the result was far more satisfactory. Under the old system the weights and measures were regularly inspected at least once a year: as the law is administered at present, there is practically little or no inspection. I know districts that have not to this day been visited by any officer appointed under the new law. Now, the position I take in regard to this matter is this: that the Administration who made the change in the Weights and Measures Act, who dismissed, I think, 99 officers, who supplanted these with other men, are bound to give the fees that was collected before the administration of the House some explanation why those officers were dismissed, present Government, it cannot have been very oppressive. It and to show some reason why so complete a change was made in the administration of such an important department of the public service. If it is alleged that these men did not discharge their duties well, I answer that they collected more revenue proportionately than the present officers; if it is said that they did not visit the various districts under their charge, I will be able to show that the greater number of them inspected the different districts under their charge at least once a year, and I will show still further that under the present regime there is practically no inspection whatever. Besides, I notice, in the report of the Minister of Inland Revenue, that the contingencies of that department are extraordinarily large, considering the small amount of revenue received. Notwithstanding the fact that the officers are doing little or nothing, the department took pains to advertise the regulations. They paid for advertising in the Dominion Guide $10, in Slack's Almanac $30, in the almanac published by the Montreal Gazette $50, in Campeau's Guide to the House of Commons $80, in Burrows' North-Western Canada $50, in a French pamphlet circulated in Manitoba $50, in the Parliamentary Companion $60, and to Belanger & Co., $10, making a total sum of $360 paid in a single year to tell the people of Canada what a great institution this is, as managed by the present Administration. After the officers appointed some years ago were dismissed and better trained men put into their places, it was necessary that they should be instructed; and I see an item of $845 paid to a gentleman for visiting and instructing these new officers, in order that they might collect a paltry revenue of $25 in one case, and $70 in another, and in another case draw $160 for contingencies and collect no revenue at all. I see another item of $246 paid for travelling expenses in connection with the establishment of new offices. Perhaps the Government will be able to give full and satisfactory explanations of these expenses when we come to discuss the Estimates. In the meantime, I will await the reply to my motion in the hope that it will explain to me many things which appear at present to be very unsatisfactory.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman, I think, would have done a good deal of service by making this motion, if he had not made his speech. The motion, of course, is for information which the Government are quite ready to give, and which, perhaps, the House will be glad to receive. A man of the hon. gentleman's experience and standing in the party ought to know that in matters of administration like this, really there are no politics concerned. This is not a question affecting the late or the present Administration. No matter what Government is in power, it is interested in having the departments well administered. As regards the legislation, I suppose the present Government, or at least some of the members of the present Government who were in the Government of 1878, are responsible for it. The late Government did not repeal that law, but administered it according to their lights. We all know that the late Government and their predecessors were getting rather into a hornet's nest, as, by the administration of the law, they put to a considerable inconvenience the small retail dealers, shopmen, and the middlemen generally, who deal with the great mass of the people, and furnish them with the supplies which come under the regulations of weights and measures. But the hon. gentleman, judging from his speech, has made his motion rather for the purpose of attacking the Administration since 1878, than with any strong desire to get the information he asks for. He compares the receipts of a couple of years ago with the receipts now. If I read the Reform press aright, I find that the conduct of Mr. Brunel and the Department has been very oppressive. only half the sum has been collected in the way of fines and is the duty of every Government to see that there are just measures and balances, and the Act introduced, and founded on the experience of other nations, was for that purpose. I believe, on the whole, that under my late colleague, Mr. Baby, the administration of the department was thoroughly successful. I believe that by a great deal of tact, forbearance, and judicious concession, he removed many of the objections and heart-burnings that were raised by the carrying out of the Act in its stringency. Whether that has been the cause of the falling off in the revenue is a small affair, because this is not a matter of revenue, but a matter of a just balance and a just weight and measure; and I believe that by degrees dealers are adopting proper weights and measures. The hon, gentleman speaks, also, of the increase of expense. He knows the Act has been developed, and that the Inland Revenue just now is being collected, while we are merely proceeding on the lines of the Act, and in the same spirit as it was carried out by the late Government, the requirements of the Act, neither in number of officers nor salaries, exceeding the limits sanctioned by Parliament. The information shall be brought down at once. The hon, gentleman is quite right in calling the attention of the House to any undue expenditure or any defect in administration in a matter which affects the daily transactions of the masses and those who deal with them.

Mr. BOWELL. I suggest an amendment to the motion by the addition of the word "conduct" for such dismissals, if any; because I am aware that in some cases the hon. gentleman was justified in his dismissals. I would like also to add the year 1878, and a statement showing the receipts and expenditures under the Weights and Measures Act for the year, from the 30th June, 1877, to the 1st July, 187%. I think, with these amendments, the hon mover will, perhaps, better accomplish his object by obtaining a comparative statement. So far as the administration of the Act goes, in the district in which I live, it has never been so good before, nor has the business ever been so thoroughly attended to as under the present officers.

Mr. ROSS. I am quite agreeable to accept the amendment suggested by the hon. Minister of Customs. I may say, I am sure the First Minister is a illustration of the operation of "putting yourself in his place." When he occupied a seat on this side, and his followers also, happily for the country, we constantly heard charges brought against the Department of Inland Revenue of the excessive burdens imposed by the Weights and Measures Act, and of the unreasonable anxiety of the Inspectors of Weights and Measures to enforce that Act. I think hon, gentlemen opposite made this a political question during the elections of 1878. I know many ridings in which it was made a political question, and that in many instances the late Administration was charged with the introduction of that Act, whereas it is the production of the genius, shall I say, of the present Minister of Railways. The Liberal party were not only charged with the framing of the Act, but with all the effects of its administration; and it was no apology for our conduct to say that a just weight and measure were necessary. However, that is the apology urged by the present Government. I am glad to find the right hon. gentleman believes in a just weight and a just measure, and I trust he will apply them to the political acts and intentions of his opponents in future.

Mr. MILLS. With regard to the Minister of Railways, when this measure was under our consideration, an attempt was made to charge the late Administration with changing the law as to weights and measures and introducing a new system, the hon. gentleman had the fairness to deny the assertion. That was one of the few instances in which this hon. gentleman acted fairly towards his political opponents.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Ex uno disce omnes. Sir John A. MacDonald.

Mr. MILLS. I do not think it is necessary for the Minister of Customs to propose any amendment to the motion of the member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross). I think it is perfectly clear why the hon, gentleman dismissed the various officers appointed by the late Administration. If you were to put the names of all the people in the constituency in a wheel of fortune, and draw out certain names by lot, and appoint the persons so drawn, it would be impossible to find them all incompetent to discharge the duties of such officers. The late Administration appointed Inspectors of Weights and Measures at various points in the country. When this measure was under our consideration, hon gentlemen on the Treasury benches will remember that I pointed out it was their intention to do by the Act what they had not the courage to do without it—to dismiss all the Inspectors of Weights and Measures under the law as it stood. The First Minister denied any such imputation, and said he had never acted in a way to justify a charge of this kind. In this particular my prediction appeared to be apt, and my apprehensions well founded. The hon, gentlemen opposite did on this occasion adopt the American system, maintaining that to the victors belong the spoils-not simply they might legitimately have done, to fill up vacancies where they occurred, but they changed the law and made inspection districts larger, where now inspection is very imperfectly performed. If, as the hon, gentleman says, no complaint is made now against the administration of the Act, it is largely because it is not carried out, that no action is taken under it. The instructions to the officers may have been to give the community as little trouble as possible. We know grocers and dry-goods men do not wish their weights and measures inspected every year; and, although we believe it is necessary in the public interest, the traders themselves, whether their weights and measures are perfect or imperfect, will never ask their inspection. In this matter we see only the revenues derived from this source, and, as an hon. gentleman says, not the benefits to the people from the obtainment of . just weights and measures. We learn from the return that there has been a great relaxation of the closeness of the supervision exercised when the districts were small and the work was under the immediate attention of those appointed to perform it. We do not need the words added the motion by the Minister of Customs.
w right well the cause of the dism to There was no complaint against the parties. Will the hon. gentleman say that all the inspectors were complained of as being dishonest or incompetent, that formal charges were preferred against them by the department, that these charges were investigated, found to be well made, and the parties dismissed for cause? We know right well that cannot be done, and that when that has not been done, then the Administration have no right to assign as a cause incompetency which has not been established. When the hon. gentlemen had to fill up the various appointments that had to be made in a new district, they should have confined themselves to choosing for those appointments men who were in office at the time. We might as well undertake to amend the law of Customs, dismiss all the Custom-house officers, and then make new appointments with as much propriety as what has been done in this instance. The Government acted on the principle that to the victors belong the spoils. They dismissed the inspectors appointed by the late Administration and filled their places by their

Mr. BOURBEAU. Although I did not hear the speeches of the two hon. members who have just spoken, I understand that the subject matter of their discourse was a complaint against the law concerning the inspection of weights and measures. The members of the Liberal party find cause to complain because their friends have been dismissed from their situations in the inspection of weights and measures. Yet these friends have not always satisfactorily performed their duties, extortionate charges have been exacted from merchants as well as farmers, and these latter have frequently expressed their discontent. I have often had the occasion of noticing that this law, put into force by the previous Government, was far more adverse to the interests of the public than the present one. In the county which I have the honor of representing, the inspector was appointed by the present Government to supersede the former incumbent, who did not give satisfaction to the public in the fulfilment The Inspector appointed by the present of his duties. Government gives satisfaction to Liberals and Conservatives alike. The charges incurred by those who have weights and measures for inspection are far less than formerly. If the Government does not derive as much revenue therefrom under the present law, at any rate the law gives more satisfaction to the public, and has re-established in the county that order that was so needed. As the hon, leader of the Government has so well expressed it, the inspection of weights and measures has not been established to make it a source of income, but rather to preserve order between buyer and seller, so that the public should ever feel secure in the accuracy of the weights and measures employed. It is easy to understand the discontent of those who are obliged to make some disbursement to have their weights and measures regulated, but taking it all in all, the working of this new law gives general satisfaction.

Mr. SPROULE. I was amused at the reasons given why the revenue produced by the Weights and Measures Act, previous to 1879, was greater than it is now. The reason is evident to those who understand the working of the Act. A case has come under my own observation, where scales were inspected by the inspector, appointed by the late Government, at a cost to the owner of $25; while the same scales were inspected by the inspector appointed by the present Government, at a cost of only $11. In another case the cost under the old law was $17, whereas it was only $9 under the new regime.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. DAWSON, in moving for a return of surveys made in the fall of 1879, and winter of 1879-90, of the southern route or shore line, between Red Rock, Nipigon Bay and the terminus of the Pacific Railway at Thunder Bay, said: This report is a very important one, as by means of it, I understand a very good line has been found, where the country some distance inland from the coast was very rough and impracticable. The report came in so late that I believe it could not be included in the general reports. On looking at this map in the railway office, it appears as if that survey, making as it does a great bend toward the south, had added to the distance, but it is not greater than the distance in the other case, because the country inland between Red Rock and Thunder Bay is exceedingly difficult. This section was examined twenty years ago by efficient engineers who found it so broken that a waggon road could not be made through it. The Pacific Railway engineers have been surveying it for the past ten years and have not yet got a suitable line for a railway. Of course, men and money will carry a railway almost anywhere, as in Section 15, but this | made? shore line to which I refer, between Nipigon Bay and Thunder Bay, is easy of construction, while it would not really add to the distance, considering the deviations that would be required in the rough country by the inland route.

"Mr. HAGGART. - On this subject I would ask the hon. Minister of Railways, before moving an amendment to the motion, if he can supply the report of the surveys made by Mr. Austin and Mr. Cambie, between Lake Nipissing and this Thunder Bay route during the present season? This report would be of interest during the Pacific Railway debate. believe we have no life saving stations upon the inland

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is no objection to bringing down this information. It will show that the survey made from Nipigon to Thunder Bay went to establish the fact that a very favorable line has been obtained in that direction-I believe the shortest line, so far as the construction is concerned, of any line that can be obtained. Of course, if the line were carried out from Nipigon, to strike the main line at a considerable distance out, it would shorten the distance from Nipissing to the Red River and decrease the length of the line to be constructed. There is, however, a very favorable line, much more easy than was previously supposed, found by the survey of last year, which was carried on in the winter from Nipigon to Thunder Bay. With reference to the remarks of the hon, member for Lanark, I may say that it is not necessary to make any amendment, because I am having these reports of Mr. Austin and Mr. Cambie propared as rapidly as possible, and, I hope, in a few days to be able to lay them on the Table of the House.

Mr. BLAKE. Perhaps the hon, gentleman will give us a brief account of the result of these surveys of which the hon, member for Lanark spoke.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say that exploratory surveys had been made generally in that country some time ago, but the whole distance had never been chained nor yet connected. There was general information which had extended over a number of years, but I thought it was desirable when we were taking this question up, to deal with it practically for the purpose of securing the construction of the whole line to be able to supply the missing link, as it were, by showing the incomplete connection between the various explorations, and Mr. Austin and Mr. Cambie were detained for that purpose. Mr. Brunel was charged with the examination of the line from the point where it was diverted, going north of Lake Superior, to come to the Sault Ste. Marie. He was charged to survey that line from the Sturgeon River and down to Spanish River, for the purpose of giving the fullest information as to the line to Sault Ste. Marie. Messrs. Austin and Cambie were directed to go on, and, as rapidly as possible, complete the connection with the main line from a point which had not been thoroughly examined. The result is we have now the whole distance chained from Nipissing to Thunder Bay, a distance by the chain of 650 miles. Perhaps in the construction it will be necessary to exceed that distance a few miles. The result of that examination is of a very satisfactory character. It has developed the fact, to which too much importance can hardly be attached, that instead of being a rough, sterile and uninhabitable country, there is for some 200 or 300 miles distance a very good, well timbered country, and that the line will not be very difficult of construction. It shows that a very considerable distance from Nipissing on the main line towards the head of Lake Superior is a very valuable section of country, and one which we may fairly anticipate will furnish a very considerable amount of traffic for that line in providing lumber and materials which will be required for the settlement of the North-West.

Mr. BLAKE. As to the general result of the exploration

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Towards Spanish River, that I am not able to speak of, more particularly, but I believe the section of country is very favorable.

Motion agreed to.

LIFE SAVING STATIONS.

Mr. CHARLTON, in moving for papers and correspondence on the question of establishing life saving stations on the inland waters of the Dominion, said: I waters of the Dominion. I noticed the other day, in looking over the report of the United States' Life Saving Department for the year ending 30th June, 1880, that the extent of the operations of that department had been very large, and the amount of property and the number of lives saved very great. The United States has 139 such stations on the Atlantic coast, 34 on the great lakes, and six upon the Pacific coast. Last year the total number of vessels lost was 67; the number involved in disasters, 300; the number of persons on board, 1,989, and the number lost only nine. The number of persons brought ashore by means of the life-saving appliances of this department of the public service was 706; the number of vessels assisted off that were stranded or placed in positions of danger was 128. Many vessels were warned off dangerous places by the lighting of signals at night on the beach. Since the organization of this department in 1871 the total number of disasters has been 1,097; the value of the vessels lost, $13,330,000; the value of the cargoes, $7,118,000; the value of the property saved, $12,130,000; the value of property lost, $8,291,000. The number of persons upon the vessels which were lost during that period was 10,381, and the number saved 10,010. The number of lives lost was 371, and of that number 183 were lost in the disasters at which the benefits of the lifesaving appliances could not be rendered available. The number of persons sheltered by this branch of the public service, during the same period, was 2,203. These statistics demonstrate clearly the importance of this service to the commercial marine of the United States, and I think it is worthy the consideration of the Government-if they have not already considered the matter—whether it would not be proper to establish such stations, not only upon the coasts, but upon the inland waters of Canada. We have on our great lakes many points which are much exposed, and where many disasters occur—such for example as Long Point, on Lake Erie. I cannot give any definite information as to the expense of these life-saving stations. I believe that the number of persons employed at each station is usually six. Houses are built at some convenient point on the beach, and runways are provided for launching the life-boats into the surf. There are appliances for resuscitating distressed mariners-medicines, blankets, flannels, and other articles of that kind. There are, of course, life-boats, mortars for throwing lines, and all other necessary appliances. The crew of six men are detailed as patrolmen, and they patrol the beach at night. If vessels are noticed in dangerous positions signals are made to them by means of lights, and information is conveyed to the stations so that the life-boat and other appurtenances may be transported to the scene of the disaster. I do not think that the expenses of these stations can be very great; and my object in making the motion is to direct the attention of the Government to the matter. Though our revenues may not justify a very heavy expenditure for such a purpose, I beg to commend to the Government the propriety of establishing a few of these stations at some of the more exposed points upon our inland

Motion agreed to.

IMMIGRATION.

Mr. GLEN moved for a statement showing the number of emigrants into Canada for each month in each year, from 1875 to 1880 inclusive; and also, for a statement shewing the number of emigrants from foreign parts and the number from each Province of Canada, into Manitoba and the North-West Territories, in each month of each of the said years. He said: I ask for this information for the purpose of showing that the greater number of emigrants arrived in this country during the season of navigation, and also that those who go to Manitoba, go there during the season of navigation. If we had the Sault Ste, Marie Railway con-Mr. Charlon.

structed, which might be completed early in the spring of 1883, we could transport the great bulk of the emigrants to Manitoba via Sault Ste. Marie and Thunder Bay through our own territory, thereby preventing them from going into American territory, and be more likely to keep them in our own country.

Mr. POPE (Compton). I do not think it is possible for us to give this information. No doubt the hon. gentleman is quite right in saying that emigration takes place during the summer season, but he does not need a return to show that.

Mr. BLAKE. If the records of immigration into Canada from foreign parts are correct, they ought to give us the number of immigrants arriving and when they arrived, and the number by each ship, so that I cannot see that there should be any difficulty in obtaining a monthly statement of foreign immigration. If the department is not managed on that principle, I should like to know how it is that we can find the number of those who come to the country at all?

Mr. POPE. I am sure that I cannot give anything like a correct monthly statement, but I can give a statement for the whole time. Those moving from this country to Manitoba do not come under the cognizance of the department.

Mr. BLAKE. I am a little alarmed at the statement that the hon gentleman has no means of telling how many people have gone into Manitoba from this country. We have, then, no means of knowing what the extent of immigration to Manitoba has been.

Mr. POPE. I mean that I have no means of knowing exactly the monthly immigration into Manitoba.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The better plan would be to allow the motion to carry, with the understanding that as full information as the department can furnish will be brought down.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAY LANDS.

Mr. GLEN moved for the statistics and other information on which were based the plans and prices adopted in 1879 for the sales of railway lands and pre-emptions, and now in force

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have no objection to the motion; but perhaps I may state that the reason why different belts and different prices were established was, that the Government naturally supposed that the land next the railway would be of more value than that further off.

Mr. BLAKE. I am delighted to hear an authoritative statement from the leader of the Government, so extremely opposed to the doctrine his followers have been propounding for the last few days, namely, that the outer belts were as valuable as the inner belts, and that 50,000,000 acres of land near the railway would be worth quite as little as fifty million acres further away. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman, but he does not agree with his followers in this particular.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am glad the hon. gentleman and I agree on something. It is quite obvious that the land near the railway is worth more than that more distant, and I think it will be found that hon. gentlemen who act with me, take, as I and the Government take, the average of the land both near and distant.

Mr. MILLS. It is not a fact, then, that distance lends enchantment to the view.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It may add to the enchantment; it does not add to the value,

Motion agreed to,

VANKLEEK HILL POST OFFICE.

Mr. ROUTHIER moved for: 1st, copies of all correspondence and documents in relation to the dismissal of Duncan McDonell, late Postmaster of Vankleek Hill, in the County of Prescott; 2nd, copies of all correspondence between the Postmaster General and one McLaurin, the present Postmaster of Vankleek Hill, respecting his appointment to the said office, the salary allowed him, and the management of the said post office generally; 3rd, copies of all instruction. given to the said McLaurin, in relation to the holding of the said post office of Vankleek Hill.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. BLAKE in moving for copies of all rders in Council. correspondence, reports, and papers touching the contracts for the two sections of 100 miles each of the Canadian Pacific Railway, west of Red River, and touching the cancellation of either of the said contracts, the execution of the work thereon, and the cost thereof, said: It is stated that the contracts for the two sections of 100 miles each, west of Red River, or one of these contracts, at any rate, has been cancelled, and that one or both are being carried out at the cost of the Government, by some arrangement by which the contractors have become overseers for the Government. I think it is well that we should have all the papers on the subject.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for a map showing the proposed railway grants, under the Canadian Pacific Railway contract on the Table, in so far as with the present information the same can be laid down, said: It will be remembered that, under the former system, the hon. leader of the Government brought down a map showing the alternate sections of the railway lands, and I suppose a similar map is being prepared in the department to indicate, approximately at any rate, where the railway lands will be taken from; at any rate, as far as they can be taken from the twenty-four mile belt. I think that would be a reasonable precaution, and it ought to be done now, if it has not been done.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. As the hon gentleman understands, the plan is this: There are six ranges of townships on each side; every alternate section in these townships is to be given to the Canadian Pacific Railway Syndicate to make up the 25,000,000 acres, inclusive of the Hudson's Bay sections and the school sections—there are four sections excluded from every township. It will probably be found that there are people who have settled upon some of these lands in advance of the surveys, and their rights must be protected. The hon, gentleman can make the calculation for himself of the quantity of land to be given in each township along the line of railway, less the unknown quantity of land that may be occupied by squatters. But I may state that, roughly calculated, the land along the direct route from the western boundary of Manitoba to Jasper House, at the foot of the Rocky Mountains, will amount to about 11,000,000 acres.

Mr. BLAKE. Is that after allowing for any waste lands or lakes?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think not, but I am not quite sure about that. I asked the Surveyor-General to state roughly the amount, and he stated about 11,000,000! acres. As regards the balance, the hon. gentleman will see by the contract that, in order to encourage the Pacific Railway Company to build as many branches as possible, we give them the alternate sections along the line of any branch railway they may build in order to make up the 25,000,000 ignorant, uninstructed, uncandid and unfair persons, outside acres. But if they do not build any branch lines the the House have compared the estimates made of those deficiency is to be made up with lands selected by agreement different kinds of work with one another, as if there was between the Company and the Government.

Mr. BLAKE. Of course I was aware of the mode in which any deficiency was to be made up, but it appeared to me that a map might be made showing where such railway lands lay as are to be found within the twenty-four mile belt. 1 was not aware that it was intended to exclude the lands in Manitoba from the operation of the railway grant; but, perhaps the hon, gentleman assumes that the amount within that Province will be so little that it is hardly worth men-

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. And, therefore, we may assume that the twenty-four mile belt will be substantially from the western boundary of Manitoba to the Jasper House Pass?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The information furnished was in answer to an enquiry I made in my department; but I would not like to be bound by it. The return will bring down more particulars which the hon gentleman

Mr. MILLS. Will the return show the lots actually occupied between the western boundary of Manitoba and Fort Ellice. There must be a large portion of land in that region taken up?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I suppose there is no very accurate information as to squatters, who are entering our country from all points of the boundary. They do not all come in at Emerson. It is impossible to say where they all are. Of course, the return will show honestly all the lands appropriated and sold, or under contract of sale, homesteaded, or otherwise disposed of.

Motions agreed to.

PACIFIC RAILWAY MODIFICATIONS.

Mr. BLAKE moved for an Order of the House for: -

(1.) A statement showing, in detail, the particulars of the various modifications and alterations made in location, design and otherwise, whereby the estimated cost of the section of the Pacific Railway between Kamloops and Yale was reduced in April, 1880, from the estimate in 1878, and a statement of the amount of such estimate of 1878; also a statement showing, in detail, the particulars of the further various modifications and alterations whereby the reduced estimates of April, 1880, was further reduced in April, 1880; also a memorandum of the quantities and prices allowed in respect of the several modifications and alterations referred to in each such statement, and particulars of the character of the projected line as it was designed to be constructed under each of the said three estimates, including information as to the grades and alignment in the forms given in the report of Mr. Cambie for 1878, and including a description of the character of the bridges, culverts, and other structures, and other works under each estimate, and all other particulars necessary in order to show what the line was to be like according to each of the three estimates. Kamloops and Yale was reduced in April, 1880, from the estimate in 1878, three estimates.

(2.) Similar statements as to the section between Yale and Port Moody.

(3.) Similar statements as to the section between Thunder Bay and Selkirk.

(4.) Similar statements as to the section between Selkirk and Jasper.

(5.) Similar statements as to the section between Jasper and Kamloops.

(6.) Profiles of the said several sections according to each of the said proposed systems of construction.

He said: It is very well known, with reference to the Canadian Pacific Railway, that various estimates have been made at different times by the Chief Engineer and other officers, of the cost of that work, and of the various sections of that work. These estimates varied naturally, irrespective of any question of a change in the character of the work, as further information was obtained by the engineers, and it became possible, more accurately, to set down a price for the cost of the work. But they have varied also in later years for another and quite intelligible reasonalterations in the character of the work projected. Some persons, of course not in this House, where we are all well informed, intelligent, all fair and candid men-but, some ignorant, uninstructed, uncandid and unfair persons, outside really no difference at all in the character of the work. It is convenient that we should ascertain specifically what the varying estimates of the engineers have been, and what the differences have been in the character of the work in respect of which they have estimated. Now, up to a comparatively recent period, with one exception, to which I shall allude in a moment, the work which we understood we were preparing to construct, was a high-class railway. As to the character of its structures, it was to be the same as the Intercolonial. As to its grades and alignment it was to be very superior to the average of all the railways on this be very superior to the average of all the railways on this continent throughout; and, as to that portion which extended from Lake Superior to Jasper House, it was to be very, very far in advance—with reference to east-bound traffic—of, I suppose, any road of the same length on the continent; I am satisfied I am right in saying very far in advance of any railway on the continent of that length, say 1,500 miles. That is the general style of the road. As to the character of the structures, the standard of the Intercolonial was adopted, and as to grades, alignment and curvature we were promised, even through the and curvature we were promised, even through the mountainous and wooded sections, the very highest class of railway, as also through the prairie region, and through that section, where the work must be done at more expense, from Red River to Lake Superior, where you reach our interior sea-board. Now, I purpose, in giving the reasons for this motion, to show to the House, partly by a reference to authentic documents, that I am justified in my course on this occasion. The most convenient mode of dealing with the earlier estimates and standards used in treating this subject is, perhaps, to take the report of the Chief Engineer for 1877, which summarizes the previous results, and then applies itself to the work of the year. I propose, first of all, to deal with what is called the British Columbia section which, in this report, begins at the Yellow Head Pass, and continues down to Fort Moody. The first practicable route tound, as appears from the Chief Engineer's report, so long ago as 1871, was that which has been ultimately adopted; and it is a remarkable proof of the great difficulties present to the minds of the engineers, and of the successive Governments which dealt with this matter that, having so early as 1871, found the most practicable route, which has been ultimately adopted, we should have been, almost ever since, trying to find some other route which would afford an access from the Rocky Mountains to the Pacific coast easier than that to which we have, at last, been obliged to resort. I am not, in the least degree, now proposing to question the wisdom of that choice, which may have been a good one; I am merely saying that we found the first practicable route in 1871, and that we have been trying to escape from it ever since, on account of difficulties of construction, but that we have ultimately been compelled to adopt it. Speaking of the operations of 1871, the Chief Engineer, Mr. Sandford Fleming, thus reported:

"It was further found that it was possible to reach the coast from Kamloops by the course and outlet of the Rivers Thompson and Fraser, the line terminating at an excellent harbor on Burrard Inlet. Thus, it was line terminating at an excellent harbor on Burrard Inlet. Thus, it was ascertained that a line was available for the railway, through the entire Rocky Mountain region, although portions would be enormously expensive. The report which I had the honor to submit, dated 10th April, 1872, pointed out generally the advantages of this line as compared with the railway extending eastward from San Francisco to New York. Those engineering features, which govern the cost of operating a railway and transporting goods, gave promise of being much more favorable on the Canadian route. The United States Pacific Railway attains an altitude above the sea, at four different points, fully double the height of the great continental summit on the Canadian line, and for 1,300 consecutive miles there is no altitude so low on the railway between San Francisco and New York, as the highest summit of the line through the Yellow Head Pass With respect to distances it was estimated that, from Burrard Inlet to Montreal would be 633 miles less than from San Francisco Yellow Head Pass With respect to distances it was estimated that, from Burrard Inlet to Montreal would be 633 miles less than from San Francisco to New York. It was, at the same time, estimated that the Canadian route would bring New York, Boston and Portland, from 300 to 500 miles nearer to the Pacific Coast at Burrard Inlet than these cities now are, with San Francisco as the terminal point of their line through the United States. The distance from England to China would be more than 1,000 miles less by the Canadian line than by the line passing through New York and San Francisco.

"The remarkable advantages of which the first year's survey (1872) gave promise, are not attainable without encountering obstacles which call for formidable works of construction. A line, in itself practicable, had indeed been discovered, but the information gained by the rapid and necessarily imperfect exploration also indicated that to carry a railway there were the correct of the present would be compared. necessarily imperfect exploration also indicated that to carry a railway through some of the gorges of the Rivers Thompson and Fraser would require an enormous outlay. The difficulties, in fact, appeared so great that a recommendation to adopt the route discovered, could not be justified until every effort had been exhausted to obtain a line sufficiently favorable at less cost. Accordingly, in 1872, the engineering staff was reorganized, and the work of survey and exploration was extended to embrace a wider area of operations."

The engineer then proceeds to detail the other operations that went on in that and subsequent years, with a view to find some easier route. Then I turn to the work of 1874, in which instrumental surveys were made of the section from the Fort Hope to Burrard Inlet. The report thus states on the subject:

"The instrumental survey made this year from Fort Hope to Burrard Inlet was so far satisfactory as to establish the fact that the line was perfectly feasible and the gradients favorable, although the bridging of the wide and deep river channels would be expensive. Three tunnels appear to be necessary, having a total length of 3,400 feet, but only at a few other points would the work of excavation be heavy. It was considered important to obtain exact data in order to form a reliable estimate of the difficulties to be encountered along the canyons of the lower rivers ered important to obtain exact data in order to form a reliable estimate of the difficulties to be encountered along the canyons of the lower rivers Fraser and Thompson. The engineering force available was insufficient to make a minute survey of all the very serious difficulties encountered, extending as they do successively, for seventy miles. It was deemed advisable, under the circumstances, to select an average section of the canyons for examination; accordingly, a trial location survey was made for a distance of fourteen miles up the Fraser from Yale. On this fourteen mile section the survey showed that tunnels of an aggregate length of 6,3%5 feet, together with formidable rock cuttings, would be required. Favorable undulating gradients could, however, be obtained."

So that with the view at the time to establish the average character of the work, an average canyon was taken, and it alone was explored. That I need hardly say was a very rough, although, perhaps, the best available mode of obtaining an estimate of what the real difficulties of the work were. But things got better by 1877, when a more detailed report was made. The engineer gives us then ten different possible lines, speaking of the probable cost of which, he says

"It would be undoubtedly desirable for the purpose of comparison to have reasonably correct estimates of the probable cost of each route, but this result is unattainable without regular location surveys."

He then proceeds to state the difficulties which exist:

"It is an exceedingly difficult matter, even with data sufficient to deduce the actual quantities of work, to form an estimate of cost at all reliable, owing in part to the uncertainty of the price of labor. It is impossible to say what wages it may be necessary to pay. The price of labor on the Pacific coast has, of late years, been much higher than on the Atlantic coast; and it is not possible to foretell what its range may be in future years. The value of labor enters so largely into the cost of a railway that any estimates of probable expense are conjectural, unless the price of that labor be established. It is, nevertheless, possible to form a comparative estimate by taking, as a standard, the prices which have obtained on other public works recently completed. The Intercolonial Railway will, in this respect, be taken as the standard, and the estimates will be based on the cost of labor during the construction of that work. A percentage may be added, as individual judgment may dictate, equivalent to any supposed advance of price which may affect the western section of the Pacific line." the actual quantities of work, to form an estimate of cost at all reliable,

The engineer goes on to say that basing his estimate on these figures, that is to say on the assumption that the cost of labor, etc., would be the same as on the Intercolonial, which, of course, taking that as a common measure, would afford a remarkably unsatisfactory mode of getting at the comparative cost, he estimates the route we were then adopting at $35,000,000. But he proceeds to say:

"These estimates are founded on the theory that the works are to be constructed equal in character to those on the Intercolonial Railway. The constructed equal in character to those on the Intercolonial Railway. The amount of expenditure, however, may, in the first place, be reduced by the introduction of timber trestle-work in the place of solid earth or rock embankments, and by the use of temporary structures in place of permanent and more costly ones. Various expedients could be resorted to to limit the first expenditure, generally, by the adoption of perishable works, to be replaced as they require restoration by more permanent works. By this means the first cost could be reduced, but with the prospect of ultimate increased expense. It is found difficult to determine the extent, in such case, to which temporary structures may be admitted, and it would be impossible to make a fair comparison of the several lines unless the estimates were based on precisely the same standard. Accordingly, it is considered advisable, as has already been stated, to take the ingly, it is considered advisable, as has already been stated, to take the standard of the Intercolonial Railway, where solid and permanent works generally prevail. The characteristics of a railway have much to do with its capacity for business, and the cost of maintaining and operating it. The route which will in the highest degree admit of low gradients, easy alignment, and permanently firm road bed, at the least annual outlay, is the one most capable of transporting cheaply. In this respect, there can scarcely be a doubt as to Route No. 2, terminating at Burrard Inlet, being the best."

That was the state of things in 1877. We had an average piece of canyon taken and a location survey made of it, and the cost of that fourteen miles was taken as the average cost of the seventy miles of that class of work of which it formed a part; but we had not materials, as the engineer says, of forming anything like an accurate judgment of the character of the work itself, nor had we any materials to ascertain what the cost would be, so far as it depended on the price of labor. With this imperfect information and taking the cost of labor on the Intercolonial as the standard, he estimates $35,000,000 as the cost from Yellow Head Pass to Burrard Inlet. But a very great step in advance was taken during the next year, when the report of Mr. Smith, acting Chief Engineer, shows what had been done to ascertain more particularly what the cost would be, as far as that could be ascertained, from the class of the work irrespective of the price of labor. The engineer, in stating on what his estimates of the cost of the British Columbia section, according to the various routes, were based, states:

"The estimates, as stated in the report, 'includes everything deemed necessary to complete the grading of the railway, with solid embankments, iron bridges, and, generally, with durable structures equal in point of character to those on the Intercolonial line.

"'Also the cost of ballasting, permanent way, rolling stock, stations, shops snow sheds and fences, indeed all the supplemental expenses indispensable to the construction and completion of a line similarly equipped and equal in efficiency and permanency to the Intercolonial Railway, and basing the calculations of cost on precisely the same data, the same value of material, and the same average value of skilled and unskilled labor, as obtained on that work.'

"There is great probability that these estimates will prove to be too low for the class of work referred to, as the price of labor of all kinds rules much higher on the Pacific slope than on the route of the Inter-colonial Railway. The cost, however, can be kept down by using stone and iron only for the larger structures, and culverts under high embankments. There is plenty of timber to be had alongside the line embankments. There is pleuty of timber to be had alongside the line for constructing and renewing the lighter structures when necessary. But, as the increase of cost, if any, would be proportionate on each route, these estimates were believed to present as fair a comparison of the several routes as could be arrived at with the data then obtained "These data, however, being imperfect, owing to the loss of plans and profiles of a portion of the route No. 5, in the fire of 1874, which destroyed the Engineers' Offices at Ottawa, it was deemed advisable to have a resurvey made, and during the past season seven parties have been engaged in that work. A very close location survey has been made, and every effort has been employed in the endeavor to reduce the cost of construction to a minimum. By the introduction of a large number of exceptionally sharp curves a considerable quantity of tunnelling and rock excavation has been avoided; further, the line has been carried at points so close to the rivers as to require protection works against floods, while the inclination of the slopes, instead of being 1½ to 1, as on the other routes, has been frequently increased to 1 to 1, in order to reduce the amount of excavation." the amount of excavation.

With this information, with this too low estimate of the cost of labor, the work was estimated by the Chief Engineer to cost, through the Yellow Head Pass by way of the Fraser and Thompson Rivers to Fort Moody, $36,500,000, if carried to English Bay it would be $37,100,000. This is Mr. Smith's estimate, made upon a survey location of the whole line. I gave the data upon which Mr. Fleming based his estimate, and they were obviously very imperfect, but now we have a close location survey, and pretty full information of the details upon which Mr. Smith bases his estimates. Upon page forty-nine of the report of the acting Chief Engineer, he says:

"The gradients on all the three routes may be considered favorable "I are gradients on an tac three routes may be considered lavoration for a mountainous country, the maximum being 1 per 100 or 52.80 feet per mile, with the exception of a portion of the Bute and Dean Inlet routes, in passing through the Cascade Mountains, where the gradients wary from 60 to 110 feet per mile, &c."

But I need not refer at greater tength to this portion of the report as those routes are not now in question. The appendix to which I referred contains the report of Mr. Cambie the Engineer in charge of the surveys in British Columbia. He points out that in the case of this particular route, which is designated No. 2, it will be necessary to add the cost of continuing the line to Coal Harbor in Burrard Inlet, a distance of twelve miles, say $600,000, or to English Bay, fifteen miles, at a cost of $900,000. The reasons given are that Fort Moody, though a good harbor for its size, is very small, and wholly inadequate for the trans-continental traffic, and, therefore, for the purposes of a through line to carry across the continent the commerce of the east, we must add according as we take the twelve miles or the fifteen miles additional, the sum of $690,000 or $900,000 to the cost. The present plan, however, only contemplates the construction of the line to Fort Moody, as a terminal point. So that we may adhere to the estimate of $36,500,000, which I have already given. Then, Sir, as to the grades which were resorted to in order to get the estimate down to $36,500,000. There were on the route which we have now in question, a considerable number of low class grades, to which I will not refer at length; but I may say that upon the grades rising east from '70 to '80 there are 33'20 miles, or 6'74 per cent, of the whole; between 80 and 1.00 there are 66.06 miles, or 13 42 per cent., which is the highest grade upon the route. Rising west there are between 60 and 70, 11 miles; between '70 and '80, 8.55 miles; between '80 and 1.00, 27.74 miles. The lengths of the curvatures were found very considerable, the total percentage of curvature being 42·10 upon the whole distance of 493 miles, but that is not all or the chief part. Taking 4° curves as a minimum, we find that of curves over 4° and under 5° there were 36 75 miles, over 5° and under 6° 3·11 miles; over 6° and under 7°, 1·25 miles; over 7° and under 8°, ·16 of a mile, giving curves as sharp as 716 feet upon the system of construction proposed so long ago as 1878, producing the estimates as to cost, which I have referred upon a basis as to labor to which I have also referred. Then Sir, we reach the next report—the special report of Mr. Fleming, with reference to the proposed contracts for the central section—the Yale-Kamloops section. In this report which is dated 22nd November 1879, and is based upon the probable cost of the road under the tenders that were submitted to the department and ultimately sanctioned by the House, he says:

"Those who made the surveys and calculations, inform me that the quantities are very full, and that in actual execution they can be largely

That is a perfectly legitimate subject of reduction without altering the character of the work. He goes on:

"I am convinced, moreover, that by making an extremely careful study of final location, by sharpening the curvature in some places, by generally adjusting the alignment to the sinuosities, and sudden and great inequality of the ground, by substituting the cheaper classes of work for the more costly, whenever it can be done, and by doing no work whatever that is not absolutely necessary, a very marked reduction can be made."

I read this because it gives us, as I say, two modes upon which a further saving beyond that which the engineer contemplated: first, "that the quantities are very full," and, secondly, by a modification of design which, altering so seriously the character of the work, would alter very seriously the cost to the country of the work. This is to be done by "sharpening the curvature," "by using great judgment in adjusting the alignment to the sinuosities and sudden and great inequalities of ground," "by substituting the cheaper classes of work for the more costly" and by "doing no work whatever that is not absolutely necessary." On the 22nd of November, 1879, these were the suggestions of the Chief Engineer to the hon. Minister, accompanying his report, recommending the letting of those contracts. That is the last stage of the year 1879, and now we come to the first stage of the year 1880. I will next take up the Engineer's General Report of April 1880. After stating his views as to cheap transportation and the importance of low grades and good curves, he says:

"Low gradients are not considered of equal importance on other sections of the line. It is not proposed to adhere to the principles in British Columbia. The grades and curves will be then determined by the physical obstructions which present themselves. The limitation observed will take a much wider range, in order to avoid expenditure, and it is proposed, as far as practicable, to lighten the work by accommodating the alignment and gradients, as far as this can be done, to the features of the ground."

He is invited by the Minister on the 15th of April to give estimates for the construction of the Pacific Railway. The letter of the hon. Minister states:

"The Pacific Railway debate will begin this afternoon, and I must ask you to furnish me with an estimate of cost. In doing this, take the following data: the four contracts recently let in British Columbia, making full allowances for the reductions to be made and referred to in your report on those contracts."

So that the Chief Engineer was called upon to take the four contracts let and also to make allowances for the reductions referred to in the report on the contracts of the 22nd November, which I have read. The reductions were to be made first of all by calculating upon an excess of quantities, and, secondly, by further degrading the character of the work in the various particulars mentioned in that report. Then the Minister goes on to say:

"With regard to the location and the character of the railway, I am aware that your own preference has been for a line with light, easy gradients. The Government recognizes the advantage of this feature between Lake Superior and Manitoba, but west of Red River we attach less importance to it than the rapid settlement of the country, and the immediate accommodation of settlers. The policy of the Government is to construct a cheap railway, following, or rather, in advance of settlement, with any workable gradients that can be had, incurring no expenditure beyond that absolutely necessary to effect the rapid colonization of the country."

The Chief Engineer answers this, so far as British Columbia is concerned:

"I understand the policy of the Government, with respect to the railway to be: to proceed with the construction of 125 miles in British Columbia, under the 60th, 61st, 62nd, and 63rd contracts. The expenditure on the 125 miles to be limited in accordance with the provisions of the contract, and the views set forth in my report of the 22nd of November last."

The engineer refers to this report in a foot note, to the effect that further reductions could be made by further reducing the character of the work. The engineer proceeds in his letter to estimate that, from Jasper to Port Moody, the road would cost with light equipment $29,000,000, to which he added one million, making altogether $30,000,000. Then he is asked to make a further estimate, particularly directed to the Nipissing line, and also to estimate the whole cost, and he writes a further letter on the 16th of April, in which he says:

He proceeds to state what his total estimate would be. Now we had reached, then, for the whole line from Jasper House to Port Moody, in April, 1880, a reduced estimate of $30,000,000 upon the altered policy of the Government—a policy to make the railway as cheap as it could be made the road to be adjusted as nearly as its being workable at all would allow, to the sinuosities of the ground, the grades to be as steep, the curvatures to be as sharp, and the works to be as cheap as they could be, and making these possible reductions, according to the view of the Chief Engineer in April, 1880, the whole line between those points could be made for a sum of $30,000,000. The estimates which have been brought down as of December, 1880, a few short months later, was a very large further reduction on two portions of that part of the line to which my remarks have been addressed. From Kamloops to Yale, there is a further reduc- of $6,120,000. Then the totals from Yellow Head Pass to Mr. BLAKE.

tion—I do not put in the reduction on rolling stock at all —but a reduction by modification of design made in the location from Kamloops to Yale of \$1,663,200. The Chief Engineer's estimate was \$10,000,000, and if you apply to-day to that section a proportion of the \$1,000,000 which is given moreover to British Columbia, you get some. where about one-third of a million more, say ten and onethird million that the Chief Engineer had estimated on the lowest scale. But there is yet a lower deep, and the hon. Minister found it in December when he took off from the lowest possible estimate of April, that is ten and one-third million, no less than one and two-thirds million. Then from Yale to Port Moody, which had been estimated in all at about \$3,620,000 that estimate is reduced by \$133,700 by modification of design and improvement of location. I leave out, as I said, the reduction in respect to rolling stock. I have endeavored to ascertain what the general effect upon the section estimated for in 1877 and 1878, by Mr. Fleming and Mr. Smith, respectively, that is to say, from the Yellow Head Pass to Port Moody, would be, applying to these sections upon which they do not give us special information the reductions which are given on the sections about which we are informed. The distance from Yellow Head to Port Moody is 493 miles. The engineer's report for April, 1880, estimates, at the reduced rates from Jasper to Kamloops, \$15.500,000; add the proportion of the million dollars, \$540,000, which gives you a total cost, by that estimate, from Jasper to Kamloops, of \$16,040,000. The distance from Jasper to Yellow Head Pass is 57 miles. Allowing the same proportionate cost for that mileage as for the mileage from Jasper to Kamloops you get \$2,736,000, leaving the estimate of April, 1880, from Yellow Head to Kamloops at \$13,260,000. You get, then, from the report of April, 1880, the following: --- Estimated cost from Kamloops to Yale, \$10,340,000; estimated cost from Yale to Port Moody, \$3,620,000; making together \$13,960,000, to which add the estimated cost from Yellow Head to Kamloops, \$13,260,000, and you get a total cost, from Yellow Head to Moody, by the estimate of April 1880, of \$27,220,000, while the estimate of 1878 for the same distance from Yellow Head to Moody was \$36,500,000, showing a difference of no less than \$9,280,000, or a saving of 25½ per cent. And it is to be remembered that the estimate of 1878 was based upon the Intercolonial prices of labor, admittedly too low, while the estimate of 1880 is based upon what the engineer believed would be the cost of labor in British Columbia itself, conducting the work slowly, so as not to raise the price of the labor by increasing the demand beyond any reasonable supply. Assuming that the saving was proportionate over the whole line from Yellow Head to Moody, the cost, by the estimate of April, 1880, of the Government section from Kamloops to Moody, would be  $\frac{41}{80}$ ths of the whole.  $\frac{41}{80}$ ths of the estimate of 1878 would be \$18,700,000, which was reduced in April, 1880, to \$13,960,000, or a reduction of \$4,740,000. That reduced amount was further reduced in December, 1880, to \$12,160,000, a further reduction of \$1,800,000, making a total reduction between 1878 and December, 1880, in the Government part of the work, of not less than \$6,540,000 on the total estimate of \$18,700,000. or thirty-five percent., making no allowance in either case for rolling stock. And even if you look at the last estimate alone, you will see a handsome reduction of within a fraction of fourteen per cent. The Syndicate's part, which is from the Yellow Head Pass to Kamloops, would be \$80 hs of the whole cost from Yellow Head to Moody. That would give you, according to the estimate of 1878, \$17,810,000; the estimate of 1880 is \$13,2c0,000, a reduction of \$4,530,000. Assuming a further proportionate saving by the estimate of December, 1880, you will get \$1,590,000 more saved, making the cost only \$11,690,000, or a total reduction in the Syndicate's section

Moody would show thus: Estimate of 1878, $36,500,000; estimate of April, 1880, $27,220,000; saving of $9,280,000; estimate of December, 1880, $23,850,000; total saving between 1878 and December, 1880, $12,660,000, on the estimated cost of $36,500,000 or thirty-five per cent. Or, if you choose to look backwards and compare the present with the past, instead of the past with the present, you find that the cost, as now proposed, would be increased by 54 per cent., or more than half as much again by reverting to the former estimates. Now, I am not at all objecting to any one of these estimates. I am simply pointing out the differences between them, in order that we may ascertain what are the main causes of these differences. As I have another part of the subject to deal with, and it is now six o'clock, we had better let it stand over.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. GAULT moved the second reading of Bill (No. 7) entitled "An Act to incorporate the Wrecking and Salvage Company of Canada."

WRECKING AND TOWING IN INLAND WATERS.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Bunting, for an Address for correspondence between Sir Edward Thornton, British Ambassador at Washington, and the Secretary of State for the United States, relative to Wrecking and Towing in Inland Waters.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex). Public attention has for some time been directed to this question respecting wrecking and towing in the inland waters of the Dominion, in consequence of diplomatic correspondence between the Secretary of State of the United States and the British Ambassador at Washington, which has been published in the American and Canadian newspapers. Mr. Secretary Evarts, of the United States, in a rather offensive lette, casts reflections upon the conduct of certain Canadian officials and the owners of Canadian wrecking tugs, basing his letter on information furnished him from time to time by the United States Consuls, stationed at Sarnia and other points on our inland waters. I find in the report of the Consuls of the United States, a communication from the Consul stationed at Sarnia, in which he reflects very severely on the capacity of the Canadian tugs engaged on our inland waters, including Lakes Erie and Huron, and also on the regulations of the Customs Department, in this connection. This Consul, Mr. Pace, thus writes:

"Some changes have been made in Canadian wrecking regulations within the past year, and these changes modify, to some extent, the more rigorous rules of former years, but the reformation is by no means complete. Under former regulations an American tug was not permitted, under any circumstances, to engage in the rescue of any wrecked vessel or property in Canadian waters. This rule has been so modified that now an American steamer may obtain permission to render assistance to a vessel wrecked in Canadian waters, provided it may appear to the Canadian customs officer that the wrecked vessel in question is in immediate danger of total destruction, and provided further that there is no Canadian steam-tug conveniently at hand to render the desired services. But while the Canadian officer is investigating the condition of the wrecked vessel in order to determine whether the vessel is in danger of becoming a total wreck, the elements, regardless of his opinion, carry on the work of demolition.

"Having the right to navigate the waters of Canada in the ordinary pursuit of commerce, our seamen cannot understand why they should be restricted from asking and obtaining aid from any source when disaster overtakes them. Much feeling is sometimes manifested by our captains who are denied the privilege of obtaining the services of American wrecking tugs in times of trouble, and who are obliged to accept instead old and inferior vessels known as Canadian wreckers.

"My advice is frequently sought by American vessel masters as to the proper course to pursue under circumstances of the nature here described, under any circumstances, to engage in the rescue of any wrecked vessel or property in Canadian waters. This rule has been so modified that now and in some instances I have found it difficult to restrain the more impetuous from forcibly resisting these unfriendly regulations relating to wrecks and wrecked property in Canadian waters. In a former communication to the department upon this subject I called attention to the inferior and comparatively unseaworthy condition of Canadian wrecking tugs as compared with our own wreckers, and I now assert (not entirely as a novice, for I have had practical experience as a sailor) that, with but barely one exception, there is not upon the whole chain of lakes a wrecking tug of Canadian register worthy of the name. I am familiar with all the boats which figure on paper as the Canadian wrecking fleet, and the tug McArthur is the only vessel belonging to that fleet which may justly claim exemption from the charge of being herself a wreck. Should this wrecking fleet be arraigned in order for review, the practical eye of the American sailor would detect something fully as ridiculous as that shown in the play where Falstaff musters his recruits.

"It may be proper to state that the entire wrecking fleet of Canada is and in some instances I have found it difficult to restrain the more

"It may be proper to state that the entire wrecking fleet of Canada is owned or controlled by a company known as the "Canadian Wrecking Company;" this company has, therefore, a monopoly of the wrecking business in these waters In the interests of justice I sincerely hope to see a further modification of wrecking regulations which enrich a company at the expense of our lake marine."

I had read the letter of Mr. Evarts to Sir Edward Thornton before my attention was drawn to this report. and while I then thought it most offensive on his part, my opinion has been modified on reading that report. We must shift the blame from the shoulders of the United States Secretary of State to the shoulders of his subordinates. It appears this Consul at Sarnia has stolen a moment from his arduous duties, in enumerating the 99,000 Canadian emigrants who cross annually at that point to the Republic, to compose that offensive report. I will briefly allude here to some points in his statement, in order to refute them from my personal knowledge. Living as I do at the Detroit River, and personally acquainted with the nature of those tugs, and with their efficiency, I think this is a subject on which I can speak with confidence as to the facts in dispute. Mr. Pace says:

"Under former regulations an American tug was not permitted, under any circumstances, to engage in the rescue of any wrecked vessel or property in Canadian waters."

There never was a period in the history of Canada of which that statement holds good. There never was a time when American vessels were not permitted to assist their own or (anadian vessels when wrecked. "The rule has been modified now," he goes on to say, so that a United States steamer may assist a United States wreck. The rule that obtained for some years was the Order in Council, passed by the Mackenzie Administration, when the member for St. John county (Mr. Burpee) was Minister of Customs. That Order in Council was entirely satisfactory to the Canadian wrecking interest, to the rules of the wrecking clubs and the Canadian Inland Revenue, and if it has been seriously modified I considered a blow has been struck, not only at the wrecking interest, but at our whole merchant marine. When we had not a wrecking fleet of our own, the prices charged by Amerialmost better for a vessel owner to give the vessel to the wrecking tug altogether. By their numerous fleet, the Americans are trying to drive the Canadian vessels out of the field altogether, and should they succeed in this design they will recruit themselves by a recurrence to former high charges. Every facility is at present afforded to American tugs to assist Canadian vessels in distress when no Canadian tugs are at hand. I have frequently applied for favors and concessions to American tug owners during the last two years, when our own tugs were not available, and have always met with a hearty response from the Minister of Customs. From whatever source the statements may come, it is literally untrue that any obstructions have been cast in the way of employing American tugs when Canadian tugs, equally well fitted for the work, were not available. It is, of course, only natural, that our American cousins should manifest a good deal of feeling at being denied the privilege of using their own tugs in our waters to rescue their own vessels, but it is also only natural that our tug owners should desire the protection of the Government with regard to their interest; and I do trust, when these papers are brought down, it will be found that the present Administration will carry out the policy which the Mackenzie Administration adopted, and which was so entirely satisfactory, being, as it was, just and humane to both nationalities, and fairly protective to this important Canadian industry. This gentleman, Mr. Pace, stated that there is not a boat in the whole chain of lakes, belonging to the Canadian service, worthy of the name. I would ask that particular enquiry be made and information obtained as to whether that statement is true. We ought not to allow statements of that kind to go unchallenged. We ought to have information from the officials as to the condition of the wrecking tugs used on our inland waters, which have come under the sweeping censure of Mr. Pace. I am informed there are wrecking tugs at Collingwood fully equal to all requirements; also that the wrecking fleet at Port Colborne is quite equal to the lake fleet at Buffalo, and to my personal knowledge the wrecking fleet which is employed mainly on the Detroit River, between Lakes Huron and Erie, are very efficient vessels. Among others we have the McArthur, the Erie Belle, the Minnehaha, the Paul Hackett, and many others, plying on the Detroit River and neighboring lakes. We have also the infamous wrecking company which has especially called down the wrath of Mr. Pace, whose boats are of first-class capacity, containing all the modern appliances, and are always kept with their fires ready, so that they can have steam up in one hour, and be on Lake St. Claire, or at Amherstburg, or at the mouth of the river within two hours of the receipt of a telegram from Windsor. They are kept there the whole season, and, considering the enormous expense which a fleet of this kind costs, in the way of appliances, steam pumps, &c., it would be most outrageous to allow American vessels to compete with Canadian tugs in Canadian waters, unless some measure of reciprocity were granted. There are instances to my knowledge, I regret to say, in which collectors of customs have granted facilities to American tugs where Canadian tugs were available. I do not think the late Minister of Custom contemplated, when he issued those instructions to collectors of customs, that such advantage would be taken of them, and I am sure the present Minister does not approve of this being done. It is within my knowledge that some American vessels, which were stranded near Amherstburg, waited two days to receive the assistance of an American tug which was owned by the agents of the vessel, when Canadian tugs were lying at Amherstburg ready to undertake the work. What real grounds of complaint the Americans have I do not know. All the concessions and favors have been granted to American tug owners, while I am not aware of any instance in which a concession of any kind has been granted to a Canadian vessel or tug. I know of instances of Canadians having been fined for aiding Canadian vessels in American waters. If any grievance exists upon this question, I think it was on the side of the Canadians rather than the Americans, who are in the habit of indulging in some bluster and misrepresentation upon this subject, as upon some others, for the purpose of getting some advantages which they might not otherwise obtain. When they talk about reciprocity in wreckage, they talk about something which is unreasonable and absurd. The character of the coasts of our inland waters is such that accidents to vessels mostly happen upon Canadian waters and the Americans wish to have a reciprocity which would give them all and give us nothing in return. If there is to be a reciprocity at all let it be a real reciprocity not only in wrecking, but in towing in American or Canadian waters; let us have also a reciprocity with regard to Customs regulations, so that the heavy tonnage dues which they now charge upon vessels engaged on the inland marine should be more fairly balanced. Mr. PATTERSON (Essex).

Present time the American Customs authorities charge Canadian vessels more than double the dues for entrances and clearances than they charge vessels sailing under their own flag. When they are ready to meet us half way in regard to these matters, I am quite sure that our inland marine will be happy to consent to a reciprocity in wrecking regulations also. But it would be wrong for our Government to agree to a reciprocity which would drive out of the wrecking industry a number of tugs, which have been constructed at great expense and fitted up with every suitable appliance for the efficient conduct of the business in which they are engaged. The Secretary of State for the United States has, I regret to say, been grossly deceived by his subordinates with regard to this matter. I know of my own knowledge that the report which Mr. Pace has made with regard to that section of our inland marine of which he writes is absolutely and literally untrue. I should think it would be advisable that the Minister of Customs should cause an authoritative enquiry to be made, and if it be found that the Americans have any real ground of complaint, the matter might be laid before the United States Government, and the way thereby paved to the establishment of a real reciprocity between the two countries, with regard to the matters to which I have adverted. My attention has been called to an article in the Hamilton Spectator of recent date, in which it is stated that a new wrecking company is to be formed, with a capital of $500,000, to carry on operations, not only in the upper lakes and rivers, but in Lake Ontario and the St. Lawrence. Whether this is the company for which my hon. friend from Montreal West (Mr. Gault) is seeking incorporation I cannot say. I wish again to assure the Government and the House that the report of Mr. Pace is a gross caricature, more worthy of Mark Twain, in his graver moments, than of a United States Consul sending to his Government a grave official document. Our fleet is thoroughly efficient, and quite capable of discharging its duties, as anybody who has read the shipping news during the late disasters, can amply testify. The company which seems to fall especially under the disapproval of Mr. Pace, is only a small part of our wrecking fleet in those waters; but though only a small part its vessels are very efficient; the boats I mentioned, and especially the Prince Alfred, are the best wrecking tugs on our lakes, either Canadian or American; they are kept up at an enormous expense; they are always ready in fair or foul weather, on an hour's notice to start to any point on the Canadian lakes or rivers at which their services may be The business has been very satisfactorily conducted for the past few years, and the desire on the part of the American tug ring to get hold of the business, may have induced them to make representations to Mr. Pace which have led him to make such a report as he has made to his Government. Mr. Evarts refers to the Act which was passed by the American Congress in 1878. It is an Act to aid vessels wrecked or disabled in the waters coterminous to the United States and the Dominion of Canada, and the preamble reads as follows:-

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, that Canadian vessels of all descriptions may render aid or assistance to Canadian or other vessels wrecked or disabled in the waters of the United States, contiguous to the Dominion of Canada: provided that this Act shall not take affect until proclamation by the President, declaring that the privilege of aiding American or other vessels wrecked or disabled in Canadian waters contiguous to the United States, has been extended by the Government of the Dominion of Canada and declaring this Act to be in force. And provided, further, that this Act shall cease to be in force from and after the date of proclamation by the President, to the effect that said reciprocal privilege has been withdrawn or revoked by the said Government of the Dominion of Canada."

s which Mr. Evarts goes on to refer to the efforts which, as he says, have been made by the United States to obtain reciprocity At the in this matter. I trust that the hon, the Minister of Customs will cause the enquiry to be made which I have asked for. This is a matter, perhaps, which does not affect many members in this House, but it affects materially many of my constituents, and it is a matter which deserves the consideration of the Government. If the Government have been led away by misrepresentations in granting the concessions which the Mackenzie Administration declined to grant, I hope those concessions will be withdrawn. As matters stood under the late Minister of Customs, everything that could be desired for the protection of life and property was granted, and it would be very unsatisfactory to those interested and to the Canadian marine to have any further concessions or indulgences granted to United States' wrecking vessels in Canadian waters, without something being granted to our vessel owners beyond the mere privilege of being allowed to rescue wrecks in our own waters. Mr. PLUMB. The question that has been brought forward by the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Patterson) is entitled to the serious consideration of the House. My hon, friend has truly stated that the question does not interest directly a large portion of the members of this House, but he has also stated truly that it interests directly the whole Canadian commerce. It is a very great question, in which the respective rights of the Provinces and of the United States are directly interested, and it is one, of course, which we can approach without prejudice to the question which may arise between the two Governments, and we can state the position in which we are, and ask for the judgment of the House and the opinion of the Government on the subject. It is well known that, whether by the authority of the American Government or not, the most extraordinary regulations have been made to protect the American wrecking vessels on the one side, and to exclude our wrecking vessels on the other. I know a case where a vessel in extreme peril was rescued by a Canadian tug, and that tug was seized, I think, in the Detroit River and subjected to a heavy fine for doing what was an act of mercy, and for which she should have been rewarded, rather than muleted. It is, of course, obvious that it is impossible for any wrecking arrangements to be made, which shall have vessels at all points where wrecks may possibly happen, that can rescue property, and the only possible service which these people can perform, is the salvage of property, not the saving of life. It is well known that during the great stress of weather, under which wrecks occur, it is almost impossible to bring any vessel, no matter how well manned to the immediate succor of the vessel in distress. An efficient company, with good appliances, on this side of the border, should have every possible encouragement, and I believe it is intended that, before this Session is concluded, a Bill shall be introduced to charter companies of that kind. I have no doubt that the service can be made perfectly efficient, provided the incorporators have the protection of the Government, which, I think, they have a right to expect, for I think they have a preferential right within the jurisdiction of Canada to perform their services upon the lakes over which Canada has control. This last season has been especially prolific in accidents, showing that an efficient service of that kind is required. do not think in the history of the commerce of the lakes there has been such extensive disasters accompanied by such a loss of life and property, as have occurred within the last two or the months upon Lakes Erie and Ontario. All these disasters warn us that there should be a system adopted which would encourage Canadians with the necessary capital to combine for carrying on a very meritorious and important service connected with their inland commerce. I think the House is under the greatest obligation to the hon. member for Essex for bringing this matter before us. I trust a discussion on this subject will take place, and that those gentlemen who are practically acquainted with the subject, to the Canadians, the other prohibited towing in the waters those whose residence on the great inland waters have led of the United States; so that, taking the two together, they

them to investigate the subject, will follow up this discussion, so that we may be enabled to know the difficulties which have heretofore attended the formation of a Canadian company, and be able to judge of the pressing importance of the case which has been presented by the hon. member for Essex. Residing, as I do, upon the borders of one of the great lakes; knowing, as I do, the constant necessity for a wrecking organization; knowing, as I do, that as long as we are hampered in the way we are, and as long as it is claimed that the necessity in regard to matters of this kind is like that jug-handled reciprocity of which we used to hear in days gone by-all on one side-just so long we shall be prevented from doing what we ought to do in the way of organizing compunies to perform this kind of service. The interference of wreckers from the other side is altogether accidental; they are not bound to come; they come when it is their interest to come, and they stay away when they can employ themselves better otherwise. I trust that these associations - there are one or two very good ones, I believe, on Lake Erie-will be encouraged to continue their work, to enlarge their capital, and to do the kind of service efficiently for which they were created; and I commend to the careful attention of the House the remarks which were made by my hon, friend from Essex (Mr. Patterson), and I think that as this discussion proceeds, it will be found that he had the strongest grounds for presenting this motion to the House, and that it will meet with that careful attention, which any practical subject is sure to receive from the practical representatives of the people assembled here to-night.

House. Since the late Government issued instructions to guide the Customs'-house officers on the inland waters of this Dominion, the American newspapers have published articles in the attempt, by bluster, to induce the Government to give way on this question. They tell us that the Canadian vessels are not fit to do the work; but they do not particularize. If they cannot mention any case in which life or property has been lost in the inland waters of this Dominion, through the inability of Canadian tug owners to perform the work they undertake to do, I think it is high time they should stop this cry. They also raised the cry that men were saving life in American waters. I know of no law, Canadian or otherwise, that punishes a man for saving life or for saving a vessel, in distress. But there is a law, and they have enforced it in the United States, prohibiting foreign or Canadian vessels from saving wrecked vessels on American shores: and for years the Americans had the whole inland waters of this country as a preserve for themselves. The Canadian Government allowed them to do the work for years, while Americans would not allow Canadians to do the same in their waters. To say that to allow Canadians to go into their waters is an equivalent, is absurd, because ninety out of every hundred wrecks occur in Canadian waters. If they are in earnest, let them throw open the coasting trade of the United States, but if not, let them give our tugs the privilege to tow from one port to another. If they do that, the Canadians are able to take care of themselves; and if they will not, I ask the Government to protect the Canadians. The Customs officers of this country are too lenient in this matter, and it is high time they should be looked after. Why, Mr. Evarts in Congress said, that the highest official of the Canadian Government was controlled by a Canadian wrecking ring. Very complimentary to the high officials of the Canadian It is said the American Government ct of Congress on this question. I Government! passed an Act would ask hon, gentlemen to scan that Act closely. If my memory serves me, there were two Acts

had this effect: that if an American vessel was wrecked in United States waters, a Canadian tug had not the privilege to tow it to an American port. This looked like a little sharp practice. I know this question is giving the Customs Department a good deal of trouble and annoyance. But the Americans ask for privileges from this Government on a misrepresentation of the facts. The difficulties are owing to the action, not of the Minister of Customs, but of some of his officials, and I ask him now to look into the matter. I ask him to see that the law relating to wrecking is carried out the same as any other law. Reference has been made to the desirability of having a life-saving service in connection with this service. In justice to the Americans I would say that the life-saving service of the United States is of great benefit both to Canadians and Americans, and if this Government could bear the expense of a life-saving station I should be glad to see it established. Something has been said about the boats. I assert that the Prince Alfred is the only boat in the fresh waters of this country kept for wrecking alone. While I have a vote in this House I shall protest against giving the Americans any concessions until they give us a quid pro quo. On a former occasion, the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) brought up a complaint in reference to a case where one of the boats went out to save life and property; but when the return came down it appeared that the Canadians had saved life at the risk of their own lives, while the Americans came in and made money. I trust our Government will consider this matter, and see that their officers carry out the law in this respect, and the instructions of the department, so that there may be no more extension of privileges to American tugs to enable them to do the work that should be done by Canadians, so long as life and property are not in danger. Of course, if there is any danger of life, or danger of the immediate destruction of property, by all means let the Canadian Government give the Americans every privilege to save it. But where there is no such danger, and our vessels are ashore, as wrecks, by all means give the employment in this connection to Canadians and Canadian tug owners. Money which should reach this country should not be allowed to pass into the hands of Americans, as in years gone by.

Mr. DAWSON. Without entering into the merits of this question, I may say that a great deal of life and property on the lakes might be saved by a system of proper inspection of vessels, to ascertain if they were seaworthy. If report be true, some vessels lost in Lake Ontario this season, with all the lives on board, went down on account of their unseaworthiness. Along the lakes there are many unseaworthy vessels that have been left lying a long time in the harbors, but whose owners will use them as long as they can be kept afloat; and in storms they go down. So from this cause we may expect an increased loss of life from year to year. We have had very few wrecks on the north coasts of Lakes Huron and Superior; because we have not only got good vessels, but the coasts are particularly well sheltered on the Canada side. But we had two vessels lost on those waters last year, the Zealand in Lake Ontario, and the Simcoe in the middle of Lake Huron. In one case there was a great Whether the vessels were seaworthy or not, I cannot say; but it is reported that at this moment there are a great many unseaworthy vessels on our inland waters, and it is highly desirable there should be some system of inspection adopted. Believing that the object of this motion is very good, I shall have great pleasure in supporting it.

Mr. McCUAIG. The subject of the preservation of life and property in the case of wrecks is of great importance. I agree with my hon. friend from Algoma (Mr. Dawson) as to the value of a system of inspection. In November last, I noticed in the newspapers of the country the statement that a very large amount of property had been lost on the lakes, in I charges than Americans. Mr. McCallum.

consequence of there being no tugs to render assistance to vessels on account of the operation of the Canadian law. I then took occasion to address the Buffalo Board of Trade on the subject. I believe those bodies in most of the western American cities are composed of respectable men, many of them interested in preserving shipping property. I think all that we require is for our Government to communicate with the American Government, when I have no doubt some reciprocal arrangement could be made, beneficial to both countries. In reply to my application to the Board of Trade, the Secretary wrote on the 7th December, as follows:—

"BUFFALO BOARD OF TRADE,
"BUFFALO, N.Y., December 7th, 1880. " J. S. McCuoig, Esq., M.P., " Picton, Ont., Canada.

"Dear Sir,—Your letter of November 22nd received and contents noted-Upon inquiry of the Insurance agents and parties interested in the schooner Kingfisher I find that there was no foundation for the paragraph that appeared in the Buffalo Courier, as far as "the wrecking law" was brought into question. No tugs of any kind could have rescued the vessel and the insurance agents so stated.

"As far as I can learn, the complaints of Americans are, that vessel owners state that the Canada Towing and Wrecking Company have not sufficient help—they own one tug called the Prince Asfred drawing 11 feet water with one steam-pump on board, and one tug Jessie drawing 8 or 9 feet water; these boats are generally located at Windsor, Ont., opposite Detroit, Mich.; this company has also one extra steam-pump kept ashore at some point for use when called upon.

"There is a tug called the McAnthur which belongs to other Canadian

"There is a tug called the McArthur which belongs to other Canadian parties, with a pump on board I think, and the location of said tug I know not.

"These are all the Canadian appliances for wrecking purposes from the foot of Lake Erie to the head of Lake Superior, near Duluth. Nearly 1000 miles of coast, four lakes and the rivers.

"You can readily see that these tugs are totally insufficient for the purposes required. If a vessel goes on shore at a convenient spot well, if not what is to become of it?

purposes required. In a voscit point of the lakes, &c., are large harbors with many tugs and appliances at each port, enough to establish a patrol system, with the most powerful contrivances for succoring vessels, &c. Take Buffalo for instance, look at her fleet of tugs of immense power, all of which could be used for wrecking purposes.

"On the Canada side at Port Colborne there are three or four small tugs which could be used for wrecking if called upon at this end of Lake Erie.

which could be used for wrecking if called upon at this end of Lake Erie. but they are generally engaged in towing vessels to and from the Welland Canal.

"Perhaps these few notes may assist you in making up a case in favor of some changes in the law of wrecking, of insisting that the Canadian Towing and Wrecking Company should have extended facilities. Shall be pleased to hear from you and give any assistance in my power.

"WILLIAM THURSTONE, "Secretary."

If the statements of this letter be true, and I have no reason to doubt them, it must be evident to every hon. member that we have not sufficient tugs or proper arrangements for the preservation of life and property for a coast line extending over so many miles. I have, myself, at Lake Ontario, witnessed the loss of several lives in its waters while 150 to 200 men stood on the shore. Why? Because we had no proper assistance. I contend that no laws of two countries lying side by side should in any way interfere with the enterprise of men prepared to jeopardise their own lives for the preservation of others, or with the demands of humanity. Judging from this letter from the Buffalo Board of Trade. I am satisfied that with the American and Canadian tugs united, they would be insufficient to save the life and property lost on the lakes in those severe storms. I hope whatever legislation may take place, that it will be in that direction. By proper arrangement, a great deal of property, and a great many lives might be saved at a cheaper rate than at present. I have had considerable experience with Canadian tug-boat companies, and have yet to learn they are very much more moderate in their charges than our American friends. With the exception of Mr. Donnelly, of Kingston, who has rendered very great assistance at moderate charges, who is a man of wonderful skill in this respect, I have yet to learn that Canadian tug-boat owners are, in cases of disaster, more moderate in their

Mr. McCALLUM. They do not charge for saving life as

Mr. McCUAIG. I am only saying that so far as liberality coes these things are governed entirely by the spirit of trade. If a vessel is in great distress, and there is only one tug on hand to assist her, it often occurs that the captain of the tug having one object, the interest of the owners in view, loses sight of that which should guide him, the great spirit of humanity. I believe the American Board of Trade is willing to co-operate with the Dominion Government in a liberal spirit, to make these laws as perfect as possible. I clip the following from a leading Ontario paper :-

"There is one point in Secretary Evart's letter on the wrecking question which has some truth in it. He complains that our wrecking service is inefficient."

I endorse every word in that letter. I say, as one largely interested in the trade of the country, it is inefficient; and with the exception of Mr. Donnelly, of Kingston, the Tugowners charge exorbitant rates.

Mr. McCALLUM. My hon. friend tells the House that if we had American competition we could save life at cheaper cost than now. I ask hon, members if they ever knew a case where men charged money for saving life under such circumstances. Is there anything in the laws of this country or the laws of nature to prevent a man saving a life in danger? This humanity cry is merely used as a lever to cheat Canadians of their just rights. My hon friend read a letter from the Buffalo Board of Trade containing statements which were utterly untrue. The statement that the Kingfisher, which was abandoned, would have been brought safe into Buffalo harbor a week ago were it not for the Canadian laws, is one which the facts do not bear out. The article of which the member for Prince Edward (Mr. McCuaig) spoke, and which he ascribed to the Canadian press, was from the Buffalo Courier, and no doubt emanated from some member of the Board of Trade. I should like to know what appliances they have in Buffalo to assist wrecks. There are only two pumps at Buffalo and neither is fit to pump grain out of a vessel, because they are nine and ten inch Wellington pumps, which are perfectly useless, as far as getting the vessel off is concerned. All the hon. gentleman has to do, is to go down to the office of the hon, the Minister of Marine, and he will see the number of tugs that are at Port Colborne. If he will look at the Steamboat Inspection Act, and the fees of collectors from steamboats, he will see the number of tugs that we have, and not be so ready to take the authority of the Buffalo Board of Trade as to the resources of the country. Will the hon, member believe the statements of that Board of Trade, as opposed to those of the hon. member for Essex? I would like to ask the hon. gentleman, if he knows what pumps the Americans have got. How many have they got on Lake Superior? They have not got one. The Canadian Wrecking Company keep at Windsor, all the time, one boat and three pumps. As true Canadians we must protect our own interests. What is the American rule? Secretary Evarts said they had this rule for thirty years: that Canadian vessels were welcome to assist vessels in distress, no matter what their nationality was, as long as they were in Canadian waters, and under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Government. This is very kind of Secretary Evarts to tell us that poor Canadians are permitted to work in their own waters. You would fancy, from the remarks of my hon. friend, that the Canadian tug-boats should be continually sailing up and down our waters to prevent vessels from running ashore. I can'tell my hon. friend that tugs are like doctors. You never send for them except when you want them. As far as I know the stock is a poorly paying one. Our people are struggling hard to keep the wrecking business in Canadian waters for Canadians, and I trust that

"Sig.—I am now instructed by the Minister of Customs to call your attention to the bearing of the Customs Law upon the treatment of wrecked vessels, or property, in Canadian waters, which provides, in effect, that no vessel, foreign or Canadian, has a legal right to interfere with wrecked vessels or materials in Canadian waters, unless permitted the Government will give them all the proper assistance they require to accomplish this object. I am quite willing to have reciprocity, but it must be a reciprocity of fair play. Let the Americans give us an equivalent for what we give thom. If they have a griovance, if we are acting against good neighborhood and the interests of humanity, let them throw open their coasting trade, so that Canadian tugs may have the privilege of towing from one American port to another; and I am quite sure that if they concede these privileges, Canadians will not fear the competition.

Mr. McCUAIG. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if he is acquainted with the tug Prince Alfred?

Mr. McCALLUM. Yes, I am,

Mr. McCUAIG. Are you aware that she draws eleven feet of water. If she does, I maintain that she is unfit for

Mr. McCALLUM. It depends altogether upon the amount of fuel that may be upon the tug whether she will draw 9 feet of water or 11 feet. If she has only a small quantity of coal, she will not draw 11 feet; if she has a large quantity she may draw 11 feet. If my hon friend knows anything at all about wrecking, he must know that if it is necessary for a tug to approach a vessel, that is lying in shoal water, she should have only a light load and a light draught in order to get alongside. My hon. friend, if he is desirous of getting all the facts in the matter, should go to the Library and get them, instead of accepting the dictum of a member of the Buffalo Board of Trade. Another hon. member, I remember, on a former occasion, accepted the statements of gentlemen connected with the Buffalo Board of Trade, and I think I can trace the same hand in the present instance.

Mr. McCUAIG. I only wish to say that I do not believe that the Secretary of the Board of Trade at Buffalo-a respectable body-would make a misstatement over his own

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton). Since my hon. friend from Monck (Mr. McCallum) has had the kindness to allude to me, I think it is incumbent upon me to rise and explain. Two years ago I had an interview with a gentleman from Buffalo, I do not know whether he belonged to the Board of Trade or not, but he succeeded in gaining my sympathy very much on this question, and I thought it my duty to bring before the House the subject which is now under discussion. I was induced to believe that there was a very great want of reciprocity between the Government of the United States and the Government of Canada; and I was made to believe that a want of humanity did prevail on the part of the Canadian Government; that while the Americans were willing to reciprocate in every way possible, Canadians themselves turned a deaf ear to all their entreaties and solicitations in that direction. I was told that the Government of that day were the cause of all that unfortunate and unneighborly conduct on behalf of Canada, and I was told that an order had be in issued by the then Minister of Customs making it imperative upon all tugs or vessels which went to the assistance of vessels in danger to go to the port nearest the disaster and get permission before they could render aid or succor. When I perused the document which I am about to read, I certainly thought there was a good deal of truth in what was stated to me by the gentleman who made the complaint. This document is as follows :-

"No. 3, Customs Department, "Ottawa, March 8th, 1878.

by the Collector of Customs at the nearest port,, after reporting to him; and no foreign vessel should receive such permission, as it is contrary to the Customs Law, and should be placed under detention in case of

"I have the honor, &c., "J. Johnson."

"To Collector of Customs."

This was dated 8th March, 1878, and it was regarded by me as a most inhumane decument. I made some enquiry about the matter, and I put a notice on the paper to enable me to move for a return of correspondence. I investigated the matter after the papers were brought down. I came to the conclusion that the Canadian Government was not so much to blame after all. I am free to admit that this circular letter is not exactly couched in such language as would lead one to believe that tugs could go to the assistance of vessels in distress without getting permission from the collector at the nearest port. It is contended now, by the hon. member for Monck, that it is not intended to prevent any vessel from going to the rescue of property or for the purpose of saving life. It is quite possible that that may be the fact, but I think it would have been far better if the Commissioner of Customs of that day had made that fact quite clear and explicit.

The result was, however, that a good deal of ill-feeling sprung up on both sides of the boundary line. I am perfectly satisfied that it is not altogether in the interests of humanity that the correspondence has taken place which is referred to in the motion now before the House. I am satisfied that the Secretary of State at Washington has been induced to commence this correspondence and to make those complaints by the wrecking ring of the American Union. I feel quite certain that the correspondence has not taken place with a view of bringing about reciprocity; but whether or not it be true that they are able to outstrip Canadian enterprise in wrecking, whether or not it be true that there is not a sufficient force on the Canadian side in the wrocking service to give assistance in all cases, I am quite satisfied that the correspondence which has taken place has certainly done some good, for we find that in the present Session application has has been made for the incorporation of a company for salvage and wrecking purposes. To-day I presented a petition from some influential gentlemen, praying to be incorporated as another company for the same approach incorporated as another company for the same purpose under the name of the St. Lawrence Wrecking and Salvage Company. If these companies are incorporated—as I take it this will be-and as we have men of ability and means in this country who understand the business and are desirous of investing their means in such enterprises, there is every reason why the Government of the day should be cautious about bringing about a reciprocity in this particular matter. I suppose it is not difficult to imagine what the result of reciprocal arrangements between the American Government and the Canadian Government might be. We can well imagine that the Americans would completely outstrip our Canadian tug and wrecking service, as it is now constituted; and therefore, when the Government see that there are gentlemen who are willing to invest their means and who are asking for bills of incorporation, they should be allowed to go into the enterprise. I see by one Bill before the House that the capital stock is $300,000, with the right to increase it to $1,000,000. The Bill I shall have the honor to introduce will ask that the capital stock may be declared to be $500,000, with power to increase it to $1,000,000. So that we have the enterprise, the energy, and the ability, and the means to establish a first-rate wrecking service in this country. Therefore, I think the Government should be careful before they bring about that reciprocity which the Americans desire. We know perfeetly well that this last year there has been an immense loss of life and property on the inland lakes, and it may be do this, they must still not neglect the interests of that there has not been sufficient aid and assistance given which we are now speaking. It is of great importance to Mr. Robertson (Hamilton).

to this service. I think that before another stormy season comes about we will find the Canadian wrecking service to be quite ample and sufficient to protect, not only all Canadian vessels which may be wrecked, disabled or endangered in Canadian waters, but American vessels as well. I think there are good reasons why the Government should know what the feeling of this House is before they grant the reciprocity which is asked for by the American authorities.

Mr. BOULTBEE. This question has occupied my attention for many years, and I think many hon. gentlemen will agree with me that the interests of our lake and river navigation are not sufficiently attended to. We have become so essentially a railroad people, we are so absorbed in railway enterprises, that we have more or less neglected this great branch of industry. It seems to me, provided as we are by nature with such magnificent water communication, that we are untrue to ourselves in every respect, if we neglect to foster the great interests which are connected with those waters. It has been a matter of painful interest to many of us, it was to myself, at any rate, that during the recent season there was such an enormous number of disasters in our lake navigation, a number of disasters that might not have occurred if proper care had been given to prevent them. As the hon, member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson) suggested, I think there has been too much carelessness as to the system of inspection whereby vessels navigating those waters should be carefully looked after, so that property should not be wasted and that life should be preserved. A strong feeling exists amongst men who understand the subject much better than I do, that there is a gross carelessness existing as to the means that should be used for inspecting vessels. Not only during the past season, but for years past, there has been a loss of human life, with its accompanying misery, that is utterly appalling to contemplate. Now, I do not understand the subject sufficiently to indicate the action that should be taken by the Government as to this system of wrecking service. I can understand that, in a national point of view, we should desire to nurse our own marine and to toster our own Canadian industries, and it would be inopportune and improper to allow American companies to engross this service altogether. Nor is it necessary that such a state of things should be allowed to ensue, because we have not proper means for preserving life and rescuing vessels, since wrecks, as I understand, take place to a much larger extent on the Canadian shore than on the south shores. I think the interests involved are sufficiently large to warrant the Government in taking some further action and assisting in developing a system whereby vessels, either wrecked or in danger of being wrecked on the coast, may have prompt assistance. Both the interest of our national industry and the interest of humanity demand it. I understand there are certain Bills before this House contemplating the encouragement of some means for more carefully and more usefully prosecuting this business, and I trust they may be sanctioned. I know that amongst men connected with this matter in Toronto and elsewhere, there is a feeling prevailing, with respect to the navigation of our lakes and rivers, that there has been a culpable neglect, not only on the part of the late Government but of this Government also, in attending to this important interest. I do not desire to shelter one Government at the expense of another, and if the Government I support has been neglectful of this matter, I must censure it as I would those to whom I am opposed. It may be said for the present Government that they have not only to do their own duties but to pick up the business neglected by their predecessors, to put our financial position into shape, and to develop our National Policy. But while they the prosperity of our lake navigation that there should be some proper system for securing the safety of life and property engaged in it. For this purpose it is not necessary that we should shut out the Americans from joining us if they are disposed, but I think it is the duty of the Government to see that we in Canada are not left to the mercy of the Americans in a duty which we should be prepared to do ourselves Mr, BOWELL. If I caught the remark made by my hon. friend who has just sat down, it was that, not only the late Government, but the present, had neglected their duty with regard to these wrecking laws. If he had informed the House in what respect, I should have been better able to reply to him as far as the present Government are concerned. I do not think the Government have reason to regret that this question had come before the House, as we have thereby obtained the views of the representatives of the people upon it. It has been the desire of the Government in the past to carry out the law, and to enforce as far as possible the regulutions issued, both before and after their accession to office, with the view of protecting the interest of the wrecking and towing companies in this country; not, I can assure the House at the expense of life or property. In order that this question may be fairly understood, I will read to the House the different orders that have been issued-two by my predecessors, and one since I have had the honor of administering the affairs of the Customs Department, and after they have been read I think it will be seen that the conclusions which have been drawn by my hon. friend from the County of Prince Edward (Mr. McCuaig), or my hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) are not borne out by the fact. I do not propose, at present, to enter into the question of reciprocity, or to refer to the contents of the papers which have been moved for, and which will soon be laid before the House; but I may say that the Government, in its correspondence with the authorities at Washington, has always expressed a willingness to enter into any arrangement of equitable reciprocity which they might propose, or which they would accept at our hands. On all occasions, however, they resisted any proposition made to them except on one condition, viz: that the American wrecking companies and American tug owners should have the right to come into Canadian waters to save the property not only of their own vessels, but of Canadian vessels whenever the opportunity presented itself. Well, the position taken by the Government was this: that this was a one-sided reciprocity from the simple fact that the larger number of vessels plying on the upper lakes, and on that particular part of the north coast where wrecks mostly take place, are American bottoms, and such an arrangement would be giving almost a monopoly to the American tug owners. I can easily understand that the letter read by the hon. member for Prince Edward should have been written by the secretary of the Board of Trade. We are constantly receiving complaints from that section of the country, and I think I can safely say that 19 out of 20 of these complaints have emanated from parties interested in the wrecking companies, that in fact the underwriters and the tug owners are the men who have the most to gain by doing that kind of work in our waters. The case to which my hon, triend from Hamilton referred was that of a vessel which had been stranded on our shores, and from the coldness of the weather some of the passengers and crew had been frozen to death. It was represented to the American Government, by those interested in the case, that on account of the order which had been issued by the late Government, the wrecking tugs of the United States were prevented from going to the rescue of these unfortunate people. What is the fact? The papers laid before the House proved that this vessel was wrecked, and that these lives were lost months before my predecessor issued the Order. Besides, the people and property saved from that vessel were saved by my hon. friend from Monck (Mr. McCallum), and those who owned | Order to be issued on the 19th September, 1879.

the tugs which he at that time controlled. I do not hesitate to say that the great majority of the charges brought against the Government of this country were just as baseless as that. My hon, friend from Prince Edward, from his large experience, must know that vessels might be wrecked along the south shore of the county in which he lives, and that it would be utterly impossible to save life, particularly where there are no tugs nor other vessels to go to the rescue: and it is in cases of that kind that complaints have been made against the Government. The first order that was issued by the Customs Department in reference to this matter was on the 1st December, 1877, and was as follows:

"Pending instructions expected by this department from the Minister of Justice, you are reminded that, no vessel, foreign or Canadian, has legal right to interfere with wrecked vessels, on the Canadian shore, unless permitted by the Collector of Customs at the nearest port, after reporting to him, and no foreign vessel should receive such permission, as it is contrary to Customs law, and should be placed under detention in case of violation. in case of violation.

(Signed), "J. Johnson."

Now, it seems to me that both the newspapers and a good many members who have discussed this question, do not draw a distinction between a wrecked vessel and a vessel that had gone ashore, and may be wrecked unless assistance comes to her. The interpretation of the Customs laws, and all laws relating to wrecked vessels, is simply this: A foreign vessel may be wrecked on your shore, she may contain thousands of dollars worth of property subject to customs duty; and unless that is looked after by the customs officers, at any moment it may be scattered all over the country, and the revenue is defrauded. That is the only object, really, that that first order had in view. Now, on the 8th March, 1878, a second order was issued, as follows:-

"CUSTOMS DEPARTMENT, "OTTAWA, 8th March, 1878.

"Sin,-I am instructed by the Minister of Customs to call your attention to the bearing of the Customs law upon the treatment of wrecked vessels or property in Canadian waters, which provides in effect that, no vessel, foreign or Canadian, has legal right to interfere with wrecked vessels or material in Canadian waters, unless permitted by the Collector of Customs at the nearest port, after reporting to him. And as foreign vessels should not receive such permission, as it is contrary to Customs law, they should be placed under detention in case of violation.

This is the Order which gave a good deal of offence to our American neighbours, and which, I think, induced the writing of the letter which was read by the hon. member for Prince Edward (Mr. McCuaig.) A misapprehension having arisen on that point from the misrepresentations which had been and are constantly being sent to Washington, induced Mr. Secretary Evarts to enter into correspondence with the Canadian Government on the subject. In almost every case brought under the notice of the Government, we have proved, after a thorough investigation, that the charges have been as groundless as those to which I first referred. Explanations have been repeatedly made by myself in this correspondence, on behalf of the Canadian Government, to the United States authorities, that there was no intention nor should such an interpretation be given to the order issued in 1878—of preventing in any case, or under any circumstances, a vessel going to the relief of any other vessel, no matter what her nationality, if there was the slightest danger of her being wrecked, or of the loss of property; and on that principle we have acted ever since the present Government was formed. I have no reason to doubt that that was the intention of the late Government also, when they issued that Order. But for fear difficulties should arise, and any of our collectors misunderstand the true intent and meaning of that Order, and the intentions of the Canadian Government, I instructed an explanatory

Mr. McCUAIG. If a vessel should be stranded in a gale of wind, and there happens to be no Canadian tug at hand, will you permit an American tug to rescue her?

Mr. BOWELL. On every occasion, and under all circumstances, when application has been made to the department for the use of American tugs or pumps, when there has been no Canadian within reach, that permission has been given.

Mr. McCUAIG. I appreciate your liberality; but while such correspondence was corresponding with the department the ship property might be lost.

Mr. BOWELL. That might happen; but I have heard of no such case. But in case of any misapprehension, or danger of property being lost, the collectors have discretionary power to order any vessel within reach, or any tug, no matter where she may hail from, to render every assistance to save the vessel and property.

Mr. McCUAIG. Have collectors discretionary power?

Mr. BOWELL. On every occasion when life or property is in danger, and no Canadian tug is within reach, the collectors may allow other vessels to go to the aid of those in danger. We tell them, at the same time, however, that this privilege is not to be granted in any way to interfere with the rights, under the law, that the Canadian wrecking companies should exercise, and should possess the profits of.

Mr. McCUAIG. The collectors, though very good men, may be wholly unacquainted with maritime law, or may possess peculiar ideas as to how they should act in the case of endangered vessels; and while telegraphing to and awaiting instructions from Ottawa the vessel and property may be lost. I would like a solution of this difficulty.

Mr. BOWELL. If my hon, friend had waited till I read the circular of the 19th September, 1879, he would have found that any collector of ordinary intelligence could understand distinctly that, under such circumstances, the Government desire—that while they must insist on the enforcement of the wrecking, towing, and coasting laws of this country-nothing should be done to interfere with the saving of life and property. The circular thus reads:

"Customs Department,
"Ottawa, 19th Sept., 1879.

"SIR,-Referring to Departmental Circular No. 210-3, of 5th March, "Sir,—Referring to Departmental Circular No. 210-3, of 5th March, 1878, on the subject of wrecking by foreign vessels in Canadian waters, I am desired by the Minister of Customs to inform you that the Circular is not to be understood as having any application to cases wherein life may be in danger, or where property may be jeopardized by delay, such, for instance, as the grounding of a vessel in circumstances in which immediate assistance would prevent a wreck; nor is there any possible case in which vessels of any nationality should be prevented from going to the rescue of persons in peril of their lives, or of vessels in danger of being lost.

"You will understand the terms 'wrecked vessels or property in Canadian waters' as referring to vessels and cargoes cast upon the Canadian shores and stranded or wrecked, requiring apparatus for their removal, or the discharge of cargo into other vessels; and to goods which may have been discharged or floated off therefrom, and cast upon

"I am, Sir,
"Your obedient servant,
"J. JOHNSON."

Mr. McCUAIG. May I ask the date of that circular?

Mr. BOWELL. It is dated 19th September, 1879.

Mr. McCUAIG. That circular does credit to your heart and to your department.

That is a plain interpretation of the Order issued, and which, I think, the late Government intended should be the construction put upon those Orders. My only reason for making that explanation was to prevent any of the Custom-house officers along the frontier putting a construction on the former circulars which had been issued Mr. Bowell.

friend from Prince Edward and many of the Americans Our tug-owners and who are interested in this work. others interested in the trade complain that our Customs collectors put too broad an interpretation upon that Order. The case to which my hon friends from Essex and Monck referred. I have under my hand. The complaint came to the office that the collector at Amherstburg had overstepped his duty in permitting American tugs to go to the assistance of an American schooner, on the ground that there was no Canadian tug present, when Canadian tugs could have been procured. After reading the papers I ordered a letter to be written to him approving of his conduct. The letter stated  $\mathbf{of}$ that while approving of his conduct, I had given, and would continue to give, the greatest attention his conduct, possible to the interest of the wrecking companies of Canada, but could not disapprove of reasonable concessions to United States tugs when necessary to the rescue of human life or the saving of vessels from total wreck. In this case the vessel, according to these documents, which are the only data I had on which to form an opinion, had been thrown on some rocks. The collector informed the department that he was fearful, that the wind blowing from the west would lower the water in the River Detroit to such an extent as to break the vessel in two, unless she was taken off the rocks. and that there was only one small Canadian tug there, not sufficienly strong to rescue this vessel from probable destruction; he therefore allowed an American tug to come to the rescue. That is a case in which I think the collector exercised a wise discretion, a discretion which the department, with those facts before them, fully justified. It is stated now by the hon. members for Monck and Essex that there was a Canadian vessel, the Prince Alfred, lying at Windsor, that could have been obtained within an hour and a half at the outside. The collector informed the department that the accident occurred on a Sunday, that the telegraph offices were shut, and he was unable to telegraph to Windsor for assistance, or he would have done so.

Mr. PATTERSON. (Essex). How did he manage to communicate with Detroit on Sunday if he could not communicate with Windsor?

Mr. BOWELL. I understand from the papers before me that the American tug was lying ready to assist the vessel on the rocks, and only awaited permission to do so. In such a case the collector did quite right. If it be a fact, as stated by one of the hon. gentlemen who have just spoken, that some of the collectors in the west are in collusion with the American wrecking companies, and if the hon. gentleman will bring that under the notice of the department, I assure him that the complaint will be attended to at once, and if true we will endeavor to find other collectors who will attend to their own duties and not enter into understandings with American tug owners. I have never heard, except were interthe American tug-owners  $\mathbf{who}$ vessels, complaint of their own ested in want of power or the insufficiency of Canadian tugs. I may say, for the information of the hon. member for Prince Edward, that while he complains that one of these vessels draws too much water and cannot be used for the purpose for which she is equipped, a complaint has come to me from shipowners on the upper lakes that they do not draw sufficient water and have not the power when at full steam to draw a vessel off. My hon. friend must know that there are other vessels belonging to the wrecking and tugging companies in this country that do not draw so much water as that. There are tugs in the west that draw from six to eleven feet of water, hence the smaller ones can be used for the shallow water. It is absolutely necessary that we should have strong tugs of heavy draught to be used in assisting stranded vessels. I am very glad this question has come up, as it has given the Government an opportunity of similar to that which has been given by my hon, hearing the opinions of hon, members representing the frontier or lake shore constituencies. It is from them we may expect to obtain information which will justify the Government in the course it has pursued of improving the law and in endeavoring to make the policy still more liberal.

Mr. GAULT. This is a subject in which I am deeply interested as an underwriter, and I hope the discussion will be of great advantage to the country. I had, yesterday, a memorial sent to me from the underwriters of Montreal, complaining that the ship Boyne, wrecked at Cape Charles, with $52,000 worth of wheat on board, should have been kept there with the waves breaking over her at every high tide. I went to the Government to see if they would allow this large quantity of wheat to be sold, and that they should get pro rata the amount at which it would sell. This wheat was likely to sell at 8 or 9 cents a bushel, and the duty on it was 15 cents, but the Government told me distinctly that they could not alter the law, and that this wheat must either be exported or allowed to rot in the ship. I think that was one of the hardest things that I have ever known, and it seems to me that the Government might have made some order to remedy it. I should be quite willing that the Government should take the wheat themselves, sell it by auction, and put the money into the Treasury, rather than let the wheat go to waste. I think it a very great sin to let this $52,000 worth of grain be wasted. I have used all my influence, but it amounts to nothing, and I feel very sorry about it. There are great complaints in Montreal, and the parties have just cause in this matter, and I hope the Government will bring in a Bill immediately to set this matter right.

Mr. PATTERSON. I have listened to the explanation of the Minister of Customs with great satisfaction. I may say that I have no personal interest in the matter, either for or against the tug-men. I am so situated, however, that I have a personal opportunity of knowing that the statements made in the Evart's letter, and the reports of the United States Consul at Sarnia, are untrue; and I felt it my duty to bring the matter before this House. It was never desired by the men engaged in the wrecking business in my section of the country, that Americans should be prevented from coming in in cases where property or life was at stake. The matter is therefore understood by the collectors at Detroit and along the St. Clair River, and they are fairly alive to their duty. The only fault I have to find with these gentlemen is that they are apt to be too lenient. They certainly do not err in the direction of severity towards The Minister of Customs knows American tug-owners. that I have frequently asked concessions in the direction of allowing Americans to bring in tension irons and other appliances, when Canadian apparatus for the purpose was not available. I wish, however, to assure the Minister of Customs that when I found fault with certain collectors in the west for a too lenient interpretation of the circulars sent to them, I did not dream of accusing these gentlemen of acting in collusion with American tug owners. I believe them to be conscientious in discharging their duties as they understand them. I think my hon, friend from Prince Edward has wandered from the question under discussion, and that, besides, if he was desirous of playing into the hands of the American tug-owners, he has succeeded admirably in doing so by raising the cry of inhumanity. That cry has no right to be brought up in this debate. It is not contended by any one that when life or property is at stake, any rules should be too rigidly enforced, and I know that collectors are in the habit of allowing American tugs to proceed to the assistance of vessels in distress in American waters, when life and property are at stake. I trust the Government will speedily bring down the papers.

member for Montreal West, in pointing out the great hardships which seems to be caused by the operation of the present law, as to the salvage of property in wrecked vessels. The case he refers to is one of very great hardship, indeed, but it is only one of a number of cases which are constantly occurring. When last year we had, near to the city of Montreal, the misfortune to have a serious accident in the canal, the same difficulty arose, and the subject became a matter of very considerable local discussion. It seems to me to be a most extraordinary thing-and whilst I believe the law is on that side, yet, I am bound to say that I think the Government ought to be strong enough, where the law is evidently, I was going to use a strong expression, but I will say, wrong on the face of it—to say that they will take the responsibility of dealing fairly in cases of that kind, and then to bring down legislation to amend the law. The idea of the property in this vessel, the Boyne, lying at this moment, in the St. Lawrence, being destroyed absolutely, because it will not realise enough to pay the duty of 15 cents. per bushel, is a proposition that I am quite certain no one could, for one moment, assent to. I believe that is the law, but, I hope, sincerely hope, that the Government will take it upon themselves to issue an order that that property may be sold, even if they take the whole of the proceeds as the duty, but do not let the property itself be destroyed. As to the question that has been discussed, it is rather an old familiar subject, for the simple reason that for three or four years we had consecutively in the city of Ottawa, when in the month of January the Dominion Board of Trade held its meetings, Captain Dorrs, of Buffalo, as the representative of the upper lakes, soliciting their influence with the Government to have our law changed. It occurred to me that this was simply a branch of the general question of reciprocity between the two countries and their reciprocal relations. If they are anxious to have these special privileges, in the meantime, at any rate, whilst their means and appliances are very much greater than ours, let them give us something in return. The statements made by the Minister of Customs, to-night, show clearly, as far as the Government is concerned, that ample measures have been taken, and can be taken for the protection of life and property, and that life and property shall not be permitted to be destroyed on the Upper Lakes out of any mere matter of national sentiment or feeling. Under these circumstances, if the Americans are anxious to have full opportunity of wrecking on the Upper Lakes, let them give us the coasting trade, let them give us free opportunities for reciprocal relations between the two countries, and I have no doubt that everyone in Canada will gladly consent to their proposition. I remember, and I dare say that my hon. friend remembers, a very remarkable speech made by the late Hon. Joseph Hamlin, at a Detroit convention, in 1866, when he referred to the Reciprocity Treaty as heing reciprocity in all and the convention. rocity Treaty as being reciprocity in slices. The suggestion arose out of a remark by Mr. Hamlin, who was at that time, or had been just before, the Vice-President of the United States, that this was simply reciprocity by slices, and that the object of our friends on the other side was to get the people in this country to make one after another, every possible concession that can be made to every possible interest in which they are concerned, and to leave us without any concession in return. If, therefore, the American Government are auxious to have these privileges, let them come to us with fair and reasonable offers for a Reciprocity Treaty between the two countries, and I have no doubt that the Government of Canada and the Canadian people of all parties will be very glad to meet them.

Mr. GAULT. I have just had a communication from the Minister of Customs, telling me that the wheat in the Boyne Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I do not intend to discuss the has been sold to-day for 15½ cents a bushel, giving the general question, but desire to join with my hon. friend the Government 15 cents, and ½ cent for the underwriters, and the corn at 8 cents, giving the Government seven, and the underwriters one.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I may say that difficulties arose last year in different parts of the Dominion of the character of those mentioned by my hon. friend from Montreal West—namely, difficulties connected with the damage to grain, subject to a specific duty. There is no provision under the Act by which the Minister of Customs can receive less than the specific duty in such cases. For instance, a vessel was lost in the Bay of Quinte and another in the neighborhood of Kingston, with grain on board, and the grain was permitted to be exported and, therefore, relieved from duty, and they got what it was worth on the other side for feeding purposes. Under the Tariff Act goods are subject to the ad valorem duty which have been depreciated or damaged, but these cases having arisen, for instance, the case referred to by the hon. member for Montreal, it has been found impracticable to export the grain, and it has been sold subject to duty. Under the circumstances the Government will take the matter into consideration and see whether relief can be found. The difficulty was not so apparent in the case of the loss which occurred in the neighborhood of Kingston, because the grain was exported and sold. But in cases where it cannot be exported, a hardship may arise, and the Government will give their serious consideration to it.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. The hon. the Minister of Finance has said that he would take this matter into consideration because cases have occurred at Montreal where large quantities of grain had been damaged, but which could not be exported and upon which they could not collect enough to pay the duty. I am sorry to hear that the hon. gentleman could be induced to act by the loss at Montreal but not by the smaller losses at Kingston. Now, when you have an aggregate of smaller grievances they come to make a large one, and so it is in this case. There have been innumerable instances of the kind at Kingston. Hardly a ship arrives there but has 50 or 100 bushels of damaged grain, sometimes 1,000, sometimes 10,000. I have known cases where this grain was not exported but was sent out into the harbor and thrown over-board into the lake, although that grain was worth, perhaps, ten cents a bushel, which for 10,000 bushels would come to $1,000. If the Government says: We will not put that $1,000 into the Treasury but we will throw it into the lake, I think that is monstrous. If it is the law, the sooner it is changed the better. When the grain is damaged it ought to be sold for what it is worth, and if it does not bring what the Government wants, take all it will bring, but do not throw it into the harbor. What is the consequence of this law as it stands and as it has been enforced? We are in this country expending millions of dollars in enlarging the canals and in trying to get the trade of the west to come down by the St. Lawrence. There are many little things which tend to make it a desirable trade, and which, together, would attract it down the St. Lawrence. But if you dissatisfy the mariners and captains of vessels they will grumble at your regulations enforced by the Customs Department, and you will find that they will sooner take half a cent or a cent less a bushel for their grain and go to a foreign port instead of a Canadian port. The consequence is, that if these irksome regulations of the Customs Department are put in force, it will cause the trade to go to Oswego or Buffalo instead of coming down the St. Lawrence. I believe it would be of the utmost benefit to this country if the Government, this Session, took up this matter and introduced a Bill by which a side of the House. We find the hon, member for Cardwell (Mr. White) speaking on both sides of the question; and, not content with that, he says he is in favor of reciprocity. We know that for the last three years the hon, gentleman, has been arguing for protection, and trying to show this House that if we were to throw open our markets to the Americans our industries would be destroyed. Now, the hon. gentleman seems to think they are quite strong enough to compete with the older and more wealthy industrial institutions on the other side.

Mr. WHITE. I am in favor of reciprocity in the natural productions of the two countries and none other.

Mr. MILLS. The hon, gentleman is like Mr. Bigelow: his mind is too fair to lose its balance, and that is the reason the hon. gentleman has taken the opportunity to speak on both sides of this question. The hon, member for Montreal West complains that a large cargo of wheat has been lost, or was so much damaged that it was sold for little more than pays the duty. But that hon, gentleman has voted for the past five years that the purchaser does not pay the duty, that the duty is paid by the American producer. If that is so, why should the Government here, when the American producer of this grain has paid you by a reduction in the price equivalent to the duty, remit the duty to the purchaser? Can there be a more monstrous proposition? Can any proposition be more monstrous than that suggested by the hon. Minister of Finance and the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick)? Those hon, gentlemen have been telling the farmers throughout the country that the duty is paid by the Americans upon grain coming into Canada, and not by the consumer in Canada. The First Minister went through the country telling the farmers that in consequence of the duty upon American barley, they were being mulcted to the extent of 15 cents a bushel upon every bushel sold to the American market. Now, hon gentlemen are assuming the very reverse of that position.

Mr. ROCHESTER. Is that the time they had 68 cents a bushel?

Mr. MILLS. The same difference exists to-day between prices in the Canadian and American markets that existed before this National Policy was adopted, and now the hon. Minister of Finance, after he has argued and acted upon the assumption that the duty is paid by the producer and not by the consumer comes down to the House and says he has under consideration a proposition to hand this duty, not over to the parties who paid it into the Treasury, those foreign producers, but to those who are speculating and trading in this particular article of foreign produce.

Mr. ROCHESTER. It is very well to go on and get all the complaints in to-night before the holidays come on. This question, it appears, affects a great many members in this House. I do not know any part of the country that has been more affected by the coasting law between the United States and Canada than this section of the country. The coasting laws between the United States and Canada have, I may say, robbed this part of the country of a large number of vessels and a large amount of trade. It was supposed by the public generally, that the Treaty of Washington guaranteed certain rights, both to Canada and the United States, with regard to coasting on the inland waters of each nation. But this treaty, in that respect, was not carried out by the United States. I will read a letter written by the Collector of Customs at Plattsburgh, in reply to one sent to him by one of the forwarders:

certain specific duty shall be levied upon damaged grain, or at all events, that grain se damaged shall be sold for what it will bring.

Mr. MILLS. This discussion has been of considerable interest and instruction to hon gentlemen on this (Opposition)

Mr. Character and introduced a Bill by White a Bill by White and a Bill by White and a Bill by White and a Bill by White a Bill by White and a school of the state inst., wherein you ask for the following information, viz: Whether Canadian barges will be allowed to pass en route from Rouse's Point to New York with foreign merchandise in bond? In reply, I beg to inform you that the United States laws, as construed (I think misconstrued would have been a better word), by the Treasury Department, prohibit the trade in question, so far as British vessels are concerned. See 2,771, Revised Statutes of the United States, which read as follows:—Vessels which are not of the United States shall not be admitted to unload at ports of entry established by by-law, and no such vessel shall be admitted to make entry in any other district than in that one in which she shall be admitted to unload."

Once a vessel going from Canada to the United States passes the line, she can go on to the extent of the first collectoral district, but if she goes further she is liable to be seized. On the other hand, American barges, which are now carrying all the lumber from Canada to the United States, can enter any Canadian port they like. A Canadian vessel can only go a certain distance, and she must unload there, while an American barge can go from port to port in Canada to gather her load, and then go back to the United States again; this is a gross injustice to the trade of this country. I think about 400 barges and between thirty and forty tugs have been allowed to lie idle at the docks. Some years ago, to test the law on this question, a tow of ten barges was loaded at Ottawa and sent to New York. It went to New York and returned as far as Rondout to load up with coal. While the tow was there, this same Collector of Customs at Plattsburg, after receiving instructions from Washington, telegraphed to the officer at Rouse's Point to seize these barges because they had passed beyond the first collectoral district. Fortunately for the barges, before the telegraph arrived, they had just got across the line and were safe, but the experiment has never been repeated. Not satisfied with the letter he received from the Collector of Customs at Plattsburg, the forwarder wrote to Washington, and received the following reply:-

" TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
" WASHINGTON, D. C., 18th June, 1875.

"I have received your letter of the 4th instant, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of the Ottawa and Rideau Forwarding Company, stating that he had forwarded a number of his British barges from Ottawa to New York, via Lake Champlain, Champlain Canal and the Hudson River, and that he intended continuing that trade if it be not

I will thank you to inform the gentlemen that the laws, as construed by this Department, prohibit the trade in question, so far as British vessels are concerned. The fact that the vessels mentioned as having gone to New York were British, was overlooked at that port, and they were treated as American. Section 5,771 of the Revised Statutes requires that the vessels in question shall unload at your ports.

"Very respectfully,
"B. H. Bristow,
"Secretary." (Signed)

I think it is a great hardship that our shippers are denied equal rights with American shippers. The Federal Government have on previous occasions tried to throw the blame on the State Governments; but I can produce documents from the State Governments to show that they have no objection to reciprocity with Canada with regard to the passage of boats through their canals, for they say that the more boats that pass through their canals, the more money they can make. I hope the Government will endeavor to obtain justice for our own people in this matter.

Mr. BOWELL. I wish to make one or two remarks in reference to the charge made by my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick). It does not come well from my hon. friend, because there happens to be a vessel at Kingston with some damaged grain on board, to urge that the whole specific duty should be set aside. If the specific duty means anything, it means that it should not be set aside, even for damaged wheat.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. It does not mean a specific duty on damaged wheat, but on sound wheat.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Kirkpatrick), being a lawyer, which I am not, may be better able than I am to give an interpretation to the law upon what it should contain, rather than what it does contain. I will not discuss the principles upon which or any other purpose—a point I will not now discuss. But, supposing a bushel of wheat in Chicago cost $2.00, the duty in Canada would be 15 cents, and if it cost 50 cents, does he mean to tell us he would only levy the stuty in proportion to the value of the wheat? If wheat becomes damaged it is none the less wheat, and if it be entered for consumption in Canada, any lawyer or anybody else must say it is subject to the duty of 15 cents, and that duty no person administering the Customs Department has any right to change. The hon. gentleman says that irksome regulations were issued by the Customs Department in this matter. There have been none at all. The law is on the Statute-book, and it provides for 15 cents duty as a protection to our farmers. He veted for that, and for the seven cents per bushel on corn for protection, and now, because the Minister of Customs will not violate the law and allow that wheat to be entered at a lower than the legal rate, in order that his constituents or others may obtain this grain for feed, although it competes with the coarse grains of our farmers, for whose benefit he voted for protective duties, he seems dissatisfied. That may be good law, but if so, I do not understand the law. If I understand specific duties, they must be levied on the article no matter what its price in the foreign market, the moment it goes into consumption, the duty has to be collected. But an ad valorem duty is quite a different thing, being in proportion to the value of the article; and the law provides that should the article be damaged, the ad valorem duty must be lowered in proportion. But I know of no principle upon which, with a specific duty, you can adopt the principle laid down by my hon. friend. Apart from protection altogether, if he can suggest a mode by which the Government can set aside any law in order to meet these particular cases, I shall be very glad to carry it out, and I am sure the Government will be equally glad. In all those cases of damaged grain the duty must be collected until the law is changed. The Government has no option in the matter. There have been no regulations issued in reference to this matter, irksome or otherwise.

Motion agreed to,

DEATH OF MR. THOMPSON, OF CARIBOO.

Mr. BUNSTER. It is my painful duty to announce to the House the melancholy intelligence which has just reached me, of the death of one of our members. I know the House will sympathize with me in expressing the severe loss we experience in the death of Mr. Thompson, of Cariboo—a gentleman who occupied a prominent position in this House ever since Confederation, and who always commanded its respect, as well as the respect of his constituents and the country. I will, therefore, out of respect for his memory, ask the House now to adjourn as a small tribute to his worth. He was remarkable for his adhesion to his party and to his leader, whom I would have been glad to see here to-night to do justice to our departed friend, for he could better perform that duty than myself. He was always earnest and sound in the great work of Confederation, and in the effort to make Canada a nation. I think the hon. member for Niagara, who was a very particular friend of Mr. Thompson's, will endorse my sentiments by seconding the motion.

Mr. PLUMB. I am certain that the announcement which has been made by my hon. friend, the member for Vancouver. in such feeling language, will meet with a response from every hon, member in this House. The untimely death of our fellow-member, Mr. Thompson, will be felt by every one on both sides of the House who was acquainted with him during the time he sat in Parliament. That gentleman's courteous manner, his intelligent handling of such questions as came under his observation and purview, his uniform gentlemanly and courteous demeanor, won him friends on both specific duties are based; they may be best for the revenue sides of the House. I venture to say that he never had an enemy in it. I knew him from the time he entered the House. He had preceded me three years, having entered the House on the admission of British Columbia into the Union. He was always, no matter upon what subject he addressed the House, clear and forcible. He never an offensive word to any hon. member of the House. I believe he has left a record here which all of us must respect, and which all of us may envy. It is with the greatest regret that we see, as must be inevitable with those who sit in this House year after year, chair after chair vacated, filled as they have been by those, no matter of what party, no matter what our relations might have been with them, in whom we must always feel a peculiar interest, sitting as we do together, counselling as we do together, endeavoring as I hope we ought to do, to carry forward in some small degree as best may in us lie, the interests of this great country. Sir, Mr. Thompson was a representative of the farthest corner of this great Dominion; but he was nevertheless one of us, knit together by the common bond of fellowship, which brings us here, each to endeavor to carry on so far as he may the little part in the great work which is entrusted to us by the people. We shall no longer hear his voice among us; but I trust, I believe, in fact I know that there are few men who would leave behind them a more cherished memory than that of the hon, member whose demise has been announced by my hon, friend. Therefore, I think, that it is entirely fit that an adjournment of the House should be moved. I have been very ready at the request of my hon. friend to second his motion, and I trust the House will not hesitate to adopt it.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I am quite certain that there will be a general concurrence in the proposition made by my hon. friend to adjourn until to-morrow, as an expression -a very slight expression—of the regret that every hon. member of this House will feel in the announcement which has just been made. Some three or four week since, when Parliament was summoned, we understood that Mr. Thompson was in ill health, and it was doubtful if he would be able to reach Ottawa this Session; but, in his great anxiety to be present and take part in the important questions that were to be brought under our notice, some of them affecting very materially the section of the country that he represented, he left his home and reached Victoria, and this morning we heard of his death. I cannot speak of him, perhaps, as my hon. friend behind me has spoken of him, because I was not so intimately acquainted with him; but all of those who have been present in Parliament, who have heard his speeches, and been brought in contact with him in various ways, will join with me in the expression of opinion that he was a man of very considerable ability and most genial and kindly in his sentiments and sympathies. I think, under these circumstances, it is unnecesssary for me to say more than to express in union with my hon. friends our sincere regret, and to hope that the proposition made may be generally concurred in by the House as a testimony of the appreciation in which that hon, gentleman was held by his colleagues in this branch of the Parliament of Canada.

Mr. ANGLIN. I share fully the regret for the loss of Mr. Thompson, expressed by the hon. gentlemen who have spoken on the other side. Still there is a duty to this House which, I think, I should not now fail to discharge. Many years ago it was resolved by this House that the old custom of adjourning on the death of a member should be discontinued, and from that time to the present I believe there is no case in which the House has adjourned for any purpose of this kind. It has frequently happened that members of the House died in Ottawa while the House was in Session, and the House did not adjourn. I think it was the late Mr.

Sandfield Macdonald who first pointed out that in a House so large as this it would be more convenient to follow the example of the Imperial Partiament where this mode of paying respect to the memory of deceased members was discontinued many years ago. My own impression is it would be injudicious to go back to the old system. I think the expression of regret pronounced by the hon. gentlemen opposite, and repeated by myself in my own weak way, an expression in which, perhaps, other hon. gentlemen may choose to join, will suffice to show how much we regret the loss of the gentleman whom we all knew and all liked. I am reminded by an hon. friend behind me, that last year there was a special case in which we adjourned in order to enable members to attend the funeral of the late Mr. Holton. That was the only instance of the kind I can remember.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I quite concur in the statement of the hon. member for Gloucester that the House arrived at the decision that the practice of adjourning on the death of a member should be discontinued: but I am certain that hon. members on both sides, after the allusion to the melancholy event which has deprived us of one of the most respected members of this House, will not feel any desire to continue the sitting to-night. That is all we propose.

Mr. BLAKE. Of course we all recollect that the late Mr. Sandfield Macdonald proposed that the practice of adjourning on the death of a member should be discontinued, and in deference to what we knew were his opinions the House did not adjourn on the occasion of his death, although he had filled the most distinguished positions in the gift of the Crown here. I believe that the same conclusion was arrived at on the death of Sir George Cartier, another gentleman who occupied the highest position in the gift of the people of the old Province of Canada, and whose death during the sitting of Parliament. also took place It having been proposed even at this late hour to adjourn out of respect for the late hon. member, I should have felt that it was an innovation which might become the subject of observation, but that the hen. member for Vancouver has simply made a motion for adjournment. He has stated the reason verbally, but upon our journals it will not appear that the adjournment is made for this particular reason. Having regard to this fact, as well as to the lateness of the hour, I do not think that any reasonable objection can be made to the adjournment. As to the reason for which the adjournment is asked I join very heartily in the expressions of regret which have fallen from other hon, members on both sides of the House at the melancholy event which has deprived us of the society of a colleague whom we have known since British Columbia entered the Union. We must all feel solemnized at the visits of death to an assembly, not so very large, which have been so numerous during the last few months; and there will be a disinclination on the part of hon, members to engage in the business of the House after the sad announcement which has just been made.

Motion agreed to; and (at 11:10 o'clock. p.m.,) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 23rd Docember, 1880.

INDEPENDENCE OF PARLIAMENT.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT introduced a Bill (No. 9) for the better securing the independence of Parliament and preventing corrupt practices. He said: I may briefly state the object of this Bill. We are about to create a railway corporation with extraordinary powers, and the object of the Bill is to cause to be inserted in the law such additional stringent provisions as may make it difficult for such a corporation to interfere improperly with the election of members of this House, by the practice of any of those corrupt acts which we know, by the experience of the United States and other places, have in former times been practiced by such corporations. Perhaps it would not be admissible, according to the practice of the House, to enter into a discussion of the details of the Bill until such times as it shall have been printed and placed in the hands of hon, members.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think the usual practice upon the introduction of a general, not a private, Bill—I believe it is the almost universal practice in England, though we have not adhered so closely to it here-is that the explanations of the Bill should be made upon the first reading; and not upon the second.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I have no objections to explaining it now. Corporations, as we all know, are very difficult to deal with, or, according to the well known dictum of a well known and eminent English lawyer, we can neither punish the body or the soul of a corporation. I propose that if a corporation be convicted of improper practices, its charter shall be forfeited. I propose, also, that the members, officials or directors of such a corporation may be subjected to more severe punishment than the law provides,—should they be found guilty of aiding, abetting, or conniving at,—for the grave offence of corrupting members of the Legislature of this Dominion. Those are the chief points which I propose to aim at, and those are the modes by which I propose to reach my object. I believe such offences should be held to be misdemeanors, which they are not at present. I think this is a sufficient explanation of the Bill-more than is usual at this stage of a Bill of this character.

Bill read the first time.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. FERGUSON. Before the Orders are called, I desire to make a personal explanation in the matter which came before the House the other day. I refer to a statement made on page 96 of the Auditor General's report, wherein he states:

"I observe that I failed to remark in my letter of the 13th instant, on three cases of payment of indemnity to members of the Commons, which do no appear to be covered by the Act, to which reference was made in that letter. The three cases are Mr. C. J. Coursol, Mr. J. B. Mongenais, and Mr. C. E. Ferguson. The above named parties were paid full indemnity, though absent from the House for a portion of the Session."

I was so astonished at the statement, at first, that I was unable to offer any explanation. The first intimation I had of my name being in the report was the remarks of the hon. member for Montreal East (Mr. Coursol). I did not think so much about my name being mentioned as I did of 29 of signing a declaration which was not true. I called at the office of the Auditor General, and stated my grievances. He kindly consented to investigate the matter, and subsequently sent me the following letter:

"OTTAWA, December 20th, 1880.

"Dear Doctor,—On examination it appears that your name was mentioned instead of Mr. M. P. Ryan, where it was intended to point out those members who, last Session, received indemnity under a Resolution of the Commons, for the time during which, they were absent from Ottawa. The examiner who made the error, was new to the work of sudii and under instructions to evidence the summer who had of audit and under instructions to point out payments which were made without authority or an apparent authority, when greater authority had without authority or an apparent authority, when greater authority had otherwise determined.

"I noted payment to you, which was perfectly regular, as you were ill while in Ottawa. I send him with this, to make a personal explanation on the subject. It never occurred to me that the persons, whose names were given, would feel directly affected, by notice being taken of the matter. It having been, so far as I can recollect, the custom for the last ten years, to pay, on a Resolution of the House, those members who were, through illness, absent from the Seat of Government during any portion of the Session.

of the Session.

"I presume that the result of attention being drawn to the subject, would either be an amendment of the Indomnity Act, or a discontinuance of the Resolution, and my sole object was to bring about that result.

"Yours very truly,

"J. L. McDOUGALL,

"Auditor General.

"To C. F. FERGUSON, Esq., M. P., "House of Commons, "Ottawa."

Of course, to myself, that letter personally is satisfactory, but it is not satisfactory to have my name paraded in that connection in a public document under the authority of an officer of the House.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

The House resumed the further consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Blake, for an order of the House for statement shewing in detail the particulars of the various modifications and alterations made in location, design and otherwise, whereby the estimated cost of the section of the Canadian Pacific Railway, between Kamloops and Yale, was reduced in April, 1880, from the estimate of 1878, &c.

Mr. BLAKE. When six o'clock arrived yesterday I was about to address myself to the other portion of the Pacific Railway, excluding the portion in British Columbia. But before quite leaving that portion I may just mention that there appears to be some discrepancies in the estimate of April, 1880, of the Chief Engineer, with reference to the section from Jasper to Kamloops. If the hon. Minister would look at the mileage and the cost per mile, he will find that they do not sum out the aggregate of $15,500,000, which is stated as the cost. I am not sure that that error is altogether in the estimation, because this year we find instead of an addition of 15 miles to the mileage, which addition would go a considerable way to make the gross sum of $15,500,000, which would still, however, leave $200,000 or $300,000 short, to the extent of which the proposition of work done by the Syndicate would be lightened. Then a word with reference to the section from Lake Superior to Red River. We know that the estimate for 1879 was $18,000,000, that the estimate for April, 1880, $17,000,000, a difference achieved to a very considerable extent, as I understand it, by a saving in one particular part of between three or four miles of the road, and also something in rolling stock. But the estimate of April, 1880, has been modified still further. The reduction of $18,000,000 to $17,000,000 has been modified still further by improvements in location and modification of design, to the amount of $1,385,000, a very considerable additional reduction. Upon that a paper which the hon. gentleman brought down yesterday or the day before, throws some light, and a portion of that reduction obviously is, by that paper, explained to be a further prosecution of the work of the charge of having resorted to the disreputable practice | economy in improving the service and adapting the railway more accurately to the natural features of the ground without impairing its character or standing. But I observe that a considerable portion of that saving, as I judge, is stated thus: The hon, gentleman read an extract from Mr. Fleming's report, suggesting that in certain portions of the road, where it was practicable, resort might be had to trestle-work and piles. The hon gentleman continued: That, I need hardly ssy, is a very material modification in design, and it would be well to know to what extent that is to be applied, what is the extreme length of the piles to be used, what is the saving to be accomplished by this particular modification of design? The general result, leaving out the question of rolling stock, leaving out the question of the reduction in building, has been that 1879 says $18,000,000; April, 1880, says $17,000,000; and December, 1880, says $15,615,000. Of course, these various alterations in cost must have been accomplished largely by modification of design, and it is natural that we should see particularly what these modifications are. Now, turning to the prairie section, I will refer to the Report of the Engineer for 1877, showing what the work of 1876 was on that part. He says:

"The gradients and alignment will nowhere be less favorable than on the railway now in operation in the old Provinces. The maximum gradient between the Yellow Head Pass and Selkirk will be 58.80 feet per mile. Up to a point 468 miles west of Red River no gradient ascending eastward in the probable direction of heavy traffic need exceed 26.50 feet per mite.'

Speaking of the result as to a good line there, the engineer, in the report the same year, goes on to cay:

"It has been held from the first, that the successful occupation of the prairie region, and the extent to which it may become thickly populated, will, in a great measure, be governed by the capacity of the line to Lake Superior to carry cheaply the products of the soil. The success of the railway itself must be determined by the number of inhabitants which can be established in the country; and the degree of prosperity of the population will be influenced in no narrow limit by the character of the outlet for the products of their industry. The more, therefore, that the eastern section of the railway can be rendered available for cheap transportation, the more rapidly will the prairie region become populated, and the more speedily will the land become self-sustaining. I have felt it my duty to regard these views as of paramount importance in the location of the line between the prairie region and Lake Superior. Accordingly, every effort has been made to discover the shortest line with the lightest possible gradients and easiest curvature, especially in the direction which heavy traffic will take—towards the Atlantic sea board."

After giving the results achieved from Selkirk to the east he goes on to remark:

"Thus, there will be no impediment to the Pacific Railway carrying products from the heart of the continent to Lake Superior at a lower rate per mile than those now obtaining on the leading railways already in operation.

Then, proceeding to discuss the subject of the line further west, he says:

"I have described the efforts that have been made to obtain a line with the easiest possible gradients from the prairie region to the navigable waters of the St. Lawrence, and the paramount importance of this feature. Reference to a table in the appendix, which gives a summary of gradients for each hundred-mile section of the railway, between the Lake Superior terminus and Tôte Jaune Cache, shews that there is no gradient ascending in either direction exceeding 1 per 100 er 52.8 feet per mile, and with one single exception, viz.: at the crossing of the South Saskatohewan, the heaviest gradient ascending ontwards from a point near Battleford to Fort William is only 0.5 per hundred or 26.4 feet per mile. I feel satisfied that a revision of the location at the one exceptional point will, with but trifling cost, result in obtaining the desired gradient there also.

"Assuming the gradient at the South Saskatchewen to be accepted."

"Assuming the gradient at the South Saskatchewan to be amended, I am enabled to report a location on which, for fully a thousand miles west of Lake Superior, the easterly ascending gradients can be kept down to half the maximum gradients on the Grand Trank and other railways in operation in the older Provinces. Cheapeass of transportation in thus, to a certain extent, assured—an important element in facilitating the prosperous settlement of the fertile territory in the

"The following will show the remarkably favorable gradients seemed on each 500 mile section of the line, west of Lake Superior; and the Mr. BLAKE.

"Thus on that portion of the line located and established for a distance of 1,500 miles, there will be close on 1,200 miles level, or with gradients under 26½ ft. per mile, and no portion of the balance will rise more than 53ft. per mile."

That was to be the character of the line, according to the report of 1877, for the whole distance of 1,500 miles from Lake Superior; but it was, of course, modified by the circumstances to which I have alluded as having occurred in April, 1880. The Report of the Engineer for the year 1880 proceeds as follows:-

"The importance of securing cheap transportation between the Prairie region and the eastern markets has been kept prominently in view in establishing the railway between Selkirk and Lake Superior. I have in previous reports described the efforts made from the beginning of the survey to attain this object.

"In my report of last year (p. 18), I referred at some length to the subject, and drew attention to the fact that the Government had placed under contract the whole distance east of Red River on a location definitely established with gradients so light and favorable that cheap transportation is assured for all time to come.

"This important condition is not attained without difficulty. Atsence transportation is assured for all time to come.

"This important condition is not attained without difficulty. At some points it has involved heavier works than would have been rendered necessary had steeper gradients been employed; but these points are remarkably few, and the increased expenditure, compared with that of the whole line, is small. The advantage gained will amply compensate for the extra expenditure incurred; and the results to be attained can be easily understood by reference to the Report on Rolling Stock appended. It can there be seen that the same engine which would transport 19 cars with a paying load of 190 tons, over a line with the ordinary gradients, would take 37 cars with 376 tons load over the Pacific Railway with the gradients obtained. Moreover, it is calculated that the 'consolidation' class of loc-motives preposed to be brought into use ultimately, will be capable of hanling, from Manitobe towards Lake Superior, on the gradients established, as much as 765 tons of paying load."

But these results, although obtained, and we hope yet freight cheaply is concerned—from Selkirk to Lake Superior, are not considered of equal consequence farther west. I need hardly say that it is of great consequence to the dweller in the prairie, no matter how remote from Lake Superior, who expects that his grain will reach the sea-board via the line from Selkirk to Thunder Bay, that that line should be capable of carrying freight as low as possible; always provided that security shall be given that the amount charged for transportation shall bear some proportion to the cost of transportation. But, although this is important to all the dwellers on the prairie, in Manitoba, as well as farther west, it is of the last consequence to the dweller more remote. disadvantaged as he is by his being farther west, to have a line with good grades and curves, and capable of transporting produce cheaply to Selkirk. Such a line, it is obvious, you will measurably have under any circumstances, because the character of the country is most favorable for the construction of a good railway. Very nearly one-third of the 1,500 miles from Lake Superior westward is reported as absolutely level, and a great portion of the rest is reported as being approximately level. But it is equally obvious, as appears from the general tenor of these reports, that there are, as is natural in such a stretch of country, great gullies, enormous water courses, and mountainous regions, in which the question of grade becomes a serious one, and in which a heavy expense will be necessary to bring the grade down to the proper point. These heavy grades must involve a heavy charge for transportation, to which the letter of the Minister of the 15th April, with reference to the location and character of the railway west of Selkirk, alludes, as follows:-

"With regard to the location and character of the railway. I am aware that your own preference has been for a line with light, easy gradients. The Government recognizes the advantage of this feature between Lake Superior and Manitoba, but west of Red River we attach less importance to it than the rapid settlement of the country and the immediate accom-

"The policy of the Government is to construct a cheap railway, follow-

"The policy of the Government is to construct a cheap railway, following, of rather, in advance of settlement, with any workable gradients that can be had, incurring no expenditure beyond that absolutely necessary to effect the rapid colonization of the country.

"In accordance with this policy, Mr. Marcus Smith has found a line on the second hundred-mile section where, two years ago, he reported it impracticable under the old system of gradients, and he has stated to me that there will be no heavier hundred-mile section than this one between Manitoba and the Rocky Mountains. I am, therefore, perfectly justified in calling upon you to take the accepted tender for the second hundred miles section as the basis for estimating cost up to the mountains."

I pause to remark that this avowed policy of the Minister does in plain terms alter the whole character of the railway in grades, and I presume also in alignment and curvature. The policy was, instead of getting a line of the character agreed upon as proper, to get, -I suppose only temporarily, as cheap a line as possible, to largely increase the grades, though with that to accept a location which had been found absolutely impracticable under the old system of gradients, but which, with superior grades, was reported by Mr. Marcus Smith to be practicable. The engineer, answering the Minister's letter, says:

"I understand the policy of the Government, with respect to the railway, to be " " the roadway and works to be of the character defined by the 48th centract of the tenders for the 66th contract;"

And he describes what has been done in these words:

"West of Red River, 100 miles have been placed under contract, and tenders have been received for a second hundred-mile section. These two venders have been received for a second hundred-mile section. These two sections are designed to be constructed and equipped in the most economical manner, dispensing with all outlay except that necessary to render the railway immediately useful in the settlement of the country. It is intended that the line be partly ballasted, to render it available for colonization purposes, full ballasting being deferred until the traffic demands high speed."

We are here met with this embarrassment, that as far as I know, there was no very close calculation before the calculation made by the Chief Engineer in April, 1880, as to the west of Nipissing. Assuming that he takes the length of cost of the prairie section; that, in making an estimate of the cost of that section, one was obliged to rely upon the description that the engineers gave of the character of the works required in different sections, as they described them. You find that they described the work as "beavy," "moderately heavy," "light, etc."; and the nearest one could come to a true estimate was-always assuming, of course, that the standard, the curvature, the gradients, the alignment were to remain as before—that works described as heavy or light in one section would cost about the same in the prairie section. Of course, such estimates would be open to the same reduction which the British Columbia estimates were open to, on the two grounds-first, that the more accurate location of the line showed that it was possible to diminish the cost, and also, and I venture to say chiefly, that the change in the character of the line also diminished very largely the cost. I think it important that we should know, in full detail, what were the particulars of the modification in design which enabled the estimate, so obviously and very much reduced, of April, 1880, to be made. We have not an estimate of December, 1880, as to this portion of the line, because the Government does not propose to construct it. It is left for the Syndicate to construct, and the hon. Minister does not seem to have thought it necessary to obtain a further estimate of what its cost is likely to be. I am not now discussing the question of policy. I am merely pointing out that the changes made are important and serious, and one wants to know what were the grades and the character of the alignment which it was proposed to have in April, 1880, west of Selkirk and to the Rocky Mountains. Then, I turn to the section north of Lake Superior, which remains, so far as information is concerned, in the least satisfactory position of any section of the line, because, as I said on a former occasion, it was not regarded as of present consequence for any Government to push on the location survey of that section, as it was generally understood that its construction was to be postponed for a considerable time. Now, all that you can find, so far as I can judge from the facts before us, is the pretence that the works would be very heavy for a good line of the same character as the Canadian Pacific Railroad was intended to be—alignments, grades, and curvature of the character I already described, giving us excellent grades for the traffic east-bound, and fair, good grades for the west-bound traffic, the standard of the works. equipment, and so forth, equivalent to that of the Intercolonial. The estimates made upon that basis, of course, wholly differ from any estimates which are to be made upon the basis of the policy of April, 1880. The engineer does not in the general report, so far as I remember, deal with that particular branch, but it is dealt with in the letters. The second letter would appear to have been written to the engineer, and is replied to by him, on the 16th April, and in that letter he shows the new basis of calculation:

"Sir.—In compliance with your directions, I have the honor to consider the cost of the eastern section of the Pacific Railway extending from Thunder Bay, Lake Superior, to the eastern terminus, Lake Nipissing. In my report recently laid before Parliament, I have referred to the projected line between South-East Bay, Lake Nipissing, and Sault Ste. Marie. The explorations of this district have established that a location can be had porth of Lake Nipissing, which would be common for 60 or 70 miles to the explorations of this district have established that a location can be had north of Lake Nipissing, which would be common for 60 or 70 miles to the St. Mary's branch, and the main trunk line to the North-West. As the St. Mary's branch will, in all probability, be constructed before the through line is undertaken, the length of the latter will be reduced by the length of the location, common to the two lines. The eastern terminus will consequently be advanced some 60 or 70 miles to the west, beyond the theoretical starting-point at Lake Nipissing. The length of the eastern section, therefore, may be assumed not to exceed 600 miles."

That is the first element in this calculation. He assumes that the Sault Ste Marie Branch will be built before we commence the construction of the eastern link; that 60 or 70 miles of the eastern link, by which the construction is brought to the Sault Ste. Marie line must be built, and that . he may take as a starting point sixty or seventy miles to the the eastern section, so referred to, at 600 miles, then he

"It is impossible to say what labor and materials may cost some years hence, when the period arrives for the eastern section to be undertaken. Taking the basis of present prices and present contracts, and adhering to the economic principles of construction set forth in the letters of yesterday, I feel warranted in stating that $20,000,000 may be considered a fair estimate of the cost of opening the line from Fort William to the

Now, it is to be observed, that the estimate of $20,000,000 is based upon the economical principle of construction contained in the letter to the Minister, of the 15th April, and the reply of his officer of the same date, which involves the abandonment of the old system of high class works, easy grades and good curves, and the adoption of low class works, steep grades and sharp curves. The engineer adds:

"In order that the estimates of the cost of the line from Fort William to the Pacific, and from Fort William to the Eastern Terminus near Lake

Nipissing, be clearly understood, I deem it proper to submit the following explanations:—
"I have, in previous reports laid before Parliament, advocated a location for the railway with generally light gradients and other favorable engineering features. The policy of the Government, as stated in your letter, likewise the change of line by the abandonment of the old location west of Parliament, it is the change of the state of the change of the parliament. the old location west of Red River, render it necessary on my part to modify the views I have previously held."

It is shown, therefore, repeatedly, that in making his estimate on the basis of a road, from 50 or 60 miles to the westward of Nipissing to Thunder Bay, he has abandoned the old system and adopted a cheaper railway. What we will want, therefore, are such details as enable us to judge what are the grades, curves and general class of structures, and the character of the grades, general line that we propose, upon which $20,000,000 are to be spent which, for 600 miles, would give $33,333 per mile, so, with this information, we shall be able to know the general character of the line from Nipissing to the Pacific which we proposed in 1880, is as contrasted with the character of that line, which had been up to that time proposed. We shall thus be able to judge of the description of road we shall construct and hand over to the Syndicate, and, presumably, the line which the Syndicate itself is to construct, so far, at any rate, as its obligations to the contract go. I do not mean to say they may not better those obligations. They will do what seems to them good, but so far as the obligations of their contract go. It is not with any view to express or imply any opinion on this change of policy, nor to discuss the expediency of any change that I make these remarks, but simply with a view to pointing out that there was, in 1880, a material change of policy as to the character of the road, involving an enormous change as to the cost of its construction. It is important to us, in view of the policy for ten years maintained, that we should have a road with light gradients and every favorable engineering feature to know in how far this change of policy involves a departure, not merely as to price, but also as to the attainment of results, and it is for this reason that I have put in your hands this motion for further information.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is every desire on the part of the Government to furnish the hon, gentleman with all the information he and the House can desire, in order to an intelligent discussion of the very important question we have under consideration. But to comply, specifically, with the terms of his motion would require some months; I think, however, it will be possible to give all the information asked for necessary to the intelligent discussion of the question.

Mr. BLAKE. I had intended to suggest that, if there were any particulars for which a great deal of time would be required, it would be convenient that such as could be immediately supplied should be given now, the supplementary portions to be supplied as soon as possible.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It would be impossible to give detailed information without full communication with House that we had effected a very large reduction in the Mr. BLAKE.

British Columbia, and that would not answer the object of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blake). I have supplied, already, as clearly as I could, all the data necessary to a proper, appreciation of the question before us. I will gladly furnish any information I possess in order to satisfy the hon gentleman. But I may say that my case is a somewhat singular one. Almost the only ground on which I have had to defend myself, as a Minister, from the criticisms of hon gentlemen opposite, is, that I continually come back to Parliament asking for less public money to accomplish the same object. Generally speaking, a Minister is obliged to come back to Parliament with apologies for having exceeded his estimates, and asking more money to accomplish the work in hand. I think that was found to be the general experience of Ministers of Railways or Public Works here and elsewhere; but my fortune, however, has been somewhat different. The charge to which I exposed myself was that I had asked too much; that my estimates had exceeded the amount required. I will endeavor to justify myself as far as I can by placing in the hands of the hon. gentleman information that ought to satisfy him that all these estimates were frankly and fairly stated to the House as far as the information in my possession enabled me to do so. The hon gentleman has gone through very elaborate statements to show that the same engineers estimated some of the works at a higher cost to the country at one time than they did at another time. I do not think it is at all surprising, that, with increased information, the estimates, expectations and opinions as to the cost of certain works should vary sometimes in one direction, sometimes in another.

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I hope we are getting wiser every day, that those who devote their time and attention to a great work, whether engineers or ministers, become better informed and able to produce fuller and more reliable statements, year by year, than they previously could. So far as I am concerned, I have always taken the House into my confidence in the fullest and frankest possible manner. All the information I could obtain I submitted to the House. When the very great reduction was made in the estimate submitted last Session, it was stated at once to the House that the Government being compelled reluctantly to go on with the construction of the road as a public work, directly carried on by the Government, and chargeable to the Treasury of the country, felt bound to reduce the expenditure as far as possible; and while it was stated to the House that so far as the line of the railway, that was then in a somewhat advanced condition between Thunder Bay and Red River, was concerned, we considered it true economy to preserve the very favorable gradients that had been established on that line, even although considerable addition in the expenditure should be made, although we considered it necessary to carry out the design of making it a first-class work, even although it should involve considerable additional cost, because it was the outlet to Lake Superior of the traffic of the North-West; still we felt that so far as the works in British Columbia were concerned, it was desirable to proceed in such a way as to secure, across the prairie, a colonization line of railway, reducing the expenditure in every way, and, at the same time, reduce the cost of construction in British Columbia, as far as was practicable. These opinions were fully stated to the House, and I am glad to say that the information obtained from the progress of the work, during the time that has elapsed since these estimates were submitted to the House, has enabled me to state that so far as the work between Thunder Bay and Red River is concerned, instead of being obliged, and I confess that we had under estimated the difficulties and the cost, I was placed in the position of being able to show to the expenditure that would be required to give us a first-class line from Thunder Bay to Red River. I think this ought to be satisfactory to the hon. gentleman. The character of the road was in no way made to suffer by any change of design. The grades were preserved and its substantial character. At the same time, the improvement in the alignment, the careful examination, from day to day, of the location, enabling us to relocate it at several important points, shortening the distance, and reducing the amount of work, placed it in my power to submit the estimate now before the House. So also, in my estimate for the work under contract in British Columbia, I told the House that, in my judgment, there was every reason to suppose we could revise that estimate and place the amount that would be chargeable to the country at a very much lower figure. This was done. Hon, gentlemen know it was stated not only that the estimates on those contracts let were outside estimates, but a large amount was thrown on as contingencies intended to cover any reasonable contingency in the specification; and the belief was expressed that when we came to the construction of that line, we would be enabled very largely to reduce that estimate. The engineers had their attention directed to the great importance of it, the same time securing a workable road with fair grades, and without excessive curvature and reducing the cost of work as far as possible. The estimate now submitted, with reference to the line under consideration between Thunder Bay and Red River, and the four contracts on the 127 miles under contract at British Columbia, are in the light as I said before of the practical experience that the year has afforded. There will be no objection, so far as the line between these points is concerned, to bringing down all possible information with reference to the works between Thunder Bay and Red River and those in British Columbia. The more accurate the information the more will the hon, gentleman be satisfied that I am quite safe in stating that the estimate of $28,000,000 which I made, will not be increased, but will be largely reduced. I give the House the best evidence of the soundness of my judgment in that relation, by pointing to the fact that again and again I have come to Parliament and shown that, so far as both these sections are concerned, instead of the estimates having been increased there has been a steady reduction. There is another very large element in the consideration, which the hon. gentleman has not failed to appreciate, and that is that in my estimates submitted a year ago, I provided for the full equipment of the line between Thunder Bay and Red River, and the line in British Columbia. I did not, of course, provide for a very heavy equipment in British Columbia, because we have no reason to believe that the volume of traffic would be so great, for some time to come, as to render a heavy equipment necessary; but that burden, under the contract now before the House, will be taken off the shoulders of the Government and placed upon the Company, who undertake to operate the line. The estimate of a year ago for the line from Fort William to Selkirk, was $17,670,000; the estimate now submitted to the House is $14,000,000, a difference of $2,230,000. mode in which that reduction has been effected has been detailed in the report of the engineer, which I have placed in the hon. gentleman's hands. It consists of the reduction on account of equipment, and the reduction in the cost of works, by the improvement of location and the design of The reduction on the line between Thunder construction. Bay and Red River, by improvement in location and the modification of design, amounts to $1,385,000; the reduction on account of rolling stock, $745,000; the cost of the workshops which would have been necessary if the Government had had to operate the line, would have been $200,000 With reference to the Pembina Branch, the only alteration as between the estimate of last year and the estimate of the present year, is upon rolling stock, and that is placed at | will be considerably below that sum. I think that the

the moderate sum of $193,100. The Pembins Branch was so far constructed as to give us very closely the amount that would be required, so I have not been obliged to make any reduction in that estimate. From Kamloops to Fort Moody by modification and design, and improvement in location, there will be a reduction of $1,166,200. The hon, gentleman must remember that from the very nature of the country in both these branches it was impossible to make such a location survey in the first instance, until it was placed actually in course of construction as would give us an exact idea of the cost. But when we had the construction staff on the ground, we found that great improvements could be made in the alignment, as well as in other respects and thus save a considerable amount of money. The character of the country is entirely different from the prairie sections, where for a hundred miles there is no bush in sight, and nothing to interfere with the examination of this line. The character of the country between Thunder Bay and Red River and between Kamloops and Fort Moody is such as to enable the engineers from day to day, by careful examination and study, to discover how important savings might be made; and I do not think that anyone, who is familiar with the character of public works, or of the country in these sections, will consider it was at all remarkable that on the 185 miles between Thunder Bay and Red River there should be a saving of $1,385,000, and on the 127 miles between Kamloops and Fort Moody a saving of $1,663,200 on the original estimates. Of the latter sum we had, for reduction in rolling stock, $175,000, and for buildings $250,000. Of course, if the Government had had to operate this portion of the line they would have required to furnish shops and a variety of other things which are not called for when it is being passed over into the hands of the Company. Between Emory's Bar and Fort Moody the reduction will be found not at all greater than the result will demonstrate as safe. We have made a reduction on the 90 miles between Emory's Bar and Fort Moody of $313,700, made up of $133,700 by improvements in location and careful alignments in the road. So far from that being excessive, I do not at all hesitate to say that I expect to reduce those figures very considerably. The amount of rolling stock for that portion that is taken off, is only $16,000, a very light equipment, as the hon. gentleman will see, making a reduction of $54,000. We are considering that these are to be the terminal buildings for the Pacific Railway, and I think the hon. gentleman will see that $54,000 is a very light reduction indeed. I do not at all hesitate to say that I expect to make that reduction on the 90 miles between Fort Moody and Emory's Bar, much more than that. There is another reason why it is obvious that we shall be able greatly to increase the reduction, and that is, that these estimates were based upon the cost of different things in British Columbia. Mr. Fleming's estimate of a year ago was based upon the condition of things in British Columbia at that time, when he placed it at $3,500,000 for 90 miles. At that time labor and everything that went in the construction of a railway were of a very costly character. We have ten years in which to construct that 90 miles; under the contract we are only obliged to build it by the time that the old line is built. Hon, gentlemen will at once see that when the labor is disengaged that is now occupied in the construction of the 127 miles west of Emory's Bar, we may fairly expect to be able to place under contract 690 miles at a very much lower estimate than Mr. Fleming would have been justified in making a year ago. I say, therefore, that in making a reduction of $4,750,000 on the amount of work to be constructed and handed over to the Company by the Government, I believe these figures will be found to be entirely safe, and that, instead of costing us $28,000,000, the amount to be paid by the Government detailed information already laid before the House, will warrant us in arriving at the conclusion that that estimate is not only a safe one, but that it is really the outside estimate of the amount of money to be paid by the Government. I will now advert to the central or prairie section, and then I have no hesitation in saying that, had we been compelled to come before Parliament this Session with an estimate, I would have been obliged, in the light of the year's experience, to say that in all probability I would have to increase that estimate. The hon. gentleman will see that, in the first place, it was supposed by my hon. predecessor that it was next to impossible to obtain the construction of a line in the direction that we are taking to the south of Lake Manitoba, and that the ravines and gulleys to be crossed were of a character to make it next to impossible to go in that direction without a very great cost. I think the hon. gentleman stated, more than once to the House, that by diverting the line to the south of Lake Manitoba we would not only increase the distance some thirty miles, but increase the cost to the country by $1,000,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE. That was the engineer's estimate.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I took what I supposed was s better means of forming a judgment than any that the hon, gentleman had, and that was to place 200 miles under

Mr. MACKENZIE. Of the easiest part.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think that, as far as the section of 100 miles is concerned, the report of Mr. Marcus Smith, who had made the location of that section, went to indicate that it was a fair sample of the work to be constructed. The hon. gentleman is, however, correct in saying that, taking the 200 miles together, it would be very much easier than the remainder of the line. We had the assurance of the engineer that we could get a favourable line in that direction, a line, at all events, if not so good in point of grades as that which the hon. gentleman had located by the narrows of Lake Manitoba, still one that would serve as a colonization road. I have already stated to the House that our intention was, finding ourselves compelled to go on with the construction of this road as a Government work, to go out upon the prairie and to open up the country with the cheapest description of road we could obtain. I dare say the House will remember the stringent criticism, and some of it well founded, to which my predecessor subjected that proposal, and he showed the House that there was a large amount of work to be done on the section of 100 miles, and he practically stated to the House that he did not believe it was possible for that work to be accomplished for anything like the figures for which the road was contracted for. This has proved to be correct, and the Government felt bound to offer this by competition, requiring that parties should, in the first place, deposit a cheque of $25,000, I think, as the evidence of their bona fides, and, in the second place, five per cent, upon the amount of the contract. When these stipulations were completed, the Government were obliged, of course, to place the work under contract; the result has been to satisfy me that it was utterly impossible for them to accomplish the construction of the work at anything like the figures they had undertaken. They were unable to carry the work forward, and the contract, as the hon. to Parliament this year in the position in which I stood last year, asking for public money to construct this as a Government work, it would have been my duty to revise my estimate for the central section. I have no hesitation in saying that while we should have been able, with the new light we have obtained, to reduce largely the cost of the construction of the line between Thunder Bay and Red to state to the House that, low as was the character of the which the Minister says he will be able to keep up the Sir Charles Tupper.

central section of the road—a simple colonization road; as I have admitted again and again to the House-it was necessary for me to ask for a very considerable increased estimate on that portion of road. It was not necessary, however, that I should deal with that branch of the question, because, under the contract which has been laid on the Table of the House, all the risk, all the responsibility, and all the cost connected with the construction of that portion devolve upon the Company with whom the contract was made. The fullest possible information that I have been able to supply from the data within my possession, has been given to the House; but whatever yet remains will be supplied. I make these explanations in reply to the very lengthened address of the hon. gentleman, and I must express my regret that he has not been more easily satisfied than he has with the information I have submitted. I will endeavor, however, to supplement that with such further information as the department can supply, and as may be made available for the present discussion. But if this resolution is allowed to pass in its present form, it must be with the proviso the hon. gentleman has himself made; that we shall furnish all the data we can without causing any further delay.

Mr. McLENNAN. I have listened with great pleasure to the statements made by the hon. leader of the Opposition. Any new light we can obtain on this question is highly acceptable. I am not disposed to harp at any conditions that are attached to an enquiry of this kind, but, perhaps, the House will agree with me, that the skill and ingenuity of the hon. leader of the Opposition was very clearly marked in the final generous proposition which he threw across the floor at my hon. friend the Minister of Railways. It was to the effect that these enquiries were not made with the view of discussing any change of policy, but of pointing out the importance of ascertaining—what? The means by which a charge might possibly be formulated. I have listened with still greater pleasure to the explanations of the hon. Minister of Railways, and I think it must be very gratifying to this House that at every stage of this discussion, in every new statement, every new estimate made, we find that we can build the road more cheaply than we had thought before, and without any deterioration in the character of the road. So that magnificent rule of three which has been formulated so ingeniously nearly produces nothing. We continue to be assured that we shall have a first-class railway upon the basis of any or all of the estimates which are put before us. I am glad to hear from the hon. Minister, that he is in hopes of coming before us at a later stage with still further reduced estimates, and I think the House and the country will forgive him for any length he chooses to go in that direction, within the condition that he will give us a good

Mr. BLAKE. It is extraordinary with what different ears we hear on the two sides of this House. I certainly did not hear the hon. Minister declaring, except with reference to the line between Red River and Thunder Bay, that he was about to give us a line not inferior in character to that which has been formerly projected. If the hon. member does intend to say that the other sections to be constructed are to be equal in character to those which, in earlier days had been projected, and had been the standard of construction up to that time, I shall be very glad to know gentleman knows, has been cancelled. If I had come back it. But that would be in contradiction of everything the Minister of Railways has written and stated on that subject to this moment. The member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) believes that he heard him say that this reduction in the cost was to be effected without alteration in the character of the road. Both the Minister's own statement last Session. his letters to the engineer, and the estimate of the engineer, all point to alterations, impairing the character of the road. River, on the other hand, I should have been obliged frankly I except the portion from Thunder Bay to Selkirk, upon character of the road as to grades and curves, though the character of the structures is, to some extent, inferior. I did not say or imply that I wanted this information for the purpose of making any charge against the Government.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did not understand you to do 80.

Mr. BLAKE. I said expressly I did not mean to make or imply any charge of impropriety in regard to altering the character of the road; but I said I thought that the country was interested in knowing what the real change was in the efficiency of the structure we were to get at the reduced price—which I still think a very reasonable demand, although every person in the House does not appear to agree with that view. The Minister of Railways objects to my inquisitiveness, saying that he gave me very important information already. But no information produced at all indicates what the grades and curves are to be in the British Columbia section, or were to be on the 200 miles west of Red River; and we do not know, in these important particulars what the modifications were to be. We knew the grades were to be deeper and the curves sharper—that was told us before the Session; but we did not and do not know what the grades and curves were to be while a close estimate was made on the 2nd April last, by the late engineer and another by the present engineer, since that time Ministers must know what the present standard of grades and curves is, and there should be no great difficulty in telling us the facts. However, it is of great consequence to get early all the information procurable. I think it is important to get all asked in the motion. I hope the hon. gentleman will not find I have asked for too much, for more than his own engineers Mr. Smith and Mr. Cambie gave him, with reference to the British Columbia line, as it was then proposed to be constructed. Why should we not have the information now, as it was given then. I think the motion reasonable, and that we should have expected the information without any demand, for our assistance as an element in the discussion. I am glad to know the hon. gentleman will give us, early, all he can get, and hope we shall obtain the rest at some time or other, not distant, as even then it would be interesting as a relict of the past.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is quite correct in saying that I confined my statement to the maintenance of a first-class road between Thunder Bay and Red River. At the same time, I am prepared to state that the road in British Columbia, as now going on, and in conformity with the contracts originally made, will, I think, be a very good and sufficient line for all the traffic that will require to be carried.

Mr. BLAKE. I believe that.

SIT CHARLES TUPPER. I will relieve the mind of the hon gentleman and the House, when I state that there will be no curve on the British Columbia section sharper than any on the Intercolonial, and no grade heavier than on this road.

Mr. BLAKE. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say there is not a very bad grade on the Intercolonial?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not; but I can say it is a first-class road.

Mr. MACKENZIE. It is not. The hon. gentleman knows there is a grade on the Intercolonial under 700 feet radins.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is, nevertheless, a first-class road.

Mr. MACKENZIE. No; that portion will have to be rebuilt when there is any great traffic.

first class roads in the United States with sharper curves to have the work of preparing them any further extended, and steeper grades than the Intercolonial possesses, and which are not only regarded as first class roads, but accommodate an enormous volume of traffic.

Mr. PLUMB. Yes; the Hudson River road, between Albany and New York, has steeper grades, and it is considered a first-class railway.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will submit information, apparently not covered by the motion, including the additional correspondence, which will embrace all the surveys not yet laid before the House.

Motion agreed to.

STEEL RAILS.

Mr. BLAKE moved for a statement showing the quantity of steel rails and fastenings bought by the Government in 1879, and average price thereof, together with statement of interest on such price from date of payment at the rate at which part thereof are to be conveyed to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company; the quantity already delivered and the dates of such delivery, and dates at which undelivered are due; the quantity already used by the Government, and quantity required for completion of the Government part of the railway; the quantity which will remain for conveyance to the Company and the price thereof according to contract as of its date 21st October, 1880; the market value of such last mentioned quantity on the average prices for each of the months of September and October, 1880, and on the price of 21st October, 1880.

Mr. PLUMB. There are one or two omissions in this motion which, I presume, occurred through inadvertence, and, before the motion is adopted, I beg to supply those omissions by proposing the following amendment:

That the motion be amended by adding to it the following words:-That the motion be amended by adding to it the following words:—
"And also a statement showing the quantities of rails and fastenings purchased by the Government in 1874, 1875 and 1876, showing the price thereof and the interest on such purchases from the date of each purchase until the said rails and fastenings were used on the Canadian Pacific Railway or elsewhere, and showing also how and where such rails and fastenings were used, what quantity remains unused, and the place or become such remainder is stored." places where such remainder is stored."

I think that in getting the information called for by this resolution, it will be desirable at the same time to have embodied in the report the information which I ask for, and I trust the House will be in accord in the view that this amendment should be adopted. There have been, as this House well knows, several purchases of steel rails in regard to which the public interest has been shown; and it is desirable in matters of this kind to avoid, as far as possible, multiplicity of documents and reports. I have no doubt, therefore, that the hon. gentleman will consent to the amendment, and perhaps it was through inadvertence that he did not insert in his own resolution a request for the information of such importance for the purposes of comparison as I ask for in my amendment. There are purchases of rails, and we like, when we get information of this kind, to have all the information that can be elicited by a resolution of this House.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. In furtherance of the laudable object which the hor. member for Niagara has in view, I would move that this resolution be further amended by requesting, that to the motion be added:

"And also the several quantities of steel rails bought since the 1st January, 1877, together with the prices thereof."

If it is desirable to have any additions to the returns, let us go back to a reasonable time, ten years back, and then we will have all the information together.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. As the duty of making these Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I could name half a dozen returns will devolve upon myself, I am not very anxious otherwise it might be well to go back to the period when the rails were purchased for the Intercolonial, as I think we can afford to have that period reviewed. However, I do not now intend seriously to make that suggestion. The information will of course be given, but I may tell the hon. gentleman that it will not establish the point which the hon, gentleman has in view-namely, that a great deal of consideration has been shown to the Company by allowing them to purchase a large quantity of steel rails when they could be purchased at a very low price. Of course, it is well known that the Government were fortunate enough to secure 50,000 tons of steel rails at exceptionally low prices-about 11,000 for the Intercolonial, and 39,000 for the Canadian Pacific. The rails were not all delivered, as it was not necessary to have them delivered promptly; they are not on this side of the Atlantic. The Government requiring between 7,000 and 8,000 tons in British Columbia, for the purpose of constructing the line there, directed that the rails remaining in England should be shipped to British Columbia, and there will be but a small quantity of rails, if any, which the Company would have an opportunity of receiving by paying the costs and charges. also, that there is a considerable amount of property which we shall require them to take over, as the Government would not require it, and we shall not expect to be dealt with too closely in that regard. I do not think that any real loss would have been incurred by the Company being allowed to pay the Government the amount which the rails cost, including interest and all other charges.

Mr. BLAKE. I have no objection to my hon. friend from Centre Huron, and my hon. friend from Niagara, obtaining the information which they desire, but if there is to be great delay in bringing down the return, encumbered by these amendments, if it involves so much labor as the Minister seems to expect, I trust he will, at any rate, expedite the preparation of my part of the return as much as possible. The information which is sought is not desirable merely for the purpose of political controversy, in which the member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) is so fond of revelling, but it is germane to the question which is now occupying so largely the attention of the House and the country; it bears materially on one of the terms of the bargain we are asked to sanction, and that is the reason why I seek for the information. I trust the return will be brought down as speedily as possible.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not think it will occupy much time in preparation.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). My hon. friend from West Durham asks for information which is not in the possession of the Government, officially. The motion requires information as to the market value of steel rails in England, a matter upon which, I suppose, the Government have not any authentic information. Such information could only be in the form of facts or documents within the official cognizance of the Government; and, perhaps, in order to get it they may have to issue a Royal Commission or take some other official steps to make certain what is now uncertain.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think we shall have to ask some gentleman to go to England to get accurate information.

Mr. BLAKE. I have no doubt the hon member would go himself, if he thought for a moment what the market value of rails was in September or October.

Mr. CAMERON, (Victoria). But that would not be information within the power of the Government.

Mr. BLAKE. I know the hon, gentleman is more powerful than the Government, but I am surprised that the Government have not discovered the fact.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Mr. PLUMB. I trust the information sought by the motion will be brought down as soon as possible. My hon. friend the member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) says that I revel in political controversy. My hon. friend might perhaps have taken a share of that remark to himself, and apportioned a great deal of it to the hon. gentleman beside him (Sir Richard J. Cartwright), who proposed the further amendment.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

THE PACIFIC RAILWAY CONTRACT.

Mr. BLAKE moved for any statement or estimate which was made by or on behalf of the Government prior to the making of the Canadian Pacific Railway Contract, of,—(1). the value to the Company of the cession of the Government rails and fastenings at cost and interest; (2) the value to the Company of the right to admission free of duty of the materials required for the construction or equipment of the Railway and Telegraph Line; (3) the value to the Company of the perpetual exemption of the Railway and all stations, station-grounds, workshops, buildings, yards, and other property, rolling stock, and appurtenances required for the construction and working thereof, and of the Capital Stock of the Company, from taxation by the Dominion, new Provinces or Municipalities therein; (4) the value to the Company of the exemption from taxation of their lands in the North-West Territories until they are either sold or occupied for 20 years after the grant thereof from the Crown.

FOOD SUPPLY OF INDIANS.

Mr. MILLS moved for a statement shewing in what parts of the North-West Territories there has been a total failure of the usual supply of the food on which the Indians subsist: what it is that has so failed; how many Indians in consequence of this total failure have been dependent upon the Indian Department for the means of subsistence; the kind of supplies furnished; from whom purchased; where purchased; whether by private contract or by public tender; the amount paid for each kind; the quantity; the amount paid for freight; to whom paid; from what places and to what places carried; and the amount paid for distribution. He said: My reason for asking for information is the very broad statement that has been put into the mouth of His Excellency, namely, that there has been an entire failure of the usual supply for Indians in the North-West Territory. As there are 30,000 Indians in that district, and as we know what it costs to feed them for a season, and as we have the broad statement that there has been an entire failure of the supply, it becomes a very serious matter. To furnish the means of subsistence for 30,000 people implies an expenditure that would absorb a very considerable portion of the revenue of Canada. I think that we are entitled to the fullest information on that subject. It may be that the expenditure has not been due so much to the failure of the supplies of the Indians over that large territory, as it is to a want of the facilities of transportation, or perhaps it may be to the want of capacity in those who are employed in that particular business. There is nothing, perhaps, connected with the Administration of the Government about which it is more important to have explicit information, for there is nothing that so largely depends upon the fidelity and energy of those who are charged with the administration of Indian affairs. I think myself that the probability is, that that statement was somewhat too general in its character. In many parts of the country the Indians are largely dependent upon fish for means of subsistence, and if that has failed it is rather an extraordinary state of things. In other parts they are dependent upon the chase, and we have been informed that the herds of buffalos have returned, and consequently that the Indians are better off now than formerly. If this be the case, then the statement put into the mouth of His Excellency is hardly warranted by the facts. However, it is very important that we should have the information sought for at as early a period in the Session as it would be possible for the right hon, gentleman to bring it before the House.

Motion agreed to.

DISMISSAL OF INDIAN AGENTS.

Mr. MILLS moved for the correspondence relating to the dismissal of any Indian Agent or other officers connected with the management of Indian affairs in the North-West Territories.

Motion agreed to.

POST OFFICE AT DOMINION CITY.

Mr. SCHULTZ, in the absence of Mr. Royal, moved for a return of copies of all evidence taken before the Deputy Postmaster of Winnipeg, in the course of the present year, with reference to the grave complaints made against the management of the Post Office at Dominion City; also copy of the report of the said officer.

Motion agreed to.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS IN MANITOBA.

Mr. SCHULTZ moved for a return of all receipts from Government Railways in operation in the Province of Manitoba and the Territory of Kewaydin during the months of September, October and November.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of Mr. MILLS asked the hon, leader of the Government if he would bring without a motion all correspondence between this Government and the Government of Manitoba in reference to the enlargement of the boundaries of that Province. He also asked him whether the terms of the Bill which had been introduced into the Manitoba Legislature on the same subject had been agreed to by the Government here.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have not read the Bill. I received a draft of a bill from Mr. Norquay, the Premier of Manitoba, which I have not yet been able to read, but I have not had my attention particularly drawn to the Bill now before the Legislature of that Province, though I have seen it mentioned in the newspapers. I fancy the measure to be introduced here will not accord in all respects with that measure

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

House again resolved itself into Committee for the further consideration of certain proposed resolutions for granting and appropriating twenty-five millions of dollars and twenty-five millions of acres of land in the North-West Territories, according to the contract relating to the Canadian Pacific Railway transmitted to this House by His Excellency the Governor General by his Message dated December 10th.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I desire to say a few words upon the important question before the Committee, and I shall endeavor to approach the question with all the earnestness that I can command. I listened to the speeches that were made upon both sides of the House with a good deal of attention, and especially to the speech made by the hon, gentleman who introduced the resolutions. I have also read the speeches which that hon. gentleman has made outside of the House, with an earnest desire to discover as far as possible the line of argument by which the Minister of Railways proposed to justify the contract for which he has invoked the sanction of Parliament. One is naturally curious to know what arguments can be brought forward in support of a contract containing such peculiar and extraordinary provisions, and granting such rights, privileges and franchises as the one now before the House. Before, however, endeavoring to analyze the arguments which have been advanced by hon. gentlemen opposite, I must say that I believe the Minister of Railways has made the best of a very bad case. He made a speech extending over five hours, during three hours of which we were favored with quotations from the speeches of the hon, member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), and the hon, member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), while only about an hour and a half was devoted to the hon. gentleman's own scheme. When we dissect the speech of the Minister of Railways, and sift the wheat from the chaff, when we analyze it fairly and honestly, we find that the hon. gentleman justifies this extraordinary contract on two grounds. He says, first, that the proposition he has submitted to Parliament is the best proposition that was ever submitted to Parliament—a proposition superior to the Allan contract, and to the proposition which was made by the hon, member for Lambton in 1874. Secondly, the hon. gentleman says that this bargain is the very best that the Government could make; and in order to show that the proposition of the Government is superior to the one submitted in 1873, or the one submitted by the hon member for Lambton in 1374, the hon, gentleman undertakes to compare the present contract with those schemes respectively. But, Sir, it does not appear to me that this is a fair line of argument. What might be considered a fair bargain in 1873 or 1874, a bargain in the interests of the country, might not be so considered in the year 1880; and, at all events, we are not now discussing the terms either of the Allan contract of 1873, or the scheme proposed by the member for Lambton in 1874. Good or bad, the Allan contract failed; the members of the Company failed to carry out its terms, and we are not now called upon to discuss it. We are now called upon to deal with a living contract,—the Tupper contract, the one we are now discussing,—and to say whether that contract is one which Parliament should ratify. Nor are we now ealled on to determine whether or not the terms proposed by the hon, member for Lambton for the construction of a trans-continental railway were in the interests of the country—that is the proposition made by the hon, member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) and sanctioned by Parliament; and in discussing the terms of this contract we must not only consider that time and circumstances are entirely changed, but that those propositions, whether good or bad, are not now open for discussion. The former propositions were never carried out, and what we have now to deal with is the vital and living question of whether the propositions made by the hon, the Minister of Railways are such as we ought to approve. Even if it were true, as a matter of fact, that the propositions now before Parliament are better than those embodied in the Allan charter, or better than those submitted by the hon. member for Lambton, that would not justify us in affirming the propositions now before the House. A period of six years has passed since the Mackenzie propositions were submitted to Parliament. The character and position of the country have entirely changed since then, and we are now face to face with a different class of circumstances. But, Sir, I deny that as a matter of fact, the present propositions are at all to be compared to those embraced in the Allan charter, or to those covered by the bill of my hon, friend from Lambton. My hon, friend from Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) took the same ground as was taken by the Minister of Railways; he undertook to analyze the Allan charter and the hon. member for Lambton's propositions, but he only dealt with what he was pleased to call the minor details of those schemes. I commend the judgment and the discretion of my hon. friend in touching lightly upon what he called the minor details, details which I consider of the first importance in the discussion of this question. I say that a comparison between those two schemes and the present one will show that the terms of this contract are infinitely worse for the country than the terms of the Allan contract or the Mackenzie proposals. Has the hon, the Minister of Railways or the member for Richmond and Wolfe taken the trouble to analyze the terms of the Allan charter? It contained many bad things which, I believe, were not in the interest of the country; but, as compared with this contract it was infinitely superior in every respect. I will trouble the House for a moment or two with a short analysis of the Allan charter and the proposals of 1874 and compare them with the present contract, as I consider it a matter of the first importance that the House and the country should understand the difference between the two, more especially as I observe that not only on the floor of Parliament, where the Minister of Railways' utterances are received with the attention to which they are entitled, but that, in his peregrinations throughout the country, he has taken precisely the same line, and declared that the terms of this contract were far superior to the terms of the Allan charter and the Mackenzie proposals-but on all occasions the hon, gentleman has carefully abstained from pointing out in what respect. The very first point in this contract is also the first one in the Allan charter, and that is the character of the road. What did the Allan contract say of the kind of road we were to get for our money, and then what does this contract say on the same subject? You will find that under clause 9 of the Allan charter, it is provided:

"That the railway shall be constructed and equipped according to specifications to be hereafter agreed upon between the Governor and the Company, and that the materials of, and manner in which the several works forming part thereof shall be constructed, and the mode of working the railway, or any part thereof, including the description and capacity of the locomotive engines and other rolling stock for working it shall be such as may be hereafter agreed upon between the Government and the Company."

Is there any clause of that kind in the contract we are asked to ratify? In bald words we are told that the road is to be built after the standard of the Union Pacific Railway. as it was when first constructed. There is not a word in the contract about the work being constructed upon specification to be provided by the Government, and there is not a word in it about the work, materials, mode of construction, and the locomotives being of such a class and character as shall be agreed upon between the Governor in Council and the Company. Everything under the contract we are now asked to ratify depends upon the condition of the Union Pacific Railway when it was first constructed. Upon that point there is a difference of opinion that I shall discuss here-Mr. CAMBRON (Huron).

the other case everything is in the hands of the Company itself, without any supervision or control by the Government. Parliament or the people, taking the Union Pacific when first constructed as the standard. Yet the member for Richmond and Wolfe and the Minister of Railways declare that in every respect this contract is equal to, if not superior, to the Allan contract. There is another very important point in which the Allan contract, in my judgment, is far superior to this one. The same clause of the Allan contract provides:

"That in order to establish an approximate standard, the Union Pacific Railway is selected as the standard, but in a general way only, and not with respect to any minor details in its construction or working which may be found objectionable. Nor with respect to alignment and grades, which shall be as favorable as the nature of the country will admit of without undue expenditure."

Under the Allan contract not only were the minor details in the hands of the Government, but the grades, alignment and curves were to be, not after the standard of the Union Pacific Railway, but such as would receive the sanction of the Governor in Council. Under the present contract everything is left in the hands of the Syndicate, with the simple stipulation that the Canadian Pacific Railway shall be constructed after the standard of the Union Pacific Railway as it was when first constructed, which, I contend, was upon the 10th of May 1869, and I shall endeavor to show this fact and what its condition was then. The hon. Minister of Railways tells us that this contract is superior to the Allan contract, and that it is the best that was ever submitted to Parliament. Let us examine still further and see if the hon. gentleman is correct. The Allan contract provided ample security for the completion and equipment of the work. Hon gentlemen opposite tell us that in the present case that point is of no consequence, that these men will go on and complete the work. The hon, member for Richmond and Wolfe discussed this point at length. He told us they will build the eastern section because they will make a profit out of it. will build the western section because they will make a profit out of it; but the hon, gentleman forgot to point out the immense profit they would make out of the central section, and that it rested entirely in their own hands as to whether they should pocket the millions they could make out of the central section and abandon the eastern and western sections altogether, and that the only security the country had for the completion of the eastern and western sections was the sum of $1,000,000. Under the Allan contract ample security was provided that the whole road should be completed and equipped. Cause three of that contract provided that the shareholders could not transfer their shares, and thus escape liability, until six years from the date of the charter. Is there anything of the kind here? On the contrary, under the Act of Parliament appended to this contract there is express provision that the moment this Company becomes incorporated, the personal responsibility of the shareholders ceases, and this fact the hon. Minister of Railways forgot to mention, both in his speeches in Parliament and to the country on this subject. This provision of the Allan contract was some guarantee that this road would be completed and equipped to the satisfaction of the Government and the country. Here there is no such guarantee. The Allan contract further provided that the capital of the Company should be $10,000,000, that only ten per cent. of that sum should be paid, and that the personal obligation of the stockholders for the other $9,000,000 should remain as a security for the final completion and equipment of the road. This contract does not offer any such security. It leaves it optional with the Company to abandon the eastern and western sections altogether; no sufficient guarantee is provided against that contingency; and yet the hon. Minister of Railways and the point there is a difference of opinion that I shall discuss here hon, member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) tell us after. In the one case the work is under the direct control of that this is the best contract ever submitted to Parliament. the Governor in Council, or in other words, of Parliament, in | There are other discrepancies between these two contracts to which I wish to refer. Clause ten of the Allan contract provided that when each twenty miles of the railway was completed the Company were bound to work the same for the conveyance of freight and passengers. They were bound to work it effectually and in the public interest. I very much doubt if, under clauses seven and eight of this contract, the Company are bound to work the road at all, until the whole of it is completed. Then as to the lands, you will find that the Allan contract made ample provision for the encouragement of settlers in the North-West. Clause fourteen provided that the Company were to get 50,000,000 acres of land in alternate blocks 20 miles in depth on each side of the main line, and not less than 6 nor more than 12 miles in width. If any of the alternate blocks to which the company were entitled, were unfit for settlement, they were still bound to take at least one mile in depth and 12 miles in width on each side of the railway. Under this contract, the Company are the sole judges of the kind of land they are to get, and where they are to get it. They alone have the selection. If they find 20 or 30 acres of alkaline land or muskeg, they may refuse the whole section and select elsewhere at their option in the fertile belt. And yet, the hon. Minister of Railways tells us this is the best contract ever submitted to Parliament, although in this very essential element it falls far short of giving the protection afforded by the Allan contract to the settlers and the country. The Allan contract also provided that the Company were bound to take their 50,000,000 acres, of fair average quality of the land, in the section of the country best adapted for settlement, and were not permitted, as this contract permits the Syndicate, to take the best lands from the belt first, and then select wherever they choose elsewhere for the remainder of their grant. By clause sixteen of the Allan contract it was provided that the price of the land should, from time to time, be decided between the Government and the Company, according to the price that could be obtained for such lands without obstructing the settlement of the country. Surely that was a wise provision; but there is no such provision in this contract. The construction of the railway there was not the only object had in view. What is the use of the railway unless we get settlers there? And if the terms of this contract are such as to retard the settlement of the country, then I say this contract ought not to be affirmed. Under the Allan contract, the surveys were to be paid as part of the sui sidy; under this contract the Government pays the cost of the surveys. Under the Allan contract the Company got the right of way over the lands, and the right of way only; under this contract the Company get a great deal more—they get their roadbed, the lands for their station-houses, the lands for their workshops, the lands for their dockyards, and lands for other appurtenances. As if the Government had not given them enough under specific terms, the Government added another clause to give them other appurtenances, and that without limit. There is no limit to the quantity of land they are to get for these purposes; and yet, hon. gentlemen tell us, and it was stated in the country by the hon. Minister of Railways, that this is a better contract, by far, than the Allan contract. Besides all this, there are many things in this contract that were not in the Allan contract at all—things which my hon. friend from Richmond and Wolfe forgot to mention. In the Allan contract there was nothing said about admitting to the country all the supplies required for the road and all the materials used in the road free of duty. In the eyes of my hon. friend this may be a small matter, but in the eyes of the Syndicate it amounts to exactly $5,000,000. In the Allan contract there was no monoply of the right to construct branch roads south of the Pacific Railway. The monopoly of the carrying trade was not in the Allan contract; here it is, and here in such a way that even the power of Parliament cannot rectify the wrong if this contract receives the sanction of Parliament. Hon. members opposite do not think this of much importance. I think if they sit down and figure it out they will find it of very considerable importance. The lands were not exempt from taxation in the Allan contract, nor were the rolling stock and capital stock; they are all exempt from taxation in this contract. Under the Allan contract the company had not the power to select the land wherever they saw fit; the Government had a voice in the matter. Here the Company select where they see fit; the Government have no voice in the matter; and yet the Minister of Railways says in Parliament, and out of it, that this contract is far superior to the Allan contract—that it is the best that has been laid on the Table of the House or proposed to Parliament, and he appeals to his followers today, and his followers heartily respond, and say that it is the best contract ever submitted to the House, when a fair comparison of the two contracts would convince any disinterested man that the terms of the Allan contract, bad as they were, were not as bad as the terms of this contract. But that is not all. The hon, gentleman goes a step further, and says that the terms of this contract are not only superior to the terms of the Allan contract, but to the proposals submitted to Parliament by the hon, member for Lambton, and embodied in the Act of 1874. If that were true, and I submit to the House that it is not true, it would afford no justification for the proposition which the Minister of Railways has submitted to Parliament. Let us for a moment compare this contract with the proposition made by the hon, member for Lambton, and bear in mind that they were only propositions-propositions submitted to Parliament under the Act introduced by the hon, member for Lambton. His Government took to itself the power of constructing this railway in the way pointed out in the Statute, but they were merely propositions after all, not of a binding character as these are. We are told we have to accept there as they stand, good, bad or indifferent; no modification, no changes. Good or bad, we have to accept them. Let us for a moment compare this contract with the terms of that Act, and see if the hon. gentleman's statement is correct, that this is the better of the two. Now, let us take the very first ground presented in all the schemes— the standard of the railway. It may be said this is a matter of small importance, but I say it is a matter of prime importance, because, if you take the standard of the Union Pacific Railway, on the 10th of May, 1869, and give us a road of that character, then you have an inferior road-a fourthclass road. Take it as it was in 1873, and you have a road somewhat better, but still a bad road; take it as it was in 1874, and it is somewhat better still, but by no means a good road; but between the 10th of May, 18.9, and the 1st of October, 1874, the Union Pacific Railway Company spent upon their road something in the neighborhood of $10,000,000, to make it anything like a road, that freight and passengers could be carried over with any degree of safety or promptitude. Therefore, it is important that the period when the Union Pacific Railway was first constructed should be already settled, in order that we may understand the kind of road we are getting. It is important, especially in view of the fact that the other portions of the road that are being constructed by the Government are to be first-class roads—that this road, for which the country, in my judgment, is paying an enormous sum of money, should be something more than a fifth-class road, should be better, at all events, than the Union Pacific Railway was on the 15th of May, 1869. Therefore, if I take up sometime in discussing this standard, it is because it is important and I wish to impress its importance upon the House and country. In the Act of 1874, section 6, the following provision is made:-

capacity of the locomotive engines and other rolling stock, shall be such as may be determined by the Governor in Council."

Sir, there the Company have not a word to say, not a syllable. They are not made the sole judges. The Union Pacific Railway is not adopted as the standard; it is left entirely to the Governor in Council, in other words, to Parliament, in other words to the people of the country, to whom Parliament and the Government are responsible, and the mode of construction, the materials to be used, the kind of road to be built, the rolling stock to be used on the road, are all in the hands of the Government in Council. Here there is nothing of the kind. The Government in Council have not a word to say in the matter. Their mouths are closed, their hands are tied, and it is left entirely in the hands of the Company—practically, absolutely and substantially in the hands of the Company—to say the kind of road they are to give us for the enormous concessions we are making to them. And yet, we are told by the Minister of Railways and the member for Richmond and Wolfe, and the Minister of Public Works, that this is the best contract that was ever submitted to Parliament; that it is better than the proposition submitted in the Bill of the member for Lambton, and better than any other proposition presented to Parliament for the building of this great trans-continental railway. Is that all? No. The Minister of Railways tells us it is the best contract Parliament could possibly make. How does he know that? How does the House know it? Did he give the country an opportunity of judging whether it is or not? Did he give contractors an opportunity of tendering for the work, or of coming to the Government and saying, we will undertake its performance? Let us know your propositions—your concessions. Not at all. Secretly, behind the back of Parliament and without the knowledge of the people's representatives, the hon, gentleman signs this contract and affixes his official seal, without the authority or sanction of Parliament. He contents himself by telling us it is the best contract ever submitted to Parliament and the best the Government could do. How do we know that? The Government has refused the people's representatives in Parliament, and the people themselves an opportunity of pronouncing upon the character of the other proposals and schemes. They refused to give us material upon which an opinion could be formed. They simply asked us to take their word that this was the very best bargain that could be made. So far as I am concerned, though in some things I may have faith in the hon. Minister of Railways, on this question I have very little faith in him. I want to have the material before me on which to form an opinion. But the Government refused to give the people, refused to give the representatives of the people, an opportunity of judging whether or not this was the best offer that was made and the best bargain that could be made. The Government refused to submit it to the people. They refused to submit their scheme to public competition. They did not tell the public, as they ought to have told the public: "We want to build this railway; there are our grants; here are our concessions; give us a tender for the contract." No; the hon. gentleman enters into a secret contract with this Company, and then boldly asks Parliament to ratify his action. Not so did the hon. member for Lambton discharge his duty to the public. Under the propositions of the hon. member for Lambton, the case was entirely different. The lands were to be set apart, but without the exemption privileges and advantages given under this contract to the Company; and above all, the public were to have an opportunity of judging in regard to the work, because he provided in clause eight, sub-section one, that every contract should be submitted to tender. If that had been done here, we should not have the same ground of complaint. It does not rest with the hon. Minister of Railways to say this is the best that could be done when he did not give the public an lof the road. We know what that means. Mr. CAMERON (Huron).

opportunity of tendering for this work on basis of the subsidies, grants, advantages, privileges, immunities and franchises given under this contract. Under the proposition made by the hon member for Lambton, it was provided that the lands should be in alternate sections of twenty square miles on the line of railway, or at a convenient distance therefrom, each section having a frontage of not less than three miles nor more than six miles on the line of the said railway, that twothirds of the quantity of land so appropriated should be sold by the Government at such prices as might, from time to time, be agreed upon between the Governor in Council and the Company, the proceeds thereof to be paid to the Company; the balance of the land to be conveyed to the Company and the land to be of a fair average quality; and when sufficient quantity could not be found in the immediate vicinity of the railway, as much as might be required to complete such quantity, to be appropriated at such otherplaces as might be determined by the Governor in Council. Now, there were important advantages and important reservations under these terms. In the first place, the Government reserved to themselves the control of two-thirds of those lands, the power of selling those lands, proceeds to be handed to them, and thereby had the power of encouraging immigration. They did not hand those lands over absolutely to a company, and they did not, above all things, give a direct inducement to a company to hold those lands from public occupation for a period of from twenty to to forty years, by exempting them from taxation, as is done under this contract. More than that. They provided that if the lands the company were to get could not be got within the railway belt, they were to be selected elsewhere by the Governor in Council. Had the Governor in Council a word to say on the subject under this contract? Not a word; and bear in mind that under the terms of the hon. member for Lambton's proposal, the Governor in Council was to be the sole judge as to where these lands were to be selected, while under the present contract they are absolutely left to the unrestricted choice of the Company, and not only that but the lands are to be conveyed to the Company with the direct inducement to hold them until, by the industry of the settlers of the North-West, they will have become immensely valuable. Under the proposal of the hon. member for Lambton there was protection for the settlers; under this, the Governor in Council abnegate their functions and hand over to this irresponsible Company the management, sale and prices of these lands. Yet the hon. Minister of Railways, with the coolness and apparent sincerity which so distinguish his utterances in this House and on the public platform, tells us this is the best contract ever submitted to Parliament, far better than either the Allan charter or the propositions made in 1874. On referring to the propositions of 1874, you will find another important element in the carrying trade of the world dealt with, to my mind, one of the most important elements open to discussion in connection with this matter, namely, the rate of freight for passengers, and goods. How was that disposed of in the Act of 1874. In clause 8, sub-section 8, the following tanguage is used:—
the Company, but to be run under such regulations as may, from time to time, be made by the Governor in Council, as regards the rates chargeable for passengers and freight, the number and description of trains to be run and the accommodation to be afforded for freight and passengers." Under the present contract, the rates for both passengers and freight are left completely under the control of the company. The only provision on this subject is that neither the Government nor Parliament can interfere until the Company have, at all events, realized out of the net earnings at least ten per cent. on the cost means that the Company can exact from the public rates up to at least $10,000,000 before Parliament can interfere, and we are told by the hon. Minister of Railways, the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) and the hon. Minister of Public Works, that, notwithstanding this clear point of divergence between the two proposals, this is the best that was ever submitted to Parliament. Another proposition contained in the Act of 1874, not in the present contract, is of the first importance in dealing with the question, that is the right reserved by the Government to acquire the road at any time. The Bill of the hon, member for Lambton provided that the Government could purchase the road or any part of it on payment of the cost of the road and ten per cent. less the money subsidy and the proceeds of the sales of the lands; and if these lands are as valuable as we now say they are, and as we would believe they are-if they are worth $5 an acre, as I believe they are—then, under this wise provision, the Government would ultimately not only acquire the road, but after charging against the cost of the road and the ten per cent., the money subsidy and the price realized for the land, there would be a balance coming to the Government. But in the contract now before the House, it is not only proposed to give the Syndicate the land and the money, but to hand over to them the road itself absolutely without reservation, without control or limitation, or the power of purchasing. The Company may harass the people of the North-West, they may exact extortionate or exorbitant rates; and the Government are powerless. More than that. Under the proposition of the member for Lambton the Government had power to suspend the work on any portion of the road; but there is no such provision in the bargain now before the House. it was provided in the scheme of the hon member for Lambton that the costs of the surveys, which are now estimated to be $3,500,000, should be part of the subsidy; but under this contract, in addition to all the other grants and privileges which I have pointed out, the cost of the surveys is to be paid by the Government. And over and above all this, the hon. member for Lambton di not propose that the materials used in the construction of the road were to be admitted free of duty; he did not propose that the Company should have a monopoly of the carrying trade of the North West, he did not propose that they should have untaxed all the lands required for roadbed, station and station ground, or water frontage; he did not propose that the plant, the capital invested, should be exempt from taxation for all time to come; he did not propose that this gigantic monopoly should have the selection of the best lands in the North-West Territories. I think that anyone who makes an honest comparison between the two schemes must candidly admit that, while in the Mackenzie contract there was some protection for the country, some safeguard for the people, in the present contract there are none. Sir, I now desire refer to another argument employed by the hon. Minister of Railways, an argument which I think was scarcely a fair one. The hon, gentleman in discussing this question, makes no allowance for the difference in the condition of affairs between 1874 and 18-0, for the increase in value of the lands, and the general development of the country between 1873 and 1880. In 1873 there was no access to the country; the St. Paul and Manitoba Railway was not constructed, and not a dollar had been expended on the road between Thunder Bay and Selkirk; and outside of what is now the important City of Winnipeg there were scarcely any settlers other than Indians who roamed over the plains. And when we have spent enormous sums of money in acquiring the country to getting access to it, and developing its services and making the land valuable, we are asked to hand over all these benefits to should not the country receive the benefit of the increased matter that in 1:62 and 1864, the United States Government value of the land, when that increased value is the result of the expenditure of the people's money? I now wish to touch for a moment upon some of the objectionable features of the contract. The hon, member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) said, in dealing with this branch of the subject, that he would touch lightly upon some of these features. I commend the hon. gentleman's discretion in deciding to touch them lightly, for I think it would be searcely safe for him to touch otherwise than very lightly upon such extra-ordinary propositions. And first, there is the question of standards. I know there is a difference of opinion upon this subject, as to the time and mode of construction, and it shall be my endeavor, if possible, to set that difference of opinion at rest. Why, let me ask, should there be any doubt upon a question of such importance as this? Why, in the propara-tion of this contract, was there any room left for doubt? It is said by one hon, gentleman that it is the Union Pacific as it was on the 1st October, 1-74, that is to be the standard of construction for this road, while another hon. gentleman says that the standard is that of the Union Pacific as it was when first constructed, namely, on 10th May, 1809. Why, I repeat, should there be any room for doubt upon the matter? Surely the hon, Minister of Railways could have selected out of his own exhaustless vocabulary a few plain words, which, if they had been inserted in this contract, would have settled the matter beyond a doubt. I as-ume that the hon. Minister of Justice had something to do with drawing the contract, as it naturally belongs to his departmentthough on the face of it, I must say, it bears little evidence of having been drawn by skilful hands—why could not he have chosen a few simple words from his more limited vocabulary which would have set the matter at rest, and avoided long discussions in Parliament, and long and expensive litigation before the Courts, in order to settle what period of the Union Pacific was meant by the words "when first constructed." But to show the utter carelessness, the wanton recklessness with which the Government appear to have entered into the bargain, allow me to point out that the Minister of Railways himself did not know what was in the contract, and was ignorant of what he was committing the country to. He assumed, in the first place, that the standard of the road was the same as that provided for in the Allan contract, and it was only when he was brought to book for so assuming, contrary to the fact, by the hon. member for West Durham, that the Minister in charge of this great work discovered that the road was not to be built upon that standard, but by a much inferior one, namely, the Union Pacific road as it was on the 10th May, 1869. But why could not the hon Minister of Railways, with his usual astuteness, have made the Union Pacific, as it was in 1874, the standard by which this road was to be built? I by no means admit that the Union Pacific at that date was a good road, or that it would be a safe and proper standard, but surely the difficulty could have been got over by a few simple words, stating clearly what the real standard was to be. The hon, member for North Victoria (Mr. Cameron) said that the Union Pacific, as it was in 1874, must be taken as the standard, but this is clearly not the case; but the Minister of Railways should have put the matter beyond controversy. That he does not do. He does not say the Union Pacific Railway as constructed or as finally completed, shall be the standard, but he uses the words, "the Union Pacific Railway as first constructed," and that, in my judgment, puts the matter beyond the shadow of a doubt, and you must go back to the railroad when it was first constructed, and that was in May, 1869. Now, I propose to show that the words the hon, gentleman has used in this contract brings us back to the 10th May, 1869, at which time the Union Pacific was first constructed, and we must take that road, at that time. as the standard by which the Canadian Pacific Railway is an independent company irresponsible to Parliament. Why to be built. It is known by those who have examined the made grants of land and money to the Union Pacific, the Central Pacific, and the Southern Pacific Railways; that these grants involved considerable expenditure, $16,000 a mile, from Omaha to the base of the Rocky Mountains; $48,000 a mile for the 150 miles through the Rocky Mountains; $32,000 a mile for the road located between the Rocky Mountains and the Sierra Nevada Mountains; $48,000 a mile for the 150 miles through the Sierra Nevada Congress by the same Act donated 12,800 Mountains. acres per mile for the construction of these roads. A reference to the Act of Congress will show that these companies were entitled to get their subsidy in money and lands as each section of twenty miles was constructed, and that Congress had the power of appointing Commissioners to examine and report upon the kind of road they were getting; and as soon as these reports were handed to Congress, the money and the land subsidy were handed over to the companies. The public documents of the United States show that on the 23rd of November, 1868, the Commissioners appointed by Act of Congress to examine and report upon the Union Pacific Railway from Omaha, 890 miles westward, reported as follows:-

And at that time, according to their report, there were 890 miles constructed out of the 1,038, the real length of the Union Pacific Railroad. The Commissioners further say:

"We will repeat here that the west-end of the track as we found and have considered it, is at the junction of Muddy Lake and Black's Fort, 190 miles from Omaha. We are aware the Railroad Company had not reported then the last 90 miles as ready for examination by the regular Government Commissioners."

You will find that on the 29th of January, 1868, the Presi dent of the Union Pacific Railway presented to Congress, as he was bound to do under the Act of incorporation, his report on the progress and condition of the road. Among other things he reported that the earnings of the road up to the 30th of December, 1867, were $1,864,000. If the road was not constructed there could be no earnings. then in running order, for the President of the Railway reported that $5,360,000 of United States bonds had issued that year for 335 miles of the road completed that year. On the 9th of March 1871, the President of the Union Pacific presented the financial report of that railway in which he stated :-

"That $5,360,000 of United States bonds had issued that year for 335 miles of the road completed; and that they had received seven per cent., bonds secured by mortgages on 12,000,000 acres of land."

Now, under their Act of incorporation they could not receive this money until the road was finally completed and taken off their hands by the Government. The President further reported that up to that time they had sold 292,900 acres of land, but under their charter they could not acquire the land, and of course could not sell it until the road was completed. Poor, in his "Manual of Railways," says that the road was completed on the 10th May, 1869, to the junction of the Central Pacific Railway,—on the 10th May, 1869,—when a continuous line across the continent was formed. I hope that the gentlemen on the other side of the House are now satisfied that the Union Pacific Railway, from Omaha to the junction of the Central Pacific Railway, was completed on the 10th of May, 1869. If they are not, I will give them further evidence. In the American Railway Manual of 1873, page 540, it is stated:

"Work was commenced in 1863, but the difficulty of procuring labor and material at that time seriously interfered with the pasquess of the contractors, and it was not until 1865 that the grading and bridging of 100 miles was completed, and the iron laid from Omaha to Fremont. After that time the road was open for traffic from point to point, with much greater rapidity than had ever been known before in the history of railways."

Mr. CAMERON (Huron).

In 1866, 265 miles of the road were completed; in 1867, 245; in 1868, 350 miles were completed; and in May, 1869, a junction was effected at Ogden with the Central Pacific Railway, forming a continuous line between the Atlantic and the Pacific of 1,038 miles. Are hon, gentlemen now satisfied that this road was first constructed on the 10th of May 1869? Are hon. gentlemen yet satisfied? No! Well I will try to convince them still further. My hon. friend from Victoria, who is an able lawyer, I suppose will be satisfied with the judgment of a court of last resort upon the subject. I hold in my hand one of the last volumes of the reports of the Supreme Court of the United States, where this point is discussed, and where, by a solemn judgment of that Court, the question is settled, and settled beyond a peradventure, that the Union Pacific Railway was first constructed on the 10th of May, 1869. The question arose in this way: Under the terms of the charter, and in consideration of the land and money subsidy, that company was bound to pay 5 per cent of the net earnings of the road to the United States Government to recoup them for the money advanced and the land granted. They were bound further to carry troops and munitions of war over that road for one half the ordinary price. In 1878 the railway company brought an action against the United States Government to recover a large sum of money for transporting troops over their road. The United States Government set up by way of defence, a claim by way of a set-off for 5 per cent. on the net earnings of the road to which they were entitled, under the charter, from the 10th of May, 1869 to 1874; and the company resisted that application on the ground that the road was not constructed until October, 1874. The matter first came up before the Court of Claims, and the Judge of that court decided that the road, having been finally completed on the 10th day of May, 1869, the Union Pacific Railway Company were bound to pay to the United States Government five per cent. on the net earnings of that road from the 10th of May, 1869, to the time the action was brought. As this is a question of the first importance, I am going to trouble the House by reading a clause or two from the judgment of the Court, in order to satisfy hon. gentlemen that this matter has been finally settled and carried beyond the region of discussion by a solemn judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States. The Judge says:

"In one sense, a railroad is never completed. There is never, or hardly ever, a time when something more cannot be done, and is not done, to render the most perfect road more complete than it was before. This fact is well exemplified by the history of the early railroads of the country.

"In the present case, we have for our guidance several clauses in the charter of the Union Pacific Railroad Company (the Act of 1862), in which the terms referred to are used, as well as the Acts of the parties in which the terms referred to are used, as well as the Acts of the parties in reference thereto. One of these clauses is in the fourth section of the Act, which contains an engagement on the part of the Government to grant certain sections of land to the company on the completion of a certain number of miles of its road.

"Reading these sections together, it seems hardly possible to conceive that the road 'completed,' in the last clause of the sixth section. has any other or different meaning from that which it has in the fourth and fifth sections; or that the five per cent. of the net earnings should not be demandable by the Government as soon as the whole line was completed, in the same manner in which any forty (or twenty) miles was to be completed in order to entitle the company to bonds. This conclusion is so obvious and self-evident that it hardly needs a word of argument to maintain it.

and self-evident that it harmy needs a word of the last section of the road (and indeed extending some fifty miles beyond the point of division, finally agreed upon between the Union and Central Pacific and Railroad Companies), was made on the 13th of May, 1869, and was in the words following:— Oliver Ames, being duly sworn, deposeth and saith that he is President of the Union Pacific Railroad. And in pursuance of the requirements of Sect. 4 of the Act of Congress, approved July 1st, 1862, entitled: 'An Act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean.' &c., he now states, under oath, that another section of eightya railroad and telegraph line, from the Missouri River to the Pacine Ocean,' &c., he now states, under oath, that another section of eighty-six miles, commencing at 1,000 mile and ending at 1,086 mile post, sompleted on the tenth day of May, 1869, making in all 1,086 consecutive miles of said road, beginning at the initial point on section 10, opposite wes ern boundary of the State of Iowa, as fixed by the President of the United States, and ending at a point 1,086 miles westward therefrom on the line designated by the maps of the said company on file in the the line designated by the maps of the said company, on file in the Department of the Interior, that have been completed and equipped in all Department of the Interior, that have been completed and equipped in all respects as required by the Act referred to, as he is informed by the engineer charged with the construction of said line, and as he verily believes to be true.

"The Court of Claims finds, as a matter of fact, that 'on the 10th of May, 1869, the last rail of the claimant's road was laid, and about a week afterwards the road was opened over the entire length to public use the second of the court of the second of the

for the transportation of passengers and freight, and for the service of the Government; and this service was from that time forward performed con-

"Similar reports were made by the Secretary of the Interior, as the successive sections were completed and reported on by the Commissioners, down to and including the 9th day of February, 1869, and were severally approved by the President, and the company received the subsidy bonds of the Government in accordance therewith."

Judge Strong of the Supreme Court says:

"I concur with the majority of the court in holding that the railroad was completed, within the meaning of the sixth section of the Act of 1862, on the 6th day of November, 1869. I concur, also, in the definition of 'net earnings,' as the term was used in that section.'

Here is a solemn judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States, holding that this road was completed in 1869, and yet the hon. Minister of Railways asks us to believe that it was not completed until the 1st of October, 1874. If that is the case, why did not the hon, gentleman set all these doubts at rest by inserting a clause to that effect in the contract? It is practically admitted by hon. gentlemen on the other side. that the Union Pacific Railway of 1869 was not such a road as we should get for the money and land we are giving; and so, in order to let themselves down easy, and to satisfy their grumbling followers and the grumbling country, the Government have stated, through the public press, and, I think, the Minister of Railways made the same statement, that they have a letter from the Syndicate acknowledging that the standard meant in the contract was the standard of the Union Pacific as it was in 1873. Is that document under the hand and seal of every member of this Syndicate? Is there such a document in existence? The hon. Minister of Railways finds that he has made a mistake, and he tries to correct his mistake by affirming the existence of this new official document. If the standard of the railway is to be the standard of the Union Pacific of 1873, this contract must be changed so as to make it agree with the new standard which the hon, gentleman has adopted, before it can be ratified with safety by Parliament. If we ratify the contract as it stands, the courts, when called on to interpret this contract, will not read the private letter of any member of the Syndicate in order to put a legal interpretation on the terms of the contract. They will base their construction of the contract on the contract and the Act of Parliament based on the contract just as they stand, and it is folly for the Minister of Railways to fancy that he can get rid of the effect of the words used in the contract by avowing his possession of a letter written to him by some member of the Pacific Syndicate before the ratification of the contract, varying the terms of the contract. I take it, therefore, that we must deal with this question just as it is now submitted to Parliament; and if the Union Pacific Railway as constructed in 1869 is to be the standard, let us see for a moment what that road was at that time. It is admitted on all hands that then the road was defective. I will show that it was bad in every sense, and that by documentary evidence. In a report of the Chief Engineer of the Union Pacific Railway, presented to Congress on the 1st of May, 1868, after 890 miles of the road had been completed and received off the hands of the Company by the Government of the United States, he states that for 22 miles the grades of the road were 60 to 70 feet to the mile, that for 24 miles the grades were from 70 to 80 feet to the mile, that for 18 miles they were 80 to 90 feet, and for some other portions 90 to 100 feet, and that for a certain other portion they were 100 to 116 feet per mile, and yet that is the road that we are expected to take in consideration for these enormous grants and other concess between the 1st January, 1874, and the close of August, cessions that we are to make to this company. That is not all. After this road was taken off the Company's hands, a Commission was appointed by the United States Government to investigate and examine the condition of this road. On December 21st, 1869, they reported that the road-bed in many places was too narrow, several of the bridges were too light, especially in their suspension rods, and that they were utterly unfit for the transport of heavy trains; that the tunnels were arched with wood work, and would have to be replaced shortly; that the ballasting in many places was defective, that the grade for sixteen miles was 80 feet to the mile at a place called Eagle Canyon, at Hazard Point 80 feet to the mile, at Bufort there were six miles 80 feet to the mile, at Bitter Creek the grade was 90 feet to the mile, at Echo Canyon and down to the valley of the Great Salt Lake 90 feet to the mile; and yet, Sir, this is the kind of road that the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House are willing that the country should get as the great Pacific Railway. The Minister of Railways will still further find, in the condensed American Encyclopedia, page 219, a statement to the effect that the "gradients do not generally exceed 80 feet in the mile," very moderate indeed, "though in one instance they reach 90 feet in the mile, and in one instance 116 feet in the mile." That is not all. Another Commission was appointed by the United States Government, to investigate and report on the condition of that road, of which one of them, a Mr. Brooks, was the Government Director of the Union Pacific Railway. It is charged that the Government Director and others of the Commission were bribed to make a favorable report on the condition of the Union Pacific Railway, and that their report could not be relied upon, yet even that report says that the road was defective in construction and defective in the nature of the materials used. Another Commission was appointed by the United States Government, and that Commission in their report to Congress pointed out what would be required to put the road in anything like an efficient condition, and make it anything like a second class road. To change the position of the line and diminish the curvature, would take $200,000; completing embankments, $240,000; reducing the grades, $525,000; ballasting the road, $910,000, and so that Commission goes on pointing out the defects of the road, and what it would take to remedy them, until the total amount is given at, $6,489,000, before the road would be fit for its ordinary traffic. Now, I ask is it fair to the House and the country to take such a road as the standard after which the Canada Pacific should be built, a road for which we are giving such vast sums and enormous concessions? But that is not all. Rumor alleges that the Government have selected another standard now—that the Union Pacific Railway, as it stood in 1873, is to be the standard, and not as it was in 1869. I am prepared to show by the official documents submitted to Congress, that the road in 1873 was not an efficient one. But it does not rest in the mouth of the Minister of Railways to say, that the Union Pacific Railway as it was in 1873 is the standard, because he has already by this contract taken the Union Pacific as it was in May, 1869, when first constructed, as that standard. The United States Commissioners reported on 2nd December. 1874, that it would require $529,100 to put the railway track and ballasting in anything like good condition. This period is one beyond the time mentioned in the contract or in the private letter to which I have referred. At the time mentioned in the report, $529,100 was required to put the railway track of the Union Pacific in good condition, but in December, 1874, the company had not spent one dollar for that purpose. According to the same report it required $551,000 to put the bridging in good condition. The company expended for that purpose but $307,000 up to December, 1874, leaving a deticiency of $243,000 required to be thus spent. The Commissioners further reported that 1874, that is after the period fixed for the adoption of this road as the standard, 55 miles of 58 lb. rails were relaid, the cost of the rails and their transportation having been $271.552. Within the same period 567,307 and 47,892 hardwood ties were laid at a cost of $260,000. Thus, between those dates the company, in order to make the road even fairly passable, had to spend nearly two millions in replacing inferior with suitable ties, and making the road fairly passable. Further, between 1st January and 22nd December, 1874, ten bridges had to be changed at an enormous cost. Then, as to the condition of the road between January and December, 1874, we have it stated in the same report that the additions to the rolling stock, locomotives, and so forth, amounted to $116,750, the cost of six second-class passenger cars built at Omaha reaching $21,000. So, if the Minister of Railways will take the trouble to refer to the reports presented to Congress and printed by it, he will find that, in 1873 this Union Pacific Road, which is to be the standard of the Canadian Pacific, was wholly unsuited to the traffic intened to pass over it. Sir, this is not all I have to complain of in the first clause of the contract. How does the hon. gentlemen undertake to settle difficulties or dispute if one should arise between the Company and the Government, after the road is constructed? What machinery does he employ? Does he invoke the powers of the Courts? Does he say that, if a dispute should arise as to the kind of road to be constructed, as to whether the Company have complied with the terms of the contract or not, that dispute shall be settled, as all disputes should be, by the law courts of the country? The hon, gentleman has, in the city of Ottawa, a court created practically for the purpose of settling disputes of that kind. Does he invoke its power in case of any dispute under this contract? Not at all. An arbitration, of all things in the world, the hon gentleman has provided to settle such disputes. We have had a little experience of arbitrations during the past year or two, and know what the country has suffered by them. The arbitrators are to be thus selected: One of them is to be appointed by the Company, another by the Government, and a third by the two so appointed. We know perfectly well what that means, and who, and to what nationality the majority of these arbitrators will belong. This American Company will select an American as their arbitrator, and the chances are ten to one that the third arbitrator will be an American also. We know that all kinds of influences are brought to bear on the Administration of the day, no matter what Administration may be in power, to secure certain results. We know that every witness and every expert brought before the court so constituted for the purpose of settling difficulties that unquestionably will crop up between the Government and the Company, must necessarily be an American, because nobody else knew anything about the Union Pacific Railway in 1869. With a court so constituted, with the kind of evidence we must rely on, and with the Government handicapped from the outset, I want to know what the chances are in such a contest for the Government getting fair play or justice. We know, from the experience of the last two or three years, that great power and pressure are brought to bear constantly on the Government to induce it to do things no Government ought to do. We know that in the United States, in similar circumstances, not only courts so constituted but the high courts of the United States, were charged with being influenced by the pressure brought to bear on them from without in contests between the Government and these gigantic corporations. I will read to you the opinion of an able American on the danger of submitting to courts so constituted the rights of the people or the rights of the Government in the case of disputes between the Government and these corporation, wielding immense power and having millions of dollars at their disposal. A dis-Mr. CAMERON (Huron).

United States Government, with respect to carriage and transportation during the American Civil War. That dispute came up before one of the American Courts. What did the New York Central Railway Company do? They took care to have the case tried in one of the courts of the State of New York, and employed as counsel, one of the most prominent men in the State-a man that made judges there as hon, gentlemen opposite made them here, or as this Syndicate will make them, under this clause I am now discussing. They brought Senator Conkling down to argue their case before a court, created by himself and the Judge of which was named by himself. The American writer says:

"During the war, our Government, under the then existing tax-laws, collected from the New York Central Railroad about half a million dollars. The railroad company claimed this was unauthorized, raised certain legal points, brought suit to compel the Government to refund the amount, employed Senator Conkling as counsel, and was successful. The bearing of political influence upon this case was so obvious that it was commented upon at the time by several newspapers—among others by the Utica Observer as follows:—'Now, when Mr. Conkling went down to Canandaigna to try this railroad case, be carried with him a greater political influence than any other man in our State wields. He appeared before a Judge whom he had elevated to the Bench only a few months before. He confronted a District-Attorney who could not nold his office for a day if Mr. Conkling should demand his removal. He secured a verdict which the jury was forced to render by the rulings of the Judge. Under that verdict the railroad recovers a round half million, which it might have lost but for its shrewdness in employing the right man to prosecute its claim.'"

I commend the railway company for their shrewdness in employing the right man to prosecute their claims; but do hon, gentlemen opposite suppose that when vast interests are involved before this arbitration, this powerful Syndicate will not resort to the use of just the same manœuvres and the same tactics as were resorted to by the New York Central Railway? They may not have Senator Conkling to argue their case before this arbitration, but they will employ others possessed of similar influence to argue their case, men who have ready access to the powers that be, men who are entrusted with the rights of the people, men who owe a double allegiance—one to the country and one to themselves; and we know from the experience of the last two years in connection with these contracts, to which side their allegiance will be given. I a k again what expectation we can have that the Government will receive justice in a contest with the Syndicate handicapped as they will be under this contract, and with the political pressure and financial power this company will wield. There is another point to which I wish to draw the attention of the House. As I understand the terms of this contract—I may be mistaken in reading them, because some of them are very vaguely and loosely worded—the Syndicate have the practical monopoly of the construction of all railways south of the Pacific Railway, starting at or near it and running in any direction except southwest or westward of south-west. and then such railway must not run within the fifteen miles of the international border. This is a practical prohibition for twenty years upon legislation in this direction. Minister of Railways has practically undertaken to tie the hands of this Parliament, and to tie the hands of our successors for twenty years, in respect to the construction of railways in the direction I have indicated. Why, the hon. gentleman ought to know that he cannot do this. It may as well be understood at once that, if the Bill passes, the next Parliament that meets may repeal it. The next Parliament may cancel this contract and repeal this Act, but the hon, gentleman does not consider this. He is so wild and extravagant in his views that he undertakes, in so far as he can, to tie the hands of Parliament for the next twenty years, and practically for that time prohibit all railway legislation, without pausing to reflect that if another Parliament, looking at matters in a different light from the present, actuated by higher and different motives, should consider it in the interests of the country that there should be freepute arose between the New York Central Railway and the trade in railway matters, that there should be competition, and should they see fit to repeal the Act of Parliament and annul the contract, as has been done in the Mother Country, they have the right and the power so to do, what would be the inevitable result? The hon. gentlemen knows, and, indeed, he has hinted, what the result would be—a claim for damages. The hon, gentleman, perhaps, recollects what took place with regard to the Scottish Church. He knows that before the union of England and Scotland in 1704, the Scottish Church was established by law, and had a right to the patronage and the livings in Scotland. He knows that before 1690, by a contract entered into between the Government and the representatives of the Scottish Church, a contract, lay patronage was practically abolished, and the power of presentation to livings placed in the hands of the people. In 1690 an Act was passed by the Scottish Parliament confirming that agreement; and, after the union, so jealous were the Scottish people of the rights they had acquired under this contract and Act of Parliament that they induced the Imperial Parliament to pass an Act confirming that contract, the language used in the Act being that the Act should remain unchanged and unchangeable for all time to come. But the hon, gentleman knows that five years afterwards the Imperial Parliament, with new light on the subject and taking a different view of things, repealed that Act, notwithstanding the strong language employed in it. The hon, gentleman tables a contract; he asks Parliament to ratify it; he provides, by his contract and bill, that the hands of Parliament shall be tied for 20 years to come, though he knows perfectly well that Parliament may at any time repeal it, and without making any provisions for the conconsequence if it were repealed? An application to Parliament for damages by the Syndicate; and we all know what means and instrumentalities these companies use to accomplish their purposes. Perhaps they may appeal to the ears of a friendly arbitrator, and we know well how such cases are usually conducted, and how far arbitrators protect the interests of the Dominion; or perhaps they may appeal to the law courts of the land, and that means that we must pay exemplary damages, because we violated the absurd terms of a very absurd contract. There is one way of escape. Let us reject this contract, or, if this contract must pass, pass it shorn of its most objectionable, some of its most obnoxious features. There are one or two other points to which I wish to refer, though they have been touched upon by hon, members and notably by the hon. member for West Durham, who has dealt with them in his usual lucid and able manner. I am quite satisfied that if this contract goes into effect, the Syndicate will acquire powers which will be injurious to the best interests of this country. Not the least of these will be the powers they will acquire over the carrying trade of the country. We are practically creating—the word may be a disagreeable one to use—a huge and gigantic monopoly. We are giving these gentlemen rights, powers, privileges and franchises, such as, I venture to say, were never granted by this or any other Parliament. We are giving them rights which no private company should have, rights which it is dangerous for any company to possess; we are creating a monopoly which may possibly work serious injury to the well being, I am sure it will to the mous powers. I do not say that they will use these powers at once, but we are paving the way for their ultimate use; we are putting them in a position to exercise these powers at any that Committee, and he says:moment, to oppress the people of the North-West, and make company from building a road within fifteen miles of the boundary line; and we are doing all this for the sake of relieving the Government from the responsibility of constructing the balance of the road, and keeping under our own control our own money and our own lands. We are asking the people of the Mother Country, the denizens of the teeming cities of Great Britain, and of the continent as well, to emigrate and settle in the North-West. To that, I have no objection; I think public money could not be better expended than to induce immigration. We are telling them in plain English: We do this for the purpose of improving your position; we settle you in the fertile prairies of the North-West, and give you homesteads there. We send you up to the Turtle Mountains, and away beyond the Saskatchewan; and we do all this for your prosperity, but when we do all this we tell you that for the next twenty years you cannot have a railway there unless by the grace of the Syndicate; you cannot help yourselves, and you cannot ask the Government to help you, because for twenty years we have tied up our hands and the hands of the Government of Canada, and we cannot perm:t the construction of any railway that will compete with that of the Syndicate. We are doing a great wrong to those people; we are inducing them to leave their homes and settle in the North-West, and when we get them there we give them no outlets, and we compel them to pay every cent of municipal and provincial taxation. We allow the Company to select the best land in the whole territory, and the Government has nothing to say in the matter; we exempt them from all taxation, but the emigrants we induce to settle there pay every farthing of provincial and local taxatingency—the hon, gentleman knows what would be the tion. This Company and all their property and land, stock, and roadway, with all their appurtenances, are exempt from taxation for all time to come. We are inviting emigrants to settle our boundless prairies and then telling them: You must pay the taxes to keep up the Provincial and Local Governments; you must build the roads and construct the bridges, but the poor Syndicate must pay nothing, they are altogether exempt from taxation. Every December the tax collector will call on the farmer there, but he dare not call on the Syniedate. And so, we are building up a gigantic monoply; we are giving them huge privileges that no corporation should get. We are doing more than that. We are giving them all these privileges and advantages that they may be in a position to harass and oppress people we are sending there, and in addition to all this, we are giving them practically the carrying trade of the North-West for all time to come. Now is the time to regard the interests of the people there as well as the people of this country. Now is the time when the Government ought to keep their eyes open and surround this contract with every legislative safeguard that such a contract ought to be surrounded with. The United States have had some experience with these gigantic monopolies. Although I am not in favor of following the example of the United States in all things, yet there are many things taking place there from which we may draw lessons. The farmers of the Western States complained of the excessive rates extorted by these railway monopolies, and their voices were heard upon the floor of Congress, and in response thereto Congress issued a Commission to examine into this whole question of the carrying trade from the western States to the eastern seaboard. That prosperity of this country; and we should be very careful and investigation showed that the whole carrying trade of the very cautious before we invest a corporation with such enortion placed a check upon them, was practically in the hands of four men. The Hon. Mr. Windom was the chairman of moment, to oppress the people of the North-West, and make every foot of land in that territory pay tribute to them. We are preventing ourselves from incorporating other companies to build competing lines; we are handing a great railway over to a rival American company, and preventing any other and other companies of the line between Chicago and New York, who possess, and not unfrequently exercise, powers that the Government of the United States does not possess. They may at any time, and for reasons satisfactory to themselves, at a single stroke of the pen, reduce the value of property in this country by hundreds of millions of dollars, by an additional charge of 5 cents per bushel in the transportation of cereals."

Are we not walking in their footsteps, or are we taking lessons of wisdom from their experience? We are following in their footsteps. We commit the follies they committed and suffered from; we have no protection, no safeguards, nothing in the world to prevent this Company from doing just what they please and exacting just what rates they like. The Committee further reported:—

"The loss to the North-Western States in the entire crop of that year, estimated at over 900,000,000 bushels, would have amounted to the enormous sum of $90,000,000. Such a law, if permanently enforced, would, by the reduction of 10 cents a bushel in the cereal crop of the North-West, reduce the value of the farms in that section by an amount which would build and equip all the trunk lines of railroad from Chicago to New York."

We are to-day asked to put this Company in a position to do the rame thing here. The same state of things exists to-day with us that existed there in 1871. The hon, member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), in his magnificent oration, delivered here a few nights ago, showed that it cost 45 cents a bushel to take grain from Winnipeg to Toronto, of which only 9 cents is paid from St. Paul to Toronto, and the other 36 cents is absorbed by the St. Paul and Manitoba Railway, who have the practical monopoly of the carrying trade of the west, and can charge us what rates they see fit. You propose to put into the hands of that Company powers and vest in them rights and privileges which will give them a monopoly for all time of the carrying trade of our Canadian North-West, without check or reservation. Now is the time when we ought to guard against the monopolies which have arisen in the United States. I wish the Minister of Railways had taken the trouble to read and digest that admirable report to which I have just referred, before he consented to append his signature and affix his official seal to the contract now before us. Had he done so, he would not have allowed this Company the huge and gigantic monopoly given it in this contract. The author of that report points out the mistake made by the Legislature of New York and by Congress, a mistake we are now, with our eyes open, committing, in not, when granting those charters to huge railway companies, protecting the public interest, guarding them against oppressive rates, and throwing around those corporations every legislative restriction that could be thrown around them for the purpose of protecting the people from the burdens that will undoubtedly follow the giving of such powers to these companies. The author of that report says :-

"The mistake was in not providing proper safeguards to protect the public interests and hold the railroads to a strict accountability for their transactions. Thus, through the laxity of our laws and the want of Government control, (measurably excusable, considering the unforseen possibilities of railway development at the time of the enactment of these laws, but no longer pardonable in the light of the evidence herewith submitted,) have crept in those abuses hereafter mentioned, so glaring in their proportions as to savor offiction rather than actual history."

And yet, Sir, with the experience the Americans have had of these monopolies, and the extortions and sufferings the people of the North-Western States have endured, with all the difficulties they have had to encounter in connection with exorbitant charges perpetually exacted by these companies, shall we not be establishing the same evils here if we confirm this contract? I am satisfied that whoever lives ten or fifteen years from now will find that the difficulties and hardships and oppression to which the people of our own North West will be subjected by this huge monopoly which we are now creating, will be greater than were ever endured by the people of the United States. I do hope the hon. gentlemen may yet see their way clear to throw around this scheme such safeguards as will prevent this Company from exacting extortionate charges from the people who are to settle in the North-West. What protection can we give? I think there is not much difficulty about that. I think Parliament has the power, and Parliament ought to use that power, to prevent this railway company from imposing excessive charges. In two very valuable reports, which have been pre-Mr. CAMERON (Huron).

sented to the United States Congress on the carrying trade of the west, some suggestions are made as to the best modes of preventing these excessive charges. One is a mileage rate; another suggestion has since been embodied in some of the laws of the States, that is, that no railway company shall be allowed to make any secret bargain, to give any secret rate to any person carrying goods over their railway, or to grant to any individual or locality a preference rate, or to grant any individual or company a rebate. The last provision became absolutely necessary in some of the States of the Union, owing to some shippers having made a bargain with the railways that they should pay the full rate of freight and afterwards be repaid a rebate amounting to about 50 per cent of what they paid to the railways. The effect of this was that the men who had this secret arrangement with the railway companies were in a position to effectually destroy all competition. There is one case to which I would draw the attention of the Minister of Railways, a case referred to by Mr. Hepburn, in the valuable report to which I have already alluded. The Standard Oil Company of Pennsylvania, in a year and a half, shipped over several railway lines about 25,000,000 barrels of oil, the freight on which amounted to $18,556,0 0, of which the railway companies paid back $10,151,218, in the short period of eighteen months. That alone gave this company such enormous advantage over all other companies engaged in the same business that it prevented all other companies from competing against it. With these facts before him, the Minister of Railways should insert a clause in this contract, or in the Bill appended to it, covering these suggestions and such as was embodied in the law of the State of New York,, in 1880, preventing these secret arrangements which have the effect of destroying competition. Now, Sir, let me pass to another question. The Minister of Railways stated :-

"On the question of exemption from taxation of the roadway, I will not now discuss the question of the road itself being free from taxation, because the hon. gentleman will only have to turn to the laws of the United States, and in reference to the construction of great lines of railroad anywhere, to find that the policy of the United States has always been that these lines of railway—the roadway itself, its stations, everything embraced in the term railway—was exempt from taxation."

Now, Sir, I deny the correctness of that statement. I do not think the Minister of Railways was justified in making it. I doubt if the hon. gentleman can point to a single charter granted by the United States Government in which that exemption was made. I have not been able to find one, and I believe the Minister of Railways was drawing on his imagination for his facts when he made that statement. On the contrary, I find that for ten or fifteen years past, American railways have been taxed by the different States through which they pass, both for State and for local purposes. But even if the hon, gentleman's statements were true, it would be no reason why we should exempt this company from Provincial or local taxes. The States Government never gave such enormous privileges and rights as we are now giving to this Company. But, Sir, the Minister of Railways was mistaken. He was not speaking by the book, but was drawing on his imagination, as he will find by reference to the statistics of the United States on that point. I will refer to some of the leading lines of American railroads, and endeavor to satisfy the House and the Minister that they have been paying and now are paying taxes. I would not trouble the House with these statistics, but that the Minister of Railways declared that American railroads have not been paying taxes. stated so in Parliament, where he could be contradicted. He stated so on the public platform, where there was nobody to contradict the statement. The Southern Pacific Railway paid $38,900 as taxes for 1874; the Atlantic and Great Western Railway paid for taxes, in the year ending 3th June, 1874, $138,830 for 605 miles of road, and in 1879 the same road paid $96,000,

Mr. PLUMB. Where is the Atlantic and Great Western Railway?

Mr. CAMERON. If the hon, gentleman will go to Poor's Manual in the Library, he will get all the information he wants. The Union Pacific Railway, which has excited the admiration of the hon. gentleman, using his own language, to the extent that he makes it the standard for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, paid in 1874, on 1,042 miles of road, $.55,550 taxes, and in 1879, $297,158. The Central Pacific Railway paid in 1874, $462,629 taxes for 1,270 miles of road. In 1876, the State and municipal taxes exacted from that road amounted to $378,000, and in 1879, to nearly half a million.

Mr. PLUMB. How much did they receive that year?

Mr. PLUMB. For freight and passengers.

Mr. CAMERON. If the hon. gentleman will come with me to the library after the House adjourns, I will tell him all about it. The Michigan Central Railway, 284 miles long, paid in 1877, taxes to the amount of $269,800, and in 1879 to the amount of $201,681. The Chicago, Burlington and Quincey Railway paid in 1867, on the line they operated and the line they leased, $603,000; and here is a road 2,700 miles in length exempt from taxes altogether. The New York Central, 2,529 miles, owned, operated and leased, paid taxes in 1879 to the amount of $871,797. The Philadelphia Railway paid in 1879,$363,250; the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern paid in 1879, $437,116 for 1,177 miles of road; the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railway, for 1, 25 miles, paid in 1 79 $218,000. Now, Sir, these are leading lines of railway in the United states. Is the hon, gentleman correct in stating here, and on the public platform, that all the leading lines of railway in the United States pay no taxes, and can he justifying this portion of his scheme upon the ground he puts it? Can the hon, gentleman find one road in the United States incorporated and aided by Congress where the road and roadway are exempt from State taxation and local taxation? I know of none. There may be some exceptional cases, and the hon. gentleman may know of them; but even though there are exceptional cases, the hon. gentleman has no right, speaking from his place in Parliament, his words carrying with them all the weight and influence of his official position, to tell the country that this concession should be given to this Company because the United States Government has given similar concessions to railway companies in that country. Has the hon, gentleman ever figured out what this concession amounts to? Has his friend who sits behind him (Mr. Plumb), and who is constantly interrupting by interjecting remarks and in a way that nobody can understand, figured out what this concession amounts to in addition to the money and land grants? If the Central Pacific Railway, with its 1,222 miles, paid $327,000, what should the Canadian Pacific Railway with its 2,700 miles of road pay in 1891—ten years after this? It is a simple question of figures. I dare say the member for Niagara, irrepressible as he is, and always interrupting everybody who is talking except himself, can, by the rule of three, figure out what this concession comes to. Let him try. If he will make the calculation, he will find it comes to considerably more than half a lation, he will find it comes to considerably more than half a million a year, and that capitalized represents $15,000,000. But this is a perpetual exemption. Parliament cannot interfere unless by paying exemplary damages to the company, and, of course, we do not want to do that if we can avoid it. I have shown, I think, very clearly that the hon. gentleman, when he made that statement, that these leading lines of railways were all exempt from taxation in the United States of railways under what is called the head grant system, and that therefore this was a proper concession to America, and that therefore this was a proper concession to make to this Company, was not speaking by the book, that he was making a statement that he ought not to have made

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. CAMERON. I was speaking, when the House rose, of the exemption of these lands from taxation. I pointed out that the Minister of Railways was entirely mistaken when he made the assertion in Parliament that the great American lines of Railway were exempt from taxation, and in using that as a justification for the present proposition before Parliament. I find that the hon. Minister of Railways, on another occasion, stated outside Parliament:

"I find the laws of Minnesota provide that as fast as the railway is definitely located and established, and the selection of land made, the company shall be for ever exempt from all assessments and taxes, also on all stock, whether belonging to the company or individuals, and all franchise and estate, real or personal, held by the company, and the land grant accrued to the company by Act of Congress, shall be exempt from all taxation until sold and conveyed by the company. So the laws of Minnesota, in the strongest way, are in conformity with the provisions which we have made in this respect in regard to taxes. This not only makes a free roadway and all property connected with the railway free, but the lands are free from taxation for twenty-five years after disposed of."

I think that at the same meeting where the hon, gentleman delivered this address, he stated the roadway in Wisconsin was also free from taxation. I challenge the hon. gentleman to point out an instance in which the American Government, as a Government, in granting a subsidy of money or of lands, made it a condition that the roadway and the property of the company, apart from the land, should be exempt from taxation. The hon, gentleman was entirely mistaken in regard to Minnesota and Wisconsin. In Minnesota there are thirty-seven railways, some very small and some of considerable length. Out of the thirty-seven, eight or nine belong to the Chicago and North-Western Railway; that is, they are run under the power of or by lease to that company. On these roads this company paid in 1879, for taxes, $357,996. Nine other roads in these States are taxed for their roadway, plant, etc., in different amounts, and the remainder, which are roads recently chartered and under contract, are not included in Pool's Annual Railway Statistics. I find that the same state of things exists in the State of Wisconsin, so that the hon. Minister of Railways is entirely mistaken-I hope unintentionally-in saying these roads were all exempt from taxation. Then the hon, gentlemen justified exempting the lands we are giving the Syndicate from taxation for twenty years on the ground that the United States, when they incorporated similar companies and gave them land grants, exempted these grants from taxation. The hon, gentleman is here again entirely mistaken. The United States Government, as a Government, has not exempted these lands from State taxes, or local taxes for municipal purposes. There are one or two instances in which the United States Government exempted such lands from taxation, these lands being in the territories, but the exemption ceased when the territories were merged into States; but the hon, gentleman is entirely mistaken when he says they were exempted from taxation in the same sense and spirit as that in which he proposes to exempt the Syndicate lands. The hon. gentleman said:

mile of railroad which has been or may hereafter be constructed pursuant to the Act of 1870. The said company, its successors and assigns to have the right to locate the said lands as head rights certificates, without the necessity of alternating the sections; the said lands and certificates to be released from all county, state, municipal and other taxes for a period of twenty-five years. The moment our lands, however, are sold they become liable to taxation. Under that United States law they remain free for twenty-five years after coming into the hands of private purchasers. There is nothing of the kind here."

In this extract I have just read, the hon, gentleman tries to convince the House and the country that, under the laws of the United States, these lands are exempt from taxation. That is not the case. There are one or two instances in which the United States have given land grants in the territories, and these lands have been exempt from taxation; but there is no instance of their being exempt from taxation after the territories had become States and ceased to be territories. The Government have no power, when territories become States, to exempt the lands in those territories from local taxation; and it is doubtful if this Parliament can make a similar exemption in this case. hon, gentleman points out that these great corporations which receive their existence from Congress are exempt from taxation. If he will take the trouble to refer to the reports, the latest authenticated accounts, he will find that, at all events, those lands given as bonuses to the leading lines of railways have not been exempt from taxation. He will find, notably with respect to the Union and the Central Pacific and the Southern Pacific, that the Government reserved to themselves certain rights, but did not exempt the lands from taxation. They gave money and land bonuses, but out of their net earnings the companies were bound to pay the Government five per cent. in liquidation of the Government debt; and that as a sort of equivalent for these grants, the United States Government reserved to themselves the right of transporting over these roads the army of the United States and the munitions of war, and provided that the companies should only exact from the Government one half the cost of transportation. The hon, gentleman will find that the Union Pacific Railway-about which his Administration has been excited to such an extent that he made it the standard by which our road is to be constructed—in 1870-77, 1878 and 1879, paid taxes upon lands, 10,500,000 acres, $835,023, that the Michigan Central, in 1879, on 454,614 acres, which was all it then owned, paid $27,126 in taxes; that the Chicago, Burlington and Quincey road, in 1879, paid $206,954 taxes on lands. The Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific had only some 643,307 acres of land unsold, and in 1876 they paid $54,232 in taxes on their lands, and in 1879, $46,397, being an average of fourteen cents per acre upon the lands they then possessed. The hon, gentleman mentioned one solitary instance in which the lands of a railway were exempt from taxation, that of the International and Great Northern Railway Company, but he overlooked the fact that that corporation did not receive its charter from the United States. but was a purely local concern, receiving its power and authority from the State of Texas alone, which, before it joined the Union, was a sovereign State, and retained the control over its own lands. He overlooked the fact that this corporation was a consolidation of the Houston and Great Northern and International companies, that to one of those companies the State of Texas gave a money subsidy of $10,000 per mile, and to the other a grant of land. These two companies got into financial difficulties, and they became consolidated. The State of Texas desired to regain its money bonds, and in order to do so gave a grant of 5,000,000 acres of land and exempted the land from taxation for twenty-five years. But surely the hon, gentleman will not rely on that case as a justification for his proposition. The cases are not at all analagous, for in the one which the hon, gentleman has cited, and to the history of which I have referred, the matter was purely one of private arrange-Mr. CAMERON (Huron).

ment between the two companies and the State. challenge the hon. gentleman to point to a single instance, except those I have mentioned, in the whole legislation of the United States, where the Government of that country gave a subsidy of land to a railway company, and then exempted the land from taxation. The hom gentle-man says that this exemption is a trifling matter, but if he will take the trouble to make a simple calculation he will find that the matter is of more importance than he imagines. Taking the same assessment as that of the Chicago and Rock Island Road, 14 cents per acre, and multiplying it by 25,000,000, we find it amounts to something like $3,500,000. I have in my hands the assessment of some lands in Manitoba, nearly 100 miles from the railway, and I find that upon one section of 640 acres the taxes, for 1880, are $18,20. This Company have now 38,063 sections, which, if multiplied by $18.20 will amount to $644,000, or if we take $20.50 which is paid on another section in the same locality, it would amount to a considerably larger sum. This land, as I have said, is nearly 100 miles from the railway; but if we take land within say the 20 mile belt it would be a good deal more. If we calculate it on a basis of $2 per acre, we find that the taxes would be $913,000 upon the 38,063 sections which the Company have. They are not bound to sell the lands for 20 years, but suppose they sell one-half of them at the end of ten years and the other half afterwards, and taking the price at $2 per acre, the aggregate exemptions on lands alone will be something like $10,000,000 in the ten years. These lands are said by hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House to be worth more than $2 per acre; and supposing they are assessed at $5 per acre, the actual value of these lands, the taxation in ten years would amount to over $20,000,000. I say, Sir, that this is no small matter; I say that Parliament should not, even if it had the power, deprive the people of that western country -formed into provinces as it will be-of the power of exacting from this corporation taxes upon lands which they will hold for the purpose of making the most of, and thus throw the burden of local improvements on the actual settler. Sir, I never heard a proposition so monstrous as this one. I never heard one justified upon such grounds as have been advanced to support this proposition, and no such proposition was ever before submitted to a free Parliament. There are other objections to this contract of a very serious nature. I know that it does not provide for the transportation of troops or munitions of war if we should require them to be transported. The Government of the United States reserved the privilege of transporting troops and munitions of war at half-price over the roads bonussed by it. I object to this contract still further, because it does not provide for any figure at which the postal service of the country shall be rendered. We know perfectly well, that, when this road is constructed, it will be used as a postal highway, and yet this Company will charge whatever they please for carrying mails. If the Minister of Railways had only exercised his usual forethought when the Government drew out this contract, he would have made provision for the transport of Her Majesty's mails over this railway at reasonable rates; now he is at the mercy of the Company. I object to this contract upon another ground, upon which I shall, probably, have an opportunity to say more on another occasion. Hitherto, hon. gentlemen and myself have discussed this question from a purely Dominion point of view, but I cannot close my eyes to the fact that I belong to the Province of Ontario, and that that Province is contributing a very large proportion of the money we are giving to this Company, perhaps two-thirds or three-fourths of it. Has the hon gentleman protected the interests of Ontario? He knows that, when he was in Toronto, some days ago, he was assailed and beseiged by the inhabitants of that city, and urged to see that the interests of Ontario were protected. He knows that he was met by a large and influential delegation, which presented him with a petition pointing out the faults of this contract in so far as Ontario is concerned, and pointing out that their interests were neither guarded nor protected. He knows that he was obliged to admit that concessions ought to be made in the interests of Ontario. He knows that he was obliged to admit that doubts might arise as to how far Ontario interests were conserved, and that he was obliged to promise that such interests would be more effectually guarded. I am satisfied from a careful consideration of this contract that the interests of that Province are not sufficiently protected, and in fact, considering the large sums of money we shall have to pay towards building this road, not protected at all. It is stated by those connected with the railway proposed to be built in Ontario, and which connects the Railway system of Ontario with the Canadian Pacific Railway, that the effect of this contract, if ratified, is practically and substantially to out Ontario from any share in the carrying trade between Montreal and the West. When the hon, gentleman was guarding so well the interests of the Syndicate he ought not to have closed his eyes to the interests of Ontario. Having discussed the grounds on which this scheme is justified, and having pointed out a few of the objectionable features of the contract, let us go back a stage in the discussion, and see what we are giving to this Company for the purpose of constructing a road which the hon. thing which this Company gets is the money we have expended and are to expend upon portions of the road, with a mounting to $35,000,000. Then gentleman himself has said is to cost $78,000,000. The first pended and are to expend upon pornious of the cost of surveys, etc., amounting to $35,000,000. Then we are giving them $25,000,000 in addition, makers $60.000,000 in cach. We are also giving them 25,000,000 acres of land. A good deal has been said upon the value of this land, and hongentlemen have argued this question as if the lands were worth now no more than in 1873. They never take into account the changed circumstances of the country. They never take into account the fact that these lands have obtained considerable value by reason of the money we have so far expended in the construction of this road, and that they are becoming more valuable every day by reason of emigration that has gone into that country, and for which we, in the older provinces, have had to pay handsomely. They argue that the value of the land in 1873 and 1874, when the hon. member for Lambton submitted his proposition, was the same as now. I say that it is not a fair or an honest line of argument. These lands have become valuable, and there is no use in closing our eyes to the fact. There is no use in the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House trying to convince the country that the propositions made in 1874 were not as good as the present propositions. We know that the lands have become more valuable since then. We know that the Government have sold their lands for over $4 an acre there. We know that the Governor of the Hudson's Bay Company stated some weeks ago that the Company had sold their lands for over $1 an acre. We know that lands that could be got in Manitoba and the North-West Territories in 1873, at fifty cents an acre, to-day no man can buy for less than $5 or $6 an acre. We know that lands bought in Manitoba in 1874 at fifty to seventy-five cents an acre, are to-day selling at $5 an acre. We know that lands in southern Manitoba that sold a year ago at $1 an acre, are selling to-day at from $4 to $6. In estimating what this road is to cost us, we ought not to close our eyes to the fact that these changes have taken place. The experience of the United States under similar circumstances affords another indication of the value of these lands, and that they ought not to be valued to-day at only $1 an acre. In the United States the railway companies had to take the lands as they came, good, bad and indifferent. They could not select the choice lands of the country. We give the choicest lands in the whole North-West Territories to this Company. Let us see what the experience of the United States has been upon this question, for hon, gentlemen seem to draw all their inspiration from the United States. If they build the railroad upon the American standard, if they give the land free from taxation, because it has been done in the United States, we can fairly say that we ought to take the value of the land in the United States as a fair criterion in estimating the value of our own land. The Union Pacific Rallway Company, which the hon. gentleman admires so much, sold, down to 1879, 1,568,438 acres at an average price of $4.41 an acre, though the lands were inferior. In 1870 the Central Pacific Railway sold land at $2.21 an acre; up to December, 1872, the land sold by them averaged $3.93 an acre; from then to the 30th June, 1873, the average was $6.41; in 1876, the average was $7.54; in 1877, the average was $12.99. Before this road was built, before there was access to the country, the land sold at $2.21 an acre, but the moment the country was opened up the price of these lands rose to $12.99. Yet the hon, gentlemen tells us this is a good bargain, that the Syndicate is not getting too much in money or lands, as the lands were worth as much in 1878 and 1874 as in 1880. I say that is not so; I say the experience of the past goes to show that just as the country is opened up and developed, the price of these lands is increased enormously. The Northern Pacific Railway Company, whose lands will not at all compare with the lands of our North-West, sold, up to the 30th of June, 1874, 685,960 acres, at an average price of $5.46 an acre; and the St. Paul and Manitoba Railway Company sold, up to June, 1879, 634,000 acres at an average price of $6 83 an acre Seventeen of the leading railway companies in the United States who have received land grants from the Government have, within the last ten years, sold an aggregate of 11,891,553 acres, realizing the sum of $77,738,690, or an average of $6.54 an acro. And yet we are asked to put our lands down to a dollar an acre because they were only worth that sum six years ago. These facts ought to convince the hon. Minister of Railway's that in giving the lands alone he is giving this Company $125,000,000.

Mr. PLUMB. Hear, hear.

Mr. CAMERON. I will give the hon. gentleman another authority. The irrepressible member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) will accept the statements of the Minister of Railways. He never turns his back on him, and he will not call his valuation in question. In 1875 what did he say? He said, in a discussion which took place in Parliament on a kindred subject:

"I could safely make it $5 an acre, providing I have the selecting of the land."

Oh, what a prophet the hon gentleman was. He could foresee with prophetic clearness the time five years thereafter, when these lands would pass over to a gigantic corporation, and that corporation would have the power, by means of this contract, or selecting the very test lands in the whole North-West.

"I could safely make it $5 providing I have the selecting of the lands. The whole character of the lands from the western limit of Manitoba to Fort Pelly is worth . 5 an acre, as well as $1, and will fetch that sum."

If these lands were worth $5 an acre in 1875, when there were no roads and no settlement, what are they worth in 1880? In 1877, the hon. Minister of Railways placed the same value on the lands. I repeat that if these lands were worth $5 an acre in 1875 and 1877, they are worth double that sum now. But I am a modest man, and I will take the hon. Minister of Railways' own estimate of $5 an acre. On that basis, this Company receives $60,000,000 in cash and $125,000 000 in land. What else do they get? They get exemption of these lands from taxation, and estimating that exemption on the basis I have already placed them, it will amount to $10,000,000 in ten years.

They also get exemption for their road-bed, station grounds, yards, rolling-stock and appurtenances, for ever. Taking as a criterion the amount of taxes the Union Pacific Railway pays on 1,0.0 miles of railway, and applying the same rule to the _,700 miles of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and capitalizing this sum, the Company is getting at least $12,000,000 in exemption from taxation under this head alone. Still they are not satisfied with that. They get the road-bed—and let me here observe that they get the road-bed without any limit as to its width, it may be 100 feet or 10,000 feet wide. They get the station grounds and the other lands I have mentioned without limit, and under this clause of the contract, they have the right to select an unlimited quantity as well as to select the very best ground in the North-West Territory-those portions of it on which will ultimately spring up magnificent towns and cities; and yet the hon. gentleman gives all this without one dollar of compensation. We are giving this Company, for the construction of a railroad which is to cost $78,000,000, a sum that, at the lowest estimate, will amount to $200,000,000. That is not all. We are giving them the monopoly of constructing railways in the North-West, which has a value that is almost incalculable. Sir, one's patience almost becomes exhausted when one sits down calmly and deliberately to consider the vast concessions which we are giving to this Company for constructing this railway. Constructing it! They are not constructing it. The most expensive portions we are constructing and then handing over to them the fee simple of it. Sir, I am opposed to this contract on the grounds just alleged, and, not the least, upon the ground of these exemptions from taxation. As well may the Parliament of Canada legislate that every second farm in Ontario or Quebec shall be free from taxation as to impose on the North-Western settlers a burden that will rest upon them for all time to come. I am opposed to this scheme because I look upon it as an American scheme. We are practically handing the Canadian Pacific Railway over to an American Company, the St. Paul and Manitoba Railway Company. Now, what will be the effect of that? The simple effect will be that for all time to come competition will be cut off. Does anyone suppose that the Syndicate are going to allow any competition with the St. Paul and Manitoba Railway? Everyone knows that these shrewd, calculating men who have outgeneralized hon. gentlemen opposite, will not run this railway in a way to injure themselves. I am opposed to this scheme because it gives concessions that no company should get and no Government should give. I am opposed to it because we are giving them a monopoly, practically, of the construction of railways in that whole country for twenty years to come, and if we give it to them for twenty years we are practically giving it to them for all time to come. I am opposed to it because we are giving to them, practically, substantially, and to all intents and purposes, the monopoly of the whole carrying trade of the North-West country. I am opposed to it on all these grounds, and I hope—perhaps I have not much ground to hope—but I do hope, that there are enough independent members of Parliament who will raise their voices and will give their votes at all events, if they do not reject this scheme, to have it modified so that those vicious clauses to which I have referred, may be changed or struck out. This country has suffered much during the last three quarters of a century from concessions made both by Canadian and Imperial statesmen; and I hope we are not now going to suffer again in the same way and for the same cause. A good many of the rights and powers and franchises of Canada have been frittered away, bartered and surrendered by folly and ignorance during that period. Sir, we all know that in 1842, by the stupidity of an English peer who never understood or appreciated the important Durham declined to have anyone meet him on that occasion. duties he was called upon by his Sovereign to discharge, Whether my hon, friend, having already spent seventeen. Mr. CAMERON (Huron).
