Mr. Chairman, these are vital matters, and as the minister said events which are now unfolding indicate that we have to be ever vigilant if we want to make sure that we are not the object of destruction. It is an elementary principle in government that the government of the day should regard as its first obligation, the taking of every possible step to make sure that it has so arranged its procedures in national life to guarantee the preservation and the integrity of the nation. This is the standard by which we will judge, and by which in duty we must judge, the conduct of this government in the days that lie ahead and in respect of the events of the immediate past.

I agree with the Secretary of State for External Affairs that the Cuban crisis has shown that the United Nations has not lost its force and its value. Indeed, the Cuban crisis demonstrated the importance of the United Nations. However, we should remember that it is illusory to think that the United Nations can impose solutions upon great powers like the United States or the Soviet union. But the United Nations can by its good offices, as was demonstrated in the case of Cuba, provide the channel for a change of policy by a great power. It is not without significance that the United States, after what were thought to be necessary precautions were taken, did go to the United Nations. But what the United Nations can do is to supervise and inspect a solution, and that it has done in Cuba and in other situations.

Speaking about the United Nations, I am sure that my hon. friend will agree that 12 months ago it looked as though the cold war might destroy or seriously impair the usefulness of this collective security organization. We know that the death of the former secretary general was used by the Soviet union to press for a troika secretary generalship which would have reduced the United Nations to impotence. At the end of last year the unanimous decision to establish in that important office U Thant gave the United Nations a new hope and a new opportunity; and it is not without significance, as the Leader of the Opposition has pointed out elsewhere, that the three executive chairs at the United Nations general assembly are now filled by gentlemen who come from Asia.

I note with satisfaction, as has the minister himself, that the near settlement—what we hope will be the final settlement—of the Congo problem represents a major achievement of the United Nations, and particularly in the final days, to the determination and persistence of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, the minister referred in his speech to the important developments now taking place in Europe in regard to Britain's application for participation in the European common market. Recent weeks have shown a deterioration, however, in our hopes for Britain's taking this historic step into Europe. Indeed, recent days have had an air of unreality, with France and Germany signing a treaty of friendship. This action in itself could, of course, be a significant development provided it remains outward looking. The vision of a united Europe including the United Kingdom which has been presented by great statesmen in this century and which goes back to at least the days following the first world war, cannot lightly be set aside. One must stress the need for wider perspectives in pursuing this vision rather than short run pessimism because of difficulties in the Brussels negotiations.

Speaking as an individual I will say this. I regret that General de Gaulle and the government of France have felt it necessary to take the position they have with regard to participation by the United Kingdom, a position different from that of the other five member states of the European community.

From what the minister said I do not feel that there is on the part of the government a proper appreciation of the consequences of the failure of Britain to be in Europe what she has so much wanted to be in these last few months. Her failure to participate in the European common market will not mean the end of Britain or the end of Europe, but in my judgment it will certainly mark a very significant retreat in the opportunity of furthering peace in the world and unity among the western nations of the world. I greatly doubt whether the alternative which seems to be in the mind of the hon. gentleman is one that will have the significance underlined in the terms in which Mr. Churchill spoke when he advocated a united Europe. As to the conference which Canada and the United States have helped to co-sponsor, I think he exaggerated the contribution made by this government. It should not be forgotten that well over a year before the invitation was extended and long before the prime ministers' conference in London last September, preparatory meetings for this conference had taken place elsewhere.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is not so.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Prime Minister says that is not so. He will have an opportunity of showing why it is not so. However, I say that if he will look at the facts and will get properly briefed, he will see that what I have said represents the situation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Not at all.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Secretary of State for External Affairs, after talking about this world economic conference, spoke of the desirability of the United States not getting tough with its allies. Of course, as I said a moment ago, we all recognize the fact that if the western alliance is to remain strong it must be, in fact and in truth, a real alliance of free nations. Each nation must be given the opportunity to express its views and make its influence felt.

I am going to say this to the minister and in doing so I have no pointed reference to any particular individual when I make the observation. I suspect that one of the tests, in diplomatic effort, of a nation's capacity to have a sphere of influence and to be persuasive, is so to comport oneself and so to formulate and execute the foreign policy of one's country so as to invite the kind of confidence among one's colleague states which will guarantee the preservation of that kind of freedom and of that kind of desired influence. I believe that in this context a disservice will be done and has been done to the nation by the use of foreign policy as a means of furthering political ends in this or any other country.

In this context I might as well come to a subject that was referred to by the minister when he spoke of the attempts made by this government to bring home to the nations of the world the dangers of Soviet imperialism. No one denies that the subjugation of the free peoples of the world by the Soviet union is abhorrent to us all. No free man or woman in any part of the world can justify the subjugation by the Soviet union of the people of Poland, of the Ukraine, of Czechoslovakia, of Hungary and of other nations. All of us are agreed on this. However, the Prime Minister has sought—and I must say that the Secretary of State for External Affairs today seemed to do the same thing—to give the impression that not until this government came into office had any real advocacy by the government of Canada been made on behalf of these people, or not until the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues came into office. This is not the case. The present Leader of the Opposition, as secretary of state for external affairs in Canada, as leader of this party, as president of the United Nations general assembly and as chairman of the political committee in the United Nations, on many occasions spoke of the dangers of Soviet imperialism. I do not need to put on the record all the things he has said. His observations are to be found in the reports of the United Nations deliberations. They are to be found in the report of the deliberations of this house. However, I single out one because I well remember its being uttered in the United Nations general assembly when the Leader of the Opposition addressed himself to the then Soviet delegate, namely Andrei Vyshinsky. These are the words of the member for Algoma East speaking as secretary of state for external affairs on September 26, 1949, in the general assembly:

> Imperialism of the old kind is a rapidly diminishing force—a dying doctrine. The real danger today lies in the new imperialism of the post-war period. During that period only one state in the world has extended its borders and the area of its domination. That state has annexed 179,000 square miles of territory and included within its borders in the last ten years more than twenty-one million people. Backed by its armies, it has imposed satellite regimes on neighbouring states. It has used its great material power and resources to rivet its economic control over the peoples under its influence. Its leaders have talked freely of "liberation" and of "national sovereignty", but its agents abroad have never hesitated to proclaim their obedience to its control and their determination to serve its interests above the interests of their own governments and their own peoples.
> How can there be a feeling of peace and security—

Said the Leader of the Opposition of today.

> —where an alien power insists on imposing its domination over other nations and peoples? We of the free democracies—

And when he said this, I am sure he spoke for everyone in this house, for everyone in this country and for all free peoples all over the world.

> —reject this new imperialism which uses the subversive forces of international communism to destroy the national independence of even communist states which will not accept its interference and its dictates.

We also find at pages 1628 and following in Hansard, volume 2 for the last session, 1962, other statements placed on the records of this house, declarations made by former prime ministers who preceded this present government, and by the present Leader of the Opposition in several capacities, as secretary of state for external affairs and president of the United Nations general assembly. I am not saying that what the hon. gentleman said would not be supported by the Prime Minister or by others in this house. Indeed, I know that all hon. gentlemen in this house would support a statement such as the one I have quoted. But the significance of this turn in the debate is that the Prime Minister in particular has sought to convey the impression, as I sought to emphasize a few moments ago, that he alone and this government alone are to be regarded among the Canadian people as the political power in this country that has spoken up on behalf of the people in Europe who have been denied their freedom, because of Soviet union domination. Such is not the case.

I support the statement made by the right hon. gentleman in the general assembly of the United Nations in September of 1957. He made a speech there that won acclaim in the United Nations and in Canada. It was a statement that expressed in proper terms the views of the government of Canada and its people with regard to the denial of freedom by the Soviet union to millions of people in enslaved Europe. That was a speech of the highest order delivered by the Prime Minister. I took occasion in this house shortly thereafter to commend him for it. But what the Prime Minister said on that occasion, it should in fairness be noted, had been said on many occasions by Mr. St. Laurent and by the present Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson).

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the committee give unanimous consent to permitting the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I thank the house for this concession. But this is not the end of the story. In the fall of 1961 the Prime Minister made a speech before a large gathering of Canadians with European origins. He spoke then as he had spoken in the general assembly of the United Nations in September of 1957. He spoke of the subjugation and enslavement of the peoples of certain European countries. The people who heard him applauded, quite properly, because he indicated further the concern of the government and the people of Canada. This was early in the month of November, I think. At any rate, it was while the general assembly of 1961 was in session. The Prime Minister said that as an earnest of what he was telling them the government was going to introduce in the United Nations general assembly in 1962 a resolution, calling upon the United Nations to condemn the Soviet union for acts of enslavement of human beings in many countries.

Mr. Diefenbaker: With the support of like-minded nations in the United Nations.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Well, obviously you cannot pass a resolution unless you have the support of a sufficient number of nations. But I am suggesting to the Prime Minister that if he will look at the texts, and I have them all here—

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is fine.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —he will find that when he made that speech he did not say anything at that time about the support of other nations.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Just read it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Prime Minister can do so when he speaks.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am just giving the hon. gentleman the facts.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What I have said will be supported by the newspapers, and in this instance I want the Prime Minister to know that I propose to make my own speech. Two days after the Prime Minister spoke I had occasion to speak at a gathering where I commended the Prime Minister for the course he had taken. But I urged him, if he thought it was desirable in order to achieve results, of the necessity of making friends in the United Nations, of providing a really effective solution, if these were the conditions and that was his wish, not to wait until the general assembly of 1962. As head of the government and in concert with his colleagues, why not give instructions at once to the Canadian delegation at the general assembly to bring in a resolution in 1961? That could have been done but it was not done.

Then we had the general election. I well remember the speech made by the Prime Minister in Neepawa, I think it was. It was a speech which he later corrected, particularly as to words attributed to him and as applied to the Leader of the Opposition. But the Winnipeg Free Press of May 11, and this is supported by the Toronto Telegram of the same date, reported him as follows:

> Mr. Diefenbaker promised that next fall he would present a resolution to the United Nations asking the Soviet union to give freedom to the "captive peoples".

Certainly there is no reference there to having the support of a sufficient number of nations in the United Nations.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It was used all the time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Toronto Telegram of May 23 reported the Prime Minister as saying:

> The Prime Minister also announced that Canada plans to enlist the support of other nations in introducing a resolution at the next United Nations general assembly calling for self-determination for the captive people in iron curtain countries.

And so on. This was repeated in several places throughout the campaign for one obvious purpose. I charge the Prime Minister that it was done for the obvious purpose of seeking to influence certain people to support the government in respect of a matter on which the Prime Minister knew perfectly well there was no division whatsoever as between political parties in this country.

The general assembly of 1962 has terminated its sessions, but there was no resolution put forward by the Canadian government or by the Prime Minister. He said at one point he was going to go there himself. In the Montreal Gazette of August 23, 1962 he is reported as follows:

> Prime Minister Diefenbaker indicated yesterday he may go to the United Nations general assembly session in New York late next month to sponsor a resolution calling for free elections in Soviet satellite countries.

Then there is this very interesting addendum:

> He told reporters he would consider doing so if Premier Khrushchev attends the general assembly meeting, but at the moment reports of the Russian leader's plans are contradictory.

I simply want to say to the Prime Minister that while he holds a very important office I doubt very much that the decision of Mr. Khrushchev to go to the United Nations depended upon the convenience of the present Prime Minister of Canada. In any event, there was no resolution presented. The parliamentary secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs made a speech. It was a good speech. I would expect him to make a good speech. But what he said in substance, I am sure he will agree, was the same in principle as was stated by the Prime Minister in the general assembly in 1957 and by the Leader of the Opposition and by Mr. St. Laurent and others at the United Nations over the years.

I say to the Prime Minister that there is a lot of talk these days about the commitments of a nation to other governments. This was a particular commitment by the Prime Minister to the people of Canada and it was not discharged.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It was always subject to getting the necessary support of other like-minded nations.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Secretary of State for External Affairs spoke again today of disarmament. I must say the minister did not have the same confidence in the outcome of nuclear test ban and disarmament discussions which has characterized the other speeches he has made on these subjects in this house, since he became Secretary of State for External Affairs. The minister, I am sure, now recognizes that the solution of the problem of disarmament is not as easy as he thought in the early period of his ministry. We all support disarmament. We must continue to negotiate with the Soviet union and, ultimately with communist China, and with all countries, in an effort to have a system of disarmament that will minimize the possibilities of war by miscalculation.

Let there be no mistake about our support for this objective, all of us in this house and all of us in this country. This we can do, however, in this difficult nuclear age, only provided there is an agreement accompanied by the assurance of fulfilment of that agreement with regard to the measures of control which must be mutually agreed upon, not only control measures and inspection, but agreement as to what the objectives of control are.

Now, the minister seems to think that there is some ground for hope as a result of a recent exchange of letters between the Soviet union and the United States concerning on-site inspections. He looks upon this as an encouraging reason for believing that there may be some progress in this area. Let us hope that there is. I can only remind the hon. gentleman that Mr. Arthur Dean, for whom I know the minister has the highest regard and to whom he paid a tribute the other day, shortly before retiring as United States spokesman in the nuclear test discussions, did not express the view which the minister has expressed here. He did express the view, however, with regard to disarmament, that while every effort must be made to bring about some agreement in this vital field, it was not doing any service to mankind to overstate the possibilities or to be guilty of exaggerated optimism.

I have read with very considerable interest, as perhaps the minister has, a book that has just been published by Mr. James Wadsworth who, under three presidents, represented the United States in the disarmament discussions. Here is what he said, among other things:

> There is a very real question whether genuine disarmament is possible at all in the continued presence of critical political situations like Berlin. Many experts believe, and I concur, that a significant and durable relaxation of the cold war is a prime prerequisite to any relaxation of the arms race.

I think it is not a mature position to take to say that we are going to achieve disarmament in the light of the existence of the very serious differences that yet prevail between the disputants in matters of major political importance. We all hope it will be otherwise. I would not want the leader of the N.D.P. party to conclude, as the hon. member for Kootenay West has on other occasions with regard to this kind of observation, that there was not on my part the fullest appreciation of the desirability of making progress in disarmament. Of course, we must all work towards this objective. My point is that we will not reach that objective if we continue to overlook the realities involved in the present international situation.

The minister mentioned, as an indication of the recognition of the worth of Canada in these consultations, the fact that we had been selected as one of the members of the 10-power disarmament committee. We were selected by the four foreign ministers who met to set up this body. Well, I am sure that we are all proud of the fact that the contribution of Canada has been such that it has warranted the selection of this country to serve in the current disarmament discussions. However, I would remind the minister that in 1954 Canada was a member of the subcommittee on disarmament, the five members of which were the United States, France, Great Britain, the Soviet union and Canada. Canada was selected by the United Nations generally to represent all the other nations. I think that marks us as having warranted at that time the very tribute which the minister wants to take, and I think properly so, for his government and for Canada. We were on that subcommittee. It was Canada that was selected to carry on negotiations on behalf of the other four with the Soviet union concerning the conditions that must prevail if there was to be a resumption of disarmament discussions. Let it not be suggested, therefore, as the minister sought to imply today, that only this government is interested in disarmament. No one worked harder for disarmament under equally difficult circumstances than did the Leader of the Opposition, just as I frankly acknowledge the minister, himself, has worked diligently and hard towards this objective during his term of office. I simply say to the minister, it is one thing to work hard but it is another thing to work wisely in this field. I do not think it is possible to work wisely unless we take into account the existence of the fundamental differences in ideology that prevail between the Soviet union and the free world, the existence of major political problems that divide east and west.

We will reach, I hope, a stage where we can have at least partial agreement on disarmament under conditions that will not violate our security. But it is not mature, it seems to me at this time, to overstate the possibility or the extent of progress made thus far.

Now, Mr. Chairman, one striking fact it seems to me in international affairs today is the interrelatedness of a nation's defence policy, its foreign economic policy and its over-all policy. These three areas which in the past we have tended to look upon separately, now must be considered all together. Indeed, the continuous nature of this interrelatedness has major implications, as I see it, for our own foreign policy, particularly in the area of planning and co-ordinating of our own efforts and our own policies. Perhaps we should be considering some alterations. Do we have over-all planning and co-ordination of effort in the government at the present time which gives its total attention to a particular problem in external relations and is continually casting its eye up and down the radar screen looking for problems in areas where Canada can exert an influence?

The diplomatic influence and effectiveness of a nation is a total process, a composite whole, in which our political conduct, the state of our alliances, the amount of foreign assistance which we give, our military power, our domestic economic situation, operate all together. It is a truism that Canadian diplomatic influence and effectiveness must be less than what it could be when our own internal economic affairs are in a state of confusion and when our nation appears to be doubly confused and without a vigorous national purpose.

Many commentators in recent years have noted that Canada seems to have less effect in international affairs than formerly. They say we do not possess the power and influence we once did. The minister knows who say this. I am not saying it, but I can refer, as the minister knows, to those objective assessments which have been made of the government's foreign policy, to the way they have executed it; I cannot absolve the government from blame in this matter. Indeed, as has been so often commented on, our diplomacy has been a great deal less than satisfactory in a number of areas, and there are other reasons as well for our present situation.

The fact is that in today's world the pace of change has become so rapid as to destroy utterly the process of gradualism which we had once come to know. Revolutionary change has become a part of our lives, and yet we have not adjusted our thinking to the implications of the scientific and technological revolution of our times.

We need to be constantly re-examining our foreign policy objectives, constantly querying the means by which these objectives are carried out. The minister today said we have begun a new era. Well, if we are in a new era surely we are entitled to have, particularly at a time when we are discussing national defence, a statement on it as well as on our foreign policy objectives, how we pursue them and how they are related to defence and international commercial policies. This is necessary if we are to have a mature consideration of our foreign policy.

Now, Mr. Chairman, before I resume my seat I say to the minister, as I have often said to him on other occasions in these debates, we endeavour in this country, and I think properly so, to minimize the occasion when we have to differ with the government on foreign policy. We basically support the same principles, although because of what the minister said today it seems to me that in this new era there is a need for a re-enunciation of those principles and new adaptations, if we are to satisfy fully the obligations of this debate.

The government, this party and other parties in the house are not basically divided on the broad lines of foreign policy. Therefore, in the consideration of these matters, let us not be afraid to express our differences. Let us not be afraid to point out where there are weaknesses. Let us not exaggerate our achievements whether in terms of collective effort or in terms of national achievement, but let us bear in mind that in this difficult period there must be stated goals of foreign policy carefully adhered to, respected by all branches of the government, the defence department as well as the Department of External Affairs.

Differences between ministers or differences of policy with regard to ministers in these departments are not conducive to the development of a strong and respected position for this country in the United Nations or elsewhere in the world. So I say to the minister we must pay more attention to our long run objectives and to policies and ways by which we can continue to play an effective role in foreign policy. The minister has that opportunity and I submit to him with the greatest respect that that obligation was not discharged by him today.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, we have listened to a partial statement by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and we have listened to today's spokesman for the Liberal party on the same subject. I am more than ever convinced that it is time we came to grips with all of the basic issues concerning external affairs and defence. We have avoided decisions long enough. Canadians want to be informed. They want action, not talk.

I shall not take time this afternoon to review world developments. That has already been done. Rather I shall endeavour to get down to what I regard as some of the major issues that are before us. During the past few weeks the question of Canada's military policy, and this is very definitely related to the over-all picture of external affairs, has come prominently before the public, and Canadians have become properly concerned about the attitudes of their politicians and alarmed at the general situation relating to Canada's role in the international scene.

The politicians of our old line parties have much to answer for to the electorate of Canada. Surely, however, nothing condemns the weakness of both the government and the Liberal party in the face of urgent threatening problems so much as the total failure of both to state clearly their policies on nuclear weapons for a period of something like three years, except perhaps to accuse each other of what the other has not done or, if done, has done wrong? It is no wonder the Canadian people have become confused. It is no wonder, because there has been no clear light for them to follow.

Canada's weapons policy at the present time is a matter of urgent public importance. Perhaps we only now realize how serious was the Cuban crisis last October and how totally unprepared we were to take effective action. If this crisis has driven politicians in all parties to come to some decision on this important question then perhaps indeed it has done some good. Events do not wait on us forever, and through lack of decision our freedom can easily be lost. If we look back it is not difficult to see that the government has in fact committed us to a policy whereby, if we had no nuclear arms, we had no effective weapons for defence at all.

The CF-104 and the Voodoo aircraft, the Honest John rocket launcher and the Bomarc missile were all designed for maximum effect with nuclear warheads. Their empty mouths mock us if we do not arm them as they were intended to be armed; yet now we learn the Bomarc is no longer to be used by the United States. In fact it has rapidly become obsolete altogether. The government of Canada has at no time admitted it had a nuclear policy. Rather we have had the pathetic spectacle of our minister of external affairs respected as the apostle of disarmament and negotiated peace at the United Nations while, at the same time, the Minister of National Defence travels about the country and the world telling us we need nuclear weapons, and all the while the Prime Minister of this country sits in between remaining evasive and uncommitted. It is no wonder the Canadian people are confused.

On the other hand the leader of the Liberal party can hardly be proud that it took him three years of shilly-shallying to come down at last to a recognizable position on nuclear policy. He is a winner of the Nobel peace prize, a man known to be one of the best versed Canadians in the field of foreign affairs, a man who should know, if anyone knows in this country, the ins and outs of NATO policies and our commitments and our responsibilities to our allies. He is the man who hopes one day to become prime minister of this country.

How long has this man been evading his responsibility of bringing to the people of Canada a clear statement of policy regarding the question of nuclear armament? I ask him to state just what are our commitments to NATO and to NORAD. I would like to know. Or does he know? I think it was Mark Twain who once said that it is always good to know the facts before you twist them. Did the Cuban crisis and the developing political situation force him to announce a decision? Perhaps it was on the advice of the former commander of NATO, General Norstad. Or was it another instance of political expediency? Why have not the Liberals advocated before today Canada joining the organization of American states?

An hon. Member: They have.

Mr. Thompson: Why did they not do so when they were in government because, as the previous speaker has stated, the invitation to join the organization of American states has been there for many, many years. This is why I believe that today Canada needs leadership, a statement of what is its policy and what are the facts as they relate not only to our commitments but to our responsibility, to our people, to our nation and to our friends and allies.

We are at war with communism. The war is not a "hot" war at the present time. Pray God that it never will become that. It is a war, none the less. It is the expressed determination of the leaders of communist nations to force their will and their way of life on the free nations of the world. It was Khrushchev himself who said, "We will bury you"—and he means just that. He now thinks it can be done without the use of nuclear conflict, but the Chinese communists have other ideas. They mutually agree, though, on the subversion of our institutions and our government by infiltration, by economic techniques—yes, and by destroying our will to resist. This is the greatest danger that threatens us in this war, because brainwashing as far as the communists are concerned is nothing more or less than a method of destroying the will to resist. Certainly we can hardly expect to peacefully co-exist with men who deny and reject the moral laws which we accept and by which we live. The leaders of communism make no attempt to conceal this fact. The problem is simply that we refuse to hear, or if we hear, we refuse to understand.

In the face of reality I suggest that there are three alternatives before us. One is that we become neutral; second, that we join the forces of the east in this ideological struggle; third, that we join the forces of the west. Now just let us look at this simply. Neutrality does not pay. In fact, there is no dogma, there is no intolerance so intolerant as neutralism. Certainly Canada has no part, nor do Canadians have any part, in neutrality. It took a long time for Mr. Nehru to wake up to this fact, but he now has. It is impossible for us to join the opposite side in this cold war. If we stop for a moment and recognize the heritage that is ours in this free land of ours, certainly these are the things that we ought to hold most dear, and there can be no place for us whatever on the other side. Therefore we are put without equivocation on the side of the free world, and as one of the larger of the small nations we must stand with our friends; we must stand on those principles which we know are true and then, when all has been done, stand again. This is our responsibility and it is only in the light of this that we can actually face up to the problems that we have.

Mr. Krushchev in speaking to the world has made it very clear that he is against nuclear wars. His reason for saying this is simply that he knows that in a nuclear war no one could emerge a victor and that both sides would be destroyed. Instead he favours war of his own design that will speed the day of the communist take-over. He promises to support the inevitable revolutionary wars such as we now have in Laos. He calls these wars "people's wars", wars of liberation; he calls them sacred wars. He has not changed his opinion on that. They are inspired and led by the communists themselves. He intends to abolish the occupation regime in Berlin, as the dividing wall has already told us. The new front of active struggle centering in Cuba is regarded as something which all communists regard as a duty to support. Let us not think that just because a few missiles have been taken away from Cuba the danger in Cuba has disappeared. All one has to do is read the newspapers of today or yesterday to understand that. Nevertheless, where the transition to communism can be accomplished by peaceful means, no war is desired. Otherwise communists must encourage armed uprising and civil war. They believe capitalism is doomed and is declining in power and prestige. That communism is the invincible force of our age is their basic conviction. Mr. Chairman, may I call it five o'clock?

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It being five o'clock, it is my duty to leave the chair in order that the house may proceed to the consideration of private members' business, pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15.

Progress reported.

ATLANTIC DEVELOPMENT BOARD

ANNOUNCEMENT OF APPOINTMENTS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I realize that this is private members' hour but I wonder whether the house would agree to revert to motions in order to permit me to make an announcement regarding the Atlantic development board. It will only take a very short time.

Mr. Speaker: The Prime Minister seeks the unanimous consent of the house to revert to motions. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thank the house. I wish to announce the appointment of the chairman and members of the Atlantic development board. Hon. members know that this board is being established under an act passed earlier in the session and will have the responsibility of investigating and reporting upon measures and projects for fostering the economic growth and development of the Atlantic region.

The chairman of the board will be Brigadier J. Michael S. Wardell of Fredericton, New Brunswick, the publisher of the daily Gleaner and also that well known monthly magazine The Atlantic Advocate. Mr. Wardell has been tremendously interested in expanding the economy of the Atlantic provinces. The other four members of the board will be Mr. Frank H. Sobey of Stellarton, Nova Scotia; Mr. Melvin McQuaid of Souris, Prince Edward Island; Mr. Fred Ayre of St. John's, Newfoundland; and Mr. Donat LaLande of Moncton, New Brunswick. Mr. Sobey is the chairman of Sobey's Stores Limited of Stellarton; chairman of the United Steel Corporation Limited; and president of Industrial Estates Limited. He is also a director of a number of firms, including Maritime Steel and Foundries Limited, Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation Limited, the Nova Scotia Trust Company, and so forth.

Mr. Melvin McQuaid is a well known public figure in Prince Edward Island, who from 1958 to 1962 was provincial treasurer and attorney and advocate general of that province. Mr. Fred Ayre of St. John's, Newfoundland, is managing director of Bowring Bros. Limited, one of the largest, if not the largest, merchandising establishments in Newfoundland, with branches in Labrador, Halifax, Nova Scotia, and Montreal, Quebec.

Mr. Donat LaLande of Moncton, New Brunswick, is the assistant general manager of the maritime district, Provincial Bank of Canada, who has also throughout the years devoted himself to the welfare of the maritime provinces.

The act provides that members of the board are appointed to hold office for a term of five years, except that of those first appointed one shall be appointed for three years and two shall be appointed for four years. Accordingly, the term of the chairman and Mr. Sobey will run for five years, that of Mr. McQuaid and Mr. Ayre for four years, and that of Mr. LaLande for three years. The government is very appreciative of the fact that these five outstanding representatives of the Atlantic region have agreed to serve as the first directors of this important new institution.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, whatever our views have been of the legislation, I am sure that everyone in the house will be glad that this board has now been appointed. Our hope will be that it will set to work without delay and that there will be some projects forthcoming for approval at the earliest possible date.

Mr. Speaker: It now being five o'clock the house will proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely private bills as appearing on page 15.

PRIVATE BILLS

THE PHARMACY EXAMINING BOARD OF CANADA

Mr. D. R. Mitchell (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the house for unanimous approval for the precedence of private Bill No. S-15 standing in my name, which is No. 447 on today's order paper.

Mr. Speaker: Unanimous consent of the house is asked by the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Mitchell) that item 447 should come to the head of the list in precedence to the first item. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Mitchell moved the second reading of Bill No. S-15, to incorporate the Pharmacy Examining Board of Canada.

Motion agreed to, bill read a second time and referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

MARION RUTH CATHERINE SLATTERY

The house in committee on Bill SD-5, for the relief of Marion Ruth Catherine Slattery —Mr. Mandziuk—Mr. Paul in the chair.

On clause 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, we are being asked today to grant a divorce to Marion Ruth Catherine Slattery, who lives in the city of Montreal. We note that in this case the people concerned are quite young. They have been separated and there has been a history of some disagreement. We also note that there is a rather unique feature in the bill in that the investigators are not the normal class of investigator but are related to the petitioner. As in all cases where there are investigators and where investigation must be proven, I think there is also a desire to give more credence to the evidence of those who are not interested for financial reasons in the case. But where there are blood relations involved there are other interests which must also be given consideration.

In this case it seems to me that we must look at the evidence. I think it is important to look at the questions asked. The questions commence on page 2, and I should like to point out that in reading the evidence I found that the barrister-at-law from Montreal in my opinion did a very good job and asked the questions in a way in which I think they should be asked. I certainly would commend his handling of the case to other lawyers who I think have not done as well.

The questions start in this way:

Q. Mrs. Slattery, were you born in Montreal?
A. Yes.
Q. Have you lived there all your life?
A. Yes.
Q. Was your husband born in Montreal?
A. Yes.
Q. Has he lived there all his life?
A. Yes.
Q. Is he still living in Montreal, to your knowledge?
A. Yes.
Q. Is he employed in Montreal?
A. Yes.
Q. Do you know the firm for which he works?
A. The Weekend Picture Magazine.
Q. Do you know how long he has been employed by that company?
A. About 10 years.
Q. So far as you know does he intend to remain in Montreal, Canada?
A. Yes.

Mr. Chairman, I think that in this case counsel has established the matter of domicile in a straightforward way and has asked the questions which are sometimes not asked, but which in this case have been well presented.

Then the chairman asked:

Q. How old is your husband?
A. 32.

Q. Did you cohabit with your husband and live as man and wife after you were married?
A. Yes.
Q. Were there any children born of your marriage?
A. No.
Q. How many times have you separated from your husband?
A. Twice.
Q. When was the first occasion?
A. In June of 1959.
Q. What were the immediate causes of that separation?
A. He was constantly going away on week ends by himself, and when I asked him to explain his absence he wouldn't tell me and he didn't treat me very well, so I went to my mother's.
Q. When was this?
A. In June of 1959.

Mr. Chairman, you will notice that the difficulty which developed in this marriage developed after the marriage had been in effect for something like three years. Mr. Chairman, if you would give some consideration to a suggestion which has been made by many hon. members in this committee which is in the form of a bill now before the house, it would seem to me that if a court was handling this particular case and had been available to this couple, in view of the fact that this marriage had a reconciliation feature about it and the marriage had been in effect for three years, if family counselling had been available this is probably one of the cases which would not have come before us. If we are going to continue as we appear to be continuing and to operate as a pseudo-court, if we were to establish for ourselves the services of a family court, which would have all the machinery available to such an institution, which would allow for the assistance and the rendering of advice to this particular couple during the period when the marriage was already in jeopardy, when there had been a temporary separation and the marriage was later resumed, then it seems to me this marriage might have been saved.

It seems to me that as a court we should have the right and the obligation to suggest whenever it seems advantageous that assistance be made available, and be made available by competent people on the instruction of the appropriate court, in order to see that a reconciliation of the marriage is attempted and is worked for. Because it is generally assumed, I think correctly so, that the institution of marriage, lying in the public domain, is of public interest and therefore the public has an obligation to see that the element of matrimony is maintained at as high a degree as possible. I think this can be accomplished in many cases by the use of a family court and the machinery which would be available for counselling services.

After the second reconciliation took place the wife returned to her husband. She had lived at her mother's house for the period of her separation which was of very short duration, namely four or five days and she had returned to her husband. Fortunately in this case, while the couple were quite young and probably ill advised in some of their actions, the mother of the girl insisted that the couple return and after four or five days had persuaded her daughter to go back to the husband. The questioning continues as follows:

Q. How were things after you went back? A. For a while they were fine and then in November, 1959, he started the same things again, going away week ends by himself and he wouldn't explain his absence. When I asked him why he didn't take me he said, "If you want to go out, go out. I don't care what you do".

I think this is an indication that if the services I mentioned had been available at that time we might not be considering this case today. There was a period of time in which the marriage had actually been re-entered upon successfully and not much objection was taking place at the time. The questioning continues:

Q. Did you have regular quarrels after these week ends of absence? A. Yes.

Q. Did he treat you badly during these quarrels? A. Yes.

Q. What did you do after this? A. When I would ask him where he was he wouldn't answer me and he pushed me aside and told me not to bother him. I would ask him, "Where were you? Where have you been?" And on one occasion he grabbed me and tried to choke me and he said, "Look, don't bother me. It's none of your business where I go."

Q. When was the occasion of your second and final separation? A. In May of 1960.

Q. How did that come about, exactly? A. He was away for the whole week end. On the Saturday night I was afraid to stay by myself because the people in the building were away. I was alone in the building.

Q. What did you do? A. I went down to my mother's place on Saturday night.

Q. Did you try to communicate with your husband during the week end? A. Yes. I phoned him all week end and I couldn't reach him until the evening of Sunday night.

Q. What happened when you reached him at that time? A. I called him and all I said to him was, "I am at my mother's". And he said, "Good, stay there".

Q. Have you lived with him since that time? A. No, I haven't.

Q. You have stayed with your mother since that date? A. Yes.

Q. What did you do the next day, Monday? A. I left the next day. I went home and took some of my clothing with me and I went back to my mother.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I think he is now reading the evidence in this case. When he is doing that, he is reading a speech. I should like to refer the hon. member to Beauchesne's fourth edition, page 124, citation 144:

It is a rule in both houses of parliament that a member must address the house orally, and not read from a written, previously prepared speech, for the reason that, "if the practice of reading speeches should prevail, members might read speeches that were written by other people, and the time of the house be taken up in considering the arguments of persons who were not deserving of their attention.

I think the hon. member may say a few words about the evidence in this case but I am sure he will try not to read in extenso the evidence in the case.

Mr. Scott: Speaking to the point of order, Mr. Chairman, may I say this. Surely, on reconsideration, you will alter your ruling which seems to be an incredible one. The hon. member for Timiskaming is not reading a speech. He is presenting to the committee some evidence from the transcript of evidence taken in the other place. How that evidence could, by any stretch of the imagination, be construed as a speech, I find it extremely difficult to understand. If the hon. member had written his remarks out and then had purported to read them to the committee, I could see some merit in your ruling, Mr. Chairman. However, what he is doing here is reading into the record from a transcript of evidence those portions which he considers to be very important. I am completely at a loss to understand how that procedure comes under the heading of reading a speech. I wonder whether you, Mr. Chairman, could explain it to me in language which I could comprehend.

The Deputy Chairman: If the hon. member refers to citation 144 he will find these words in the last lines:

—and the time of the house be taken up in considering the arguments of persons who were not deserving of their attention.

That is the reason why I asked the hon. member for Timiskaming not to read all the evidence in this case. I am sure that, with co-operation, we can discuss the whole of this problem without reading the evidence that has been given in the other place.

Mr. Barnett: If I may, Mr. Chairman, I should like to say just a word on the point of order that has been raised. With reference to your last remarks may I say that I feel sure you would not be suggesting that matters which have been given in evidence in the other place are matters which are not worthy of the attention of members of this House of Commons. In addition to that—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I do not think the hon. member understood what I said. I never said that. I asked the hon. member for Timiskaming not to read all the evidence. He may advance arguments and make remarks about it but I asked him not to read all the evidence. I never asked him not to make any remarks about the evidence that has been given in the other place.

Mr. Orlikow: Surely, Mr. Chairman, the only person who can decide how much of the evidence in a particular case is germane to his argument is the member who is speaking. I presume that, some time during this session, we shall be discussing a subject such as the Columbia river pact. I presume that certain members, and perhaps some on the government side, will wish to quote extensively from the evidence which was given before the committee which studied the pact. Surely Mr. Speaker is not going to decide when a member, whether he sits on this side of the chamber or on the other side, will have quoted enough of the evidence. Surely this is not reading somebody else's speech. Hon. members may or may not think that the evidence which the hon. member for Timiskaming is referring to is important. However, surely only the member involved can make a decision on that matter.

The Deputy Chairman: I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North misunderstands the duty of the chairman of the committee. I should like to read to him standing order 59, paragraph 2:

Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

And also paragraph 4:

The chairman shall maintain order in committees of the whole house, deciding all questions of order subject to an appeal to the house; but disorder in a committee can only be censured by the house, on receiving a report thereof.

Mr. Orlikow: Since the only item before the committee is a particular divorce action and since the hon. member for Timiskaming is quoting from the evidence with regard to that divorce action, surely he is in order, as there is nothing else to discuss.

The Deputy Chairman: I think the hon. member is not following the citation. He is reading, and that is the reason I asked the hon. member for Timiskaming not to read his speech. He can make any comments about the evidence he pleases but I ask him not to read all the evidence.

Mr. Scott: Speaking still to the point of order, Mr. Chairman, I would not want you to think that in anything you say we are in any way questioning your authority. We have always found you to be extremely fair and very courteous in all the dealings you have had with us in the house. Therefore anything we say is in no way intended to reflect upon you; indeed, we hold you in the highest esteem. But I should like to ask you, if you would be so kind as to give me your indulgence, to explain to me your ruling that the hon. member for Timiskaming cannot read this evidence.

I must confess I am completely confused. When you first objected you said that the member was reading his speech, and when this was discussed with you you then said that according to the citation we were referring to matters not suitable for the house to consider. When that was discussed you then said that the hon. member was reading long citations. Now we seem to be back to a ruling that he cannot read the evidence. I am wondering what the ruling is.

The hon. member for Timiskaming is purporting to read into the records of the house portions of the transcript of evidence taken in the other place on which this bill is based. It seems to me that is relevant and should be available for the consideration of members of the house. I wonder whether you would restate the ruling why the hon. member cannot read this evidence into the proceedings here.

The Deputy Chairman: Perhaps I can give my ruling in French and with the translation I am sure the hon. member will understand well what I said.

(Translation):

I asked the hon. member not to read in extenso all the evidence submitted during the inquiry by the Senate committee.

I suggested that the hon. member confine himself to commenting on the evidence, referring to part of it when necessary, but he is not to read it because that would amount to reading a speech and I cannot allow it.

That is what I meant when I asked the hon. member to abide by the rules of the house.

(Text):

Mr. Peters: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for your guidance. I should like to say that I am not reading entirely from the evidence. You also have my assurance that I am not reading from a speech. I have the original certified copy of the transcript of the actual evidence from the other place and it is certainly not a speech, although these transcripts may be a collection of speeches by barristers, senators, petitioners, respondents and various other witnesses.

I think that to paraphrase some of the evidence would not be a fair way to present the case. Unfortunately many members of the house do not get the evidence and I should not like to give an improper presentation of the evidence by paraphrasing rather than referring directly to it. However, you have my assurance that it is not a speech I have here but rather the transcript of evidence obtained from the other place.

As I was pointing out, in this particular case there was considerable opportunity to do something if the circumstances had been right, and in referring to the evidence and making some comment on it I should like to say that I think it highlights our inability to assist these people when assistance is needed most.

Hon. members will notice from the evidence that in 1962 the respondent was 25 years old and that the marriage took place on June 16, 1956 when she was only 19 years old. While she was of the age of legal consent, I believe we leave to chance many times the obligations we have under the matrimonial causes act. There is little education along this line and I think that we may have failed in this case to take advantage of what I believe was an obvious opportunity for the operation of marriage counselling services. It may be, and rightly so, that in many cases it is a responsibility of the faiths to which these people belong to provide this type of counselling. I am sure that in many cases this is done and that advice along this line is provided.

However, I think it would be advisable for us to consider certain points in looking at a case of this kind. The marriage took place in 1956 and it was 1959 before trouble developed. The marriage staggered along until the spring of 1961 when there was a final break-up. It seems to me that there was an opportunity in this case for some type of family counselling. The British North America Act has given us the right to do these things and to make regulations and laws, and I would point out that I have already placed a bill before the house which would accomplish this end if it were adopted.

The very serious problem which developed here and which resulted in this young lady coming to parliament and asking for a divorce from her husband could quite possibly have been eliminated, particularly in the period from May, 1960 to 1961 when the marriage finally broke up. It is unfortunate in this case that the necessity arose of presenting such evidence as is found in the latter part of the transcript. There is evidence that the marriage which took place on June 16, 1956 was consummated but there were no children.

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired. I have given him additional time because of the points of order that were raised.

Mr. Peters: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Scott: In rising to speak on this bill, I want to say that I do so reluctantly. This afternoon in the house we have been talking about matters of world-wide importance, matters concerning all the countries of the world, problems relating to the survival of mankind, peace and war, and now at five o'clock the whole machinery of the House of Commons grinds to a stop. These great matters of world-wide importance are set aside and we begin to discuss the problems of divorce.

I have read the evidence in this particular case. It is a well documented case. There is no reason why it should not go through. Everything appears to be in order, and I hope that the committee will pass the bill this afternoon. As I say, I am reluctant to speak on it at all. It is unfortunate we could not ask for the unanimous consent of the house to continue discussing the world-wide problems that were before us. Indeed, to me it is a tragedy that these items are pushed aside while we consider matters of this kind. I do hope that during this session some action will be taken by the members of the house so that we will not continually be put in this absurd and tragic position.

Mr. Peters: While I agree with what the hon. member for Danforth has said, I think it should be pointed out that the members of this house have taken unto themselves the responsibility for adjudicating upon each case. Since that has been done, I believe we are going to have to find some new way of doing this. If I were to adjudicate on this case, I would say that I agree with the hon. member for Danforth when he says that this is a good case.

However, Mr. Chairman, I think this case has the same problem attached to it as all other cases have which come before us. We have to look at this evidence very closely because we are setting ourselves up as a quasi court. I am prepared to study this case and bring some matters to the attention of the committee. I believe we should consider the evidence as carefully as we do in any other case. In looking through the evidence I notice that the lawyer very carefully and skilfully leads the witness through a number of questions in order to establish certain facts. I am wondering if the same evidence would have been given if the witness had been allowed to make her own presentation rather than just answer questions. It seems to me that in this case the lawyer handled it very well. He asked questions such as these:

Q. Did you have regular quarrels after these week ends of absence?
A. Yes.
Q. Did he treat you badly during these quarrels?
A. Yes.
Q. What did you do after this?
A. When I would ask him where he was he wouldn't answer me and he pushed me aside and told me not to bother him. I would ask him, "Where were you? Where have you been?" And on one occasion he grabbed me and tried to choke me and he said, "Look, don't bother me. It's none of your business where I go".

In reading this evidence it would appear that they had a nice quarrel, a very quiet quarrel. You might as well have said, "After you Alphonse". It seems to me the language does not indicate the fact that the young lady has been choked; he says, "Look, don't bother me." It seems to me the questioning is rather leading.

We come now in this case to the establishment of the charge of adultery, and I think this is fairly important. I should like the hon. member for Danforth, if time is available, to say something on the legal aspects of a problem we have here. This problem is indicated by these questions and answers:

Q. Mrs. Slattery, what has happened since that time to lead you to believe that your husband has been living with another woman?
A. Well, he lives in the same area in Verdun as I do and I saw him in his car with another woman and they had a little baby in the car with them.
Q. Did you recognize this other woman?
A. Yes I knew her from the area.
Q. Are you personally acquainted with her?
A. No.
Q. Do you know her name?
A. Yes.
Q. What is her name?
A. Joan Tibbo.

Q. On this occasion when you say you saw her with your husband in his car with the little baby did you inquire about this?
A. Yes, I did.

If the hon. gentleman wishes to carry on a conversation, I hope he will speak a little louder. Now, I am only annoyed by the mutterings but I would be quite happy to answer a question if he wants to ask one.

Mr. Legare: I am just helping you to kill time.

Mr. Peters: I would be very happy to have the hon. member discuss this case if he sees fit.

I would make this point. The evidence given establishes that, before the divorce procedure was set up, the true reason for the divorce is established rather than the adultery charge which is dealt with later. I should like the hon. member for Danforth to consider the fact that, here is a woman who presumes her husband is living with another woman who has a child. This, in itself, would be fairly strong evidence that adultery had been committed. It does not seem as though any effort has been made to hide the fact that there is a child. I believe, therefore, that the basis of this case is a common law arrangement, which is not necessarily an adulterous arrangement; but in a case where a child is born adultery would be presumed.

I believe this would be the grounds in this case rather than the grounds established in the evidence. I feel that this is a technical point. I notice, too, that there is an interest on the part of the wife herself who did not go out and hire lawyers to get the evidence that must be produced before this tribunal. My point is that I do not believe we should go through all the procedures since there appear to be grounds established in the early part of the evidence that are more legitimate than the grounds that are developed later in the evidence.

I believe the fact that she is commonly accepted as his wife in that part of the community, of having a child accepted by him in that part of the community, and of establishing a common law domicile habitation in that area should establish the grounds for divorce, and not the grounds that are later developed. These grounds involve the brother of the girl and her mother. Maybe the committee would be interested in what happened. They go to the house, and it is interesting to note that again the mother comes in. She seems to be a very intelligent woman and says that the daughter should take a trip and go on holidays to think the matter over very seriously before she does anything about it. On returning from the holiday the mother and daughter both go to see a lawyer to get information about how to get a divorce.

This is the part that seems to me rather foolish, that in normal circumstances the establishment and non-denial of the establishment of a common law marriage in itself should not be an acceptable ground before this committee. It is quite true that we have not amended the Canada divorce act, that we have in it only provision for divorce on the grounds of adultery, but it seems to me there should be an amendment to the rules in the other place to allow for a divorce on the grounds of cohabitation with someone other than the marriage partner. This should be very easily established if there is an issue of that common law union.

In this case the normal procedure is gone through. The brother, the wife and the mother go to the apartment of the husband and they enter it. Incidentally she decided that she was not going to go there but she said she discussed it with her lawyer.

Q. Did you inquire about anything else with Mr. Rohrick at this time?
A. Yes, I told him I had been trying to get some personal things and my husband wouldn't let me have them, and I said, "Can I go to the apartment and get them?"
Q. What personal things were these?
A. I had a portable sewing machine I wanted and some crystal I bought before I got married.
Q. And your husband wouldn't give you these things?
A. No, and he said he would have me arrested if I went to the house because I had left on my own accord.
Q. Did you still have the key to the apartment?
A. Yes.
Q. What did Mr. Rohrick tell you?
A. Mr. Rohrick said that he couldn't have me arrested, that I could go but he said, "You best bring somebody with you to witness that you are just taking what is yours."
Q. And did you do this?
A. Yes.

Incidentally, Mr. Chairman, this reminds me of the R.C.M.P. going into somebody's place just taking what is theirs, and doing so in many cases without what seems to be the proper advice being given.

Anyway, they arrive on Tuesday night, September 26, 1961 and she is accompanied by her brother and mother. They open the door with the key and the brother goes in first. They go into the bedroom and again there is the same kind of problem. Maybe, Mr. Chairman, this is only because they are not qualified detectives and have not had the experience of some other detectives; because in the whole shuffle—and I do not want to read it all—they missed the baby. In the contention I put forward the baby would be an important part of our consideration; but if you will notice they went into the house, the brother went down the hall and into the bedroom, and the husband was at the door of the bedroom. The brother met him and while he was putting on a bathrobe over his pyjamas the question is asked:

Q. How many bedrooms were in that apartment?
A. Just one.
Q. In this bedroom was your husband alone?
A. No.
Q. Who was with him?
A. The same girl who was in the car with him.
Q. Miss Joan Tibbo?
A. Yes.
Q. Where was she?
A. She was in the bed.
Q. Do you recall the exact date of this visit to the apartment?
A. 26th September, 1961.
Q. Where was this Joan Tibbo?
A. She was in the bed too.
Q. How many beds were there in that room?
A. Just one.

Mr. Chairman, I wonder at this point what would happen if there were two beds in that room. What would the senators do in that particular case? Somebody says "Look under the bed." In this particular case the question was not asked if they looked under the bed. Maybe the committee would be interested some time in finding two beds in one bedroom to see what kind of situation would develop.

Q. What kind of a bed was it?
A. Double bed.
Q. What part of the bed was she in?
A. The side near the wall.
Q. Do you recall what she was wearing?
A. She had baby doll pyjamas on.

This may be the advisor to the other famous detective who always had the girls dressed in baby dolls. They may have been blue or pink but they were always baby dolls. Maybe it was not the detective who thought this up. Maybe it was the lawyer in the case who thought it up.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Peters: Some lawyers have lots of imagination, I have found.

Q. Did you notice any articles of her clothing around the room?
A. Yes, there were some things showing on the chair, a slip and some other things.

A number of other questions follow which I do not think are of any importance and the question is asked:

Q. Could you tell whether the bed had been occupied by the two of them before you got there?
A. Yes, because there were marks on the pillows and the bed clothes were thrown back.
Q. What did you do then?
A. My brother said, "Let's get out of here", so we turned around and walked out.

I notice in walking out they did not take either the crystal or the sewing machine. They may have been excited. There may have been other things said but it surprises me that they did not stop for the sewing machine or crystal.

Q. You have not, of course, lived with your husband at all since that day?
A. No.
Q. Have you received any support financially from your husband since that day?
A. No.

They then go on to ask what she earns and then the chairman intervenes and said:

Deal with collusion and connivance.

I am very pleased to see that was done. This is something we could recommend to some of our provincial courts to deal with, so that judges would keep this in mind and refer to it.

By Mr. Greenberg:

Q. Has there been any collusion between your husband and yourself to obtain this divorce?
A. No.

By the Chairman:

Q. You know what that means?
A. Yes, I do.
Q. You have not made any arrangements with your husband to get this divorce?
A. I have not spoken to him.
Q. You have not connived at or planned the adultery in any way.
A. No.
Q. You have not condoned the adultery, forgiving your husband?
A. No.

The reason I believe this is very important is because of the fact that in a case like this it is quite likely that the young lady herself would decide that, and she has indicated there was no chance of reconciliation, and because there is no chance of reconciliation she really is getting the divorce on the basis of the common law marriage that is in effect. This is the point I would like the lawyers to consider, that in the legislative sense it would be much easier for us to say the divorce is being granted on the basis of the common law alliance rather than on this particular limited and very sketchy evidence which indicates absolutely nothing about adultery but that two people were together sleeping in this particular bed. I believe the adultery is much more clearly indicated in the common law alliance which has resulted in an issue, and at this point I would wish some of the legal pundits in this court would give it their consideration. Then Mr. Greenberg, the counsel, asked the question I was concerned with before:

Q. Would you take your husband back at this time?
A. No, not when there is a baby involved, I wouldn't.

By the Chairman:

Q. Was the baby in the room when you went in there?
A. It wasn't in the bedroom. The living room was in darkness so I don't know if it was there.

I wonder why she did not ask when she went to get the crystal and the sewing machine. She might then have found out whether the baby was there. Mr. Chairman, while I agree that this is a good case and would probably go through in court, has adultery, in your able opinion, been proved in this case? Was the baby borrowed from one of the neighbours to create a situation which would set up this investigation? I would think that if the baby was there, if there was a baby in fact in the whole procedure, the common law alliance itself would of necessity have to be proved. The detectives in this case or, as it happened, the sleuths—the wife, the mother and the brother—should have scouted around and found out whether this baby was in fact living there. At this time the baby was probably old enough to be out and around. I suggest that is a very important part of the evidence.

Normally there are other matters that detectives consider, but in this case the evidence concerning the charge of adultery appears to be of a very stereotyped nature, and I would suggest that perhaps some coaching was carried out in connection with the answers given. I hope I am not being discourteous in this regard.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I have to advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. Scott: Mr. Chairman, I was not intending to speak again on the bill but at the urging of my hon. friend I will give an opinion on the validity of the evidence in the hope that it will convince him to withdraw his objections and let the bill go through. My hon. friend seems to think that the case for passing the bill and granting relief has not been made out and I want to try to convince him that it has. But, Mr. Chairman, if he is going to invite legal opinions from hon. members of the house, I wish he would make it clear in what capacity he is consulting us, whether it is in our legislative or professional capacity, because there might be a difference to his pocketbook depending upon which classification is applied when he is asking the question. My hon. friend seems to think that because there is a common law arrangement here, all this is not satisfactory evidence. That is his point of view. I would like to assure him that as I interpret the law there is no such thing as a common law marriage. It is merely a polite name for living in sin. In the handling of divorce actions the whole arrangement of living together and passing yourselves off as man and wife is, of course, the very best evidence that you can have. Man being man, and woman being woman, the courts will assume that the necessary grounds have been proven and the marriage will of course be dissolved.

Therefore if that is the only objection that the hon. member for Timiskaming has to this particular bill, let me assure him that the evidence is there, the case has been proven, there is no reason why he should object further, and I urge him to lift his objection to this bill, to accept our assurance that the case has been made out, and to permit the committee to pass the bill.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I think that what has been said is probably true in a legal sense, and therefore I am satisfied that it is so. However, I think there is a legislative question, because we operate in this pseudo role, that must be dealt with by the House of Commons in this business of Quebec and Newfoundland divorces. I think the final discussion of the bill should concern the fact of how the divorce is paid for. I know that many hon. members have looked at the methods that have been used for paying for some of these cases, and know that the fact is that on occasion the other place sees fit to give a rebate of the payment to be made. Therefore we appreciate the questions put by Senator Kinley in which he asked about the financial arrangements of the petitioner. He starts by asking:

Q. Were you working during this period?
A. I have worked eight years. I have always worked.
Q. Ever since your marriage?
A. Yes.
Q. And you helped to support the household?
A. When I was married?
Q. Since you were married, what did you do with your money?
A. I used some of it for the house but I was able to save quite a bit because he has a very good job.

Then the chairman asked:

Q. Would you take your husband back if he wanted to come back?
A. I certainly would not.

Then Mr. Greenberg asked:

Q. Have there been any previous court proceedings of any kind between your husband and yourself relating to your marriage?
A. No.

Mr. Chairman, I think it is very interesting to have these questions asked in a straightforward way. This establishes one of the major facts in this case and puts it in a different light from some of the other cases we have considered, in that it would appear to me—and I think it would appear to other hon. members, on consideration—that this woman, working as she did as a secretary and earning a fairly good remuneration—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It being six o'clock, I shall rise, report progress and request leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house. Agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having now expired, the house will revert to the business that was interrupted at five o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Paul in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

1. Departmental administration, $7,305,200.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, belief in a democracy does not necessarily mean hostility toward or enmity of different ideologies. Our nature as Canadians is to be tolerant. In the beginning we did not want to come to the point where we would counter communism with war and armed strife. We may even be loath to admit it now, but we must admit that deep in our hearts we recognize that there can be no conciliation between communism and western democracy, any more than darkness can be conciliated with light, or wrong with right. It is time that we admitted this openly. However, we cannot be so foolish as to believe that we can preserve our way of life by force alone. Particularly at this present time should we realize that armed force is no longer the only means by which a country can prevail over its enemies. On the other hand we must also realize that we can never prevail in our cause in this world struggle if we allow ourselves to be overwhelmed by the force of an enemy. Thus we Canadians face up to the reality of world crises and the inherent dangers which face us, even now at this particular time.

The cold war is not one of our own choosing. The Canadian people want nothing more than to live in peace—to live in peace with themselves and with their neighbours. But we are at war because communism is at war with us, and if we wish to preserve our way of life we must fight for it or it will be wrested away from us. It is our responsibility as politicians to lay these things clearly before our people. The Canadian people want to be told the dangers which face them. We all want to do our part in our humble stations to secure freedom and safety for ourselves, for our families and for our country. Too much of the time our old line politicians take no decisive stand against this danger. Either they pooh-pooh it or else they pretend it is not there.

Since the end of world war II the free world has been pursuing a policy definitely designed to contain the communist menace. I believe this policy has been right, in spite of our government's indecisiveness at times. I believe we must stand for the way of life we believe in, one that respects the rights of an individual against the threat of a totalitarian government. I believe that if we are to win then we must adopt the best weapons at our disposal, and these are not military weapons alone. There can be no substitution for moral standards; let us never forget that.

To put the present situation in its proper perspective the over-all military picture must be considered from four aspects; from the moral aspect, from the economic aspect, from the political aspect, and from the strategic aspect. Let us look at the moral side of the picture first. In one sense Canada is already committed to nuclear arms. For 15 years she has been sheltering under the umbrella of the United States nuclear deterrent. I do not believe that it has been wrong to do that. If we are serious in our fight against communism, the choice is not simply nuclear arms or no nuclear arms. It does mean choosing the best weapons which will serve the national policy we have decided upon. Morally speaking, there is little difference between a rifle with a bullet in it and a Bomarc with a nuclear head on it.

In considering the moral aspect in its most extreme form, the nuclear bomb is basically one of mass destruction. This is the H-bomb. This is the bomb carried by the intercontinental ballistic missile, by the heavy bombers which fly overhead, by the Polaris submarines. It is the technique of warfare which brings about mass destruction. It brings the terror of total destruction to force the way of the aggressor upon an unwilling victim. This is the nuclear offensive weapon of mass destruction as carried by the carriers I have outlined.

Let us remember that there are also other weapons of mass destruction. There is bacteriological warfare, poison gas, ray warfare, the poisoning of food and water supplies. Yes, and even conventional arms may come under this classification. I was surprised when in Tokyo the other day to learn that in a number of single bombing raids during the last months of the war more people were killed in Tokyo than in the dropping of the atomic bomb at Hiroshima. I believe that the use of all such weapons is a crime against humanity and is not justifiable on any moral grounds whatsoever.

It should be made clear too that there are two types of nuclear weapons which do not fall within the category of weapons of indiscriminate or uncontrollable mass destruction. One is the ground-to-air missile of comparatively small range and limited fall-out and used for the purpose of military troops in the field. I believe that such weapons are entirely different from the heavy nuclear bomb of mass destruction. The decision for their adoption must be made on the basis of military advisability. I agree that our forces cannot be "sitting ducks" for an enemy which they face and which has superior weapons to what they have. A few weeks ago I visited the Canadian cemetery in Hong Kong. Here I found the grave markers of many a young Canadian who gave his life in December, 1942 to defend that outpost in world war II. These men were sent to defend Hong Kong ill-equipped, improperly trained, and they became easy prey for an enemy which they did not believe existed. This cannot happen again.

The second type of weapon is the nuclear-armed anti-missile missile, examples of which are the Bomarc or the Voodoo aircraft. The aim of such weapon is not to cause destruction of any person or territory but to destroy in flight hostile rockets or aeroplanes carrying these rockets which menace our country or continent. These are defensive weapons particularly as they relate to Canada in our geographic position, because by no means could they reach enemy territory.

Let us now look at the second aspect, namely the economic aspect. From the economic point of view Canada is a nation of limited population and resources placed in the uncomfortable position of being the buffer state between the United States of America and the U.S.S.R. I do not believe that Canada should or even could as a matter of fact, manufacture or obtain her own independent nuclear deterrent. It is significant that while the balance of world power would be small, the danger in extending the scope of the nuclear club would be great. Even Khrushchev has not allowed his satellites to have the nuclear bomb in their hands, not even in Cuba. We would be wise in Canada to respect this unwritten convention for the sake of keeping world tension to a minimum.

We must also consider the military and strategic aspect of this military picture. It is sound policy to say that any government is responsible to see to it that at all times their nation is prepared to defend herself against any aggressor or any intruder to the best of our physical and economic ability. It is also our responsibility and privilege to share in the collective security which we have without friends, and to fulfil any or all commitments it is necessary to make. However, our big problem now is that we do not know how far our commitments go. We do not know this with regard to NATO. We do not know whether or not we have any specific commitments to NORAD or NATO. Strategically our need goes further than that. We are losing this war against communism because we are not fighting on many fronts where the weapons are not shooting ones, as we know them, but rather weapons of intrigue, subversive propaganda, trade infiltration and economic disruption. We dare not be so smug as to think we can win this cold war using the methods of world war II or of world war I. If we are to develop a peaceful world we must get away from the use of force upon our fellow man. Rather, we must prefer to give him our help, our friendship, our trade. In the first instance, this responsibility extends to the nations who are one with us in the cold war struggle. I believe there are a number of points which more or less sum up this entire picture for us.

I think we should methodically approach these points in an intelligent way with the information we must have in order to do it. I believe our responsibility to our electorate requires this procedure.

First of all, what are the logical policies which develop out of this approach? On behalf of my party I pledge that Social Credit will never adopt or support a defence policy whereby Canada adopts or makes use of offensive weapons of indiscriminate or uncontrollable mass destruction. Canada should indeed use its best efforts to promote the complete abandonment of this type of armament throughout the world, through effectively supervised multilateral international agreement.

The second point concerns whether or not Canada should acquire nuclear defensive weapons at this time at home or with NATO. The leader of the Liberal party has said that we must acquire nuclear armaments in order to keep our commitments with NORAD, with NATO. This is a reversal of the policies he enunciated up until the last couple of weeks.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Thompson: I wish to ask him what these commitments are. Have we agreed to accept nuclear weapons or have we not done so?

An hon. Member: Ask the Prime Minister.

Mr. Thompson: I would ask the government, the Minister of National Defence, the Prime Minister the same question.

An hon. Member: And get three different answers.

Mr. Thompson: When we agreed to purchase Bomarcs, did we agree to equip them with nuclear warheads? What about the Starfighter? What about the Voodoo? Is the question of NATO weaponry a Canadian decision? Is it a bilateral decision or is it a multilateral decision? What is our responsibility to NATO? If it is secret let us say so, and tell the public. After all, that is the only way in which we can be informed. Let me say that this question of emotionalism is no basis upon which to settle the problem before us. How can this house make any sound decision before it has the facts. I say that the onus is on the government to make these necessary facts available. We on our side of the house agree that a special defence committee should be set up. It is absolutely imperative that a means of continued sound approach to the safety of this country be instituted. Let us not forget that consideration. We in Social Credit are convinced that Canada's defence policy must not be a matter of partisan politics or party squabbles.

The Prime Minister so far has refused to set up an all-party parliamentary committee on defence. We believe he is wrong in this refusal. It would be well for him to remember that this is a house of minorities and that neither he nor any of us knows which political party will be responsible for Canada's government and defence policy even three months from now. We ask that all parties together may have a chance to work out with proper information a constructive policy for our country in its relations with other nations of the world and in our own internal policy in which Canadians of every political allegiance can have confidence. The answer to this second point cannot be answered until we have the facts before us and until something of this type has been done. What if we should go into an election in the next week and another Cuban crisis arises during this election period? How could we meet our commitments then? What if there should be a change of government and if in the first few days of that government we should face a crisis? This is something that we collectively in this house of minorities ought to consider if we are to be responsible to the charge that is laid upon us. I believe that the nuclear question has been made far more complicated by the indiscriminate lumping together in the public mind of every variety and form of nuclear armament as if it all were identical. Nuclear weapons of tactical military use, such as the Bomarc, have been lumped together with 24 megaton nuclear bombs as if each would cause equal destruction and each had the same purpose.

Mr. Hellyer: By whom?

Mr. Thompson: I am speaking now of the public impression of this matter. It is becoming more and more apparent that no military force can afford to be without such tactical nuclear weapons when opposed by forces which have those weapons. Their deficiency in firepower would be so great that they could not longer be considered to be an effective fighting force. I believe it is ridiculous to use the argument that because the 24 megaton bomb is a bomb of mass destruction, there cannot be defensive weapons which in an emergency are legitimate. It is asking us to throw out the baby with the bath water. Whether such weapons are a defensive military necessity in the defence of our country, or whether we have given a commitment to an ally to adopt such defensive weapons, it is a question which must be answered now and it must be answered by this house. The government has the main responsibility in the matter simply because it is the government. It is the responsibility of this parliament to speak clearly on these points and it is the responsibility of the government to state clear their policy. However, all fit into the world picture to which we are now committed.

I should just like to make one more remark in connection with this second point. Canada for years now has been sheltering under the umbrella of the nuclear deterrent of the United States. For our own good I believe it is our duty and our responsibility to help keep this deterrent strong. I believe that we must assist in maintaining a strong surveillance system, an efficient anti-submarine force in full co-operation with the United States. These are just the facts of our geographic location. We must also equip our three services with sufficient highly mobile, conventional, effectively co-ordinated defence equipment. Such forces must be completely mobile in this day and age, equipped with only the best and most modern equipment. We should discard all land equipment which cannot be air-lifted. Our air force should be equipped with the best tactical aircraft and light and heavy transport. These permanent forces should be supported by strong forces of civilian soldiers and a university training program.

The Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

The Chairman: Does the committee give unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Thompson: Thank you very much. I appreciate this courtesy.

Third, I would say that we must intensify our efforts toward multilateral nuclear disarmament and total military disarmament. We must continue without respite our efforts through the United Nations and by international negotiations to obtain effective international disarmament. The enlargement of the nuclear club and the expansion of the nuclear stockpile must be stopped. Perhaps Mr. Khrushchev removed all the missiles from Cuban soil, but let us remember that just the other day in east Berlin he said that the 60 missiles from Cuba have become 120 missiles elsewhere. We are also told that communist China will have nuclear bombs within the next year or two. Surely civilization will never resort to the destruction of itself. As a pioneer, peace-loving friendly people Canadians can reach their evident place in destiny as champions for a sane, vitally needed armament control program.

At this point it is well to remember that effective disarmament can only come as a result of peace. Peace will never come as a result of disarmament. Disarmament will come as a result of peace. Because if we have no peace there is no chance of reaching a disarmament agreement as we think of it today. Nevertheless we must continue to work for it. Yes, Canada must continue to take part in disarmament negotiations wherever and whenever they might be held. We want to be there when the first crack in the wall appears that might lead us through to something that is definite in this regard. We want to be there when the first ray of light appears through the darkness that now divides the world and makes disarmament impossible. In addition it is our responsibility to make our services available and our influence felt in any armament control agreement that may come in the process of disarmament negotiations, however small it may be. Arms control even through international agreements can never bring about an established peace, though it can and will serve toward lessening the probability and the destructiveness of war and lead us on to the peace that we all agree we should have.

In the fourth place, I would say that on the positive side in our own hemisphere the need for Canada to join the organization of American states is urgent and it has been for many months. Bolivia can never survive without United States financial assistance. Peru may even vote in a communist government next year. The Argentine becomes more and more vulnerable. Venezuela and Guatemala are unstable. Panama threatens to be a hot spot. Cuba has already fallen. Communist penetration in all these areas is intense. The population of these countries is soaring. It is estimated that within 25 years the population of Latin America will double to more than 400 million people. Desperately they need the material and moral aid we can give from within the O.A.S., which is basically a non-military organization.

In the fifth place, we must turn to the positive role of mutual understanding and help. We will never be far wrong in our defence against communism if we think of those who need our aid as people who, without it, may turn to the communists because the communists tell them that they can do more for them. Communism and the forces of totalitarianism are on the march. We who care for the individual must go on the offensive also, to respect the rights and the desperate needs of the people, particularly those who live in the emerging nations. Can we do this if we are actually cutting back our foreign aid appropriation? This aid involves developing realistic trade and mutual assistance policies with our friends, so that our surpluses that we wish to export will go to them, not to the powers that are seeking to destroy both them and us. We must recognize that in the war which engages the attention of the greatest part of mankind, the war against want, we have been endowed by nature with the most plentiful supply of resources of any country in the world. Surely with these Canada can take a lead towards the development of the world's needy nations. This will prove far better in the long-range objective.

The sixth point I wish to bring to the attention of the house involves Canada's trade policies. They must be co-ordinated with her external affairs policies. Since one third of all jobs in Canada depend on exports, it is assumed that every sale we make abroad is beneficial to our economy and consequently to the well-being of the nation. This type of trade thinking is completely divorced from political considerations that might be involved. We simply trade with anyone who has the necessary cash or credit. This is in line with the old English principle and tradition which regards trade as a non-political activity and bars trade only with the enemy in wartime. Such an approach to world trade would be justified if all our trading partners regarded it in the same light. Unfortunately in the east-west conflict which has developed a whole scale of new methods of warfare trade is regarded and used by our adversary as a major weapon.

If we accept the premise that we are at war with the communists and that this war is being waged almost exclusively by non-military means, then we must change our concept of international trade. Whether we like it or not we must accept the fact that trade has become an integral and perhaps the basic and most important part of our struggle for the survival of freedom. Once we grasp this fact it should not be difficult to recognize the suicidal nature of our present trade policy. This does not only apply to the so-called strategic materials. Simply because the communists openly declare and emphatically pursue a policy which is intended to destroy our social system, when we strengthen them we are increasing their chances of reaching their goal.

The difficulty in recognizing the danger in trading with the communist bloc lies in the temporary material benefits which our economy derives from such trade. It is virtually impossible to persuade a manufacturer or an exporter or a farmer, shall we say, that trade with communist countries is in the long run suicidal. It is equally difficult for the government to recognize the danger when every increase in exports, regardless of where they go, helps to create jobs and stimulate domestic economic activity. Since employment and domestic activity are the main pillars of political and financial stability, every government in the free world and every government in the communist world as well is extremely reluctant to let consideration of the harsh realities enter into the trade picture, just as we are in setting up our pattern of foreign trade.

Individual and collective greed, whether we like to admit it or not, is the motivating power of the economies of the democratic countries and it makes it virtually impossible for the governments of these countries to correlate trade with foreign defence policies.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Thompson: Yes.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Would he agree that hunger is the greatest threat to peace today?

Mr. Thompson: I agree, and I would add that the greatest threat to peace as it relates to hunger lies in those countries that are still on the western side of this cold war and who would like to remain there. Just remember that hungry bellies do not care about votes and do not care about democracy. They need to have their wants satisfied.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): What about full bellies?

Mr. Thompson: I would say that if what you are referring to in your question actually reached the objective which you are thinking of then there might be more reason for your question, but I happen to know that the biggest part of it is not.

An hon. Member: How do you know?

Mr. Thompson: It is quite an easy fact to understand. Come along with me to the Far East and we will certainly find out for ourselves a lot more than you know at this time. Yet, I would say this; without such correlation we can never hope to fight effectively this strange new war that is being forced upon us by international communism. We will, in fact, trade ourselves into defeat and slavery. Moscow and Peking can at any time plunge us into serious economic difficulty, yes and political difficulty too; just remember that on the other side of the house. They can do this by suddenly stopping our exports and at the same time undercutting our prices, by flooding world markets with some of their own raw materials and products.

This may not happen tomorrow. It may not happen next year. But it is bound to happen eventually. The communists are not using trade for profit as we are. They are using trade for the mutual benefit of the participants as political weapons. At this stage of the global conflict they are agreeing to trade with us, to take as much of our exports as they can pay for or promise to pay for, because our flow of goods helps to build up their strength rapidly, even as it did for Hitler in the prewar years and also because it sucks us into dependency upon them.

It is a crying indictment of our policies that we are so blinded by the profit motive or by political expediency, for example, that we are digging our own graves. Our weak and insipid foreign, defence and trade policies are the direct result of our ideological blindness. This folly is neither new nor typically Canadian. It is characteristic of the inability of the west as a whole to comprehend the nature of the global struggle with communism in this cold war. It is also characteristic of our inability to comprehend that, in order to survive in this conflict, we cannot afford to put business interests before political and defence considerations.

Now, the issue would be clear if we were at war in the traditional way with the communist countries. We would then most certainly not trade with the enemy, just as we did not trade with the axis powers during the second world war. No amount of money would have induced us to ship grain or anything else to nazi Germany, Italy or Japan while the fighting was taking place. But has the picture changed at this point in the very basic issues? I do not think it has. The trouble, then, stems from the lack of realization that there is a direct conflict involving Canada. We are in every other sense at war with militant communism which makes no bones about its desire to destroy our political, economic and social structure. By permitting almost the total amount of our present trade expansion to develop with communist countries, be it for monetary gain or for reasons of domestic political expediency, we are helping them to accomplish their aim. There is nothing to beat such a policy for suicidal stupidity.

Now, just as defence, trade is an extension of foreign policy. To change our foreign trade we must, therefore, change our foreign policy. Any meaningful revision of our economic thinking must therefore start with a thorough examination of our role in the cold war. This whole issue we are talking about right now is more critical at this point than the question of nuclear arms. After the shocks of the Cuban emergency and the Chinese invasion of India, such a reappraisal can no longer be postponed. Since our national economy is deeply involved in the process, this debate is the logical place to start such a reappraisal. This is a debate of our defence policy, our foreign affairs policy, and I maintain interrelated with them is our trade policy.

Now, to be reasonable about this problem, we cannot cut off immediately or drastically reduce our trade with communist countries. This would undoubtedly have adverse effects on our economy. How can we minimize and gradually eliminate the harmful effects of the political impelling force in our foreign trade? This can be done basically by reorienting our trade to the areas of the free world. It might entail a complete revision of our commonwealth trade policies. The commonwealth is the logical place to begin such a reorientation. I maintain that at this particular time when Britain is having problems in joining the European common market, that this is the logical time to call for a commonwealth trade conference, and to call for it soon. I have said this before, and I believe the need is greater and the opportunity is greater at this point than it has been at any time in the last six months.

It is inevitable to the survival of Canada that ultimately we will have common market arrangements with the United States within a reasonable number of years. Let us take the initiative now in seriously exploring that proposition. Why do we wait? Why are we indecisive? Are we not able to grasp the things that are involved?

There is a tremendous opportunity for increased trade in the Caribbean area which is now waiting for action, not words, to quote a newspaper article in one of the Ottawa newspapers last night. The entire American hemisphere will eventually provide a better outlet for our exports than all of the trade we could ever develop with communist countries, with the great population and the tremendous market potential it has. In this regard, it is interesting to note that just last week Soviet Russia worked out a deal to expand her wheat trade with Brazil. In fact, the expected trade increase with Brazil is going to be 50 per cent greater this next year than it was last year.

What about the cold war? We can go on and on talking about these opportunities that we have, but we must consider them in their full light. I would say that in addition there is a seventh point that is very important. I refer to our own financial and economic position. We all agree that per capita Canada is one of the richest nations in the world. We all agree that while we have a high standard of living, our financial and economic system has not permitted the expansion that should have developed. We can never survive in Canada with 18 million people. I notice that Japan is intending to double its gross national product in the next ten years. I believe that this is something we can do, too. Our population can be increased by 50 per cent in the same period. It is because of the defects in their economic systems that the governments of the rich nations of the world have come to rely more and more on the production of instruments of war which do not have to be sold in any market place to distribute income and provide employment for their workers. This was the method used by the axis powers prior to the beginning of world war II.

I am frightened that this very same economic technique of the placing of armament contracts to promote full employment has even become evident in our own policies in Canada. It is apparent in the United States also, that they are using the machinery of an expanded arms and space program financed through deficit financing, to keep the nation's economy in a state of buoyancy. It is idle for us to expect permanent peace in the world when the pressures of our economic system, enhance the possibility of a profitable contract to the armaments manufacturers, when employment and the means of life for great numbers of workers—directly or indirectly—demand the continuation of the arms race to prevent an uncontrollable recession. If we seek the long term lessening of world tensions, it is time that we studied very closely the workings of our capitalist economy, and the economies of the countries in the free world, to find out by what paradox it is that when we prepare ourselves for the very wasteful destructiveness of war, we become rich instead of poor.

This is one of the reasons that during the years of the Liberal administration from 1945, shall we say, to 1955, we had prosperity. It was simply because we were living off all the prosperity that developed as a result of world war II. Therefore I think it is high time we in Canada looked at this thing in the over-all perspective in order that we face up to the responsibilities that are before us. Thus I believe the debate in which we are taking part is at the right time and is the ideal place for us to begin a real, soul-searching look into the problems we face in our relationships with the rest of the world.

So far as external affairs are concerned we cannot separate defence policies or trade policies. I believe of all people in the world we, because of our heritage, because of who and what we are, are standing on the threshold of a new era of greatest expansion and development for the human race. I say let us take a lead in it, if only we have the courage, conviction, determination and will to move forward. This is the responsibility I see before us.

Mr. Hellyer: Will my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. Thompson: Yes.

Mr. Hellyer: Will my hon. friend say if his party believes that the Canadian government should fulfil the commitments it has to NATO and NORAD?

Mr. Thompson: I would like to know what those commitments are.

Some hon. Members: Ask your friend.

Mr. Thompson: I believe there is a grave responsibility on the government to tell us what they are, and if they are secret it should say so. If they are something which should not be brought out in public, then let us form a non-partisan defence committee where these things can be brought out in a non-political atmosphere such as we have not had during the last 12 months or so.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, this debate on external affairs and defence estimates is long overdue. This parliament began its sittings on September 27, and it seems to me a shameful thing that in all these weeks and months we have not yet had any clearcut statement from the government regarding its policy on nuclear weapons, and that this is the first opportunity we have had in the house to debate Canada's role in international affairs.

In the next few weeks and months this country will be faced with fateful and far reaching decisions, particularly with reference to nuclear weapons, and it seems to me imperative that the people of Canada should know where the various political parties stand so that the people can make a decision as to what course this country should follow in the interests of maintaining peace and security throughout the world.

I must say, Mr. Chairman, that I was disappointed this afternoon with the statements made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the international spokesman for the Liberal party, the hon. member for Essex East. International affairs, defence, and the whole question of nuclear weapons are irretrievably bound up together. The minister made no statement regarding the government's policy on nuclear weapons. Of course I may say he interrupted his speech. I believe he is going to resume it, and it may be that later on in the course of his speech he will make reference to this matter but certainly, in so far as his résumé this afternoon of the international situation was concerned, there might have been no such thing as a problem of nuclear armament. The same is true, of course, of the speech made by the hon. member for Essex East.

I would like to say in great kindness to both hon. members, for both of whom I have very high regard, that the people of Canada are not concerned with whether it was a Liberal government or a Conservative government that first protested in the United Nations against Soviet imperialism. We expect our governments to take that position.

What the people of Canada want to know is what policy is this country going to follow, what commitments have been made, why have they been made, to what extent are they going to be implemented, what does it mean in terms of Canada's future and what does it mean for the peace of the world.

We in the New Democratic party believe that the No. 1 issue facing the world today is how can we prevent a nuclear war. For the first time in his long history man has it within his power to destroy himself. Throughout the centuries we have fought wars that have killed people in their thousands. Two recent wars killed people in their millions, but when the first atomic bombs were dropped on Hiroshima and Nagasaki a new age was born. Mankind has slowly awakened to the fact that man now has within his hand the power to destroy civilization and even life on this planet. It is estimated that the United States and the Soviet union between them have stockpiled sufficient nuclear missiles to have the explosive equivalent of 50 tons of t.n.t. for every man, woman and child on the face of the earth, and when military men speak of the need for a nuclear deterrent surely there can be no gainsaying the fact that we have such a deterrent, a deterrent of terrifying magnitude.

We in this party believe that all Canada's energies should be directed towards preventing a nuclear holocaust, and to lose sight of that fact in the intricacies of discussing military estimates could be disastrous. This basic fact should be the cornerstone of our foreign policy and all our decisions, all our programs, expenditures and energies should be founded on the determination to contribute to man's desperate quest for peace.

The second thing the New Democratic party sets forth is that we believe that the No. 2 problem is to prevent the spread of nuclear weapons. The world's best hope lies in persuading the two great nuclear powers, the United States and the Soviet union, to reach some agreement fast regarding the cessation of nuclear tests, both for the sake of the health of the millions of people now living as well as for future human survival. Second, to negotiate a treaty for nuclear disarmament under international inspection and control. Everyone knows that will not be an easy task, but in recent days there have been some signs that give reason for hope and optimism. We maintain that the proliferation of nuclear weapons will make this task more difficult, if not impossible. Reaching some viable agreement between the two major nuclear powers has proven long and difficult, but every addition to the world nuclear club will only compound and multiply that difficulty.

We maintain that Canada's best contribution to the peace of the world consists in refusing to acquire nuclear weapons for Canada's forces either at home or abroad. For Canada to become a nuclear power, no matter under what pretext, is to invite the growth of the world's nuclear club. If Canada accepts nuclear weapons from the United States, that country will be under pressure to make the same weapons available to its friends in Europe and in Asia, and eventually in Africa. In turn the Soviet union will be under pressure from its friends to supply nuclear weapons to the countries with which it is allied. Every addition to the nuclear club increases by geometric progression the danger that some irresponsible megalomaniac will press the button and precipitate the world into a nuclear holocaust. It is difficult enough to persuade the two major powers to reach some acceptable agreement for nuclear disarmament. How much greater—nay, impossible—will be the task when 15 or 20 nations have a nuclear capacity at their disposal.

While we all hope that there will be no outbreak in Europe, we must remember that this is always a possibility. If that unfortunate eventuality should take place, then it is imperative that we contain it. The use of nuclear tactical weapons would make this virtually impossible, because it would lead automatically to the full scale use of strategical nuclear weapons. Almost every military authority in the world—in the western world at least—has now abandoned the theory of limited nuclear tactical warfare.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to just look for a moment at the policy which the government has followed in respect of this question. In my opinion the government has never been either frank or fair with the people of Canada. Apparently they made commitments in 1959 to acquire nuclear weapons which they knew would be worthless without nuclear warheads. They were either wasting public funds or they intended to acquire nuclear warheads for the Bomarcs, the Voodoo planes, the Honest John rocket artillery and the CF-104's. Instead of telling the people frankly that they intended to acquire nuclear weapons, they played this game of, "Now you see it; now you don't".

The Minister of National Defence and his public relations staff have ground out propaganda telling the Canadian people that our military forces simply cannot carry on without nuclear weapons. At the same time the Secretary of State for External Affairs has gone about making excellent speeches giving reasons why we should not acquire nuclear weapons. This has been a government with two voices. While I am not questioning the sincerity of either minister, I would say that after listening to them it was always difficult to believe that they sat in the same cabinet or that they were members of the same government. If they do not intend to acquire nuclear weapons, we should know why they are continuing this inexcusable waste of public funds. I am told that only a few of the CF-104's, or Starfighters, as they are called, have thus far been delivered, but I understand that the government has contracted for the acceptance of 200 in all. Without nuclear warheads, General Norstad says, these have little military value, yet we keep on spending money despite changing military concepts that make nuclear strike 'planes less valuable. If the Skybolt, which the British are now planning to discard, is nearing obsolescence, it would seem that this would be even more true of the CF-104. We have a long list of 'planes, such as the Vampire, the Starjet, the CF-100, and the ill-fated Arrow, on which the Canadian government over the years have spent hundreds of millions of dollars of the taxpayers money.

I say that the government's policy on the question of nuclear arms has been one of indecision and timidity. They have followed the policy of "nuclear arms if necessary, but not necessarily nuclear arms", which has a familiar ring in Canadian political history. They have never yet, however, defined what is meant by the word "necessary". I assume that probably the public relations experts, past and present, will watch the Gallup poll and decide when they become "necessary". I urge the government to come out from behind this smokescreen of double-talk and take a stand. I say to the government: If you have made a mistake in giving commitments, then be honest and renegotiate those commitments both in NATO and in NORAD. The Canadian people will forgive you if you have made an honest error in judgment. But they will not forgive you if you make a transparent attempt to deceive them by refusing nuclear arms with one hand and buying them with the other.

I agree with the fine tribute which the Secretary of State for External Affairs paid this afternoon to Canada's contribution on the disarmament committee of 18 and to the splendid work which has been done by General Burns. If we have followed closely the deliberations of that committee I am sure we have all been proud of the extent to which the representatives of the eight non-aligned nations have looked to Canada in many instances to speak on their behalf. I think this is one of the finest tributes that has ever been paid to Canadian integrity and Canadian diplomacy. But I want to say to the minister that the moral influence which Canada now exerts in the disarmament committee will be very seriously impaired the day Canada becomes a member of the nuclear club. It is well to remember Emerson's words, "What you are speaks so loudly I can't hear what you say".

May I make just a passing reference, Mr. Chairman, to the position of the Liberal party on this question of nuclear arms. The leader of the Liberal party has now committed his party to the acquiring of nuclear arms, and did so in a speech on January 12 at York-Scarborough Liberal convention. The talk of negotiating out afterwards was, in my opinion, just a sedative for the more disturbed members of the party who were protesting. This new Liberal policy was made without consultation with the membership of that party and represents a complete about-face from the position which the Liberal party took prior to the last general election.

At a Liberal rally in the city of Ottawa—

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member for York Centre is rising on a point of privilege.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege, the speaker mentioned what happened in a Liberal caucus.

Mr. Douglas: I did not mention a Liberal caucus. I talked about the York-Scarborough convention which was reported in the press. I said nothing about a Liberal caucus. I can assure my hon. friend that I have never quoted anything about a Liberal caucus. I have never been to one and I have no expectation of ever being at one. We have one representative there now and that is enough.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Argue: Don't cry, Tommy; you'll never make it.

Mr. Douglas: One does not have to strive to make it; one just backslides into it.

Mr. Argue: That is not how you got out of Regina.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, before I was interrupted I was in the process of quoting the leader of the Liberal party in a statement he made at a Liberal rally in the city of Ottawa in January, 1961. The press quotes him as saying:

> We should not acquire nuclear weapons under any kind of national or joint control.

The Toronto Star of November 10, 1962 says as follows:

> Canada should renegotiate her commitments with NATO to take a non-nuclear role in the western alliance, Liberal Lester B. Pearson said yesterday. He told the Canadian committee for nuclear disarmament that Canada could negotiate for a non-nuclear role in NATO and still fulfil all her obligations to that alliance.

So I am saying that the position now taken by the Liberal party is a complete about-face. Every party, of course, has a right to make an about-face, but I am simply putting on the record that this is the case.

Mr. Gregoire: It is not the first time though.

Mr. Douglas: I want to point out that the Liberal position is completely without logic when they say, in effect "We do not want nuclear weapons, but since we are committed to accept them then we should take them and then try to renegotiate ourselves out of them". Why not negotiate ourselves out now? What, in effect, the leader of the Liberal party is saying is that we should sign a bilateral agreement. We should train personnel in the use of nuclear weapons, knowing all the time we are doing so that we are going to renegotiate ourselves out the moment the ink is dry on the paper.

Mr. Woolliams: Isn't that terrible.

Mr. Berger: It is stupid.

Mr. Knowles: It is Liberal.

Mr. Douglas: Neither the leader of the Liberal party nor anybody else has given us any convincing reason why having these nuclear weapons would favour the cause of peace. On the contrary, all the arguments given by the Leader of the Opposition in his speech at the York-Scarborough convention lead logically to the opposite conclusion. Really the only reason he gave why Canada should accept nuclear weapons was because we were committed to accept them. Does this apply to all the other commitments made by a Conservative government? If it did, then there is little use in the Leader of the Opposition's trying to change the government. The President of the United States, President Kennedy, did not hesitate to renegotiate the agreement with Great Britain on the Skybolt when he thought this would be beneficial.

Acceptance of nuclear weapons by Canada is not a condition of our membership in NATO, as is evidenced by the fact that Denmark and Norway and some other countries have not accepted nuclear weapons. Rather than nuclear weapons giving us greater security, the evidence is all the other way. The United States nuclear deterrent is estimated to be five times as great as that of the Soviet union. Even Great Britain's tremendous expenditure on nuclear weapons has given her only 2 per cent of the west's nuclear deterrent. Canada's contribution, therefore, to the west's deterrent would be insignificant militarily, but it would do tremendous harm in proliferating the acquisition of nuclear arms and would therefore far offset any military value which might accrue.

I am sure many hon. members are familiar with Henry A. Kissinger, who has for many years been the chief proponent in the United States of the use of nuclear arms and nuclear strategy. It is rather interesting that in the July 1962 issue of Foreign Affairs he has written an article on this question. I shall ask the committee to bear with me while I read just a very short excerpt from it. Mr. Kissinger said:

> The present deployment of NATO's nuclear capability represents an anomaly in terms of current NATO doctrine. Nuclear weapons and delivery systems for technical use have been placed in Europe in considerable numbers. Yet deputy secretary of defense Gilpatric has rejected the notion of tactical nuclear war.

Then he quotes Gilpatric as saying:

> "I, for one, have never believed in a so-called limited nuclear war. I just don't know how you build a limit into it once you start using any kind of a nuclear bang".

Then Kissinger goes on:

> And this view seems to have been reinforced by secretary McNamara at the NATO ministerial meeting in Athens.
> At the same time, secretary McNamara has insisted that in case of general war our strategic forces are alone sufficient to perform any nuclear mission.

Then he quotes McNamara as saying:

> "There is no question but today our strategic retaliatory forces of bombers, missiles and Polaris are fully capable of destroying Soviet targets, even after absorbing an initial nuclear surprise attack".

Kissinger winds up this part of his argument by saying this:

> In these terms, the nuclear establishment on the continent is both dangerous and useless. It is dangerous because it may make inevitable the limited nuclear war both Mr. McNamara and Mr. Gilpatric have declared is certain to escalate. And it is useless because it will merely duplicate attacks on targets already covered by our strategic forces.

Therefore the whole idea, which I understood the hon. member for Red Deer to expound, that you can make a differentiation between tactical nuclear weapons and strategic nuclear weapons, and that you can have a limited tactical nuclear war, has now been abandoned by nearly all of the military experts today, men like Kissinger, John Strachey, the former secretary for war in the British government, John Gellner, and many others.

We believe that Canada should not accept nuclear weapons. We believe that as far as NORAD is concerned this was designed to meet the threat of attacks from manned bombers. But today manned bombers are no longer the real threat. Intercontinental ballistic missiles and nuclear missiles from submarines are the growing danger. Against these there is no defence other than the threat of the massive deterrent. We believe that the warning systems should be retained as long as they have any value but that nuclear warheads for Bomarcs have no military value and would lessen Canada's position in promoting nuclear containment.

In so far as NATO is concerned, we note that even the United States authorities are veering away from stressing the value of nuclear tactical weapons. These were thought of in the first instance as a means of gaining time during the period when the Soviet union had a preponderance in conventional forces; I refer to gaining time until the United States could build up its technical and strategic nuclear arsenal. As the Secretary of State for External Affairs pointed out this afternoon, that arsenal is now so great that the United States has a tremendous preponderance. It is significant that the nuclear missile bases in both Italy and Turkey are being dismantled and that the real defence now will be the use of the I.C.B.M. missiles and the Polaris submarine.

The two great dangers of tactical nuclear weapons in the hands of NATO forces is summed up in the two terms now used by the military, namely escalation and proliferation. As to escalation, the military authorities recognize that the concept of a limited nuclear action is no longer accepted. They recognize the fact that kilotons on the Elbe would mean, in a matter of days or hours, megatons on the Volga and on the Hudson. This is why President Kennedy has been stressing the fact that conventional forces should have increasing importance in NATO and that the use of conventional forces would provide a "pause" during which it might be possible to contain the conflict before resorting to the ultimate strategic nuclear deterrent.

The other danger is the danger of proliferation.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret to inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Deputy Chairman: I presume he will receive unanimous consent to continue his speech. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, I thank hon. members for their indulgence. I can assure them that I will try not to impose on their generosity.

Even military authorities are becoming increasingly concerned about the difficulty in controlling tactical nuclear weapons when they get into the hands of a number of nations. The Nassau declaration is the outcome of a struggle between, on the one hand, the United States which desires to keep control of the nuclear deterrent, and on the other hand, certain European leaders who are recklessly pressing for independent nuclear capacity, not for military reasons but in order to bolster an outmoded concept of national prestige.

I have serious doubts about the safety of having 15 fingers on one trigger, but I have no doubt about the fact that 15 fingers on 15 separate triggers would mean disaster for mankind. We in the New Democratic party believe that any proliferation, whether to independent nations or to NATO as a multinational nuclear power, would add immeasurably to the danger of nuclear war and should be resisted.

We in this party believe that Canada should have a positive program for peace consistent with the type of contribution which we can best make toward establishing collective security in the world. Canada cannot divorce itself from the world in which it lives. Canada's foreign policy should not be a neutralist one. The program of the New Democratic party drafted here in the city of Ottawa in our founding convention stated as follows:

> In the struggle between democracy and totalitarianism, Canada cannot evade its responsibility; it must always stand squarely on the side of freedom and with the genuine forces of freedom.

Our policy cannot be one of pacifism. A refusal to fight is no guarantee of immunity from attack. In the world community, just as in the local community, there will always be those who, from a desire for personal gain or a lust for power, will resort to banditry. The present dispute between India and China is a glaring example of the fact that even an unprovocative nation is not free from aggression.

Canada's policy, it seems to me, would be unrealistic if we were to advocate unilateral nuclear disarmament. In the present nuclear stalemate it is merely wishful thinking to suggest that either of the great nuclear powers should discard their nuclear weapons unless they can be assured of an effective system of inspection and control under which they will be guaranteed that while they are disarming, the other party to the agreement is doing likewise.

Canada's role should be to work for a system of collective security under the United Nations. Regional alliances must never be regarded as a substitute, and even when they are necessary they must be considered as a temporary expedient pending the development of a world authority clothed with the necessary power to keep the peace. This situation cannot be brought about overnight and cannot be whistled up out of nothing. It will involve using all our influence to strengthen the United Nations in its various activities. For years public men have talked about establishing a permanent international police force. Yet after 18 years we have not yet attained this objective.

The United Nations has had more success in putting out "brush fires" than many of its detractors had anticipated. Suez, the Egyptian-Israeli war, the present conflict in the Congo and the Cuban episode all gave evidence of the fact that, when solidly backed by world opinion, it is possible for the United Nations to take police action to stop the spread of military conflict. I would draw the attention of the committee, however, to the fact that these police actions have been taken with conventional military forces and it is here that Canada could play its most effective role by offering to make its military forces and equipment ready and available for a permanent international police force.

Canada should use its influence to remove some of the tensions that are likely to provoke military conflict. We should seek military disengagement in central Europe along much the same line as that followed in the case of Austria. We must seek a solution to the Berlin situation and the eventual signing of a German peace treaty. It is 18 years since the war ended and until some agreement is reached Berlin will continue to be a powder keg that can explode at any minute. Canada should make it clear that we will work for the right of self-determination for all peoples but that we are not prepared to lend ourselves to military adventures to satisfy the illusions of grandeur which seem to have taken hold of some of our allies in recent months and years.

In conclusion I want to say that Canada can make a much greater contribution to the positive programs for peace that are so urgently needed throughout the world. Today we are spending about $1½ billion per year on defence, much of it for equipment which is already obsolete, but we are contributing less than one twentieth of that amount for programs like the Colombo plan and in providing help for underprivileged and underdeveloped countries. Canada is not a great power in military terms or in the size of our population. Our military contribution is relatively unimportant in the sum total of military forces as they exist in the world today, but in terms of economic aid Canada can play a role out of all proportion to its population and size.

Food is one of the most important weapons in the arsenal of democracy. The New Democratic party at its founding convention endorsed the idea of having Canada contribute 2 per cent of its gross national product to assist underdeveloped areas. This would mean an expenditure of $700 million to $800 million a year to provide food, consumer and capital goods, medical supplies and technical personnel, which in our opinion would do more in the long run to remove the causes of war and to promote peace than the purchase of a few atomic weapons which would simply be added to an already dangerously large military stockpile.

The 17-man committee of economists which the United Nations appointed to look into the economic problems arising out of disarmament have made an interesting report. They state that all the nations of the world for which statistics are available, are now spending $120 billion a year on defence and are employing 50 million people in their armed services and defence industries. They estimate that if we could turn this money and manpower to peaceful uses we could raise the living standards of the people in every part of the world. We could banish hunger, disease and ignorance. It is in this war against man's age old enemies that Canada can play her most effective role.

I believe that the people of Canada would respond to such a challenge. I am sure there are thousands of young Canadians who would gladly enrol in a Canadian youth service as teachers, nurses, doctors, social workers, engineers and scientists to represent Canada in helping to raise living standards and improve living conditions of people in the underdeveloped areas of the world.

This afternoon the Secretary of State for External Affairs said that there is a longing for peace in the world. I believe he is right. I believe that in every country of the world the people are tired of war and they are tired of living in a balance of terror with the threat of the nuclear bomb hanging over their heads. I believe that in many ways the people of the world are ahead of the statesmen of the world in their anxiety for peace. I believe that the Canadian people are waiting for the government and for this parliament to give a lead to show them how we may work together to promote peace in the world. I submit that this country is waiting to see whether or not we are capable of giving that leadership and whether or not we have the capacity to match the greatness of the times in which we live.

Mr. Wahn: May I ask the hon. member whether he is prepared to tell the house if he is or is not in favour of Canada remaining in NORAD and NATO?

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, I think I answered the first question. I think that Canada should terminate its agreement under NORAD in so far as supplying Bomarc missiles and Voodoo interceptor planes is concerned, because they no longer have any function in a military sense, and that we should stay in that agreement in so far as supplying warning systems is concerned as long as they have any value. With reference to NATO, I believe we should stay in NATO. I believe that NATO has a function to perform until such time as the United Nations is strong enough to give us the collective security which the world so greatly needs. But I point out that membership in NATO is not conditional upon our accepting nuclear weapons, and that we have a conventional role which we can play in NATO and in the United Nations.

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Chairman, we have now had the volleys from the heavy artillery on all sides of the field and I will introduce something of a lighter calibre. The discussion has been a very interesting one so far. I always enjoy hearing from my good friend, the member for Essex East. We have had some good times together. I have a high regard for his ideas, except when he talks about partisan politics, and the only thing that worries me is that he has such a proclivity for talking about partisan politics.

I was interested too in the statements of the other preceding speakers. I think the hon. member for Red Deer is right, of course, when he injects what we must in a country like this always inject, the question of morality in the whole field of international politics as indeed in national politics. There were times, however, when I thought that perhaps the hon. member for Essex East injected partisanship a little too deeply, sharply and unnecessarily. I quite agree with him that Canada has in general looked upon the field of external affairs with a bipartisan approach, although I suppose out of respect to other parties I should say a multipartisan approach. When I was a student and should have been studying I had the opportunity to sit in the gallery of the house and hear external affairs discussions when the hon. gentleman's party was in power in those unhappy days behind us, and I remember that generally there was a transcending of partisanship. I deplore the fact that he discussed in somewhat critical and perhaps cynical terms the position of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. At one time, he invoked indecision, and I thought at the time that was a very dangerous subject for a man in his party which has been noted for its gyrations and inauguration of changes in policy over the past few months.

He did refer to the minister's interview on television, and I looked up the transcript after the hon. member referred to it. I noted that in the very opening statement, the minister said this:

> Canada always has stood by her friends, and of course Americans are our friends and we are standing by them.

On the same page of the transcript in answer to another question, the minister said:

> We are friends of the United States and we are standing beside them.

This, I think, was an explicit and definite statement. I listened to that interview and I remember, I think we all remember, that was a grave night indeed, the night of October 22. When the minister was asked if he would spell out the gravity of the situation, and he was asked these questions:

> Should we start putting watercans in our basement?
> Should we start making plans to get out of town?

If this minister, in possession of confidential communications from governments all over the world, had at that time said anything to augment or increase panic in the country, I should think he would not be properly discharging the duties of the high office which he holds.

My hon. friend mentioned another subject on which he and I share views, that is the membership in the organization of American states. I may say that when his party was in power I was enthused about that and I wondered to myself time and time again why he had not seen that action was taken along those lines. I know and he knows that this government has brought us closer to that very important Latin American world than his government ever did. We are today represented in every single state in Latin America. We have attended inter-American conferences. We have developed contacts with these people which are extremely valuable. I quite agree with the hon. member for Red Deer that the people of Latin America and these important nations to the south with their great problems, their great prospects and possibilities, are worthy of the utmost consideration.

I heard a great international statesman say not long ago that the problems of today which would become most important tomorrow in their development and fulfilment lie with those people below the equator, and the Latin American area is a very important part of that particular set of problems.

I think, too, it was a bit unfair to suggest that the minister had overstated his optimism in the field of disarmament. He has not, through his long political career and his highly successful diplomatic career, been given to overstatement. He has not gone in for excessive optimism. Like the President of the United States, he pointed out today that these strains which may appear within the communist world are not fractures. We all know that the disagreement which interests us would appear to be a disagreement over means and not ends. As the president, that great statesman, said the other day, a dispute over how best to bury the free world is no cause for western rejoicing.

I would say, too, that while the minister during his career has not been noted for excessive optimism he has not been noted for excessive pessimism either. World statesmen have time after time paid tribute to the tenacity with which he held to hope for disarmament. We all pray and hope that these hopes will be realized. He does not, I am sure, claim it alone nor does Canada claim it alone, but down through the course of these difficult and trying negotiations there has been one constant thing and that has been the unyielding determination of Canada to say we shall not give up; we will continue with this great world problem.

There are many aspects of Canadian foreign policy, Mr. Chairman, which are worthy of reflection by this house. In the time at my disposal this evening, I should like to discuss one of those which is very close to my heart and which I believe is becoming more and more meaningful to the people of Canada. I refer to the United Nations and our membership and role therein. I have had the honour of representing Canada at four general assemblies of the United Nations. This past session, just concluded, struck me as one of the most constructive of these important international gatherings. It seemed that there was a diminution of tension, and lessening of power politics which sometimes makes difficult the day to day progress which is such an important part of an organization which endeavours to make progress on so many fronts.

I believe that in Canada the strain of cynicism is disappearing. We have had people, publicists and others, who believed the United Nations was more a talk shop, that nothing was accomplished, that there was a great disparity in power among the members, that there was not sufficient realism in its construction. I believe the accomplishments of the United Nations in recent years, and they have been enumerated by preceding speakers, have convinced Canadians and others that this great body is in truth the hope of the world as the idealists always said it was. The past session has seen the coming to fruition of a number of projects which had seemed to be discouraging.

One thing which caused great rejoicing, I think, was the confirmation of the secretary general in his office. This great Asian statesman has done a splendid job in one of the most sensitive and difficult posts which the world could convey upon any mortal man. Canada said, from the very beginning, that we were strongly in favour of U Thant's confirmation as secretary general. The minister has referred to the success of the Congo operation and Canada's role in the advisory committee of the United Nations.

I was in the United Nations at the time of the confrontation between Mr. Zorin and Mr. Stevenson, an unforgettable moment of great tension. As has been pointed out, and something which should not be forgotten, the spokesmen for these great super powers, with their tremendous power in comparison to the other members of the United Nations, took that dispute to the very forum of world opinion, the security council. As they faced one another every seat in the security council chamber was filled with members from the general assembly. It was an unforgettable moment. The role of the acting secretary general, as he then was, was highly creditable and crowned with much success.

We are pleased too, that under the inspiration of former president Mongi Slim, the United Nations is moving forward in the direction of improving its procedures and manner of work. A very impressive committee has been set up for which I think lovers of the United Nations may entertain high hopes.

The United Nations, which began with some 50 members, has now 110. The area of the world unrepresented in the U.N. is shrinking daily. Its complexion is changing. Membership of the committees and other bodies is altering and it is necessary in the interests of efficiency to have some improvements in techniques. Indeed it is almost necessary to have an extension to the very physical facilities. These, which once seemed to be so ample, now often appear to be overcrowded.

Mr. Chairman, we in the context of this debate are of course interested in the performance of the Canadian delegation at the United Nations. I was very proud of the way the Canadian delegation performed. There is something extremely humbling to be at an international organization and note on every hand the high respect in which Canadians are held. I think it is humbling because it is quite a challenge to measure up to the tremendous responsibilities constantly put upon Canadians, especially in the U.N. context. We are a charter member of the U.N. I suppose, if one looked back over the whole history of resolutions, Canadians have been co-sponsors or sponsors of more resolutions than any other country.

The Canadian point of view is constantly sought. We have served on all sorts of peace making missions and I think it could be said that this very day Canadian personnel are performing peace keeping operations all over the world. It is something which should cause us pride. At the same time it should cause us some humility because it is a heavy challenge.

Canada took a great many initiatives in the last assembly. One of these dealt with the question discussed by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam just a moment ago. The world food program became fully operational on January 1 of this year. As is known, Canada has taken an active part in the establishment and development of this program, beginning with the Prime Minister's proposal to the United Nations general assembly in September, 1960.

This program will provide assistance by means of foodstuffs in three major fields. It will meet emergency food needs and emergencies arising from chronic malnutrition. It will give assistance in pre-school areas and implement pilot projects, using food as an aid to economic and social development.

Since the idea for a world food program was launched events have moved swiftly. In the last few months a pledging conference has been held at which approximately $88 million in commodities, cash and services were pledged. Canada's pledge totalled $5 million in commodities and cash. An intergovernmental committee, of which Canada is a member, has now been established and has prepared a work program. This, I may say, putting it very simply, is one of the concrete moves in the direction of a better world.

Canada also played a major role in the very serious question of radiation. We would be ill-advised to become so sophisticated that we lost our concern and indeed our fear of what is happening to the atmosphere. Canada moved, and was supported magnificently by the other members of the general assembly, to set up a world organization for the dissemination of information on the harmful effects of radiation and to galvanize world opinion regarding those harmful effects.

I mention some of these things because the hon. member for Essex East was asking about new steps. Canada's initiative in the second committee dealing with international economic relations, and in the conference on world trade development, was a most impressive and most successful one, and great credit is due to Senator Blois who was our representative there, a worthy maritimer who naturally did a most excellent job. There were many, many days when differences were quite acute as to when the conference should be held, how it would be held and who should be involved, but these serious differences have been ironed out and it is now set that the meeting will be held not later than 1964.

The Canadian hope is that after careful preparation the conference will achieve positive proposals for the expansion of trade, particularly by the developing countries, and on December 20 Canada was elected a member of the preparatory committee which will begin its meetings in January. Once again this country, which some would have us believe is ill regarded in the international community, was chosen to take part in the planning of this important job.

Another problem which has been facing the United Nations for some time and is becoming increasingly acute is the very mundane problem of finances and how to keep the organization solvent. In this field through the fifth committee the Canadian delegation was extremely active and I am glad to say extremely successful. We called for an appeal to the international court in respect to the question of members' obligations regarding the very costly peace keeping operations in which the United Nations is now engaged. Canadian acceptance of the court's decision was naturally forthcoming, and through our efforts in the fifth committee steps have been taken which look very hopeful in respect to establishing a sound basis for the financial operations of the United Nations. In connection therewith there comes into our minds what looks to be the happy solution of the vexatious Congo problem.

The United Nations general assembly has seven committees operating for a period of three months and so, Mr. Chairman, it would be quite a simple thing for one to carry on for a long time discussing briefly but a very few of these important avenues of goodwill and important overtures to a better and more peaceful world. In the assembly the Canadian delegation made strong reference to a subject which has been mentioned by the hon. member for Essex East, the question of Soviet colonialism.

It is recalled that a strong statement, which drew tremendous attention not only in Canada but elsewhere, was made by the Prime Minister in September 1960, and I would point out it was made in the presence of Mr. Khrushchev himself. Since that time the present government has dealt with that very important problem with consistency and persistency and has spoken out very strongly on a subject which should have been spoken on with greater strength long, long ago. It is just a little bit difficult to take when one hears the Soviet union constantly denounce the United Kingdom and France on their colonial records; but last year, before the general assembly, Canada suggested that the light of public opinion be thrown on the dark areas of tyranny within the Soviet union. That was a strong statement of which Canadians may be very proud. I do not know whether or not the hon. member for Essex East will be pleased to hear this—I am sure he will, really—but I happened to be the spokesman for the government on that occasion and the number of Canadians from all over this country who praised the speech and who reiterated the approval they had given the Prime Minister in opening the subject so strongly in 1960 brought joy to my heart.

Miss LaMarsh: He didn't open it.

Mr. Macquarrie: I may say to the hon. lady that I have examined very carefully the records of the United Nations, I have read the documents probably as carefully as she has, and I say that the strongest statement ever made on this subject was made by the Prime Minister of Canada in September, 1960.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, may I inquire of the hon. member whether he will admit that what the hon. member for Essex East has said is perfectly correct; that what in fact the present Leader of the Opposition, then the secretary of state for external affairs, said on that and previous occasions was in the same vein as the speech made by the Prime Minister, that much noted speech, and in fact what the Prime Minister said was only following along with what the Leader of the Opposition had previously said, although perhaps the hon. member may believe, because of his personal bias, that it was better said by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Macquarrie: I may say, Mr. Chairman, that I have listened to a great many speeches in this house and I have always been able to contain myself until they were finished before asking a question, even those delivered by the hon. lady. There is no doubt that the speeches to which she referred were in the same vein and dealt with the same subject. But perhaps she should read the whole speech. I say that this subject was opened up by the Prime Minister and that a persistently strong stand has been followed. If she wants to read the international comment on this, I invite her to do so. I very much deplore an interjection of partisanship into a discussion of foreign affairs. I would say, if I could presume to advise a man much older and more experienced than myself, that if the hon. member for Essex East is desirous of scoring a point against the Prime Minister of Canada—and no doubt he is—then he is not on very good ground, even in political terms, in dealing with this particular question, because the Prime Minister has been noted for his stalwart and outstanding championing of the very subject matter with which we are dealing, and I do not think any charge of insincerity would stick very well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Macquarrie: I think we should look upon this whole subject as one in which Canadians might find cause for common action and common appraisal, rather than seeking to find avenues for disagreement and the scoring of political advantage. I am not one who would ever suggest that the discharge of Canadian foreign policy did not bring distinction to Canada in the days before the present government took office. Naturally I would not say such a thing if I did not think such a thing. I will say this, that it ill-behooves any Canadian to draw comfort from the suggestion that our country's prestige today is not shining and bright, because that is exactly the situation in which it stands. I have had an opportunity to see Canada in international scenes and I have heard this tribute from all sides. As a Canadian I take great pride in that fact.

Mr. Berger: Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question of the hon. member who has just resumed his seat? Could the hon. member tell us why he has declined in his speech, which I take it was made as a spokesman on behalf of the government, to discuss the most vital issue that now faces this parliament; that is, whether Canada should acquire nuclear weapons, and the government's stand on that issue.

Mr. Winkler: Make your speech when the time comes.

Some hon. Members: No answer.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman—

(Translation):

Mr. Gregoire: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. Would the house consent to General Norstad sitting beside the Leader of the Opposition while the latter delivers his speech?

(Text):

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, that intervention represents the level of intelligence of the hon. gentleman. With regard to General Norstad, I may say that I would rather have General Norstad, a NATO commander and therefore a servant of Canada, sitting beside me than Mr. Hitler or any of his henchmen.

It is a minute before ten o'clock, Mr. Chairman, and I wonder whether I would be trespassing on the indulgence of the house if I asked it to be called ten o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

(Translation):

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It being ten o'clock, shall I rise, report progress and request leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house?

(Text):

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I inquire from the house leader what the business will be for Monday and next week, as it was promised by the acting house leader last evening?

Mr. Churchill: The business for tomorrow will be a continuation of the discussion on the estimates of the Department of External Affairs. I will announce tomorrow the business for Monday.

Mr. Hellyer: Give us a little bit of a break.

Mr. Churchill: I am giving the Liberal party and the New Democratic party time to think over how they propose dealing with the estimates.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Pearson: You had better do a little thinking yourself. You may have to do a good deal of squirming.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, January 25, 1963

The house met at 11 a.m.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF SPEAKERS OF PROVINCIAL LEGISLATURES

Mr. Speaker: Before the commencement of today's proceedings I would crave the indulgence of members of the house to draw their attention to the presence in the Speaker's gallery of distinguished visitors to this house. They are the Speakers, or their representatives, of the provincial legislatures of Canada, who are gathered here for a two day conference under the chairmanship of your own Speaker in the area council of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association. I am sure that on your behalf I can extend to them, coming from the various provincial capitals, a most hearty welcome to the nation's capital and say that we wish them well.

(Translation):

I should like to call the attention of the house to the presence in the Speaker's gallery of a delegation of distinguished visitors. Among them, we find the Speakers, or their representatives, of all Canadian legislatures, who are meeting at a regional convention of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association.

It goes without saying that I readily act as spokesman for all hon. members to welcome our visitors and to wish them an interesting and enjoyable stay in Ottawa.

TABLING OF INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMISSION REPORT ON SALARY INCREASES

Mr. Speaker: I also wish to announce that the commissioners of eternal economy—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: —or rather internal economy of this house I should say—perhaps the wish was father to the thought in that slip—have examined the salary schedules of the employees of this house and in conformity with the pay increases granted recently to certain groups in the public service of Canada the commissioners have redrawn the schedules and have granted pay increases to certain groups of house employees. For the information of the members, I wish to have leave to table copies of the salary revisions in English and in French.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Can he say whether the report of the commissioners of internal economy, which provides for pay increases to certain groups of employees of the House of Commons, includes all employees of the house, or whether some groups have been left out?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the board of internal economy has reviewed the salaries of all employees of the House of Commons.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. Were all the employees given increases?

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member can read. You have tabled the report, and I suggest that he find out. There are several hundred of them, and I cannot recall all the details.

Mr. Knowles: The answer is obvious.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Why did you ask the question then?

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

REPORT ON ORGANIZATION OF NATIONAL ADMINISTRATION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, some weeks ago the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George asked me for a report in connection with the centennial administration. I realize his interest, he having been connected with the Canadian centenary council, as he still is. At the time I said that in time appointments would be made, and now I wish to make a report in connection with this question.

On several occasions I have made statements to the house about the preparations for honouring Canada's centennial of confederation. These reports have been in the nature of progress reports. As the house knows, the National Centennial Act provides for a national centennial administration to carry out the national government's part in the planning of Canada's first century of confederation. The centennial administration is not intended to override or duplicate any existing agencies or departments of government. It is not established to tell Canadians how centennial celebrations should be conducted. It was set up to co-ordinate, to stimulate and to assist in certain specific circumstances the furtherance of this historic event.

The real success of the centennial will rest not with the plans of the government of Canada or of the provinces but will depend on the vital role of each community and every citizen. Each community, in its own way, through its own organization, can contribute toward making the entire year of 1967 something to be remembered. This is a time when every Canadian can learn more about the richness of the heritage of our country and the promises of the next century.

I am glad, and I know all hon. members in all parts of the house appreciate, that many cities, towns, villages and municipalities have already outlined their plans for 1967. I express the hope that other communities will follow their example. I do not believe that in the centennial celebrations there is any need for a centennial colossus organization at the top. The administration, the members of which I am about to announce, must ever be conscious of the local initiatives, of the needs, feelings, ideals and aspirations of the various areas of our country.

There seems to be some misunderstanding about the relations between the national centennial administration and the Canadian centenary council. The Canadian centenary council is a non-government organization; its membership represents, I think, some 270 private, corporate and other associations, their aim being to stimulate public interest in the centennial observance and also recommend policies to be followed in the national field. The Canadian centenary council elects its own directors and hires its own employees. The Canadian centenary council has been assured of the close co-operation of the government and also of the national centennial administration. Indeed, to ensure there is the closest possible liaison, among the appointments is that of the president of this organization to the board of the national centennial administration.

Questions have been asked about the relationship of the Canadian world fair and the centennial. I believe that the world fair, and I think it is so intended, should be part of and not competitive with centennial observances. Although the Canadian world fair does not fall within the jurisdiction of the national centennial administration it does provide a fitting symbol of this country's maturity at the time of her birthday party. It is part of Canada's centennial year and the government will, of course, give careful consideration to the fullest possible co-operation between the national centennial organization and the organization of the fair.

The provinces and municipalities will have programs and projects of their own. The federal government is asking parliament for funds which may be used for making grants for local projects. These moneys would be credited to a non-lapsing fund from year to year in accordance with the provisions of the National Centennial Act. They will be made up of projects of a lasting nature. They will not exceed one third of the agreed estimate of cost, and a provincial contribution is a prerequisite to a federal grant. Such grants will not be considered if a project is already receiving federal aid under other legislation. Applications with respect to assistance and aid in this regard should be made to the national centennial administration through the media of the various provincial governments.

With regard to the federal government's program on the centennial, final decisions on some problems have not yet been taken but a number of projects are under way. One of these is the "mile of living history" in the city of Ottawa, a restoration project already undertaken here by the national capital commission. A four block stretch of Sussex drive is being restored to reveal its fine appearance of the confederation era, when it was the main commercial street in Ottawa. The commission is engaged in acquiring the property affected, and this project will help to recreate the traditional route taken by the Governor General between the parliament buildings and Government House.

A second project by the national capital commission involves Victoria island and Richmond landing located on the Ottawa river, a short distance west of this house. Hon. members will recall that the Ottawa river was once the trans-Canada highway of its day. To avoid the Chaudiere falls the voyageur would portage his canoe at Richmond landing, and at some later period the logger had his lumber slide at this point. The national capital commission is acquiring this property in order to create there a replica of that era and those early days. Industrial and commercial buildings constructed in the past century will be demolished, railway lines will be removed, the timber slide will be rebuilt and typical log buildings of the era will be reconstructed.

As a third project the government proposes to establish a Canadian historical museum which will record and portray the whole dramatic story of the settlement and development of Canada from the days of the aborigines to our own day.

The government has also agreed, subject to the approval of the necessary funds by parliament, to bear half the cost of construction of a group of memorial buildings in Charlottetown. These buildings are being erected to commemorate the pre-confederation conference held there in 1864. As the house already knows, a special silver dollar is also being struck to commemorate that conference.

Apart from the projects which directly form elements of the centennial program, several others are closely related. The national library is to be completed in time for Canada's hundredth birthday as a confederation. In addition a large redevelopment project involving 150 acres, known as the LeBreton flats in downtown Ottawa, has been undertaken by the national capital commission and will be largely completed by 1967. Work was begun last year on the partial restoration of the historic fortress of Louisburg, which in its time was one of the strongest bastions in North America and an important seat of French colonial government.

I have referred to those various parts of the program which have been approved. In addition many more cultural, historical and ceremonial projects are receiving study. Further announcements will be made from time to time.

As I mentioned previously, the government has obtained the services of John Fisher as commissioner of the national centennial administration. I say no more regarding Mr. Fisher than this, that his people have been in Canada since the late 1780's, one of his ancestors was a father of confederation, and he himself has been known in many parts of Canada through the years as "Mr. Canada".

The deputy commissioner of the centennial is Robert Choquette of Montreal, a professional writer of great competence. He has published five volumes of poetry, three novels and two plays. He is the winner of the Governor General's award, the prix Duvernay, the prix de l'Académie Française and the gold medal of literature granted by the lieutenant governor of Quebec. There will be a board of directors of not more than eight.

I should mention that there is also a conference representative of all the provinces of Canada. This conference will comprise 60 representatives, 20 of whom will be appointed by the provinces and 40 by the federal government. As far as possible—and I welcome suggestions in this connection—we want this conference to be representative of all facets of Canadian life. We want the very best people possible on this conference, for on it depends, in co-operation with the officers and directors, the success of the celebrations.

The six directors outside the government are all distinguished in business and community activities. They are Mr. Hugh Mills, Halifax, a merchant; Mr. Paul Desmarais, president of the Provincial Transport Co., Montreal; George Metcalf, president of Loblaw Groceterias, Toronto; J. R. Murray, managing director of Hudson's Bay Co., Winnipeg; Dr. Norman MacKenzie, former president of the University of British Columbia and president of the Canadian centenary council; Mrs. Marianne Linnell, alderman of the city of Vancouver. The government representatives are two distinguished civil servants, Mr. Ernest Côté, assistant deputy minister of northern affairs and national resources, and Dr. John Hodgson, assistant secretary to the cabinet.

(Translation):

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I listened closely to the statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) on the establishment of a council to supervise the organization of the confederation's centennial celebrations. That most important statement could very well have repercussions throughout the country.

My first reaction following what the Prime Minister said just now was not only to assure him that we are in favour of that council, to which we shall give our strongest support, but to congratulate him as far as some of the appointments are concerned. In saying so, I am thinking of Mr. Fisher and Mr. Robert Choquette.

Mr. Fisher we have known for some time. We are aware of his experience and great qualities. I feel sure he will efficiently discharge his responsibilities; at least, we prefer to see him in the role just assigned to him by the Prime Minister than in the one he had until now.

With regard to Mr. Robert Choquette, he is an outstanding representative of French Canada. He has made his mark in the literary and academic world. I am convinced that he will fill this post with dignity.

In my opinion, it is essential that Canada celebrate the centennial of confederation in a dignified and adequate manner.

It is necessary to do some of the things mentioned by the Prime Minister, and without going over them in detail, I think of the reconstruction of the Louisburg fortress, for instance.

I feel also that it is essential for us to see that confederation rests on solid foundations when we celebrate its centennial. To achieve that aim, it is imperative to rethink, to remake the constitution as it was established in 1867.

The Prime Minister, and I remind him of this with all due respect, stated recently that we should not talk about separatism but only of unity throughout the country. All Canadians have heard that statement by the Prime Minister, but we should not forget that a movement in that direction does exist and we cannot ignore it. It seems to me that the Prime Minister is not enough in contact with some segments of the people.

That is why I was saying a while ago that a new appraisal of the basis of confederation is a must so that we may all together, properly and adequately, commemorate the centenary of confederation and that all Canadian citizens may be equal partners in that new confederation.

(Text):

Mr. Horace A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, all I wish to say is that we welcome this announcement at this time. I am sure we can all agree there is little enough time left now to make all the arrangements and plans and co-ordinate those plans in order to be ready to have a birthday party, as the Prime Minister suggests, in keeping with the importance of this occasion.

I think we in this party can, and do, give our support to the people who have been nominated to the council. We also welcome the suggestion by the Prime Minister when he invited others to propose names for the larger convention of 60. We shall give this consideration and offer some nominations, if you like, to this council. We in this party, too, hope these celebrations will do something to further the cause of the true spirit of confederation as it was outlined nearly 100 years ago.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the people of Canada are anxious to celebrate the centennial in the most outstanding way possible. It is certainly not too soon to begin laying plans at the federal, provincial and local levels. I am sure that Canadians generally will welcome the announcement made by the Prime Minister that the centenary committee is now being set up and that the board of directors has been appointed, as well as the commissioner and deputy commissioner.

I suggest to the government that in making the appointments to the council of some 60 members, 40 of whom will be appointed by the federal government, we ought to keep in mind the fact that a celebration of this kind, if it is to have any meaning, must secure the participation of a good cross section of the Canadian people, and that on that committee there ought to be representatives of farm organizations, co-operatives, labour organizations, universities, and groups interested in the arts and literature, in order that people in all walks of life will feel that they have had some part in preparing this program and in order that we may have the fullest participation and co-operation from people in every walk of life when the actual centenary is taking place.

I think we shall all look forward to the list of monuments which it is hoped will be constructed in order to commemorate Canada's centenary. However, I think we ought not to lose sight of the fact that there are intangible monuments which are equally important, and we might try to set for ourselves, on the federal, provincial and local basis, some objectives in terms of health programs, welfare programs and other things that would give to the Canadian people a sense of pride not only in brick and mortar but in the social accomplishments which they have been able to attain by 1967.

Above all, it seems to me that every effort must be made by all of us to see to it that in 1967 the true spirit of confederation has been fully established and that we do everything possible between now and then to bring about a better understanding and a better appreciation of the culture and the point of view of the two great races that make up confederation.

We in this party will do everything we can to support the government in putting into effect a program of this kind, to the end that when we celebrate our one hundredth birthday we shall be a country in which we are bound together by bonds of co-operation and mutual understanding.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

TABLING OF REPORT OF THALIDOMIDE REHABILITATION COMMITTEE

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the house I should like to table the report I have just received from the expert committee on the habilitation of congenital anomalies associated with thalidomide. The committee was established on the recommendation of those attending the federal-provincial conference on this subject on August 17 of last year. The committee was made up of a group of experts in various professional fields most directly concerned with rehabilitation.

At its final meeting last year, which was attended by provincial representatives, proposals were made for the techniques and principles that should be employed in the rehabilitation of children with severe limb defects. The proposals have been incorporated into the committee's recommendations, which coincide to a considerable degree with action the government is already taking. For example, one of the recommendations suggests that a short course be set up to provide training for Canadian specialists involved in this rehabilitation field, and arrangements are now being made with the child amputee centre in Los Angeles to bring a group to Toronto to provide a two week course as soon as possible. As soon as the date of this is known I shall invite the provinces to send specialists to this course. The federal government will pay the costs of presenting the course, and will share with the provinces the expenses of provincial representatives.

A second proposal is that three research and training units be developed in Canada, concerned with prosthetic services and rehabilitation for severely disabled persons. The government will seek to add $200,000 annually to the funds available under the medical rehabilitation and crippled childrens' grant to implement this proposal. The services which should be developed by this means will benefit not only children with disabilities associated with thalidomide, but others with severe disabilities from other causes.

The committee also considers that the whole problem of the training of prosthetists should be reviewed, and suitable courses established in Canada. My departmental officers are now consulting with medical educators in the rehabilitation field to determine the best way of proceeding.

The report points out that the basic components of prosthetic appliances are imported into Canada, and urges that a manufacturing potential be developed in this country. I expect that our current study of this proposal will result in satisfactory arrangements to achieve this objective very shortly.

All members of the expert committee deserve the greatest commendation on the painstaking way in which they have carried out their duties. In co-operation with the provincial authorities it is our intention to implement to the fullest extent the recommendations set forth in the report, two copies of which I should now like to table.

Mr. Speaker: The minister asks for leave to table the document to which he has referred. Has he leave to do so? Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Inquiries of the Ministry

ATLANTIC DEVELOPMENT BOARD

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF CHIEF EXECUTIVE OFFICER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. J. MacEachen (Inverness-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue in connection with the Atlantic development board. In view of the fact that the Atlantic Development Board Act provides that the work of the board will be organized by an executive director, can the minister tell the house whether the governor in council has appointed the chief executive officer of the board? If so, can he give the name of this officer?

Hon. H. J. Flemming (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the question asked by the hon. gentleman is "not as yet".

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a further question in connection with the Atlantic development board. In view of the appointment as chairman of the board of Brigadier J. Michael S. Wardell, can the minister tell the house the salary offered to this gentleman to serve in this capacity?

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the answer to that question is that the matter has not been discussed.

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): On the same subject, Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the importance of the duties to be performed by the newly appointed chairman of the Atlantic development board, can the Prime Minister advise the house if this same person will be called upon to resign as a member of the Canada council?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, Brigadier Wardell has, of course, been a member of the Canada council. Through the years other people have occupied such positions as membership in the Canada council and still have been able to carry on fully whatever their other responsibilities have been.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, if I may, I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Prime Minister. Can he tell the house which minister has been designated under the act to have responsibility for the board?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I should have announced that yesterday when I was making the announcement. It is the Minister of National Revenue. I thank the hon. gentleman for asking it.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Pickersgill: I apologize to the Prime Minister. I suffer slightly from the same disability as that from which he suffers, and I did not hear it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: He did not say it.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is extremely funny.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If he had done so, the hon. gentleman would have heard something that had not taken place.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

MEASURES TO COUNTERACT RADIOACTIVE FALL-OUT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that Canada is in the worst position as far as radioactive fall-out and contamination are concerned, and as the very food of the Canadian people is affected thereby, can the minister state to the house today what is the government's policy on radioactive countermeasures, a question which I asked him last October?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member made an erroneous statement to begin with, but I should like to say that the department has been making tests of radioactivity across the country. Previously I made the statement that if certain steps were necessary they would be taken. These steps are certainly not close to being necessary at the moment.

Mr. Haidasz: On a question of order, Mr. Speaker, today the Minister of National Health and Welfare alleges that I made an erroneous statement. The statement I made today is a repetition of a governmental statement made to the house yesterday by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is not a point of order. I think the minister was referring to the expression of opinion contained in the word "worst".

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I should like to ask the minister a question on the same subject. Is Canada doing enzyme research to try to find means of fortifying the human body against the effects of radiation?

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Speaker, the government is certainly studying all these problems all the time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO BUSINESS FOR MONDAY NEXT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the house leader. In order to facilitate the business of the house on Monday I wonder if the house leader could indicate now what the house will be doing on Monday.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): The normal procedure is to indicate the business of the next day at the close of the business on this day.

Mr. Chevrier: My reason for asking the question arises from the fact that on Wednesday the acting house leader indicated that it would be announced on Thursday, and as the house leader knows it was not.

Mr. Speaker: Order. An answer was given, and I think the position is clear at the present time.

(Translation):

PUBLIC SERVICE

REQUEST FOR BILINGUALISM IN ALL GOVERMENT DEPARTMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Recently we learned that to ensure the success of confederation, the Department of Agriculture would be fully bilingual. Has the Prime Minister given instructions that all departments are to follow the same policy?

Mr. Speaker: It goes without saying that the hon. member should have his question placed on the order paper.

(Text):

NATIONAL DEFENCE

BOMARC BASES—SUGGESTED RENEGOTIATION OF ARRANGEMENTS WITH U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas R. Berger (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the United States is renegotiating its arrangements with two NATO members, Italy and Turkey, and dismantling its nuclear bases in those countries, can the Prime Minister tell the house whether the United States has indicated to Canada that it wishes to renegotiate the arrangements it made with this country in 1959 to establish nuclear Bomarc bases in this country?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we are discussing this question of defence at the present time; consequently answers will be forthcoming to many phases of our defence situation after the government has been able to learn the views of the members of parliament.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REFERENCE OF RULE CHANGES TO COMMITTEE ON PROCEDURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister? If any changes in the rules of the house are proposed at this session, will they be referred to the special committee on procedure promised in the speech from the throne?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. A. J. MacEachen (Inverness-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister related to the question asked by the member for Winnipeg North Centre. May I ask the Prime Minister whether his answer applies to a suspension of the rules as well as changes in the rules?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, my answer referred to the undertaking that was given and the statement made in the speech from the throne.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Is the government, in order to avoid the necessity of getting its annual supply bill dealt with according to the rules, considering dissolution of parliament?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: Don't be so nervous.

Mr. Knowles: Is there no answer?

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is no necessity to comment on whether or not there is an answer or to insist upon an answer to any question.

FISHERIES

NORTH PACIFIC FISHERIES COMMISSION—INQUIRY AS TO RECOMMENDATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Coast-Capilano asked me a question, and on reading Hansard I find that I had not heard the last part of his question which reads "thus permitting the Japanese to fish for herring off the west coast of British Columbia". I want to make it perfectly clear, Mr. Speaker, that the finding of the international north Pacific fisheries commission has reference only to the stock of herring off the west coast of the Queen Charlotte islands beyond Canadian territorial waters. There is no question of Japanese being allowed to fish for herring off the entire coast of British Columbia nor in Canadian territorial waters anywhere. At the present time the finding of the commission is under study by the government.

Mr. Jack Davis (Coast-Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I would be permitted to ask the Minister of Fisheries if he is prepared to meet a very large delegation of fishermen who are coming to Ottawa to discuss this matter?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think these things can be done privately rather than on orders of the day.

(Translation):

FINANCE

RESTRICTION OF CREDIT BY BANKING INSTITUTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

Recently, Mr. Rasminsky stated that our banking institutions have hindered the development of the central bank in order to restrict credit. Do the Prime Minister and his government share Mr. Rasminsky's opinion?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I should like to remind the hon. member that it is out of order to call upon ministers to comment on statements made outside the house.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

1. Departmental administration, $7,305,200.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, in participating in this discussion I should like to begin by telling the Secretary of State for External Affairs how much we on this side regret that his statement yesterday was cut short by an absence of voice. I am sure he has recovered from that very temporary indisposition, and I am sure it may well be that before I have finished my remarks he will have given evidence that his voice has returned. We are discussing—and it is an unprecedented situation, I think—the estimates of two departments.

Mr. Churchill: No.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No.

Mr. Pearson: We are discussing national defence policy and external affairs policy on the estimates of one department. We are discussing the subject matters of two departments on the estimates of one department, the Department of External Affairs.

Mr. Churchill: You do not have to.

Mr. Pearson: That means that our debate is divided into a debate on foreign policy and a debate on defence policy, I would not complain about that if there were sufficient time to deal with these two important matters because, of course, they are very closely related.

Every debate on defence policy, and I suppose this applies to a debate on foreign policy as well, is essentially a debate on the ultimate fate of men and of states, of their wisdom in directing the genius of our species so that it can create more than it destroys. At the present time it has created the possibility of the destruction of our planet, as was pointed out by hon. gentlemen who spoke on this matter yesterday. Foreign policy of course, Mr. Chairman, is or should be the foundation of defence policy which is designed to support it. In our country neither foreign policy nor defence policy will be strong and purposeful unless Canada itself is strong, united and resolute, and that means above all Canadian unity on the basis on which we decided it in 1867, and a strong, independent Canada.

Canadianism, Canada first if you want to call it that, must reflect this national unity. It is, of course, as is so often said and so profoundly true, not national uniformity. Canada is composed of two races, two cultures, two languages, two traditions to which have been added those of many other people which have given colour and strength to the pattern of our national development.

But there is something else, Mr. Chairman, both in foreign policy and in defence policy. The national independence which I have mentioned, most especially in the day and age in which we live, must be qualified by the necessities of interdependence. No country, least of all a country in the position of Canada, can live unto itself alone. Canada first must never mean Canada only, nor in our time has it done so. By far, Mr. Chairman, at the moment the most important of Canada's political, material and economic relationships with any other country is that which we have with our neighbour the United States, which by its power has become the leader of the free world; a country which by its policies or even by its lack of policies so greatly influences our own destiny as well as the destiny of every other country in the whole world. How we manage our relationships with our neighbour is one of the most important aspects, and in some respects is the most important aspect, of our foreign relations, of our foreign policy.

It is also a test of maturity and the good sense of Canadian nationalism, to say nothing of Canadian politics. We must, of course, stand up for our rights as Canadians. We must protect our national interests. We must speak and act firmly when those rights and those interests are threatened by American action or by the action of any other country. We must not, and we never have, become merely a satellite of any other state. But we would be pretty foolish if we tried to put ourselves alone in orbit. We must realize that a separate Canadian identity, a strong and independent Canada, does not and cannot mean either isolation or immunity. It is well to remember this while living in the shadow of the United States. It is also well to remember that, while living in the shadow of the United States has its problems and its worries for us, living without her free strength in a turbulent and dangerous world, living with a communist state as our land neighbour instead of the United States, would be a far more difficult and far more dangerous situation for us.

Perhaps it is just as well to remember also that the Soviet union, if not our land neighbour, is certainly our ice neighbour. So we do not prove our Canadianism, Mr. Chairman, but only our immaturity when we confuse the defence of Canada's rights with emotional breast beating or by criticizing whatever symbol of Americanism we think at any particular moment requires such criticism. There is more to our relationship than that. We worry not only about our general political and strategic relationships on this continent, but we worry, also and quite rightly, about United States control of so much of our industry and our natural resources. So we should, especially since it has increased in the last five years during a time when we were to be saved from this kind of domination.

An hon. Member: It started under the Liberals.

Mr. Pearson: Perhaps it did start under the Liberals. It started a long time back under both the Liberals and the Conservatives. I have some doubts about the ability of my hon. friends in the far corner to save us by their own magic nostrums from this kind of development.

In our worry over United States economic penetration, however, and any policies designed to check it—and we should have such policies—we should not forget that United States capital has been responsible for much of that Canadian development of which we are so rightly proud and about which we boast.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Pearson: If that shout of 'shame' means anything, Mr. Chairman, then the hon. members who make it should take steps to keep all United States capital out of our land. I wonder what would happen to our country if that were done. I wonder particularly what would have happened to the province of Alberta if that had been done. We should also remember, Mr. Chairman, that when this capital from abroad comes into our country it is subject to our laws as well as to our criticisms.

Mr. Herridge: Not always.

Mr. Pearson: It is subject to our laws. Canada makes the laws that cover Canada and activities in Canada. If we allow Canadian development to be controlled by the United States dollar, if we allow Canadian values and Canadian identity to be destroyed by the less attractive aspects of United States life and culture, this will be because we did not ourselves care enough about it to do anything effective. The fault, dear Brutus, may lie in us as well as in the stars and stripes. I apologize for my misquotation of Shakespeare in the presence of a Shakespearean expert in this house.

I hope that our worries about our neighbour, and they are understandable, will not obscure a far greater cause for worry and for fear, namely that in the world today the greatest danger of losing even the peace we have is not from American imperialism but remains from communist international imperialism with its dynamic and revolutionary aggressiveness, an aggressiveness which now seems to be centered in Peking, not Moscow. It is not the United States of America which causes us in this country to spend $1.5 billion a year on our defence.

An essential condition for a better world—one essential condition, and there are certainly others—is the closest friendship and the best possible relations between the United States and all the free democracies, including Canada. The first objective of those whom we have most reason to fear—although I hope that cause will diminish over the years and I acknowledge that there are some indications of progress in that regard—is the weakening and the ultimate destruction of such good relations between the United States and other free democracies. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I repeat that in foreign affairs any Canada first policy must not mean isolation or neutralism, nor should it discourage in any way the policy of building up other associations, a British commonwealth of nations or an Atlantic community.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: The ultimate ideal, of course, is not a regional one, but universal, collective security and peace through a universal organization, the United Nations. But until that ideal is realized—and we in this house made this decision a good many years ago—we must rely on regional action, particularly at present through NATO.

The North Atlantic Treaty Organization today remains essential for collective action by the free states which are its members. Those who advocate its disbandment, as the New Democratic party does, along with the Warsaw pact, do no service to peace or security. If the NATO organization goes, then its members return to purely national defence and to national foreign policies, "each nation for itself and God for us all." But if, on the other hand, the Warsaw pact goes as part of the bargain, communist control exercised from Moscow will remain in exactly the same manner in terms of the reality of the control. There will, in reality, be little or no change.

If NATO, however, is to remain strong and effective—and this has been said by so many so many times in this house and outside that it is becoming a cliché, but it is a cliché which has become a cliché because it is so fundamentally true—it must be a genuine partnership with a maximum of consultation so that members can act together in an emergency, and that means consultation wherever possible before an emergency develops. A take it or leave it attitude by any one member could provoke, or where it may already exist could strengthen, a go it alone reaction by another, and that reaction would express itself not only in foreign and defence policy, especially in building up separate, independent nuclear forces, but also in inward looking and discriminating trade arrangements, either national or regional.

The Atlantic alliance will not survive without this concept of partnership being carried out in practice, and without co-operation and mutual confidence. Jealousy and petty nationalism could easily kill it. If any member of the alliance thinks more of national power or national glory, and allows the prerogatives of independence to frustrate the necessities of interdependence; if a member permits a "my country first" attitude to jeopardize that country's relation with its friends in the alliance, that could certainly destroy the alliance.

Mutual confidence could also be destroyed either by refusing to accept a fair share of the common defence burden, because that is what collective defence should mean, or by unilaterally rejecting pledges already accepted, commitments already accepted by refusing to take the steps necessary to carry them out. That, of course, brings me to the whole question, the other side of the coin, the question of national defence policy itself.

Mr. Chairman, as I said at the beginning this is an unusual discussion of defence policy. It is confined to these two days, and we are asked to cover the whole field of foreign affairs and defence in these two days at the end of which, because of the nature of the discussion, there will be no motion possible which could be moved in order to test the feeling of the house in respect to any particular subject of external affairs or defence. It seems to me this kind of debate on these two matters, after we have been so long prevented from debating them at all, since last September, is an evasion of responsibility for providing a more meaningful discussion of such a vital matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: In the five years since the present government took over I doubt if there is any parliament or legislative assembly in the democratic world which has had less discussion of, or less information submitted to it on, defence policy than has this parliament and the previous parliament. If you compare the discussions in congress, in Westminster and in Paris you will know what I mean.

We have had no adequate statements in recent months by government spokesmen on defence policy. Perhaps the reason for that may be differences of opinion inside the government. A house divided is not likely to welcome people to come inside. We have had no committee of the house set up on defence policy, although the request for such a committee has been made in this house more than once. We have had no realistic and responsibile statements from the government, especially since this parliament met, on this most vital of all matters, vital because it concerns peace and war. We on this side have pleaded for a defence policy committee to be set up, and other opposition parties have joined in that request.

I know, as the Prime Minister has already pointed out, that normally after a government has made up its mind on these matters, parliament agrees on them by parliamentary discussion. But in the circumstances of today and because of the situation in which we now find ourselves in view of what has happened during the last five years, things are not normal; and certainly it would be desirable, even now, to set up a small committee on defence policy which could call witnesses, get information and discuss this question, so that we could see how much agreement we could reach on it.

That has not been done. It presumably is not going to be done as long as the present government is in power. But at least as a substitute for a defence policy committee we might have had from the Minister of National Defence, before this discussion took place, some kind of white paper on defence which would put forward the policy of the government in these matters. Not only have we not had that, but so far in this debate we have not had a single statement from any member of the government side on defence, not a word. It remains for the three opposition parties to declare their position and their views on defence policy in the absence of any statement from the Prime Minister or any member of the government on that policy. This to say the least, Mr. Chairman, is a reversal of the usual and accepted democratic parliamentary practice.

Any opposition, of course, is at a disadvantage in discussing defence matters because only the government has all the information which can be used as the basis for defence policy. Although a lot of that information cannot be made public in parliament, surely the government has an obligation to make a statement based on the information which it has, and some of which it should make public before there is a debate in the House of Commons on defence policy. Surely it was essential for some government spokesman to have made a full and frank statement on defence policy yesterday. Perhaps they will do so today, Mr. Chairman.

We all know that the only sure and enduring basis for defence, that aspect of defence policy which makes most sense, is ways and means of keeping the peace. We all know now that no country, however powerful, and no agglomeration of countries, however powerful, can win an all-out nuclear war. Indeed, we are told by experts that it is impossible to even wage one. This makes it more necessary than ever to prevent one.

As part of this process in the world in which we live we have to have a defensive force, a deterrent force if you like, including a nuclear deterrent force. This deterrent force is required to preserve the peace until we reach a state of affairs where the foundation of peace will be stronger even than that of force. I pay tribute to the sincerity and the work of the Secretary of State for External Affairs in his efforts, with others, to try to find that kind of foundation. I accept that position, as I am sure do most hon. members, if not all, in this house. The only sincere alternative to the acceptance of this position is one of neutralism or pacifism. These can be very honest alternatives, though I believe they are misguided, unwise and dangerous, and I can see no safety in them.

Today, then, defence policy is based, as I have already indicated, more on the interdependence than the independence of nations. We know that no country can defend itself alone. We know that the only security, especially for a country like Canada, lies in collective action through a defensive alliance such as NATO, which rests, or should rest, so far as its military side is concerned, on a pooling of strength to which every member of the alliance makes its contribution. Collective defence of this kind is based on treaties, on arrangements, on pledges, on obligations undertaken, on commitments given among the member states, as well as commitments and pledges made by the member states to their own people.

When dealing with our friends inside an alliance we assume that pledges made will be kept, that commitments undertaken will be carried out. We also assume that a change of government will not necessarily mean a sudden and unilateral renunciation of defence obligations or military pledges which have been made. If we assume that, our friends have the same right to assume that the pledges of the Canadian government are the pledges of the nation; that they will not automatically disappear with a change of government; that they will be changed only by agreement, when they affect other members of the coalition; and that until changes are made by agreement, they will be honoured.

To find the best defence policy for Canada—and I cheerfully admit this—would be a difficult enough problem in any circumstances and for any government. But it has been confused and indeed complicated by the controversy over one aspect of this policy. It has been confused and complicated by other things, but I am now going to refer to only one subject of confusion and complication. That is, whether to use or not to use nuclear weapons of any kind and, if they are to be used, whether they should be under national, joint, or collective control; and, indeed, who should have the custody of them inside a coalition.

As was pointed out by my hon. friend from Red Deer last evening, the use of these weapons—and this has been pointed out by others also—has been made into a moral question. That, of course, makes explanation difficult because it arouses strong emotions, understandable strong emotions, which are concerned not only with human behaviour but with the very survival of mankind, because of what these particular weapons can do. Whether Canada in present circumstances uses defensive tactical nuclear weapons or not—and they are the only ones in question; no one suggests for a minute that we should take part in the strategic retaliatory nuclear deterrent in an active way—this question cannot, in my view, be decided on moral grounds without hypocrisy on our part unless we follow through on that decision with other decisions which logically flow from it. As a member of the NATO coalition we accept the nuclear deterrent in the hands of the United States as essential for defence, and we supply much of the uranium which goes into United States nuclear bombs. Therefore to say that on moral grounds we shall not accept any nuclear weapons in any circumstances is dishonest and hypocritical unless at the same time we are willing to withdraw from NATO or refuse to export to anyone uranium for military defence purposes.

The fact is, of course, that the argument for or against nuclear weapons for Canada is a political and military one, not a moral one. In saying that I am not ignoring the fact that there are moral considerations involved and that this weapon does not involve for many people a moral problem. It certainly does, but the moral problem, in my view, is concerned not with the weapon itself but with the use of the weapon; certainly not with the kind of weapon we are discussing at this time as part of the defence policy of Canada. The moral problem is concerned not so much with the weapon as with war itself, which is the basic and ultimate immorality.

As I see it, the question we have to ask ourselves is, how can Canada make her most effective military contribution to the preservation of peace and the prevention of war in co-operation with her allies—because I believe in the alliance—and how can we ensure that commitments once undertaken, pledges once given for this purpose by us in agreement with our allies can effectively be carried out until they are changed.

In dealing with this aspect of defence, the military aspect, I am aware that I am dealing with only one phase of this question. Perhaps 50 years ago if we had talked about defence in this house or in any other place we would have been talking only of the military aspect. That was defence. But there are certainly other aspects of defence now, as I mentioned a few moments ago. There is the political and diplomatic aspect; and when the Secretary of State for External Affairs works for disarmament he works for defence. His work and the work of other Canadians at the United Nations over the years to further the cause of disarmament and to remove tension and fear between peoples is defence work.

There is also the economic aspect of defence. Trade, as often in the past and now, can cause conflict which could lead to trouble; therefore the economic aspect of defence consists of doing what we can in the countries of the world and especially in our own country to remove obstructions to international trade; and, what is perhaps of even more importance, providing economic assistance to materially underdeveloped countries. Because, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam last night, we may find that if we cannot make some progress on that front, then nuclear bombs, Bomarcs, air bases and all the rest will not amount to very much in the light of even more explosive problems of ignorance, overpopulation, fear, hunger and unsatisfied legitimate desires among the emerging hundreds of millions in Asia and Africa. So economics is an aspect of defence.

There is also the ideological aspect of defence, how we can strengthen the forces of freedom and the values and ideals which should flow from freedom. I suggest that in this other aspect of defence we must try in a non-military way to remove the tensions which bring fear, conflict and war and which divide us in this small world from those we fear.

All these things, of course, do not form the major subject of discussion in this particular debate, because we shall not have time to go into these other aspects of defence. Therefore I ask, on the military defence side, what is the situation in Canada especially as it concerns nuclear weapons? Well, we know a good deal more about this now than we did, say, a year ago, not because of statements made in the House of Commons but because of information which we have been able to secure outside the House of Commons and by reading the proceedings of the subcommittees of congressional committees on defence in Washington and by reading blue books which emerge from the United Kingdom House of Commons; also, of course, by some of the things which have been said in this house and outside in Canada.

In 1959 the Canadian government—I do not think this will be disputed, but I could produce lots of evidence to support this contention if it were—agreed that the role of our overseas air division in NATO, a role which from a military point of view is undoubtedly our most important contribution to NATO, should be changed to the very important one of strike reconnaissance from high level interception. The Liberal opposition in parliament at that time, back in 1959, opposed this new and changed commitment for that air division, and we gave in some detail the reasons why we thought this was the wrong kind of role to be undertaken and why we thought it should not be accepted or, if accepted, why it should be changed before it became too difficult to change it. Nevertheless that role was undertaken, and after four years—I remind hon. members of the New Democratic party of this—after four years, because it takes that long, the equipment to discharge the role is now being delivered. I think the first planes were delivered last October for the first squadron which is to be converted to undertake the new role. The aircraft for this purpose are American Starfighters, now CF-104's in the R.C.A.F. We are informed that one R.C.A.F. squadron will be in a position to go on alert by the end of April and the others in the weeks following. So the whole division will, at the present rate of progress, be equipped within a few months.

Now, in order to accomplish effectively the role which this division has undertaken, these planes are designed—and this was understood when the order was placed—to be armed with rockets which would have nuclear warheads. We know they cannot operate effectively to do the job which has been entrusted to them without such warheads. The government, however, having committed the taxpayers to the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars on these planes—the figure which has been given is half a billion dollars—has not made up its mind even yet whether to accept the warheads or not.

It has not even made the political agreement with the United States which is essential before the nuclear warheads could be made available if it were decided later to accept and use them. That agreement will certainly take some time to negotiate, as will the training of our airmen in the use of the weapons. According to the former NATO commander it will take from three months to six months. However, nothing has been done one way or the other. No decision has been made. I say that this has now become an intolerable situation, and that the result is now a serious gap in the defence arrangements of the NATO alliance. We said that we would assume a particular responsibility in that defence. In fact we are not doing so and no one else in the coalition can now do so, because we said we would do the job and we are supposed to be taking it on.

Similarly our NATO ground forces are being equipped, if they have not already been completely equipped, with United States Honest John artillery rockets designed to carry nuclear warheads, but the government has taken no decision to secure the warheads even though our ground forces are expected to use them for defence against attack, and everybody knows that fact. At home there are the United States Bomarc missiles, ground to air, which are in the same state of impotence or, if you like, suspended animation. I may say they certainly created a good deal of political animation. The government must have decided back in 1959 that the two Bomarc bases on Canadian soil were important links in the continental defence chain. Again we Liberals at the time thought they were wrong in this matter. We opposed the decision, but it was made by the government for Canada; and the missiles have now been delivered at the expense of the U.S.A. Whatever may be their value a year or so from now, we know they are completely useless now without nuclear warheads. We know that these warheads cannot be secured at once and used at once in an emergency. Plans must be made in advance and agreements must be reached with the United States in advance.

Our Bomarc missiles, for instance, stood inert and useless in the alert during the Cuban crisis. They might as well have not been there. That crisis also showed how absurd it is to think that a decision could be made and quick, effective action taken after the emergency developed. Yet we were told not long ago that this could be done. Similarly our CF-101 aircraft, again a U.S. plane, the Voodoo, to be completely effective as interceptor fighters even for the diminishing continental defence role which they have been asked to perform but which the military experts say is still of some importance, are designed to use nuclear weapons in the interception of attackers. It is also ridiculous to think that we can reserve the decision to get them, and have them ready for use, until after the emergency develops.

In short, both in NATO and in continental defence the Canadian government has made certain defence pledges and has accepted certain defence commitments on behalf of Canada which can only be carried out by Canadian forces if nuclear warheads are used. The government and nobody else made these commitments. Since then, however, the government has refused to make the decision either to alter the commitments or to accept the means to carry them out. Alteration, of course, is not so simple and so easy as it would have been a year or two ago. It takes years, as I have just indicated in connection with the air division, to implement major changes in defence policy and commitments. I say that it is humiliating and dishonourable for Canada to make pledges and accept commitments and then refuse to discharge them or put our men in a position to discharge them if they were called upon to do so in an emergency. Canada cannot maintain a position of respect and influence in the world on any such basis.

What then should the government do? It should act in order to ensure that the commitments accepted by Canada with her allies will be discharged by Canada as long as they exist. We have taken our place in a sector of the defence line. Canadians have done that previously in our history. We must be prepared to do the job in that sector until we agree to do something else. As a lady delegate, according to the press, reported to the recent Conservative convention, and I think her words bear repeating, the situation is this. I may say that this was not during one of the breakfast meetings nor indeed during one of the barbershop quartet meetings. This was at the meeting which discussed defence and nuclear warheads. This lady delegate is reported to have put the matter in this way, "We have contracted. We have this by agreement. We promised. We have no choice now whatsoever".

An hon. Member: What did Mrs. Pearson say?

Mr. Pearson: I will get to that, too. Up to a year or so ago the government had some room for manoeuvring in this matter. Until the equipment had been delivered we could have changed the commitment without the difficulty or delay that is now inevitable. We on this side of the house thought that change should have been made to a better role, and we said so inside and outside the house. But now the rockets are with the batteries, but without ammunition. The planes are with the squadrons, but without the armament which they are supposed to have. Hence it is more difficult to make changes, and it will take longer. Meanwhile do we do nothing in respect of the commitments undertaken, as I understand would be the position of my hon. friends of the New Democratic party?

The Minister of National Defence in the House of Commons on March 20, 1962 as found at page 2012 of Hansard, stated as follows:

> As the 104's have only begun to come off the production line and we are just setting up training facilities to train the crews to operate them, they will not be going into operation for a year and, as I said several times before, the matter of securing armaments for them is not an urgent matter at this time.

It is an urgent matter now because the planes are there and the crews are with them, and if they are to be trained they should begin to be trained now with the equipment necessary for them to do the job they were asked to do. Policy now has been translated into arms, into equipment and into organization. Surely it is idle to argue, Mr. Chairman, that you can go on shilly-shallying on this matter, that we need do nothing now because changes are taking place all over the place in defence strategy and in defence tactics. Of course they are, and they will continue to take place. That is only an argument for not doing anything at any time.

The cancellation of the Skybolt by the U.S.A. for the United Kingdom, for instance, has nothing whatever to do with this Canadian problem. The British ordered this nuclear missile from the United States. The United States stopped production of the Skybolt, which was to take the place of the Blue Streak. Then the United States offered the British, in place of the Skybolt which had taken the place of the Blue Streak, another American nuclear missile, the Polaris. To make that a situation which is the same as that with which we are faced, when we have taken on a certain job which can only be done by one particular missile at this time, when the government refuses to change the job or take the missile or get a substitute for it—surely to relate this problem to that which the United Kingdom government has and to which the Prime Minister has referred does not make any sense at all.

There is no parallel here, no excuse for inaction any more than there is in the Nassau communique which refers to discussions about a NATO nuclear deterrent force. The Prime Minister has said that this is something new, this is a new situation, this is a change, this is an important development, and we must hold back and see how it works itself out. Mr. Chairman, these discussions with regard to a NATO nuclear deterrent were first referred to in the House of Commons by spokesmen of the government back in the autumn of 1957 or the beginning of 1958, because it was at the NATO council meeting in Paris in the autumn of 1957 that the decision was taken regarding nuclear weapons for NATO even if that decision has not yet been fully implemented. Discussions have been going on for years and they will probably go on for many, many months before the NATO council and the NATO governments are able to work out a satisfactory collective nuclear deterrent; to use this as an excuse for inaction in carrying out now the pledges we have undertaken with respect to making equipment available to do that does not, I repeat, make any sense.

It was because of the changing and shifting situation respecting nuclear equipment that we on this side four years ago opposed the taking on of commitments that required this kind of equipment which could only come from the United States. But the government brushed aside our objections and our doubts. So now let them carry through, or propose some other course which would be an effective one for Canada and agree on it with our allies. Meanwhile let us keep our pledged word.

The government, I repeat, should end at once its evasion of responsibility by discharging the commitments it has accepted for Canada and, as it happens, it can only do this now by accepting nuclear warheads for certain defensive tactical weapons, which cannot effectively be used without those warheads. An agreement with the United States for this purpose would have to be negotiated, presumably one similar to those signed by the United States government with the United Kingdom and other NATO countries to provide for joint control of the use of the weapons, if and when they are accepted. As I have said before, in such an agreement it is true that a United States finger would be on the trigger but a Canadian finger would be on the safety catch, and when we get a genuine NATO nuclear deterrent there will be other fingers as well on each safety catch.

The government position remains, however, that no decision need be made, that no action need be taken, a position which, of course, one might expect from this government. We can wait to see how the disarmament discussions get along or until an emergency develops or until something else happens. That is merely getting the worst of both worlds.

There are those who argue—I have no doubt we will hear this argument from the government side; we have already heard it from some members of the New Democratic party, and it has been referred to by the leader of the Social Credit party—that we have no nuclear commitments, that we have made no pledges to ourselves in Canada or to our allies which require the use of any kind of nuclear warhead. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that this is the crux of the whole question. Therefore I should put on the record the evidence which justifies the stand we have taken on this matter. The evidence surely shows how wrong that attitude is, and of this there is no shadow of doubt, no possible, probable shadow of doubt.

Let us look at the commitment or pledge. Let us go back to February 20, 1959, nearly four years ago. As found on page 1223 of Hansard the Prime Minister said this then in talking about these new weapons:

> The full potential of these defensive weapons is achieved only when they are armed with nuclear warheads.

This is back in 1959.

> The government is, therefore, examining with the United States government questions connected with the acquisition of nuclear warheads for Bomarc and other defensive weapons for use by the Canadian forces in Canada and the storage of warheads in Canada.

That was February 20, 1959.

An hon. Member: That is not a commitment.

Mr. Pearson: On March 10, 1959, as found on page 1775 of Hansard, this appears:

> The government does not anticipate concluding a formal agreement with the United States government on the acquisition of nuclear warheads in the immediate future.

Naturally he was asked why, and he answered the question by saying:

> —it would be some time before nuclear weapons would and indeed could be made available for use by Canadian forces.

In other words, when the weapons were made available or could be made available to Canadian forces, an agreement would then be concluded.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Pearson: Well, if language has any meaning that is the only interpretation you can give it.

An hon. Member: Case dismissed.

Mr. Pearson: I will prove that is correct by quoting the then minister of national defence, General Pearkes, who followed this up on July 2, 1959, by saying, as found on page 5393 of Hansard:

> —it is government policy that Canadian troops should be armed as efficiently and as effectively as are troops with which they are co-operating.

Then he added that negotiations were going on with the United States to make this possible. These were the negotiations that the Prime Minister talked about to make possible the acquisition of nuclear warheads for this equipment. Then General Pearkes, the minister of national defence at that time, went on to say:

> —in order to arrange the details of the storing of and equipping our forces with nuclear weapons as and when they would be available and as and when we would have the weapons to launch them.

That was the purpose of the negotiations. On July 3, the very next day, the then minister of national defence said that these negotiations, and I quote from pages 5414 and 5415 of Hansard, "are fast reaching a stage when there can be an exchange of notes on this matter". This was in July, 1959. What were the Canadian people entitled to draw from that kind of statement by the minister of national defence?

An hon. Member: A very weak statement.

Mr. Pearson: It certainly was a weak statement, as it turned out, because that was four years ago and nothing has been done about it. In the same statement the minister said in the house:

> I presume that eventually the Canadian forces will be equipped with atomic weapons.

Well, when is eventually? Obviously, Mr. Chairman, at the latest it should have been when the equipment, the 'planes and missiles were delivered and the commitment had by that delivery become effective. This has now happened. Later, in confirmation of this point of view, on July 22, 1959 the defence minister in an interview over the C.B.C. admitted this. He is talking now about the air division in France:

> The problem will arise when our squadrons are re-equipped with the F-104G's and then armed with nuclear weapons.

I do not need to quote the position of the present Minister of National Defence on this matter because it is well known, and within the limits of cabinet propriety it has been quite consistent. All this, from the highest sources of the Canadian government, confirms what the Canadian and NATO military chiefs have known and have said; that there was indeed a nuclear commitment, both to the people of Canada and to our allies. Our allies certainly understood this to be the case. This was confirmed only Monday last by the minister of defence in answer to a question which appears at page 2920 of Hansard for that date. I will read the question: "When the government selected the Bomarc, the CF-104, the Honest John rocket and the CF-101B, was it aware that—" was the Canadian government aware— "maximum efficiency of these weapons depended on the use of nuclear armament"? The answer was, and I am sure these words were very carefully chosen:

> The government was aware that in each instance these weapon systems would reach their maximum effectiveness when armed with nuclear warheads or weapons.

Surely our government does not wish to equip our troops with weapons which cannot reach their maximum effectiveness. Then the other question was, prior to acquiring these weapons did the government indicate to the United States or to NORAD or to its NATO allies or to NATO headquarters that it was or that it might be unwilling to accept nuclear arms? The answer was a short and categorical one, very much to the point. The answer was "No".

So much for the pledges made, the statements made and the commitments undertaken by the government, in statements in this house and outside this house. What are the commitments as understood by our allies? Last night the leader of the Social Credit group in this house said he did not know, and it was very difficult for him to make up his mind until he knew what the commitments were. I hope by now he is a little clearer in his mind in so far as statements made in parliament to the Canadian people are concerned. Let us look at the other side of the question. Was it understood by our allies that we were taking on this job?

There is no one, Mr. Chairman, who has a better right, a more respected right to speak about the North Atlantic Treaty Organization on the military side, the strategic side, than the former commander of that alliance, General Norstad. He was the commander of the NATO forces in Europe and, as I said last night, as such he was not the servant of any one government, he was the servant of all the member governments of NATO. He conducted himself properly as such while he held that command. Tribute has been paid to him by the member governments for doing so. He was not only a United States military man, he was a NATO military man, a NATO statesman and a NATO diplomat. He was the representative of all the government members of NATO. It does not seem to me to add anything to the dignity of this discussion when he is referred to, as he was by the new president of the national Conservative association, as merely a retired American general; or, according to one report when he came to Ottawa the other day, as merely an American tourist whose views are not any more important than those of any other American tourist.

An hon. Member: Are you trying to get him on the active list again?

Mr. Pearson: It is very easy for my hon. friends opposite to depreciate a man whose views they accepted when he was the commander of NATO. There was not one word of criticism ever directed at him when he had this position, but when he came to Canada on a farewell visit and incidentally gave his views as a servant of Canada and when, unfortunately, he was not received by the Prime Minister but made a voluntary statement at a press conference arranged for him at which the Associate Minister of National Defence was present, when he answered questions honestly and frankly about what we had in the way of a military commitment to NATO, when those answers did not seem to fit in with the views, prejudices, policies or desires of hon. members opposite or hon. members of the other two opposition parties, then they proceed to denigrate him, try to tear him down.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, before the luncheon recess I was discussing the nature of the pledges we have made on this question of nuclear weapons, the evidence to support the fact that we have undertaken certain commitments, and I had reached the point where I wished to produce some evidence, not from statements of members of the government in this house but evidence from persons outside the house concerned with the military policy of the alliance, persons who would have no axe to grind in this matter and who would presumably have the expert knowledge on which to base their information.

As I have said, this question of commitments is the crux of the situation, and I am sure the government will appreciate that because the Prime Minister has already reminded us in the house that we have made certain commitments, for instance the sale of wheat to communist China, and that we are the kind of people who honour our commitments.

At the press conference with General Norstad there was in attendance, as I mentioned this morning, the Associate Minister of National Defence, and if any of the information given by the general, who was retiring from his position as NATO commander, was inaccurate in any respect there was an opportunity for the Associate Minister of National Defence to correct the record and make sure no wrong impressions had been created. As a matter of fact I believe the general at one stage of the press conference did refer to the fact that this was a question that should be answered by a government representative.

I have before me a verbatim record of that press conference. There was nothing General Norstad said at that time that was new. It was merely confirming what had been said in the House of Commons by the opposition and by Canadian military chiefs outside the House of Commons, but it was impressive in its confirmation of these earlier statements. At one point in the press conference, talking about Canada's commitments which was the question that had been addressed to him, the former NATO commander said this:

Canada has met those commitments in numbers and in general in quality during the entire life of the alliance.

I think that is true, except perhaps one could question whether we had met our full commitment on land, which I believe is a brigade group in Europe, and that the other components of a division in Canada be equipped and ready to join that brigade group in Europe as a Canadian division. But apart from that possible difficulty the general said we have met our commitments in numbers and, in general, in quality during the entire life of the alliance. Canada had been really outstanding in meeting its military commitments in that sense. Then the question was asked:

Q. General, do you consider that Canada has committed itself to provide its Starfighter squadrons in Europe with tactical nuclear weapons?
A. My answer to that is yes.

That is categorical and unequivocal enough. The general went on in replying to another question to say:

We established a NATO requirement for a certain number of strike squadrons. This includes tactical atomic strike squadrons and Canada committed some of its force to meet this NATO established requirement. And this we depend on.

Incidentally General Norstad added, "Again, we depend on it particularly because of the quality of that air division". Then another question was:

Does it mean, sir, that if Canada does not accept nuclear weapons for these aeroplanes that she is not actually fulfilling her NATO commitments?

The answer was:

I believe that's right. She would be meeting it in force but not under the terms of the requirements that have been established by NATO.

Then another question was asked:

General, did you say that you believe that Canada has committed this Starfighter group to tactical weapons? A. No doubt—I know that they have committed the Starfighters, yes.

Then in reply to a question dealing with the political arrangements which would be required in order to make possible political agreement with the United States in order to make it possible for Canadian forces to accept or use these weapons, and to the possibility of this resulting in a proliferation of nuclear weapons, the general had this to say:

There is no proliferation so far as control is concerned, because these weapons are held in the hands of the country of their source until they are actually used. But they can be made available just as fast to a French squadron, to a Belgian squadron, to a Dutch squadron, to a German squadron, to a British squadron or to a Canadian squadron, as they could be to an American squadron.

The questioner interjected:

Yes, but subject to bilateral agreement...

And the general replied:

Yes, this is subject to bilateral agreement.
Q. Would the crews be trained to use the atomic weapons?
A. Under the bilateral agreement, yes. It does take a bilateral agreement because under the American atomic energy law, if there is a bilateral agreement between two countries concerned then the information can be made available which will permit the training with these weapons and this is being done with almost all the countries of the alliance at the present time.

Then there was this question:

Q. Lacking a bilateral agreement, how long does it take to train crews?
A. You can't train them without a bilateral agreement.
Q. What I mean is, after you get such an agreement, how long would it take?

The general said:

—I think it's about six months, isn't it; three to six months minimum?

Then Air Marshal Miller, who was there, said:

Yes, but it could be done under six months.

Then General Norstad said:

It takes some time; it takes a considerable period of time.

He went on to explain, in answer to another question, that the Canadian crews have not had this training before because in earlier days the 'planes were not available, but that now the 'planes were available and they were there. Then the question was asked:

With how many countries, sir, does the U.S. have such bilateral agreements for nuclear weapons?

General Norstad said:

Essentially all the countries. I can't give you the exact number; essentially all of them.

Then the question was asked:

Could you say, that the forces of what countries are actually in a position to acquire nuclear weapons immediately now in the NATO force?

General Norstad answered:

Almost all of them.

Then the question was asked:

But where are the weapons physically, are the—

Then he said this:

This is a question I cannot answer.

The question went on:

Does this mean that the Canadian forces are the only ones in the alliance that—

General Norstad broke in:

No, not the only ones. This has really not been a problem with the Canadians in the alliance up to this time. And will not become a problem until the equipment is changed.

Well, Mr. Chairman, the equipment has been changed and airplanes have been delivered. Then questioner went on:

Or until a bilateral agreement is signed?
A. Yes. But a bilateral agreement becomes important when the new equipment comes into the air division.

Then he added this:

I advocate the signing of the bilateral agreement because this is the only way in which you can be fully trained.
Q. When do you believe the lack of a bilateral agreement would become a problem of creating a weakness to NATO?

"A problem of creating a weakness to NATO"—and if any man was qualified to discuss the strength and weaknesses of NATO, it was General Norstad. His answer was this:

I think that it is desirable to take whatever action is necessary now, bilateral or anything else, so that the ground and air forces of Canada, which are deployed in Europe, could be used promptly with full effectiveness and I think this is important now.

Then once again the general tried to get the questioners off this question of nuclear weapons. There were questions on other subjects, but I would just like to put on the record of Hansard what the general said in winding up this press conference. He was talking about a NATO nuclear deterrent and how control would be exercised if such a deterrent force was created. He thought it should be brought under the authority of the alliance and he said:

I personally favour the authority being the authority of the alliance to the largest possible extent, and that those weapons which are developed, designed and deployed for the purpose of defending Europe, should be really controlled by the authorities, political and military, who are charged with that particular responsibility. I would like to see this within the NATO concept because I think this reduces the danger of proliferation. I think this would be satisfactory to the largest number of countries.

Mr. Chairman, I think that puts on the record the evidence given in this house which supports the view that a pledge was made to the Canadian people, and the evidence given outside this house which supports the view that the pledge was understood to be such by those who were responsible for the military side of the North Atlantic treaty alliance. Now may I, before putting forward in conclusion our own policies on defence generally, including this matter—and I can do that, I hope, very briefly—refer to what I believe to be the policy of the other two opposition parties in this matter.

The policy of the New Democratic party, as it was expressed last evening by the leader of that party, is "no nuclear weapons of any kind, in any circumstances, under any form of control, for Canada". I think that is a fair statement of the case. Well, Mr. Chairman, that is clear not only from the statement made last evening but also, of course, from the resolutions adopted by the founding convention of that party from July 31 to August 4, 1961, because those resolutions included the following:

The New Democratic party believes that we should seek a reappraisal and change of NATO's policies and objectives.

I do not think anyone can quarrel with that. Then there was this resolution:

The New Democratic party believes that the extension of nuclear weapons to any further states and alliances threatens disaster to the world. It therefore opposes Canada's troops being supplied with such weapons at home or abroad. At present,—

I underline these words:

—except for those nations which have independently developed atomic capacity neither NATO itself nor its members individually possess or control nuclear warheads. Should they do so, Canada must make it clear that it cannot remain in the alliance.

Those words mean, if they mean anything at all, that if there is a NATO nuclear deterrent, where the authority and control of the nuclear deterrent force would be taken out of the hands of an individual member of the alliance and put under the authority of NATO itself through a mechanism devised by the NATO council—that is, a genuine collective deterrent with nuclear defensive, tactical weapons—the New Democratic party advocate that we withdraw from the NATO alliance. Well, Mr. Chairman, we on this side of the house do not accept that position. I say with great sincerity that, while I appreciate the sincerity of hon. members of the other party who support this view, I do not believe that such a withdrawal by Canada from the alliance, in the circumstances of there being a collective nuclear, tactical deterrent under NATO, would add anything to peace or security in the world. I think it would weaken peace and security in the world. Then the resolution goes on:

To relieve tensions, Canada should press for a demilitarized zone in central Europe and—

Listen to this. I mentioned this earlier in my speech:

—for the simultaneous disbandment of the Warsaw and NATO pacts.

That puts the two pacts, presumably, on the same level of interest and importance in so far as the preservation of peace and security is concerned, and suggests that if we withdrew from both of them the balance would be maintained. I do not agree with that, Mr. Chairman. Perhaps I should add that one New Democratic party spokesman, the hon. member for York South, in explaining the policy of his party the other evening in Toronto, and incidentally in confirming the view that the Tory government did in fact take on a nuclear commitment as far back as 1959, made a statement about Liberal party policy which is completely false when he said on January 5 as reported in the press:

> The agreement on Bomarcs was negotiated with the United States by a Liberal government when the present Leader of the Opposition ... was our minister of external affairs.

Mr. Chairman, there was no negotiation of such an agreement by the previous government. I doubt if there was even at that time such a thing as the Bomarc B, which is the weapon we now have. It was under development at that time. So far as the position of the Social Credit party is concerned, the leader of that party made a strong plea for leadership, direction and decisiveness and said that all parties should at least take a stand on this matter so that people would know where they stood. He was complaining that we on this side were not definite. But the hon. member did not do very much in his statement last night, or in his broadcast the night before, or in the other statements which have appeared in the press in the last week or two, to clear up the ambiguities in the position taken by his own party on this important matter.

He is reported as having said on January 14 in Hong Kong that there is no need for nuclear weapons on Canadian soil. Nevertheless, he is reported as having said in Vancouver on January 16:

> If acquisition of nuclear warheads by Canadian forces abroad means co-operation with NATO, then Canada should co-operate.

He is also reported as having said about the same time in Alberta that Americans should be permitted to make Canada their nuclear arsenal in case of war but that Canadian forces should not have such weapons. He said:

> Nuclear weapons should be available to be brought to Canada in the event of a nuclear war and if that happened Canada should become the "arsenal" of the United States.
> Meanwhile Social Credit does not favour extending the "nuclear club" but the party does think Canada should keep her NATO commitments even if it means equipping Canadian forces overseas with nuclear power.

I mention these things because we were reproved last night by the hon. gentleman for not being very decisive and clearcut in our statements. I must admit that the co-leader of that party has been clearcut in his statement as reported in Le Devoir. He stated categorically that he opposes Canadian acquisition or use of nuclear weapons in any circumstances. Then, according to the reports, he went on to say that Canada should be like Ireland and Switzerland.

I want to conclude by putting forward the principles of a Liberal policy on defence and, indeed, in respect of this particular problem which we are discussing as part or our defence. In our approach to this matter we should try, and, indeed, I try, to avoid the thinking of both those who say "I made up my mind years ago and I see no reason to change it" and of those who say "I refused to make up my mind years ago and I see no reason to do so now." The Liberal party defence program put forward before the last election and made public on April 13, 1962 included this paragraph:

> Defence policy cannot be fixed for all time. Decisions must be made in the light of changing circumstances as they become known. There must be decisiveness in doing what is necessary when it is necessary. On the basis of present knowledge, the defence policy of a new Liberal government will not require Canada to become a nuclear power by the manufacture, the acquisition or the use of nuclear weapons under Canadian or American control.

Note—"under Canadian or American control". That is, national control. And indeed, the political agreement we would make and, I assume, any political agreement which the United States government would make on this matter, would not provide for national control but would provide for joint control, both sides having a veto of the use of these weapons. The statement goes on:

> A new Liberal government will, however, examine each situation in the light of the overriding responsibility for the security of the Canadian people.

Then we included this paragraph:

> If the members of NATO make an agreement for a NATO nuclear deterrent under NATO collective rather than national control, then Canadian forces in NATO should not be prevented from participating in this agreement by acquiring the necessary NATO tactical and defensive nuclear weapons.

That is a statement made on the eve of the last election and it is on the record.

What will we do now? There is nothing in what we put forward now which contradicts that statement. In addition, a new Liberal government would make a complete and thorough review of our whole defence policy, which is something far beyond the use of nuclear weapons alone. We would carry out a review of our old defence policy as part of continental and collective defence which is today, I realize, more for defence through prevention than defence through protection. In this re-examination, one which cannot, of course, be concluded overnight and one which would require full consultation with our NATO allies, we should seek a defence role for our country which would be more appropriate for us than our present one and which would enable us to make a more effective contribution to collective security, to our own defence and to defence of peace.

The basic principles underlying such a new defence policy—and I do not mind thinking about basic principles in this debate; in that respect, perhaps, I differ from the advice given by the Prime Minister to a Conservative meeting last week—the basic principles underlying this new defence policy by which we would be guided would be as follows—I ask the indulgence of the committee while I put them on record.

1. Defence policy must be part of our foreign policy as well as of that of our allies as long as we remain in a coalition which is directed toward the establishment of a constructive and enduring peace based on disarmament, especially nuclear disarmament, on co-operation between all nations and on the promotion of freedom and human welfare everywhere.

2. It follows that Canada's defence policy must not hinder or minimize Canada's influence at the United Nations and in the councils of the world in the efforts to realize these political objectives.

3. We must take whatever steps are feasible for the protection of our territory through suitable measures for that purpose. Defence measures for our own territory must also be related to our international commitments for collective security. They must be determined by the circumstances of today, not of yesterday. Protection which is effective only against dangers that have disappeared is merely a waste of money, resources and effort.

4. Canada's defence policy must be geared to its industrial resources, which means that Canadian defence equipment should be manufactured in Canada to the maximum possible extent. This would have a bearing on the kind of defence policies we adopt. As a member of a coalition which is supposed to operate on the principle of the most efficient and coordinated use of our collective defence resources and on the standardization of arms and equipment we in Canada should concentrate on doing the things that are strategically, industrially and politically best and most appropriate for our country.

Our financial resources are, of course, limited and therefore we should be careful to see that our defence dollars are spent sensibly and economically, avoiding commitments which require expensive equipment, equipment which is, or soon will be, obsolete, and activities which are, or soon will be, meaningless.

5. Canada must continue the closest possible co-operation with the United States and all our friends in NATO—and that includes the United States. She must do nothing to weaken NATO collective policy and action, while insisting that this requires the closest and most continual consultation between partners that is possible. Otherwise, as I tried to point out earlier today, the defence coalition will not survive and the defence policies of its members will go their separate ways along with their foreign policies.

6. Canada's defence forces, whether stationed in this country or in Europe, should be so organized, trained and equipped as to be able to intervene wherever and whenever required for United Nations, NATO or Canadian territorial operations. We should be especially ready and willing to take part in United Nations peace preserving operations. That will require quite a change in our present defence policies. That means that it must be the first essential of Canadian defence policy to give our forces maximum mobility, especially through the provision of adequate air transport.

An hon. Member: That is a change from 1939.

Mr. Pearson: Yes. Many things have changed since 1939.

7. The three Canadian defence services should be fully integrated with maximum efficiency and economy both in operation and administration and the necessary changes to that end should be made at the Department of National Defence.

8. Canada should not contribute to the strategic nuclear deterrent, which is very much different from the tactical deterrent, except—and this is important—in early warning devices to protect that deterrent from destruction.

An hon. Member: Bird watching.

Mr. Pearson: I heard one of my hon. friends opposite mention bird watching. They have produced now a defence policy which has accepted equipment which is not even designed for that purpose; and then they refuse to follow through on the necessary steps to make it do the job which it was designated to do.

Mr. Hellyer: A bird's nest policy.

Mr. Pearson: Finally, I would repeat in a few words our position with regard to tactical and defensive nuclear weapons, a matter which is very controversial and which is only one aspect of defence policy. Like everybody else in this chamber I hate nuclear weapons as much as I loathe the necessity for having them at all and the possibility that weapons of any kind may have to be used in a nuclear war. Their complete abolition by international agreement should be a second priority in disarmament negotiations. The first is the end of nuclear testing. Meanwhile, as I stated earlier today, I accept the necessity, as does our party, of the nuclear deterrent. As long as the government could change its defence pledges which required nuclear warheads, we on this side advocated that change. The government ignored our arguments. It went right ahead. Now the pledges must be implemented as long as they exist. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, a Liberal government would honour those pledges made by its predecessor for Canada in agreement with our allies as long as they exist, until they were changed. That means that we would put Canada's armed services now in a position to do the job we had entrusted to them by the role which we had undertaken and which in certain cases requires at this time the use of tactical and defensive nuclear weapons. As I see it, that would be the only honourable course for the new government representing the Canadian people. Any other course would betray our trust, weaken Canada's reputation for living up to its word, and deceive our own people with regard to pledges we had undertaken. I therefore repeat that, while keeping our pledges, we would seek a better and more effective defence role for Canada in the alliance, knowing that while this is necessary —and it will now take time—it is also necessary to honour the pledges we have undertaken until they are changed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I look forward with some interest to the discussions yet to take place. I think the course I suggested the other day, that an opportunity should be directly given to discuss foreign affairs and defence, which are necessarily intertwined one with the other, was a proper and effective course to follow in order to ascertain the views of the members of this house in connection with these problems. While the Leader of the Opposition suggests that a two days limitation makes it impossible so to do, I point out that this is the period usually given in the mother of parliaments where discussions take place which are incisive, direct and without unnecessary verbiage. One thing which we agree in all parts of the house is that everything possible should be done to maintain the strength of each of the nations within the free world, economically and strategically. We are in agreement that everything possible should be done to maintain our defences while at the same time we should endeavour to attain that objective which, elusive as it has been for a thousand years, has represented the hope of all mankind.

I regret that the Secretary of State for External Affairs yesterday afternoon was unable to complete his summary of the contribution which has been made by Canada towards achieving disarmament and peace. However, even without elucidation on his part, I think Canadians everywhere realize that he has raised the standard of Canada in the United Nations to an extent that has brought honour to this country.

I am pleased to have this opportunity to reply, something that was denied me only a few weeks ago, in the parliament of this country. I intend to traverse the record. I have listened to the Leader of the Opposition. When he speaks in these loud tones near the end, I realize that the louder he speaks, the less certain he is of what he is saying. Sometimes I wonder about the source of the new policy declared. Sometimes I wonder if it is only coincidence that following some of his expeditions into a neighbouring country there is inevitably a new policy or a change in policy. I see where he objects to any suggestion of that kind. I am sure that Mr. Val Sears is one who does not speak unfavourably of those in the opposition, and this is what he said in an article in the Toronto Star on the 14th of January:

> Liberal leader Pearson made his decision alone—

That was true enough because they were so surprised in Manitoba that they had to swallow themselves.

> —and in the final hours before the speech was delivered. The argument, however, had been mustered days and weeks before. Mr. Pearson, loaded with memoranda on the nuclear question, went to New York early last week to attend a conference on world tension. There, he discussed the issue with a number of international observers and likely tested Washington opinion with United States representatives.

This is all very helpful but it also reveals a situation to which we certainly must give consideration. How surprising it was that the hon. member for Assiniboia, who used to be for withdrawing Canada from NATO, who used to be attacking nuclear weapons in any form, said when he heard of this statement:

"I support it. There is no question of me leaving the Liberal party over this issue." I am glad to hear that, but it does add up to one fact, that the country has had placed before it by the Leader of the Opposition a policy that bears no paternal relationship to the views he has expressed over and over again in this house. I am going to take the record today because the record tells a story that is the answer to much of what he advanced today. As far as those laudable objectives are concerned which characterized his peroration, such as securing a larger proportion of the defence dollar for Canada, these are fine objectives. That is what this government has done. To an extent such as never before existed, there has been between our country and the United States a recognition that Canada's industrial economy deserves and has earned a larger share of the defence expenditures.

In 1961 the amount spent by the Canadian government in Canada was $502.9 million and $26.1 million outside Canada, or 95.1 per cent of the expenditures within Canada.

Internationally we live from time to time in the hope of bettering days. We also live between the hope of an assured peace and fear. We must maintain our defences. Of that there can be no question. But I think it is of interest that in the spiritual things the western world is gaining strength among those countries which in the past have had a large or considerable communist population. In western Europe today the communists are down to 60 per cent of the strength they had in the years immediately following the second world war. One reason for that is the division which has taken place between Russia and some of her satellites and now between Russia and communist China. Another reason is that conditions among the people economically are far better than they are behind the iron curtain. There were about 4 million card carrying members of the communist party in western Europe after the war. That number is estimated today to be 2.4 million. Even people living in the communist world, as they become prosperous, are losing their fanatical adherence to communism.

Then there are the events which have taken place in the last few weeks. Mention was made of the meeting between President de Gaulle and Dr. Adenauer. The agreement signed represents a forward step that could never have been contemplated 10 years ago. It shows that in the international field today the word "never" should not be in our vocabulary. Indeed, I feel that more and more we should endeavour through trade and cultural exchanges to bring about an understanding of each other.

Take the situation recently in East Berlin when the delegates booed the Chinese spokesman. Then there is the exchange of letters between the President of the United States and Chairman Khrushchev regarding nuclear testing. This is encouraging. Of course, if an agreement were secured without the adherence of the French and particularly without the adherence of communist China, it would not be too effective. All of these things point to better relations but we must in no way let our defences down. Admissions that things may be bettering should lead in no way to a diminution in the need of our maintaining our defences.

We are having this debate, as I said a moment ago, to secure the views of the house. I am going to show from the record that we have been consistent throughout in the stand we have taken. We shall make our decisions, and have, on the basis of Canada's security and the maintenance of our responsibilities internationally. We have made them and will continue to make them on the basis of no other consideration. I start at once by saying that any suggestion that we have repudiated any undertaking by Canada internationally is false in substance and in fact. Canada does not, has not and will not renege on her responsibilities. Let there be no doubt about that. When there is a suggestion that she has, that is but part and parcel of the attitude taken by the official opposition during the past five years of downgrading our country nationally and internationally.

The Leader of the Opposition says that we should have a committee of parliament on defence policy. The leader of the Social Credit party made a similar statement yesterday.

I point out this fact, that never at any time has there been a committee set up in our country on defence policy. There can be committees on defence for the purpose of looking into questions of defence but not for the determination of policy, which must be the responsibility of the government. Indeed, the Leader of the Opposition himself said on January 19, 1959, and in that he was consistent with the stand that was taken throughout the years by his party when in power:

> The sole responsibility for the policy decision in this matter as in defence policy generally remains in the hands of the government, and they should have met it before now.

This is the tradition of British parliamentary government and we on this side do not wish, as we did not wish when we were in opposition, to depart from it in favour of the making of policy through parliamentary committees. This is the stand we take, a stand that is consistent as the Leader of the Opposition said in 1959, with the whole question of parliamentary responsibility.

Now, sir, the Leader of the Opposition has admitted that defence is a complex problem, a difficult one not alone for Canada but for all the countries in the free world who are having difficulty in this connection. All of them have made expenditures for weapons and the like which, before they were produced, have had to be put in the scrap heap. Somebody said, and I think this is a slogan that appears on the walls of some of the defence establishments in the United States, if it works it is obsolete. There has been a tremendous expansion in plans for defence and the media for defence. How often it has been found that before the weapons are ready for distribution they have already ceased to have any effect.

I want to point out a few general rules that we in this government have adopted. We say we shall take adequate steps at all times to protect this country. We have taken these steps. Indeed, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs said on December 17 on his return to the House of Commons from the NATO conference in Paris, the various nations there without exception paid tribute to the degree to which Canada had carried out her responsibilities. There was some suggestion today that in the interest of collective security we should co-operate in things that, for us, would not be effective. The stand we take is this: Canada has co-operated and will co-operate, but she will not be a pawn nor be pushed around by other nations to do those things which, in the opinion of the Canadian people, are not in keeping with her sovereignty and her sovereign position.

Our general purpose has been to do our part to assure Canada's security, to work with our allies in close relationship, and at the same time press forward for disarmament which is the only hope for peace. This is our purpose, this is our aim and our objective. Regardless of the political consequences, we will act to do those things that will carry out our responsibilities. We will fully co-operate with the countries of the western alliance, but with policies in co-operation with them that are made in Canada and not elsewhere. We will maintain Canadian sovereignty, regardless of the pressures, of the views, of anyone visiting our country or otherwise. We will have a policy that remains flexible so as to meet changing conditions. We will do nothing to extend the nuclear family. We will do our part to assure the continuance of the contribution of Canada to all U.N. forces designed to preserve peace.

Fundamental to our policy as it relates to other nations is the desire to be a useful and ever-ready agent for peace and for productive solutions while at the same time pulling our weight. Some say you should take the advice of generals if they are eminent. This was not the view of President Eisenhower who had occupied the highest position in the western world as a general. He did not say this until the last speech he delivered prior to giving up the presidency. This is what he said at that time:

> In the councils of government we must guard against acquisitions of unwarranted influence, whether sought or unsought, by the military-industrial complex. The potential for the disastrous rise of misplaced power exists and will persist.
> We must never let the weight of this combination endanger our liberties or democratic processes. We should take nothing for granted. Only an alert and knowledgeable citizenry can compel the proper meshing of the huge industrial and military machinery of defence with our peaceful methods and goals, so that security and liberty may prosper together.

This has been the view of Canadian leaders, too. Sir Robert Borden, in 1917, said, "They advise but the civil authority determines". I emphasize that fact because the major portion of the argument of the Leader of the Opposition is based on the quotation of questions and answers selected from an interview that took place some weeks ago. I am going to deal with the question of nuclear weapons. This is a question that arouses in all of us those feelings of fear. I am going to deal with that at some length.

Nuclear weapons have a basis, for all peoples, of power and danger far beyond anything known before. Today, the United States has a preponderance of that power, and that caused Khrushchev to realize there would be no payoff in victory for the communists if they moved forward. This was the essence of the Cuban question and of the stand taken by the President of the United States. When the hon. member referred to Canada not having acted, may I say this? How could you act at the same time as your partner acted if you had no knowledge in advance beyond an hour and a half prior to the delivery of the speech of the President of the United States? He said, why didn't we act? We acted immediately. The United States knew in advance the course she was going to follow and had naturally had arrangements made in advance. We as a partner in NORAD had no knowledge. I simply point that out without further observation. For those in positions to control or use nuclear weapons, they possess a responsibility of magnitude and seriousness that it is hard even to imagine. It must be a frightful thing to have resting on your shoulders, as rests on the shoulders of the President of the United States, the responsibility in this connection. The United States has today taken over the herculean responsibilities that Britain carried for a hundred years, and there is resting upon the President of the United States decisions the seriousness of which affect all parts of the world.

We have been confronted with serious difficulties and problems in the defence field since 1957. One of our first acts was to continue an arrangement which our predecessors had made, which permitted United States interceptor aircraft to fly over Canada. A few weeks later we entered into a NORAD agreement to establish a single separate effective control of North American defences. Forces of the United States and Canada were organized to defend our two nations against nuclear attack, and I point out so far as the Bomarc is concerned it was simply part of the plan, and was not to defend Canada. That is not its purpose. Its purpose is to preserve the strategic air command from an attack which would prevent the strategic air command from striking out with all its deterrent power. We organized to defend the bases of the deterrent nuclear force which has protected us, as well as the western world, for the past half dozen years and more.

That agreement was worked out to the mutual advantage of both countries and Canadian officers have taken a full share of responsibility and have done outstanding work in carrying it out.

The question of defensive nuclear weapons is one that must receive the attention of all the countries. We believe strongly in limiting the spread of nuclear weapons at the independent disposal of national governments. In that we are in concert with the opposition.

In December, 1957, I was one of those who attended the meeting of the NATO powers in Paris. We agreed to the establishment of stockpiles of nuclear warheads in NATO nations, to be readily available for use by nuclear forces in Europe who were then confronted with the threat of Russian nuclear weapons against them.

During 1958 the Canadian government studied intensively the arms required by Canadian forces in modern circumstances, and we reached the decision we would provide aircraft for the purposes of NATO. At that time I made it perfectly clear, as I shall point out in a moment, that those forces would have to be equipped, in order to be fully effective, with defensive nuclear weapons if and when the need arose. That was recognized in taking the decision that was announced in September, 1958, to instal Bomarc anti-aircraft missiles in Canada.

The Leader of the Opposition would have you understand that there has been no change; once you do a thing you should stay. In 1958, when the Bomarc was first laid down as a plan, the great challenge to North America was believed to be bombers carrying bombs. That is what we thought. Today that is changed. More and more there is a phasing out in connection with the bomber threat as more and more intercontinental ballistic missiles are increasing in number. Those are some of the stands we have taken and I set forth the views of the government on February 20, 1959, as quoted by the Leader of the Opposition. In accordance with that statement we proceeded to acquire equipment, aircraft, launchers and other items necessary to enable the Canadian forces to be ready to use defensive nuclear weapons if and when that became necessary.

In May, 1959, the supreme commander of NATO forces visited Ottawa and proposed to the government that the first Canadian air division in Europe should undertake a strike reconnaissance role to protect the NATO forces aircraft from the first attack on them. That we placed before the House of Commons. The government considered the proposal, and early in July announced its decision in the house to accept this role and to equip eight squadrons of the division to discharge it. Our ambassador informed the NATO council of this decision.

While nothing was specified about arming the aircraft with nuclear weapons it was realized by all that this would be desirable and that nuclear weapons should be available as and when required, under joint control, in NATO stockpiles in accordance with the general NATO decision of December, 1957, to which I have referred. Similarly, but less important, plans were made in connection with short-range defensive missiles.

Now, sir, that is all in the past. Those are the stands which we took. Those are the views that we placed before parliament in detail; and that is what surprises me, that the Leader of the Opposition, after his return from the United States a few weeks ago and after the interview with General Norstad, suddenly realized what was actually the fact. He suddenly realized that there should be some action taken, and I am going to deal with that because when I follow him in his equivocating stand throughout the past five years—if I can do it—I shall place before the house something of what I spoke so frequently—

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —of a bold and imaginative policy, straightforward and courageous.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret to inform the house that the time of the Prime Minister has expired.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Deputy Chairman: But I am sure he will receive unanimous consent to continue.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): He always has. The Prime Minister always has.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, may I invite your attention to the rule which indicates that under all circumstances, whether in the house or in committee, the Prime Minister, like the Leader of the Opposition, is not under any limitation of time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No one ever stops the Prime Minister from speaking.

Mr. Ricard: Except the Liberals.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Except the hon. member for Essex East, with the co-operation of the hon. member for Assiniboia and some others over there, on December 19.

We have spent billions of dollars on defence since world war II. Much of what has been spent might be considered by some to have been wasted, but if it had not been for the defences we built up, and those associated with us, our freedom might long since have disappeared. Since the time we entered into these commitments I have referred to things which have changed greatly. It was not a mistake to take measures to ensure the necessary security, on the basis of the information we had then, even though in the light of subsequent events some of the things that were done had been proven, as with every country, to be unnecessary.

I referred a moment ago to the tremendous strength of the United States. In December it was publicly stated that the United States had now 200 nuclear tipped, intercontinental ballistic missiles in place and that American missiles—these were press reports—now include 126 Atlas missiles, 54 Titans and 20 Minutemen. In other words, they are moving in the direction of a new concept of defensive measures. Those new concepts were the result of the meeting in Nassau, to which I will later make reference.

No one can predict the future. We build today on the basis of information that we have. We provide the weapons today according to our best lights and following collaboration among those associated in this matter of defence. New forms of deterrent are being developed. Military mistakes and changes have been made by all the countries in the western world. A short résumé will give the committee some idea of how easy it is to say what should be done now on the basis of what was done earlier in the face of other circumstances.

Britain had the Blue Streak, a long range missile which cost her some $267 million. She gave it up. Recently the United States decided that the Skybolt would not be used. The Leader of the Opposition said that they decided to end the building of the Skybolt. I do not think that is correct. What they decided was that in view of the uncertainty of this missile there was no real purpose in going on with it. But on the other hand, in Nassau the United States was willing to proceed, provided Britain would put up a corresponding amount of money in order to ascertain whether or not it could be made workable. By the spring of 1960 the United States had spent over $3 billion on various forms of projects, military weapons and the like, that had to be cancelled or ended in their production.

We had to take the same course. Some people talk about courage. Well, we took a stand in reference to the Arrow. No one wanted to take that stand. It is easy for members of the opposition to say it should not have been done. As I look back on it I think it was one of the decisions that was right. Here was an instrument beautiful in appearance, powerful, a tribute to Canadian production. But people sometimes say to me, "How would it have defended Canada?" What is the total area in which it would operate at full speed? The answer is, 325 miles out and back, in a vast country like Canada. We could not get sales for it at all and the cost would have been $7½ million per unit. What a tremendous cost to this nation. This instrument that was otherwise beautiful, magnificent in its concept, would have contributed little, in the changing order of things, to our national defence.

Every now and then some new white hope of rocketry goes into the scrap pile. We established the Bomarc, the two units. They are effective over an area of only a few hundred miles. They are effective only against aircraft. People talk about change. Who would have thought three years ago that today the fear would be an attack with intercontinental ballistic missiles? This program cost Canada some $14 million. The United States put up the major portion of the total cost. I do not want to repeat, but it is necessary to do so, that with the advent more and more into intercontinental ballistic missiles the bomber carrier is less and less the threat that it was.

So what should we do? Should we carry on with what we have done in the past, merely for the purpose of saying, "Well, we started, and having started and having proceeded, we will continue"? Should we do this in an area where mistakes are made? I am not dealing with those mistakes at the moment; but should we continue with such programs, in the light of changing circumstances? These were not mistakes in judgment at the time, but the failure to be able to look ahead and read the mind of Khrushchev and those associated with him in the presidium. More and more the nuclear deterrent is becoming of such a nature that more nuclear arms will add nothing materially to our defences. Greater and greater emphasis must be placed on conventional arms and conventional forces. We in Canada took a lead in that connection. In the month of September, 1961 we increased the numbers of our conventional forces. There was criticism at the time.

I was in Nassau. I formed certain ideas. I read the communique that was issued there and I come to certain conclusions based on that communique. Those conclusions are as follows, and these are the views expressed also by the United States under secretary of state, George W. Ball: that nuclear war is indivisible; that there should be no further development of new nuclear power anywhere in the world; that nuclear weapons as a universal deterrent is a dangerous solution. Today an attempt is being made by the United States to have the NATO nations increase their conventional arms. The Nassau agreement seemed to accept these three principles as basic, and to carry them out both countries agreed to assign to NATO part of their existing nuclear force as the nucleus of a multilateral force.

What was the plan? The Skybolt, they said, had not been too successful—although it is ironical that the day after the communique the first one was successfully launched into space. The day is rapidly passing when we will have missile sites that are set, firm, on land. The new concept is the Polaris missile which is delivered from a submarine. When the Polaris missiles are delivered to the United Kingdom as part of the multilateral force, Britain will not have her independent nuclear deterrent power any more to the same extent, excepting to use these in a case of supranational emergency.

Mr. Chairman, I am going to read the paragraphs in question from the communique. They illustrate in a most striking way the state of flux of the defence of the free world. The communique shows that changes are taking place, and I will read the various paragraphs that set this out:

> The president informed the prime minister that for this reason—

That was, that it was very complex, and so on:

> —and because of the availability to the United States of alternative weapons systems, he had decided to cancel plans for the production of Skybolt for use by the United States. Nevertheless, recognizing the importance of the Skybolt program for the United Kingdom, and recalling that the purpose of the offer of Skybolt to the United Kingdom in 1960 had been to assist in improving and extending the effective life of the British V-bombers, the president expressed his readiness to continue the development of the missile as a joint enterprise between the United States and the United Kingdom, with each country bearing equal shares of the future cost of completing development.

Then the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, while recognizing the value of this offer, decided after full consideration not to avail himself of it because of doubts which had been expressed about the prospects of the success of the enterprise. As an alternative, the president offered the Hound Dog missile; but the Hound Dog missile cannot be used on British aircraft because it would put the bottom of the aircraft too close to the ground, causing danger to those operating the planes.

The statement continues:

> The Prime Minister then turned to the possibility of provision of the Polaris missile to the United Kingdom by the United States. After careful review, the President and the Prime Minister agreed that a decision on Polaris must be considered in the widest context both of the future defence of the Atlantic Alliance and of the safety of the whole free world... The Prime Minister suggested and the President agreed, that for the immediate future a start could be made by subscribing to NATO some part of the forces already in existence. This could include allocations from United States strategic forces, from United Kingdom bomber command, and from tactical nuclear forces now held in Europe. Such forces would be assigned as part of a NATO nuclear force and targeted in accordance with NATO plans.

Finally, they came out in favour of this multilateral NATO nuclear force. Returning to the Polaris, the president and the prime minister agreed that the purpose of their two governments with respect to the provision of the Polaris missiles must be the development of a multilateral NATO nuclear force in the closest consultation with other NATO allies. Accordingly, they agreed that the United States would make available a contribution of Polaris missiles on a continuing basis for British submarines and that the nuclear warheads for Polaris missiles should also be provided. These forces, and at least equal United States forces, would be made available for inclusion in a NATO multilateral nuclear force. At the same time, while they set up this multilateral force in embryo, the last paragraph points out that the president and the prime minister agreed that in addition to having a nuclear shield it was important to have a non-nuclear sword. For this reason, the communique concludes, they agreed on the importance of increasing the effectiveness of their conventional forces on a world wide basis.

That is a tremendous step—a change in the philosophy of defence; a change in the views of NATO, if accepted by the NATO partners. Certainly it represents a change in the views of two nations which play such a large part in the NATO organization. They went further, as I understand it. They concluded that the day of the bomber is phasing out. Britain wanted a striking force of its own. Britain needed a delivery system produced at the lowest cost. Hence, the Skybolt. With the advent of the Polaris missile the United States believed there was no longer need for the Skybolt, and this was agreed to by the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom. Who made the mistake? Are they to be condemned? No less than $600 million was spent on the development of the Skybolt which was believed to be the essence of defence measures for the United Kingdom itself. I point this out because everywhere in the world, as a result of Khrushchev's changing moods, and vast improvements in technology both with respect to defensive and offensive warfare, the decisions of today are often negatived tomorrow.

When I say there has been a change, let me point out this fact. Only today, in a dispatch from Washington, it is reported that President Kennedy called Livingston Merchant, a veteran diplomat, out of retirement to lead a government team which will prepare United States proposals for a nuclear force in Europe. This was announced yesterday in a statement read to the press by the president's press secretary. The report says that although United States and British efforts to create a nuclear striking force under NATO have run into stiff resistance from the French, Mr. Salinger—he is the secretary—said: "Mr. Merchant and his group will talk with French officials as well as with officials from other NATO countries." All of us know the kind of man Mr. Merchant is—one of those dedicated servants who, in his period of office did so much to increase the good relations between our country and the United States.

Concepts are changing. I do not intend to go now into many particulars but I ask hon. members who say there is no new strategy to read the article in one of the December issues of the Saturday Evening Post. The heading is "Our New Strategy—the Alternatives to Total War", and the viewpoint given is that of Mr. McNamara, the secretary of defence of the United States.

Only on Wednesday, the Turkish government is reported to have announced that Jupiter missiles were being removed from Turkey and Polaris weapons substituted. A similar announcement was made yesterday, I think, by Premier Fanfani of Italy. As far as these missiles are concerned, the reported proposal to replace the present missiles in Italy and Turkey by submarines mounted with Polaris missiles is an example of the rapid changes of these times. Obsolete missiles in vulnerable positions are being replaced by a relatively invulnerable weapon. I cannot altogether understand what the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) meant by his observation that we should no longer produce anything which will become obsolete. After all, that has been the whole history of the development of defence in the last 17 years since the end of the war. Since they are mobile, these Polaris missiles can be put in position or removed as the situation requires. They can be centrally controlled by NATO or another agency. By having the weapons stationed at sea the provocation of having them mounted on the territory of close U.S.S.R. neighbours is removed. Because they are relatively invulnerable, their effectiveness as a deterrent is all the greater.

I propose to review some of the views expressed by this government on the question of defence and to go back over some of the various statements which have been made. I do this because it seems passing strange to me that the Leader of the Opposition only found them out after his trip to the United States—or only revealed that he had found them out then. I say this because I dealt with the situation in detail here in the House of Commons on February 20, 1959. I ask hon. members to read Hansard. They will find I said this—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What page, please?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Page 1223. I said that in keeping with the determination that Canada should carry out its task in a balanced, collective defence—

> In keeping with that determination, careful thought is being given to the principles which in our opinion are applicable to the acquisition and control of nuclear weapons. The government's decisions of last autumn to acquire Bomarc missiles for air defence and Lacrosse missiles for the Canadian army—

One doesn't hear anything more about Lacrosse missiles—

> —were based on the best expert advice available on the need to strengthen Canada's air defence against the threat to this continent and on its determination to continue an effective contribution to the NATO shield.
> The full potential of these defensive weapons is achieved only when they are armed with nuclear warheads. The government is, therefore, examining with the United States government questions connected with the acquisition of nuclear warheads for Bomarc and other defensive weapons for use by the Canadian forces in Canada, and the storage of warheads in Canada. Problems connected with the arming of the Canadian brigade in Europe with short range nuclear weapons for NATO's defence tasks are also being studied.

It set this out in great detail. There is no concealment. There is complete revelation of what we are doing. I could read from Hansard year by year. As found at page 1223 of Hansard for 1959, I said this:

> It is our intention to provide Canadian forces with modern and efficient weapons to enable them to fulfil theri respective roles... it is the policy of the Canadian government not to undertake the production of nuclear weapons in Canada... We must reluctantly admit the need in present circumstances for nuclear weapons of a defensive character.

Then again as the Leader of the Opposition said, on a number of occasions I stated that there was no expectation of an early conclusion of a formal agreement. On January 18, 1960, as found at page 73 of Hansard, I said this:

> Eventually Canadian forces may require certain nuclear weapons if Canadian forces are to be kept effective.

Then again:

> Negotiations are proceeding with the United States in order that the necessary weapons can be made available for Canadian defence units if and when they are required.

That was always of the essence throughout in the stand that we took. I cannot comment in detail on these negotiations but I wish to state that arrangements for the safeguarding and security of all such weapons in Canada will be subject to Canadian approval and consent. Then again on February 9, 1960:

> If and when Canada does acquire nuclear weapons it will be in accordance with our own national policies and with our obligations under the north Atlantic treaty.

Again on July 4, 1960, I said a similar thing. As found at page 5654 of Hansard I said this:

> —in so far as general policy is concerned we are always in this position. On the one hand we are desirous of attaining disarmament; on the other hand we have to discharge our responsibility of ensuring to the maximum degree the security of the Canadian people. So far as that is concerned—

And so on. Again in July I mentioned the matter and again in August:

> —We are, therefore, going ahead with the procurement of vehicles which can use these nuclear weapons, but the decision as to the acquisition of the nuclear warheads depends on circumstances which might develop some time in the future.

Throughout we have followed that course. I do not wish to fill the record, but again on November 23, 1960, I was asked to give a report and I said I would refer the hon. gentleman to what was said on January 19 and February 20, both in 1959; January 18, 1960; February 9, 1960; July 4, 1960 and July 14, 1960. On November 30 I said this:

> —the position of Canada is completely unchanged. We have made it perfectly clear that when and if nuclear weapons are required we shall not accept them unless we have joint control,—

There has been no suggestion at any time of any watering down of that stand. Then again on September 20, 1961:

> However, and I emphasize this, in each of the instruments that we have, the Bomarc and the Voodoos, nuclear weapons could be used. The defensive weapons requirements of Canada and the need for the preservation of security will be the overriding consideration in the mind of this government.

And so on throughout the entire piece. Then, as well in various speeches made outside of the House of Commons I underlined this fact, namely that we were in a position where nuclear weapons could be secured and would be secured in the event that the circumstances at the time made such a course reasonable and necessary. I went further in that connection when I said this:

> Would you in 1961, faced by the overwhelming power of Soviet might in East Germany close to West Berlin with large divisions fully armed, would you place in the hands of those who guard the portals of freedom nothing but bows and arrows? They would stand against overwhelming power—it is as simple as that.

Throughout the election campaign I followed the same course. In the two speeches I made before the United Nations I asked, as had the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and as did the Leader of the Opposition today, for the abolition of nuclear weapons, the end of nuclear weapons, the systematic control of missiles designed to deliver nuclear weapons of mass destruction, the designation and inspection of launching sites for missiles, the abolition of biological and chemical weapons and the outline of outer space for military purposes. That has been our course throughout.

During the election campaign, however, with the change in circumstances that had been taking place from the point of view of defence, I outlined the position of this party in a speech which I made in Brockville. It was not too successful, judging by the results, but I spoke there during the campaign and I said this:

> We shall not, so long as we are pursuing the ways of disarmament, allow the extension of the nuclear family into Canada... We do not intend to allow the spread of nuclear arms beyond the nations which now have them.

Those in short are the views expressed, with one exception. Today the Leader of the Opposition said that when we brought into Canada the 60 F-101B interceptors, it was clearly understood that they would be armed with nuclear weapons. On June 12, 1961, I set out in detail the arrangements that had been arrived at between Canada and the United States. I think I had better read from it:

> —for some time representatives of the Canadian and United States governments have been working on an agreement relating to the defence of Canada, more particularly to air defence and to the Canada-United States production sharing program. The objective of such an agreement was to reflect the desire of both governments to ensure more effective use of the productive capacities, skills and resources of each country and at the same time to demonstrate our mutual determination to improve the defensive strength of NATO and particularly of NORAD under it...
> In consideration of the financial and other benefits which will accrue to the United States as a result of Canada's assumption of additional responsibilities under the Pine Tree agreements, Canada will be furnished with 66 F-101B interceptor aircraft and appropriate support equipment. These aircraft, title to which will be vested in Canada, will be armed with conventional weapons.

Today the Leader of the Opposition said otherwise. That is the background. That is the recital of some of the stands we have taken and which are consistent throughout and which, when read in conjunction one with the other reveal the situation as we saw it. The Leader of the Opposition said, "Let us be bold; we have a policy. The government has not a policy but we have a policy". Well, I am not going to follow the Leader of the Opposition throughout the entire course of his migrations through change in connection with this problem, but I am going to refer to some of the oscillations and vacillations. I am going to try to carry hon. members through the jungle of uncertainty that he built up on behalf of the opposition during a period of several years.

In 1958 he proposed that nations manufacturing atomic weapons should agree not to do so in the future. But that did not prevent him from approving the continuing increasing sale of Canadian uranium to the United States, the chief buyer and the chief maker of atomic weapons. Furthermore, regarding the use of nuclear weapons by Canadian forces he said on the 17th of March, 1960: "There is every doubt and confusion".

What was the stand of the Liberal party? On January 18, 1960, he said: "We should not accept baby nuclear bombs or missiles". On July 15, 1960 he said: "The middle powers should have a self-denying ordinance in nuclear weapons." On August 5, 1960 he said: "Canada should get out of Bomarc operation." Hon. members will have difficulty following me though I am reading from the same gentleman.

On August 5, 1960 he said that NATO should build up its own deterrent force. On the same date, a few lines later, he said he was not suggesting a NATO strategic force. On August 5, 1960, he also said that Canada should reject nuclear weapons for its forces. On the same date a few lines further down he said: "But this should be subject to re-examination."

Be bold. Be imaginative. Be direct.

An hon. Member: Be decisive.

Another hon. Member: Begone.

Mr. Diefenbaker: On March 28, 1961 he said that NATO should rely less on a nuclear deterrent. On April 27, 1961, he said in effect that over-reliance on a nuclear deterrent was a fear of his. A few lines further down he said: "A nuclear deterrent is absolutely essential." Then on September 14, 1961, he said:

Canada is not making any effective contribution but we should not accept nuclear weapons in Europe.

I have heard enough of this story.

An hon. Member: Is this all in one speech?

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is the same thing over and over again. Now we are to be more direct and more certain. I am going to come to the latest policy because he has pulled two or three props from underneath it as a result of losing some supporters. What is the next statement?

Canada's role should not be a fighting role.

That was September 15—

Mr. Pearson: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, the Prime Minister is reading a lot of statements which he attributes to me. He knows the rules, I assume, and therefore he should identify each statement as he makes it, giving the source and the date.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All right. I will now follow the admonition. If the hon. gentleman wants identification he will receive it. I always wait for that. It seems they never learn. We start off with a report of the Liberal convention in Ottawa in the Ottawa Journal of January 10, 1961.

Mr. Pearson: You have already put that on the record.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He wants proof. "Pearson Proposes Non-weapon Role In NORAD." That is in big enough letters that it needs no further identification.

Mr. Pearson: That is a headline.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He went on to say that Canada should do away with interceptors, manned and unmanned, but co-operate with the United States in the role of air detection, identification and warning. That is when the Falcon became a bird watcher. The same suggestion was also embodied in a policy paper presented to a rally subcommittee on defence.

What Mr. Pearson's policy amounted to was Canadian participation in NORAD in so far as radar stations are concerned but withdrawal in so far as interceptors and the Bomarc anti-aircraft missile are concerned.

That is number one. He asked for proof. I have got the document here. It is issued with that reddish superscription.

Any extension of the possession of nuclear weapons under individual national control will greatly increase the danger of accidental outbreak of nuclear war and also the difficulty of achieving disarmament. Membership in the nuclear club, therefore, should not be extended beyond the four countries which now possess such weapons... Canada cannot deny nuclear weapons to other nations and at the same time arm her own forces with them.

What a tortuous course.

A new Liberal government, therefore, should not acquire, manufacture or use such weapons under separate Canadian control or under joint United States-Canadian control.

I have been told over and over again about our course. I realize the complexity when the Leader of the Opposition stands up today in shining armour and in a voice full of emotion tells us in this house what should be done. If we had listened to this advice in the past, where would we have been?

Mr. Pearson: Where have you been?

Mr. Diefenbaker: He says: "Let us be consistent". Let me read on from there.

Canada should continue to play an important part in the defence policy of NATO which seeks security through collective action. However, NATO's objectives and the means of achieving them should be reconsidered in the light of the conditions of today rather than those of 12 years ago. The nuclear power of the United States is necessary as a strategic deterrent as long as the Soviet union maintains massive nuclear forces. But the use of this power might convert a limited attack into a general and fatal nuclear war and its non-use might mean an easy triumph for the aggressor if there were no adequate alternative defence. The sound alternative is to build up NATO shield forces adequate to prevent a communist attack.

That was the policy of the Liberal convention B.G.—before Gordon, in January of 1961. I do not like to put these things on the record.

Some hon. Members: Oh, no?

Mr. Diefenbaker: However, I felt that the house would like to have a handy and ready reference to what the hon. gentleman describes as courageous consistency.

The Soviet union has strong forces for such an attack now in process of being armed with nuclear tactical weapons. If after re-examination of its defence policy the NATO council formally decides that conventional forces should be reinforced by nuclear weapons solely for defensive tactical use, then Canadian forces under NATO command should possess such weapons.

I shall return to that in a moment because that was the policy at that time. On November 7, 1961, he spoke in Quebec and there is this headline over the report: "Liberals Would Reject Bomarcs, Says Pearson". Then, surprisingly enough he spoke in a by-election in Labelle, in which one of the Bomarc sites was located. He says do not bring politics into this thing, and then we read what he said to the people of Thurso, Quebec as reported by Paul Dubois in the Ottawa Citizen of October 29, 1960:

Referring to the planned Bomarc base at Montpellier, located in the northern extremity of Labelle riding, Mr. Pearson condemned the government's plans to equip the missiles with nuclear warheads, missiles that would be controlled by the United States. A nuclear deterrent may be necessary for the United States but not for us and other countries.

Then we find these words, and you can just hear the emotion packed into these words as he appealed to that great gathering. I think there were 30 or 40 present.

If Russia ever attacked North America and specifically Canada, Montpellier would be a prime target for the Russians. Montpellier and communities for hundreds of miles around would be reduced to ruins.

Now, there was a reference to this policy in connection with NORAD. There is a reference in the magazine Canadian Commentator dealing with the policy that was announced:

This month's Liberal party rally has provided a dismaying example of what must happen if a military problem is resolved entirely on the basis of political considerations. The problem in question was that of Canadian participation in the North American Air Defence Command. The resolution, as it was reported, suffers somewhat from confused terminology—it approves "identification" of suspected aerial intruders by Canadian fighter aircraft, but not "interception," although the former action is not possible without the latter. Still, it is quite clear what the stand is which the Liberals are taking in this matter: They want to leave all arrangements as they are except that Canadian forces in NORAD would not actually shoot. In other words, we would warn the Americans that the enemy was coming, we would tell them who he is, we would fix and track him, but then we would virtuously withdraw and let the Americans do the killing.

Then, finally, they came out with this policy. I do not know who claims the paternity of it but certainly it was not the Liberal party who presented it. The hon. member for Lambton West has been swallowing himself ever since; he did not know anything about it. He announced in advance it was going to be a policy which was going to be anti-nuclear weapons. There were others in the same position. I have read this over, and I suggest everyone read it over because it is a most interesting piece of work.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am glad to see the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George because he is certainly one who needs some information about it. Now then, we are—

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, just on a point of personal explanation for the benefit of the Prime Minister—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am sorry; the identification was wrong but the interception was right.

Mr. Drury: I am glad the Prime Minister recognized his mistake.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I quote:

Canada should contribute to the strategic nuclear deterrent.

Who makes this declaration of policy, this ringing declaration?

Mr. Pearson: Will you read that again?

Mr. Diefenbaker: What was that?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, the Prime Minister has just read a statement in which he said that I said Canada should contribute to the strategic nuclear deterrent. It reads "Canada should not contribute". There is a "not" there.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am reading from the report of the hon. gentleman's speech.

Mr. Pearson: Read it again.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I say that there will be no additional—

Mr. Pearson: Read it again.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There will be no additional knowledge for anybody reading it a second time.

Mr. Pearson: Just read it correctly.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I did not interrupt the hon. gentleman; I listened to him.

Mr. Pearson: You just left out the word "not".

Mr. Diefenbaker: We are going to have nuclear weapons; that is what they are for, you think, and then read on:

The government should re-examine at once the whole basis of Canadian defence policy. In particular, it should discuss with the United States and with NATO a role for Canada in continental and collective defence which would be more realistic and effective for Canada than the present one.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Some of them have heard it for the first time. I continue quoting:

This examination would be concerned, among other things, with the necessity of building up NATO's conventional forces and the part Canada could play in this. However, until they are changed, a new Liberal government would put Canada's armed services in the position to discharge fully commitments undertaken for Canada by its predecessor.

What do these weasel words mean? What has been the reaction in the United States to them? Well, in the Toronto Star of January 15, 1963, there is an article by Martin Goodman which reads as follows:

Hon. Lester Pearson's attempt to clarify Liberal defence policy has further confused U.S. observers.

Canada will honour commitments, he says, and then the article continues:

Meanwhile the government re-examines Canada's defence policy with Pearson's obvious intention to shift to a non-nuclear role.

Presumably six months or so later, the troops would stop training, the warheads and technical personnel would depart. Canada would have a new policy, but would be no closer to its implementation than it is now.

Now, that is the United States view. What about the Canadian view? All across this nation one finds one editorial after another asking, what is the meaning of this policy? Some editorials say, "More confusing". This is what the Calgary Herald says:

Just exactly where does Hon. Lester B. Pearson, national Liberal party leader, stand on the subject of nuclear warheads for Canada's armed forces? Up until last Saturday it was understood that he opposed them. On Saturday he announced that he is now in favour of Canada acquiring them.

A sigh of relief could be heard across the land.

At last a major political party was prepared to argue on behalf of this country fulfilling its mutual defence commitments.

But such rejoicing as was occasioned by hearing what has become an unusual sound in Canada, a strong, bold voice of leadership, turned to puzzlement and dismay on Wednesday.

In another public pronouncement then—

That was the Algoma East revised version.

—Mr. Pearson indicated that maybe nuclear warheads are not the answer after all.

Maybe it would be better to change Canada's commitments to NATO and NORAD, he said.

The editorial ends up in this way, and the Calgary Herald has strong feelings on this:

But in his Wednesday speech he undid much of the good impression he made four days previously.

They should have heard him today with his further revision.

Perhaps he did not make himself perfectly clear on Wednesday. But why create doubts? Exactly where does he stand now? A good many puzzled citizens would very much like to know.

So, I could go all across this country. I could continue and quote editorials from all across the country. He said the problem was confused and complicated, but to try and follow the course that has been taken by the opposition in this matter is to endeavour to follow a pathway of irresponsibility, a policy of shift, a labyrinth in shuffling, confused and contradictory.

I wish to give someone an opportunity to follow me because I know they want to do so, but I could go on with the quotations. However, that opportunity will come later. There is however one further one to which I wish to make reference, the considered statement of the Leader of the Opposition made on August 5, 1960, as reported at page 7606 of Hansard for that date.

In my view we should get out of the whole SAGE-Bomarc operation, and we should not spend any more money on radar gap fillers . . . It seems to me . . . that our experience in the last three years has shown that in attempting to participate in continental defence in the way we have, we are becoming, nothing more than just the last two knots on the Bomarc tail of the defence kite. I believe that in getting out of this position, which

I consider to be an ineffective one for Canada, we would be rejecting the use by us of any form of nuclear weapons for what is mistakenly called the defence of our territory. I believe, however, that we should continue the part we are now playing in early warning operations, though they will be of diminishing importance—

It is one of those things that caused delays, and hours of concern and worry. We ask "Are we doing what is right?" Well, I can tell you that we have not in any way broken any of our undertakings. We have at all times maintained the best defence that we have been able to, on the basis of the information we had at the time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: To summarize our viewpoint, there is a will to peace, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs said yesterday. There is progress being made. We must maintain our defence. We shall not allow Canada to be placed in a subservient or unsovereign position. We shall follow the course that we have been following—one that has been consistent. It has been one of calm consideration of the matters as they arise.

We know, as the Leader of the Opposition said, that the way to prevent nuclear war is to prevent it. What course should we take at this time? I emphasize what I have already stated, that we shall at all times carry out whatever our responsibilities are. I have said that strategic changes are taking place in the thinking of the western world, and there is general recognition that the nuclear deterrent will not be strengthened by the expansion of the nuclear family. With these improvements in the international situation, this is no time for hardened decisions that cannot be altered. We must be flexible and fluid, for no one can anticipate what Khrushchev will do.

A meeting is about to take place in Ottawa of the NATO nations. They will meet here on May 21 to 23 and the very fact that they are meeting here indicates the attitude towards Canada and the feeling of the NATO nations towards her. As was said by the Leader of the Opposition when they met here previously, it represented a recognition that Canada had a very important part to play.

What shall our attitude be? It will not be one of recklessness, not one of making final decisions in the face of a changing world. I mentioned Nassau a moment ago and, as one examines what took place there, he realizes that we are living in a new and changing world of defence realism.

The Leader of the Opposition says all the F-104G aircraft have been delivered.

Mr. Pearson: I never said that.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: You did not say that? I am sorry. My interpretation was that he repeated over and over again that that was so. The total number that has been delivered is one squadron. Following SACEUR's recommendation, as we saw the situation in 1959 and as I said earlier in my remarks, we undertook to equip our squadrons assigned to NATO for a strike reconnaissance role, which role would include the mission of delivering nuclear weapons. No one was under any misunderstanding in that connection. Parliament approved this program and appropriated the funds.

I have said earlier that all the nations made mistakes, $3 billions worth of mistakes and more, up to 1960 but the fact that a mistake may have been made, or may not have been made, should not be a basis for the continuation of a policy just because to admit it would be wrong. Delivery of the F-104G has commenced, but the strike reconnaissance role has been placed under doubt by the recent Nassau declaration concerning nuclear arms, as well as other developments both technical and political in the defence field. It will be necessary, therefore, at this meeting in May, for Canada to give consideration to this matter and we will, in co-operation with the nations of NATO, undertake a clarification of our role in NATO defence plans and disposition.

We are united in NATO. We have never and will never consent to Canada breaking any of her pledged words or undertakings. It is at that meeting, where there will be reviewed the entire collective defence policy, that we shall secure from the other member nations their views, and on the basis of that we will be in a position to make a decision, a consistent decision, first to maintain our undertakings and second, to execute, if that be the view, the maintenance of our collective defence. In the meantime the training of Canadian forces in the use of these weapon systems can continue.

So far as NORAD is concerned I have said at the beginning of my remarks that Canada's sovereignty must be maintained. We shall continue our negotiations. They have been going on quite forcibly for two months or more.

Mr. Harkness: For two or three months.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, they have been going on for two or three months. Sometimes I wonder whether that is the reason the Leader of the Opposition rushed in with his statement the other day, because he found that out and knew about it. But there was never any concealment of the fact. We will negotiate with the United States so that, as I said earlier, in case of need nuclear warheads will be made readily available. In other words, we will be in a position to determine finally, in the interests of Canada and our allies, the course to be followed in the light of changing circumstances in the disarmament field, which have become encouraging recently through Khrushchev's acceptance of even a minimum observation of nuclear testing. We will discuss with the nations of NATO the new concept of a nuclear force for NATO. If that concept at Nassau is carried into effect, much of our planning in the past will pass out of existence.

Mr. Chairman, it is so easy to say what should be done. Conscientiously and honestly we have tried, in the face of changing conditions, to bring about peace. We do not want to do anything at this time to rock the boat. If in the progress of disarmament it is found that we are beginning to approach that new era that all of us look forward to, the NATO nations meeting together can make that determination in agreement that is best for each and all. If, on the other hand, there is going to be set up a multilateral nuclear force, then all our planning to date, or most of it, will be of little or no consequence. I know they say, "Make decisions. Be concrete; be direct". Mr. Chairman, recklessness was never evidence of decisiveness. We will, as a result of the fullest discussion and consideration, determine a course which I believe now means a vast alteration in all the defensive techniques that we have accepted in the last few years, and we will come back to parliament and place before it the considered view of this government.

Mr. Hellyer: You will come back when?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I throw this back to the opposition. We never sold Canada. We have never in any way made undertakings that we have not carried out. Canada has a proud record. The opposition should not try, for political purposes, to besmirch that record. All of us should be true Canadians when facing a problem that touches the heartstrings of each and every one of us. My prayer is that we will be directed in this matter. Some may ridicule that belief on my part. I believe that the western world has been directed by God in the last few years, or there would have been no survival. I believe that will continue. My prayer is that we shall so live as to maintain not only the integrity of Canada and its high reputation by carrying out our responsibilities, but at the same time that we will be right, that the Canadian people will be able to say that, whatever decision is made, it was made with every consideration being given to all those moral and psychological things that form one's make-up.

I would rather be right, Mr. Chairman, so that those who come after may say, "He refused to be stampeded. He refused to act on the impulse of the moment. He and his colleagues together, with the support of the Canadian parliament, brought about a policy, in co-operation with their allies and by influence over their allies, that led to the achievement of peace".

The Chairman: The hon. member for Trinity.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Douglas: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, we have witnessed in this two-day debate an incredible spectacle—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member has risen on a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Douglas: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, the period of time set aside for this debate was two days. Yesterday each of the parties had an opportunity to speak. Today the two major parties have occupied the entire day. I do not object, because the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition had a right to make full statements, and they came very close to taking almost two hours apiece. But now to deny either of the other two parties an opportunity to take part in the conclusion of this two-day debate seems to me, Mr. Chairman, to be sheer discrimination.

The Chairman: Order. I regret the comment of the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam. The Chair, in exercising its judgment in this rather difficult situation, with ten minutes to go before the allotted time elapses, was put in a very embarrassing position if it was to discriminate between either of the two parties at the far end of the chamber. This was the problem that I had in mind. No private member from either the government or the opposition side has at any time in the past two days been permitted to speak and—

An hon. Member: What about the hon. member for Essex East?

The Chairman: I should correct that by saying that they have not been called, because obviously they have risen and then other hon. members have been given the floor. I thought that was a fair and equitable way of settling the question in this short period of ten minutes. If I had recognized an hon. member of the Social Credit party I am sure the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam would have been unhappy—

Some hon. Members: No.

The Chairman: —or vice versa. In closing the remarks on this subject, let me say that any member of either of those parties is perfectly at liberty to move that a member of his own group be heard, although I have now given the floor to the hon. member for Trinity.

Mr. Knowles: As a matter of fairness, I move that the hon. member for Villeneuve be now heard.

The Chairman: Would the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre put his motion in writing?

Mr. Hellyer: In the circumstances I have no hesitation in yielding the floor, if that is the general wish of the committee.

The Chairman: I thank the hon. member for Trinity for his co-operation.

(Translation):

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank sincerely the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) and the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) for the courtesy they have extended to me. In fact, I believe that both minority parties represented here should have the opportunity, during this second day of the debate, to put forward their views concerning the external affairs and the national defence of this country.

Mr. Chairman, we have listened with interest to the speeches made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) and by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), and we must admit that neither of them have enlightened us very much, although they spoke for nearly two hours each. This reminds me somewhat of what Mr. Clemenceau said after the first world war:

I apologize to the memory of Attila and of his like, but the art of keeping people alive is much more complex than that of slaughtering them.

Mr. Chairman, during the whole day we have heard about national defence, armaments or nuclear weapons. We have heard also about possible attacks, to such an extent that we might have thought we were on the verge of a national, international or world conflict, while people like you and I are not thinking about any conquest nor seeking to stock nuclear weapons in Canada, but merely security, accompanied by freedom.

Mr. Chairman, national defence has been described to us as being the main problem of the Canadian government. In fact, the Leader of the Opposition stated that national defence should be based on national security, which we now have. And while he has managed to find out the weak points in the government, which cannot take a stand for or against and which seems to say: "Are we in favour of nuclear weapons or not?", the Leader of the Opposition did not say, however, what he would do if he were in the place of the government.

Two or three times he gave us to understand that if the Liberal party were re-elected he would perhaps have some changes made, in order that we would not be in need of any nuclear warhead nor anything else like it.

Mr. Chairman, yesterday evening, when the Leader of the Opposition opened his remarks, the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Gregoire) rose on a point of order to make the following remarks:

Would the house consent to General Norstad sitting beside the Leader of the Opposition while the latter delivers his speech?

And the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), with his usual spirit, his fluency of speech and especially his quick-wittedness, managed to say:

Mr. Chairman, that intervention represents the level of intelligence of the hon. gentleman with regard to General Norstad—

Of course, he is the only one in this house who can understand General Norstad.

—I may say that I would rather have General Norstad, a NATO commander and therefore a servant of Canada, sitting beside me than Mr. Hitler or any of his henchmen.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know what the leader was referring to when he made that statement. But I still say this to him: I would not like to have near me or by my side in this house neither Hitler, nor General Norstad, nor even the Leader of the Opposition who cannot act up to his convictions as a Canadian, on behalf of the Canadian people who are ready to give their lives and their blood for their country.

And it is this man who comes here and tells us, in a two-hour speech: "What would we do in Canada if we did not have the United States to tell us what to do? What would we do in Canada if we did not have General Norstad to tell us what to do, to teach us nationalism or internationalism?"

Mr. Chairman, any Canadian, whether the leader of a political party, Liberal or anything else, who is not able to assume his responsibilities as a Canadian any better than the Leader of the Opposition did today, does not even deserve the confidence of his own followers.

The Leader of the Opposition also ventured this afternoon to hold up to ridicule the leader of our party, the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson), when he tried to prove that our leader contradicts himself, that he makes a statement in the west, another kind of statement in a different province and still another one elsewhere.

The leader of our group took part in the discussion yesterday. He called the attention of the house to the present situation in Canada. Among other things, he has put forward the general policy of our party.

That policy is not for one province only or for one area of our country, but for the whole of Canada.

This is what the leader of our party said:

First of all, what are the logical policies which develop out of this approach?

Let us face up to the problem as it is.

On behalf of my party, I pledge that Social Credit will never adopt or support a defence policy whereby Canada adopts or makes use of offensive weapons of indiscriminate or uncontrollable mass destruction. Canada should rather use its best efforts to promote the complete abandonment of this type of armament throughout the world, through effectively supervised multilateral international agreement.

(Text):

Progress reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the report be received? Now?

Mr. Knowles: We wonder if the house would give unanimous consent to continuing to deal, during the hour from five to six, with the business which we have had before us up to this point. I raise the matter because the bills at the top of the list are in the names of members of this group. I refer particularly to my friend the hon. member for Kootenay West, whose bill would be called. We would be willing that this hour be given to the debate on external affairs.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would point out to Your Honour that it does not matter whose bill is at the top of the list. If the time is sacrificed, it makes it that much more difficult for the other bills to be heard. We see no reason whatever for deviating from the normal rules of parliament.

Mr. Speaker: It has been proposed to set aside the rule applicable for private members business, but it would require the unanimous consent of the house. Is it the wish of the house that the house revert to committee?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: When I rose, Mr. Speaker, I did so simply to point out that for my part I saw no particular reason for this procedure. However, if it is the general view of the house that it would be preferable to go on with this debate, I certainly should not like to be the only member of the house who stood in the way of doing so. In the circumstances I would suggest that we make it unanimous.

Mr. Speaker: Is it unanimously agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Chown in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

1. Departmental administration, $7,305,200.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, I am very grateful to the members of the New Democratic party for their courtesy. My wish is that justice be given to the New Democratic party right after I am finished with my comments.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, I was quoting the points made yesterday by the hon. member for Red Deer with regard to the use of atomic arms.

He dealt with the following point:

The second point concerns whether or not Canada should acquire defensive nuclear weapons at this time—

That is the position now. The hon. member for Red Deer does neither establish nor analyse any of those principles, but he looks at the facts and takes them exactly as they are.

—at home or with NATO. The leader of the Liberal party has said that we must acquire nuclear armaments in order to keep our commitments with NORAD, with NATO. This is a reversal of the policies he enunciated up until the last couple of weeks.

And the Prime Minister gave us a striking example when he quoted from the statements the Leader of the Opposition made one, two and three years ago.

In the third instance, the hon. member for Red Deer said this:

How can this house make any sound decision before it has the facts. I say that the onus is on the government to make these necessary facts available. We on our side of the house agree that a special defence committee should be set up. It is absolutely imperative that means of continued sound approach to the safety of this country be established. Let us not forget that consideration. We in Social Credit are convinced that Canada's defence policy must not be a matter of partisan politics or party squabbles.

Now, since yesterday we are hearing about that attitude, about the attitude of the various parties in the house.

I noted that the views of the New Democratic party were imbued with a Canadian spirit until its leader mentioned an international government which would establish centralization. In such a case, the hon. member might assume about the same importance as a church warden in some Canadian parish.

Social Crediters insist on having a clear and definite policy. We are against the use of nuclear weapons. We advocate instead the use of essential foodstuffs to feed the hungry people of the world. We would then set a real example of peace in the world, rather than an example of defence. When I speak of true peace, Mr. Chairman, this does not imply an armed peace, as some would have it. When we speak about defence, let us admit that we consider the possibility of a world wide communist attack, from Russia, China or somewhere else.

Well, communism, whether we like it or not, is an ideology and the way to fight efficiently against it, in the world, is not by using atomic weapons any more than by using nuclear bombs or weapons, or rifles, or guns.

One can kill communists, yes. One can put communists in jail, yes. But one cannot kill an idea. The way to fight an idea is with a better idea.

If we do not want to have communism, let us fight it with a better idea, one which, while guaranteeing security and freedom, will be such as to make freedom felt. That is what we Social Crediters are striving to achieve and to make people understand throughout Canada.

In the past, we have seen small countries in a state of extreme poverty sink into communism. Why is Russia not willing to use atomic weapons? It is because she is in the course of winning over the small countries of the world, purely from an economic standpoint, without resorting to war or atomic weapons.

I should like to state here, Mr. Chairman, that Cuba, a small country which is situated close to the American shores, would not be communist now if the free world had helped her when her citizens were dying of hunger as is the case at present in some Asiatic countries.

We appreciate that Canada must have some kind of a defence program in case of attack but we would not go too far in that respect.

We of the Social Credit party believe in the kind of offensive which provides food for those who are hungry and relief for those who are destitute. There is no doubt that there is want in the world today because, according to the press, two thirds of the world's population are living in want.

Instead of having launching pads for Bomarc missiles in the North Bay and La Macaza regions, why not have cold storage plants and grain elevators where we could store commodities to feed mankind and let the world enjoy them, unconditionally, in order to respect the freedom of the peoples as well as that of the families and the individuals, in our country and throughout the world.

Mr. Chairman, debates lasting two or three days, like the one that started yesterday, are not enough to create a climate of security, a climate of understanding between all the countries of the world. I feel that we Canadians, we federal members of parliament, as well as all the national organisations, can be of great help in creating this economic climate and this climate of understanding and unity throughout the world.

The small part that Social Credit can play is directed to promote the progress of Canada on the road to welfare, to security and liberty.

Because we believe in human liberty, we think that a human being must be respected and surely, we shall not do it with nuclear weapons.

I said a while ago and I say it again that if we wish to fight communism effectively in the world, we must put up against it a better philosophy, a philosophy which respects man and allows him to develop himself according to his aspirations, his talent, his capacity, his intelligence and his own will.

Then, we will have created welfare, for the advance of the world on the road to progress. We will have at least contributed in creating that economic climate which every political party as well as every individual is looking forward to all across Canada.

We of the Social Credit are officially against nuclear arms, whether in Canada or outside the country. We are in favour of bread and butter, we are in favour of the hungry people in the world.

(Text):

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Chairman, I have had the honour of speaking to smaller audiences than this, but seldom to more distinguished audiences; and I want to thank the members who made it possible for us to put forward our views once again in this debate.

The key issue in the debate is the question whether or not Canada should accept nuclear warheads either in Canada or for her forces in Europe. The New Democratic party's stand on this matter is crystal clear. We say that for Canada to choose a nuclear role would be a foolish and fatal step. In our view such a decision would be militarily useless, politically disastrous and morally unjustifiable.

The Leader of the Opposition today put on what to me at least was an extraordinary performance. He made a lengthy speech, nearly two hours, justifying his sudden shift in favour of the adoption of a nuclear role. He managed to do so, while failing to advance a single argument to support the idea that such a role was suitable for Canada or would help our alliance one whit. His single pretext for his shift was an alleged commitment that he denounces as a mistake in the first place. In one breath he tells us we have made a bad mistake in accepting a nuclear role, and in the very next moment he says that we should continue the mistake and waste millions and thousands of millions of dollars of public funds to perpetuate the mistake. He wraps himself in a mantle of righteousness when he says we should continue a mistaken policy and after the whole mistaken policy has been carried out we should then proceed to negotiate our way out.

If the government has made a commitment, and I leave that dispute to the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition, it is perfectly obvious that it was a commitment subject to renegotiation in changed circumstances. It is equally obvious that those circumstances have changed in fact. We in this party believe that if any such commitment was made it can and should be renegotiated, and renegotiated now, before we accept nuclear warheads, and not at some future date after we have accepted these nuclear weapons. Indeed, until a few weeks ago when the Leader of the Opposition was converted by some person—I do not know whom—he made perfectly clear that he was of the same opinion himself.

Before I deal once again with the problem of nuclear weapons, I want to make a few more general observations. I believe that the government deserves congratulations on one thing at least and that is on its decision to discuss defence and external affairs together. They are both aspects of the same problem, the security of Canada and its contribution to the security of the world. In our view the Canadian policy for security lacks a proper balance.

The enemy, Mr. Chairman, is war itself. The word that should sink into our minds when we discuss war today is the word "annihilation". We face momentarily, hourly, daily, the possibility of widespread annihilation. This is one of the lessons of Cuba. It is a new phase of human history. It is the supreme challenge of our age. It cannot be met by traditional methods of defence alone. In the long run it can only be met by building a world community and establishing the rule of law. It is not a pious hope for the millenium; it is the immediate and urgent task for today. It is a task which cannot be completed today or tomorrow, but it must be started and carried through every day, including today.

In building a world community we must have regard not only to the menace of communism, of which much has been said in this debate and which is indeed a real menace, but we must also have regard to the striking contrast between the affluent west and the poverty stricken continents of Asia, Africa and South America. It is our view that a generous and effective economic plan, on the same scale of generosity as the Marshall plan, to enable countries such as India to "take-off" on the way to expanding and self-sustaining economies, is a contribution to defence and security just as important as, if not more important than, the contribution to the traditional weapons of defence. I am glad that the Secretary of State for External Affairs is listening.

In this field the whole western world lags, and Canada lags behind the western world. We should like to see a very different proportion between the $1½ billion we are spending on what is traditionally called defence, much of which is admittedly obsolete, and the one twentieth of that sum that we devote to economic aid and technical assistance. We do recognize the need for defence and the need for unity and co-operation in defence. We believe, however, that the form of our defence should look to the future as well as to the present.

One of the basic reasons for urging that Canada should accept a non-nuclear role in defence is that a non-nuclear role—more suitable for many other reasons—would enable Canada's military contribution to be available for use by the United Nations. I suggest that the experience of the past as well as the hope of the future makes this a more fruitful role. Surely it is possible to look beyond the existing nuclear stalemate, the balance of terror and the necessity of military alliances, to a future when peace can rest on the securer foundations of a world system of law. We should today take steps to hasten that day in the future.

It is our view, however, that Canada should contribute to the western alliance. It would be naïve for us to assume, as some do, that war can be avoided by weakness, disunity or unilateral disarmament. It is our obligation to seek by every possible means for multilateral and complete disarmament, the building of a world community and the establishment of the rule of law, and the fullest support for the United Nations does not absolve governments from planning to maintain the security of democratic institutions by building up a balance of power to deter or resist aggression. To this purpose Canada must contribute, and it is only sensible that her contribution should be made in co-operation with those nations to whom she is closely allied by ties of history, geography and common democratic tradition.

However, Mr. Chairman, the very fact that we are in an alliance enables us to contribute to the alliance the particular type of forces which the alliance most needs on the one hand and which this nation or any individual nation within the alliance can most suitably provide. It is our view that Canada's most suitable contribution to the alliance should not be in a nuclear form.

We find the switch of the Liberal party to advocating a nuclear role for Canada incomprehensible, unless indeed they are simply reflecting a view of political expediency and seeking perhaps to mirror rather than lead public opinion on this vital matter.

Mr. Hellyer: We are not.

Mr. Brewin: The commitments, such as they may have been, to NATO were made at a time when the prevailing military doctrine was that tactical nuclear weapons were an essential part of western defence against superior conventional forces. They were made at a time when the essential importance of conventional forces was overlooked. There is an almost unanimous stream of informed opinion that what the western alliance lacks is not nuclear weapons, either strategic or tactical, but adequate conventional forces.

Mr. Chairman, Sir John Strachey, former minister of war in Great Britain, in an article in "Encounter" of last April, called for reversal of NATO strategy. He recognized that there was a general impression that nuclear arms and nothing else were of importance. He pointed out that a nation or alliance which maintains large scale nuclear weapons alone would put itself at an extreme disadvantage as compared to a nation or alliance which maintained both such a nuclear force and adequate conventional forces also. The latter, he said, would almost certainly be able to have its way on all issues of less than life and death importance. Over the years such a series of secondary triumphs might well add up to world hegemony.

Later, he says therefore for NATO to possess no forces on the ground or merely token ground forces, would be a formula for piecemeal capitulation. He further points out the danger of the use of tactical nuclear weapons which the Leader of the Opposition says are so important. The introduction of such weapons to redress the balance between the ground forces was, he said, a wholly unsuccessful move. The wide scale devastation of any country in which they would be used makes it almost certain that any limited nuclear war, or the use of tactical nuclear weapons, would escalate almost at once to a full scale nuclear war.

He goes on to say this; while it may be necessary while the Russians possess tactical nuclear weapons that the west should possess them also for deterrent reasons, it is important that they be held well back, under a separate chain of command, and never integrated with the front line ground forces.

I recommend, Mr. Chairman, to the members of this committee an excellent series of articles by a number of American scientists under the title "Arms Control, Disarmament and National Security". I had intended to give the committee the benefit of some of the observations here, but I am going to cut that short. I should like to refer, however, to a passage on page 310:

> The uncertainties in the use of tactical nuclear weapons remain, even when they are under Anglo-American and Russian control. The disadvantages to either side that would follow from its initiating tactical nuclear war looms so great that it seems safe to predict that this possibility would be delayed until all other less dangerous means were exhausted. In short, more prolonged exposures to the rigours of nuclear strategy have led to increasing disenchantment with proposals for limiting nuclear war. The consequence is a reassessment of the role of conventional land armies in dealing with the explosive clashes of national wills, so as to maintain a risk that is commensurate with the provocation. The basic military mission of NATO is to provide just such a series of graduated responses. In the end the argument leads unavoidably to the conclusion that the only sensible military policy for the west would be to counter the Soviet conventional offensive forces in Europe by conventional counter forces—> —And it is in the redress of this unbalance that the smaller powers could make their strongest contribution to the defensive strength of NATO. This would mean the abandoning of any pretense that the use of nuclear weapons in Europe would be likely to do other than lead to widespread nuclear war.

I point out to this committee in commenting on this passage that the policy which is advocated by the Leader of the Opposition in this house, although he says it is a mistake, is that we should continue that policy of providing troops in Europe with these nuclear weapons, the use of which this author has said here, and it is perfectly sound, would lead to widespread nuclear war. It is just when these opinions I have quoted, Mr. Chairman, are reaching general acceptance, and when a reappraisal of NATO strategy is in order, that the Liberal party or at least its leadership, have swung to the idea that Canada's role should be to proceed with the installation of nuclear warheads, albeit that a simultaneous effort apparently is to be made to renegotiate its commitment. Whatever this commitment may be, I suggest it is absolutely certain that it is the type of commitment that can be renegotiated before it is put into effect.

As I said before, the Leader of the Opposition in our opinion, clearly in the passage quoted by the Prime Minister and by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam yesterday, was of the opinion that rapid technological changes and changes in strategic doctrine always make it necessary in this field to be ready to discard the obsolete and dangerous. Yet at this very moment, when it is clear that tactical nuclear weapons are becoming both obsolete and dangerous, we have the Leader of the Opposition urging this country to step into that field.

He seeks to assume the mantle of national honour. In our view there is nothing honourable about insisting on pursuing a course that involves enormous waste of public funds, a misdirection of Canada's whole effort in defence, and a serious handicap to Canada's position as a conciliator amongst the nations.

The hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount, in what I though was an interesting and worth-while contribution in this house in December, put a number of tests as to what Canada's role should be. I thought one of the most important he put forward was this: Our military function, he said, should not impede or run counter to the possibility of useful diplomatic initiatives which Canada can, and if she can should, undertake in the world. We should not, he said, be estopped from putting forward in the diplomatic field a constructive productive effort on behalf of peace. I could not agree more with the hon. member, and yet the policy which he now espouses seems to me totally inconsistent with that test. The adoption of nuclear arms by Canada cannot help but inhibit Canada from the effort to join with other nations, such as Sweden, in expanding the non-nuclear club, and cannot help but look as though Canada were a satellite of the United States.

In my opening remarks, I referred to the fact that the adoption of nuclear weapons for Canada was not only militarily unsound but also politically disastrous, and I added the words "morally unjustifiable". I do not mean by this that even the great horror of nuclear weapons makes any reliance on them morally wrong. Canada depends upon the deterrent effect of the nuclear power of the United States. However much we regret the balance of nuclear terror, we cannot condemn those who maintain that balance for our advantage. Canada's attitude cannot be that of renunciation of responsibility and the assumption of moral superiority. The reason I say that the adoption of nuclear weapons would be morally unjustifiable is that if, as I have argued, it is militarily unnecessary and politically disastrous, it would be morally wrong to pursue a course that adds to the danger of the proliferation and spread of nuclear capacity and the dangers of its ultimate use.

I concede, Mr. Chairman, to those who believe that Canada has an effective military role, and who believe that Canada would be strengthening and not weakening her political influence, that they may have moral justification for their attitude that Canada should then act accordingly. But I suggest that there is a very heavy onus on those who urge the necessity or advisability of Canada's entering the nuclear arms race, to show such a necessity clearly and unequivocally. In my opinion the proponents of nuclear arms for Canada, and that includes the Leader of the Opposition, have utterly failed to discharge that onus.

There is a naïve argument put forward from time to time, sometimes by people who should know better, that Canadian troops should be armed with the most effective possible weapons, and it implies that the most effective possible weapons must necessarily be tactical nuclear weapons. This argument flies in the face of the far more important argument that such weapons should not, and please God never will in fact be used. It also flies in the face of the fact that we must do all in our power to prevent their use in order that our defence forces, as well as our civilization, shall be spared from annihilation.

Mr. Chairman, I think we have made our position unequivocally clear. I must say I thoroughly enjoyed today's speech by the Prime Minister, but I still listened with some interest to try to discover what the policy of the government was in regard to the acquisition of nuclear weapons. I still think that it was left in a fluid—the word he used —intangible state. I still do not know what the actual situation is.

I suggest the time has come for the government to make up its mind whether we should have a nuclear role or not, and to tell the people of Canada where it stands in that regard. I hope and I wish that this house may be given an opportunity of voting on this matter, and in accordance with its convictions, so that our convictions can be registered. Because this is a matter of such vital import there may be differences within individual parties, but I suggest this is a situation where Canada is at a point of choice between a nuclear and non-nuclear course which may spell out our fate and the fate of our children and grandchildren for years to come; and I believe we in parliament should be given the opportunity of voting and putting ourselves clearly on record as to where we stand on this issue. If we are not given that opportunity here then I hope it will not be too long before the people of Canada themselves will be given an opportunity to express their views on this issue. To make it crystal clear, I repeat that we are against the adoption of nuclear weapons for Canada or on Canadian soil.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, before the hon. member for Marquette speaks, I would like to ask if we are to understand that the Minister of National Defence, who is in the committee, does not intend to participate in this debate on defence?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I think, coming after the nearly two hour speech by the Prime Minister in connection with our position in regard to this, there is not much to be served by me going into the debate at this moment. I would just like to say that the estimates of the department will be before the house very shortly and I will be delighted to make all statements and answer all questions anybody would like to put.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Minister of National Defence if he is not aware this is the first time in Canadian history when defence matters have been discussed that the minister of national defence has remained silent?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That statement is utter rubbish.

Mr. Pickersgill: Has the extinct volcano come to life?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The blabbermouth from Bonavista-Twillingate is still active.

Mr. Mandziuk: Mr. Chairman, this day's debate has no doubt given the Canadian people a clear idea as to where the four parties stand on matters of foreign policy and matters of defence. In the short time left at my disposal I do not propose to review anything that has been said by others on these two points. I just wish to make a few reflections, such as no doubt would be made by the Canadian people on reading Hansard, reading the newspapers or hearing the radio and television.

The comments I wish to make are on the first two addresses to the house yesterday. The first address by the Secretary of State for External Affairs was given in a manner as befits a senior statesman, with no bricks thrown at the opposition nor at his predecessors in the same office. He was not playing a political game. He used no vote-catching phrases. He did not play up to the galleries. It was just an honest review of world affairs as he saw them, and from what he said he showed that he has mastered the portfolio of foreign affairs for which he is responsible.

Sincerity could be heard in every word of his speech, but contrast that with the address by the first spokesman for the Liberal party, the hon. member for Essex East. He opened his remarks with some slurring statement on the minister's inability to proceed with his address. He minimized the efforts of the minister in trying to achieve peace. The hon. member might at least have been as kind as a British journalist who, as reported in a special to the Globe and Mail on November 27, 1962, said:

> When you come right down to it, the Canadian delegation is the best at the United Nations. Can't understand why.

The hon. member could at least have been as generous as that to the Canadian delegation. Not once did the minister refer in the first person to anything that had been done. He gave credit to those who worked under him and worked with him, but the hon. member for Essex East reached the height of eloquence when he extolled the role of his leader as a freedom fighter. He repeated what he had said in a previous debate on external affairs. He used different quotations from other debates of this kind, and soon he will have put on record everything that the Leader of the Opposition ever said in the United Nations when he was leader of the Canadian delegation. It appeared as if he were defending his leader. If he had that motive, against whom was he defending his leader? There had been no criticism from this side of the house regarding that hon. gentleman's performance while he had the task of leading the Canadian delegation and had the portfolio now held by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I was answering the Prime Minister.

Mr. Mandziuk: One had the feeling he was trying to build up his leader. We have no quarrel with that. Probably his leader does need a little bit of building up, particularly after some of the events which occurred in the last few weeks and months when some very prominent lieutenants of that party left the leaky boat of the Liberal ship, defecting, and going out to what they think are greener fields. But I think he reached a greater height of eloquence when he attacked the Prime Minister of Canada. Oh, yes, he rubbed his hands with glee and those behind him applauded because they thought they had found something, some little promise that the Prime Minister had made which he did not carry out, an election promise. The Canadian people know the promise he made. He made a promise that he would put before the United Nations a resolution condemning Soviet imperialism, and he did not do it. Those to whom the hon. gentleman is catering, those he expects to keep under the Liberal flag, or those he expects to entice under the Liberal flag, know that this resolution was not put before the United Nations because it would not have received majority support.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is right.

Mr. Mandziuk: He, with the experience that he claims in international affairs and at the United Nations, knows why. Power politics is one reason. Even the United States secretary of state, Dean Rusk, who still believes in one indivisible Russia, would have been very reluctant to have gone along with us. Second, the composition of the United Nations is changing. We have there a very large bloc of Afro-Asian nations. They only understand imperialism in so far as it concerns the question of the whites over the blacks. They cannot understand Russia's imperialism over the whites. They cannot understand the dangers of communism, and we must bear with them until they see through Russian duplicity.

Why did the hon. member for Essex East deviate from the subject about which he was speaking to take a crack at the Prime Minister? It is not hard to draw your own conclusions. These are the Liberal tactics—destroy the leader, and they think they can destroy the party. I assure this house that they will not destroy the leader, and they will not destroy the party.

Mr. Byrne: They will destroy themselves. They have done it.

Mr. Mandziuk: Keep dreaming. That is what you are living on, dreams and wishful thinking. If any hon. gentleman opposite thought that the Prime Minister was not fit, they had a sample of his fitness this afternoon.

Miss LaMarsh: We certainly did.

Mr. Mandziuk: You asked for a sample of the Prime Minister's fitness, and you received it.

Mr. Byrne: He was in a fit all right; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member had better withdraw that remark.

Mr. Mandziuk: He intended to downgrade the Prime Minister—

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry to interrupt, but I think the remark made by the hon. member opposite should be withdrawn. It would read rather badly, I think, in Hansard, and perhaps not the way he intended it.

Mr. Laing: Then you should want to leave it there, perhaps.

The Chairman: Order. I am afraid the Chair did not hear the remark and therefore cannot pass judgment on it. That is one of the difficulties experienced in this particular location in the house, that interjections that are so close to the Hansard reporter do not reach the ear of the Chair. However, they do reach the Hansard reporter if he happens to be sitting in close proximity to that part of the chamber from which the interjection is made. I would have to hear the remark in order to pass judgment on it.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Kootenay East interjected, with regard to the Prime Minister, that he was in a fit. That would have reached the ear of the Hansard reporter. It is a remark that is very uncomplimentary and very unparliamentary, and I suggest it should be withdrawn.

The Chairman: Is the hon. member going to withdraw the remark?

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member who was speaking suggested that the Prime Minister was quite fit. I said that he appeared to be in a fit all right this afternoon.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, I would suggest that the hon. member for Kootenay East withdraw his remark. That is no withdrawal and no explanation; it is just a repetition of the insulting remark that he made.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Pigeon: That is all he can do, anyway.

The Chairman: It would not be a very pleasant way to cap our day, to have something of that nature on Hansard, and I think the hon. member would prefer to withdraw it.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Chairman, I made the remark in answer to what was said by the hon. gentleman who was speaking, that the Prime Minister was quite fit. I said that he appeared to be in a fit, and to me he appeared to be in a fit. I do not see anything offensive in that.

Mr. Green: That is no withdrawal; that is just a repetition of the insulting statement a third time.

The Chairman: Order. I am sure that such a remark about the hon. member's leader would not be accepted by the members of the opposition. I would ask him to withdraw the remark, without referring to Beauchesne or any specific reference, which I am quite prepared to do if that is the desire of the hon. member. Accordingly I would ask him to withdraw the remark.

Mr. Byrne: If the house feels that it is an improper remark—

Some hon. Members: We do.

Mr. Byrne: —I am quite happy to withdraw it. I have noticed that a number of things have been said back and forth. I do not think my remark has any greater implication than the other things which have been said. But if it is the wish of the house that I should withdraw it, the remark is withdrawn.

Mr. Mandziuk: Mr. Chairman, in continuing I wish to say that such small potato tactics of criticism in order to downgrade a world statesman have no effect at all on the members of this house or on the Canadian people.

Mr. Teillet: Mr. Chairman, I think in all fairness it should be pointed out that the hon. member has withdrawn his remark, and I would suggest that what the hon. member has just said is quite uncalled for.

Mr. Mandziuk: My remarks did not refer to the hon. member's withdrawal; they referred to the opposition's criticism, slander and downgrading of my leader.

Mr. Laing: Slander?

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member should give some consideration to what he is saying. There has been no attempt to slander anyone here this afternoon in any of the speeches I have heard. This charge that the—

Mr. Mandziuk: I was not referring to the hon. member.

Mr. Byrne: —opposition benches are attempting to slander the Prime Minister simply has no foundation whatsoever. The Prime Minister is the leader of the government. If we believe that what the government is doing is wrong in principle in every way, then we have every right to tell him so. So far as the Prime Minister's health is concerned, I have never cast any reflection upon his health. His perception as to what is right and what is wrong, his ability to make decisions, that is another thing. But so far as his health is concerned I have never at any time questioned it, and I do not think anyone in this party has either.

Mr. Mandziuk: Mr. Chairman, the world knows that the leader of this party from the time he took public office has been a freedom fighter. In the house and outside the house he has fought that people might receive full Canadian citizenship. He has fought for the freedom of all peoples. He champions the weak. If I had the time—as I would if there had not been these interruptions—I would have appreciated the privilege of putting on the record the resolution which the Prime Minister sponsored at the NATO ministerial meeting in September, 1957. With regard to the enslaved nations of Europe he said:

> The suppression of their liberty will not last forever.

I could quote what the Prime Minister said at the United Nations general assembly on September 26, 1960, but I have no time to do so. I could quote what he said at a meeting for the unveiling of a monument of Taras Shevchenko in Winnipeg before 25,000 to 30,000 Ukrainians in July, 1961. I could quote what the leader of my party said to the Polish alliance when he spoke to that distinguished body in Sarnia on August 18, 1961. I could quote his address to the ethnic groups, an address which he gave in Toronto on November 22, 1961. However, time does not permit me to put those quotations on the record. Nevertheless, I assure you, Mr. Chairman, that those who look up to the Prime Minister as a world statesman did not in vain present him with a plaque in New York in 1961. I believe I shall have the time to read the wording on the plaque. It is as follows:

> To the Right Hon. John George Diefenbaker in grateful recognition for the support he has given to the cause of freedom for the nations of east central Europe and his forthright stand in the United Nations against Soviet colonialism.

This is signed by the assembly of captive European nations. What criticism can be levelled at a man who has stood up so often to defend the rights and freedoms of peoples behind the iron curtain? I am not criticizing the Leader of the Opposition. But let us put everything on the record. I wish to say this: the words which the Prime Minister has used on these various occasions are the words used at the anniversary celebrations of our different national and ethnic groups in Canada. The Ukrainians, for example, are celebrating the forty fifth anniversary of their independence this week. As a matter of fact only three days ago, on January 22, those in the free world are celebrating or have celebrated the forty fifth anniversary of independence.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): A very happy anniversary.

Mr. Mandziuk: The Byelorussians celebrate theirs on March 25, and the Poles mark their anniversary on November 11. All these people look up to this man who has taken up their cause. He had the courage to speak to this imperial dictator—to speak to the emperor of this godless empire and challenge him to give these people an opportunity freely to express by their votes whether or not they wish to be within the Russian colonial empire.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Mandziuk: Certainly.

Mr. Pickersgill: Since the hon. gentleman wants everything on the record, does he recall the Hungarian people who my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition did so much to help come into this country—35,000 of them when the previous government was in office? Let us put the whole record straight.

Mr. Mandziuk: I am not belittling the Leader of the Opposition. I am just pointing out the role the Prime Minister has played in world affairs. I say on the subject of repercussions that after he had delivered that address to the ethnic groups in Toronto the ambassador of the Soviet union took exception to it. At a press conference in December the latter told the press that every time the Canadian prime minister spoke about Russian colonialism it put him into a humorous mood because there was no such thing as Russian colonialism or Russian imperialism. He held himself out as an Armenian who was, nevertheless, ambassador for the U.S.S.R. He also pointed out that the military attaché at the embassy was of Ukrainian origin. But I ask this house: is Armenia free? Is the Ukraine free?

I am proud of the role played by the Canadian delegation at the United Nations. I am proud of the address given by the hon. member who led the Canadian delegation in this last session. It is true that when he began speaking the Soviet delegation walked out. But, in the words of the Prime Minister, you cannot have in international politics two principles contrary to each other. If we condemn colonialism in Africa and Asia we must condemn it in Europe. I feel that in the light of the attitude Canada has taken, of the attitude the Secretary of State for External Affairs has taken and the way the Prime Minister is carrying on, the time is not far distant when the words of Mr. Khrushchev will apply—the words he used when he said that colonial empires will disintegrate. His will do so, even if it is the last one to disintegrate.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: Before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the leader of the house to indicate what business the government is proposing for next week.

Mr. Churchill: The business for Monday will be legislation—item No. 4 on today's order paper, Bill C-87 to provide for a national economic development board. The second item will be No. 2 on today's order paper dealing with the Freight Rates Reduction Act. If that should be completed there is No. 27 on the order paper, the resolution dealing with the National Productivity Council Act.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister indicate what business there will be for the subsequent days and whether the business he has announced will be continued with until completed? Could he also tell us if there is to be a budget next week?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker has cautioned the house against entering into a debate at this time. I have announced the business for Monday.

At six o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, January 28, 1963

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. PEARSON—REFERENCE TO REMARK IN DEBATE BY PRIME MINISTER

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am raising a question of personal privilege arising out of a statement made by the Prime Minister in the house on Friday as reported in Hansard at page 3135. I have just had an opportunity of comparing that with the statement as it actually appeared in the press release issued by my office as to what I did say. The Prime Minister was quoting from a statement I made in Toronto on defence policy and he said:

I quote:

"Canada should contribute to the strategic nuclear deterrent."

At the time, Mr. Speaker, I raised the question that this was a misquotation. I asked the Prime Minister if he would read again the paragraph from which he was supposed to be quoting. Since that time, Mr. Speaker, I have had a chance of reviewing the text released and from which the Prime Minister was quoting. The Prime Minister only omitted one word, Mr. Speaker, from the sentence in question, but it was an important word. He omitted the word "not". The statement I made read "Canada should not contribute to the strategic nuclear deterrent".

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The document I had before me was as I read it. I say to the hon. gentleman that if the document was incorrect, that is the one I sent to Hansard. In the face of his explanation, as always may I say that I accept it.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that on Friday the Prime Minister quoted from a document which was a report of a statement I had made, and in view of the fact that the report he quoted differed in a vital respect from all other reports issued by my office, would the Prime Minister table now or tomorrow the document in question from which he was quoting so that it may be identified and, if necessary, corrected?

SEARCH AND RESCUE

NORTHERN QUEBEC—ANNOUNCEMENT OF FINDING OF MISSING AIRCRAFT

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): I am sure the members of the House of Commons and Canadians everywhere will be profoundly thankful at the good news that the Norseman aircraft, which was the object of so wide a search between Payne bay and Fort Chimo in Arctic Quebec, has been found and that all eight people aboard are well and now safely at Fort Chimo.

Some further details have reached us in which the house might be interested, Mr. Speaker. The pilot's name is Paul-Joseph Garon. There were six Eskimos on board and the northern administrator, Mr. A. F. Flucke. The Eskimos were Mrs. Lizzie Unga Kauki, who was 67 years of age; Mrs. Susie Kudluk, 49 years of age and her children, Jonas, 17, Marcussie, 14 and Victoria, 12; and Miss Mary Adlook, 35.

Word of the whereabouts of the downed aircraft was brought to Fort Chimo shortly before eight o'clock last night by the pilot of the aircraft and a young Eskimo, probably 17 year old Jonas, who struggled into Fort Chimo after a 60 mile trek in blistering January weather to bring the news of the aircraft's whereabouts.

Savage winter weather has made communications with Fort Chimo unusually difficult since the R.C.A.F. search began, but we have learned than an Otter aircraft of the Quebec provincial police flew to the area of the downed aircraft and brought the party in. We know, too, that the Norseman had a good supply of food aboard, including a load of seal meat that the Eskimos were taking to friends at Fort Chimo, and that they built a snow house as shelter from the weather.

What started as a routine flight of a northern administrator going about his duties on a winter day has become a story of courage and resourcefulness in the best Arctic tradition. We thank all those who were active in the search which brought about this successful conclusion.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

*INCOME TAX "SURPLUS STRIPS"

Question No. 1,174—Mr. Fisher:

1. What is the definition given by the Department of National Revenue (taxation division) to the procedure known colloquially amongst taxation accountants as "surplus strips"?
2. What estimate does the department make of the number of surplus strips carried out in Canada in 1961 and 1962, and the estimated amount of money saved by the corporate taxpayers from going into the taxation revenue?
3. Has the department considered appealing any surplus strip to the income tax appeal board and beyond in order to determine the legality of such a procedure?
4. If so, what sections of the Income Tax Act and its regulations are considered relevant to the matter?

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): Return tabled.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to ask the Minister of National Revenue if he would consider switching the answer to question No. 1,174 to a starred question instead of an order for return so the question and answer may be printed in Hansard. I ask this, Mr. Speaker, because the minister informed me there was no particular reason for not giving an oral answer except to save time. I would very much like to have the answer printed in Hansard, as was my intention when I asked the question.

Mr. Speaker: If it is a very lengthy reply—

Mr. Fisher: No, it is very short, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: It would require unanimous consent to revert to questions, and I do not know whether this consent is forthcoming.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Let us proceed one step at a time. We are now going to leave orders of the day—

Mr. Knowles: We have not completed orders of the day.

Mr. Speaker: Well, at the end of orders of the day, we will revert to questions.

[Later:]

Mr. Speaker: May we revert to questions, and the Minister of National Revenue will now give an oral reply to question No. 1,174.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I think the request of the hon. gentleman from Port Arthur was that it be printed in Hansard. I have no objection to reading it, but I do not have a copy.

Mr. Speaker: Is it a lengthy reply?

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): It has a lot of figures in it.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps then it could be taken as read and included in Hansard. Agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: The answer above referred to is as follows:]

1. There is no specific definition of the term "surplus strips". It is frequently used to refer to any procedures that have been followed for the purpose of transferring surpluses from corporations to their shareholders with a minimum of tax payment.

2. The department can make no estimate of the number entered into in 1961 and 1962. Most returns for 1962 have not yet been filed. As regards 1961, it is pointed out that usually no income is reported from these transactions, and that the department could not list them without first investigating to determine the facts of each case.

3. The department will assess, and carry through to appeal if necessary, for all taxes payable under the provisions of the act.

4. The relevant sections of the Income Tax Act, depending on the various circumstances are sections 6, 8, 16, 21, 22, 27, 28, 67, 68, 81, 82, 85I, 105, 105A, 105B, 105C, 108, 137, 138.

FOOD PURCHASES BY CANADIAN-EUROPEAN SHIPS

Question No. 1,267—Mr. Dumont:

1. What proportion of the food supplies used on ships plying between Canada and Europe is bought in Canada?
2. What quantities of milk, butter, pork, beef, and potatoes are bought outside Canada by the said above companies that have Montreal as their terminal point?
3. Do most shipping companies buy food supplies in Europe and make their round trips without buying any in Canada?

Mr. Halpenny: No information.

BANKRUPTCIES AND INSOLVENCIES

Question No. 1,270—Mr. Matheson:

1. Using 1956 as the base year, what was the percentage of increase or decrease in the number of bankruptcies and insolvencies under federal legislation during each of the years 1957 to 1962 inclusive?
2. What were the total estimated liabilities of bankruptcies and insolvencies for the period 1952-1956 and for the period 1958-1962?

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): 1. A total of 2,849 bankruptcies was reported in 1956. Using 1956 as the base year, the following is the percentage of increase in the number of bankruptcies during each of the years 1957 to 1961 inclusive:

1957	22.36 per cent
1958	13.34 per cent
1959	13.65 per cent
1960	27.80 per cent
1961	23.24 per cent

The final figures for the year 1962 are not yet available.

2. The total estimated liabilities for bankruptcies reported in the years 1952-1956 inclusive are as follows:

1952	$ 25,155,493

(1) Data for 1961 will be available in April 1963.

(2) These figures include also persons convicted of motor manslaughter.

Questions

*EFFECTS OF RADIOACTIVE FALL-OUT IN NORTH

Question No. 1,277—Mr. Haidasz:

1. Has the government received any information concerning the level of strontium 90 among Alaskan Eskimos and, if so, what is the nature of such information?

2. Has the government received a copy of a resolution adopted by the technical committee for caribou preservation requesting a federal investigation into the question of radioactive fall-out and its effects on humans and animals in northern Canada and, if so, what steps have been taken by the federal government to investigate this problem?

Mr. Dinsdale: 1. Yes; some research results have very recently been published and government scientists are aware of the preliminary indications of other research now in progress.

2. No, since the formal minutes of the technical committee for caribou preservation have not yet been received. However, officials of the Canadian wildlife service were present and took an active part in the discussions of the committee. Over the past two years the service has been investigating the distribution and extent of radioactive fall-out in relationship to cervidae in Canada, in collaboration with the department of biology, University of Ottawa. A priority program of investigation into other aspects of the problem is now being developed by my department and the Department of National Health and Welfare.

RETURNS TO SUPERINTENDENT OF INSURANCE

Question No. 1,282—Mr. Berger:

1. Are life insurance companies required to submit returns to the superintendent of life insurance, disclosing the names of those persons or corporations holding shares in said life insurance companies, and the capacity in which said shares are held by such persons or corporations?

2. Are these returns omitted from the annual report of the superintendent of insurance to the Minister of Finance and, if so, for what reason and on what authority?

Mr. Grafftey: 1. "Yes" to the first part; "No" to the second part.

2. "Yes" to the first part; As respects the second part, the main reason for the omission in recent years has been to avoid facilitating the sale of control of companies through publication of the names of individual shareholders; as respects the third part, in the absence of any specific requirement that the lists of shareholders be included, no authority is needed for their omission.

KESWICK, ONT. POST OFFICE

Question No. 1,290—Mr. Addison:

Has the Post Office Department investigated the possibility of acquiring land, and building a post office, in the town of Keswick, Ontario, and, if so, what are the results of this investigation and what action is contemplated?

[Mr. Nesbitt.]

Mr. McCleave: Yes. Sites are being considered by the Department of Public Works in co-operation with the Post Office Department. It is intended to prepare plans for a new building after a site has been acquired.

Richard, J. A.	2,701.12
Small, Robert H.	1,620
White, H. O.	3,000

*Section 16(a) of this act provides for a reduction of these pensions by the amount of pension payable to a former member under the Old Age Security Act whether or not he applies for that pension so long as he is otherwise eligible to receive it.

OLD AGE PENSIONS—EXTENSION TO SINGLE WOMEN AND WIDOWS AT 60

Question No. 1,293—Mr. Mather:

Has the government given consideration to extending the old age pension to unmarried women or widows aged 60?

Mrs. Casselman: As this is a matter of government policy any announcement would be made by the government in the usual manner.

VOTING BY HOSPITAL PATIENTS

Question No. 1,294—Mr. Mather:

Has the government given consideration to providing voting facilities to persons confined in hospitals during federal elections?

Mr. Diefenbaker: This relates to a matter of government policy. Any announcement in connection therewith will be made in the usual manner.

RAINY RIVER, ONT.—COMPLAINTS RESPECTING MAIL DELIVERY

Question No. 1,298—Mr. Benidickson:

1. How many complaints have been received by the Post Office Department from residents of the district of Rainy River relating to the new mail delivery arrangements that were set up by the Post Office Department after the C.N.R. cut its passenger train service in October 1962 from 6 days per week frequency to 3 days per week frequency?

2. From what persons have such complaints been received?

Mrs. Fairclough: 1. None.

2. Not applicable.

INTERNATIONAL COMMODITY AGREEMENTS

Question No. 1,300—Mr. Laing:

1. In how many, and by what designation are they known, does Canada participate officially in international commodity agreements; and on what date was each originally signed?

2. In which of these agreements is commodity output in Canada affected either by direct undertaking or by voluntary acceptance of quotas?

3. If the answer to No. 2 is affirmative in respect of any commodity, state in which commodities the government of Canada has accepted the principle of limiting output and to what extent in each case?

4. Was the government of Canada (a) represented (b) consulted (c) asked to approve the decisions of (i) the consortium which met in Mexico city and agreed to production quotas on lead and zinc (ii) the consortium which met in New York and agreed to crop limitation and price increase for coffee?

5. Are there any cases of commodity agreements to which Canada is a participant in which the agreement has not been presented to parliament for ratification and, if so, state the cases?

Mr. Nesbitt: 1. There are four international commodity agreements in which Canada participates officially, namely: international tin agreement originally signed June 28, 1954; international sugar agreement, originally signed August 24, 1953; international coffee agreement, originally signed October 16, 1962; 1949 international wheat agreement, signed March 23, 1949; 1953 International wheat agreement, signed April 13, 1953; 1956 international wheat agreement, signed May 16, 1956; 1959 international wheat agreement, signed April 22, 1959; 1962 international wheat agreement, signed May 11, 1962.

2. None.

3. Not applicable.

4. (i) (a) Canada was represented by an official delegation with industry advisers at the third session of the international lead and zinc study group in Mexico city, March 20-24, 1961. There was no intergovernmental agreement to production quotas on lead and zinc.

(ii) (a) Canada was represented officially at the United Nations international coffee conference in New York city, July 9-August 24, 1962. There has been no agreement to date to limit coffee production nor is there anything in the agreement which specifies price increases for coffee. The agreement attempts to stabilize world coffee prices at a level not lower than that prevailing in 1962.

5. The tin and sugar agreements were ratified by Canada and then tabled in parliament; the wheat agreements were accepted by Canada after having been tabled in parliament. The coffee agreement was ratified on November 20, 1962, and has not yet been tabled.

Question No. 1,313—Mr. Burgess:

Does the government propose to extend assistance for winter works past March 31, this year?

Mr. Hales: If the question pertains to the municipal winter works incentive program, 1962-63, the answer is that this program will be in effect until April 30, 1963.

CHARCOAL MANUFACTURING PLANTS

Question No. 1,314—Mr. Badanai:

What is the number of charcoal manufacturing plants in Canada and the location of each?

Mr. Nesbitt: There are eight main producers of charcoal in Canada; 5 in Quebec; 1 in Ontario; 1 in Alberta and 1 in British Columbia. These do not include smaller producers, such as farmers, who produce limited supplies of charcoal.

BOUNTY ON DOGFISH

Question No. 1,315—Mr. Mather:

Is the Department of Fisheries considering the establishment of a dogfish bounty to encourage development of this industry in line with potential market possibilities?

[Mr. Jorgenson.]

Mr. MacLean (Queens): In the last five years, the Department of Fisheries has paid subsidies to encourage the catching of dogfish for meal production and oil production. In neither case has the result been satisfactory from the point of view of reducing stocks. However, I am prepared to consider any new proposals which offer a reasonable chance of success.

*CANADIAN IMMIGRATION FACILITIES IN POLAND

Question No. 1,317—Mr. Haidasz:

1. What were the facilities of the Canadian department of immigration in Poland in 1958?
2. What are the present facilities?
3. Who performs the medical examinations of prospective immigrants?

Mr. McGee: 1. The Department of Citizenship and Immigration had no facilities of its own for the examination of immigrants in Poland in 1958.

2. The processing of applications for the admission of immigrants sponsored by residents of Canada is carried out by the Canadian embassy in Warsaw.

3. Immigrants from Poland are medically examined upon arrival in Canada; however, a preliminary examination is carried out by private practitioners in Poland. The results of their examinations are forwarded to Canada through the Canadian embassy in Warsaw.

COMMITTEE ON COMMUTER SYSTEM FOR TORONTO AREA

Question No. 1,319—Mr. Addison:

Has the federal government been invited by the Ontario provincial government to place a representative on the special committee to study the establishment of a co-ordinated commuters' railway system for the Toronto metropolitan and surrounding area?

Mr. Halpenny: A search of the records failed to indicate that any such invitation has been received.

CHANNEL AND HARBOUR IMPROVEMENT EXPENDITURES, LAKEHEAD

Question No. 1,320—Mr. Badanai:

What specific amount of the nearly $11,000,000 that the Department of Public Works anticipates spending on channel and harbour improvements from the St. Lawrence river to the lakehead is earmarked for the lakehead?

Mr. McCleave: From April 1, 1962, to March 31, 1963, the end of the current fiscal year, the department anticipates spending nearly $11,000,000 of which slightly over one million will have been spent in the lakehead area.

*REGISTRATIONS FOR EMPLOYMENT AND BENEFIT RECIPIENTS

Question No. 1,324—Mr. Deschatelets:

1. What are the latest statistics of the unemployment insurance commission concerning the number of unemployed persons who registered for employment at the offices of the commission?
2. What are the latest statistics of the unemployment insurance commission concerning the number of unemployed persons who are receiving unemployment insurance benefits?

Mr. Hales: 1 and 2. Figures are not compiled on the number of unemployed persons receiving unemployment insurance benefits on specified dates. The number of active claimants for unemployment insurance benefits on November 30th was 374,191. At that date the number of persons registered for employment at local offices of the national employment service was 456,756.

(Translation):

*SALARY INCREASES FOR CERTAIN CLASSES OF CIVIL SERVANTS IN MONTREAL

Question No. 1,326—Mr. Deschatelets:

1. Does the government intend to increase immediately the salaries of assistant clerks, clerks grades 1 and 2 and typists grades 1 and 2, employed by the income tax division in Montreal who were not included when increases were granted lately to certain classes of civil servants?
2. Does the government intend to revise immediately the annual increase of $60 a year granted recently to the telephone operators and stenographers grades 1 and 2 employed by the income tax division in Montreal?

Mr. Grafftey: 1. No.

2. No.

Mr. McCleave: No. (a), (b) and (c), not applicable.

(Text):

N.B.-P.E.I. CAUSEWAY—SERVICES OF CONSULTANTS

Question No. 1,343—Mr. Rideout:

Has the government engaged Northumberland Consultants Limited to assist in planning the New Brunswick-Prince Edward Island causeway and, if so, on what date was this company engaged?

Mr. McCleave: The three firms forming Northumberland Consultants Limited were retained on June 22, 1962, and the agreement with Northumberland Consultants Limited was signed December 26, 1962.

ERADICATION OF LAMPREY EELS, GREAT LAKES

Question No. 1,348—Mr. Robinson:

1. What work is being carried out in lake Superior to eradicate the lamprey?
2. What results have been attained?
3. What work, if any, is being carried out in lake Huron and Georgian bay to eradicate the lamprey?
4. What work, if any, is being carried out in lake Michigan to eradicate the lamprey?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): 1. The fisheries research board of Canada and its counterpart in the United States are involved in programs to eradicate the sea lamprey in the great lakes. Thirteen streams on the Canadian side of lake Superior and fifteen on the American side were treated with lampricide (a selective poison to kill lamprey larvae) in 1962. Electrical barriers are being operated in known lamprey spawning streams on the Canadian and American sides of lake Superior. In 1962 eight such barriers were operated on the Canadian side and twenty nine on the American side for the purpose of assessing the lamprey control program. Stream surveys to discover lamprey spawning streams were conducted on 178 streams on the Ontario side of the lake in 1962. To date 503 tributary streams have been examined on the south shore of lake Superior.

2. Catches of adult lamprey at electrical barriers in 1962 showed declines of approximately 78 per cent and 82 per cent on the Canadian and United States sides of the lake from the averages of catches over the past five years. The rate of wounds and scars in lake trout catches in 1962 in lake Superior was 5 per cent or less. The 1960 wounding rate was from 8 per cent to 12 per cent.

3. To date a limited number of streams on the Canadian side of lake Huron have been examined and treated.

4. To date United States fishery agencies have surveyed 357 streams tributary to lake Michigan. Eight of these streams were treated with lampricide in the Green Bay area in 1962.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

GRADUATE LAWYERS IN PUBLIC SERVICE

Question No. 1,268—Mr. Matheson:

1. How many graduate lawyers, by departments, were employed in the public service of Canada as of December 31, 1962?
2. How many of these, by departments, were employed in a legal, as distinct from an administrative capacity?
3. What progress has been made to implement the Glassco commission recommendations (a) to integrate legal services within the department of justice (b) to establish branch legal offices in centres across Canada?

Inquiries of the Ministry

*UNEMPLOYMENT BENEFIT PAYMENTS

Question No. 1,323—Mr. Deschatelets:

From January 1962 up to date, what were the amounts paid for each month as unemployment benefits?

Mr. Hales: Return tabled.

PIGEON RIVER, ONT.—REMOVAL OF BORDER CROSSING

Question No. 1,331—Mr. Badanai:

1. What is the situation surrounding the removal of the present border crossing from its location at Pigeon River, Ontario, to the new site at High Falls, Ontario?
2. Has a contract been awarded for the construction of buildings to accommodate customs and immigration offices at High Falls and, if so, what is the amount of the contract?
3. Will the present bridge at Pigeon River be removed and, if not, will it be put to any particular use?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO MOVING OF SUPPLY MOTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the Prime Minister's statement over the week end regarding the urgent necessity of getting ahead with estimates, would the right hon. gentleman explain to the house why, in the two Mondays of the resumed session, no supply motion has been moved, without which the estimates of any additional department cannot be dealt with?

Mr. Speaker: I am just wondering whether the Leader of the Opposition might not rephrase his question. We are tending toward an argumentative or debative answer. I think that on reflection the hon. gentleman will see what I mean.

Mr. Pearson: May I rephrase the question in this way, then. Having regard to the fact that a supply motion has not been moved in the first two Mondays of the resumed session, would the Prime Minister give an assurance that a supply motion will be moved next Monday?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The order of business is usually made known to the house by the house leader. Having regard to the experience we have had on those supply motions which have been before the house in respect of the departments which were opened, and the degree to which they have been held up by the opposition—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I thought from the beginning we were getting on to a patch of very thin ice here, and I was not far wrong.

[Mr. Matheson.]

Mr. Pearson: In view of the Prime Minister's reply, surely I have the right to ask him whether he is aware that a supply motion can only take, at the most, two days.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I realize that a supply motion can only take two days, but the six departments we have already opened are being held up—

Some hon. Members: Oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think we shall move to something else. Orders of the day are not an area for debating.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I should like to address a supplementary question to the Prime Minister and ask him whether he is aware that only once since the opening of the house last September have the estimates of any department been called, apart from those of the Department of External Affairs which were called last Thursday for a special debate.

METHOD OF DEALING WITH ESTIMATES FOR PRESENT YEAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a straightforward question to the Prime Minister seeking information which I believe the house and the country are entitled to have. In view of the importance of there being parliamentary approval before the people's money is spent, will the Prime Minister at an early date take the house into his confidence and tell us what the government's plans are for dealing with the estimates for the current fiscal year?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I tried to give a completely straightforward recital of the situation a week ago today, and having done so the matter now rests with other members in the house.

An hon. Member: Government without responsibility.

Mr. Knowles: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. What plans is the government making to be sure that it will have the necessary money to pay civil service and other salaries on the 15th of February, at the end of February, on the 15th of March and at the end of March?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the question is quite hypothetical at the present time.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In the light of the statement he made last week that he was going to introduce interim supply on Friday, can the minister now give some indication as to when that will be done?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of Finance): I do not recall the statement to which the hon. member has referred, Mr. Speaker, but the house leader will be announcing to the house when interim supply will be sought.

Mr. Chevrier: A supplementary question. May I get some clarification from the house leader as to when interim supply will be introduced?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the business of the house for the next day is announced each evening before the house adjourns.

INCOME TAX

PROPOSED ABOLITION OF RECEIPTS FOR CHARITABLE DONATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Cote (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Has the minister provided that receipts for charitable donations, which are an outrage against the clergy and the people, will be abolished and replaced by an equivalent tax reduction?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I feel that the hon. member is expressing his opinion or his views rather than seeking information from the minister.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NUCLEAR WEAPONS—PRESS RELEASE RESPECTING SPEECH BY PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand a press release which has just been issued by the minister of defence which purports to be an interpretation of the Prime Minister's speech of last Friday, January 25, as setting forth a definite policy for the acquisition of nuclear arms. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he accepts that as a proper interpretation of the speech which he made last Friday.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my speech was very clear—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —very direct and very comprehensive. I do not think it requires any interpretation.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): In view of the Prime Minister's reply may I ask a supplementary question. If the Prime Minister's speech was as clear as he said it was, why did the Minister of National Defence have to interpret it for him?

Mr. Speaker: Order. We are still in an argumentative mood.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. In view of the fact that the minister of defence took no part in the debate last week, as he indicated he might, may I ask the Prime Minister whether the defence estimates will be brought down quickly in order that the minister may clarify the statements which he has just released to the press?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the question as to when estimates can be considered will depend upon motions to go into supply, and the acceptance by the house of the order in which the departments are opened.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of National Defence. In view of the extraordinary step taken by him in issuing a press release in which he has sought to give his interpretation of the remarks of the Prime Minister on Friday, are we to conclude as a result that the minister is satisfied with this course and that he now thinks this would preclude him from taking the necessary and normal step of resigning from the government in view of his differences with the Prime Minister?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I took no extraordinary steps. I was asked questions by various members of the press gallery, first of all immediately after five o'clock last Friday, as a matter of fact. I have answered various questions from various people, and in order not to have to deal with a dozen or 20 people individually I made a statement, and I think that statement stands for itself.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question if I may. May I ask the Prime Minister whether he saw and approved the press release issued this morning by the Minister of National Defence?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, answers or statements made by ministers following requests by the press are naturally not seen by the Prime Minister.

[Later:]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Minister of National Defence who is carrying on the negotiations with the United States, referred to the other day by the Prime Minister and mentioned in the hon. gentleman's release this morning.

Mr. Harkness: I do not think it would be appropriate for me to release that information, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Would it be that there are no negotiations being carried on?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. That question is quite improper.

BOMARC BASES—SUGGESTED RENEGOTIATION OF ARRANGEMENTS WITH U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas R. Berger (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. In his speech on Friday, which all of us enjoyed, the Prime Minister said the government was renegotiating its commitments to NORAD. May I ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of the fact that the United States is renegotiating its arrangements with two NATO members, Italy and Turkey, and dismantling its nuclear bases in those countries, the Prime Minister will tell the house whether the United States has indicated to Canada that it wishes to renegotiate the arrangements it made with this country in 1959 to establish nuclear Bomarc bases in this country?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think if the hon. member will consult Beauchesne, citation 171, he will see that in his opening remarks he rather ran afoul of paragraph (r), which says that no question shall "refer to debate ... of the current session"; and Friday afternoon was certainly part of a debate in the current session.

Mr. Berger: May I rephrase my question by omitting the initial reference to the debate. The question was, in view of the fact that the United States has been renegotiating its arrangements with two NATO members, Italy and Turkey, and dismantling its nuclear bases in those countries, can the Prime Minister tell the house whether the United States has indicated to Canada that it wishes to renegotiate the arrangements it made with this country in 1959 to establish nuclear Bomarc bases in this country?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I set out the situation fully on Friday. In so far as communications between governments are concerned when negotiations are taking place, those communications are secret and are never asked for in the House of Commons. In giving that answer, however, I do not want any implication read into it that anything in the nature of the request in question has or has not been made.

Mr. Berger: On a point of order, I believe the Prime Minister may not have apprehended—

Mr. Speaker: Order. There cannot be any question of referring to the nature of the reply. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was rising a few moments ago.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member was not rising.

[Later:]

Mr. Malcolm MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Does the government's proposed clarification of Canada's role in NATO mean that the present government intends to seek a conventional forces role for Canada in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization?

[Later:]

Mr. MacInnis: I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. What military value would the Bomarcs, armed with nuclear warheads, have for North American defence?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member will recognize that question is a rhetorical one and quite out of order.

[Later:]

Mr. MacInnis: I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence and ask him if one of the objectives of the present negotiations with the government of the United States in relation to Canada's role in NATO involves the scrapping of Bomarcs.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): This is the same question that was asked the Prime Minister just a few minutes ago.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN FAMILY ALLOWANCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Megantic): Mr. Speaker, my question is intended for the Prime Minister. Does the government expect to increase the rate of family allowances in the forthcoming budget?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member should be aware that the period allotted to orders of the day is not the proper time to reveal particulars concerning the budget.

DEFENCE RESEARCH

COST TO U.S. OF PUTTING CANADIAN SATELLITE IN SPACE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Herbert E. Gray (Essex West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. Can he tell the house whether it is a fact that it cost the United States of America $10 million to put Canada's Alouette satellite into space last fall?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have no specific information as to what the cost was as far as the Thor that was used for the purpose is concerned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

OPPOSITION TO INCREASE IN MEMBERS' INDEMNITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilles Gregoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. In view of the statement made by the hon. member for Port Arthur, which has been published in a newspaper, to the effect that those who would be opposed to an increase in members' salaries would risk acts of violence on the part of a group of members of this house, and since the Social Crediters have indicated they are opposed to an increase in members' salaries until an increase in family allowances has been granted, would the minister take steps to protect the other group of members against those acts of violence referred to in his statement?

Mr. Speaker: I should like to draw the hon. member's attention, once and for all, I hope, that the period allotted to orders of the day is not the proper time to make statements or raise matters of this kind.

FISHERIES

REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF REPORT OF NORTH PACIFIC COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries supplementary to the question I asked him last Wednesday. Can the minister further inform the house whether the report of the recent meeting of the international north Pacific fisheries commission will be referred to the standing committee on marine and fisheries for consideration?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add to the answer I gave previously.

BRITISH COLUMBIA—IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS RESPECTING LICENCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I want to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and ask him what progress is being made in translating the recommendations of Dr. Sinclair on licence limitation into legislation; and if this has been done will he present it to the house this session?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to make a firm statement as to what might transpire in the remaining part of this session, but at the moment there are no plans to introduce such legislation.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—REFERENCE OF TREATY TO HOUSE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the rumoured resignation of the Minister of Justice is no longer—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: Public works.

Mr. Byrne: —a hypothetical matter, would the Prime Minister indicate that he will put the Columbia river draft treaty before a committee of the house so that it can be discussed prior to the departure of the Minister of Public Works?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman seems to be somewhat involved when he mentions the Minister of Justice because, of course, there has been no suggestion of his resignation. If he is referring to the Minister of Public Works, and I will try to get the hon. member back on the rails because he seems a little off, that matter has been dealt with on a number of occasions.

Mr. Byrne: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I corrected the suggestion that the question had to do with the Minister of Justice. It is the Minister of Public Works, and I believe the Prime Minister knows that he appears to be leaving this house without this matter having been discussed.

Mr. Speaker: What is the supplementary question?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Byrne: Would the Prime Minister answer my question?

[Later:]

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister give any indication when the Columbia river treaty will be put before a committee of the house?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, in due course.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

PROTEST RESPECTING PROGRAM ON FRENCH NETWORK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gerard Lamy (St. Maurice-Lafleche): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State. Can the minister assure the house that he will take the necessary steps to put a stop to such television programs as the one carried over the C.B.C., Thursday, January 24 last, between 9 and 10 in the evening, entitled "Le petit monde du père Gédéon"?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sure the hon. member will realize that it is not the proper time to ask a question on the control or censorship of the C.B.C.

Mr. Lamy: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I think that the "morality" of the nation, Mr. Speaker, is something that concerns us.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has made his representations. He should now have his question put on the order paper.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

MAINTENANCE OF ROGERS PASS SECTION FOR WINTER TRAVEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the minister of northern affairs, national resources and so on.

Mr. Knowles: The leader of the band.

Mr. Herridge: In view of the statement made by the superintendent of the Revelstoke and Glacier national parks that the Rogers pass section of the trans-Canada highway will be kept open all winter to all traffic, period, will the minister say whether he stands behind that statement?

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I presume that statement by the superintendent of the parks was made as the result of a press release I made last October in which I said "I am confident the highway will be kept open although there will be delays while avalanches are being brought down and cleared from the road". I am happy to report to the house that during this very severe winter weather the highway has been closed for the shortest period. I should like further to inform the house that I did not clear this release through the Prime Minister's office.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think we are getting quite a bit out in space on some of these replies as well as on the questions.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Cote (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. Could the minister tell the house whether he had the former Conservative member who was defeated and lost his deposit at the last general election make a statement on his behalf concerning the construction of three grain elevators in Chicoutimi?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member will surely recognize that his question is out of order.

Mr. Gilles Gregoire (Lapointe): I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture. Does the minister still resort to patronage as regards construction projects?

Mr. Speaker: Since the first question was out of order, the supplementary one is even more so.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

FLIGHT FROM LOS ANGELES TO MONTREAL BY FORMER PRESIDENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to direct a question to the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Transport, and ask if he can give us any information on the quixotic mercy flight from Los Angeles to Montreal made by the T.C.A. in which a former president of T.C.A., Mr. Symington was involved?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member will recognize that his question is one which would be better placed on the order paper. He could get more information in that way. I have some difficulty in deciding why it is important that we should have the information at this stage.

Mr. Fisher: I think it is important that we should have this information at this time because there have been many confusing stories about this, and since a crown corporation is involved I think we should have a clear statement.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member will recognize that there are many confusing statements about many things coming from many sources. I do not believe they require clarification on orders of the day.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MESSENGERS AND CLEANING STAFF—REQUEST FOR SALARY REVIEW

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of their great need, will the minister ask the commissioners of internal economy to review the case of the messengers and cleaning staff who serve us in this House of Commons, for whom no increases were provided on Friday?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will ask the commissioners of internal economy to look over the record.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REQUEST FOR MEETING RESPECTING SECURITY INVESTIGATIONS IN UNIVERSITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Has the minister had a request for a meeting to discuss R.C.M.P. matters from the Canadian association of university teachers, and if so has a date for such a meeting been set?

Mr. Speaker: I believe a similar question was answered about the middle of last week. I may be wrong but it seems to me to be the case.

Mr. Orlikow: It is not the same question.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Justice): Since I answered a question in almost the same form I have not received any request from that source for an appointment to discuss any matter. I can assure the hon. member that that organization is quite competent to handle these requests on its own behalf without it being made a matter for questions every day in the House of Commons.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

ROYAL COMMISSION—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I wonder if I might ask the Prime Minister whether he would inform the house when he expects to receive the report from the royal commission on health services?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I communicated with the chairman, Hon. Mr. Justice Hall, and he advised me that the expectation of himself and his colleagues was that it would be available in June.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENTS TO ACT THIS SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, and ask him whether he is in a position to tell us when we might have the proposed amendments to the Indian Act presented to the house.

Hon. R. A. Bell (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add to what I said earlier in the session.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Would the minister give the house his counsel and advice on what appears to be the French secessionist movement led by Mr. de Gaulle?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member will recognize that first of all he might be inviting a lengthy speech, certainly not the kind of reply given on orders of the day. Perhaps he could reserve his question until the estimates of the department, which are currently before the house, are being considered.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

SUGGESTED ROYAL COMMISSION TO STUDY CANADIAN CULTURAL SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): One week ago today the Prime Minister, in answer to a question, stated that he intended to make a statement under motions concerning the question of biculturalism and the advisability of setting up a commission thereon, or as an alternative he would make a statement regarding a federal-provincial conference to look into the whole matter of biculturalism. He was going to make that statement last Tuesday, but it was postponed. I wonder if I could ask the Prime Minister when he intends to make that statement.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I hope to be in a position to advise on the date the day after tomorrow.

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY AS TO PROBABLE DATE OF PRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance if he can say when he proposes to bring down the budget for 1963-64.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of Finance): In due course and without undue delay.

Mr. Knowles: May I direct a question to the Prime Minister?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is seeking to repeat the question, and there are other members who wish to ask questions. He can ask his question in his turn.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Minister of Finance, and ask him when he expects to be able to table the main estimates for 1963-64, without which there cannot be a budget?

Mr. Nowlan: Well, Mr. Speaker, I believe the main estimates are now in the hands of the printer. I cannot say exactly when they will be received, but I have asked that the printing be proceeded with as expeditiously as possible, in both languages, so they may be tabled at a relatively early date.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Is the Prime Minister correctly reported in this morning's press when it is said he declared that a budget could not be brought down until the previous year's estimates had been concluded? If he has been incorrectly reported, would he like to correct the report now?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would not like to correct anything of the kind. I said it would be inappropriate to bring in a budget without having passed the previous year's estimates, and I still so believe.

FINANCE

ROYAL COMMISSION—INFORMATION AS TO PROCEEDINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilles Gregoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Finance a question?

[Mr. Douglas.]

In view of the fact that several chartered banks have made a submission to the Porter commission and that several members of the commission are chartered bank directors, can the Minister of Finance give the house assurance that it will be kept informed of the decisions and intents of the Porter commission, regardless of the position of the commissioners?

Mr. Speaker: I believe the hon. member is voicing an opinion and that he is not actually seeking information.

NATIONAL ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT BOARD

PROVISION FOR DEFINITION OF DUTIES, APPOINTMENT OF MEMBERS, ETC.

The house resumed, from Tuesday, January 22, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-87, to provide for the establishment of a national economic development board —Mr. Nowlan—Mr. Chown in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, just before we resume debate I would like to ask the Minister of Finance, in view of the fact that there has been some considerable discussion of this bill at the resolution stage and some considerable discussion of it on second reading, as we are now on clause 1, which is the only clause that will permit us to have a general discussion, is it his intention to make a statement with regard to the bill? The minister will recall that he spoke at the opening on the resolution stage, but on second reading the measure was spoken to by the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, and since that time we have not had any observation from the Minister of Finance.

I am wondering whether he intends, early in the discussion on this clause, to give us his reactions to the various suggestions and arguments that have been made.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, I assumed there were others who would want to speak in a general way on clause 1, and I did not want to delay the discussion. I would be prepared to deal in a summary way with some of the arguments advanced, but I thought it much better to wait until other hon. members had a chance to discuss clause 1.

Mr. Berger: Mr. Chairman, may I, on behalf of the New Democratic party, take this opportunity to put our views before the committee with regard to some of the important features of the legislation that the government has brought before the house in connection with the national economic development board. During the course of the debate members in all parties—I think some of them for the first time—have seen and acknowledged the necessity for the government of Canada to plan for Canada's future. I think some of the hon. members who spoke were late comers to this point of view, but we in this party are pleased that hon. members representing all parties in the house have spoken in support of the idea that Canada should plan her economic affairs and should plan ahead for her economic future.

All over the world countries have adopted the idea of social and economic planning. They are taking steps in the Scandinavian countries and in the countries of western Europe to plan their national economies to make sure that prosperity and full employment will come to their people in the days that lie ahead. Some of these countries have already achieved prosperity and full employment for their people but in Canada, due to the failure of the present government and its Liberal predecessor to meet the necessity for planning, Canada is declining. Other countries are flourishing while we are stagnating.

We in this party believe we have to take steps to adopt genuine social and economic planning. We have already expressed support for the legislation to establish a national economic development board, but at the same time we have advised the house of our misgivings regarding the form this legislation takes at the present time. We hope something can be done about that as we proceed to consider this legislation clause by clause, for we must adopt the idea of genuine social and economic planning. We must be prepared to establish a genuine national economic development board if the promise of material prosperity and spiritual fulfilment, which the twentieth century holds out for Canada, is to be realized.

I shall deal with one important aspect of planning that ought to be considered by the national economic development board, by the house and by informed public opinion. That is the idea of planning for the consumer, because when we talk about social and economic planning what we want to achieve is not necessarily the maximization of profit, not necessarily more and more production, but to provide for the consumer the goods and services he wants and needs.

Does the consumer today, under the economic arrangements we have, get the goods and services that he wants and needs? The consumer, the ordinary citizen—and all of us are consumers—is exhorted on all sides to consume at all costs. This is his sacred duty to the free enterprise system. He is exhorted to consume all kinds of appliances and all kinds of commodities, but the question this committee ought to be asking itself is, does the consumer get what he wants and what he needs? I do not believe, and I do not think hon. members in the Social Credit party and at least some hon. members in the Conservative and Liberal parties believe, that our industrial machine is producing what people want and what people need. All of us are acquainted with the book that was written by J. K. Galbraith, "The Affluent Society". It is necessary to refer to only one of the examples he gave of the dilemma that faces the United States, and likewise Canada—the dilemma of public squalor in the midst of private affluence. He of course pointed out what should have been obvious to us, what should have been obvious to any administration that was planning the social and economic future of the country, in either the United States or Canada.

I think the most disconcerting thing that was revealed by J. K. Galbraith in his book was the fact that here on this continent we spend more on advertising than we do on education. Of course this leads to the question, what is more important, stimulating artificial demand for goods and services that the consumer may not want, that the consumer may not need, that the consumer may not have the money with which to buy, which may lead to his financial ruination if he tries to obtain them, or to provide that every citizen, every Canadian young and old should have the right to education whether it be technical, academic or vocational; the right to whatever education he can benefit from.

Even in terms of industrial development, even in terms of the necessity for expanding the gross national product, even in terms of the requirement of increased economic growth, it is essential that as we move forward into the age of technology, the age when scientific qualifications in many, many fields will be more than ever necessary; as we move forward into the time when our young people will have to be trained in all kinds of fields and will have to utilize all kinds of techniques that today we barely realize the necessity for, that we devote much greater expenditures to education than we are doing at the present time.

I was talking about the fact that the consumer must be given a place in the kind of planning that we have to adopt in Canada. We talk about the necessity for the consumer to have freedom of choice, and the members of the New Democratic party believe that the consumer ought to have freedom of choice. Economists today talk about the idea of economic sovereignty. Some of them say that under our present arrangements the consumer has the right to choose whatever commodity he wishes to buy, and we do not wish to take that right away from him.

We believe that right is essential. We believe the consumer ought to have freedom of choice. But does he really have freedom of choice today in Canada? How can the consumer be said to have freedom of choice in an age of administered prices, when the prices he pays and the prices he is charged are not competitive; when these prices are administered by the people who control the large corporations in the key industries?

Last April we had as good an example of the fact that administered prices exist on this continent as we will ever have, when the leading steel corporations of the United States —by sheer coincidence—simultaneously raised the price of steel by $6 a ton. Of course this meant that the price of every commodity of which steel was a component would necessarily be increased by at least an equivalent amount. President Kennedy recognized the necessity for the government to intervene in the interests of the consuming public, and he did intervene and persuaded the steel companies to cancel the increase they had made. I think that is one of the best examples we can have of the necessity for planning for the benefit of the consumer, because that is what we are trying to achieve. We want to plan for the maximization of the choices that confront the consumer. We want to plan to make sure that he has genuine freedom of choice.

We in this party have advocated, on behalf of the consumer, that we ought to establish in this country a ministry of consumers' affairs. We have advocated the idea that in the cabinet there should be a minister representing the consumer, looking after consumers' affairs. We believe that such a minister ought to be a member of a federal planning board. We believe that the national economic development board should be responsible directly to the cabinet, not simply to the Minister of Finance. We believe that the Minister of Finance should be a member of that board, should be its chairman. And we believe that there should be a minister in the cabinet sitting on the national economic development board to represent the consumers of this country.

When we are talking about the necessity for planning for the consumer we have to consider how we can make sure the consumer has sufficient income to enable him to freely choose those commodities that he wants and needs. Of course we in the New Democratic party have advocated time and time again from this section of the house the necessity in Canada today for stimulating consumer demand, for a planned increase in the supply of the money and credit, not an indiscriminate increase such as was advocated by the Social Credit party when it put before the house the idea of debt free money—an idea, incidentally, to which the Leader of the Opposition subscribed at that time. The Leader of the Opposition, in the debate on Friday, referred to the social and economic planning advocated by the New Democratic party as "magic nostrums"; yet the Leader of the Opposition advocated the idea of debt free money only a few months ago in this house, or at least his right bower in economic affairs, the hon. member for Davenport, advocated the idea of debt free money.

I suggest that it does not lie in the mouth of the Leader of the Opposition, who put forward that fantastically irresponsible idea, to denounce the members of any other party in this house as advocating "magic nostrums". I do not think the Leader of the Opposition had any clear idea of what debt free money involved, but at least his right bower in economic affairs should have known better.

We in the New Democratic party believe in the necessity for expanding Canada's social capital in order that additional money may be made available and spent. This may involve planned deficits; not the kind of financial chaos that this government has imposed upon the country, but planned deficits designed to enable municipalities, provincial governments and the federal government as well to increase the supply of social capital in this country, to increase the number of schools and hospitals, the number of community centres, to supply the country with the highways and bridges that it needs.

Mr. Chairman, we believe these things could be done, and in the process the number of jobs, the amount of money and consumer purchasing power would be increased, and the consumer would benefit because he would have the money to enable him to exercise genuine freedom of choice. We also need a countrywide minimum wage law to increase the incomes of consumers all over the country.

Let me point this out. Even if the federal government concerns itself with the necessity for taking all these steps to increase consumer demand, to give to the consumer sufficient income to enable him to buy the things he wants and needs, that will not suffice unless the planners, the federal government, concern themselves with the problem of interest rates. The necessity for regulating interest rates in this country should now be apparent to hon. members in all parties. It should now, I hope, be apparent even to the members of the cabinet. We already supervise the lending activities of the chartered banks; we already regulate the interest charges which they make to the public. Surely it is time we got around to regulating the lending activities of finance companies, small loan companies, department stores and furniture stores. Surely it is time the federal government supervised the lending activities and regulated the rates of interest that are charged by these companies. It is necessary to cite only one or two statistics in order to justify the case for federal legislation to regulate interest charges in this country.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member is making it difficult for the Chair with respect to relevancy, especially as he speaks of other legislation which has nothing whatever to do with this bill. I have looked at clause 9 of the bill before us, and I know it lends itself to fairly wide scope for debate; but there are private members' bills having to do with the subject the hon. member is now considering. I think he will agree with me I have been tolerant as to relevancy up to this moment, but before he begins to quote examples which go into detail on a specialized subject I caution him that I would have difficulty in relating them to the bill under consideration.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I speak on the point of order? I do not want to detract from the implications of the statement which Your Honour has just made. On the other hand I would not wish your observations to preclude a debate which I think is inevitable on this matter. It seems to me that on this bill we are entitled to discuss whatever subject matter we believe should come within the compass of a national economic development board. It is true that clause 9 is fairly general in its scope. Some of us might argue that it is not general enough. If one does not stand up at this time and make an observation of this kind one might be precluded later on from taking a position as to what should be the scope of this bill, and I strongly suggest that the whole economic life of the country is involved in this bill, at least to the extent that it is open to hon. members to suggest that the bill should encompass the total economic life of the nation.

Mr. Douglas: When the bill was in the resolution stage it was described by the minister as having to do with economic planning for Canada. It is difficult to explain how we can discuss economic planning for Canada in isolation from such questions as instalment buying and the high interest rates which are related thereto, because they form part of the consumer problem which in itself is a most important part of the economic situation. I think it would be difficult to circumscribe a discussion of this type by ruling out consideration of such matters as interest rates and instalment buying.

The Chairman: I rose as a precautionary measure having heard the hon. member say that he intended to proceed with this matter in some detail. If, for instance, we were to allow a discourse on examples of harsh interest rates and so on it could come to a point where, in my view, it would be outside the scope of this bill. I did not make any ruling, and the hon. member may proceed now.

Mr. Baldwin: Perhaps I might make a brief comment on your observations, Mr. Chairman, because this is a matter which might come up later on. It is true that at the resolution stage and on second reading it is obviously difficult, when we are dealing with a bill of this nature, to curtail the scope of debate, but it is my submission that when we come to debate in committee there are rules which set a perimeter around the discussion, which must then have some limit. To that extent I submit that your caution was well deserved.

Mr. Berger: I appreciate the brief intervention you made in the debate, Mr. Chairman. Before my hon. friend the member for Burnaby-Coquitlam and the hon. member for Essex East rose to speak on the point of order and to point out the relation between the regulation of consumer credit and economic planning on a countrywide scale, I was about to say that the amount of money which the people of this country owe to the finance companies, the small loans companies, the department stores and the furniture stores totals $2,450 million, while the amount they owe to the chartered banks totals $1,600 million. Thus the people of this country owe almost 50 per cent more money to these financial institutions, which now go unregulated, than they do to the chartered banks, which makes this problem a matter of great concern to economic planners and one which should be considered at an early stage by the members of the national economic development board when it is established.

Your Honour was somewhat disturbed lest I recite a series of examples of the imposition of harsh rates of interest upon members of the public. I did not intend to do that, but I agree with what, I think, was implied in Your Honour's remarks, namely that these examples are so numerous that if we once began to recite them members in all parts of the house would have hundreds of cases to lay before the minister. I am sure all hon. members are anxious that the minister and the national economic development board should consider this problem at the earliest possible time.

National Economic Development Board

There are some general features attached to the imposition of interest charges which ought, in my view, to come to the attention of the board at the earliest opportunity. These financial institutions that I have mentioned use a number of techniques to increase interest charges to those who make loans from them and to people who buy their goods far beyond any reasonable limit. There is the technique of not quoting the rate of interest, of simply telling a consumer that he is buying for so much down and $10 a month. There is the device of the added rate. A consumer is told he is paying, say, an interest charge of $6 on $100 over a period of one year, which sounds as if he were paying only 6 per cent. In fact, because he will have paid off at least half of the debt at the end of six months, he will be paying 12 per cent. There is the technique of the discount rate. A consumer receives $94 and then has to repay $100. This sounds like an interest rate of 6 per cent, but it is really 12 per cent. Then there is the simple monthly rate, which is what the department stores use in their revolving credit plans. The consumer pays 1½ per cent a month, which is actually 18 per cent a year. A consumer may pay 3 per cent a month to a small loans company. That is 36 per cent a year. These are all aspects of the problem of excessive interest charges, and the national economic development board ought to consider the whole question as one of urgency.

We in this party believe there must be legislation to curb the exaction of excessive interest rates and to restrict interest charges to reasonable limits. We do not go so far as to advocate the idea of debt free money. I know this is one of the sacred policies of the Liberal party, one which they espoused with a good deal of vehemence last fall and one which the hon. member for Davenport and the hon. member for Essex East expounded to the house with their usual eloquence.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Of course the hon. member is wrong once again.

Mr. Berger: Nevertheless some of us were not persuaded that debt free money is a sound policy. We in this party believe we ought not to adopt policies such as debt free money, a policy which has been rejected by every reputable economist. We believe we should rely on policies which will commend themselves to people versed in economic affairs and who have some knowledge of sound economic and fiscal practices.

One of the policies which does commend itself to people who are knowledgeable in this field is a policy of regulating excessive interest charges and limiting interest charges to reasonable levels. That is what this party believes in. We believe that this is a measure that the national economic development board ought to consider. This is a measure which justifies, in fact commands, legislation at the earliest possible moment by this government, or by any government which may succeed it. We believe that the consumer ought to be protected. We believe that legislation to regulate interest charges is one of the essential ways in which this protection can be afforded him. That is why, as the chairman of the committee quite rightly pointed out, some members have submitted bills to regulate interest charges. I myself, Mr. Chairman, have submitted such a bill.

Mr. Chairman, let me conclude my remarks by saying that the earlier the ministry, the earlier that this house, and the earlier that the national economic development board give their attention to the problems of the consumer, the better. When we are planning our economic affairs we are seeking to provide for the consumer the goods and services which he wants and which he needs. When we talk of planning we are concerned about maintaining a level of income which will enable all Canadians to purchase the good things which ought to be available to every one of them. We can do this only if we are prepared to regulate not only the supply of consumer credit, but also interest charges. Otherwise, if we took steps to increase the level of consumer credit—

Mr. Gregoire: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Berger: Yes.

Mr. Gregoire: Is it his intention to see that the consumers buy with borrowed money or with money they have?

Mr. Berger: I should like them to be able to buy with money which they had earned, with money they had earned in jobs which can be made available to them if we adopt the idea of genuine economic planning, as they do in so many other parts of the world. I believe that they ought to be able to borrow money if it becomes necessary for them to do so, but only at reasonable levels of interest. I suggest that it is a sad commentary on the kind of government which this party and that party have given us when we do not yet have on the statute books of the nation legislation regulating interest rates in the same way that the bills now before the house, and which will shortly be debated, call for.

Mr. Gregoire: Do you not think that we have enough debts in the country now? Let some people secure money without having to borrow.

Mr. Berger: Mr. Chairman, as the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam has quite rightly pointed out, what we need is money which will buy something, money which will maintain its buying power. If hon. members do not yet realize this they should, but the policies advocated by the party of the hon. member who asked me the question are such that if we adopted the idea which they share with the Liberals, or debt free money, the result would be a galloping inflation in this country. If we accepted the magic nostrums put forward by the hon. member for Davenport, the savings of old age pensioners and the savings of other people on fixed incomes would be wiped out. There would not be any prosperity for anybody then. You must plan your economy. Increasing the money supply and increasing the supply of credit is only one of the economic tools which ought to be used when planning your economy.

Mr. Chairman, I was in the process of concluding my remarks when the hon. member was good enough to interrupt me and enable me to prolong them. Let me just finish by saying that we in this party are going to fight in this parliament for legislation to regulate interest charges. We believe that this is an essential policy, a policy that ought long ago to have been adopted by the government of this country. We intend to do our best to make sure that that policy is adopted in this parliament.

(Translation):

Mr. Sauve: When the establishment of a national economic development board was announced in the speech from the throne, most hon. members, I am sure, were delighted at the action taken by the government in this field. I am afraid, however, that the government foreshadowed in the speech from the throne much more than it is actually introducing in the house.

I remember that in the speeches delivered during the throne speech debate, government members told us that the government was finally bringing before the house a revolutionary bill, a measure of utmost importance.

Now, I find that this bill was read for the first time on November 28 and that today is January 28. Therefore, more than two months have elapsed since this bill was introduced and I am not aware that it is members of the opposition who have delayed the passage of this bill.

I believe, on the contrary, that in the case of this bill as well as that of the other measures it has introduced, the government has always postponed the debate on the grounds that it had to deal with more urgent matters that came up unexpectedly.

Thus it is that, in a few days, we shall be called upon to vote interim supply, eleven twelfths. To my knowledge, it shall be the first time in the history of this house since confederation that such a measure is put forward.

Newspapers are devoting a lot of space to the difficulties now facing the government. Having had to delay until now its requests for funds, it has been wondering how to get out of this fix.

I note also that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Nowlan) has been content to put forward only the introductory resolution of this bill and, as the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) observed a while ago, he has not even made any comment since. In fact, it was the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Martineau) who introduced the bill in this house.

I find it strange that, for a measure as important as this one which is considered essential to the recovery of our country's economy, the government should have waited until today to resume the discussion.

I find it even more strange that the responsible minister was not always present in this chamber while the measure was being discussed.

We have now reached the committee stage and I intend to make a few remarks on the nature of the bill.

The presentation of this bill concerning a national economic development board seems to conflict with two other bodies created by the government: the national productivity council and the Atlantic development board.

I do not understand very well what the government had in mind when it set up those regional or special boards that do not seem to report to a higher body, like the one it proposes to set up now.

Mr. Gregoire: It is because they do not know what to do.

Mr. Sauve: I wonder, in fact, as the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Gregoire) has said, if the government is not simply looking for measures that might yield political advantages, giving no real thought to the most important problem, the economic development of our country.

When I read this bill, Mr. Chairman, I am surprised to find that its scope is so limited. One would get the impression, on reading it carefully, that the government, in order to satisfy public opinion which demands measures of this kind, has decided to introduce a bill without giving it any real substance.

National Economic Development Board

In this bill there is a frequent reference to consultations, to the possibility of members of the board to present briefs, suggestions, to waiting for directions from the Minister of Finance, but it seems prevented from taking any initiative.

I really wonder what will come out of this bill. I am happy, however, that it was introduced because at least it is an indication that we are on the way of what is commonly known as "indicative planning".

I intend this afternoon to dwell a little longer on this indicative planning. I am pleased to see that the government has decided to apply at least part of the electoral platform of the Liberal party in the last general election. Indeed, I read at page 14 that the Liberal party of Canada proposed the setting up of an economic council.

And the government picked up the idea.

An hon. Member: Twenty two years too late.

Another hon. Member: Why did you not do it in your time?

Mr. Sauve: We are in the opposition, not in power. At the time when we were in power, we maintained economic activity at a high level. It is only since the Conservative party came to power that the economic situation has deteriorated in this country.

At all events, the Canadian people passed judgment at the 1957 election and we do not have to discuss it. But we are certain, as all Gallup polls indicate, that come the next election, that is in a few weeks, and the Liberal party will come back to power; and I understand quite well why our friends to my left hesitate so much to help us to overthrow this government. The Social Credit members are ashamed because they know very well that last June they were elected to oppose the Conservative government, but they supported it since they have come to sit in this house. So, they are afraid to face their electors because they will be sent back home.

Mr. Pigeon: You had to take shelter on the Magdalen islands.

Mr. Sauve: It is a wonderful riding and the hon. member might like to get elected there, but it is a sure thing that he could not do it at the next general election.

I was discussing indicative planning, Mr. Chairman. What interests me in indicative planning is the goal that is usually pursued. As you are aware, the French government at the end of the war developed the Monnet plan. And in 1958, a French author named Pierre Bauchet wrote a very interesting book, entitled; "The French experiment in planning". I would like to quote two lines from that book to show you what, to my mind, is the main objective of planning.

On page 21 of the book I just mentioned, it says:

> A concern for full employment is, indeed, one of the essential motives for planning.

Now, I am surprised that in this bill there should be no section aimed at full employment, because the unemployment situation is alarming in Canada at this time.

May I refer to the latest report of the dominion bureau of statistics on the labour situation since 1962, where it is said that on December 15 there were 414,000 people without jobs.

Now, government members may declare loudly that our economy has improved in 1962, but the fact remains that 414,000 Canadians were without jobs. The figure is excessive. In fact, it means 6.3 per cent of the labour force. Now, 6.3 per cent of the labour force means the highest unemployment rate among the NATO countries.

I shall now quote from a document which was published in September 1962, under the title:

(Text):

"Report of President's committee to appraise employment and unemployment statistics, U.S. government printing office."

(Translation):

Figures are given, on page 235, concerning the unemployment situation in 1960, and it can be seen that the figures for December 1962 do not differ very much from those given for Canada in 1960.

In the United States, unemployment represented 5.6 per cent of labour; in France, 1.9 per cent; in Western Germany, 1 per cent; in the United Kingdom, 2.4 per cent; in Italy, 4.3 per cent; in Sweden, 1.5 per cent and in Canada, 7 per cent in 1960 and 6.3 per cent in December 1962.

The level of unemployment is still high in Canada. But, and this is more serious, unemployment is not of the same extent throughout all areas of this country.

I believe that is one of the causes of uneasiness that is felt in many areas of the country.

To support my contention, I should like to put forward a few figures. For December, in the whole of Canada, the figure was 6.3 per cent.

If we look at the statistics for the different provinces or areas, we see that unemployment affects 11.6 per cent of the labour force in the four Atlantic provinces; 8.4 per cent in the province of Quebec; 3.9 per cent in Ontario; 4.5 per cent in the prairies; 7.7 per cent in British Columbia.

There is therefore undue unemployment throughout the country, but it is more acute in certain areas and very acute in the province of Quebec.

An hon. Member: With a Liberal government.

Mr. Pigeon: Would the hon. member allow me a question? The hon. member is talking about unemployment in the province of Quebec. Is he not of the opinion that the provincial government has certain responsibilities in that field?

Mr. Sauve: I shall come back to this aspect of the situation in a moment when I deal with the co-operation that is necessary between the federal and provincial governments.

I was speaking of unemployment and I believe that it is extremely revealing to consider at the same time the personal income per capita. Here we notice differences that are still more substantial. On page 38 of the last report released by the dominion bureau of statistics and entitled "National account, income and expenditure, 1961", we find figures for the personal income, per capita, in 1961.

If I mention these differences as between the various areas, it is because I shall later on insist on the importance of regional planning in a national economic development board with indicative planning. In Ontario—and this will certainly interest my hon. friends from the opposition sitting on my left—in 1961, the personal income per capita was $1,829; in British Columbia, $1,809; in Alberta, $1,582; in Manitoba, $1,476; in Quebec, $1,332; in Nova Scotia, $1,191; in Saskatchewan, $1,184; in New Brunswick, $1,054; in Prince Edward Island, $952; and in Newfoundland, $904.

Now, I notice that there is a difference of $497, or 37 per cent, in the personal income per capita between Quebec and Ontario.

Thus, I do not wonder why discussions are going on in the province of Quebec whereby people are questioning our whole participation within confederation. When we realize that our people are in an inferior position as regards unemployment, personal income, civil service, big companies—privately owned and crown corporations—we wonder whether the economic situation is not mainly responsible for this attitude taken by the population of Quebec on its relations with the rest of Canada. That is why I believe that a national economic development board, at the federal level, is very important as long as it is well directed or organized, and has definite purposes. We cannot be satisfied with a body which will only collect statistics or wait until the minister directs it to make certain inquiries.

On the contrary, we must have a body bent on co-operating with the economic councils in the provinces, a body which will be concerned with regional development and production, which will envisage a full employment policy, the goal of indicative planning, as I mentioned earlier.

Indicative planning is easy to establish. We might very well provide for this in the bill, and I am certain that the whole Canadian people would welcome it. We should set up a working committee which would consult the various groups interested in production, the various professional groups which would submit reports pointing out to the Canadian government the objectives we are able to reach. For instance, there is in France a research body called the Monnet plan, which is composed of 90 people at the most. Those 90 people consult nearly 4,000 leaders of organizations, economists, labour union leaders, representatives of management and farmers' unions before suggesting the objectives to be reached within a certain period. When everybody is in agreement with regard to those objectives, the plan is submitted to the French parliament and means of reaching the proposed objectives are suggested. If it is impossible to so so by agreement among the interested people, no intervention on the part of the government could force them to reach those objectives.

There is also in France what is called government incentives, as we have them in Canada, but without any planning. For instance, for quite a long time the government has been subsidizing the gold mines, the transport of coal, and the transport of wheat from west to east. Grants are handed out without any co-ordinating policy. The government might very well resort to fiscal and other incentives and give priority to certain industrial areas.

To my mind, we could use such indicative planning in this country. For instance, I see no reason why we might not all agree on the objectives to be attained. I am convinced that all members in this house will admit that there is no valid reason for such a high unemployment rate in this country.

If we want to fight unemployment, we must agree on the means to do so effectively. As I pointed out a few moments ago by quoting some figures, unemployment is not the same throughout Canada. We might therefore try to favour some areas or some industries, so as to enable them to increase their production, in order to check unemployment in those districts. We have to promote full employment by all means, as well as co-operation between the various provinces and the federal government in the field of public investment. Every year the federal government as well as the provincial and municipal governments spend considerable amounts while there is no co-ordination between the various levels of government in investment matters.

Governments often act simultaneously on the labour or material markets, thus creating a temporary artificial scarcity. The federal government, the provincial governments and the municipalities do their borrowing without getting together to co-ordinate their borrowing policy.

It should be possible, within the proposed board, to plan government expenses in the field of capital expenditures, to organize planned government borrowing at federal and provincial levels.

This bill is based on the assumption that what is good for private enterprise or for individuals, is good for the community as a whole.

That is the famous saying which a former president of General Motors used when he said a few years ago:

(Text):

What is good for General Motors is good for the United States.

(Translation):

Now, that is a philosophy with which I totally disagree. The common good is not an aggregate of what is good for particular groups. We could all be very happy on our street and keep our door-step clean, but that does not mean that the sidewalk will be in the same condition throughout, that the garbage placed outside our door will not bother our neighbours.

I have always been amazed to find that the intervention of the government in certain fields has been accepted without discussion, and most particularly in postal matters, health, transport, communications, radio, television and highways, and when it is a matter of national economic growth, instead of taking steps to fight unemployment or to develop certain underdeveloped areas, the government should retire behind the screen of "laissez-faire".

However, during the last war means were found to co-ordinate the efforts of the nation as a whole, in order to achieve a specific objective: victory. I am still wondering why, in peacetime, means can not be found to reach the very specific objective of full employment.

Of course, a bill like the one now under consideration is a beginning, a starting point. In fact, we are now on the way to an indicative planning policy, which is very well explained in the excellent paper issued by the national productivity council, entitled "Report of the European Mission". This booklet makes extremely interesting reading, and I wonder why the government has not drawn on that report to draft its own bill. It seems very well established that the members of that mission came back from Europe impressed by the indicative planning program in operation in the European countries they visited. Here is what we find in paragraph 24 of the said report:

All countries visited admit the necessity of planning, under one form or another. Most countries make use of "indicative planning" as one of the measures most likely to ensure economic growth.

Mr. Chairman, I feel that when we come to the consideration of the various sections the bill could be amended, so that when parliament has adopted it we may all rejoice, both members of the government and those of the opposition, at the very extremely important move which will finally ensure this country a policy of full employment, a decrease in unemployment and better relations between all Canadians, which we all desire and hope one day will be achieved.

(Text):

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, that is a very important bill because in my opinion it very definitely affects the life of the communities which I represent. However, in reading it I am surprised to find it only goes to the extent of providing a board which will collect information and make it available to the minister. If there is going to be any advantage from national economic development, what we need is a board that will be able to advise the government and provide it with the knowledge requisite for the formulation of a policy that the government can implement for the areas that are selected, either by the government or the board, for specific attention.

This idea has been adopted by governments all over the world. I have been very impressed, speaking to people like George Cadbury who has been attached to the United Nations, to find that the United Nations has sent officials to places like Ceylon, Jamaica and other newly developing countries to establish councils to advise their governments of the potential wealth of their countries and how to get the most out of national economic development.

We in Canada are faced with many major problems, and I do not make any bones about the fact that I do not expect the government, through this bill, will solve those problems. However I hope and believe they can be solved. I have no more faith in this government than I had in the Liberal regime which, it must be said, had a bureaucracy established that would have been able to undertake this type of work without such a board, if it so desired. Now, with a government that cannot run its own affairs, that finds us on a Monday, only a few weeks from the end of the financial year, without the supply motions necessary to allow us to discuss the business of the house in an orderly fashion, I cannot expect such a government to be able to take the advice of this board and put it into effect in order to establish economic equality across Canada.

The government has so little faith in this type of thing that it has brought forward a bill to apply to the Atlantic provinces. Why does it do this? To some extent, like the government, we are representative of the provinces and the provincial governments. The former speaker mentioned that in the province of Quebec this has been a great problem and that there were problems of a national nature in Quebec that were going to be aided by this particular bill. This is true of all the provinces, and it may be the reason for the introduction of the bill providing for an Atlantic development board, with stronger provisions than this bill. It may be that the provinces, the provincial governments and people generally throughout Canada are not yet ready to provide the government with the machinery that would establish an economic development council to provide full employment for all the people. It may be that they are not ready to support a bill which would provide the machinery necessary to make the most use of the wealth we have and achieve reasonable economic development in all parts of the country, using the wealth of the country.

We are particularly concerned with this in my area. We have built numerous communities on the strength of the basic resources of this nation. Many of our towns are only celebrating their semi-centennial this year. Many of them were very progressive in their day. One has only to drive through the town of Cobalt to know this. The people there talk of the days when there were electric railways running throughout the silver area, from Cobalt to Haileybury and New Liskeard, and from Cobalt into the Kerr lake camp. All these towns were further developed 40 years ago than they are today. It seems to me a shame that the people of those communities should find themselves going backward instead of forward, with their only hope lying in this type of development.

It seems to me the time has now arrived when we should not any longer be taking people to industry, like we still are in many of our larger cities, but that we should take industry to the people and to the communities that have already been developed. I am not suggesting this is the only thing we should be doing, but it is one of the first things we ought to do.

Why was it necessary in countries like Sweden, France, and most of the major countries of Europe? I would suggest it has been necessary because the free enterprise system works only on the principle of building up profits rather than on the establishment of economic welfare for the people as a whole. I think this has been recognized by many countries throughout the civilized world, and it is now being recognized in a small, token way by the government of Canada and the people of Canada.

It is surprising what favourable steps governments will sometimes take, but eventually they do take these steps. It is also surprising that these steps should be taken by a Conservative government, when one considers the fact that the Liberal party suggested they are to the left of the present government. I was surprised to read in Saturday's newspaper that in the province of British Columbia a Conservative government was suggesting a medicare program for the province.

An hon. Member: A Conservative government?

Mr. Peters: The Conservative party. The Conservative government that is in power there has not got around to implementing such a program but I suggest this is only a matter of time; it also will make the same suggestion before the next provincial election.

One of the major things with which we should be concerned, apart from relocating industry, is the development of an economy for Canadians by Canadians. Many times I have been shocked by the control exercised by countries not under our jurisdiction but working within our boundaries. Not only is this work done by corporations of other countries but even sometimes governments of other countries.

I believe we are going to be advised in the next few months that we will be regulated to some extent in our economic development by what happens south of the border in relation to agricultural products. It has been suggested that if the United States, through legislation in that country, decides to scrap the present support program in regard to wheat, one of Canada's major developments will be in jeopardy, and rather than producing $2 wheat they will be producing $1 wheat. I wonder where our average of $1.50 will go if this happens. There is very little we can do about it in the present circumstances, and it seems to me that if a national economic development board is going to meet the needs of the Canadian people we must be in a position to do something about it.

On many occasions we have heard from and met with representatives from the automobile industry in this country. This seems to me to be a wonderful opportunity for the hon. member for Essex East to rise in his place and demand Canadian government assistance for an industry which should be Canadian. It is well recognized that it is rather foolish to buy cars that are manufactured for desert conditions and for conditions very unlike those in northern Canada; it is foolish to pay money for a product that is not meeting our needs. It is in the interests of the Canadian government to give some assistance to developing a product that will meet the needs of Canadians, and will meet them by the establishment of an industry that will produce something that is good for Canadians.

We must always be shocked—certainly I am always shocked—to hear that because of legislation or regulations passed in another country we are stymied in our economic development in this country because of our limited ability to sell the product which we manufacture. I refer to the Ford situation where Canadian firms were not able to sell to one country because it was considered not to be in the interests of another country.

Mr. Pugh: Would the hon. member accept a question?

Mr. Peters: Sure.

Mr. Pugh: Sell in what other country?

Mr. Peters: Pardon?

[Mr. Peters.]

Mr. Pugh: The hon. member mentioned Ford cars. Sell in what other country? What is the name of the country?

Mr. Peters: They were trucks to be sold to red China.

Mr. Pugh: Thank you.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, that is a very, very interesting question. The hon. gentleman, I presume, comes from western Canada, and he does not rise in his place and say—

An hon. Member: He comes from the west coast.

Mr. Peters: Well, that is western Canada even if it is on the west coast. He does not rise in his place and object to wheat being sold to red China, but he objects to trucks being sold to them. At least, that is the implication in his question.

Mr. Pugh: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, I raised no objection whatsoever. It was the hon. member's party that raised the objection to selling wheat to China, I thought; he certainly has no objection to selling cars to China. I certainly have not myself.

Mr. Peters: We in this party I am sure have no objection to Canada selling anything of a non-military nature to any country in the world which has the money to buy it or trade that can be used as barter for that product. We are a country that has to develop and we need to do so in an industrial sense. We can, it is true, increase our production tremendously in an agriculture sense, but at the present time we are not able to sell our present agricultural production. Industrially this country has a lower wage scale than many other countries throughout the world, and I believe we are in an advantageous position to go into the production of many, many other things. But I suggest that the economic development council would have to inform the government that assistance was necessary if this were to happen. We decided to sell food to Cuba, and we received a great deal of condemnation from several parts of the world for doing so. I believe that if the Cuban people wish to eat—and I think they do—and there is a product we can sell to them and they have one which they can sell to us, then we should do that and we should not care whether it suits the needs of someone else's economic blockade because they lost one of their little corporations.

I believe this is something Canadians have to do. That is why I am so shocked every time I hear a Liberal spokesman rise in this house and defend the right of another country to have some control over our corporations.

I think the Ford example is a good one to think about, because we have all met delegations from the automobile industry which have informed us that a great many of the employees of their industry are unemployed because no expansion is taking place in the automobile industry in Canada, and yet more cars are being sold in Canada every year. I think this is one of the things to which Canadians should give consideration. I believe that this domination of capital from other countries may make it necessary for the federal government to get into the field of supplying capital to industry in those areas that need it.

I have always been very pleased and very proud of the fact that the maritimes, an area which I agree needs development as badly as any other area in Canada, have on their own, without government assistance initially, developed the idea of industrial estates. I am pleased that the federal government, through the Atlantic economic council bill, gave some assistance to the idea of establishing industrial estates in the provinces of the maritimes. I suggest that this right should be given to the rest of Canada. If the rest of Canada is not ready for it, then let the federal government give leadership in developing plans so that the people will know the advantages of this type of development and will assist in bringing it about.

We in northern Ontario have always depended upon our natural resources as the main source of our income. There have been several examples where these resources have not been utilized for the benefit of Canadians. Right now silver that is being produced in my area in very large quantities is being shipped to the United States for manufacturing and refining to the extent where it can be used by the Canadian mint. Then what happens? The Canadian government go to the United States and buy that silver back because we have not the guts and the gumption to put $500,000 into the refinery that we already have in Cobalt. This plant can produce the mint silver that is required by the Canadian government and the Canadian government would save $2 per ounce if we were to do that. It seems to me that we have a terrific love for a foreign country if we are prepared to pay them an extra two bucks for the silver we carry around in our own pockets. This government has not the ability to decide that this Canadian industry is worth saving and do something about it.

We are going to be asked in the near future to assist this refinery. When the refinery at Deloro closed its doors United States interests offered to smelt the silver that we were not capable of handling. We are now capable of handling it. We have this plant—it was operating under very odd auspices until recently—and it is worth the federal government investing some money in it to see that it operates in Canada for the benefit of Canadians. The silver industry is no small industry. This can be readily ascertained if we bother to find out the quantity of silver that is being bought at the present time from the United States. I do not blame the entrepreneurs in the United States for dealing with Canada in the way they have, but I do blame Canadians for allowing this or making it necessary. We have near Kirkland Lake an area which is a good example in this connection. The town of Kirkland Lake itself is dying quite rapidly. Every year another mine closes down. Miners are being laid off and no industry is being developed in the area so that this particular area can continue its economic growth in co-operation with other areas throughout Canada. Yet we found last year that a United States corporation was willing to come into the Kirkland Lake area, establish the Adams mine and start a mining development on which they expect to spend $30 million or $40 million in the next two years. I thank them for doing something which Canadians themselves were unwilling to do, and in some cases incapable of doing. I think there is a terrific waste of our natural resources in allowing this to be done.

I know we are not yet developed to the point at which we can use the total production of this large and worth-while mining operation but I think we are in a position where we could put in a smelter and develop a degree of manufacturing of iron and steel in that area so as to make it a booming area again. It seems to me that this iron industry will eventually employ people in secondary industries connected with it to the number of 4,000 or more, yet we in Canada will only have 300 or 400 employees. Again, we are to be hewers of wood and drawers of water for Americans who have more foresight than we have ourselves. If this government wants to develop a worth-while enterprise, an iron and steel industry in northern Ontario would be a venture well worth considering and, since it is already in the embryo stage, it would not cost too much money to carry out.

The idea of relocation of industry has been adopted by almost every major, economically developed country in the world, countries which have a high standard of living as hon. members may check for themselves. These countries have decided that they cannot afford to enjoy the luxury of unemployment such as this country still thinks it can afford, but cannot. I think one of our major advances in this country must concern the development and diversification of our industry, and the diversification of industry must inevitably lend itself to government planning. Why should industry go into towns and cities in metropolitan areas where more is asked for a small business site than would be asked for a whole city block in less congested areas, which are already developed, with water, sewers and electricity laid on; areas where the municipalities would provide the land almost free of cost because they are anxious to have industry and willing to help to the extent a small municipality can? What assistance do such municipalities get from the federal government?

The Minister of Finance is interested in this bill and rightly so. He has shown an interest in other acts for the development of Canada. But I wonder if he has given real consideration to the relationship between this bill and the Industrial Development Bank Act. There are a number of small industries in my own area which have gone to the industrial development bank for loans only to find that no money is available. Eventually they got the chartered banks to lend money with respect to enterprises which the industrial development bank had declined to accept as security. For example, ten or 12 farmers were running a co-operative dairy. A second dairy was going bankrupt and they went to the I.D.B. to ask for a loan. They have a large modern building with a great deal of equipment and by adding the second dairy they would almost double the amount of equipment available. They were not acquiring the other dairy merely in order to expand but, as I say, because the other dairy was going bankrupt and the farmers would be left holding the bag if someone did not bail this concern out of its difficulty. The I.D.B. told these farmers that the building was not worth more than the mortgage they held on it. They were told that their farms and their collective value as citizens did not mean anything at all. The bank wanted to see everything in black and white. They wanted to be able to seize the building and recover the value of the loan if anything went wrong, ignoring the fact that it would be a dairy with farmers depending on it. Money could be lent only on the building itself. I believe the collective value of our citizens is important. I believe the collective value of our farm economy is important. In addition, I believe the value of our unemployed should never be forgotten. These are all matters which should be taken into consideration. The other day I was approached by a young man who had bought a dry cleaning establishment. He told me that money was not available to consolidate his mortgages. These mortgages were considered good enough to be collateral for the building and for the equipment he had bought. Yet when he went to the I.D.B. and asked for consolidation of his debts it was no dice; the building was not worth enough, and that was the only thing they could lend money on. What kind of a development are we going to have if this is the way things are carried on? Suppose we ask for money to develop a mining venture and the only thing the company has are buildings above the ground? Is the I.D.B. prepared to help an industry of this kind? I doubt it. Unless we revise the bill before us it will not serve industry in any way whatsoever.

The minister does not need further statistics to be collected. We already have statistics available. What he needs, as we see it, is a national economic development council which will tell him where we can get the most in the development of Canada out of specific expenditures in a particular field at a particular time. The government must then decide to do something about it. It is not good enough simply to advise the Minister of Finance, because the Minister of Finance is in a difficult position always. He finds that when everything else is paid there is nothing left over, the same as you and I do at the end of the year. If we are to undertake our economic development on the basis of whether the Minister of Finance says it is economically feasible or not we shall find we shall never develop anything in this country because there will never be any money left over. Hon. members can ask the char staff and the messenger service what happens when it comes to getting down to the bottom where the money is needed the most. The areas where development is really needed will be neglected in favour of the larger centres. They will find there is no money available for them, just as the char staff and the messengers have found. There can be no doubt as to the necessity of guiding the relocation of industry. Areas such as metropolitan Toronto and London, Ontario, are already facing problems of access and transportation which were unheard of 30 or 40 years ago. Problems such as these could readily be solved by industrial planning but the remedies which are most appropriate cannot even be considered under the terms of the bill which is now before us.

There are occasions, it would seem, when industrial plants are switched to other areas without even economic reasons being given for the move. There was a small plant in a town in my own area which moved to another town not very much larger. I asked why it had moved and was told that the president's wife did not like the society she found in the first town. That was the reason why the concern moved. It is surprising that a free enterprise system can be so arranged that even economic considerations need not be taken into account, but that an action so important to employees and others can be taken merely on the whim of particular persons. Another company left the town where I live and established itself in the city of North Bay. The head office is there and the company has between 60 and 70 employees —not many, but still the departure of the company was a considerable loss. The reason given for the move was that the comptroller lived in Montreal and found it easier to go to North Bay than to New Liskeard. By its very nature the free enterprise system works severe hardship on people, and though this is usually done under the guise of economic interest it seems to me sometimes even this motive is badly bent.

The federal government can give important assistance to the development of this country. Much of the knowledge needed has already been obtained. We do not necessarily have to go to Europe to find out what has been done in the various countries there, though I think this would help. Also, I believe, it has been done on many occasions. I know that when a man engaged in the lumber industry in my area wanted to find out how he could get the most out of his factory for a dollar—and he was engaged in an industry where the efficiency was very low—he went to Sweden and asked them what they did. When he came back to Canada I do not think he applied the Swedish system. I think he used the education which he had to adapt it to the Canadian way of life, and he now has a flourishing industry which uses many years of experience gained some place else to adapt itself to the Canadian system.

I think that we have to apply this method not only to the field of industry but also to the field of transportation. The economic development of this country will be retarded for many years to come if we do not face and come to grips with a national transportation policy. In my own area transportation is always cited as the only reason why secondary industry cannot come into northern Ontario. People say that this means the transporting of raw materials into the area and taking out of it the finished product. Yet I have sat on negotiations with a large factory in New Liskeard, the Hill, Clark and Francis factory, which also owns Hallidays and has an interest in many other woodworking concerns across the nation. Yet this company manufactures doors and windows for Simpson's, Eaton's, for Hallidays, and for many other companies, and will ship the doors and windows from New Liskeard to Toronto, Hamilton and other areas. These other companies in turn send them back to New Liskeard, pay transportation both ways, and yet sell their products for two or three dollars less than they can buy them in the first place from the factory. This is not a transportation cost. It has nothing whatsoever to do with transportation. This is just another bugaboo used by industry often reluctant to look at the needs of the people and finding this as another reason to give for centralization of industry, in spite of the many problems which centralization has had.

We do not want to be unfair to the urban centres of Canada. We are happy that they have developed as they have. But the representatives from these areas will agree that some of the problems they now face in their urban development, or in the renewal of their urban development, will be at the expense of all Canada. And we are going to be happy in developing them. But in return for that, I believe they have an obligation to help those not capable of helping themselves at the present time. It is not possible for the people in my area to help themselves, because the money in the hands of any small entrepreneur who would do the developing is not sufficient for the type of industry which will be self-reliant and will be carried in the northern areas. It is true that there will be some small industry, but what we need is fairly large industry to solve the problems which we have. I ask this not only for my area; I ask it also for the thousands and thousands of small towns and communities across Canada. For example, I think of those towns in western Canada which even now find their only claim to fame is a rural elevator. And the signpost on which they have their name, indicating that they are a rural station, is not disappearing. Why can we not provide those small communities with industry to maintain them and to see them grow rather than disappear? We should be proud of the heritage our forefathers in the west and in the outside areas of rural Canada left to us, and rather than destroy it we should try to build it up.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Laing: Mr. Chairman, I welcome this opportunity to say a few words on this bill. I note with some satisfaction that it is taken in the name of the Minister of Finance. I want to say at once that as far as I am concerned, and I think as far as most of the people on this side are concerned, I am of the opinion that it could not be better taken, both from the viewpoint of the minister's goodwill in doing something worth while for the country, and probably also from the viewpoint of his ability to do so. But I am going to suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the bill as written certainly does not warrant the hyperbole of praise given it by the minister when he spoke at the introduction stage. No doubt it will be subjected to some amendments, which I hope the minister will receive, in order to give it the ability to produce something for the Canadian people. Because as the bill stands, this is nothing more than the setting up of a permanent advisory board to the government. It says that.

The question I want to put to the minister is this. Does he not have at the present time in the various departments of the government that type of advice and information constantly at hand? We are in favour of planning, because we have seen in other nations of the world the results of planning since the end of the war. While we note with tremendous interest the great progress which has been made in those countries, such as the European countries and in Japan, I am rather of the opinion that most of it has been the result of invention being forced out of necessity. They were in grave difficulties and have now come back at a tremendous rate.

Our situation in Canada is not like the situations of those countries. To apply the principle of planning in this country on the basis they have applied it in western Europe and in Japan would, I think, be a most difficult matter indeed. I think the minister is aware of that. But certainly the bill as it stands will give him nothing more than a group of advisers, and I think that there are already a great number of advisers in various departments who can supply all this information.

I am going to make special reference to the particular situation in which Canada finds itself in respect to world trade. I noticed with some interest that a portion of the bill had some meat in it. I refer to the duties and the powers for which it provides. I want to tell the minister that far too much of the bill is given over to the provision of the people who will be on the board. Also I notice that only the chairman is to be paid, and that is the intention. However, the duties and powers are very interesting. Clause 9 of the bill says:

> It shall be the duty of the board to furnish to the minister all such advice and information as will best assist the government of Canada in furthering a high and sustainable rate of economic growth in Canada, the strengthening of Canada's international financial and trade position—and this interests me very much—

> —and the achievement of the highest possible levels of efficient production—and so on.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It being five o'clock it is my duty to leave the chair in order that the house may proceed to the consideration of private members' business, pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15.

Progress reported.

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock, the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, page 24, namely notices of motion.

(Translation):

NATIONAL HEALTH

ASSISTANCE TO EPILEPTICS

Mr. J. P. Deschatelets (Maisonneuve-Rosemont) moved:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give consideration to the advisability of introducing legislation to provide assistance to epileptics:
> 1. by requiring the federal civil service and industry at large to hire a fixed percentage of employable epileptics, as is done in the United Kingdom and elsewhere;
> 2. by promoting with the provinces admission of epileptic children in regular schools on the same basis as any other children;
> 3. by increasing the research work on epilepsy, and by contributing with the provinces to the erection of treatment centres (Foyer Dieppe) for male and female sick persons;
> 4. by improving the conditions under which epileptics live, through a more active public campaign.

He said: Mr. Speaker, two years ago, when the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare were under consideration, I had the opportunity to submit to the house the very special problem of epileptics. Last year, I had put on the order paper a notice of motion, but the early dissolution of parliament did not allow us to consider it. Tonight I am very happy to submit to this house this question which I feel is most important and I do hope that I shall be able to go over the subject rather briefly so as to allow members of the other parties to state their views on the matter.

First of all, what is epilepsy? It is a disease much better described maybe by its negative effects than its positive effects. Generally, epilepsy is not hereditary, nor contagious. It does not make one sick or unable to work nor does it make one mentally deficient; therefore, an epileptic is not less intelligent than any other individual.

Epilepsy can be described as a disorder of the nervous system, a very complex illness with the brain as its vital center. It can exist as le petit mal or as le grand mal. Usually, le petit mal is the phase of the illness in childhood or youth.

And today, the question is asked? How many epileptics are there in Canada? We have no statistics available, but according to the criteria usually accepted in the principal countries of the world which actively contend with that disease, it can be said that one individual out of 200 suffers from epilepsy. In Canada, it is generally recognized that about 100,000 persons are affected by epilepsy at various degrees. That is why it is so important.

Mr. Speaker, I said a while ago that statistics are incomplete or non-existent. As a matter of fact, epileptic cases are usually concealed by the parents, and they are not to be blamed entirely because they realize much more than others that in our Canadian society—and I would say that the same situation applies in almost every country of the world—the epileptic is discriminated against at school and within the community.

And yet, following the advancement of modern science, when the epileptic gets all the required medical and surgical care, statistics clearly establish that about 50 per cent are completely cured, that there is a marked reduction of attacks in some 30 per cent of cases and that there are around 20 per cent of cases for which medicine can do nothing yet.

Having said this, one can wonder what the situation is for the thousands of epileptics in Canada and what we actually do to help them. If we answer frankly, we must admit, I think, that we do nothing, or almost nothing, in the face of a tragedy that takes place under our very eyes.

Mr. Speaker, I want to try and describe this unfortunate situation and suggest, in the light of what is done at present in the world, some means of helping those sick people.

First of all, at school: as soon as the illness is diagnosed, the child is immediately asked to leave school. That is the situation in Quebec, as well as in all the other provinces, I believe. If there are honourable exceptions, I would very much like to know about them. It is obvious that if it is known beforehand that he is an epileptic, the child is not admitted to school. Therefore, unless his parents can afford to hire a private tutor, the epileptic child is, first of all, illiterate. He is kept away from school, from children his own age with whom he could play. Thus he grows up isolated from other people and quickly develops all the complexes that make his illness worse.

When the child becomes an adult, he has no future except unemployment, because the same discrimination exists with regard to the adult epileptic. And yet, nothing prevents the epileptic from getting married because, usually, the illness is not hereditary, but through neglect and lack of understanding, he is not permitted like other citizens, to take an active part in society. Those are, briefly, facts which can be seen every day, if one stops and thinks about the epileptic's problem.

In Canada, at present, there are only very few observation, research and guidance centres for epileptics. I know that the Dieppe Foyer performs an enormous task with meagre means. However, there again, only men are admitted and only a very small number of patients can take advantage of those facilities.

If we look at the other countries of the world, we find a large scale offensive against the effects of that disease.

In France, the St. Paul medical centre in Marseilles, the most modern in Europe, has developed a research bureau with substantial grants from the French government. Famous doctors from the whole world are fighting a real international fight against that disease. Examination of young patients allows for a well co-ordinated guidance and, where a complete cure is not obtained, the child at least, is guided in such a way that he does not become a liability to society.

In the United States, the epileptic foundation in Washington is leading the fight on the American national level. Research work is concentrated there, and its results are made known to the American public through tracts and booklets. This informative publicity is directed toward parents, school teachers and the public at large.

In Great Britain, a specific act of which I have here a copy, was passed in 1954, under the title "Disabled Persons Employment Act". In addition to research work being done in Great Britain, this legislation provides that epileptics may be employed by the British government and industry. It provides that, in proportion to the number of employees of a particular industry or in the civil service, the employer must, under penalty of offence and fine, employ epileptics for the types of jobs they can properly discharge.

In Canada, I believe the time has come to become conscious of this problem and to take immediate action in the interest of epileptics.

I would remind you that we now have nearly 100,000 persons suffering from this illness in Canada. Only in extreme cases can they obtain a disability pension which is not conducive to a solution of their problem. I am of the opinion that we should ponder the problem a little while in order to consider immediate measures.

What can we do? What action could be taken at once to allay and improve the conditions of epilepsy sufferers?

First of all, I shall deal with the most important problem, that of education and training of children. At the earliest opportunity, we should, in co-operation with the provinces, find means to educate epileptic children. Let us start by providing those children with the education which will permit them to take their place in our society.

In other countries, figures show eloquently that epileptics cling to education as if it were their sheet-anchor, and that everywhere they are making very remarkable progress.

Second, we should do something at once for epileptic adults. Today these people are without hope, while it seems that we do not care about them. I think we should do what was done in Great Britain, that is we should pass legislation providing for the employment of a certain amount of epileptics in the civil service and in private industry.

I believe that if a campaign were launched along those lines—and I imagine that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith) is quite often called upon to address certain clubs, such as the Rotary or others—that if the example came from higher up, all our businessmen and industrialists, who are generally very generous, were they placed before that problem, would react by doing their part to place some epileptics in certain types of jobs.

I therefore suggest two main lines of action: first of all, education for the young; and employment, in all cases where it is possible, both in private industry and in the civil service.

If we take such action, we shall have done much, we shall have demonstrated, above all, to that great number of sick citizens that we are beginning to look after them; we shall have done much also to eliminate that misunderstanding which unfortunately is too often prevalent among the public.

But there would be much to do. We would need in every province a medical research center where we could give vocational guidance to young epileptics and re-education to adults. I think the national health department could send observers on the spot to Washington, France and Great Britain where they could get acquainted with the most modern methods of fighting that disease and its effects. The department should also inform the public about that disease and about what every individual can do to lessen its effects, by using pamphlets and booklets to appeal to the sympathy of our educators and of our people.

When it comes to epilepsy, it is indicated in some reports that medicine, in spite of all scientific developments, cannot do everything, and that lasting improvement in the state of health of epileptics largely depends on their living conditions at home, at school and within society.

I hope this debate will have contributed, at least in part, to the desired result.

(Text):

Mrs. Jean Casselman (Grenville-Dundas): Mr. Speaker, may I commend the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets) for his very obvious interest in the problem of epilepsy, an interest which we all very definitely share with him. It is a problem that arouses the deepest sympathy of every member in this house and, I am sure, every Canadian. We would all like to do everything possible for the unfortunate sufferers from this unhappy problem, and to see that they are given every opportunity, as he has pointed out, of receiving all possible educational assistance as well as medical assistance.

There is, of course, this same concern over disabilities of all different types. The problem, as the hon. member himself has mentioned, is that many of the things he wishes to achieve are difficult to initiate at the federal level. The house knows that many of the matters which he introduces in this motion have traditionally rested in provincial hands.

In so far as labour legislation is concerned, the first item in the hon. member's motion, my own view is very much against the rigidity of the compulsory employment of certain numbers of epileptics. It seems to me that the promotion of sympathy and understanding for all disabilities, combined with increased attention to their education, is a much sounder and stronger approach than the technique of compulsion, which has major disadvantages. First, there is always a certain amount of resentment when anything is compulsory. This would be particularly unfortunate in the very area where the intention is quite otherwise, in fact the very real need is otherwise. Second, if there is a compulsory number, it discourages sympathetic efforts and attitudes towards the greatest possible co-operation with handicapped persons in the very particular places where they find the very best chances for adjustment.

In many countries it is thought that the introduction of a quota system can tend to downgrade the jobs made available to disabled persons, and that employers tend to provide the most marginal jobs just to fulfil the quota. It is thought in some countries that the full abilities of disabled persons would not be recognized by employers under a quota system, and further that the disabled person himself would have some feeling that he might not have been hired because of his own particular ability. A classic example of the quota system and the supplementary of designated employment is in operation in Great Britain. Under the disabled persons act, every employer who has 20 or more workers is required to employ a quota, at present 3 per cent, of the registered disabled persons, and the act also provides a register.

For the most part employers have kept to this obligation and there have been very few cases where actual proceedings in law had to be taken. However, the committee of inquiry on the rehabilitation, training and settlement of disabled persons, reporting in 1956 noted that although they received no evidence that the quota system should be abolished they had been made aware that in the Scandinavian countries the quota system was not favoured, on the ground that in time of full employment it was unnecessary and in a period of depression it was unenforceable. Furthermore the committee went on to note that from the evidence received although the quota system has been of some assistance to settlement officers in placement work, its main value has not been here but rather to the value given publicity among employers. The committee recommended therefore that the quota system should not be abolished in Great Britain, but because of the educational importance of it it is clearly the British view that this placement by expert officers is dependent on the goodwill and co-operation of the employer.

In all countries the trend seems to be away from compulsory provisions that can cause ill feeling and perhaps even result in the placement of the disabled in jobs that might actually prove dangerous to them. The emphasis must be on filling needs on an individual basis with particular regard to the skills and physical capabilities of the persons concerned.

Considerable strides are already being made and I do take exception to the mover of the motion when he suggests that very little attention has been given to the problem of epilepsy. I think I can show him that considerable attention has been given to the problem. Strides have been taken in the area of improving skills, particularly through an act to provide for the vocational rehabilitation of disabled persons, recently passed under the auspices of the Minister of Labour. Under the terms of this act, in co-operation with the provinces the federal government is making it financially easier to assess the condition of a disabled person, find out the best means by which he can be guided to suitable employment and provide medical treatment or any necessary equipment. Costs are shared equally by the two senior levels of government and the program should have far reaching implications.

There are many tasks which can be performed well by disabled persons and I know the government is anxious to foster recognition of this, both inside the civil service and in industry generally. It seems to me, however, that there is still a great deal of public education to be done in this regard and there is still considerable reticence on the part of the handicapped themselves in admitting their problems and disabilities. This situation of course will be somewhat eased and improved as public education increases and sympathy thereby increases.

Much has been done and still can be done through large companies which have industrial physicians and nurses. There are, however, as we know, many small companies which do not have and may not be in a position to contemplate medical services of any kind in the near future. In this case general public acceptance and understanding of disabilities, including epilepsy, will gradually open increased employment possibilities. In this respect the Canadian epilepsy foundation, with its headquarters in Toronto, is doing admirable work, and such groups deserve every possible encouragement and support.

Within the civil service disabled persons are employed wherever their capabilities fit some particular position, and I believe that the federal government is giving a very strong lead in this respect. To require the employment of a fixed percentage would create many difficulties in terms of decisions as to who could or could not be hired, and where they could or could not be placed, and it seems to me this is very nearly unworkable in this country.

The hon. member speaks of the possibility of increasing the research work on epilepsy but here, as elsewhere, we run into the problem of provincial responsibility. The national health grants program was established to help provinces expand their own research programs and related matters, but decisions as to where the emphasis should be placed are made in the provincial capitals.

Since this government came to office it has increased the available amount of hospital construction grants by 55 per cent, and other national health grants by 20.5 per cent, with a view to stimulating progress in all health fields. The Foyer Dieppe, which the hon. member mentions, has benefited to a considerable degree, in fact to the extent of over a quarter of a million dollars. Since 1957 it has received this total from federal funds, and indeed the federal contribution to the problem of epilepsy throughout the whole country has been $1,126,000. This has assisted epileptics throughout the whole of Canada.

Since the mover of the motion seems to feel so strongly that so little has been done, I might just break this total down. Foyer Dieppe has received in federal assistance, already expended or approved, the amount of $292,323; Hotel Dieu du Sacre-Coeur has received expended or approved federal assistance in the amount of $596,426; and the Montreal Neurological Institute $47,256.

In Ontario we have the outstanding epilepsy centre in Woodstock which has received federal assistance expended or approved in the amount of $149,452. In Saskatchewan we have the University hospital in Saskatoon which has received $8,713, and in British Columbia the British Columbia epilepsy society in Vancouver has received $32,406 for the employment of personnel for the operation of an epilepsy centre.

In 1953 the British government appointed a committee of inquiry on the rehabilitation, training and resettlement of disabled persons, and in 1956 they brought forward a very interesting report. On page 74 of this report there is particular mention of epileptics and it is interesting to note this statement:

> The most important finding of the report is that recent advances in medical knowledge offer much greater hope that epilepsy can be controlled, particularly if they can be made generally and readily available through an organized pattern of specialist units... This means that it should be easier in the future than in the past for an increased proportion of epileptics to live a normal life in the community, whether as schoolchildren receiving education in ordinary schools or as workers taking a normal place in open industry. Clearly this should be the objective. There must, however, be some proportion however small, who will need special provision whether for short or long periods, in the same way as other disabled persons—for example, special schools, rehabilitation units, sheltered employment, residential hostels, etc. Their needs require also the same close co-operation between the different authorities responsible for the different services which the committee has emphasized elsewhere.

The Canadian government's attitude at the present time follows this recommendation very closely, as can be seen from the considerable amounts expended or authorized already, in the medical services towards helping epileptics in their physical improvement and development, and also in different types of rehabilitation training and educational assistance for those who are definitely handicapped.

It is my very strong feeling that there are definite dangers in seeking to establish legislative authority for one group of handicapped persons, with the very possible exclusion or neglect of others, however unintentional this may be. Circumstances change from year to year, and in general there is more to be said for an approach where the provinces are free to gear their programs to the needs of their own citizens and afterwards approach the federal authorities for the necessary aid.

Rehabilitation matters are of great significance in the whole general field of social welfare. This year we have seen legislative authority provided to establish a national council of welfare to advise the government on all aspects of the welfare situation. I would hope that it will turn its attention to this area of epilepsy and all disabled persons, and make suggestions as to how and where the government's present activities can be improved. They will thereby be adding to the already valuable advice we receive from the national council of welfare, and have been receiving for many years.

This morning I had the honour to welcome on behalf of the minister the federal-provincial conference of public health nurses. This is their second conference, the first being held in February of 1961. Representatives from the provinces are gathered here in Ottawa in a very impressive group. They are experienced in and deeply concerned with this important public service. This is another avenue, it seems to me, through which we will have increasing opportunities for assisting in all health problems, including recognition of the different types of epilepsy and advice as to how and where the best treatment and rehabilitation can be obtained for them. This growth of co-operation between different branches of government in any field is encouraging, and it is most particularly encouraging in the field of public health. I believe we can expect from this conference and subsequent conferences on public health nursing an increased understanding, an increased ambition toward definite, co-operative aims which will lead to very improved methods of dealing with this problem which the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets) has rightly brought forward, and it will also include very serious consideration of the problems of all disabled Canadian people.

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time to acknowledge our indebtedness to the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets) for bringing this matter to the attention of the house. As we consider the notice of motion that is on the order paper we note that there are some particular clauses regarding which we might raise some objection and some question, but I think all of us recognize the intent of this motion and feel that the hon. member has, as I have said, made a valuable contribution in bringing it to the attention of the house.

It seems to me that in the consideration of a measure such as this there are a great many other issues that might enter into it. The parliamentary secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare has referred to some of the problems involved. In her remarks the hon. lady has pointed out the possibility of discrimination—and I use that word advisedly—if we endeavour to make legislation apply to only certain classifications of our citizens. I would prefer to consider this in its broader aspect, not only stressing the importance of consideration for those who are suffering from this particular handicap but those who are suffering from other handicaps or disabilities which make it difficult for them to fit into the picture of employment across the country.

I believe some categories of our citizens are subjected to some form of discrimination in their search for profitable employment. I think that often this discrimination results from ignorance, but there are times when it is the result of economic considerations. Those engaged in industry hesitate to employ people who are suffering from various types of handicaps or disabilities because they feel there would be an interruption in service on the part of the employees which could result in a loss of efficiency as far as their operations are concerned. I think that research has proven this fear groundless. In fact, it has often been established that those who are handicapped in some particular way more than offset that difficulty by their devotion and diligence to the tasks assigned to them, which qualities may often be lacking in those who are not handicapped.

Therefore I feel that this word of exhortation might go out not only to governments but also to private industry, not to discriminate against those who may be handicapped in this or other ways, but rather give them an opportunity to engage in profitable and productive employment to the very highest degree of their ability and qualifications. I agree with the suggestions made by the parliamentary secretary to the minister in stating that it would be very difficult to set a specific percentage to be employed by the civil service, and I would once again emphasize the fact that rather than place it in that particular context we would suggest that no discrimination be practised when it comes to a matter of the employment of employable epileptics and those who are suffering from other types of disability.

The question of the education of epileptic children is a very important consideration. Whether or not the suggestion made in clause 2 would be applicable in all circumstances is perhaps open to question. I would not be in a position to pass judgment on that particularly, except to say that I believe consideration would have to be given to individual cases and to the degree of affliction in this respect. Reference has been made to the matter of research and treatment centres. It would seem to me that this is a field into which the federal government could move in a very constructive manner. Once again the parliamentary secretary has indicated the contributions which have been made in this respect. However, I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that as far as the provision of these facilities is concerned—that is, treatment centres and so on—our suggestion relative to the use of a municipal development bank would be very useful. Through the provision of social capital through the Bank of Canada we could make a greater amount of money available for the erection of these institutions and for the facilities which are required for the effective treatment of these people.

As I have said, Mr. Speaker, I rose only to indicate support of the principle or motive incorporated in this particular measure, but I suggest there should be—as there is, I believe—a growing awareness on the part of society to bear its responsibility in assisting those who are handicapped in any way, giving them the fullest opportunity to co-operate and participate in activities and make the highest contribution possible under the circumstances. We are, as I have said, very happy to give support to the motive and principle contained in this measure.

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, we of course support the principle stated in this motion. I have not had very much experience with epileptics, although as a teacher I can tell hon. members that a great many of them do attend the ordinary schools. Of course, it depends upon the individual and the degree of the infirmity, but many of them do attend schools. The teachers are simply notified that this person is an epileptic and in most cases there is no particular problem. The affected students fit in with the school pattern well provided they are not severe cases.

I have had experience with another type of handicapped. Of course, there are mental as well as physical handicaps, and for some years I was associated with the affairs of a home for retarded children in my own constituency of Burnaby. The type of handicap is different, but the problem of obtaining employment is the same. Another factor which must be considered is the considerable burden which falls on the parents. In the last few years the associations for retarded children in all the provinces have done a great job in making governments at various levels aware of the needs of retarded children. In my own province, governments, both municipal and provincial, have responded to these needs, after considerable pressure, by providing places in local schools or by providing special schools for these children. In my own province, after a number of years of endeavour, we do now have most of the retarded children attending schools at public expense.

The associations have now moved on and are trying to do something for adults and teenagers. Sheltered workshops have been set up which these people can attend and at which they can receive the necessary technical training. After a probationary period, they receive pay. They are not doing make-work jobs but are carrying out useful tasks. When companies want particular jobs done, the sheltered workshops do them and, in turn, pay the retarded adults who are working there.

It has always seemed unfortunate to me that there has to be such a vigorous program of public education before we make a move in these matters. The pattern seems to be the same everywhere. The people affected, in many cases the parents of handicapped children, have to form an association and carry out a program of public education before they can get governments to act. I would feel better if this country and those in a position of responsibility would recognize that these problems exist and do something about them before they are forced to take action. We know very well what our health and social needs are. We do not need to be told, in many cases.

There is one other aspect of this subject to which I should like to refer. I do not think we can divorce the difficulty which handicapped adults find in obtaining employment from the general economic situation. It is difficult enough for these people to get employment at the best of times, but when there are a large number of unemployed in this country it is still more difficult for them. I hope the day will come in Canada when we have a period of full employment and even a labour shortage, because I think it will be much better for these people at that time.

We cannot get away from the fact that it is very hard indeed for them to get employment.

The parliamentary secretary—and I congratulate her on having certainly done her homework on this topic—has spoken against the idea put forward in subparagraph (1) of this resolution, that some compulsion should be applied regarding the employment of epileptics. Unfortunately, I think this would be necessary in many cases because if there were not some compulsion very few would be hired. The hon. lady did answer a number of questions on this topic and I should be pleased if before this debate is over she would answer one other question. She said that the civil service, or the government, was employing a certain number of epileptics. I should like to know, if possible, how many are at present in employment. If this question cannot be answered today, perhaps she will answer it at a later time. However, I am glad that something is being done in this connection. The hon. lady also gave us information concerning the amounts granted to the various societies in the provinces for work in this field. I noted that $32,406 was mentioned in connection with the British Columbia association. I must say in this connection that it does not seem like a very large amount. Perhaps I might have some information on this subject as well: is this a case where more money would not help solve the problem, or is it all the money that is available as a grant at this time? The parliamentary secretary has pointed out that certain things have been done, and we are very glad of that. Nevertheless, the motion which has been put forward today does serve a useful purpose. It reminds us all of this subject, and although the department may be doing something there is certainly no reason for self satisfaction. I hope it will serve as a reminder, to bring this matter to the fore and keep it in the mind of the department.

Mrs. Casselman: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. lady having sat down and concluded her speech is precluded from taking the floor again even to answer a question.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sure that in these exceptional circumstances there would be unanimous consent.

Mr. Speaker: Well, there is some time left to the hon. lady. If she wishes to answer and the house is prepared to give her the time there will be no objection.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mrs. Casselman: I am embarrassed to receive so much courtesy. I only wish to say that I do not have the answer to that question at the moment but I shall be glad to get it immediately.

Mr. S. J. Enns (Portage-Neepawa): As one who is vitally interested in the broad scheme of rehabilitation I want to send a salute to the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets) for bringing to public attention this frightening question of the problem of the epileptic. It is not confined, of course, to the epileptic alone, as has been pointed out by the hon. member who has just spoken; it is a problem which faces disabled persons generally. Somehow, however, the case of the epileptic is the most frightening because it is a shocking experience for people who are not in daily contact with epileptics to witness an epileptic seizure. It seems to me there is a terrific amount of prejudice and misunderstanding about this disease, as previous speakers have said. I myself, would question the advisability of singling out this one disability for special attention and for special legislation. However, the subject well merits discussion and deserves public attention to be focused on it. Modern society still seems to cherish some medieval ideas about this whole subject of epilepsy. The epileptic appears to suffer a double handicap; it is not only the illness itself but the prejudice and misconception surrounding it which he has to overcome before he stands a chance in the labour market. We are, of course, speaking of the employable epileptic.

I have wondered what could be done about rehabilitating other disabled persons and I was interested to hear what the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont told us about legislation in the United Kingdom parliament. I think he described it as the disabled persons employment act. I was, therefore, somewhat surprised to hear him centre his motion on the epileptic. I think he would have been better advised to have included other disabled persons as well. I think it is not feasible to guarantee employment by legislation alone. In fact, I wonder sometimes just how useful legislation can be in achieving an object which we would all agree to be desirable. Largely it is this question of public attitude which surrounds any disability. I think the hon. member has referred to the work done by the association of retarded children, just as other work has been done for people who have other afflictions. We need a public education program which will induce the public mind to consider people who are less than completely or abnormally physically endowed for various enterprises in the field of employment, education, research and so forth.

One of the difficulties about the epileptic is, I suppose, the misconception that he is often less intelligent. I think that research would certainly bear out the fact that this is no more so than in any group of population which is physically normal. There is always a spread of intelligence. Largely the lack of knowledge in the epileptic is due to the fact that he has not the opportunities of education because in some areas and in some instances he has not been accepted in the schools among normal children. As far as the section of this motion which refers to including epileptic children in ordinary schools is concerned, comments have been made about this, but I would certainly question the advisability of doing this in toto. I believe that certain epileptic children would be better helped if they were at least in special classrooms where they would have the treatment they need if and when they were subject to seizures, and where they would not be perhaps subject to ridicule or much excitement by other children, were they unfortunate enough to have a seizure. Therefore I cannot quite accept the suggestion of the hon. member in the second part of his motion that measures should be introduced to admit children into ordinary schools. I am sure that on further elucidation he would say he meant that only in certain cases would this be so. The question of legislation is still only a secondary solution. I think the broadest improvement which could benefit any disabled person is to have a greater public awareness of the needs of disabled people.

When we speak of having concern for the individual rights of people—I think this is a phrase which we have heard in more recent times—we must not forget the rights of disabled people as well. Certainly these rights are denied if they have not been given equal opportunities of education, of employment, or even given accepted places in society as healthy persons with whom to associate. Sometimes they are so much isolated that they fear to be part of the normal community even though they could well find a useful place in the community. So that really more necessary, I suggest, than education would be research and vocational training. These facilities would require, of course, substantial grants from the government, and I think they would be forthcoming if they were submitted to the appropriate legislature, which I presume in most cases would be the provincial governments.

I also think there has to be a wide program of public education which would make the average person more aware of just how much these people can really contribute to our community. I think it is a mistake if we let people just live off assistance because they are disabled. This is certainly not the answer. There is in all labour some dignity, and anyone who is working wants to know that he is doing something worth while, and that he is earning his keep. Therefore, even if it needs to be a sheltered workshop, or a specialized centre for epileptics or other disabled persons, he needs to have some satisfaction in his work.

I feel that these are areas for private agencies who have already done so much to meet various human needs in our communities and to enable them better to develop. Because private agencies have a capacity for community involvement which is much better and greater, and are much more capable than any act of parliament. That is because they are interested in epileptics and form a group, a chapter or agency to try and aid the needy epileptics. In that way you are much closer to the problem and much more vitally and personally interested; therefore, the results are much more far reaching. Of course, aid is required from government finances. However, the initiating program I suggest would be best advanced by the widening of the scope of private agencies which already exist in this field.

It is to be hoped that all levels of the community and all levels of industry will examine and re-examine their employment practices where they can, and in that manner will afford to disabled persons, including epileptics, employment possibilities. This is necessary in order that the achievement of an elemental human right is attained—that is, the right to live and work in a normal way. I feel that the hon. member has done a great service to the epileptic by introducing this resolution, and the very fact that there has been this spirited and interesting discussion will be of benefit to all these disabled persons.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker: I am very sorry but the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Pilon) had given me no indication of his wish to participate in this debate. That is why I did not recognize him sooner.

The time appointed for the consideration of private members' bills being expired, the house will revert to the business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

PROVISION FOR DEFINITION OF DUTIES, APPOINTMENT OF MEMBERS, ETC.

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill C-87, to provide for the establishment of a national economic development board—Mr. Nowlan—Mr. Paul in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

(Text):

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Laing: Mr. Chairman, at five o'clock I had completed my congratulations to the minister who is guiding this bill through the house, had made some comment upon the general condition of sterility in the bill itself and was beginning to pay some attention to the fact that one section of the bill deals with the very important consideration of paying more attention to Canada's balance of trade and trading position. It is with that particular aspect of the bill, which is designed to provide for the establishment of a national economic development board, that I want to say a few words to the committee tonight.

Last week a very important speech was made by a very important man. I refer to the speech made by Mr. R. M. Fowler which has now been published and which he has titled, "Wanted, A Trade Policy". It might well be argued that Mr. Fowler represents a definite segment of the Canadian economy but I think every member of the house will agree that he is a very well informed Canadian and a very able businessman, that his views should be listened to, and that the government of the day should profit therefrom. Inferentially he suggests that we do not have a trade policy, and he wants a trade policy. He wants a policy directed toward a definite objective for Canada today and in the future.

I think we might well profit from a consideration of the historic position of Canada in trade. In the early days of Canada and government in Canada I think there must have been a widely held opinion in this country that we could make some permanent long time arrangement with the country to the south. When that failed there emerged in its place the historic national policy of Canada and the name of Sir John A. Macdonald. Quite obviously the concept at that time was that the central provinces would manufacture goods for Canada which would be transported on transcontinental railways to areas whose raw materials would be sold, and the proceeds used to buy the manufactured products of central Canada. That policy served us in its day and we went on to other things.

In the period between the two great wars we built up in Canada the historic so-called triangle of trade. We sold great quantities of goods to the United Kingdom and became very interested in commonwealth trade, particularly the advantages given us under commonwealth agreements. We took pounds sterling which were transferable very easily into our currency to enable us to buy tremendous quantities of manufactured goods from the United States. If you study the period between the wars you will find that is the trading history of Canada in that particular period.

During the period of the second world war tremendous demands were made upon Canada in the area of things which we were able to provide and manufacture and as a result of particularly good management we came for the first time to the point where I think we could consider ourselves at least in part an industrial nation. Now we are confronted with a new set of circumstances in the world where great trading blocs are rising and where agreements are being made not between one nation and another but between blocs of nations, and I think it is time now for us to inspect again the basic, fundamental problems that we have within our own country.

I come from a province which at the present time is selling to the United States $50 million worth of goods per month or about $600 million a year. About $125 million is represented by sales of energy in the form of oil and gas. We also sell $204 million worth of lumber per year. These articles are basically raw materials which British Columbians are finding command basement bargain prices in world trade, the lowest possible prices at which any goods are sold. At the same time that we are selling $50 million worth of goods per month to the United States, according to figures which are the most accurate I could obtain from our provincial department, though I would not say they are absolutely accurate, our trade with that old historic province of New Brunswick only amounts to about three quarters of a million dollars per year. When we look askance and are worried about great trading blocs and the common market, I think we must also admit that within our own country we have failed dismally to create a common market in Canada. This, of course, is a regional matter. I know that the minister is aware of the situation because I know I am aware of it.

I want to draw his attention to the fact that from Prince George in the central interior of our province we ship about $80 million to $100 million worth of lumber per year. Historically this lumber has gone to the head of the lakes and from there largely to United States markets around Buffalo. At the present time the shippers of this lumber are faced with the Damoclean sword of a threatened 17 per cent increase in freight rates, when the lumber is already bearing an impost of $34 per thousand to reach Buffalo. I think the minister will agree with me that if the railways were suddenly granted the 17 per cent to which they claim they are entitled, and this amount was added to the cost, it would be extremely doubtful that the lumber industry there could survive, and at this time I know of no other market for that particular grade of lumber.

These are conditions within this immense industry which have arisen out of our history, out of geography, and which we have to face. I think we should face them in a spirit, not of what we hope Canada might be, not what we see in other countries, but considering the development of Canada and in the love of Canada as she is and not what we might hope she is. These are difficulties with which we are confronted and they require, I would suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, a far different attitude on the part of our federal government than we have seen in recent months and in recent years. It gets back to this, that in these matters of trade policy which Mr. Fowler is suggesting, we must seek to adopt a policy for our own country which is intelligent, honest, honourable and promises respect in the various parts of this country.

I notice that in Ontario they have a man named Macaulay, who is making certain suggestions. It may well be that for the short term period they may be of advantage to the people of Ontario. However, I doubt very much if that sort of thing is going to be of long term advantage to the people of Ontario. I am going to suggest to the minister, and I am quite sure he would agree with me, that the same condition pertains in the old, historic provinces down by the sea. This sort of policy which is implicit in what Mr. Macaulay is suggesting is not of any value to them and it is not of value to us in western Canada. As a matter of fact, I know of no one in western Canada who needs a hippopotamus, and I do not know of anyone at the moment who wants one.

I think we need to adopt a policy based upon the promise of support from the most people in Canada. We know that in western Canada there are some industries who would find it to their advantage to have complete free trade tomorrow morning. I am going to say very frankly to you that those industries in western Canada know that they cannot have free trade tomorrow morning. At the same time, they cannot stand the back-door preferences that have been brought in by the government in recent months. I am not going into the question of whether they were legal or illegal, but nevertheless there is protectionism being brought in. The minister has from time to time assured us that these protectionisms are for the short term; they are going to be removed.

I have another aspect of trade that I should like to bring forward, about which I am going to make suggestions to the minister later. I think that today we are dependent for the maintenance of the economy of Canada, to the extent of almost 30 per cent, upon our exports. I have found, in the last year for which I have figures, 1961, that of our total exports no less than 54.5 per cent went to the United States. In that same year, of our imports, no less than 67 per cent were brought in from the United States. The second most important trading nation to us is, of course, the mother country. In 1961, we sold, of our total exports, some 15.6 per cent to her and we brought back some 10.7 per cent of our total imports.

I made inquiry, too, about our trade relations that exist between Canada and the signatories of the treaty of Rome, in other words the members of the common market. I found, somewhat to my dismay, that of our total exports to those countries in 1961, only 8.4 per cent went to all the members of the common market. From them, we bought only 6.4 per cent of our total imports. When we add these figures together, both exports and imports, we realize that Canada is a north Atlantic trading nation, without any question. Our past experience having been in that direction, I think we may safely assume that our future is going to lie in that direction, too.

I have a criticism to make of the government at this time because, to the south of us, we have the President of the United States submitting to congress and successfully obtaining therefrom, legislation which was called the trade expansion act of 1962. We, on this side of the house, like to call it the trade liberalization act. This act gives to the president of the United States extraordinary powers to make agreements, not with one nation but with groups of nations such as the common market. Here, it seems to me, is a clear invitation to Canada to improve her position by making available to Canadians the export market containing 300 million people rather than the small market of 18 million people which we have at home. I think the government has been remiss because I am quite certain that this government has not pressed this matter with the President of the United States or with his secretary of commerce.

We go on attempting to purchase from the United States some $460 million to $480 million worth of goods more than we sell to them. I do not believe it should be difficult for our leaders to impress upon the President of the United States and his secretary of commerce that Canada cannot go on interminably borrowing half a billion dollars in cash down there to buy goods from them, when there is this invitation to reduce tariffs. I want to ask this government, to ask the minister, to what extent they have gone to the United States and placed Canada's position before the United States. Have they said to them, certainly, we want to equate our balance, but we want to equate our balance with you not by going on buying imports to the extent of half a billion dollars, but by asking you to reduce your tariffs to the point where we can sell half a billion dollars worth of goods to you. It would seem to me that would be the positive approach and that would be the best way of taking the furrow out of the brow of the Minister of Labour annually in the wintertime when we seem, in Canada, to come to the position where employment is related to the condition of the equinox.

I find that many of the industries in which we have exports are the resources industries largely dealing with materials in their raw state. There is a totally inadequate and unhappy amount of Canadian labour content in those things we are selling. I find that in the automobile manufacturing industry in Canada today there is almost 10 per cent of the value of the automobile that is made up of labour. This, in Canada, is a fairly high percentage. In the case of the fruit and vegetable canning industry, the labour content is 10 per cent in relation to the total value of the manufactured goods. In so far as crude petroleum and natural gas is concerned, Mr. Chairman, do you know that the labour content is only 4 per cent of the total value of the goods sold?

Now, I am not going to disparage the labour that goes into the development aspect of that industry. This represents a tremendous expenditure of money.

Mr. Nowlan: Have you got the figures for minerals?

Mr. Laing: Yes, I am coming to those. As I said, in the case of crude petroleum and natural gas, the labour content is 4 per cent. There is an enormous amount of labour employed and an enormous amount of capital expended in the search for oil. Of course, here we are dealing with the industry once the development has taken place. Then, you merely turn a series of large spigots and that is it.

We come to agricultural implements, and we find that no less than 23 per cent of the sale price of farm implements, that is from the manufacturer, is labour content. In the case of silver, lead and zinc mining industries, it is 15 per cent. In the case of pulp and paper mills it is 16 per cent. In the veneer and plywood industry 29 per cent of the sales price of the product in the plant is labour content, and here we come to the position of our industries in British Columbia doing business in the United States market. We sold nearly $204 million worth of lumber to the United States but we sold only $137,000 worth of plywood and it would seem to me that this government should take a position with the United States government by suggesting it shoud reduce the tariff on plywood to let Canada sell more plywood in that market.

I also find that in the house building industry the labour content is 34.5 per cent. These are things that make for employment in Canada, and an improvement in the quality of goods we sell abroad would have a very great effect in lessening the problems which the Minister of Labour carries, in particular at this time of the year.

My point in rising to speak in this debate is to suggest to the minister that in his department and the other various departments of government he must have available to him the same kind of intelligent advice as the bill proposes to obtain. As the bill stands it is proposed that we shall have a full time chairman and shall have not less than 14 and not more than 24 members of the board.

I think I can read into the particulars of the bill something of the idea of the wartime dollar-a-year men. I am not going to disparage the work done by the dollar-a-year men but I would remind the minister that their work was done under different conditions, when the country was passing through times of greatest danger and distress. At that time men had inclinations to do something for Canada, and I do not think the same feelings would apply to the same extent in peacetime.

I also gather from the numbers indicated that there is the idea in the minister's mind that representation must be given to the various regions of Canada. I agree entirely with this idea, but I also suggest to the minister that there has been a tremendous amount of writing, some very excellent writing, done in Canada in recent years by Canadian economists. A great variety of books have been written on Canada's economic position and I would remind the minister of some of them which, no doubt, have come to his attention.

There is the series of lectures given by Mr. Vincent Chapin, assistant director of the international trade relations branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce entitled "The Significance of Trade Obligations For Canada", a very fine set of three lectures. There is R. V. Anderson's "The Future of Canada's Export Trade"; the "U.N. Commission on International Commodity Trade"; Mr. H. E. English's book, "Canada and the New International Economy"; R. B. McPherson's book, "A re-appraisal of Canadian Trade Policies"; Gilbert Jackson's "Post-war World Trade"; and the various GATT publications dealing with Canadian trade in agricultural products. All of these are known to the minister and I ask him does he not now possess adequate civil servants capable of doing all the things suggested in this bill?

We are not opposed to the bill but I suggest that if the minister is to make it worth while he will have to add some new ideas to it in order to put some life in it. If it were possible to get a group of full time Canadian economists to serve on this advisory board, constantly digging about Canada and finding out the relationship of one part of Canada with all other parts, and the ability of one part of Canada to take an active part in a certain export field, then that is another thing, but they would have to be full time economists rather than the 24 part time men who will serve on this board.

I am certain the minister will agree that if we leave the bill unamended it provides very little but advice which he would have to examine anyway. I am quite certain there are economists employed by industries in Canada who would be quite prepared to give him their views. These views would be regional views, and probably views related to their own types of industry; but he proposes to set up something less efficient than if he were to rely on the very high grade economists now in the civil service and employed in Canada's various industries.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, I think I can do no better in this debate tonight than to have my first remarks concerned with a leading editorial which appeared in the Globe and Mail on December 8 last, and in quoting it I would like to point out I shall quote every word that is in it. Some of the words and sentences are to some extent critical of my own party, but we on this side of the house do not leave out quotations which happen to be critical of us.

Mr. Ricard: That is a low insinuation; it belongs to you.

Mr. Walker: The quotation is:

> Now that it is decided that parliament will not resume after Christmas until January 21, the belief in Ottawa is that the new budget will not come down until February at the earliest. With the precarious state of the government in the Commons, it appears possible that we shall be precipitated into a new election before any attempt is made to tackle the root causes of our economic difficulties.

In all these circumstances it is becoming increasingly difficult to escape the impression that the government is deliberately holding back on important and controversial legislation for fear of suffering a defeat in the Commons. As this newspaper has suggested before, such tactics would be a grave mistake.

The Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but, as he pointed out to the committee that he was going to quote the editorial in complete detail, I wish to say that so far as the quotation has gone it has not any application to the bill under consideration. If he would be prepared to assist me in that regard I might review the opinion I express now. We are talking about a bill to provide for the establishment of a national economic development board, and I would caution the hon. member about quoting the editorial in full because hon. members of the committee have their own opportunity to read it and no doubt most of them have read it. If he can apply certain passages that are closely related to the bill, then I shall be glad to hear him.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, this is what I was attempting to do. I had no intention of quoting the whole article. This has to do with the long term measures which were proposed by the government in the throne speech, and certainly one of the long term measures we might expect is an effective economic development board. That is how the editorial is associated with it, but if the chairman and the committee desire me not to go further into the part where it deals with some of the faults it finds with the Liberal party, then I shall be quite happy to leave that particular part out. As it says in this editorial, there is no sign yet of the long term measures, and it was in that connection I gave the quotation from this national newspaper which has not been unfriendly to the government. This is a judgment of a reputable newspaper which I believe has the interests of Canada at heart. This is an editorial expression of the kind of concern for Canada that I myself had when earlier this session I said this:

It is not only this minority Conservative government's reputation that is at stake at this time ... but there is something of much greater importance about which I want to speak, although the government's reputation has a direct bearing on this other matter, and that is the question of the confidence of Canadians in the ability of our free parliamentary democracy to supply the answers and chart the course for the great social changes that are now under way in Canada.

Then I went on to speak of the government's apparent incapacity to understand the kind of social ferment and unrest that is bubbling away under the surface of our national life and which occasionally manifests itself publicly in a number of undesirable ways. The gravest dangers to Canada's unity and economic independence lie in the months and immediate years ahead. No longer will any government be able to cap the well or hold back our people's aspirations by expedient grants, handouts or appointments in a piecemeal fashion. We are faced with a groundswell of what I think of as a frustrated Canadian spirit that yearns for greatness for our country; that calls for Canada's sympathetic and helpful identification with the emerging nations; that desires deeply the respect of our traditional friends and neighbours; that wants to believe in political morality and the courage of conviction; that is struggling toward a proud and satisfying Canadian identity in the family of nations.

This failure by the government to "understand tomorrow", to borrow Rabbi Rosenberg's phrase, is what is holding this country back. This failure to understand tomorrow is what makes possible the rise of demagogues and tyrants, or maybe we are in the grip of them already. But we must do more than understand tomorrow. A government must have policies for Canada that prove they do understand tomorrow and know what is going on, and that they are capable of leading the country forward. For instance, where is the integrated, comprehensive policy that would make the C.N.R. a useful instrument in the economic recovery of Canada's depressed areas? As my colleague from Antigonish-Guysborough pointed out in his excellent speech on Thursday, December 6:

We all know that governments over the years have been concerned with this matter, and indeed went so far as to create a royal commission to look into it. The royal commission reported that by reason of the development of competition, particularly trucking competition, in central Canada the railways are having a tough time making ends meet in the extremities of the country. Consequently they apply for permission to raise their freight rates, but this permission they use to its full extent only in those extremities. Therefore the freight rates go up in the east and the west, and they are kept down in the centre of the country by reason of the competition there.

The royal commission on transportation points out:

While we recognize the complexity of the rate structure issue, we cannot help but believe that railway resistance to the adoption of a more cost-oriented basis for ratemaking is essentially unrealistic and reflects a degree of institutional rigidity which is out of place in the transportation environment of today.

Those are the words of the royal commission on transportation, and I use this example to illustrate the ridiculous situation where a publicly owned utility, owned and paid for by the Canadian taxpayer, operates in such a way as to prejudice the growth of secondary industry in areas where such growth is of prime importance to the local taxpayer. All because of a lack of a nation-wide transportation policy we cut the economic throats of the very areas the government now says it is going to assist by setting up another board or council. I presume that this board will be working hard to counteract the penalizing policies of other boards, and all this costs money, hard earned taxpayers' money. Why spend all this money if it is not used in conjunction with a national policy designed to produce the Canada of tomorrow?

In these fast moving days we know that many airplanes—I believe we have learned this—are practically obsolete before they are off the drawing board. I submit that most of our piecemeal legislation is the same way. The basic problem is that all these bits and pieces of legislation only delay the full answer to our nation's needs because they are not connected to a national policy, and all hon. members know why. There is no national policy. There is no national policy on defence; there is no national policy on power and water resources; there is no national policy on depressed area redevelopment; there is no national policy on foreign investments in, and subsequent control of, Canadian resources and industries; there is no national policy on medical care, contributory portable pensions and other social security measures; there is no national policy on public housing.

Mr. Nesbitt: Oh, nonsense.

Mr. Walker: I repeat, there is no national policy on public housing.

An hon. Member: Don't be so stupid.

Some hon. Members: Keep on reading.

The Chairman: Order. Perhaps I should have interrupted the hon. member previously to point out that, if he was quoting his colleague from another debate that has taken place this session, he was not in order. I did not interrupt him at that time because I had already interrupted him once. I now interrupt him again just to caution him about ranging too widely in his contribution and so that he will assist me in terms of relevancy, which is what I have to look for.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, I am rapidly narrowing this down to my point.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, in case hon. gentlemen on the other side of the chamber did not hear me, I wish to repeat that there is no national policy as such on public housing. We can no longer afford the luxury of lack of long range policy. I believe the worst feature of this sad state is that it is being paid for by the sacrifice of taxpaying Canadian citizens. I might say, Mr. Chairman, that I am paying off the last of my income tax this month.

An hon. Member: Good.

Mr. Walker: That is right, it is good. We will go without things in our home in order that I may fulfil this obligation to the country. I am now saying, and the taxpayers of this country are saying: "What is the government doing with our money? We want an accounting". The people say there must be no more waste because of lack of national policy on defence, on unemployment, on depressed areas, on small business, on industrial development which we hope will be owned and controlled by Canadians.

Mr. Chairman, I served in a municipality in Ontario for a number of years, and I say that if Ontario municipalities spent tax moneys before budgets and estimates were approved by their councils they would be laying themselves open to serious charges of maladministration by the Ontario municipal board. The Tory government have leisurely but, in my view, with intent, drifted into this same serious position in connection with national expenditures of billions of dollars of taxpayers' money.

Mr. McIlraith: And they refuse to submit it to the house.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, there is no municipal board to chasten them, but there is the parliament of Canada composed of representative Canadian citizens whose legal and constitutional job is to keep an eye on how our taxes are being spent. The denial of this right is the last stage of the evasion of rights of the common man, the ordinary taxpayer, to demand an accounting of the government's use of his hard earned money.

The Chairman: Order. I have endeavoured very patiently to hear the speech of the hon. member, recognizing that there will, I expect, be opportunities when he can make a speech of the nature of the one he is now giving and remain within the rules of the house or of the committee. I hope he will co-operate with the Chair and confine himself to the bill which is under consideration.

Mr. Walker: Yes, Mr. Chairman. Will the government not now, even at this late date, trust parliament, which represents the people of this country, and bring forward national policy legislation that we can get our teeth into, that we can amend and improve, and finally pass in a co-operative effort to move Canada forward in a way our people so earnestly desire? Those who feel as I do will assist them in every way possible.

National Economic Development Board

If the government really means business, will it please now give this country an integrated over-all long range economic policy of national development which takes into account the urgent needs of municipalities and the small businessman, as well as our industrial complex. Will it please consolidate all its boards, commissions and development councils, which have been riding in six different directions at the same time, into one department of action for the economic growth of all regions of Canada, under a minister directly responsible to parliament, a minister available for questioning.

I understand that the genial but overworked Minister of Finance is to be responsible to parliament for the economic development board proposed in this measure. I am sure that the hon. senator who is charged with the responsibility of this board's work outside the House of Commons, is going to be very, very frustrated as he watches from the galleries the Minister of Finance explaining to the house what he thinks is in the mind of the hon. senator.

All the information is in. Information trips and reports have been made by the productivity council, the Canadian Labour Congress, the dominion bureau of statistics, the Bank of Canada and ever so many others. The municipal, national and international experts have all reported. Under this new act we are apparently now going to analyse the analysers. We are going to study their report on previous studies and reports. This is a waste of time and money.

The country is read for a policy of action that can save us our financial and political independence and achieve a rate of growth to lick unemployment and remove the immigration bars once more.

What is the government's reply to these auspicious circumstances? They say: "Let us run around the track once more. Let us have more studies and reports and recommendations." Can we not now move, or has our will and moral fibre deteriorated to the point where the government is biologically incapable of taking a strong firm decision on anything that requires a national policy.

The measure before us states that annual reports are to be submitted to the responsible minister three months after the close of each fiscal year. The government has all the information it requires right now to give the green light to the Minister of Finance to formulate a national development policy. Why wait any longer?

(Translation):

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, section 1 of Bill C-87 reads as follows:

This act may be cited as the National Economic Development Board Act.

[Mr. Walker.]

For the past several hours, we have been hearing the whining and laments of our Liberal friends concerning the government's inaction. We feel ourselves that the government is not so very anxious to introduce or set up in Canada means to tap our natural resources or to develop our national economy.

On the other hand, when we hear members of the Liberal party criticize the government and accuse members of a certain party of the opposition of filibuster or of obstructing the orderly conduct of the nation's business or the administration of Canada, we wonder—and rightly so, I am sure—why they did nothing when they were in power because, if they had done something, we would not find ourselves in the present situation.

Mr. Gregoire: Quite true.

An hon. Member: Twenty two years.

(Text):

Mr. Pigeon: Twenty two years.

Mr. Caouette: Twenty two years, it is a long time, Mr. Chairman.

(Translation):

People sitting on the same benches for twenty two years.

Mr. Gregoire: Not the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue).

Mr. Caouette: With the exception of the hon. member for Assiniboia, who not so long ago was sitting elsewhere.

But when we hear representatives of the Liberal party criticize the government, we wonder quite rightly, as I said before, why they did nothing during the 22 years they sat on your right.

Mr. Gregoire: Jokers, that is what they were.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, as the hon. member for Lapointe just said, they were jokers, they were incompetent—

Mr. Gregoire: It is true.

Mr. Caouette: —or ignorant.

Mr. Gregoire: Or all three.

Mr. Caouette: Well, perhaps all three—

(Text):

Mr. Fisher: All three.

(Translation):

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, we in this corner believe that there is a lot to be done, not only to establish a national economic development board, but also to develop our natural resources.

Yesterday, I attended meetings in the riding of Richelieu-Vercheres, a good solid Liberal riding for a number of years. I also was in the Shefford constituency where, in spite of a terrible storm, I met several thousand people.

I have also realized that the people of our counties, the average Canadians understand the problems, and especially their solutions, much more readily sometimes than certain members of parliament can or seem to.

In fact, when we ask the people of those constituencies: Is there in Canada a man or woman who is worrying about not being able to find tomorrow a dress, a topcoat or fur coat, a man's garment, a hat, in short, clothes, food or electric appliances? We get the following reply: Nobody stops to think about that, not even a single member of parliament.

There is only one question which comes to everybody's mind: Is our purchasing power sufficient for us to buy existing commodities in Canada, so that production in our country may be under the control of the Canadian people?

We must give more importance to the consumer than to the producer in Canada. Producers have but one problem, to sell their products. That is why a national economic development board which would encourage or control production in our country would in no way solve the problem. Members of parliament, like the rest of the people, must concern themselves with the problem of making it possible for consumers to buy the commodities manufactured by our producers or by the production complex in Canada.

Naturally, some hon. members and some economists will claim that that will bring inflation, that it is utopian, just like certain writers and economists who maintain that Social Credit is a utopia. Those who do not know what the word "utopia" means—and that includes several members of parliament—like to say: "It's a top; it's a top; it's a top."

Mr. Chairman, Social Crediters have a solution to offer to Canada. Not only do they offer an answer to Canada, but it is the true reason why we are assembled here and why the whole country should present today a united front, and act and exist as a single person.

Social Credit will not perform miracles.

Besides, the Liberals have never performed any, far from it. They created problems so that we could perform miracles afterwards.

The Conservatives have not done much more in the last few years. Social Crediters do not pretend to be supermen, but they do claim that they can bring to Canada an answer likely to arouse interest, not only within our boundaries, but also outside the country.

If this economic development board now under discussion has not yet been set up, it is through the fault of the Liberals, even though they complain—as can be seen in the press—that the government has not accomplished anything since it came into power.

All rushed forward for the onslaught. Of course one can make a few suggestions concerning the national economic development board. But what practical ideas did the Liberals put forward in answer to the Conservative program? In this instance, we see quite clearly, once more, that both parties are of the same essence, that they have the same organization, an identical platform, the same fundamental principles.

Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to detain the house any longer. If the national economic development board is important to Canada and to the hon. members, let us by all means enact the bill, create that board, and ask it to create in turn the economic conditions which will—or so Canadians hope—lay the foundation for economic development.

(Text):

Mr. Webster: Mr. Chairman, this discussion has proceeded for some considerable time, but there are one or two things I want to say on behalf of the New Democratic party. There has certainly been widespread interest in the bill we are considering at the present moment to establish a national economic development board. The reason is that people are asking, is it possible to manage and direct the development of our Canadian economy so as to correct the weaknesses which have been apparent for many years to anyone with eyes to see and ears to hear? The bill might very well be called "Great Expectations", because I suggest that people are expecting great things from it. But they will be disappointed and disillusioned unless the government is wise enough to accept many of the carefully considered amendments which will be proposed by my colleagues in this corner of the house.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the success of this bill will depend on at least four things: first, an understanding of the problems to be solved; second, the sincerity of the government in promoting the concept of modern planning; third, the composition and competence of the board to be appointed; fourth, and probably the most important of all, the courage to implement the recommendations of the board both in the public and the private areas of our economy.

The week before this session opened last September there was an editorial in Maclean's magazine by Peter Newman, one of the most experienced and respected commentators in the newspaper field in Canada. Now, sir, I am not going to read the whole editorial, but I do crave your indulgence to read a few paragraphs which deal directly with the problem that is before us this evening. After referring to the stopgap measures adopted by this government last summer Mr. Newman continued as follows:

> The cardinal task facing us now is to correct this flabby approach to economic problems. We need, first, a measure of economic planning to bring direction and purpose to the management of the nation's affairs. Economic planning in one form or another is the means by which the western European democracies have outdistanced us economically. Administrators in Washington are using—under other names—many of the methods that together make up economic planning. Ottawa is not; but sooner or later Ottawa is going to have to start...
> The vital first step in the intellectual reorientation the new economic climate demands is to throw off the tyranny of words. In the past the phrase "economic planning" has been damned as socialistic doctrine—

Mr. Chairman, I recall, as has already been mentioned in this debate, that in introducing this legislation the Minister of Finance very carefully, but I think very foolishly, avoided using the word "planning" at any time. May I continue:

> A planned economy does not signify state control. Rather, it is the deliberate use of those methods that can encourage government, industry and labour to co-operate voluntarily—
> Until recently, most economists tended to recognize only two earlier models: the totalitarian model of Russia, and the unrestricted free enterprise model of the United States. But as Robert Fowler—to whom reference has already been made by the hon. member for Vancouver South this evening—

> —the enlightened executive who heads the Canadian Pulp and Paper Association has recently been pointing out, the experience of Europe now offers us a third alternative: the choice of a free but planned economy. "To adapt this to Canada," Fowler admits, "will require profound changes in our attitudes and our laws... but it may offer the best chance of restoring rapid economic growth in this country, and a chance of achieving a distinctive national identity."

Briefly, sir, may I indicate a number of factors which merit consideration in setting up this board. First, the final purpose must be to assure the development and use of our material and human resources to the highest degree possible in the service of people here and elsewhere. Second, both private and public sectors of the economy must play a part in any effective plan. Third, long range objectives should be established as this is not intended to meet a temporary emergency. It will be a continuing process. Fourth, the whole of Canada must be involved, not just a few isolated areas that may be particularly in difficulty at the present time. Fifth, the best available personnel should be engaged. During the war the late C. D. Howe did this successfully to prepare Canada for its war contribution. Surely we can do as well in peacetime. Sixth, co-operation of all sections of the community will be the key to the eventual success of this legislation. I am thinking at this point not just of industry, labour and government but of people generally.

I submit that if the board that will be appointed and which will be responsible for this legislation is wise it will consider the importance of this factor, that working people of all kinds need to participate more in our Canadian democracy. We need men and women from management and the unions and the civil service certainly but also from the universities, consumer groups and citizen organizations across the country.

In this age of bigness ordinary people become divorced from the end product, the results of their labours. Not only in the interests of democracy but in the interest of good mental health men and women need to be consulted more and trusted more in the management of the country's affairs. After all, this is their business. Given an opportunity to participate, Canadians would respond to a peacetime adventure of this kind with the same spirit that has always characterized our people whenever they have faced challenging problems ever since confederation, almost 100 years ago.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to take any part in this debate on the first clause of the bill and I would not be doing so except for one of those meteoric interventions that we have from time to time when the hon. member for Villeneuve condescends to visit the chamber briefly. I did not feel I could allow some of the things he said to pass in silence and it is only to reply to one or two of them that I have risen to speak.

The hon. gentleman expressed a view with which we are certainly in agreement, and that was that the government was very slow in getting down to any kind of business. But then he went on to deny the Liberal party any right to criticize the government because we had been 22 years in office some years ago. We were in office for 22 years because the Canadian people wanted us, but apparently, in his view, we are for all time to be stopped from saying anything in the parliament of this country. No doubt that is the conception of democracy of the hon. member for Villeneuve but it is not mine.

I simply wish to suggest to you, sir, that there is every reason on earth why the Liberals should criticize the dilatory conduct of the government. For the 400,000 unemployed, looking for jobs, which has been the average in this country since the election of 1958, taking one month with another the whole year round, the last five years have seemed a lot longer than the previous 22. I suggest to the hon. member for Villeneuve that the reason he was able to get elected in 1962 was that we had then had four of those five years with a Tory government and had had unemployment and the discontent which it fed. I suggest that if there had been the kind of full employment that existed up until June of 1957 the hon. member for Villeneuve and his friends would not be here at all.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: Everybody knows that. Everybody knows that they have cultivated misery and that that is their sole and whole stock in trade. Unfortunately and unhappily there has been misery for the last four and now nearly five years for them to cultivate, because of the failure of the government to keep the Canadian economy in a state which employs all our people.

Mr. Ricard: You never had full employment.

Mr. Pickersgill: The figures have been put on the record many times and I am not going to put them on tonight, but I will use an illustration that I think is the best that can be used. In the last year that the country had a Liberal government a quarter of a million strangers came to live in Canada and all those who wanted jobs found jobs.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: Also, all young Canadians who wanted jobs in that year found jobs too.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, hon. gentlemen do not want to let me speak.

Mr. Ricard: You can speak all you like. You are saying nothing at all.

Mr. Pickersgill: They are seeking to shout me down—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Ricard: Speak all you want. You are not saying very much anyway.

Mr. Pickersgill: —because they do not like to hear the truth.

Mr. Ricard: More people are working than ever before.

Mr. Pickersgill: But I do not think they will find me as easy to discourage as they found their leader was recently. I was saying, sir, when I was interrupted by the whip, whose function is something other than to create a disturbance in the house, that in the last year we had a Liberal government this country was able to absorb a quarter of a million immigrants—

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: —and in addition all our young people were able to find employment. In 1956 and 1957 no one in this country had to look long for a job.

An hon. Member: Why did they kick you out?

Mr. Pickersgill: Somebody said, "why did they kick you out". I will tell the hon. gentleman precisely, because we had been there for 22 years—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am very interested in the remarks of the hon. member but I would suggest to him that they must have relevancy to the bill. I am sure the hon. member will try to bring his remarks back to the bill we are discussing because at the present time he is very far from the subject of the bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I am dealing precisely and explicitly with the remarks made by the hon. member for Villeneuve and I claim the same right to speak as the hon. member for Villeneuve, notwithstanding the fact that, unlike the hon. member, I am no friend of the government.

Mr. Ricard: We choose our friends.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member for Villeneuve would deny us the right to speak because conditions, he said—he was allowed to say this and was not interrupted by the Chair—were just as bad—

Mr. Ricard: This is very low of you.

Mr. Pickersgill: —circumstances were just as bad when we were in office as they are now. If he was permitted to say that I suggest, sir, that you would not wish, because you have always been fair in the Chair, to deny me the right to reply, and that is all I am doing.

I repeat that the difference is very plain. I will tell hon. gentlemen why it was. Just a few minutes ago the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway commended the late Mr. C. D. Howe for the planning he did for Canada during the war. He could just as well have gone on to commend Mr. Howe and his colleagues, and I was not one of them, for the planning that they did at the end of the war. The white paper on unemployment forecast policies, maintained for 12 years, from 1945 to 1957, resulting in the highest level of employment that we have ever known in Canada. This enabled the population of this country to rise more rapidly than it had ever risen before at any stage in our history. It enabled us to open our doors to millions of immigrants who were able to come here and make their living.

What has happened in the last two years in connection with immigration? More Canadians have left Canada, I am unhappy to say but it is true, to find jobs in other countries than strangers have come to Canada looking for work. This is the difference. I can tell the hon. gentleman who talks about "le pouvoir d'achat" that we would have no trouble in maintaining "le pouvoir d'achat" if we had our people working and earning wages. This is the way to have purchasing power, to keep your people working and earning wages.

This, I may say, was the policy that was laid down at the end of the war by the Mackenzie King government of that day. This was the policy that was followed for 12 years, and for 12 years we had full employment in this country. For the last five years the average unemployment, one month with another, has been over 400,000.

Now, that is the difference. Those are the facts and they have no relation to the fictions to which we are treated from time to time by the hon. member for Villeneuve and those who live in the world of fantasy which that hon. gentleman has created. It seems to me, sir, that it is about time we stopped talking a lot of nonsense—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: I said I thought it was time we stopped talking a lot of nonsense about—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: I repeat that I will not be discouraged as easily as the hon. gentlemen's leader was the other day, no matter how much disturbance they choose to create. It is time we stopped talking, and listening to, a lot of nonsense about—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: —some magical formula which will solve all our problems without any kind of planning or any kind of organization, which the hon. gentlemen in the Social Credit group seem to think they have discovered. As a matter of fact, as far as I can discover, all they have discovered is a way in which to keep in office a government which only 37 per cent of the voters wanted in office.

I suggest, sir, that it is, and it always has been, difficult ever since 1867 to maintain a viable, dynamic, growing economy in this country. It has always required planning. It has never resulted from the operation of simple laissez faire; never at any time, and whenever any attempt has been made to leave it to the so-called natural forces, the economy has flagged. So far as I can see, that has been true in the nineteenth century and in the twentieth century as well. It is true, and we have never pretended to the contrary, that plans were made at the end of the war. Plans were made for the transformation of the Canadian economy from a wartime to a peacetime basis. We had a formidable task at that time. There were one million men and women under arms and there were another million working in munitions plants. Hon. gentlemen will recall, some who have been here a long time like the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, that he and his friends expected a depression at that time. I suggest that one of the principal reasons there was not a depression was precisely because there was intelligent, broad planning of the kind that was carried on at that time by the government of that day.

This is precisely what this country needs now, and it is precisely what we recommended in the last election campaign. I could read from the program that we put forward. I remember the scorn that was poured upon these proposals of ours, particularly by the Minister of Labour. We have had these statements brought up before in this debate, and I am not going to repeat them. The minister will recall, himself, how he dismissed all this planning. Then, we remember the Prime Minister, in one of those airy-fairy speeches of his—you know, with that extraordinary comprehension of the economy which he has—talking about the great struggle being a struggle between free enterprise and socialism. This, of course, is a lot of nineteenth century nonsense that no one living in the twentieth century—I was almost going to say living in the real world—would be talking about now.

Mr. Martineau: A debt free money world.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, the hon. gentleman can go over and chat with his friends about that. The Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys would not even be in the government if it was not for the debt free boys keeping him there.

If I may come back to my point, it is a very simple one. We do need planning. This bill, and any blueprint the government has so far given for this council, I suggest is a sham. I suggest the government has no intention of having this board work. They feel that, as a result of the last election and the 37 per cent of the votes they got for their method of running the economy—

Mr. Bigg: How many did you get?

Mr. Pickersgill: We got 37 per cent as well, and a little bit more. As the Leader of the Opposition said, in the last election the people did not decide what government they wanted. They gave an emphatic verdict on what they did not want. I can also say that if hon. gentlemen opposite will give the people a chance it won't take them long to decide what they do want now, after the exhibition we have had for the last nine months.

In so far as this bill is concerned, I say it is difficult to believe a government containing the Prime Minister and the Minister of Labour, considering the views they expressed about any form of planning before the last election, would have any serious intention of allowing this board to work. I do not believe there has been any genuine conversion of these people. It is just another gimmick, another Diefenbaker gimmick, to try to fool the people once more. I do not think, sir, it is going to work.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to speak on the first clause until all hon. members had spoken, but having listened to the political claptrap to which we have been exposed for the last 15 minutes I think I should say something at this time.

My only regret is that all the people of Canada could not have been sitting in the galleries here tonight. They would have witnessed a spectacle of political irresponsibility the like of which this parliament has not seen for many many months.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could I ask the minister a question?

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, I have disagreement with my friends in the far corner of the house with respect to their ideas of planning, but they have contributed an intelligent discussion with respect to planning from their own point of view, and I respect them for it. Indeed the great majority of hon. members of the house have done likewise. The hon. member for Vancouver South tonight gave us a contribution with respect to problems affecting his province, problems which this board might be asked to deal with, but here we have just been exposed to a political diatribe the like of which you would not hear in the backwoods of any constituency in any place in Canada, and here we are dealing with a matter of importance. We are dealing with a matter which all hon. members have said they agree on and think is necessary. They agree it is something with which we have to deal, and yet we have to indulge in a partisan diatribe such as transpired tonight.

All it goes to prove is that there is a split in the Liberal party between those who want to play partisan politics come hell or high water and those who are prepared to give us a chance to go ahead with the country's business, and I think my friend from Bonavista-Twillingate is certainly the leader of that rebel group.

When he was speaking I was fearful of the fact that he might have a stroke. I am glad he has his doctor in attendance here because if he indulged for very long in pyrotechnics such as tonight we would have a casualty on our hands and that, from a personal standpoint, I would regret very much.

Mr. Pickersgill: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Finance has made a dastardly attack on my health. I assure you, sir, my health is excellent. I have never been in better health. In fact I would challenge the Prime Minister to push-ups any time.

Mr. Starr: Your arms are not long enough to get you off the floor.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, if I were as partisan minded as my hon. friend from Bonavista-Twillingate I would regret that my diagnosis had been wrong, but as a personal friend I am glad to know his physical strength is much greater than his mental stability.

This debate has gone on for some considerable time and as I said, on the whole—and I emphasize on the whole with one or two noticeable exceptions, some of which we have seen tonight—it has been orderly and constructive. I appreciate the manner in which hon. members from all parties participated, despite the fact that we have varying points of view in looking upon the problem. Like everyone else, everyone is for virtue and everyone is against sin, but when it comes to describe what is virtue and what is sin sometimes there are differences of opinion.

Sometimes we have hon. members saying we should have planning of a mandatory nature, and that term is more than suggestive and more than indicative; but our friends in the New Democratic party have expressed that point of view, have expressed it forcefully, and from their own point of view have expressed it very well. It will not surprise them at all when I tell them I disagree with the point of view they express because it is not reconcilable with a free economy, and so far as the government is concerned we believe in that system despite the fact that in historical connotations and in our growth there have been some limitations on the development of the nation in a free enterprise system.

Some hon. members have said that the board is inadequate. There have been suggestions that the board is going to consist of only one man. Other inferences have been drawn, I think honestly drawn, and as we go on to deal with the clauses I shall deal with them in greater length.

The chairman is to be a full time chairman and a varying number has been set for the members. They are not frozen into a compact group. In fact there is a certain amount of elasticity whereby within this number we can have a board representative of industry, agriculture and all the various groups in this great nation. It is true membership is of a voluntary nature. Members will be paid their expenses. They will not be paid salaries per se; but, Mr. Chairman, you will notice that under clause 16 the board may appoint such officers as it requires and these will not be employed through the civil service commission. They will be appointed by the board and they will be paid such salaries as the board shall determine.

There is no question as to why that provision has been included. I may say I expect to be here when this bill is implemented, and if this provision carries I hope we will attract to the board the very best brains obtainable in Canada for its service, regardless of politics and regardless of anything else. With all due respect I might as well face this problem frankly. If we limit this board to retaining employees under the civil service commission then I point out that the statutory salaries which are fixed will apply and the statutory competitions must be held.

I have had something to do with the drafting of this bill and I resent any inferences to gray eminences. Any gray eminence who exists, when he found out about this board he found out about it from me. That is the first he heard about it and I am determined, so long as I am Minister of Finance and so long as I have responsibility for handling this bill, or act when it becomes statutory legislation, that we will have a group of employees, servants—call them what you will—associated with the board—

Mr. Pickersgill: Bureaucrats.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

Mr. Nowlan: They will not be bureaucrats, I can assure you on that. We inherited a lot of bureaucrats and bureaucrats have their place, and I must say they are right there.

Somebody said "You have enough men now to advise you." That is true in the civil service. We have, I suggest, as able a group of men and women in the upper echelons of the civil service as any country in the world, and I pay tribute to them; but they are very, very limited in number and the problems are very, very many. Virtually all of them in the civil service are saddled with responsibilities of administration, departmental administration and day to day problems. They can deal with those day to day problems and they deal with them effectively, certainly to my satisfaction and the satisfaction of my colleagues. Though we all make mistakes, on the whole they deal with their work reasonably well; but when it comes to the long term problems they just have not the time to give their attention to those problems. Certainly hon. gentlemen opposite who have experience in administration know the problems they are confronted with from day to day. Our senior civil servants are not in the position to deal with these long range problems as they should. When some of us—shall I say, "when I" looked over the situation and I realized the long term problems that had to be solved, and I realized the problem of the balance of payments, I realized that we had to have a group associated with this government; not, as the hon. member for Davenport said the other night, a wing or part of the Department of Finance. It will not be a part of the Department of Finance. It will be an independent board entirely, reporting to the Minister of Finance, whoever he happens to be at the moment, but it will be no more a part of the Department of Finance than is the tariff board or any similar body. It will be an independent board to which we hope to invite in a voluntary capacity the leaders of business, agriculture and labour, with all the groups in this country sitting around. Somebody said it would be a cocktail party. That was said by my genial friend down to the right, with his brilliant tongue but not always the logical reasoning that one would expect from him. He is the one who referred to this board as being a cocktail party. I am told, without any great knowledge of it, Mr. Chairman, that sometimes good things emanate even from cocktail parties. But certainly it is not a cocktail party that is going to determine the work of this board. There will be groups associated with it comprising, I hope—as I have said—the very best brains this country can produce, men and women in economics and finance and experienced in the various problems with which we are confronted. We are also asking the universities to help. We are asking them to solve certain problems by delegating to them, or some industrial research group, certain problems.

There are no other problems, Mr. Chairman. This country and this parliament needs the support of all parties here to make sure that the type of men and women we invite to come to this board, the type of men and women the board after it is appointed will retain and ask to take employment here, will be of the calibre that the nation needs. In the face of this we have picayune, partisan criticism such as has emanated from two or three speeches, and only two or three, to the effect that it is going to be very difficult to get the men and women that I hope will be attracted to this board and who I believe can be attracted to the board if this parliament deals with the bill as I suggested, with all respect, it should be dealt with.

I am not going to go into all the criticisms which have been uttered by various hon. members during the debate. As I said, Mr. Chairman, I think most of them have been on a very high level. One could spend a great deal of time dealing with them, but I would hope this committee could see its way clear at least to pass clause 1 this evening in order to get off the first clause, and then we will deal with the details of the other clauses as time goes on.

I have notes of all the comments of every hon. member except those who have spoken this evening. I did not have the time to make notes of what was said in those speeches this evening. The hon. member for Coast-Capilano said that the board should report to a committee of three ministers. I do not think anyone expects a board to report to a group of ministers. It must report to somebody who is responsible for it, and there certainly is no difficulty in the world about setting up—as my hon. friend for Bonavista-Twillingate and others who have been in government know—a committee of the ministry to deal with specific problems as they develop.

The hon. member for Red Deer made an address earlier in the debate, I think when we were at the resolution stage, in which he suggested that a great deal of this work should have been delegated to the productivity council, and we did not need this board at all. That is an argument which he advanced and I think there are others who perhaps share his view. I would point out to the hon. member that the United Kingdom has had a productivity council for many years and it has done very, very good work, as has the productivity council in this country. But in the United Kingdom two years ago they also set up what is popularly called Neddy, the national economic development—I do not know what that last initial stands for—

An hon. Member: "Council".

Mr. Nowlan: —but it is roughly parallel to the national economic development board which we are now setting up.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, might I rise on a point of order. I would correct the Minister of Finance when he says that I suggested the productivity council should take over the work of this proposed economic development board. That is not what I said. I said the two bodies should be co-ordinated together and the productivity council should be enlarged, so that the full scope and purpose laid down for this board could be fulfilled.

Mr. Nowlan: Well, Mr. Chairman, east is east and west is west, and never the twain shall meet. Apparently the hon. member for Red Deer wants to incorporate the two groups. We are following the example set by the United Kingdom in setting up a national economic development board which will work very, very closely in co-operation with the productivity council. A great deal has been said with respect to planning. Some of it has been said by our friends in the New Democratic party. My hon. friend from Essex East and others have referred to the great development that has taken place in western Europe. They referred to France as an example, Sweden and other countries. Certainly we in this country who study these matters would be the first to admit that they have made tremendous advances and tremendous development has taken place. However, I would suggest that this committee must not overlook the constitutional problems with which we are faced; the fact that this is a federal state, that we have provinces and are not a unitary state, that property and civil rights impinge upon trade and commerce and there are always constitutional problems which do not apply to unitary states such as —I am not sure of the constitutional developments of all the European countries and I do not want to be caught out in this connection, but I would suggest France, Sweden, Belgium, Switzerland and the United Kingdom. Also, we certainly have not the government control or the intervention of the state in this country; and, with all due respect to my hon. friends in the far corner, I do not expect we will have such control for some time such as there is in France, Sweden and other European countries.

We are developing here a pattern which is somewhat different from that which is applied in western Europe. I think it is closely analogous to that which applies in the United Kingdom and it is one which I think will result in a great deal of development and planning in this country. It is easy to say, "Ah, it is only a shell, only an empty gesture. It does not mean anything at all". Those comments can be made and have been made to some extent during this debate. I disagree with them positively and absolutely. As I said earlier, I know what is the concept of planning, not the mandatory planning that some would have, but the long range planning which I and my colleagues had in mind when we asked this parliament to set up this board. It is far from perfect. No organization can be perfect and no organization will be perfect. It is going to face difficulties, of course. There are many problems which we have to face. There are problems such as the hon. member for Vancouver South referred to this evening. There is this problem, for instance. My hon. friend from Vancouver South said, "Well, after all President Kennedy now has his long term trading bill. Why do you not approach him and enter trade negotiations? Why do you not arrange for reciprocal trade or break down the barriers between our country and the United States?" That, of course, is an argument which has been advanced before and it is one worthy of comment. But certainly President Kennedy made it abundantly clear, I hope, that any concessions that he makes so far as tariffs are concerned are going to be on the most favoured nation basis, and when he makes reductions they are going to apply to all the nations that come into the most favoured nation tariffs. Much as we have pride in Canada and admire our friends in the United States, I would think that if the hon. member for Vancouver South were in charge of tariff negotiations for the United States he might hesitate in making too many concessions to Canada. I know they would apply to the whole world, but they still have to trade and negotiate with the United Kingdom. These matters however to a large extent depend upon a certain gentleman across the channel, as to whether the United Kingdom enters the common market and whether they deal with the United Kingdom or the common market countries generally. There are, of course, problems confronting us, and that is one. We have the balance of payments situation. We have the tariff negotiations. We have all these things to which hon. members have referred. I suggest that having had a debate which has gone on, now, for some days—and I am glad it has, because it has been, as I said, a very good debate—perhaps we could proceed. I understand there are to be some suggestions made, some amendments which hon. members would like to move. I should like to hear these proposals and give careful consideration to them. There is, on our part, no fixation with regard to this measure. There is nothing in this on which we stand or fall, come what may. It is a bill which has been drafted and to which consideration has been given by many people.

I am prepared to listen to any argument which may be put forward from time to time and, if I can see my way clear, to accept it if it does not involve the principle upon which the bill is based. I know of one proposal which is coming forward. It is a proposal I should like to debate strongly, because I think the type of man we should bring in has to be assured of relative continuity of employment, and this assurance cannot be given if he is only appointed for a short term. But that is another matter, and, as I say, I hope the committee can see its way to make progress before it rises at ten o'clock.

We read in the papers from time to time that this parliament may not be here for very long—that there may be an election. There are various predictions made which, perhaps, are products of the imagination. Nevertheless, these are considerations which we should have in mind. Therefore I should like to see this clause passed so that we may go on tomorrow and make further progress. So, if in its wisdom parliament decides that there should be other issues resolved in another form, we should at least have this bill through and begin acquiring the personnel to man the board. I can assure this committee that when the announcement of the appointment is made by this government we shall hear from all sides that we have chosen wisely and well. I am sure that this would also be true if another government were making the appointment. Unless such a choice can be made, a choice will not be made. That is why I should like to have this clause agreed to, and deal with it.

Mr. Teillet: I had hoped that my remarks, which will not be unduly extended, would have been delivered some time before this. However, even though they follow the lengthy observations which we have just heard from the minister, I hope I can conclude before ten o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Oh.

Mr. Teillet: Well, hon. gentlemen opposite have treated me this way since I came here. I have no complaints, but they must accept the same thing in return. One point which arises out of the minister's remarks is this —and I have no doubt he meant what he said when he told the committee he was prepared to accept suggestions made to him. If that should be the case, I think the government might well consider the appointment of a minister for economic planning. I would certainly have no objection to such a move.

The second comment I wish to make—and this, again, arises from the minister's observations—is that the theory of the Conservative party's divine right not to be criticized is not accepted by this side of the house. Moreover, the theory they are trying to spread throughout this country, that any criticism of the Conservative government—

Mr. Grafftey: You are just boycotting the nation's business.

Mr. Teillet: The usual remarks from the other side. I was insolently spoken to by the Prime Minister when I first came into this house and I do not expect anything less from his henchmen. However, I do have one idea I want to discuss and I insist I do so very seriously. In the bill we find under duties and powers a clause which reads:

> The achievement of the highest possible level of efficient production and employment so as to ensure the raising of standards of living in all parts of Canada.

That phrase "in all parts of Canada" is the matter I propose to deal with this evening.

I could preface these remarks in no better terms than those used by my colleague from Toronto Davenport on November 29 as reported in Hansard on page 2147.

These were the third and fourth points he made.

> Third, this council should be concerned not only with analysing economic trends; it should also have as one of its main functions responsibility for working out solutions to our basic problems in practical terms. This means that the council should translate a good rate of economic growth into targets for each of the principal industries of the country; and in doing this it would be necessary to take into account regional problems and regional points of view. Fourth, the council should point the fact out to the government if it appears that any of the government's policies are in conflict with one another, as recently they have so often been, and it should be its responsibility to suggest how these conflicts might be reconciled.

Mr. McGrath: Why not table it as read?

Mr. Teillet: If hon. gentlemen opposite want to interrupt, my remarks will take that much more time. It is entirely up to them. I intend to have my say whether they like it or not.

I want to develop that idea a little further. In a country such as ours, national goals should not be set without due regard for the development of each region in Canada. This means, in effect, that planning will and must require a regional as well as a national approach. If we look at our geographical areas and go back to our historical methods we shall see clearly the great need of the regional approach. Our national concerns, by which I mean our business enterprises, our national business organizations, whether they be public or private, may at times make decisions which in their minds appear to be sound economics. But too often these decisions, even when they are correct in a narrow economic sense for a particular industry, result in a harmful dislocation in a particular region. In the end this can only work to the detriment of the national interest. The best example, of course, is our national communication system but there are other industries which have advanced the argument of economics as justification for concentrating in one area or another. In many cases it is doubtful if there really was justification for this concentration. The Trans-Canada Air Lines case is one instance of this. The transfer from east to west was based on the advantages of more economic operation, we are told. This is at least questionable in this particular case if all facts are taken into consideration—the piecemeal moves, the additional competition of air lines, the day to day decisions taken without regard for over-all effect. When all these things are taken into consideration it is doubtful if the regional development or, indeed, the national interest have been well served by this move. Many of us contend they have not. A shift seems to have taken place from decentralization in recent times. I cannot express it better than did my colleague from Toronto Davenport whom I quoted earlier.

As far as our western problems are concerned, we have reached a stage where much thought and study is required. Matters have reached a point at which a complete re-examination of our financial and economic position within confederation is needed. The application of the Rowell-Sirois commission recommendations served well in their time. But when it came to the time where adjustments were required the present government saw fit simply to scrap them. This needs to be taken up again. Such a council as proposed here should be able to work with such other bodies as are established from time to time for the purpose of re-examining our constitutional or other relationships. This is not said lightly. We have had dislocations in the past and we may well have them again. Western Canada cannot long continue to expend its efforts to develop its industries only to find that almost as soon as they are developed and established they are whisked from under their nose for establishment elsewhere. Our trade and economic structures have long been designed to work in favour of the more industrialized centres. This is the kind of problem, among others, which a council of this nature should be designed to solve.

Industrial development, economic growth and expanding trade should be viewed and encouraged so as to provide benefit to all regions of our country. If our national life is to be maintained in a healthy, vigorous condition we must make sure that our maritime as well as our prairie provinces share in our objective of an ever-rising standard of living, and I suggest the minister has a great deal of knowledge of that question.

The exploitation of the tremendous wealth of our western provinces is not developing at a pace consistent with our capabilities because we are handicapped in so many ways. Population is one, the tendency to centralization of many of our major industries, both private and public, is another. This requires the setting of regional as well as national goals, and national goals should be adjusted to benefit regional development. The establishment of large concerns in the industrial east, often behind tariff protection, should not be permitted adversely to affect regional industries, in some cases even to destroy them. This has too often been the case. We are not here pleading for special privileges but only for an opportunity to develop at the same rate as the country as a whole.

A national economic development board, with this kind of objective and with the means at its disposal to plan, to analyse and to recommend forcibly, can and should be an instrument for a really great step forward and for sustained progress in our economic life.

Mr. McGrath: Would the hon. member identify what he is reading from?

Mr. Teillet: I am reading from notes. Again, I do expect these interruptions, but I do not take exception to them. I am reading rapidly from my notes, because, as I said earlier, the minister's reply delayed me and I want to get through before ten o'clock. But this does mean, particularly in the public sector of the economy, but also to some measure in all major industry, that the pure economic fact is not the dominant objective; the over-all objective must be the national interest.

Mr. Chairman, I am going to take another minute or two to deal with the objections and cat-calls from the other side. I have attempted here to deal with this matter very seriously, because I believe that this suggestion is one which cannot be overstated. This matter of regional development does not seem to suit hon. gentlemen opposite, who must carry on in their normal manner, which means that the sacred Conservative party must not be criticized, and that any new member coming into this house must be insulted. I take this and accept it. But I would suggest to them, however, that when we on this side get on our feet they must be prepared to accept criticism whether they like it or not. I do want to put that to you, Mr. Chairman. This is not the last time, either in this parliament or in the next, which may not be too long off, when you will hear me being very critical of the attitude not only of the treasury benches but also of some of the backbenchers on the other side of this house.

(Translation):

Mr. Lamoureux: Mr. Chairman, I hope the house will allow me to make a few brief remarks on the bill before us.

In the speech from the throne at the opening of parliament, we had the privilege of learning that the government was committed to bring before the house a program of legislation meant in part to stimulate the Canadian economy and to maintain a high level of employment.

The national economic development board, and this will come as a surprise to many, since the Conservative party have traditionally held that the idea of a planned economy was dangerous.

During the course of this debate, we have been reminded of the heated opposition raised by the supporters of this government when a similar bill was submitted to the house some years ago. Such a change of heart is not easily explained. There can be only one conclusion and it is that the government, having failed to solve Canada's economic problems through policies originating from within, must now rely on a solution suggested by the Liberal opposition. Of course, Mr. Chairman, I would not like to give the impression that I find fault with a government borrowing suggestions from other political parties for its legislation if they can be a real contribution to the welfare of the nation. If, after opposing a project because it was based on planning, the government decides today to reverse its policy and to sponsor an absolutely similar project, we must welcome that.

In fact, I find a little ridiculous the prudish reserve with which some people will approach the word or the idea of planning. In a country such as ours, where the government interferes in almost all fields of national activities, where almost one third of all revenues are handed back to the government in the form of taxes, where the government has taken under its control a large part of the production and consumption system, how could it be possible to solve the inevitable problems of such a complex economy without planning through state intervention?

If a charge is to be laid against the government, it is for not having set up this development board a long time ago. It is obvious that in order to ensure the rational and fair development of the whole country, guidance must come from the central authority.

One of the most loathesome aspects of the present unemployment crisis in Canada is the fact that this social evil seriously affects some regions of the country, whereas in others there is almost full employment and a measure of prosperity. That is where guided development could help the regions hardest hit by unemployment and business stagnation.

(Text):

Mr. Chairman, may I call it ten o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It being ten o'clock shall I rise, report progress, and request leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause 1 stands.

Progress reported.

Business of the House

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair, I wonder whether the house leader could give us an indication of what business the government will be bringing forward for the rest of the week?

Mr. Churchill: The business for tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, will be the continuation of the program which I announced on Friday night, namely this bill, followed by the Freight Rates Reduction Act measure, followed by the national productivity council.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if I could ask the minister whether he could give us an assurance that during the course of the week the external affairs estimates would be called, so that we can debate the repudiation by the Minister of National Defence of the Prime Minister?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is not a debate.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am asking for an assurance about the spending program of this government.

Mr. Speaker: Order; no comments.

It being two minutes after ten o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. KNOWLES—REFUSAL OF PERMISSION TO ATTEND WITH DELEGATION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. There appeared in this building this morning a delegation headed by the government of my province of Manitoba, with which were associated other organizations representing the citizens of my province. As a citizen of Manitoba and as a representative of hundreds of people affected by the matter concerning which this delegation came to Ottawa, I wished to associate myself with it, but I was barred from entry to the room where this delegation was making its presentation. In addition I know that the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Chown), the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Teillet) and perhaps others were also barred. I protest against this action.

(Translation):

Mr. R. J. Teillet (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I wish to support that protest.

It seems to me that, in such a case, where an important delegation from Manitoba came here this morning and submitted a brief to the ministers of the crown, without the elected representatives of Manitoba being given the opportunity to be present and to assist that delegation, it is fitting that I join with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) in protesting against such an action.

(Text):

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the delegation led by the cabinet minister from Manitoba and supported by representatives from a great many organized bodies in Manitoba appeared this morning to present, to representatives of the cabinet, a brief on behalf of persons concerned with the problem connected with T.C.A. in the province of Manitoba.

This is only one of hundreds of delegations that have appeared here over the years to make presentations to the cabinet, or to representatives of the cabinet, and the custom and practice has always been to hold these meetings in camera.

Mr. Knowles: That is not true.

Mr. Churchill: In this particular instance the Manitoba members were notified that if they would appear at 11 o'clock they would have an opportunity to meet with the delegation. They accepted the invitation; they did appear, and I was there at the time they were present.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I rise on another question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: We must first of all deal with the first one. Somehow I do not feel this is a true question of privilege. It may be a matter of grievance, but I do not feel it is a question of privilege affecting hon. members in the house. If the hon. member on some other occasion wishes to raise a question of grievance, the choice is his.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I rise on another question of privilege. It has been stated that the Manitoba members were invited to a meeting at eleven o'clock and that those of us who wished to do so attended that meeting. This is true; but this invitation was not extended to us until after we had been debarred from the other meeting.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This also is not a question of privilege but just a dispute as to facts, which does not give rise to a question of privilege within the sense of privilege as it is applied in this house.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NUCLEAR WEAPONS—REPORTED CABINET DIFFERENCES IN REGARD TO GOVERNMENT POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of exchanges in the house yesterday and statements which have appeared, he wishes to make a statement to the house now on reported differences between himself and the Minister of National Defence on vital aspects of defence policy.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add to what I said yesterday.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of National Defence—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I should like to hear the supplementary question. There was some static in the chamber.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Would the minister indicate to the house, with regard to the negotiations mentioned in the third paragraph of his so-called statement of clarification released to the press yesterday, whether the negotiations are being carried on by officials in the Department of National Defence, by officials in the Department of External Affairs, or by officials in both departments.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the general purport and tenor of this question is the same as the question asked yesterday, to which I replied—and I repeat the reply—that I do not think it has ever been the custom to state exactly how negotiations are going on and what are the exact terms of the negotiations, until they are concluded and an announcement can be made.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In answer to that, Mr. Speaker, and on a point of order, the question yesterday had to do—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That's no point of order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —with who was conducting the negotiations. Today I have asked, which departments?

Mr. Speaker: Yes, but the minister has chosen to answer. He gave an answer, and that is it.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether the statement issued yesterday by the Minister of National Defence, which the Prime Minister has now had an opportunity to read, accurately reflects the policy of the government regarding the acquisition of nuclear weapons for Canada?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, as I made perfectly clear yesterday, I do not intend to go further in that direction. I made the statement on Friday as to the position of the government, and that position stands.

Mr. Benidickson: Ambiguous.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of National Defence whether he will confirm his statement that Canada has been negotiating with the United States for the past two or three months in order that nuclear warheads will be made available for the CF-101 interceptor squadrons.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I think the statement is perfectly plain and clear, and it so states.

Mr. Pearson: A supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister, then, confirm what he said, as reported at page 3132 of Hansard for last Friday, that these aircraft, the CF-101's, will be armed with conventional weapons?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the Leader of the Opposition will recognize that he may not ask questions referring to previous debate in this session.

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Megantic): I should like to address this question to the Minister of National Defence. Is it a fact that General Norstad has stored samples of nuclear weapons in the cellar of the Leader of the Opposition's house?

Mr. Speaker: Order. These somewhat frivolous interventions do not lead to any advancement of the business of this house.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Would the hon. gentleman please inform the house whether he saw the statement issued by the Minister of National Defence and, if so, now that he has read it, if he agrees with the position outlined in that statement as being the policy of the government with respect to nuclear weapons.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I suggest that that is not a proper question for orders of the day.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: I wonder how we could get any clarification of that answer. After all, that is the purpose of supplementary questions.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, we are having the same difficulty as Your Honour in getting clarification of that answer.

Mr. Speaker: I am not suggesting that the question may need some clarification, but the answer that was given. That is the purpose of a supplementary question as I apprehend it. An hon. member asking a supplementary question is, really, taking the place of another member who would have the right to the floor. There may be a following question on the general subject.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Then I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the statement made a moment ago by the Prime Minister that the speech which he delivered in this house on Friday represented government policy, and in view of the statement made by the Minister of National Defence in a press release which contradicts that policy—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —may I ask the hon. gentleman—

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member will realize on reflection that he is expressing an opinion. His comment on the question of contradiction is a matter of opinion. I think the hon. member will be able to rephrase his question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I, with regard to a matter so important as this, involving a clear division of opinion within the cabinet—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —point out to Your Honour that the statement which was made on Friday last represented in its entirety the policy of the government of Canada with regard to defence matters. May I point out, too—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —that the Minister of National Defence issued a press release which contradicted that statement. In the face of this situation am I not entitled to ask the Minister of National Defence, in view of this clear division of opinion, if he does not think he ought to observe the time honoured practice in such circumstances and resign?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member will, I think, agree with me that his conclusion as to the statement made by the Minister of National Defence represents an opinion. It may be shared by others but it may, also, not be shared by others. It represents an opinion, and as such is contrary to the provisions of standing order 39. The hon. member has a great deal of experience and could, I have no doubt, rephrase his question so that it would not contain an expression of opinion.

Mr. Pearson: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, you have indicated we may not direct a question which represents mere opinions. But when I attempted to produce some evidence to support the contention that there was a contradiction, by quoting from the statements made by the Prime Minister and by the Minister of National Defence, you ruled that to be out of order.

Mr. Speaker: I was not ruling out the evidence. I was ruling on a matter of reference to a speech in debate in this current session, which is clearly out of order. Those are the rules within which I am working. These are the rules within which I shall work.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I should like to ask him whether it is his intention to issue a statement clarifying the statement made by the minister of defence, which in turn clarified the statement made by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think paragraphs 1 and 2 of citation 171 might have some bearing on this type of question.

(Translation):

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Could the Prime Minister allow the Canadian parliament to hear General Norstad expain the Liberal party's policy on nuclear weapons?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member will no doubt realize that the remarks I made a moment ago about a question that was asked apply also to his own.

(Text):

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Are the negotiations to which he refers in his statement the same negotiations referred to by his predecessor about three years ago, or are they a new development in the consistent policy elucidated by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, these are a new set of negotiations, as I said, started upwards of three months ago.

[Later:]

Miss Judy V. LaMarsh (Niagara Falls): I have a question to address to the Minister of National Defence. In the light of Canada's reported pallid non-participation in the NORAD alert during the Cuban crisis, can the minister advise the house whether the United States government or the Canadian government instigated the new set of negotiations to which he has referred?

Mr. Harkness: I did not catch the purport of the question, I am sorry.

Miss LaMarsh: I am glad to repeat it, Mr. Speaker. In the light of Canada's reported pallid non-participation in the NORAD alert at the time of the Cuban crisis, can the minister advise the house whether the United States government or the Canadian government instigated the new set of negotiations to which he has referred, and which have taken place since October last?

Mr. Harkness: I take most serious objection to the proposition put forward in the guise of a question by the hon. member. So far as the actual question is concerned, as contained in the last few words, Canada initiated the matter.

NATO—CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN NUCLEAR WEAPONS TALKS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas R. Berger (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister tell the house whether Canada is represented and is participating in the discussions being held this week in Paris among NATO members with Mr. Livingston Merchant regarding a proposed multinational nuclear NATO force?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, Canada has a permanent representative at NATO and she will be represented in any discussions that take place in the NATO council.

LECTURE IN ENGLISH TO GROUP SPEAKING FRENCH ONLY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Roy (Levis): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed, I think, to the Associate Minister of National Defence, and I beg his pardon for not having given him notice.

Is the minister aware that an English speaking lecturer, employed by the government, went to Valcartier to give a talk in English to a group of French Canadians who did not speak English?

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member will admit that it is not the time, on the orders of the day, to ask such a question.

[Miss LaMarsh.]

TRADE

EUROPEAN COMMON MARKET—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON ENTRY OF GREAT BRITAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. G. L. Fairweather (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Prime Minister would bring the house up to date on the present situation regarding the possibility of Great Britain entering the European economic community.

Mr. Speaker: I think this is asking—

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in view of the question from the hon. member—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —at the end of the question period, if the house would agree, I would be prepared to make a statement on this matter.

Mr. Speaker: There was no question of order here. The Prime Minister simply made the reply that if the house gives permission he might make a statement at the end of the orders of the day. That will be entirely up to the house at that time.

[Later:]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, in view of the question that was asked I do not know whether the house would wish to have a short statement in this regard. I had not intended to make one originally, but as the question was asked I wondered whether the house wished me to make one now.

Mr. Speaker: I regret that I forgot the indication during the earlier part of the question period that the Prime Minister wished to revert to motions. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, as hon. members know, in so far as the Six are concerned the negotiations which have been going on in Paris since October, 1961 terminated today, at least for the time being. The latest information I have in that connection is that the five members other than France continued some discussion this afternoon following the conclusion of the negotiations among the Six. This naturally becomes a matter of very considerable moment to our country and to the countries of the free world as to what course should be adopted at this time.

The attitude taken by this government in regard to British entry was set out in the statement which I made to the prime ministers' conference in September last, in which I stated:

> We wish to emphasize first of all that the decision regarding the entry into E.E.C. is one for Britain and Britain alone, after the consultation which this meeting has made possible and such further consultation as may be desired.
> The Canadian government is not taking a position on whether or not the U.K. should enter the common market because we respect the right of Britain to take this decision herself. We have been invited to tell the British government of our assessment of the effects of such a decision upon Canadian interests and we have done so. There are many other considerations involved in this decision which only the British government and the British parliament can take properly into account.

At that time I proposed that whatever the outcome of this conference might be, an invitation should be extended "to all member nations of the commonwealth, of the E.E.C., E.F.T.A., the United States of America and Japan and other like minded nations indicating a desire to participate, to meet at the earliest practicable date to give consideration to how to deal with the trading problems before us in a way which will be to the mutual advantage of all". Then I said this:

> This should prepare the way for the prospective non-discriminatory tariff negotiations on a most favoured nation basis.

Then I pointed out the following:

> I believe that this would offer a practical contribution to the solution of our difficulties which will advance the strength of commonwealth association, will permit the common market to proceed with the expansion of its own activities, and will bring to bear the immense trading capacity of the U.S.A. and Japan.

As the house knows, subsequently I brought this proposal to the attention of the President of the United States and it was accepted. I referred to that on October 16 last and some discussion took place at that time. In connection with this meeting suggested by me and accepted by the President of the United States, in which Canada and the United States joined, the council of GATT will be meeting in a few days for the purpose of deciding on the ministerial meeting. I think in view of what has taken place in Brussels today everything should be done to speed up the holding of the ministerial meeting so that these various like minded nations that I have named, together with the commonwealth countries, the European economic community, and the European free trade association can meet together.

As far as the commonwealth is concerned, today I had a conversation with the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom in this regard. Consultations I am sure will be continuing now among the various member nations of the commonwealth as to what would be the appropriate course to take within the commonwealth without in any way derogating from the ministerial meeting which, although it was generally agreed in the last few days that it could not take place before April 1, might be advanced to a considerably earlier date.

I hope to be in the United Kingdom on February 25, and at that time there will be an opportunity to consult with the British government on this matter, particularly with regard to the commonwealth. After all, as I said in September, the decision was for Britain. Britain has now, apparently, found it impossible at this time to join on terms that would have safeguarded to any degree the commonwealth relationship and commonwealth preferences. That being so, no time must be lost in bringing together, by consultation, the various parts of the commonwealth in order that full and informal discussions, to begin with, may take place without delay and also, at the same time, to do everything we can to expand multilateral trade in all parts of the world through the medium of discussions and conclusions reached at the ministerial meeting of GATT.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): The Prime Minister has just made a statement on a matter of the greatest possible importance, and it is to be regretted that circumstances do not permit the kind of discussion of this subject which its importance, both immediate and ultimate, would justify.

The attitude of the opposition toward the negotiations which have been going on for months with a view to the United Kingdom joining the European common market has been clearly expressed, I believe, on many occasions. We on this side have from the beginning been sympathetic to this development, though agreeing with the Prime Minister that it is, of course, a matter for the decision of the United Kingdom alone. We were sympathetic, and we favoured this development if it could be brought about on suitable terms and under suitable conditions; because we on this side felt that the United Kingdom as a member of the European common market would help to ensure that the coming together of Europe both economically and politically would be brought about in a way which would not be inward looking or exclusive but so as to encourage the removal of obstructions between the new organization and the outside world. We thought British membership would have an important and desirable effect in the right direction.

We also supported the move because we thought it would be a further step in the development of the Atlantic community, and that based on this Atlantic community the best possible arrangements could be made with other countries in what we called the free world. It would appear there has been a setback to this development, a setback which even now, we must hope, will not be permanent. Any one member of the European community which accepts responsibility for keeping the United Kingdom outside of the European community is taking a heavy responsibility on itself.

When the Prime Minister said on Friday last, as reported on page 3126 of Hansard—

> The agreement signed in Paris (between President de Gaulle and Dr. Adenauer) represents a forward step which would never have been contemplated ten years ago.

—I found myself at that time disagreeing with his analysis of that particular agreement. However, the information today is that there has been a serious setback. The Prime Minister has rightly said, what can we do now in the commonwealth and, indeed, in the free world to ensure that this setback is not a permanent one in its effect on bringing about better relations among all countries, not only in trade but in other ways. The Prime Minister has talked about the GATT ministerial meeting. That meeting is an essential process, more essential now, perhaps, than it was. It must be remembered that a preparatory committee in connection with this meeting was set up nearly a year ago. It is to be hoped that this preparatory work can be brought to a conclusion with the least possible delay.

The development made known today is bound to have an important effect on the United States trade expansion act because that act was predicated upon the United Kingdom becoming a member of the European common market. If the United Kingdom should now be kept out of that market, the President of the United States will have to amend in some respects the trade expansion program act passed by congress last year. It is to be hoped that this will give the Canadian government an opportunity to share in any changes which may have to be made to that act so that we may associate ourselves, even at this stage, with the United States in the negotiations which may be required, through GATT, with the European common market, even without the United Kingdom. Such negotiations however will have to include the United Kingdom and other members of the commonwealth as well.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): I believe everyone of us in this house has watched with intense interest the development of the situation in Europe as it relates to the entry of Britain into the European common market.

We are concerned with the action which has been taken on the part of the president of France and by the apparent inability of the British negotiators to make their point with the European economic community council.

This is not the time to enter into a debate on this topic nor is it the time when we should be looking backward at things which might have happened or at things which might have been done. I believe it is our duty to evaluate the situation with regard to our own responsibilities and the part Canada herself can play in this situation.

This does not relate so much to Britain and her relationship with the E.E.C. or to the affairs of the other nations which compose that organization. It brings us back to the fact that we in the commonwealth have a definite responsibility. I think it would have been to our advantage had we, last fall, called for a commonwealth trade conference and moved forward with that project. I believe that at the present time the moment is opportune for such a move to be made. In fact it is urgent that Canada should take the lead in this regard. For too long we have stood back and waited to see what someone else proposed to do before we acted. We should be taking the lead now by calling the commonwealth together in a trade conference. We have an economic committee already set up which could do this work.

I believe we could do more to help Britain in her problem, as well as helping Canada, and I hope the government will take action along these lines as quickly as possible. We should, I believe, take a sympathetic attitude toward the problem which faces Britain, but it is about time we in Canada did something not only to help her but to help ourselves and to help the free association of nations which we now have in the commonwealth.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): The rejection of the British application for membership in the European economic community will have far reaching repercussions for the United Kingdom and for the world, as well as for Canada as an important exporting nation.

On this day when there will be a good deal of disappointment in many quarters it should not be forgotten that when the treaty of Rome was signed in 1957 Britain could have entered the European common market without any difficulty whatsoever, and that she refused to do so rather than destroy the commonwealth preference system because she felt she had an obligation to the other members of the commonwealth. We should keep that in mind and remember that Britain made a serious sacrifice in order to preserve the commonwealth ties and to retain the commonwealth preference system. Now that she has been rejected it should also not be forgotten that this rejection arises out of the fact that General de Gaulle has sought increasingly to direct the European economic community inward rather than outward in its outlook. This, in my opinion, will destroy the European common market, because I do not think this inward look is shared by the other members of the European common market.

The Prime Minister has said that we must now decide what we are going to do. This is not the proper time to debate the matter. However, I want to say very briefly that there are three things which ought to be done. First of all, we ought to be doing more to adjust the balance of trade between Canada and the United Kingdom. Some four or five years ago, when visiting the United Kingdom, the Prime Minister talked about transferring 15 per cent of our trade from the United States to the United Kingdom, that this would solve the imbalance from which Canada and the United Kingdom both suffer. It is true that imports from the United Kingdom have increased, but exports have increased even more, so that today Great Britain continues to buy from us 50 per cent more than we buy from her. This is something which ought to be receiving the attention of the government and of this parliament.

The other matter is that I think the government ought to go back and see whether or not the United Kingdom is prepared to resubmit the proposal she made for a free trade agreement between Canada and Great Britain, that proposal which the government rejected out of hand in 1957. I think this could be extended to the entire commonwealth if the proper negotiations were proceeded with.

Third, I suggest that this is a time for the government to open negotiations with the United States to discuss the implications of the trade expansion act. The Prime Minister has spoken about the GATT ministerial conference. Such a conference will have merit, but surely anyone who is familiar with the problems of GATT will be aware of the fact that this is a long process of negotiation, and that the immediate hope lies first in helping to reduce the imbalance of our trade with Britain; second, in getting greater free trade within the commonwealth; and third, in entering into negotiations for freer trade with the United States under the provisions of the trade expansion act. If the European common market can be persuaded—which I doubt —by General de Gaulle to go it alone, then the commonwealth, the United States and the other parts of the world must make their trading arrangements accordingly.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

INCREASED FEDERAL PARTICIPATION IN WINTER WORKS PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gerard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, in view of the present state of emergency I should like to put a question to the Minister of Labour. Would the minister tell the house whether he intends to announce soon a better government participation in the program for encouraging winter works?

(Text):

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): If I understood the hon. member correctly, Mr. Speaker, he wanted to know whether there would be better participation in the winter works program. This winter works program is far in excess of any program of past years, and it is growing by the day.

(Translation):

QUEBEC—REQUESTS FROM UNORGANIZED MUNICIPALITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gerard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour.

Would the minister tell the house whether he has received from the Quebec government a request of co-operation in regard to communities which are not organized in municipalities, and which cannot now participate in the winter works incentive program?

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member should have his question put on the order paper.

(Text):

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT RESPECTING TRANSFER OF FACILITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs, of which I gave him public notice in room 238-S at twelve o'clock today. Will he make a statement to the house as to the government's position with respect to the representations made this morning by the delegation from Manitoba concerning the proposed removal of the T.C.A. overhaul base from Winnipeg, and will he assure that delegation and Manitoba that any moves will be arrested pending further consideration?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is making representations. I will hear the question so far as making a statement is concerned.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will be very pleased to answer this question in the name of my colleague if you give me permission.

Some hon. Members: Go on.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, following the very interesting meeting that we had this morning with this delegation from Manitoba I got in touch with the president of T.C.A., and following our conversation it was decided that no transfer at all will be made from Winnipeg to Montreal of any T.C.A. employee pending full consideration and investigation of the whole matter by a cabinet committee and a committee of the board of directors of T.C.A.

FISHERIES

ESTABLISHMENT OF BASE LINES TO PROTECT CANADIAN FISHERMEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack Davis (Coast-Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Has the government given any consideration to the establishment of base lines from headland to headland to protect the rights of Canadian fishermen on the east and west coasts?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the government hears briefs on this matter from time to time from various interested groups. It is a matter which has been very actively under consideration for a number of years on an international basis, and is under active consideration at the present time.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder whether I could ask a supplementary question of the minister. Could the minister tell us whether any negotiations are going on at the present time with the government of any other country with respect to the establishment of a 12 mile fishing zone?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, this is a question which should be directed to my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs. My department does not deal with foreign countries.

Mr. Pickersgill: Then I should like to direct the question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): There have been discussions going on on this question from time to time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think perhaps the minister did not hear my question. I asked whether there were any discussions going on at the present time. Can the minister say whether there are or are not any going on at the present time?

Mr. Green: I said there were discussions going on from time to time.

Mr. Pickersgill: But not now.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question. Are these discussions between officials of the Department of External Affairs and the foreign power?

Mr. Green: The hon. member knows better than to ask that question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. A few moments ago I asked a question of the Minister of National Defence as to which department of the government, defence or external affairs, was carrying on negotiations in connection with the matters mentioned in paragraph 3 of the minister's release of yesterday. The minister said it would be improper for him to make a reply as to which department. We now have from the Secretary of State for External Affairs a reply which clearly indicates that it is not an improper question. I therefore say to you, Mr. Speaker, it is a violation of the privileges of this house for the Minister of National Defence to have denied this house that information.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member has had sufficient experience to recognize the fact that he may not comment on answers that are given, even though they may be quite unsatisfactory to him or to others.

NORTH PACIFIC FISHERIES COMMISSION—INQUIRY AS TO RECOMMENDATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the reported impending departure of Canadian fisheries department officials for Tokyo to discuss regulations under which Japanese fishing vessels may catch halibut in the Bering sea, and in view of the fact that Canadian halibut fishermen as well as United States halibut fishermen are opposed to the north Pacific commission recommendation permitting Japanese fleets to harvest halibut in this area, has the minister already decided to approve the controversial recommendation or will the matter be referred to the standing committee on marine and fisheries, as requested by the representatives of the government of British Columbia?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): I have nothing to add to the reply I gave yesterday, except that the delegation which goes to Tokyo on February 5 has nothing to do with whether or not the recent findings of the international north Pacific fisheries commission, which is created under the international north Pacific fisheries convention, are approved by the government.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I wonder if the minister does not think this question is of such urgency it would move even this government out of its lethargy and the matter would be referred to the committee on marine and fisheries.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is making representations and expressing his own opinion.

[Later:]

Mr. Arthur Laing (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries in relation to the international north Pacific treaty. In the light of the fact that we have a delegation of fishermen here today, and that representatives of the industry are also here, would he give most earnest consideration to referring this matter to the committee on marine and fisheries while they are still here?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, the delegation from the fisheries council presented a brief to representatives of the cabinet yesterday and, as the hon. member knows, another delegation has been here yesterday and today and their representatives are being heard. So far as the treaty is concerned there is nothing before the house with regard to it, and it would be for the decision of the house as to what is referred to a committee.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I wish to address a supplementary question to the parliamentary secretary to the Prime Minister in his capacity as chief government whip. Has he made arrangements for the use of Senate committee room 356-S tomorrow at three o'clock for the fisheries committee or for some other fisheries groups?

Mr. Theogene Ricard (Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, so far as I know, no.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO SETTLEMENT OF TREATY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works, but first I wish to congratulate him on his election to the leadership of the Conservative party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Byrne: Having said that, I wonder whether the hon. gentleman would tell the house if one of the very important items he wishes to clear up before leaving the department would be the final settlement of the Columbia river treaty?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should express my appreciation to the hon. gentleman for his very kind words and to the members of the house for their reception of them. The general warmth of the reception moves me to wish that all those here were going to be future electors in the province of British Columbia. I might even be encouraged to anticipate a more favourable reception on the part of the hon. member for Kootenay East.

The desire to see a clarification and resolution of the Columbia problem is always in my mind and foremost in my effort. I only hope that it will not be necessary to await certain electoral outcomes in British Columbia in order to do that.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

WEST GERMANY—FINAL DATE FOR DISPOSITION OF WAR CLAIMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It may not appear to be of national importance or urgent; however, it is national in scope and is very urgent to some Canadians. Has the Canadian government received notice from the West German government that it has set a final date for the disposition of all claims that the victims of nazi persecution might have against it? If so, have Canadian citizens with unsatisfied claims for nazi persecution been notified of this decision?

Mr. Speaker: I wish to thank the hon. member for having cleared this matter with me first. I have indicated, and I am still of the same opinion, that this question would be better put on the order paper. There is no great urgency to have the information at this moment.

Mr. Herridge: With all due respect, Mr. Speaker, you are not fully aware of the circumstances. This matter does involve—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member can get his question on the order paper.

Mr. Knowles: It could take weeks to get an answer.

Inquiries of the Ministry

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR SETTING UP OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he would take steps—and by unanimous consent he can do so today—to set up the external affairs committee so that it could meet at once to discuss the negotiations on defence policy and the Columbia river treaty.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the committee has been constituted. A discussion took place in connection with external affairs and defence the other day. I suggest to the Leader of the Opposition that he speak with his colleagues and advance legislation now before the house; then we would be better off.

Mr. Speaker: Order. We are not going to get into a debate on this matter.

ELECTIONS ACT—AMENDMENT TO REDUCE TIME REQUIRED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John A. Addison (York North): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the widely circulated reports of the possibility of an early election, is it the intention of this government to introduce an amendment to the Canada Elections Act reducing the number of days required to hold a general election?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Both points are hypothetical.

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING—RESIGNATION OF COMMITTEE CHAIRMAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question of either the Minister of Transport or the house leader. My question is occasioned by the resignation of Hon. Earl Rowe, who was chairman of the sessional committee on railways and shipping. Since the committee has not finished its work I would like to ask either minister, whichever one has the responsibility, to give some indication as to how and when the committee will proceed in this situation?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I understand that this is a matter for the committee itself to decide. I shall be pleased to raise the matter with our whip and with the vice chairman of the committee, and provide an answer to the hon. member on it.

[Mr. Knowles.]

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REQUEST FOR RESIGNATION OF DONALD GORDON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

Following the investigation concerning the employment of French Canadians within the C.N.R., has Mr. Donald Gordon given orders for his own resignation?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member will agree that his question is out of order at this time.

INQUIRY AS TO INVESTIGATION INTO STAFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilles Gregoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Balcer)? Could the minister tell us if he has received a report of the investigation to be made by Mr. Gordon about the personnel of the C.N.R.?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): I have nothing to add to what I said a while ago.

Mr. Gregoire: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the Minister of Transport get in touch with the president of the C.N.R. so that we might get that report as soon as possible?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is making representations.

Mr. Gregoire: I did not intend to make representations, Mr. Speaker. I wanted to obtain information about the investigation now in progress in the C.N.R.

Mr. Speaker: You have that information now.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING AMENDMENTS TO ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour, to ask the minister if before the final draft of suggested amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act is made, labour and other groups will be consulted and asked to make recommendations.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): I am sure those who are interested in the recommendations and eventual amendments that will be presented to the house will have an opportunity to express their viewpoints.

NATIONAL REVENUE

CAMPOBELLO, N.B.—REQUEST FOR 24 HOUR SERVICE ON BRIDGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Can the minister advise the house whether the chief inspector of customs designated by him to investigate the Campobello bridge situation has completed his survey and reported on his findings? If so, is the minister now in a position to reconsider his decision and have the bridge reopened for 24 hour traffic?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think this problem still remains in the category of information that is not urgently required at the present time. The hon. member can put his question on the order paper and be provided with the information.

Mr. Robichaud: I was instructed by the Chair on Thursday last to place a similar question on the order paper. Within a few minutes the question was placed on the order paper following such instructions, but when questions were called yesterday I did not receive any answer. This is an urgent matter which concerns 1,400 residents of the island.

Mr. Speaker: It may be of some urgency. I think it is recognized that there are some things that are urgent to a lot of people—

Mr. Robichaud: The minister should stand up to answer questions once in a while.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Robichaud: It is the Minister of National Revenue who is answering the question while sitting down.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Robichaud: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, it is the Minister of National Revenue who is answering my question without standing up.

Mr. Speaker: There have been a lot of questions and answers by people who did not have the floor, but the Chair is not aware of them.

TRADE

CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN NEW YORK WORLD FAIR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andre Bernier (Richmond-Wolfe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Could the minister tell the house whether the proper authorities have invited Canada to participate in the world fair which will be held in New York in 1964?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member will undoubtedly agree that his question could easily be placed on the order paper since it deals with an event which will take place in the rather remote future.

TRANSPORT

WELLAND CANAL—INQUIRY AS TO IMPOSITION OF TOLLS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. James C. McNulty (Lincoln): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister inform the house whether the government is considering reversing the position taken by the Prime Minister on June 15 last as to reinstating the tolls on the Welland canal, in view of the statement by Dr. Pierre Camu, vice president of the seaway authority on Monday, January 21, that St. Lawrence seaway tolls are expected to be revised.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member will recognize he is inviting a controversy, and also asking the minister to comment on a statement made by a person outside of this house, which is quite wrong.

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENT TO RAILWAY ACT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister and ask him what has happened to the bill which, on January 21, he said would be introduced and placed on Votes and Proceedings, having to do with an amendment to the Railway Act based on the recommendations of the royal commission on transportation?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that bill has been drafted, but after consultation with the premiers of the western provinces a request was received from them, and also from other interested groups in the western provinces, for an opportunity to discuss generally some of its terms. I think that meeting is to take place this coming Friday.

Inquiries of the Ministry

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

INQUIRY AS TO STATEMENT BY ASSOCIATION OF EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Postmaster General, but before I do so may I remind the house that yesterday was her birthday anniversary. I know that it is not very polite to remind a lady that she has got older, but in this case it is polite because it does not show. I wish her health and happiness, in a sick and unhappy government.

Is the Postmaster General aware of the statement issued last week end by the executive of the federated association of postal employees after a week of deliberations and, if so, will she comment on it?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I do not know the statement to which the hon. member refers. I would be pleased to answer him, particularly in view of his complimentary remarks, but I am at a loss to know what it is to which he refers. If he would like to send me a message—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. In any event I think any comments on such a report might not be quite in order at this time, but after all those complimentary remarks perhaps anything was fair to the hon. member.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR INCREASED FAMILY ALLOWANCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Megantic): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

Does the government accept the principle of an increase in family allowances?

Mr. Speaker: That question is one of policy and a rhetorical one at the moment.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

TRANSLATION INTO FRENCH OF WORK BY BEAUCHESNE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Bellechasse): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In view of the tremendous number of questions from this corner of the house that are ruled out of order, could not the printing of the French edition of Beauchesne's be speeded up?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me one has but to study the official report to know the kind of questions that are to be asked at this stage of the proceedings.

COPYRIGHTS

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF NEW LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Miss Judy V. LaMarsh (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State. Can the minister give a progress report to the house on the present circumstances with respect to the copyright act, which was promised by his predecessor during the last session?

Hon. G. E. Halpenny (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, there is a committee of officials in my department studying it at the present time. I understand that this same act in Great Britain was under study by a committee for some four years before it was brought into the house.

Miss LaMarsh: As a supplementary question, for the information of the Secretary of State will he inquire in his department as to whether this matter has not now been under study since the report of the Ilsley royal commission, which was handed to the then government in 1958?

PUBLIC SERVICE

INQUIRY AS TO PAY REVIEW FOR CERTAIN CLASSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. My question is based upon the assurance he gave the house just before we recessed for Christmas with regard to those categories of civil servants for whom no increases were provided in the announcement on December 10. Particular reference was made to post office employees and to customs and excise officers. Can the minister say whether he is yet able to report on the review promised with respect to these employees?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not recall exactly the answer to which the hon. member refers. During the recess I had consultations with representatives of the various unions, the mail carriers and postal clerks. Discussions have been going on with respect to these matters. As the hon. member well knows, the civil service commission will make a recommendation, which the minister will then consider.

Mr. Knowles: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Are the elevator operators in this and other federal buildings included in this review?

Mr. Nowlan: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I cannot answer that question at the moment. There are hundreds of classifications for thousands of employees, and I would have to check the record to make sure.

INQUIRIES OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I express to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hees) the sympathy of the official opposition on the news which has just been received, to the effect that the George H. Hees building in Toronto has been burned out.

(Translation):

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker). Since there is talk of election in all newspapers, could the Prime Minister give us some assurance that parliament will be recessed for a week before dissolution, so that the Liberal party may appoint a new leader?

Mr. Speaker: For the third time, I wish to remind hon. members that orders of the day is not the proper time to voice or exchange views which, however brilliantly put, are still of a political character.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

INQUIRY AS TO POLICY RESPECTING SECOND ROUTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister and ask what progress is being made toward establishing a policy of building a second trans-Canada highway with federal government participation.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Of course, Mr. Speaker, that is a matter of government policy to be announced in due course. Today, I may say, a representative group headed by William Hawrelak from Edmonton and several others placed before the government representations in favour of a second trans-Canada highway by way of Edmonton and thence through The Pas.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I could ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question. Is the government giving any consideration to providing additional financial assistance over and above that now provided by law in order to have the present trans-Canada highway completed?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, as far as the government of Canada is concerned there has been a completion of that highway.

[Later:]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate regarding the trans-Canada highway I should like to add, so that there is no misunderstanding, that I was referring to the ceremony marking the completion of the route for traffic. Federal contributions for construction will, of course, continue as long as authorized by the act.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I think the Prime Minister perhaps misunderstood my question. My question was, is the government giving any consideration to the proposal made, for example, by the MacPherson commission, or other proposals, for increasing the scale of federal aid in order to speed up the completion of that highway in those provinces which are unable to carry on at a satisfactory rate of speed under the present financial arrangements. I wonder whether the Prime Minister could answer that question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have some difficulty. We are not re-embarking on a question period, I trust. We had finished the question period and this was a reversion to motions. We called orders of the day. If there is some clarification required I would leave it at this point. I hope hon. members do not feel that this is a reopening of the question period.

PROVISION FOR DEFINITION OF DUTIES, APPOINTMENT OF MEMBERS, ETC.

The house resumed, from Monday, January 28, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-87, to provide for the establishment of a national economic development board—Mr. Nowlan—Mr. Chown in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

(Translation):

Mr. Lamoureux: Mr. Chairman, when the house adjourned last evening, I was saying that I agreed to the general principle of the bill now under consideration, and I was expressing the opinion that planning under the conditions now prevailing in the country, has become essential to the solution of our economic problems.

Yet, I wonder, Mr. Chairman, whether the scheme, as it stands now, may become the efficient planning instrument that the government thinks it is putting at the disposal of our country's economy. The bill to set up the national economic development board is strangely similar to the bill which set up, in 1960, the national productivity council, and we might have grounds to fear that that new body will have a career as fruitless as that of the national productivity council.

The fact that only one of its advisers, that is to say the chairman himself, is called upon to work full time on this board, makes from the start the undertaking rather uncertain and problematical.

The bill also provides for the appointment of a maximum of 25 advisers, that is, the same number that was provided by the national productivity council. It would be quite surprising, Mr. Chairman, that such a large group of persons could produce anything but much discussion and little action. It would be preferable that the number of members be limited to three or five, perhaps, and that these work full time toward the achievement of the board's objectives.

I feel also that we should be concerned about the fact that there is no reference at all to the method of co-operation between the board itself and the government agencies. The bill setting up the national productivity council provided for the appointment of four officials from the departments concerned; this bill, however, does not provide for anything of the kind, and limits the relations between the board and the government to the reports which shall be made by the chairman to the Minister of Finance. In fact, the bill now under study does not confer any specific function, work or responsibility to the board; it merely instructs it to consider certain situations and report to the minister.

Besides, the bill itself recognizes implicitly that the members who will serve on that board without pay will effectively do little work since it provides, in a rather funny way, that members who perform duties in addition to their ordinary duties as members of the board, will receive a remuneration.

The general impression one gets from the bill is that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Nowlan) will have in hand a poor instrument to accomplish things otherwise quite praiseworthy.

Indeed, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the bill was prepared with too much haste and I find it hard to believe that an instrument so uncertain and indefinite could become, through the action of some voluntary advisers, a dynamic planning agency. If we were to appraise the bill in itself instead of accepting the interpretation given by the minister, there is a real danger that the national economic development board might be abandoned to its own resources; it will struggle along, begging interviews from the responsible ministers while being stuck with the suggestions it would like to have implemented.

If that planning project is really going to fill the present requirements, the national economic development board should be the very life and soul of the national economy. It should also be able to attend to the most pressing things first and to grapple with the immediate problems like chronic unemployment.

I think more particularly of the eastern Ontario region, which does not seem to have participated to the extent one might expect in the industrial development of the post-war years. It is not because resources are lacking, far from it. Manpower, skilled labour, excellent communications, plentiful hydroelectric resources, there is everything that could be required to bring about the economic growth of a whole area. No doubt the problem would not exist to the same extent had we agreed to give that region of the province a supply of the hydroelectric power developed to the benefit of other more fortunate regions of the province, at the price of great sacrifices that were required of the residents of that region. That decision did a great harm to all eastern Ontario and perhaps it would not have been reached if, at that time, there had been an agency like the national economic development board.

I am also thinking, Mr. Chairman, about the particular case of the area I represent in this house, and which is waiting with an increasing anxiety for the government to do something to put a stop to a situation that the most laudable efforts of the local authorities have never been able to correct.

I regret to recall here that, according to the latest official reports, more than 2,500 applicants for unemployment insurance benefits were registered with the commission's office, in Cornwall. It is an increase—seasonal perhaps but still an increase—of 700, as compared to the end of November. On the other hand, more than 3,200 persons are registered as seeking jobs, that is an increase of 600 over the previous month. Those figures do not substantially differ from what they were these last years; they illustrate how chronic the unemployment plague has become in this country.

I will not tax the patience of the committee by recalling in detail all the initiatives taken in that particular area to solve locally, through the only facilities at the disposal of a municipality, the economic problems of that community. Similar laudable efforts have been made in other areas, and that resourcefulness redounds to the credit of our municipalities. If enthusiasm, good will and initiative could by themselves bring in new industries, increase salaries and create employment, municipalities which, like Cornwall, have left no stone unturned to get rid by themselves of their economic plight would all benefit today from full prosperity and employment.

Unfortunately, the increasingly sharp competition between provinces, between various areas and between municipalities, in regard to the acquisition of new industrial enterprises, too often results in cancelling out particular efforts and in rendering fruitless local initiatives. Since economic problems continue to exist, in spite of all the hard work done by municipalities, it becomes imperative to look for solutions to those problems at higher levels of government.

We believe, Mr. Chairman, that the government must rethink the whole economic pattern of this country. I do not think this government has now a clear, precise, logical and long term plan to steer the economy of this country in a way that will solve the greatest problem today, chronic regional unemployment.

The setting up of the national economic development board is a step, faltering and long overdue no doubt, but still a step in the right direction. The planning of our economy could be of great help to us. But some people think that such planning should not be too easily entrusted to so many councils, committees and commissions, which the government is setting up with a generous enthusiasm.

The gradual surrendering of the ministers' prerogatives to commissioners and advisers is leading us toward the establishment of a technocracy which is contrary to democratic principles. It would have been much easier to support the bill under discussion if the minister had brought before the house a positive and detailed policy of economic planning of his own, for which he would have assumed responsibility and whose application would have been under his direct supervision. The alternate proposal submitted to us is a plan to find a plan. And if the search is successful, as we all hope, it will not be the work of the government, but rather of its technical advisors. Who knows if it will not be necessary later on to appoint a new board to carry out the recommendations of the national economic development board?

As I said earlier, Mr. Chairman, this bill is a step in the right direction, as long as other measures will supplement it without delay in order to make possible a fair and orderly development in all parts of the country.

Mr. Dumont: Mr. Chairman, on two occasions, yesterday afternoon, we had the opportunity to speak and we let it go, while three Liberals as well as four other members, during the evening, made speeches. But that did not prevent the member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) to say, last evening, that the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) wanted to deprive the Liberal party of its right to be heard. What a big joke.

If I referred to his statement, since he has been in the habit of making statements for 22 years—or should I say for 27 years—and not always in the best of taste, I would probably make interesting finds. I shall refer, for the moment, to what he said last evening, and here are his very words as shown in the official report. I quote:

> I suggest that if there had been the kind of full employment that existed up until June of 1957 the hon. member for Villeneuve and his friends would not be here at all.

In view of the venerable statement of the hon. member, let us look back to the period when he was in office, in order to see what was said at the time. We find on page 47 of Hansard a statement quoting the Calgary Herald:

> Labour and management officials in the British Columbia timber industry have forecast widespread unemployment in the industry this winter.

Again in Hansard of January 9, 1957, at a time when the Liberals were in office, we find:

> Both groups agreed it would be "the worst winter since the war" and some said unemployment might spread to other industries.
> International Woodworkers of America expect to have 1,200 men out of work by mid-November. Already nearly 800 have been laid off.

Should the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate remember what he has said, he would be so nervous that we would think there was an atomic bomb under his seat.

But since the hon. member usually makes a statement one day and another kind of statement the next day, he is recommending for the national economic development board plans which make me remember only too well what we saw in my own riding last year in connection with the winter works program.

Mr. Leblond, a good Liberal mayor, ordered the work to be done with shovels. The tractors and shovel dredgers were then put away and the men had to work at temperatures of 10 below zero, which is abnormally cold weather to have men work to earn their living by the sweat of their brow.

I believe that hon. members should rather recommend appropriate means to have the works financed by the municipal governments, so that our mayors could have the job done the way they want to. Then, it would not be necessary to have men carry out in such cold weather, winter works ordered by whatever party it may be.

People in St. Philemon see how ridiculous this is but they nevertheless agree to work because they have to eat three meals a day. One of those workers told me: "Why not use a spoon instead of a shovel, so as to make the work last all winter?" And another one, yet more astute: "While we are at it, let us use tooth-picks: the work will never end."

Planning which the government would undertake would be along that line; individuals would be forced to do things which the hon. members of the house cannot see. That is why we in this corner of the house are earnestly advocating the establishment of a municipal credit board in order that the municipalities may not be compelled to agree to carry out the necessary works in such a ridiculous manner which is unacceptable in 1963. People submit because they have no choice. It reminds us somewhat of the concentration camps behind the iron curtain.

I realize that we are quite comfortable in this house; it is therefore hard to imagine the hardships suffered by those who are working in freezing weather. This is the reason we are here, this is why there are 30 Social Credit members now in the house; the people were more than fed up with the old line parties who managed the affairs of the country according to their dishonest methods, which forced human beings to stay in the cold in freezing temperatures, and are unacceptable in our times. They will want a Social Credit government the next time around.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate advises Social Credit members not to talk about unemployment. I read that under their stewardship they let the farm situation remain stagnant, and they had no need for any plan let alone a national development board to know wheat crops should be produced in Quebec where farmers have enough intelligence to follow the advice of their agronomists. At page 142 of Hansard for 1957, we see in a statement of the then hon. Liberal member for Kamouraska, Mr. Arthur Masse, what was the Liberal policy then. I quote:

> In 1950, there were 360 farmers paying income tax in Quebec. In 1954, there were 860.

That is 860 out of 122,000 farmers. Such a situation has always prevailed under the Liberal government, a party which is a poor administrator for the people but a good one for the world of finance, and in which we find directors of chartered or other banks.

According to those administrators, the best plan is to enable rich people to become richer and the poor to become even poorer. People are fed up with that and we shall see in the next election that the Liberals will find themselves in the same position as in 1920 and in 1923, namely in the state of a greatly reduced opposition.

I should now like to quote a further statement on the farm situation, as recorded in the official report of January 11, 1957, still by the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Masse), who said that only 27 farmers in his riding had an annual income of $1,900. He found that still satisfactory.

Today, those hon. members, now of the opposition, would have us believe that they have better methods. If they have, why should there not have been more than 27 farmers whose income was $1,900 a year in 1956? There again, they were satisfied with the situation. In my opinion, that line of reasoning is completely ridiculous. I believe it is time for the Canadian people to realize that the Liberal party is in favour of planning and supports the national economic development board, providing it involves more planning. The general public is aware of this. The Canadian people will also realize that the Liberals are the same persons who, in 1956-1957, gave away to the United Kingdom interests amounting to $26 million. At that time, the United Kingdom owed us $26 million. As can be found in Hansard for January 11, 1957, the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent stated that he was going to give the United Kingdom $26 million.

Looking further, in Hansard for January 30, 1957, I find that a loan of $1 million was granted for the Suez canal clearing by the same party in power.

Those are the reasons why we took a chance with the Conservative party but since it cannot do better, and since we are at the present time in need of someone who can launch the Canadian economy toward progress, let us elect active people and oust those who ask for nuclear weapons instead of economic development.

Mr. Latulippe: Mr. Chairman, the aim of economic activities has always been to produce as much as possible with the least effort possible. Automation should please man, should help him, should exalt him in his country, instead of pushing him in that kind of insecurity which demoralizes him.

Why does the state exist? To lead or to serve? We must realize where the duty of the state lies. What is the purpose of this bill to set up a national economic development board? What is it about? Production activities? Processing operations? Manufactures? Plants? Increase production? Agriculture? Transport?

I wonder what is the aim of all those activities. Why do they exist? Of course, their raison d'être is to meet the needs of human beings. That is the aim of any sound economy; to fill the need for appropriate goods and profits. Production and industry therefore exist to serve.

Furthermore, we are convinced that with modern means of production and transport, it is possible and relatively easy to put enough goods at the disposal of all consumers to satisfy all their essential needs. If that result is not achieved, the fault does not lie with production itself, and it does not lie either with the will of the consumers.

Since the aim of production is to meet the needs of consumers, it follows that consumers must have the means to make their needs known to production; it is to the master to make his desires known to his servant.

We have here a bill concerning economic development, under which the government will be authorized to direct; and thanks to that power, even if the people are in need of bread, the government will be able to say that it is guns that are needed—exactly what the people do not want.

Reference is made in this bill to planned or directed economy. To direct means to draw, to push in a given direction. In what direction? If it is not directed in the direction of its final objective, it will go astray; and if its final objective consists in meeting the needs of consumers, is it not consumers themselves?

Yet, is that really the idea entertained by those who are requesting a planned economy? Are they not thinking rather in terms of an economy in which the government will put its finger in all control institutions and will tell production what to do and consumers what they must accept?

If that is the kind of direction which is requested, let us realize at once that we already have, and that we have had for several decades, a directed economy. It is directed by those who are in a position to give orders to production, by those who are in a position to dictate their conditions to producers, and by no stretch of the imagination could we say that it is the people, with their needs, who are giving orders to production.

Who suffers from hunger? Members of families where there are more mouths to feed than there is money in the pocketbook. Are they the ones who give orders to food producers?

Who suffers from cold, sickness and the lack of clothing? Are they the ones who give orders to suppliers of firewood and fuel oil, to clothing manufacturers, doctors and druggists?

Who is most in need? Those who live in plain houses. Is it for them that thousands of people work in our industrial cities? Who gets the carloads of commodities which come out of our manufactures?

Production is diverted from its end. Shoes are produced not for the comfort of the people but to enrich the manufacturers. Thousands of people go barefoot while thousands of pairs of shoes remain in storage and on store shelves. Incentives are being sought for production without any thought being given to the consumers.

Indeed, that condition is imposed at the very source where the money required for production comes from. It is the manufacturer who borrows money and the banker who lends it who decide to what use the money will be put. That is where decisions are made concerning the proposed production and where authorization to speed up or slow down production comes from. The banker's book is supreme; absolutely no consideration is given to the consumers' needs. What is the use of planning?

Everybody knows that today's overabundant production has not met the enormous needs of the world and it is on this most revolting historical fact, that those who promote a planned economy base themselves.

But it is noteworthy that most of the laws that advocate a planned economy are very careful not to make the slightest reference to the power that is directing the economy at the present time. They recognize that the economy is not directed towards the needs of the consumers, but they merely ask the government to intervene to give orders to producers.

We forget that the government itself takes orders from an outside power since it takes so few measures for the good of all. Being itself under the power of money "barons", how can the government intervene except under orders and under pressure from those money "barons"? The government should get its freedom back first.

But once that has been achieved, should it behoove the government to state the needs of the consumers? Is not its function rather to remove the obstacles so that the consumers themselves can make their needs known?

There is a very simple way for the consumers to make their needs known to production and the first duty of a government worthy of that name should be to offer it to the consumers. That is the only guidance, the only logical intervention needed.

Put some familiar looking pieces of paper in each consumer's pocket, or give him only an account on which to draw cheques, and you will see if each consumer will not start at once to place orders with production; and if that situation is allowed to remain unchanged, production will automatically meet the needs of the consumers.

Money is like a right to vote with regard to products. If production exists for the consumers, that right to vote must be given to the consumers. The dollar is the voting slip through which the consumer chooses the product that suits him. Therefore, it is with this voting slip that the consumer will direct the industry, finance through his purchases the enterprise that works for him and eliminate by refusing it his slip, the one which pursues other aims.

Production is very efficient provided it is left alone. Let us take the case of the shoe-making industry; a woman buys three pairs of shoes for the members of her family. You never hear the owner of the store say that he cannot let these three pairs of shoes go lest he might not be able to replace them. The manufacturer is only waiting for the order to supply more, and the owner of the store knows it.

Shoes are being replaced with the same unfailing certainty as a cause produces its effects.

But apply a regulation that will take away from the woman the possibility of buying the shoes; then production will slow down in proportion; for example, if the husband does not work, there is no salary coming in, and on the basis of the reward and punishment system which has taken over the field of economy, being out of work, he has therefore no right to production. The right to production is reserved as a reward; the man having not earned that reward, the shoes will stay there and the members of the family will go bare feet.

The manufacturer will not provide shoes of all sizes, not that he is not able to do so, but on account of a rule that stands against it. Production will automatically supply consumers as long as the latter are able to voice their needs to production and unless interference is exercised by a power beyond both the producer and the consumer.

However, through a philosophy that bears the strong stamp of Judaism, the pursuit of an end pertaining to morals is inflicted upon economy. Industry and production are being made a management implement instead of a service implement. Industry thus finds itself in a cramped position; it is being asked to do something that does not come within its functions and is prevented from achieving its end.

Its own end directs it to supply as many useful things as possible with the least possible effort; and the nearer it gets to it, the more it is crippled by the rule of reward and punishment. The man who is not called upon to produce must not enjoy the fruits of production.

The more industry improves, the more it eliminates human labour and the authorized consumer. And, always on account of the system of reward and punishment, the more it suppresses the authorized consumer, the more it is condemning itself to stagnation, unless it is directed towards activities having to do with destruction, as is the case today; warfare is the salvation of the system.

The conditioning of the right to the necessary things of life has become such an instrument of management that it is being used unconsciously by those who want to manage others and who have neither the virtue nor the efficiency to succeed otherwise.

This is the axis around which political patronage, intimidation and economical dictature, at all levels, are rotating.

It is the hidden government of money interests, the government of those who, being absolute masters of money and of credit, distribute them according to their fancies and control even our right to breathe.

When the Social Crediters ask for a bare minimum for everybody, through the payment of a national dividend, regardless of any personal contribution to production, do we not find our opponents always eager to mention the moral danger involved? If, all of a sudden, man could feed himself without having to toil, what a catastrophe that would be and how could he be kept under the yoke.

And yet, the economy is not meant to govern, but to serve. Its concern is to supply the earthly goods man must have to meet his temporal needs; its moral character is to be found in the achievement of that goal, not in substituting it to morals.

It is to mystify the multitude and to prevent or delay the true reforms that the profiteers of our present financial system take cover behind moral considerations, the moment that means are sought to put an end to their deadly swindles.

If the plans set forth here and there favour regimentation—statements made by prominent people have more or less as their common denominator regimentation, state employment, state enterprise, control for the centralization of power, the loss of national sovereignties, and, it goes without saying, provincial sovereignties and individual freedom—it is precisely because preparations are being made to deal with current problems without disturbing the present financial set-up.

It is found that, with the financial system we now have, there is no other alternative to the economic slump than socialism, avowed or not. And, because the financial set-up is not to be tampered with, the way is being paved for socialism; instead of having the financial system conform to the needs of humanity, it is humanity that has to conform to the requirements of the financial system.

The Social Crediters are the only ones who have the courage to attack the financial system, and for that we are found guilty of a crime. Each time we make some progress, a pack of people rise against us and, in this pack, it is surprising to find forces and men who, taking their responsibilities, denounce socialism.

We are the only ones to fight for the respect of free enterprise, for the respect of the human being, and for the idea that each man should receive the bare minimum required for a decent livelihood, for the achievement of a life really worth living, in security and in peace.

Mr. Chairman, the only alternative that we bring in, in order to improve our economy, is to lay down plans and more plans. People are tired of all those plans which mean nothing. This bill concerning the establishment of a national economic development board will not bring money into the pockets of our citizens: they will keep on starving. Fifty years may go by before anything comes out of this bill, if anything ever comes out of it.

We may be all dead before any results from this disastrous economic bill start showing.

We are opposed to this economic bill. We are in favour of a system which will bring life and not death. People want to live with dignity; they want to see their legal, moral and social rights fully respected. That is the reason why we are fighting. We Social Crediters, demand the right for each individual, everything which is available: the right to production, the right to modernization, the right to everything his forefathers have achieved before him. We are here to demand those rights and we do so with all our strength.

(Text):

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, before clause 1 carries I wonder whether I might ask the Minister of Finance a question about the general scope of this bill. It is obvious from the terms of the bill that it has to do with certain planning with regard to production and with increasing production. I am wondering whether under this legislation it would be possible to have the national economic development board look into the whole question of rail line abandonment across this country. I ask this question on clause 1 because I feel it is of such a general nature that this is the appropriate place to raise the matter and the appropriate place for it to be answered. It is obvious that this question has to do with planned reduction in certain services over a period of time and might, on a narrow interpretation of the bill, be considered something apart altogether from its scope.

Indications have been given to us at other stages in the proceedings this session that certain steps will be taken to deal with this question. I am not certain in my own mind whether it is possible or desirable under this bill to have that kind of an inquiry. I am not certain in my own mind whether it is possible under the bill to establish a committee or a body, to provide for the remuneration of the people involved and to give them terms of reference that would enable them to do a comprehensive job. I want to tell the Minister of Finance that the people on the prairies who are particularly concerned with this whole problem of rail line abandonment are absolutely opposed to the board of transport commissioners being given the job. They feel that basically the board of transport commissioners is a court of record. They feel that it is involved with detailed consideration of railway questions such as freight rates, and that any general study of the economic services provided by branch lines and the adverse effect of their removal should be undertaken by a board or body outside of and apart from the board of transport commissioners.

While the question of rail line abandonment has been raised in the three prairie provinces mainly, I believe the Minister of Finance would agree with me when I say that this whole problem is likely to have a very important and very serious impact on the maritime provinces. Therefore, while it is a problem that today is being focused on the prairies, mainly because of the aggressive action of farm leaders and organizations in that part of the country, it is nevertheless something that has a very broad scope. I would ask the minister whether it would be possible in his opinion, under the terms of the bill as they now exist, to set up a committee or body that would have representation from the railways, the federal government, the provinces and the organizations which have been particularly involved, to study the serious economic effect and the serious cost to communities of a large scale abandonment of railway services and to look into, amongst other things, the efficiency or inefficiency of the operations of the railway companies having to do with branch line services.

I can tell the committee there have been brought to my attention a great many accusations that the railway companies are deliberately operating branch line services in such a way as to show large losses. The belief of the people making these statements is that these losses are being incurred so as to bolster the arguments of the companies at a later date in their applications to abandon lines. Here are some examples of what I have been told: sending in special trains to pick up goods when the regular biweekly schedule would do; discontinuing a passenger service and, on the very day it is discontinued, laying down tile in the waiting room the passengers used to use; saving an expenditure of $6 in wages with the result that a special train has to be sent in at a cost of $800.

I realize this has been a broad and far-ranging discussion. We had a long discourse on Social Credit theory a while ago. But I think it is very pertinent to this bill to inquire whether or not such an important question as the discontinuance of branch line services is the kind of thing which could be inquired into under this measure. I am not asking the minister whether this bill is to be used as a vehicle for such an inquiry or not. I do not expect to get that information from him. But I wonder if he would comment on his understanding of the general terms of this legislation and tell us whether a committee of inquiry of a type which would be as independent and as competent as the chairman whom the minister wishes to appoint could be set up to inquire into this whole question and, by so doing, meet the demands of so many organizations that an impartial and independent inquiry be undertaken.

Mr. Nowlan: The hon. member has asked a pertinent question. I am not going to give any categorical answer at the moment, but he knows that the powers set forth in clauses 9, 10, 11 and 12 are very wide. These provisions would, I think, give this board the power to investigate any problem relevant to the development of the economy of the nation. So I think I can say affirmatively that this board would have the power to conduct inquiries into this matter.

It should also be borne in mind that the intention of the government and, I am sure, of this committee in setting up the board is to deal with long term problems and I understand that the problem which the hon. member has raised is, at least in some areas, of a short term nature because the impact will be felt in the relatively near future if something is not done in connection with it. As the hon. member knows, the bill which deals with this matter is being held up at the moment until the premiers from the three western provinces come here next week. I may also say—and I do not think this has been said before—that this problem is not one limited exclusively to the prairie provinces. It has its impact directly on other provinces in Canada, and I may say, in passing, that the premier of Nova Scotia is coming here some time early next week—he has asked for an appointment on Tuesday or Wednesday—to discuss with the government the very question which has been raised by the hon. member for Assiniboia. So, without saying that this bill would constitute the ideal machinery to deal with this problem I would say affirmatively that this question could be dealt with by the board if that were the desire of the house or the government at any time.

Mr. Argue: I thank the minister for his answer. I would simply say that I welcome the information that the premier of Nova Scotia will be in Ottawa to discuss the important question of railway branch lines.

Mr. Nowlan: Perhaps I can qualify that. He is coming to discuss not only the problem of branch lines but also other problems in the field of transportation.

Mr. Argue: No doubt he will be discussing other matters, too. We can think of all kinds of questions he might discuss.

I was about to say it is somewhat difficult for those of us who come from the prairies when we are made aware of a belief on the part of some people that this is purely a prairie question. It is a national question and I am sure it will be raised on a national basis just as soon as there are applications for the removal of branch lines in Ontario, Quebec and the maritime provinces to the degree that these applications have been forthcoming on the prairies. It is clear, however, from the evidence, that the prairies have had to take the lead in trying to get the government, after months of delay, to do something about these continuing applications to remove branch lines. The minister has said this is a short run affair. Well, if your railway is to be taken from you, you can call it short run or long run. If it is taken from you the day after tomorrow, I suppose it is a short run action but the difficulties and inconveniences will last as long as you live, or as long as you reside in that community. I would remind the minister, because he knows, already, that the MacPherson commission recommendation on this point has to do with the removal of branch line services over a period of 15 years. Here is a question, obviously, which requires long term planning and long term action. If this is to be merely short term action on the basis of the balance sheets of the railway companies, I ask the government what possible economic advantage would it be to the country to remove branch line services if by doing so you save the railway companies $1 and cost the communities involved something in excess of a dollar in increased costs? This is an important question and I am not certain what should be done about it, not having, as yet, seen the legislation which the government is to bring down to deal specifically with this problem. However, it is because of the determined opposition in western Canada to this job being given to the board of transport commissioners that I thought it worth while putting my inquiry to the minister. I thank him for his opinion that there is sufficient scope under this legislation to enable the kind of general inquiry I have in mind to be undertaken.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—Definitions. "Board".

Mr. Martin (Essex East): During the general discussion mention has been made of the planning programs of various European countries including the United Kingdom. Mention has been made that the chancellor of the exchequer, who holds a position in the United Kingdom similar to that occupied by the minister of finance here, occupies the post of chairman of the Neddy council. Can the minister say whether or not any consideration has been given to this arrangement and what his feeling in connection with the proposal is. It will be remembered that my hon. friend from Coast-Capilano emphasized this in his speech.

Mr. Nowlan: Yes. I should say, I suppose, that this is a suggestion to which consideration was given in the preliminary drafting of the bill. The official with whom I was associated realized that in the United Kingdom the chancellor of the exchequer was the chairman of a board popularly called Neddy. I would not say that we gave too careful consideration to this because it was felt that it was unusual on a board such as this, one to which we wanted to attract all areas of our economy to give advice to the government. It was felt that there might be some difficulty in appointing a member of the executive for the time being, whatever might be the party in power, or whoever he might be, to be chairman of the board. It was felt that the board should be kept relatively small, as has been pointed out by various hon. members; that there should be a permanent chairman who would give direction to the operations of the board and who would not be responsible for administrative details or responsibilities, as would a minister. I know that I do not have to remind the hon. member for Essex East of the problems of a minister in any department. Although it is true—and I say this without any reflection upon Neddy—that the chancellor of the exchequer in the United Kingdom is the chairman of the board, he carries so many responsibilities that I am quite sure he does not give the intensive direction to that board which we felt a chairman should give to this one. Therefore, it was decided by the government, and I suggest properly decided, that the chairman should be somebody brought in from outside who would act as chairman of the board, in the same way that other government boards have chairmen outside of the executive.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister's statement is an important one. It clearly indicates that the government does not have in mind the kind of body which exists in the United Kingdom, which exists in France, and about which we had some considerable detail from the hon. member for Gaspe yesterday in the very excellent speech which he delivered. We have no indication from the government of any intention to have a liaison between the government as such and this board except, as will be found in subsequent provisions in the bill, occasion is offered for reporting by the board to the minister. We will not even have what they have in France, the existence of a government rapporteur, who sits not only in the councils which have to do with the public, as well as the private sector. In France, in the top council, the "conseil superieur" and in the "commissariat du plan", provision is made for the existence of a rapporteur who represents the government. This we are not to have in the case of this particular board being set up by this bill. This gives an indication at this stage in our proceedings that the government does not have in mind the kind of planning body which the national productivity council special mission to Europe has reported on so favourably and which it has recommended for adoption in this country.

Mr. Nowlan: Well, Mr. Chairman, I do not want to get into a discussion on the details with the hon. member. As I said last night, the constitutional situation in France and in the United Kingdom, and in other European countries as well, is quite different from that in this country where we have a federal state, with provinces, and where the laws are such that it is very difficult to set up a unitary commission such as you might have in France or in other countries. Also in this country, rightly or wrongly, and I am sure the hon. member for Essex East will agree with me rightly, the state does not have the degree of control over industry which it has, shall we say, for instance, in France; so I suggest there is no complete parallel which one can draw between the two. When we come to the consideration of clauses 9, 10 and 11 we find that the duties and responsibilities of the board are set out. In clause 12 it is provided that:

> The board shall, to the greatest possible extent consistent with the performance of its duties under this act, co-operate with the national productivity council, the Atlantic development board, and all departments, branches and other agencies of the government of Canada—

I can assure the hon. member that it is the intent of those who are responsible for the inception, the drafting and the presentation of this bill to parliament that the closest co-operation and liaison between this board and all other facets of the Canadian economy, so far as the federal government is concerned, will take place, and I hope that that is also the case with the provincial governments in so far as they feel they can co-operate with this board in the development of the Canadian economy.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I would not want the remarks of the minister to be construed as establishing that we on this side had recommended overlooking the federal character of our constitution.

Mr. Nowlan: No, I did not mean that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am sure the minister did not mean that. But because he has made the observation, I think some comment is essential. I clearly indicated when speaking on the resolution that a complete parallel between what we proposed and what exists in various European nations was not possible in Canada because in every instance we were dealing with unitary states in Europe, whereas in Canada we have a federal state with ten provincial bodies operating and exercising sovereign powers under section 92 of the British North America Act. This difference between our constitutional set-up and that of the European countries offers in itself no justification, it seems to me for the suggestion made by the minister. As I pointed out, or endeavoured to point out, in my previous statement, there must be the closest possible co-operation between the federal and provincial governments to make effective the purposes of a planning board which is intended to deal in a total way with the economic problems of Canada. Indeed, I complained that this bill was deficient, as we shall later show when we come to the pertinent clause, in that it does not make provision for the co-operation which must prevail between the two senior levels of government. The minister is quite right that because of the property and civil rights clause in the British North America Act, it is open only to the provinces to exercise those powers which are exercised, for instance, in the United Kingdom under the town and country planning act. But it should be possible, having in mind the fiscal powers of the federal government with regard to its general and unlimited tax policy, for the federal government to be able to work out arrangements in connection with the provincial power over industry, let us say, in any given province in order to meet the problem of, for example, the relocation of industry mentioned by the hon. member for Essex West the other evening. This bill will be one having a most limited scope unless we provide in it an obligation of the board and of the government to bring about a co-operative effort between the two levels of government to achieve objectives which we think even in a limited way are encompassed in clause 9 of the bill.

Clause 2 agreed to.

On clause 3—Establishment of board.

Mr. Munro: Mr. Chairman, I should like to address a few remarks to the minister with respect to clause 3. We find this clause objectionable because there is no reference made to any action which the minister or the government must take with regard to consulting any of the principal organizations throughout the country which represent the various economic areas of Canadian life, presumably the very organizations the co-operation and assistance of which are going to be required if the aims of this board are to be realized. I think an outstanding example of the very thing which could happen here and which happened to a board somewhat similar in function to this one, namely the national productivity council, was the resignation of Mr. Claude Jodoin. It is not so much an example of the fact that he represents the Canadian Labour Congress but of the fact that he represents a large organization and presumably speaks for a large number of people in one specific area of our economic life. This could apply to the Canadian Manufacturers' Association or any other such organization where the government wishes to appoint a representative of that organization and puts men on a board, but owing to dissatisfaction with the manner of the appointment it did not get the co-operation of the association involved.

In pointing out the example of the appointment of Mr. Claude Jodoin, I would say that he resigned from the national productivity council on the basis that he was appointed without being consulted prior to his appointment. That is the first point. The second point is that he was not appointed as a representative of the large organization of which he was the head, namely the Canadian Labour Congress, and therefore felt that any contribution he could make to the national productivity council was severely limited, in that he could not speak for the Canadian Labour Congress, the very congress whose co-operation the national productivity council needed ever so badly, since the co-operation of labour and management was an essential to any proper carrying out of the duties of the national productivity council.

I cannot see how this legislation prevents a similar occurrence taking place with respect to the national economic development board. Again, and I may say this matter has been gone into several times in this House of Commons, the duties of this board seem to overlap to a considerable extent those of the national productivity council. Perhaps it is the suspicion of many of us that the ultimate purpose is to have it take over the national productivity council. If that is so, it is all the more important that the manner of appointment is such as to ensure the utmost co-operation of management and labour, to say nothing of agriculture, or the purpose of the national economic board will never be realized.

In view of this consideration I think it is essential to make an amendment to this particular clause. At the same time this amendment, it will be noted, does not derogate from the government's ultimate responsibility and jurisdiction in making an appointment. What the amendment does is to ensure that the organizations whose assistance is essential for this body are consulted prior to the appointment and that to some degree the government can be assured that, once the appointment is made, the particular appointee will be able to commit to a considerable extent the principal organizations of the country of which he is a member to assist in the carrying out of this board's duties. To that end I should like to make the following amendment:

> That the period in line 15 be replaced by a comma and the following words be added:
> "after consultation with the principal organizations representative of trade unions, farmers, and other groups as the governor in council may determine.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Peters: While we agree that some consideration should be given to this amendment, I believe it does not go nearly far enough. One of the problems in connection with the operation of the productivity council is that we are asking for advice and assistance from a number of groups and yet we are not allowing these groups to have an active part in the selection of their representatives, and therefore not after consultation with the governor in council but with the organizations which are interested in and concerned with this matter. They should have the opportunity of nominating their own representatives. The reason for this is simple. If we are going to ask for the co-operation of certain industries and certain large corporations as was done during the last war, then there is one thing that should be done. On that occasion we gave them representation in the form of dollar-a-year men in many cases. However, these men had the backing of the independent companies who were paying them, and they went to their assignments with the understanding that if they made a suggestion to the government, that suggestion was one which they could put into effect.

While I do not wish to discuss the representatives of corporations, I know that in a union it is extremely difficult to elect, through convention or in any manner through which a representative may be chosen, one who will go and take part in deliberations in a council or other body and who is not in a position to commit the organization he is representing. This situation cannot come by selection. It cannot come by the governor in council asking for this, as actually that is the cabinet. It can come only if the representative is one who has the permission and direction of his organization to back up the representations he makes. I suggest that is something that has been done in days gone by and that in this particular case anything less will not be particularly successful. May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

The Deputy Chairman: It being five o'clock, it is my duty to leave the chair in order that the house may proceed to the consideration of private members' business, pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15.

Clause 3 stands.

Progress reported.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business. The items for consideration today are private bills which appear on pages 19 to 57 of today's order paper.

Mr. More: Mr. Speaker, I should like to seek the unanimous consent of the house to have dealt with first item No. 370 on today's order paper, namely second reading of Bill S-9, an act respecting the Evangelical Lutheran Synod of Western Canada.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Regina City seeks the unanimous consent of the house to have considered, in priority to all other items, item No. 370 on today's order paper, being second reading of Bill S-9, an act respecting the Evangelical Synod of Western Canada. Has the hon. member such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Peters.]

THE EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN SYNOD OF WESTERN CANADA

Mr. K. H. More (Regina City) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-9, respecting the Evangelical Lutheran Synod of Western Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Herridge: I simply wish to ask the hon. member whether he is going to explain to the house the purpose of the bill so that we shall understand clearly what we are dealing with.

Mr. More: The purpose of this bill, Mr. Speaker, as set out in the explanatory notes, is to give effect to an agreement of consolidation, effective as of July 1, 1962, whereby four large branches of the Lutheran church in the United States and Canada, namely American Evangelical Lutheran Church, the Augustana Evangelical Lutheran Church, the Finnish Evangelical Lutheran Church of America and the United Lutheran Church in America agreed to consolidate under the name of "Lutheran Church in America". The Evangelical Lutheran Synod of Western Canada was one of the synods of the United Lutheran Church in America.

The territorial jurisdiction of the Evangelical Lutheran Synod of Western Canada included the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and that part of Ontario lying west of the 86th meridian of longitude, the Yukon territory and the Northwest Territories.

Under the terms of consolidation, this synod is to be known as central Canada synod of the Lutheran church in America and the territorial jurisdiction is to be limited to the provinces of Saskatchewan and Manitoba and that portion of the province of Ontario lying west of the 88th meridian of longitude.

Clause 1 of the bill changes the name of the corporation in accordance with the agreement of consolidation.

Clause 2 of the bill provides for the adherence of the corporation to the Lutheran church in America in ecclesiastical matters.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

SONJA BAGRY

The house in committee on Bill No. SD-6, for the relief of Sonja Bagry—Mr. Mandziuk —Mr. Paul in the chair.

On clause 1.

Mr. Howard: In so far as the bill before us is concerned, I have taken the liberty in the last few minutes of looking at the evidence upon which the bill is founded. There are a number of strange things about it which I think should be examined very closely by committee of the whole before the committee decides to recommend the bill to the house. I would particularly draw your attention to a few changes which were made in the petition as it was originally drafted and as it now appears in printed form before us. These changes took place before the committee of the Senate, and some of them make one wonder what the Senate committee was thinking about or trying to do when it made these changes.

In the first instance, part 1 of the petition upon which this bill is founded reads:

> That on or about the 8th of May, 1945, your petitioner was lawfully married to the said—

Then, there is the name of the respondent.

> —in Braunschweig, Germany.

However, in the evidence which was given before the committee by the petitioner, from which I should like to read a few excerpts, with the committee keeping in mind that the petition which is now printed before us contains the note that on or about the 8 May 1945, the marriage took place, different statements are made. The petitioner appeared, was sworn and proceeded to give certain evidence to which I must refer now. She identified herself, her address, occupation, religion and where she was married. Then, these questions were asked by the clerk of the committee:

> Q. When were you married?
> A. July 26, 1945.

There was no hesitation, just a direct statement, July 26, 1945. You will recall the petition as it is now printed gives the date as May 8, 1945. Then, the clerk says:

> Q. I show you a document. Do you recognize this document?
> A. Yes.
> Q. What is it?
> A. That is a marriage paper.
> Q. Are the statements in it correct?
> A. Yes.
> Q. Have you seen this document before?
> A. Well, I have it.
> Q. You sent it in?
> A. Yes.

Then, the marriage certificate was filed as exhibit 1. There are some other questions about recognizing a photograph of her husband and then the lawyer, Mr. Masse, asks these questions:

> Q. I understand you were married on the 14th July, 1945?
> A. Yes.

Previously, she had answered it was July 26, 1945 and now she says it was July 14, 1945. Then, the chairman of the committee interrupts and asks:

> Q. Do you know the date you were married?
> A. I don't know.
> Q. What month were you married?
> A. I think it is June or May, I don't remember.
> Q. What does the marriage certificate say?
> A. In May, I think.
> Mr. Masse: The 8th of May.
> The Chairman: 1945?
> Mr. Masse: Yes.
> The Chairman: You had better amend the petition.

Then, the committee approves an amendment to the petition showing the date which appears on the marriage certificate. Let us remember that it took a series of questions by the clerk of the committee, by the lawyer representing her and by the chairman to get information as to the exact date of the marriage, and the answers ranged over two different months and two different dates in one month. Perhaps this is not important in itself, but it is important I think when we connect it with the other alterations and changes which were made in the petition and the other inconsistencies in the evidence given by those who appeared as witnesses.

There was another change which took place in the petition as it was originally presented and as it now appears before us. This was in clause No. 6 of the petition which now reads:

> That after the said marriage and until the month of June, 1951, your petitioner lived and cohabited with the said—in Braunschweig, Germany to the month of November, 1947, and thereafter in Montreal, Canada, and that two children were born of the said marriage—

Then, the petition gives their names and the dates of their birth. In the petition as originally presented it indicated that there was only one child born of the marriage. Subsequent evidence brought to light the fact that there were two, one of whom had died, I believe in 1953. Accordingly, the petition was amended to cite the facts as they were, correctly.

That particular clause 6 of the petition also says that they came here to Canada in November, 1947 from Germany, and in the evidence which is given later on as to what time it was that they came here, the petitioner was not quite sure when it was and had to be prompted somewhat by the lawyer with respect to that particular time, but that was subsequently cleared up.

There is one other change in the petition which I submit is of great importance and should be studied at some length by this committee. It concerns clause 7 which I gather is the one of main substance, namely that which alleges the commission of adultery. As it is printed the petition reads as follows:

That during the month of January, 1961 and on numerous other occasions in 1961 the said ... committed adultery with one ... housewife, residing at—

Further on it alleges that they were living, residing, cohabitating at that address as man and wife, or what is loosely referred to as a common law relationship. The particular point with which we must concern ourselves is that during the month of June, 1961, adultery was committed.

The committee must remember that petitions are not hastily drawn up. A petition is prepared by a lawyer who undoubtedly acquaints himself as fully as possible with all the facts to make sure everything is correct in the petition so far as its allegations are concerned. Now, the original petition reads: "That in the night of June 13th, 1961" certain things took place. That is subsequently changed by the committee of the other place to read "during the month of June, 1961". Instead of confining it to one evening or one day they expanded it to embrace the entire month of June.

I submit that was done for a particular purpose by the senators on the committee in the other place, namely, to bend over backwards if necessary to ensure that the allegations of adultery were proven, because if June 13 had remained in the petition, as will be shown later on, none of the three witnesses who appeared on behalf of the petitioner had any knowledge of what happened on the night of June 13 when it was originally alleged adultery took place. I say that the senators in the other place, in their overzealous desire for proper court procedures, expanded this period to give the benefit to the petitioner.

Mr. Fairweather: It was more than you are doing.

Mr. Howard: In answer to my hon. friend who interjects, all he has to do is communicate with the Prime Minister to try to inject some backbone into the Prime Minister, and perhaps then we will get some solution to this particular problem.

One of the witnesses called was a Joseph Szabo who, having been sworn, testified as to his name and his age being 33, his place of living being Montreal and his occupation being a cutter. He is not, as has been the case in many instances, a private investigator or detective, but an ordinary citizen following an ordinary course of activity. He is shown a photograph of the respondent. He recognizes the portrait and identifies it as the respondent, or husband in this particular case. Then certain questions are asked of him as follows:

Q. Do you know where he lives?
A. I know.
Q. What is his address?

He gives the address as it was contained in the petition.

Q. Do you know how long he has been living there, or since when do you know he has been living there?
A. I know since 1960, August.
Q. How do you know he is living there?
A. I was boarding there.

Here is an individual who lived as a boarder, I suppose for about a year, in a particular house where this respondent is alleged to have committed adultery.

Q. Was Mr. Bagry living alone in that dwelling?
A. No, he wasn't. He was living with his wife.
Q. With his wife?
A. Yes.
Q. Do you know his wife? Can you show to us who his wife is?
A. Yes, this person here.

Obviously he pointed to somebody in the committee room. Then it continues:

By the Chairman:

Q. You are pointing to the corespondent?
A. Yes.
Q. I show you the petitioner in this case. That is not the woman you mean, is it?
A. No, I never saw her (the petitioner) in my life.

The same question is asked again and then another question:

Q. Do you know the other woman as the wife of Mr. Bagry?
A. Yes.

This indicates, on the evidence of this gentleman, who was a boarder at this residence, that for the period of time he was a boarder there until at least the time when the petition was presented—that would be from August, 1960 until June, 1961—the respondent and corespondent were living together as man and wife and presumably the corespondent was using the surname of the respondent, as one would think would happen. That in itself should be sufficient grounds upon which to grant the divorce, namely that a set of circumstances show a couple are living together as man and wife and one of them is married to somebody else. Apparently the lawyer did not think so because he proceeded to ask further questions. Apparently the Senate committee did not think that was sufficient either, and they proceeded to hear other witnesses and make other inquiries. The lawyer, Mr. Masse, asks this witness some of those further questions:

Q. How long have you boarded there?
A. A little over a year.
Q. Would you tell us how many rooms there were in the apartment where he was living?
A. There were two bedrooms: the one I was living in and another bedroom with them.
Q. Who was sleeping in the other bedroom?
A. Both of them.

Q. Did you have a chance to see the inside of this room?
A. No. I had but not at night, sometimes.

That sounds as if it is the Minister of National Defence interpreting the statement of the Prime Minister.

An hon. Member: Get back to the subject.

Mr. Howard: My hon. friend enjoyed the recitation from this evidence so much, by his jocular response, that I thought he was inviting me to go a little bit further into other jocular things, such as the defence policy of the government. The evidence continues:

Q. Do you know how many beds there were in that room?
A. Only one.
Q. Was it a small or a large bed?

As if that makes an difference with two people living together as man wife and in the same room. Anyway the answer is:

It was a large bed, a chesterfield that opened up at night.
Q. Were you living there during the month of June, 1961?
A. Yes.
Q. All through the month?
A. Yes.
Q. And every night the corespondent slept in the same room as the respondent, Mr.—

Then there is the name of the respondent:

A. Yes.
Q. Was she or he absent for one night?
A. I don't understand the question.
Q. Were they away from the house some time during the month of June?
A. I don't remember.
Q. You don't remember them being away?
A. No.

Then the chairman interrupts to deal with the significance of the June 13 date in the original petition as the one night upon which adultery was supposed to have taken place. The chairman asks:

What significance has your pleading of June 13?

Mr. Masse: Because we have one witness who was there during the night and can state that they were there.

The Chairman: But this witness cannot testify as to that?

Mr. Masse: No.

The Chairman: All right.

Mr. Masse: That is all for this witness.

So throughout this matter, Mr. Chairman, we find there is one witness who says there existed a so-called common law relationship with this couple living together as man and wife, the woman representing herself by name as the wife of the respondent; they were living together, sleeping together and cohabiting in one room in a bed chesterfield, a chesterfield that at night makes down into a bed. But when it comes to the night in question to which the petitioner refers, the witness is ignorant of that night or is not able to recall anything about it with regard to whether or not the couple were there, or the like. So he leaves the scene as a witness because he is unable to deal with this particular night of June 13.

Following him there is another witness, a gentleman by the name of Albert Zchilter. He is sworn and gives the information as to his name, his age being 53, his address, and his occupation as a grocer. It is interesting to note there, Mr. Chairman, that the address which he gives for himself is in the same block and on the same street as that given in the petition and as that which the first witness gave as his place of residence as a boarder throughout the period of time in question.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret to inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, this is a very interesting case for a number of reasons which—

(Translation):

Mr. Legare: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that my hon. friend intends to put on the record all the evidence which was wholly or partly given before the divorce committee of the other place.

May I point out to my hon. colleagues that in these precincts some of the page boys are barely 13 years old. When I look at the record of our discussions last week, more particularly on page 3087, I wonder if these youngsters could not do better than to hear us speak of adultery, cohabitation or concubinage.

Perhaps it would be a good idea to ask the youngest among them to leave the room, or to replace them by older pages. I am convinced that should the parents hear our debates, we might meet with some difficulties in our future recruiting of page boys.

It seems to me that my suggestion is in order. Let my hon. friends put into the record whatever evidence they please, but not in the presence of the youngest boys.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, on the same point of order, I must say that we have been sitting for some time and every Tuesday night, between five and six, we hear exactly the same remarks. For this reason, I am supporting my friend, the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Legare), in what he just said.

The questions were asked. The hearings took place. The evidence was heard in the divorce committee of the Senate. Those bills are now sent back to this house where they are re-sifted and warmed up, one after the other. And what do we get out of it? As a matter of fact most of the bills I looked into concerned cases of adultery—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I understood that the hon. member rose to support the remarks made in the same spirit by the hon. member for Rimouski. If he wants to drift away from them, I shall not be able to allow further comments from the hon. member as I have already recognized the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters).

I would therefore ask the hon. member to limit his remarks to what the hon. member for Rimouski said.

Mr. Ouellet: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Anyway, I apologize for perhaps having gone beyond the point made by the hon. member for Rimouski.

To sum it up, as far as the young page boys are concerned, regarding debates on divorce, where there is question of adultery, of someone having slept here or there, I think it is more interesting for us than for the page boys.

Really, in supporting my hon. friend from Rimouski, I wonder if some way might be found to prevent a constant repetition of those words in this house, which would save the Canadian people much time and money for, after all, there may be some divorce bills which could be granted without the lengthy discussion of warmed over evidence which there is no need for us to hear, as it has been previously submitted to the proper authorities.

(Text):

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I shall be very brief. As one of the members of the house with lingering Victorian tendencies, I was very pleased to hear the hon. member opposite support the suggestion which had been made previously in this debate by my colleague the hon. member for Timiskaming, that the younger members of the page staff should be asked to leave during this discussion. It is most unfortunate in a sense that these discussions have to take place and this evidence has to be read, and so on, but my colleagues are doing this with the intention of improving the procedures with respect to divorce in Canada. I do urge, Mr. Chairman, that you give consideration to the suggestion made by the hon. member with respect to the page boys.

(Translation):

The Chairman: Members of the committee will notice that action has been taken following the remarks made by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Legare) and that the younger pages have already left the house.

(Text):

Mr. Scott: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska in his remarks a moment ago mentioned that we were taking up the time of the house discussing these matters, and he asked us where it was going to end and what we were hoping to achieve. I take that to be in the nature of a question directed to us and I should like to answer it. Since the commencement of the session we have always spoken very reluctantly on these matters and would be very happy to have the entire proceedings removed from this chamber so that we would not have to deal with them. But we have taken the position that if we are going to be made to deal with divorces, then we intend to do a thorough job. We are most reluctant to participate in these matters. We wish they were not here. We would be glad to have them transferred to a competent jurisdiction when the government sees fit so to do.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I think he is trying to create a debate between himself and the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska. Also, in his remarks I think he is ranging very far from the principle of the bill the committee is now studying.

Mr. Scott: Mr. Chairman, I would never do that. I was merely trying to point out our position in this particular matter.

Mr. Crestohl: May I ask the hon. member who has just resumed his seat a question? Can he inform the committee whether any progress has been made by the representatives of the four parties who are attempting to reach some satisfactory decision about this matter?

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The remarks of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier have no relevancy to the subject of this bill. I am sorry, but I cannot allow the hon. member for Danforth to answer this question.

Mr. Howard: I do not want to become involved in that interlude at this stage, though if the rules would permit it I would certainly like to. All I can do is suggest that the hon. member who raised the question should ask the hon. member for Laurier who it was who scuttled the negotiations which took place.

One of the witnesses who appeared before the committee in the other place to give evidence was a grocer. I say that by way of repetition only to bring all his evidence into one place so that we may be able to follow more clearly what is going on. As I said at the outset of the remarks I made when I first spoke this session with respect to these divorce bills—and this will be of particular interest, I think, to the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska and others—I do not like taking part in these particular debates on these particular bills. I do not want to. I would just as soon not have to do so. I would just as soon we did not have continually, twice a week, to deal with these questions here and recite at length excerpts from the evidence given before the other place. However, as long as we have to deal with this bill which is before us, and others, we feel it is our responsibility to do so in as much detail as is necessary to get across the point of view we hold. I wish other hon. members would participate to the same extent. Perhaps in that way we could bring pressure to bear on the authorities responsible for dealing with these matters.

(Translation):

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I should like to ask you a question. Have the bills which are being referred to us by the Senate been examined previously by the other place?

The Deputy Chairman: The Chair cannot answer questions that hon. members of the committee may wish to ask.

(Text):

Mr. Howard: I am prevented by your ruling, Mr. Chairman, from replying to that interesting question. I had a worth while, interesting argument to make, one which represents my views about the members of the other place and whether they study anything with assiduity or not. In any event, Mr. Zchilter, a grocer, gives evidence by recognizing and identifying a picture of the respondent. He gives his name. Then follows a series of questions and answers:

Q. Who is this man? A. Ignaz.
Q. Ignaz who? A. Ignaz Bagry.
Q. Where does he live? A. Next door to us, upstairs, I don't know the house number.
Q. How long has he been living there, to your knowledge?
A. Oh, six, seven years.
Q. Do you know his trade or occupation. A. A tailor.
Q. Do you know whether he is married or not?
A. Well, at that time he was supposed to be married.
Q. Do you know the person? Do you see her in this room?
A. This woman here.

Those questions were asked by Mr. Masse. Now the chairman asks a few questions.

Q. You are pointing to the corespondent. It is not the petitioner. A. I never seen her (indicating the petitioner).
Q. You never saw the petitioner before? A. No.

So here we find the grocer, who has lived next door to this couple, indicating that they have been together as man and wife for six or seven years. He had some inkling that they were not married as may be gathered from his answer to the question when he said "supposed to be married". Mr. Masse asks:

Q. Have you seen Mr. Bagry and the woman that you thought was his wife many times during those seven years? A. All the time.

Witness again indicates that here is a so-called common law marital relationship which has existed for a period of seven years. Perhaps that would be sufficient to meet the test of the other place, which is adultery, because adultery as far as this case and others are concerned is solely an occasion of sexual intercourse having taken place. Proof of the act itself is seldom given. What is required is just a set of circumstances which would lead a reasonable person to assume that such an act had taken place. Presumably the senators had come to the conclusion in their own minds after a couple had lived together for seven years representing themselves as man and wife the test of adultery had been met. However, they went further.

Before I pursue the matter, because now the evidence goes into the question of children being involved, I wonder if I might have your indulgence to count the house, Mr. Chairman, in order to decide whether there is a quorum to allow us to proceed.

The Deputy Chairman: I check all the time. We have had a quorum since five o'clock. The last time I checked was about half a minute ago and there were 22 members in the committee.

Mr. Howard: That is two above par, 20 being the quorum. Of course, while reading the evidence here I cannot count at the same time. Perhaps one of these days people will be so disinterested that there will be less than that number present.

The next exchange which is of interest to the committee is as follows:

By Mr. Masse:

Q. Are there any children living that house? A. One girl.
Q. How old is she? A. Five or six; I don't know.

One would have assumed that this would be reason for eliciting additional evidence to show that this child was the child of the respondent and the corespondent, because they had lived together as man and wife for seven years. We shall go on to see whether this particular point is covered, and used as additional proof that adultery had taken place during the seven year period. But the chairman interposes to ask this:

Q. Are you going to prove June 13 through this witness?

To which Mr. Masse replies:

No, I have another witness.

This seems to indicate that the chairman is concerned overmuch about whether adultery took place on the night of June 13. Otherwise he would not have interrupted at a point where evidence was being given about a child five or six years of age living in the same house and whether or not this child had been born to the respondent and the corespondent who, according to the evidence, were living together as man and wife. The chairman goes on to ask whether the witness knows that Mr. Bagry had lived in the city of Montreal for the last six or seven years and gets the answer: "Oh, yes, naturally". I wonder if the chairman was there when the earlier evidence was given or, if he was there, whether he was paying much attention to it. He goes on to ask: "And he is still there now?" Witness replies, yes. Then one of the senators asked:

> Did you ever visit him in his rooms?
> A. No.
> Q. You never went up there?
> A. No.
> By the Chairman:
> Q. I suppose he buys groceries from you?
> A. Yes, but they take it themselves up. I may have been up once a long time ago at the beginning.

In so far as any knowledge on the part of this grocer is concerned with regard to adultery having taken place, he has not the foggiest idea. All he knows is that there is a couple living next door "upstairs some place" who take groceries upstairs. He has no knowledge of beds and the other accoutrements which go along with married life. He may have had some knowledge about the child, whether or not he thought her to be the child of this couple, but he gives no evidence about that. As far as the grocer is concerned we can completely discount his evidence as to adultery, unless we take it that he knew them together in the area for some seven years as one selling groceries to them. He said that they perhaps represented themselves as man and wife.

I suggest that this is what the committee in the other place did, and this is what was particularly in the mind of the chairman and the other members of the committee: they had convinced themselves early enough in the proceedings before that committee that there was a so-called common law relationship, and that was good enough for them. They were merely trying to get some little bit of information to prove adultery. That is why they persisted in inquiring about the night of June 13. We now find two witnesses have appeared, neither one of whom knows anything about the night of June 13 and the allegation that adultery was committed there. In each case when he was asked the lawyer representing the petitioner said: "No, I am not going to prove this by either of these two witnesses; I have another witness coming".

Mr. Ouellet: Can I ask a question?

Mr. Howard: Certainly.

Mr. Ouellet: Is it true there are 492 private bills before us which have been accepted by the other place; and is it not your opinion that we should accept all of these bills together?

Mr. Howard: The answer to that question is simply no. In the first place, I have not much faith in the other place. Second, I have found out they have been misled before, because people who appeared before the committee of the other place have been sentenced to penitentiary terms for committing perjury in divorce cases heard before the committee of the other place. Third, we do not think that parliament is the place to be a rubber stamp for marital difficulties of people living in Quebec, in Newfoundland, or anywhere else. That is why we are taking the course of following in detail the evidence in each case. I hope that is a satisfactory answer.

Mr. Ouellet: One more question. Do you expect to discuss in detail each bill and to pass them?

Mr. Howard: At the rate we are going, one bill an hour, it would take us, on your count, 492 weeks, and I do not think we will be here this long. But if we return for another session and these bills are still before us, presumably over a course of 20 or 30 years we can touch on each one of them. The solution is very simple. We have the right honourable gentleman as the Prime Minister of this country. We have his cabinet, composed of his colleagues, astute, able and capable gentlemen that they are. Surely they can come up with an answer to this very vexing problem. We have offered them many solutions and alternatives. We even went so far as to pick the Prime Minister's greatest love, namely his love for royal commissions, and we asked him to appoint a royal commission on this question. This would satisfy our desires for the moment. So far the Prime Minister has decided to be as vacillating as he usually is, so we have no other course to follow but to proceed on each one. We shall have to go through each of these 492, plus 200 or 300 more added each year until this question is solved.

Now we have another witness. This is the key witness, the individual who knows about the night of June 13. This is the man who comes forward with the evidence about the pink pyjamas, ruffled beds, dented pillows, rumpled sheets, and all the other gory details which private investigators love to reveal to the committee of the other place on the question of whether or not adultery has taken place. The other two witnesses, so far as the proof of adultery on June 13 is concerned, do not matter. One of them did not have the foggiest idea about that night, and the other one did not remember about that particular night. Now we have a Mr. Armand Masse, who gives his age as 22, his address as Montreal, and his occupation as a collector. He was sworn through an interpreter and I presume would have testified in the French language, and had his evidence interpreted all the way through by the interpreter attached to the committee in the other place. He was shown a picture of the respondent and is asked whether he recognized it, and he said it was the respondent. Then he is asked:

Did you have the opportunity to meet Mr.—

and then he gave the name of the respondent, to which he answered that he had, twice. Here is a gentleman who did not know the respondent, as the grocer did for seven years. He had not lived in the house as a boarder as the cutter, the other witness, had. He had met him on two occasions. Then the question is:

Could you tell us on these two occasions what happened?
A. The first time I went there I gave a reason for going there, and I asked him who was living there with him, in the apartment, and he showed me his boarder and his wife.

Mr. Chairman, can you put yourself in that position? A man comes to your house. He does not know you, meets you for the first time, gives you a reason for coming to you, and asks you who is living in your house. Would you automatically say: "Yes, here is my boarder and my wife", when this individual is just a collector, unless he represented himself as a private detective, or something like that? Then the next question is:

Is the person that he showed you as his wife present in this room?
A. Yes, there.

Then he pointed to somebody who the chairman discovered by question was the co-respondent. This is a person, who is the co-respondent, in the committee room according to two or three different witnesses, and it is a wonder to me that the lawyer did not take steps to give testimony with respect to the allegation of adultery inasmuch as she was there in the committee room. She did not have to give evidence. Perhaps her lawyer asked her and she said no, but it would have been much simpler than to have had this parade of witnesses, so far none of whom knew anything at all about the alleged adultery having taken place on the night of June 13. The chairman continued:

Do you know the petitioner sitting beside her counsel?
A. I haven't seen her before this morning.
Q. On the second occasion what happened?

This is the second time he went back to the house where the respondent lived.

A. I rang the bell about two o'clock in the morning. A lady came out on the balcony in her night attire and said she would call the police if we stayed there, so we went back.

I would point out that there is no further indication in the evidence as to who those persons were; whether this person Armand Masse, who classified himself as a collector, went back with somebody else, or what happened. But the word "we" is used. Then the lawyer asked further questions:

Which person told you that?
A. The lady there at the back (indicating the corespondent).

Mr. Chairman, remember this. At two o'clock in the morning somebody comes to the house and rings the bell. On the evidence of this grocer this couple lived upstairs. Then a lady came out on the balcony and said that she would call the police if they did not go away, and that same person merely recognized her in the committee of the other place as the person who came out onto that balcony.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I must inform him that his time has expired.

Mr. Scott: In connection with this bill, Mr. Chairman, there is one matter which I should like to draw to the attention of the committee. Having reviewed the evidence as we are required to do, I would take slight issue with the hon. member for Skeena. I think the evidence has proved the case and that normally the bill would be granted. However, there is one issue on this bill which we should consider, namely the matter of domicile. The members of the other place have taken the position that, in order to consider this divorce the husband to the marriage must be domiciled in the province of Quebec. On reviewing the evidence in connection with this bill I find there seems to be considerable doubt whether or not the husband in this particular case was domiciled in Quebec.

The evidence discloses that he was married May 8, 1945, in Braunschweig, Germany, and that he later came to Canada in 1947, where the couple lived in the city of Montreal. In 1949, the evidence discloses that he ran away and went to some place known as Toronto. The husband in this case would have a domicile of origin in Germany and could not acquire domicile in Montreal in the space of two years, or at least not without some substantial evidence being adduced in order to indicate that this event had taken place. As all hon. members are aware, everyone has a domicile of origin, namely the place in which he was born and it stays with him throughout life unless it is relinquished and a domicile of choice is acquired. In these circumstances, the husband having lived in Montreal for only two years, there is no evidence that he ever acquired a domicile of choice in the province of Quebec. In any event, in 1949 he ran away to Toronto, although he later came back and lived in the city of Montreal once again.

The most important ingredient in the law of domicile is not merely living in a particular province but rather living there with the intention of remaining there forever. That is the essential ingredient which must be proven in order to show that domicile of origin has been relinquished and that domicile of choice has been acquired. In this particular case the only evidence we have before us is that of several witnesses, one of whom testified that the defendant's husband lived in these particular quarters for two years. The second witness says he thinks he lived there for six years. In those circumstances I am surprised that the other place would have entertained this bill. This evidence would clearly not prove domicile in the province of Quebec.

Under normal circumstances it would be required that the defendant husband be called as witness and that he be examined by members of the other place in order for them to satisfy themselves that he was not only living in Quebec but that he intended to remain there forever. There is no evidence that the gentleman was sinking his roots in the community, that he was carrying on a business, that he was owning property or that he was doing any of the other things which are usually regarded by the court in order to establish domicile of choice.

I notice that the defendant husband was served on October 16, 1961, and that the bill was considered on January 20, 1962. In the circumstances, it seems rather strange that the defendant husband was not brought before the committee since he apparently was readily available. Had he been brought before the committee, he could then have been questioned in order to establish his domicile. What I am suggesting to the committee is that perhaps this bill should be referred back for consideration of the matter of domicile. My submission is that the husband was domiciled in Germany, that on the evidence before us he has never acquired a domicile of choice in the province of Quebec and that therefore under the rules of the other place they could not have taken jurisdiction in this matter.

As I say, I cannot understand why this matter was not pursued in the other place. In any event, such appears to be the case. We therefore suggest that this matter go back to the committee of the house which previously considered it where proper, thorough and searching examination could be made of the whole matter of the domicile of the husband and where the committee could decide whether or not sufficient evidence existed so that the matter of domicile had been adequately proven. Then we could give further consideration to this bill on another day.

Mr. Howard: My friend from Danforth being a member of the legal profession obviously runs to the core of the problem of domicile whereas senators in the other place obviously disregard that matter as having no significance whatsoever and merely concern themselves with being a convenient vehicle for people with marital difficulties in Quebec. They will bend or twist the rules or interpret the evidence in any way they wish just so long as the divorce is granted. That was the point on which I was proceeding previously. We had reached the point of this particular witness giving evidence about his knowledge of what happened on the night of June 13. Questions are asked of him about this night when the adultery was supposed to have taken place after he rang the bell at two o'clock in the morning.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It being six o'clock shall I report progress and request leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house?

Mr. Howard: Under normal circumstances I would ask consent to proceed further in order to clear up this matter. However, perhaps we can leave it to another day.

Progress reported.

NATIONAL ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT BOARD

PROVISION FOR DEFINITION OF DUTIES, APPOINTMENT OF MEMBERS, ETC.

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. C-87, to provide for the establishment of a national economic development board—Mr. Nowlan—Mr. Paul in the chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

On clause 3—Establishment of board.

The Chairman: When the committee rose at five o'clock it had under consideration section 3. An amendment had been proposed thereto by the hon. member for Hamilton East which reads as follows:

That section 3 be amended as follows: That the period in line 15 be replaced by a comma and the following words be added:

"After consultation with the principal organizations representative of trade unions, farmers, and other groups as the governor in council may determine."

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, in speaking to this amendment before five o'clock I had suggested that the clause would be strengthened if rather than merely appointing these representatives after consultation with the organization they were to be designated upon request by the various organizations to which they belong. I believe that there should be representatives of business, labour, agriculture, consumers groups and other organizations interested in this field.

One of the problems we have had with other legislation, a good example of which is that having to do with the productivity council, arises from the fact that in that organization, for instance, while there is provision for consultation with the various organizations and some opportunity for them to be represented, difficulties have arisen with regard to acceptance by the government of the representatives of those organizations, and in my opinion this situation has not proved to be advantageous.

I go back a considerable length of time to when this country did have difficulties to face and when much greater assistance than simply participation was sought from labour, business organizations, trade groups and even consumer groups. At that time many of these organizations were allowed to appoint their own representatives and such a procedure means that representatives appointed in this way carry with them the responsibility of being able to commit the organizations they represent to some extent.

It seems to me that if the trade union movement, for example, is to be represented on this new board the representative of labour should be appointed in a manner which will allow him to commit the trade labour movement from the point of view of participation in the activities of the national economic development board. When he made a suggestion he would know that he would have the strength of his organization behind him and that the organization would throw its weight behind the suggestion. I put this idea forward for the simple reason that when the government makes an appointment they do not necessarily choose the person best qualified to represent the organization. This is true, of course, of business or any other organization.

I think of what happened in the United States when Wilson of General Motors was appointed by the government of that country to carry out a particular job. He took with him to that appointment the tacit agreement of General Motors that if he proposed a certain measure in the interests of the economy of his country General Motors would lend its support and help to put it into effect. Rather than the government simply consulting various organizations with regard to appointments to this board, I think the board would be strengthened if the various organizations were allowed to appoint their representatives, with the understanding that any suggestions they put forward would have the support of the organizations they represented.

I am not completely familiar with what has happened in the case of the industrial estates in the maritimes but I understand that such a practice has been followed to some extent in that instance. I understand that the representatives in the industrial estates—perhaps I should refer to it as the economic council—can to some extent commit the organizations which have appointed them, and I think this is very worth while.

I hope this suggestion will be given some consideration. It may be that the mover of the amendment would like to strengthen it by including some provision whereby representatives of various organizations would carry with them the authority to commit their organizations to some extent at least. The government is not going to provide all the impetus in the matter of economic development and I think those who participate as representatives must carry with them some responsibility for the organizations they represent and that the organizations should accept the responsibility of naming representatives to the advisory council.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, I have listened to the suggestion of my hon. friend with respect to the proposed amendment to section 3. I remember what he said about representing a group and I would remind him of what I am sure he is very conscious, the letter written by Edmund Burke to the electors of Bristol almost a century and a half ago as to the responsibility of those who represent certain groups in certain organizations, and even members of parliament in parliament. But without trespassing further on the time of the committee I would say I am prepared to accept the amendment which has been moved by the hon. member. With regard to the policy of the government consulting these various groups, I would point out we have discussions with various members of labour and agricultural organizations, and it would never be the thought of the government to appoint representatives to this board without consultation. Therefore,

Mr. Chairman, I am very happy to say we accept the amendment as proposed by the hon. member.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The acceptance by the minister of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Hamilton East represents a strengthening of the clause, as urged by the hon. member and supported by the hon. member for Timiskaming. As the minister has said, it would be inconceivable if in the establishment of a board such as this, consideration was not given to the important opinion of labour, management and other essential segments of Canadian opinion. Indeed we would be defeating the purposes of the bill. We would be ignoring the recommendations made by the productivity council's special mission to Europe.

I think we have a right to ask the minister what the government's view is with regard to the recommendations made by the special mission of the productivity council to Europe. Reference has been made a number of times to this very important report, a unique document in itself. We have not had from the government, from any of the ministers who have spoken nor can I recall any observations or supporting statements being made by any hon. member sitting behind the ministry. This is the clause on which we should have a statement of opinion from the government as to its view with regard to the recommendations made. It will be no answer to say that the recommendations were made to the productivity council, because that would ignore one of the essential features of this bill which should be predicated on labour-management co-operation.

On page 5 of the report of the special mission the commissioners unanimously agree on the course to be taken. They say, first of all, that there is a high level of economic activity in all of the countries in Europe visited by them. They point out that practically all of the labour forces are gainfully employed, and that generally job vacancies exceed the numbers not employed. They further point out that plant productive capacity, with few exceptions, is being fully utilized and that wages, both real and nominal, have been rising at an appreciable pace.

They point out that employers appear to be prosperous and confident for the future and then, at page 5, they go on to say:

> There is little doubt that labour-management-government co-operation has contributed greatly to this general prosperity. It would be misleading, however, to attribute the prosperity of Europe solely to this co-operation. Many factors, some of which have little relationship to labour-management-government co-operation, have played a major role in bringing about this prosperous state of affairs.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

They then go on to point out, on the same page, the principal factors involved in European prosperity. On page 6 they say:

> The mission was impressed with the spirit of the relationship existing between labour, management and government, the way in which they worked together in the national interest, and the mechanism of consultation and co-operation which has been established and used to achieve economic successes in most countries visited. The spirit of co-operation between labour and management and the process of consultation with each other and with government in economic development is not confined to the national level. The spirit has spread to the industry and plant levels in most countries and the machinery for consultation and co-operation is working in industries and plants through joint councils and committees at that level as well.

Then they conclude:

> At the national level the consultative function in economic development is carried out through joint councils or bodies whose members, particularly from labour and management, represent the major interests involved in the economic life of the country.

Then they point out the gap which exists between western Europe labour-management-government co-operation, and the measure of co-operation which prevails in Canada between these three important divisions of Canadian occupational interest.

This report cannot be allowed to gather dust. We are entitled to know from the government if it proposes to accept the recommendations made by this special mission to Europe. If the government is prepared to accept these recommendations, then the place to give effect to them is in this bill. Unless this is done we tonight are not going to be engaged in setting up an organism capable of doing what the special committee to Europe said is necessary to be done in Canada, if we are to meet the problems of production, the competitive position Canada has with regard to other countries, and the like.

I hope the minister will take advantage of our discussion on this clause to tell us that the government is going to implement this report. If the government is not prepared to implement it, he should tell us why, and indicate in what particular the report is not acceptable if it is not completely acceptable. Nothing less than this will satisfy those people who want to see us establish in this national economic development board an organism capable of doing the kind of thing that is being attempted in the United Kingdom and what is being done in France, Belgium and the other countries covered by the report of the special mission of the productivity council.

We have heard a lot from the government about labour-management co-operation, but we have not had any real evidence of a deep conviction on the part of the administration that this represents their point of view and accepted philosophy of the kind of arrangements and relationships which must be established in the changing society which confronts us in Canada as in other free countries of the world.

It is significant that in 1961 the cabinet is supposed to have vetoed a proposal made by the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Trade and Commerce for a plan providing for co-operation between labour, management and the government, to work as a team in tackling Canada's economic problems. It is reported, moreover, that agreement was reached on the plan in March, 1961 at a conference of labour, management and government leaders in Ottawa, but that it was promptly suppressed later on orders from a higher level.

Has the situation changed? We were told that this plan, similar to the industry council plan set up in France, was agreed upon at the conference and that it was determined to set up a permanent tripartite council to foster continuing co-operation and consultation on economic problems, just as is being done in western Europe and Britain. This report, excerpts of which I have read tonight, supports what was attempted by at least two ministers of the government in 1961. A vital question now is whether in scuttling this 1961 plan the federal cabinet, and presumably the Prime Minister, were not in favour of the program for co-operation and consultation proposed. We are entitled therefore to have from the government its views on this special mission to Europe. We are entitled to know whether there is going to be a revival of the 1961 plan, and whether as a result we are going to make this bill the instrument which exists in European countries and which has contributed so much to the level of prosperity in that section of the world. I hope the minister—and I am sure he is—is taking notes and paying attention to what we are saying tonight.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If he ignores what we are saying, I want to tell him that we are going to be persistent tonight because we want to make this bill a good bill. It is not now a good bill—

Mr. Nowlan: Keep reading from Tory documents.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —and we propose by suggestions and amendments which we are going to make tonight and during the course of the discussion to try and make it a document comparable at least in principle and in substance to what they have in Britain, to what they have in France and to what one of our own government agencies has said we should have in Canada.

We have no evidence that the government has such an intention in mind, because we all recall the discussion concerning the Atlantic development board. We recall the discussion on the resolution with regard to amendments to the productivity council bill. We remember what the Minister of Labour had to say about the mobility of manpower and automation resolution. We recall, too, the initial statement made by the Minister of Finance. The result is that we have four boards functioning, dealing basically with the same purpose, operating under four different ministers, with no method or proposal whatsoever for co-ordination. This national economic development board ought to be the main body. It is the "national" economic development board. It ought to be able to give the guiding direction, not by compulsion but by persuasion, by example, to the Atlantic development board. It ought to be able to lay down for the productivity council ways and means of getting out of the embarrassing position in which that body finds itself as a result of the reluctance of labour to co-operate with the productivity council, because it feels that the productivity council does not operate on a wide enough base. But what do we find? We find this board, in clause 3, is going to be made up of a chairman and not less than 14 and not more than 24 members. I do not know how the minister arrives at this figure of 24 members. He has not told us. I would ask him to tell us why the membership of the productivity council is larger than that of the national economic development board, the body which should be the co-ordinating, overriding agency over all these boards which are designed to provide for the kind of limited concept of planning which the government has in mind.

The minister has not told us anything about the character of the representation to be provided by this board which is going to be made up of not less than 14 members. Are the provinces to be represented? This surely is an important consideration, because the minister himself mentioned, when he was discussing clause 2, that there were constitutional limitations within the jurisdiction of the federal government which made it necessary to rely on the action of the provinces, which have power under the property and civil rights clause of the British North America Act. Are the provinces to be represented on this board? Are the various sections of economic interest to be represented on this board? Are the Atlantic provinces to be represented on this board? Are the western provinces to be represented on this board? Are the farmers to be represented on this board?

Mr. Pickersgill: And the fishermen.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What arrangement is being made to see that there is consultation with farmers' organizations, as well as with labour organizations, business organizations and, as my hon. friend from Bonavista-Twillingate points out, as one would expect, with organizations of fishermen. These are important considerations.

Mr. Chairman, I say to the minister this. This clause will determine at this stage of our discussion whether the government really intends to make this an effective board. If this is going to be simply another deception, another façade presenting something that is going to look good in form but with no real substance behind it, then we might as well know right now. But if it is to be a board capable of providing the planning we need in this country at this time, then we are entitled to ask the government to give evidence of its earnestness. This is the kind of board which should be dealing with unemployment, the balance of payments problem and other aspects of our economic life. It should have power and a relationship to the government away beyond what the ordinary board traditionally appointed by governments has been able to do under our system of government.

Mr. Nowlan: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, the minister is always in a happy frame of mind. If what I have said makes him even happier, or if he finds what I have said to be even more amusing, I can only say to him that if this is his reaction I for one draw the conclusion that this bill is not anything more than a form of well meaning effective deception, designed to convey to the Canadian people the impression that this government at long last has decided to establish an instrument to help it and future governments in planning to avoid the kind of situations which have confronted us during the past five years.

This is an important matter. What I have said tonight is what a government agency has urged upon this government. If the government does not accept what I have said, I ask the minister to tell us what are the recommendations of the special mission of the productivity council. I ask the minister to point out anything that I have said tonight that is inconsistent with their recommendations. If he does not accept the proposal which we have made, it will clearly be another indication that the government is going to allow this report of the special mission to gather dust; that nothing will be done about it; that the government will carry on in its traditional laissez faire manner, with no real attempt being made by the creation of a new organization to seriously confront the vital problems which affect Canada at this time.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, it is a great relief to me to be able for once to release and relieve the blood pressure from which the hon. member for Essex East suffered. I have always said that if, when the time comes —and it will probably come very soon—the electors of his constituency see fit to relieve him of the terrific burdens he bears in this house, he could undoubtedly obtain a position as a leading tragedy or straight actor and make a reputation for himself on the stage such as he has never succeeded in making for himself in the House of Commons. I want to relieve his mind about that.

For once he has not been reading from statements made from Liberal platforms. For once he has not been reading from speeches which he himself has previously made. Tonight he has been reading from a report of the productivity council, or a committee of that council which this government has recommended to be appointed and which this government sent over. I am very happy to see that for once the hon. gentleman established his position on firm grounds as he did at length when he read from this document prepared by a committee of the productivity council which this government sent overseas.

I can reassure the hon. gentleman at once. I can relieve his mind. This bill has been considered by the representatives of the productivity council, by representatives of labour and representatives of industry, and all the problems to which he has referred in such fear and trembling have been considered by those representatives and recommended to the favourable consideration of this house.

Mr. Sauve: This afternoon the Minister of Finance, answering a question by my hon. friend from Essex East, told us that the council could not be headed by a minister—that it was preferable to have somebody independent in charge, and so on. The government suggests that the council should consist of between 14 and 24 members. Is it the intention to appoint other ministers to the board, for example the Minister of Labour or the Minister of Trade and Commerce, or will the board be composed entirely of persons outside the government?

Mr. Knowles: I should like to say a few brief words, and when I say brief I mean brief, about the amendment which the government has indicated it is prepared to accept. I am glad it is doing so. I think an amendment such as might have been suggested by this party would have been better, but I am glad the government is going at least this far.

The brief word I want to say is that I hope this amendment is being accepted in good faith and that it will be acted upon accordingly. I make this plea not just out of idle suspicion but out of some experience with the present government in the matter of consulting with at least one sector of the community before appointments are made. As hon. members know, I had a four year vacation from this House of Commons during which time I had the privilege of being an officer of the Canadian Labour Congress, the central body of the trade union movement of this country. I can say from personal knowledge and experience that there were several occasions, during those four years when there was no consultation before appointments of labour representatives were made by the present government; and there were also occasions when there was consultation, but when, despite the making of several nominations by the trade union movement, the government chose to appoint someone else altogether.

Several references have been made to the productivity council itself. One of the main reasons why president Jodoin of the Canadian Labour Congress found it impossible to sit on that body was that the congress was not consulted as to the people it would like to have as its nominees on that board. In fact, the government itself picked out certain labour people and appointed them directly. I suggest that if a board of this kind is to function efficiently it must be set up in a bona fide manner. The principle of this amendment must be accepted and carried out in good faith. If people are to be appointed as representatives of labour, agriculture, industry and so on, the organizations which speak for these sections of our community must be consulted, and consulted honestly. Unless, in making these nominations, any of these organizations goes completely haywire—and this is not likely in any of these fields—the government ought to accept at least one of the nominations put forward by these various bodies.

It is not necessary for me to give details of things that have happened in the past. I know whereof I speak. I am referring not only to instances in which I was personally involved, because my name was rejected—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: I hear laughter. I do not blame the government for rejecting my nomination for certain reasons, but for certain other reasons I think the nomination should have been accepted. To conclude, I say once more that if this board is to be made to work properly the amendment must be acted on honestly and in good faith.

Mr. Nowlan: Without accepting any of the references to past history which the hon. member has made, I say that the government has accepted the amendment moved by my hon. friend from Hamilton East. The government wants this legislation to work. It intends this legislation to work, and knows it will work, given the support of this committee which we expect we shall receive.

Mr. Nicholson: You will recall, Mr. Chairman, that in the early stages of this legislation, during the resolution stage, I spoke in support of this bill. I must confess that as a result of reading today's mail I am concerned over some of the statements which the minister has made this afternoon.

Under the terms of clause 3 of this bill we are to establish a corporation to be known as the national economic development board. Today I received the January issue of Canadian Business with a picture of the president of the national productivity council on the cover. An article beginning on page 28 headed "What's ahead for the productivity council" contains interesting and informative material on that subject. The president of the council, Mr. De Young says, in the course of this article on page 38:

> The unanimous decision of the productivity council has been that we take the broadest interpretation of our terms of reference permitting the council to engage in economic studies and projects relating to removing the road blocks through increased productivity.

Skipping the next two sentences and under the subheading "Role of Council in Relation to the National Economic Development Board" the president continues:

> At the present moment we are working to finalize arrangements by which the proposed national economic development board and the national productivity council will become one—

Are we going to bury this council before it is born? That is certainly the inference to be drawn from this article. It says:

> At the present moment we are working to finalize arrangements by which the proposed national economic development board and the national productivity council will become one, or at least co-operate in their operations.

My objection is to the words "will become one". I am disturbed to find that before this council comes into being, after the assurances we have had from the minister and others, the productivity council is planning to bring about a merger. Why create two bodies if there is any serious thought of there actually being only one? This highlights the importance and significance of the remarks made by the hon. member for Essex East a few moments ago, that we are going to have four boards in fields which interlock and overlap, presided over by four different ministers, and at the same time the government is trying to marry two of them. I should like to hear the minister's explanation of that particular suggestion.

Mr. Berger: Mr. Chairman, the amendment that the minister has accepted is one which has led to a discussion of labour-management relations and members in all parties have indicated that they favour good labour-management relations. I think all of us are happy to see that such a firm stand has been taken on that issue. But, Mr. Chairman, it is essential when we are discussing labour-management relations, and what this government has or has not done in the past in this connection, to remember that labour and management must be allowed to conduct their negotiations with each other on the basis of equality. The hon. member for Essex East quite rightly pointed out that the government would have to take its courage into its hands and undertake a program of genuine economic planning if this legislation was to fulfil the promise that it holds.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that when we are discussing this subject it is pertinent to remind the government that when legislation abridging civil rights in British Columbia and Newfoundland in 1959 was passed by the governments of each of those provinces, it was a time which called for courage on the part of the federal government. Nothing in either of those provinces has done more, nor could anything have been calculated to do more, to destroy labour-management relations than the legislation which was passed at that time in each of those provinces. Hon. members will recall that in the province of Newfoundland legislation was passed which cancelled the certification held by a trade union.

The Chairman: Order. I am afraid the hon. member is straying a little from the point under consideration, which is a very brief amendment. I would ask for his co-operation.

Mr. Berger: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate Your Honour's intervention and I am grateful for Your Honour's advice. I hope Your Honour will bear with me as I am a new member in this house, and a new member of the committee, but I was seeking to show how essential it was that the federal government should be prepared to do everything which lies within its powers—and a great deal lies within the power of the federal government—to make sure that labour and management deal with each other on the basis of equality. Because it is the responsibility of the federal government to protect the rights of labour, in so far as it lies within the jurisdiction of the federal government to do so. I was urging it upon the committee that on looking back to the events of 1959 the committee would agree that had the government had the courage to exercise its power of disallowing legislation passed in Newfoundland—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Berger: —and legislation passed in British Columbia, there would be in each of those provinces a much larger degree of labour-management co-operation and harmony between those two economic groups than exists today. I think all hon. members can see the connection between the federal government's responsibility to establish labour-management co-operation in all parts of the country and the legislation which is before the committee this evening.

The amendment offered by the hon. member for Hamilton East is one which, as he quite rightly pointed out, was designed to ensure labour-management co-operation. I suggest most respectfully to the committee that it is the responsibility of the federal government to make sure that the civil rights of all sections of the community are protected. That includes, of course, protecting the rights of labour.

I do not want to conduct a survey of labour-management relations in all parts of the country, but I think I can speak with some authority on the state of labour-management relations in my own province. Of course, this bill and this amendment are designed to ensure that in British Columbia as well as in other provinces in Canada we will have a much larger degree of labour-management co-operation than we have had in the past. In my own province we have had a great deal of labour-management strife since 1959.

The Chairman: Order. Both the Chair and the committee as a whole, somewhat to my surprise, have been very tolerant of the remarks of the hon. member to date, which are moving very far from the narrow consideration of the amendment. This amendment has to do with the composition of the board, and asks that the following words be added:

> —after consultation with the principal organizations representative of trade unions, farmers, and other groups as the governor in council may determine.

I think out of fairness to other members of the committee, and notwithstanding the fact that the hon. member is new to this house, he should recognize that he is transgressing the rules. It is not fair that I should permit him to do so and then refuse to allow a more experienced member to do the same.

Mr. Berger: Mr. Chairman, let me once again express my gratitude to Your Honour for giving me your counsel regarding the rules of debate in committee. Believe me, Mr.

Chairman, it was not my intention in any way to be unfair either to Your Honour or to other hon. members of the committee. Let me summarize by saying it is simply not good enough for the government to express good intentions. Good intentions will not be enough if this legislation is to be successful in promoting labour management co-operation in all parts of the country. It will take a great deal more than good intentions. It will take courage, and I urge the Minister of Finance, whose responsibility it will be to make sure that this legislation achieves its objective, to carry it out in its spirit as well as in its letter.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, I might say in answer to the question put to me by the hon. member for Iles-de-la-Madeleine that it is not proposed to have any minister of the crown, as such on the board. Of course, that does not preclude the setting up of interdepartmental committees or cabinet committees, as everyone in this committee well knows. But there will be no minister of the crown on the board as such.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, my remarks are merely to the mover of the amendment by way of brief congratulations to him for bringing it forward. Just last week I had the opportunity of sharing a platform with the hon. member, and he spent a great deal of his time expressing grave doubts about the power of trade union organizations in Canada, and where they had led some of the trade unions. He expressed considerable fears about the democracy which seemed to prevail in some Canadian unions, including one that is very prominent in his own constituency, namely the steelworkers. Therefore, I can assure him that he has had some kind of revelation in the last few days and is now prepared to put a great deal of faith in the trade union elite.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Munro: I did not have the dubious honour of hearing what the hon. member for Port Arthur had to say. However, if it was anything similar to his usual remarks, I do not think I missed a great deal.

Amendment agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall the clause as amended carry?

Mr. Peters: I was very much interested in the amendment which has been accepted by the government. However, I think we may have overlooked the fact that in establishing—

The Chairman: Order. The amendment is carried. Shall clause 3 as amended carry?

Mr. Peters: No. I am speaking on the clause as amended. We have now had considerable discussion on what I would consider to be the establishment of half of the council, namely the half that produces the ideas and brings forth the representations from the various organizations and agencies of this country. If this is really going to be a planning board, I think it should have a planning section. In order to do this I suggest that we must have on the board people who have special qualifications in the matter of planning. This board should be a continuous thing. There should be attached to the board people who have high technical skills in planning our national economy, who have knowledge of economics and of the various technical fields with which the board will be dealing. For this reason I should like to move an amendment to clause 3, establishing the clause now amended as subclause 1 and adding subclause 2 to read as follows:

> At least one half of the members of the board shall consist of persons with professional, technical, academic or scientific qualifications.

I believe that this amendment is important in order to give continuity and in order to establish a board which will have available to it the advice required in order to put into effect the ideas that will be produced by the representatives of the labour movement, the business community and the other organizations which the government has now agreed will be asked by the governor in council to make representation to the board. I think this amendment will provide a balance between the two sections of the board, namely the planning section and the idea section. I believe this amendment, if accepted will strengthen the board and will eliminate some of the problems which have developed in other boards where this principle has not been given effect.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The hon. gentleman has made a plea that the board should in one half of its membership consist of technically qualified persons. Superficially that suggestion may be attractive. If one looks at the matter superficially, it would appear that you should have certain experts as members of the board. However, when one analyses the matter he finds that the place for the experts surely is with the technical staff itself, something which is provided for in another clause of the bill to which the committee will come at a later stage.

If the hon. gentleman's amendment were to carry, one would have difficulty in interpreting what is professional, what is technical, what is academic and what is scientific. One would also have the further difficulty of determining what balance there should be between professional, technical, academic and scientific. The words themselves, in my opinion, are not mutually exclusive. Indeed, I see no reason why one who is academic should not also be professional or why one who is scientific should not also be technical. In that respect the amendment perhaps presents some difficulty with regard to interpretation.

What I suggest to the committee is that the discretion and the power which will exist in the governor in council under subclause 1, particularly with the amendment making it representative of trade unions, farmers and other groups, will better enable the representative character to be carried out and will not confine the membership to the extent that is suggested by this amendment. In the mutual exclusiveness of the various four functions here I suggest there is something which ought not to be accepted by the committee.

Mr. Berger: I rise to support the amendment that has been placed before the committee by the hon. member for Timiskaming. We in this party believe that if we are going to have a genuine planning board, it must include not only representatives of economic groups who will of necessity serve on a part time basis, but also planners trained in economics, statistics and various other fields; planners who will be able to devote their full time to planning the future of the economy; who will be able to lay down a blueprint for Canada's economy; who will be able to chart a course in order to make sure that Canada's economy does not run upon the shoals of recession and depression.

We believe this means we must have full time people on the planning board who are doing the planning, who work together with representatives of economic groups, representatives appointed by those economic groups. We believe these planners must be full time people giving their full attention and directing their whole activities to genuine planning. If this board is going to work we believe the amendment that has been offered to the committee by the hon. member for Timiskaming is absolutely essential.

Mr. Nicholson: Before we vote on the amendment I think there is something we are entitled to know from the minister. This afternoon he assured us that there had been discussions between representatives of industry and commerce on the national productivity council and representatives of labour on the council and that they had agreed that their views had been taken into consideration before this bill was brought in. If that is so, can the minister explain why the president of the national productivity council would pose such a question as that contained in Canadian Business which I just read. Surely the committee is entitled to know that before we vote on this amendment or before we vote on the clause.

Mr. Nowlan: I apologize to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre for not having answered his question earlier. I overlooked it unfortunately when I was on my feet a moment ago. All I can say in reply to his question is that this bill was drafted after full consultation with the chairman of the productivity council. He approved of the draft. We discussed it with him. He sat in for hours and hours while the bill was being drafted. I am not responsible for what may appear in any publication, as the hon. member knows. However, I think any difficulty which has arisen as a result of this article is more apparent than real. As I said, I can give the hon. member and the committee assurance of the fact that this whole matter was given careful consideration with the member who is a good friend of the hon. member for Vancouver South, and a good friend of my own, namely the chairman of the productivity council, and he approves of this draft. As I said, I am not responsible for what appeared in a Canadian business publication but I can assure the hon. member there is no difficulty on that score.

As far as the amendment moved by the hon. member is concerned, I suppose nothing could be more innocuous. It provides that at least one half of the members of the board shall consist of professional, technical, academic or scientific people. I am sure everybody in this chamber tonight is either professional or academic or scientific or technical, either a technical politician or a technical farmer or something of that kind. I could not think of anything more innocuous. However, the hon. member for Hamilton East has moved an amendment which the government has accepted and that amendment says that the government shall appoint these people after consultation with these various groups. I think perhaps there is some conflict between the two amendments.

We have accepted the amendment of the hon. member for Hamilton East. As far as I am concerned I could not care less, but I do not think this amendment amounts to anything more than words. I am not prepared to accept or reject it but I would point out that we have already accepted the amendment of the hon. member for Hamilton East.

Amendment (Mr. Peters) negatived: Yeas, 71; nays, 82.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

Clause 3 as amended agreed to.

On clause 4—Appointment of chairman.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Chairman, I should like to inquire from the minister why the words "during good behaviour" have been included in subclause 1 which now reads as follows:

> The chairman of the board shall be appointed to hold office during good behaviour for such term not exceeding ten years, as is fixed by the governor in council.

I raise this point because it is my recollection that the words "good behaviour" are missing from the similar clause in the bill establishing the Atlantic development board. According to the Minister of National Revenue, who presented the Atlantic development board bill, the reason for leaving out those words was, as found on page 2519 of Hansard for December 10 last:

> —an advisory board which we hope would consist of outstanding men who would be giving their services without remuneration. I believe such men should not have a clause in the bill reflecting on their behaviour.

Then he went on to say:

> Men who are donating their services should not be hamstrung with a phrase reflecting on their behaviour.

Am I to infer from this that it is the intention of the government to appoint men of lower calibre to this board than they have appointed to the Atlantic development board?

The Chairman: Shall clause 4 carry?

Mr. Gray: Will the minister answer? May I have an answer?

Mr. Nowlan: No.

Mr. Webster: Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to submit to subclause 1 of clause 4. The purpose of this amendment is to strengthen the bill. It is designed to give the board the status which it merits in the public administration of this country. If property constituted and effectively administered the board could become the most important agency ever established by any Canadian government. However, to perform this outstanding service and to attain this status the chairman, in the opinion of the New Democratic party, must have at least cabinet rank. I wish to submit a rather surprising witness to substantiate the point I am making. More than a year ago the Financial Post, which is usually friendly to the government—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: The joke of the day.

Mr. Webster: —began an editorial in this fashion, and I promise you, Mr. Chairman, that I shall not read the entire editorial:

> Chronic unemployment is the ominous symptom of very deep seated troubles in the Canadian economy and unless there are basic changes in business thinking, in labour attitudes and in government policies it is doubtful, indeed, if Canada can grow and prosper.

That is the beginning of an editorial entitled "Wanted—A National Ministry of Foresight". The writer goes on later to advocate the appointment of a federal ministry of planning under a minister, of course. But I do remind you, sir, that the new board will be obliged to provide the Minister of Finance with the following as set forth in the words of the bill itself:

> It shall be the duty of the board to furnish to the minister all such advice and information as will best assist the government of Canada in furthering a high and sustainable rate of economic growth in Canada, the strengthening of Canada's international financial and trade position and the achievement of the highest possible levels of efficient production and employment so as to ensure rising standards of living in all areas of Canada—

May I suggest that a board of this importance to the welfare of Canada needs a chairman who has the prestige and the authority of top cabinet rank, and in our view the most appropriate one is the Minister of Finance. Therefore I am pleased on behalf of this party to move:

> That clause (1) be deleted and the following substituted:
> "(1) The minister shall be chairman of the board."

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Chairman, I once had a very interesting occupation as chairman of a committee that looked into the organization of government machinery in Ontario. One of the purposes of the committee was to examine the relationship of boards, commissions and other agencies, to the government and particularly to the elected representatives of the people.

It seemed to us that, in the first place, there is a useful and proper role for boards and commissions of various kinds, but their responsibilities should be clearly defined, and I must say I think the responsibilities of this particular board could be more clearly defined than they are set out in the bill. It was suggested to us that at least in some cases individual boards and commissions should have a minister of the crown on them, either as chairman or as a member. I remember concluding at that time, and I still feel strongly that it is inappropriate for a minister of the crown to sit as a member of a board, commission or agency of government, with other members who are not elected and who could outvote him.

If, as is proposed by the amendment, the Minister of Finance were the chairman of this particular board, and the other members decided that for some reason or other they did not have complete confidence in his judgment, that he was not attending to his business or was just being silly, they would be able to outvote him. While I am all in favour of the appropriate people being able to outvote the Minister of Finance from time to time, and as soon as possible, I do not think this should be the prerogative of appointed officials and appointed members of a board. I would feel this whether the Minister of Finance was to be chairman or just an ordinary member of the board. I think it is wrong in principle, and I for one will oppose the amendment.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Davenport and I very often agree on basic principles although we do not always say so, but I am happy tonight to say I agree entirely with the arguments advanced by him. I think it would be most inappropriate to have the minister on the board. If there were a very high salary, then you might persuade the Minister of Finance to retire and take over the job; but then he would cease to be the Minister of Finance. All I can say is that I concur entirely with the statements of the hon. member for Davenport, and that the government cannot accept the amendment which has been proposed.

Mr. Gordon: I would like to add I was not suggesting for a minute that the present Minister of Finance be got rid of in this way. There is no suggestion on the part of hon. members on this side of the house that the Minister of Finance should be bribed to vacate his present position. I think we will take care of that in due course.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, what has been said by the hon. member for Davenport and concurred in by the Minister of Finance is true of certain kinds of boards. There are some boards whose function is quasi-judicial and there are boards which are purely administrative. I would agree that with those two kinds of boards it would be most inappropriate to have a minister sitting on them.

In the case of a quasi-judicial board he would, of course, be accused of bringing political pressures to bear in reaching decisions which should be made outside government. That is why a quasi-judicial board is set up. In the matter of administrative boards the same type of accusation would be made and a board would lose some of its non-partisan character, which is one of the main reasons for setting up administrative boards. However, in discussing this bill we have been repeatedly told that we are not talking about a quasi-judicial or administrative board. We are here talking about a planning agency. But really, as the bill stands, this is not a planning agency. This is a large advisory committee with one full time chairman and a group of prominent people who meet periodically throughout the year and who will make some recommendations which the minister may or may not consider. This is not planning.

If this is really going to be a planning board then there has to be very close liaison between the board, which is making plans, and the cabinet, which must pass on those plans and submit them to the House of Commons. In our opinion the only effective way you could have that kind of liaison is to have the minister himself preside as chairman of the board, in order to guide and participate in the deliberations of the board and to take the plans from the board to the cabinet. Otherwise this will not be a planning agency. This will be little more than an advisory board doing exactly what is done now by the productivity council.

This is why we think in this kind of planning agency there is a very vital principle to be considered, and that is close liaison with the policy making organization in democratic government, namely the cabinet. The only way to have that is to have the minister himself as chairman of the board.

(Translation):

Mr. Gregoire: Mr. Chairman, I just heard some fine pronouncements on state planning. I personally think that there is no need for any state planning. Indeed, if I have some planning to do, I am perfectly able to do it myself. Therefore we do not need such planning by the state which the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) just suggested.

It is quite enough to see that the United States does the planning for the Liberal party, without this country's government also subjecting itself to planning.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. To my mind, the hon. member's remarks have nothing to do with the amendment which the committee is now discussing; I am sure that the hon. member will try to relate his remarks to the debate on the amendment so that they may be relevant to the matter under discussion.

Mr. Gregoire: Very well, Mr. Chairman.

With regard to the amendment, I just wanted to say that I objected to what I would call a kind of state planning as suggested by the amendment now before the house.

As a matter of fact, such state planning implies that the blueprints for our economy be set up by some department, for instance the Department of Finance, instead of leaving this to the individual who is able to do so.

That is why we, on this side of the house, will oppose state planning as suggested by the amendment before us.

(Text):

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, I rise for only one purpose. That is to say that when my hon. friend deplores planning by the government, being a comparatively recent convert to Social Credit he may not yet have had time to read the books of Major Douglas, who advocates among other things the establishment of a just price for every commodity on the market from shoe-laces to airplanes. If my hon. friend can tell me how to set a just price for everything on the market without planning, I should like to know how he proposes to do it.

(Translation):

Mr. Gregoire: Mr. Chairman, I have read the books written by Major Douglas, which the member for Burnaby-Coquitlam has just mentioned, and I can tell him how fair prices could be established without state planning. It could be done through the simple application of the law of supply and demand which remains the best way of controlling the economic relationship between individuals, between producers and consumers.

(Text):

Mr. Davis: Mr. Chairman, in focusing on this clause I believe we are confronted with the nature of the planning process. The group in the far corner, the New Democratic party, have extolled to the government the effectiveness of the French system of planning. At the very top in the French system they have a conseil du plan which consists of no less than 57 members. This is not even an advisory board; it is, in the language of the London Economist, a "talking shop". It is not at all effective. The group that is really effective is the staff, the secretariat which works, under the chairman, with the industries of France. Essentially there are some 3,000 members who work with some 300 industry committees. These industry committees are substantially voluntary bodies set up by labour and management.

That to my mind is much more democratic than a hard and fast board at the top which makes the laws, in effect, tells the cabinet, the elected representatives of the people, what policies should be followed and passes directives on to industry. I am for the more democratic process, the one which sets up a board which is purely advisory. Put all the representatives you want on it from different walks of life and interests, certainly, but let it be more a talking shop than a board which gives orders to the rest of the economy.

Mr. Berger: Mr. Chairman, I think a word ought to be said in reply to the misleading statements just made by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano. The amendment offered to the committee by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway was designed to make sure that we have responsible planning, democratic planning. We believe that the planning board ought to have as its chairman a minister of the crown responsible to parliament and the people. I take it this is something that is opposed both by the minister and those who sit in the official opposition.

Surely, Mr. Chairman, even the hon. members of the official opposition can understand that if you have a planning board chaired by a minister of the crown, that it will be a planning board which is responsible to the elected representatives of the people in this parliament—far more so and to a much greater extent than a planning board which has no direct responsibility to this parliament.

It will have to be the responsibility of the federal cabinet to act as the ultimate planning agency, because after all the cabinet is responsible to the parliament of Canada, to the elected representatives of the people and to the people of Canada as a whole. Surely all hon. members in this house ought to be able to rid themselves of such pejorative clichés as "state planning" and "controls" and ought to be able to see at last that it is time we caught up with the rest of the world and adopted genuine, responsible, democratic, economic planning.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Amendment (Mr. Webster) negatived: Yeas, 13; nays, 125.

The Deputy Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

(Translation):

Mr. Gregoire: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, I wish to draw the attention of the house to the fact that this time the Liberals have supported the Conservatives. I want this to be mentioned in Hansard.

(Text):

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 4 carry?

(Translation):

Mr. Cook: Mr. Chairman, in subsection (1) of section 4, we read the following:

> The chairman of the board shall be appointed to hold office during good behaviour for such term not exceeding ten years, as is fixed by the governor in council.

National Economic Development Board

A similar term of ten years is also mentioned in subsection (3) of the same section.

Now, I believe that we should think this over, as we have deplored in past years that persons had been appointed by the Liberal government of that day to important positions, for a long term, and now we must go on putting up with them, even though they are not experienced as they should be.

I feel that this national economic development board, the establishment of which we are approving, is a body which should bring positive results as soon as possible.

That is why I think that a 10 year period would be too long. The chairman could always be reappointed after a certain time, if his services are really satisfactory.

To that end, I should like to move the following amendment to this clause:

I move, seconded by Mr. Plourde, that subsections 1 and 3 of section 4 of Bill C-87 be amended and that the words:

for such term not exceeding ten years

be replaced by the words:

for such term not exceeding five years.

I ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Nowlan) to study this amendment closely and to accept it.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Mr. Cook moves that subsections 1 and 3 of section 4 be amended by having the words:

for such term not exceeding ten years

replaced by the words:

for such term not exceeding five years.

(Text):

Mr. Nowlan: The hon. member who has moved the amendment was good enough to tell me a little while ago of his intention to do so and in the short interval which has elapsed since then I have been giving this matter some consideration. Ordinarily, I think, the difference between an appointment for five years or for ten years would be a matter on which no great issue could be taken but, as I told the committee yesterday when we were debating this point, I believe we have to appoint to this board as chairman someone who is outstanding in the economic life of Canada—someone who will command the respect, admiration and support of people in business and industrial life throughout the country. I will put this to the hon. member who has just moved the amendment, as well as to other members of this committee: would it be possible to obtain a man of that calibre if the appointment were limited to five years?

Theoretically it might be possible. One might be able to go out of here tonight and put a finger on a person of this kind prepared to serve in this capacity for five years, but I suggest one would probably be faced with the consideration of someone who was relatively young and inexperienced—someone starting out in life who would be prepared to accept the appointment as a highly satisfactory one—someone, it is true, who might grow into the position. Alternatively one would probably be considering a man on the verge of retirement. I do not think these are the type of appointments which the government has in mind. This appointment is the key to the situation. If this committee believes in a productivity board, as hon. members have all said they do, I suggest it would be most improbable that we should get a person of the calibre we are seeking to come to this board and serve for a period of five years. Anyone who has practical knowledge of these matters will realize the difficulties with which we would be confronted.

I have no time now to go over the other boards which have been appointed by governments, preceding governments as well as this government, but I doubt very much if there are any on which the chairman has been appointed for periods of less than seven years. Most of them have been appointed for ten years. Let hon. members cast their eyes at the various boards—the tariff board, the income tax board and all the rest—which come within the framework of the Canadian economy. I suggest seriously to this committee that the amendment should not be accepted, because by so doing we would seriously prejudice the government in its selection of the type of man we would want to occupy this position.

Mr. Ryan: Would the minister accept a seven year period?

Mr. Pickersgill: As I understand it, what the minister is saying is that he cannot get someone to take this position unless there is provision for a ten year tenure.

Mr. Nowlan: I did not say that. What I did say was that I doubted very much if it would be possible to get the type of man we want for this position unless the appointment was for ten years. I did not say it would be impossible. Anyway, until the committee and parliament have passed this bill we are not making any appointments to this position.

Mr. Pickersgill: Since June 18, particularly, we have had a series of appointments made by this government which, though they were mostly of people who were elected or failed to be elected to this house at one time or another, have not inspired in me very much confidence that the primary qualification which the government looks for in appointments is competence. There never has been, I think, at any time in the history of Canada such widespread patronage as there has been in appointments since June 18. I am not questioning the good faith or the good intentions of the minister, but it will not be the minister who will make the final decision in this matter; it will be the minister's leader, in whose judgment in these matters I have no confidence whatsoever based upon the quality of the appointments he has made in the past nine months.

It seems to me that for us to vest in this minority government the power to make appointments of this character for this length of time would be a most irresponsible thing to do, if it can be avoided. For that reason it seems to me that since an amendment of a reasonable character has been offered it would be a desirable thing to support it. Moreover, I doubt that anyone would be inspired with very much confidence in any tenure under this government after the way they treated the former governor of the Bank of Canada. The notion that anything put into a statute could be any protection for anyone as long as the hon. gentleman who is Minister of Justice—

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Deputy Chairman: I am sure the hon. member realizes that he is now going too far from the clause or the amendment. I hope he will give me his co-operation by making his remarks relevant.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am afraid that because of the interruptions from the other side Your Honour was not able to hear me, because I was discussing the tenure of office of the chairman of this board in the light of experiences we have had. If that kind of argument is not permitted in committee I do not know what it would be possible to say that would be relevant. But I do maintain that no one who displeases the Prime Minister or the Minister of Justice can count upon his security as long as those two gentlemen occupy the treasury benches. In addition it occurs to me that to give this moribund government any more power than need be given to it would be a mistake. For that reason I am inclined to vote for the amendment.

Mr. Herridge: I am happy on this occasion to rise and support the minister in his contention. I thought he stated the case very well, and because it is the custom of members of this party to approach these problems in a constructive and non-partisan way, I do not hesitate to say so. We believe that in this instance the minister gave sound reasons for his point of view. We do not think we should play politics with a serious matter of this sort. We do not hesitate to put forward our point of view when we disagree with the government or with the opposition, and since this is an occasion when we agree with the government I should like to reiterate something which the minister has said, but in my own words.

Anyone with any knowledge of administration would realize that we are not going to get the type of man required to be the chairman of a board such as this, possibly a man of middle age or close thereto, to undertake such a large scale and important job when he is faced with retirement after five years. There is always a safeguard: if a person appointed to this important position is not fulfilling the position to the satisfaction of the government or the people of Canada, there are other ways of seeing that the situation is corrected.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, I hope the minister will reconsider what he has said with respect to accepting this amendment. Because surely all the arguments he advanced are answered in subclause 3 of this clause where it states very clearly that the chairman or any other member can be reappointed. I bring this matter up only because if during the five year period the chairman proves that he is doing the job in line with what is anticipated as a result of the board, he can be reappointed for a further five year period. Then we would avoid invoking subsection (4) and the embarrassment and difficulties which would go with that, as mentioned by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate a few minutes ago, I would hope that the minister would reconsider this matter, because surely if this chairman does do his job properly he can be reappointed for another five year term.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, as usually expected from a historian, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has given us something to think about, reaching as he did back into recent and not so recent history to indicate that this may be a worth-while amendment. He has presented us with a bit of a dilemma since he put the case so well, such as the point that this government has perhaps been guilty of a certain amount of patronage. Some of us have had this argument somewhat neutralized because we have a bit of an historical perspective ourselves. We can go back to that golden age of Canadian politics which we heard about last night, when nostalgia flowed and we were back to the golden age of the 22 years. In this period we had a government in power which was so upright that it would never, of course, be guilty of anything like patronage. But since its defeat we have had revealed a peculiar kind of back door or swing door patronage. I wonder whether we really can accept the arguments made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. I am thinking of the hon.

member himself as an example, perhaps, of this back door patronage. After all, he had an important position in the civil service, and suddenly he is stood forth and revealed as a Liberal with a capital "L". We have had such people as Mr. Drury, who was a deputy minister, and suddenly he is stood forth as a Liberal with a capital "L".

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I would ask the hon. member to make some remarks which have relevancy to the amendment now before the committee moved by the hon. member for Hamilton East.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I am surprised that you cannot see the relevance of this to the historical argument which has been presented. The relevance is that if the Drurys and the Sharps and the Pickersgills, and people like these, have been revealed belatedly as partisans, how can we place any trust in this particular argument? Therefore as far as we are concerned, we have to take, as the hon. member for Kootenay West said, an objective non-partisan point of view and decide to support the argument of the minister. But it certainly does not seem right to me that we can accept the general indictment that was drawn by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate—

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. member permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. Fisher: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Did the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount, or did I, get any 10 year guarantee when we went into public life?

Mr. Fisher: Well, I am afraid that it is never too late for these things to happen, Mr. Chairman. I should like to say to the hon. member that he must have been given some kind of guarantee. After all, Mr. Chairman, with all those majorities in Bonavista-Twillingate there seems to be almost a guarantee given by somebody.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Chairman, after this interesting exchange into retroactive patronage, perhaps we had better get back to the question of the appointment of the chairman. I also find myself in agreement with the minister, and for the first time since this debate commenced. I think that if we are to have a chairman of this body, about which I still have great doubts, then he will have to have some security of tenure. I was not at all impressed with the argument of the hon. member for Medicine Hat, which was that the chairman can be reappointed. That would be true if we had a provision for appointing him for six months and you could reappoint him every six months; but I suggest that it would be a rather peculiar character who would accept appointment on that score. I am more interested in what are to be the functions of this chairman than in his personality.

I was interested earlier this evening to hear the hon. member for Coast-Capilano draw some comparisons between his idea of what this body should be, and the agencies for economic planning in France. I am sure he knows as well as I that the large council he referred to is a comparatively recent addendum to the planning agencies of France. The really important one has been the commissariat du plan which had very wide powers and which, moreover, as its first steps, took large strides in the field of public ownership and control of private enterprise. I think we should realize that in France this council is, as he suggested, merely a talking shop, and I suspect a screen erected at a later date to control the activities of the real planning agencies of France. In conclusion, I must say that I am surprised that any member of the Canadian House of Commons considers that this country is in need of another talking shop.

Mr. Matheson: Mr. Chairman, may I say a word on this question. Some people suggested years ago before there was any recommendation by the Gordon commission for this kind of board that there might be great advantage to Canada in making money available—perhaps one might suggest the sum of $20,000—for various departments so that the ministers of those departments could choose with some freedom the people who would be of assistance to them in formulating and integrating economic policy. They would account for this money to the Auditor General. This would leave with and repose in the cabinet and particularly those persons charged with the key ministries the opportunity to seek out the best economic guidance and help available to them as they chose to obtain it. Such a proposal would afford the minister the opportunity to make inquiries in fresh fields, and would enable him to be creative even with his own deputies and his own departmental heads. In the creation of the board I do not think any of us really want to see the duplication of a civil service, nor do we want to see erected in Canada something which is going to replace the cabinet from the standpoint of being the decisive policy-making organization of the country. That would be an idea which would certainly not appeal to me.

It seems to me very important, particularly in such portfolios as finance, trade and commerce, labour and so on, that there should be far more integration and co-operation between departments than we have had demonstrated over the past several years. One of the problems is this. Who is going to be the person integrating and actually helping with respect to this key advisory role? This is an important matter. Many Canadians do not think this particular ministry is going to survive for very long. Suppose it does not survive. Suppose this ministry is defeated or suppose it goes to the country shortly, not to return? Does it make sense then or is it conceivable that the kind of person who may be selected by the present ministry which in six years has been unable to make and formulate any economic plan of any kind whatsoever, long range or short range, is the kind of person who is then going to preside over an economic board that is going to be guiding the destinies of this country for the next ten years?

What is the situation? I submit that it is of great importance that the person who is going to be giving economic advice to the cabinet is the kind of person who is going to command the confidence of the cabinet actually from day to day, from week to week and from month to month. Of course we need the best kind of person available. It may very well be that the kind of person who would be appointed by the Minister of Finance or by the cabinet would, in fact, be the same kind of person that, for instance, a new Liberal government would appoint. It may well be that we admire the same kind of economic brains. There are not many people in Canada who are capable of doing this kind of job on a first rate scale. We should have to look hard in order to find the right kind of person.

But suppose we did not get the right kind of person. What the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has indicated is that on the part of certain people on this side of the chamber there is a marked lack of confidence with respect to some of the appointments that have been made by this administration. Now, in their dying hours, does it make sense that for ten years they would be the people to determine who would be setting the economic course for Canada after they are perhaps no longer in a position to give any guidance or leadership and when they are not going to be in a position to be supported by those people over here? I refer to the Creditists. I submit that we may be in a position of a long tenure of office. We may be in a position of having to come to terms with the gentleman who is appointed by this administration and saying, "My dear sir, we honour you, we respect you, but we have got to pay you off, we have got to provide a pension, because you are not the kind of person who should be setting the fortunes for this country".

Mr. Chairman, I wish to point this out. When we express ourselves on this kind of problem, our view must be responsible. It must be just as responsible in economics as it has been, for example, in my opinion in the field of defence. We must consider the likelihood that we shall be running Canada shortly.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Dreamer.

Another hon. Member: Put it out of your mind.

Mr. Matheson: I hear some interjections, Mr. Chairman. Some one says to put it out of our mind. However, may I say that the burden of the Liberal party today is that we must have it in our minds all the time. Everything we recommend in the field of economics or finance is simply predicated on the fact that we cannot do the popular, the easy or the sloppy thing. We must do the thing which is likely to produce the best results when in a few months we will have the duty of running the show.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I should like to point out to the hon. member that the amendment is to change the term of the chairman from five years to 10 years. I think that is the only question we have to discuss now.

Mr. Matheson: On the occasion on which I was introduced to the twenty fourth parliament a day in June of 1961—

An hon. Member: A sad one.

Mr. Matheson: My friend on the government side says it was a bad thing.

An hon. Member: A sad thing.

Mr. Matheson: However, on that sad or bad occasion my introduction to parliament was to observe the present Minister of Justice, then rejoicing in the portfolio of minister of finance, telling the country how he felt compelled to get rid of Mr. Coyne. This formed in my mind an unforgettable impression.

The Deputy Chairman: I am sure that the hon. member in his remarks will give his co-operation and that he will try to limit them to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet.

Mr. Matheson: What I am saying is this, Mr. Chairman. Perhaps partly as a result of being elected in four general elections which covered 22 years, we know what this means. As a party we know what this means.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I would suggest to the hon. member that he read article 35 of the rules. I would ask him to make his comments relevant to the amendment under consideration.

Mr. Matheson: Mr. Chairman, I will be entirely relevant. What I am saying to the committee is this. It is our Liberal tradition and our attitude to honour appointments made, to work with people who are in the public service and to do so co-operatively and fully. In order to do this we think it is rather important that there not be a return to this type of Coyne episode, one which shook this country and shook the financial structure of Canada not very many months ago and which was perhaps the beginning of a sharp economic decline—and certainly a monetary decline.

We naturally expect that appointments will be made in these dying hours. We expect that situation. There have been many such appointments in these dying hours of this twenty fifth parliament. We are going to work with these people who may be appointed. We are going to work with them as honourably and in as trusting a manner as possible. We are going to work with all people who have served Canada faithfully in the public service and are not going to deride them and tear them to pieces. It is our tradition to treat these people as some of the great people of Canada. But we have a responsibility now, with a key position, the appointment of an economic chairman who will be influencing the economic destinies of this country—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Matheson: Mr. Chairman, may I call it ten o'clock.

Clause 4 stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I inquire what the house will do tomorrow and the rest of the week?

Mr. Churchill: We will be on estimates, Mr. Speaker, starting with the Department of Labour. If that department is completed, then we shall take the Post Office Department.

Mr. Chevrier: Does that mean that we shall be on estimates on Thursday and Friday as well?

Mr. Churchill: I think that is quite likely. If we complete those departments, we will call another one.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the house leader if he can tell the house whether there will be a supply motion on Monday, as he has already indicated to the press.

Mr. Churchill: I think everybody was anticipating a supply motion on Monday and I can say that is the present intention.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, January 30, 1963

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

MARINE AND FISHERIES

MOTION TO REFER CERTAIN MATTERS TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, with unanimous consent I move:

That the standing committee on marine and fisheries be authorized to examine and consider (1) the recommendations of the international north Pacific fisheries commission that the stock of halibut in the eastern Bering sea and the stock of herring off the west coast of the Queen Charlotte islands each be exempted from the abstention principle contained in the international convention for the high seas fisheries of the north Pacific ocean, (2) the international convention for the high seas fisheries of the north Pacific ocean, and (3) the last annual report of the international north Pacific fisheries commission and, in particular, to examine and consider the possible harmful effects which such recommendations may have upon Canada's fisheries and with authority to report its findings and recommendations from time to time.

This motion is seconded by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Mather).

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to the hon. member that this is a substantive motion and therefore in my opinion it requires notice. Under the circumstances it could not be acceptable at this time without the appropriate notice.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman asked for unanimous consent, and we would be glad to accord it.

Mr. Speaker: If there is unanimous consent, of course, it can be moved. Is there unanimous consent in this regard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: I regret that there is a dissenting voice.

Mr. Howard: On a point of order, may I draw to Your Honour's attention and the attention of the house that my first words were "with unanimous consent I move", and no one objected throughout the entire reading of that motion.

Mr. Speaker: That is not in accord with the rules.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, could we be permitted to find out who objected?

Mr. Pickersgill: The government.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS TO EXTEND COVERAGE TO FARM WORKERS

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-110, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act (agricultural employees' coverage).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Rapp: Mr. Speaker, I was disappointed, to say the least, that the commissioners appointed to inquire—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must inform the hon. member that he may in a few succinct words explain the purpose of the bill, without advancing any argument.

Mr. Rapp: The commissioners appointed to inquire into the Unemployment Insurance Act, in their report dated November, 1962, on the one hand recommended that the general principle—

Mr. Speaker: No. What is the purpose of the bill?

Mr. Rapp: The purpose of the bill is to bring employees in agriculture under the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN NATIONAL—EMPLOYEES ATTENDING JOB INSTRUCTION TRAINING COURSES

Question No. 1,205—Mr. Rinfret:

In 1961, how many C.N.R. employees at the supervisory level took job-instruction training courses and, of these, how many were French speaking?

Mr. McBain: During 1961, 499 employees of supervisory rank on the St. Lawrence division took training relating to their work responsibilities. The records do not indicate the racial origin of the employees enrolled but from examination of supplementary data it is estimated that approximately 263 were French speaking.

Questions

TITANIA ELECTRIC CORPORATION OF CANADA

Question No. 1,280—Mr. Matheson:

1. What is the value of the prime contracts and of the subcontracts between the government and the Titania Electric Corporation of Canada Ltd. in each of the years 1958 to 1962 inclusive?

2. What was the maximum profit allowed to Titania Electric Corporation of Canada Ltd. on the aforesaid contracts in each of these years?

3. Was a government audit conducted for each of the prime contracts in these years?

4. Was a government audit conducted on all the subcontracts during the years 1958-1962, and, if not (a) for which subcontracts were audits not conducted (b) what was the total value of these unaudited subcontracts?

Mr. O'Hurley: 1. The value of prime contracts in each year is as follows: 1958, $80,844.36; 1959, $34,524.48; 1960, $267,282.17; 1961, $62,786.74; 1962, $1,553.70.

There are no subcontracts between the department and the company, but the company has received subcontracts from prime defence contractors as follows: 1958, $81,599.00; 1959, $114,968.00; 1960, $231,779.00; 1961, $283,046.00; 1962, $174,080.00.

2. In the case of the prime contracts, five contracts valued at $348,290.98 provided for no profit, three contracts valued at $76,810.09 provided for a profit of 7½ per cent, two contracts valued at $4,555.00 provided for a maximum profit of 10 per cent, and information on the profit of 22 small contracts valued at $17,335.38 is not readily available.

In the case of subcontracts, the company has certified that it has calculated all costs in accordance with government regulations and that its estimated profit is not in excess of 10 per cent.

3. No. Government audit action has been completed on three prime contracts valued at $152,456.65 and is incomplete on three others valued at $261,340.68 as the work is still in progress.

4. No. (a) None of the subcontracts has been audited. (b) $885,472.00.

REFUSAL TO PERMIT U.S. STUDENTS TO FLY TO CUBA

Question No. 1,281—Mr. Berger:

Did the air transport board or anyone acting on its behalf, on December 27, 1962, refuse to allow a group of United States students to take off from Toronto to visit Cuba and, if so (a) under what authority did the board purport to act (b) has such authority been invoked before in similar circumstances and what were those circumstances?

Mr. McBain: On December 21, 1962, the board denied a Cuban air carrier permission to operate a charter flight Toronto-Havana transporting American students.

[Mr. McBain.]

(a) On December 21, 1962, an applicant Cuban air carrier had not complied with the requirements of the air transport board and Department of Transport to become eligible to operate charter flights into and out of Canada.

(b) Yes, when carriers have failed to meet the requirements of the air transport board and the Department of Transport.

PSYCHOLOGISTS IN PENITENTIARY SERVICE

Question No. 1,283—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Of the nineteen psychologists employed in the penitentiary service, how many have B.A., M.A., and Ph.D. degrees?

2. Are any of the nineteen employed in psychologist positions without satisfactory completion of the basic undergraduate degree?

3. In addition to their defined responsibilities in relation to the inmates, do the psychologists have other duties and, if so, what are these other duties?

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): 1. Only 9 of the 19 positions are filled at present on a full-time basis. Of these, 5 have B.A.'s, 3 M.A.'s, 1 Ph.D. There are 3 part time psychologists, 1 B.A., 1 M.A., 1 Ph.D.

2 All those employed are graduates, but B.A. degrees do not give accepted professional status.

3. They are also responsible for the psychological assessment of staff applicants and for some training of staff.

TRAINING OF CUSTODIAL OFFICERS

Question No. 1,286—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Is remunerative recognition given to professional penitentiary staff who have qualifications exceeding the minimum requirements of the penitentiary service?

2. Are there monetary incentives provided for custodial staff in our penitentiaries to improve their education and training for greater proficiency in job performance?

3. Do all custodial officers in our correctional institutions receive training in the behavioural sciences by qualified professional staff?

4. Does the federal government contemplate the provision of training grants and bursaries for its employees in the field of correction and welfare in view of the fact that moneys are now made available to the provinces for similar training in these fields?

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): 1. Yes, in that minimum requirements qualify the individual for appointments to positions of minimum grade only, whereas higher qualifications are recognized in that the appointment is made in a higher staff category.

2. No.

3. No.

4. This matter has been under discussion, but not because of the fact that moneys are now made available to the provinces for similar training. No decisions have been reached in this matter yet.

ALERT SERVICE, TORONTO

Question No. 1,288—Mr. Fisher:

Has the R.C.M.P. any knowledge of the objectives of the Alert Service, P.O. Box 173, Station Q, Toronto, and, if so, has the R.C.M.P. co-operated in any way with the service, either with advice or funds?

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): The R.C.M.P. has knowledge of the objectives of the Alert Service and has co-operated with this service as it does with any reputable news media. It has not co-operated with funds.

*REQUEST FOR LICENCE FOR THE RE-BROADCAST OF PROGRAMS ORIGINATING IN AMERICAN TELEVISION STATIONS

Question No. 1,289—Mr. Dube:

1. Has the Minister of Transport recently received from the mayor and the city council of Campbellton, N.B., an application for the immediate granting to the North Shore Community Television Ltd. of a licence for the microwave rebroadcast of programs originating in an American television station and, if so, has a licence been granted or will it be granted?

2. If a licence has been refused, on what grounds was the decision made?

Mr. Balcer: 1. North Shore Community Television Ltd. applied for authority to establish and operate a microwave relay in conjunction with an existing community antenna television system to carry programs from broadcasting stations located outside of Canada. No licence was granted.

2. Departmental policy states that the department may give consideration to an application which is predicated on the use of a radio relay where the programs are to be received from a transmitting station located in the United States provided the area does not receive any Canadian television service either directly or by CATV and the application complies with other technical requirements.

*CAMPOBELLO, N.B.—CUSTOMS SERVICE ON BRIDGE

Question No. 1,295—Mr. Rideout:

Does the Minister of National Revenue plan to have the customs office open on a 24-hour basis on the Roosevelt memorial bridge at Campobello?

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): The answer to the question is yes.

For the further information of the hon. member I can say that on my instructions the director of customs-excise inspection visited Campobello last week and investigated the effects of the winter hour schedule operative since January 7 on the residents of Campobello and general business activity.

I received the report of this officer yesterday afternoon, and based on it orders have been issued to resume full time service effective tonight.

SOCIAL CENTRE FOR INDIANS, VANCOUVER

Question No. 1,296—Mr. Prittie:

Has the government received a request from the city of Vancouver asking assistance in the establishment of a social centre for Indians to alleviate social problems arising from the migration of Indians from the reservations to the city?

Mr. McGee: No.

C.B.C.—GRANTS, REVENUES, AND B.C. OPERATIONS

Question No. 1,297—Mr. Nicholson:

1. For each fiscal year from April 1, 1957, to March 31, 1962, what federal grants were given or paid to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation?

2. What were the total revenues of the said corporation for each of these fiscal years?

3. What were the production expenses of the said corporation for (a) radio, and (b) television, in the British Columbia region for each of these fiscal years?

4. How many directors and producers in (a) radio, and (b) television, were employed in the B.C. region in each of these fiscal years by the said corporation?

5. What was the total television staff employed by the said corporation in British Columbia in each of these fiscal years?

6. What was the total staff employed by the said corporation in the city of Vancouver in each of these fiscal years?

7. For each of these fiscal years, what was the total number of programs produced in Vancouver in the following categories: (a) children's drama (b) adult drama, and (c) musical programming?

Mr. Halpenny: I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows:

1 and 2.

	(1) Parliamentary Grants	(2) Total Revenues
1957-58	*$41,177,181.	*$ 70,567,216.
1958-59	55,953,202.	89,147,724.
1959-60	58,560,213.	97,124,153.
1960-61	64,872,304.	102,960,527.
1961-62	76,466,505.	109,786,345.

*The parliamentary grants shown for 1957-58 were provided under the terms of the Canadian Broadcasting Act, hence cannot be properly related to the grants for the years 1958 to 1962 which were made under the provisions to the Broadcasting Act 1958.

3. It is considered to be not in the public interest to require the corporation to give such information as it would affect the corporation in the competitive business in which it is engaged.

CONTRACTS TO CANADIAN CONSTRUCTION COMPANIES

Question No. 1,303—Mr. Langlois:

1. What companies were awarded the contracts for the building of facilities at the following airports: Chatham, N.B., Bagotville, Que., Val d'Or, Que., Cold Lake, Alta., and Comox, B.C.?

2. Was a Canadian company awarded any contract for the construction of the R.C.A.F. terminal at Marville, France, and, if so, what company?

3. What Canadian company was awarded the contract for the building of communication stations between Brevoort Island and Goose Bay, Labrador, for the ballistic missile early warning system?

4. Did Defence Construction Ltd. call for tenders in connection with the construction of a dock at St. Vincent in the British Windward islands and, if so (a) did any Canadian company participate in the project (b) what is the name of such company?

Mr. O'Hurley: 1. During the fiscal year 1961-62, five contracts for the building of facilities were awarded as follows:

Chatham, N.B.: Coronet Paving Ltd., Andover, N.B.

Bagotville, Que.: North Shore Builders Ltd., Saguenay, Que.

Val d'Or, Que.: North Shore Construction Co. Ltd., Montreal, Que.

Cold Lake, Alta.: Poole Engineering (1958) Ltd., Edmonton, Alta.

Comox, B.C.: Miller Cartage & Contracting Ltd., Richmond, B.C.

2. No.

3. C. A. Pitts General Contractor Ltd., Toronto, Ontario.

4. Yes. (a) Yes. (b) Bennett & White Construction Co. Ltd., and Horie and Tynan (Joint Venture), Burnaby 1, B.C.

With respect to question 1—it is understood that the information Mr. Langlois requires is in connection with the contracts referred to on page 5, paragraph 3, of the annual report, as follows:

"By year's end, five new contracts had been awarded in this connection with a total value of $3,349,000 at Chatham, N.B. Bagotville, and Val d'Or, Quebec, Cold Lake, Alberta, and Comox, B.C."

The question, therefore, has been answered to give that information.

With respect to question 4, D.C.L. called tenders on behalf of the external aid office, Department of External Affairs.

*CANADA SAVINGS BONDS

Question No. 1,307—Mr. McMillan:

1. What was the total amount of the latest 1962 series of Canada savings bonds sold?

2. What was the value of former series of Canada savings bonds turned in since the last series went on sale?

3. What was the net amount of cash realized by the sale of the last series of these bonds?

Mr. Grafftey: 1. The sum of $1,602,637,300 of Canada savings bonds 1962 series were sold to December 31, 1962.

2. The preliminary total of redemptions of Canada savings bonds of all series in October, November and December 1962 was $834,658,400.

3. Gross sales of Canada savings bonds 1961 series to December 31, 1961, amounted to $932,346,000. In this period redemptions of all series of Canada savings bonds amounted to $250,665,850.

*QUEBEC—REQUEST FOR THE REMOVAL OF RAILWAY CROSSINGS

Question No. 1,310—Mr. Beaule:

1. Has the government entered into negotiations about the level crossings of the C.P.R. located in the city of Quebec on the lines running along the St. Charles river up to Palace station between Marie de l'Incarnation street and the Palace station and, if so, what have been the results of these negotiations?

2. Has there been an agreement or have there been negotiations between the city of Quebec, the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway for the purpose of using C.N.R. tracks in order to divert railway traffic in the city of Quebec?

Mr. Balcer: The Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada advises as follows:

1. In February 1961 the board authorized improvements to the protection at the level crossings at Mgr. Gauvreau, Bridge, de la Chapelle, Crown, Dorchester and Gosford streets, which are all on that portion of the C.P.R.s' Quebec subdivision between Marie de l'Incarnation street and Palace station. The work in connection with such changes was completed by February 1962. At present there are no applications before the board dealing with level crossings on that part of the C.P.R. Quebec subdivision.

2. The board is not aware of any agreement or negotiations between the city of Quebec, the C.N.R. and C.P.R. dealing with the diversion of railway traffic in the city of Quebec. It is possible, however, that some action has been taken by these parties to consider such a proposal, and the board would not necessarily be aware of any such negotiations.

*REQUEST FOR REDUCED DUTY ON IMPORTED AMBULANCES

Question No. 1,312—Mr. Gagnon:

Has the Minister of National Revenue received representations from "L'Association des Directeurs des Finances du Canada" recommending a reduction in duty as applied to ambulances imported from the United States and, if so, does the minister expect to give a favourable reply to the association?

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the answer is as follows. I have received a copy of a brief addressed by this association to the Minister of Finance. As the hon. member knows, the second part of his question does not apply to the Department of National Revenue, which is primarily concerned with administration and is not responsible for matters of tax policy.

C.B.C. PROGRAM ON ITALIANS IN TORONTO

Question No. 1,318—Mr. Haidasz:

Has the Canadian government considered the communication from the representatives of the Italian committee in Toronto protesting the C.B.C. camera program depicting the life of Canadians of Italian descent in Toronto and, if so, what action has the government taken with regard to this protest?

Mr. Halpenny: I am advised by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation that the program "Camera Canada" on January 14 was based on the activities of a recently arrived Italian family in Toronto. It was generally well received but was criticized by some members of Toronto's Italian community who would have preferred an emphasis on different features of community life. The C.B.C. arranged for a review of the film by several representatives of the Italian community and discussed their criticisms with them. After a full review of all the circumstances, the C.B.C. still believes that the program was a fair and honest portrayal of the life of a group of recent immigrants from Italy and of their efforts to adapt to life in their new home land.

*CAMPOBELLO, N.B.—CUSTOMS SERVICE ON BRIDGE

Question No. 1,321—Mr. Robichaud:

Is the government prepared to give favourable consideration to representations received from various sources on behalf of the 1,400 residents of Campobello island for the restoration of full time service on the Roosevelt memorial bridge in order to assure continuous movement of fish and pulpwood from Campobello to the mainland?

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, this is the same answer that I gave a few moments ago. I would be glad to send a copy to the hon. member for Gloucester, if that might be considered the answer.

Mr. Robichaud: I will accept that, Mr. Speaker.

Questions

BUTTER SURPLUS

Question No. 1,325—Mr. Badanai:

1. What is the amount of surplus butter stored in Canada as of December 31, 1962?
2. What is the location of storage plants in which surplus butter is stored and what is the cost of such storage to the government?

Mr. Jorgenson: 1. The amount of butter stored in Canada by the agricultural stabilization board as of December 31, 1962, was 2,086,270 boxes.

2. The location of storage plants and storage charges are as shown in the attached table.

ST. EUSTACHE—ENLARGEMENT OF POST OFFICE

Question No. 1,327—Mr. Drouin:

1. Is it the intention of the government to proceed with the enlargement of St. Eustache post office in the county of Deux Montagnes?

2. If so (a) have plans been prepared and by whom (b) what has been the approximate cost to date of the work involved (c) have tenders been called (d) was a contract let, to whom, and for what amount?

Mr. Fulton: 1. Yes.

2. (a) Preliminary plans are being prepared by the department.

(b) As this work is being done by personnel who are also engaged on other similar projects the cost of the work done to date cannot be accurately established.

(c) No.

(d) Not applicable.

BROADCAST OF THURSDAY NIGHT HOCKEY GAMES

Question No. 1,329—Mr. Dube:

1. Has the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation ever considered the expediency of broadcasting and televising regularly the hockey games played on Thursday nights and, if so, what decision was reached?

2. Has the corporation ever made surveys of public opinion about the matter?

Mr. Halpenny: 1. No.

2. No. So far there has been no great demand for hockey other than Saturday nights, except at playoff time. With the increased interest among fans at that season the C.B.C. covers all semifinal games in part, and the final playoffs in their entirety.

CHATEAUGUAY-HUNTINGDON-LAPRAIRIE CONSTITUENCY—HOUSING LOANS

Question No. 1,332—Mr. Boucher:

How many loans were made by C.M.H.C. in the constituency of Chateauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie during the years 1959, 1960, 1961 and 1962?

Mr. Fulton:

N.H.A. Loans Approved in the Constituency of Chateauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie 1959-1962*

Year	Approved Lenders No. of Loans	C.M.H.C. No. of Loans	Total N.H.A. No. of Loans
1959	83	37	120
1960	13	11	24
1961	119	41	160
1962	455	78	533
1959-1962	670	167	837

* Data for 1962 do not take account of cancellations made after loan approved. Cancellations are taken into account in the data for earlier years.

[Mr. Jorgenson.]

*SURVEY ON CONDITIONS OF THE OUTSIDE CHANNEL AT SHIPPEGAN GULLY

Question No. 1,334—Mr. Robichaud:

In recent years, has a survey been made on conditions of the outside channel at Shippegan Gully, Gloucester county, N.B., and, if so (a) when was such a survey completed (b) what was the average depth of water found at low tide throughout the main channel leading to Shippegan Gully breakwater (c) is it the intention of the government to proceed with dredging operations to improve that channel in order to accommodate the local dragger fleet?

Mr. Fulton: Yes. (a) In May, 1962.

(b) Inside the breakwater, 8.5 feet. About 6 feet outside.

(c) Not now, because of the very high maintenance costs involved.

GRANITE FOR HEALTH AND WELFARE BUILDING, OTTAWA

Question No. 1,335—Mr. McIlraith:

1. Is granite specified for use in the construction of the new building for the Department of National Health and Welfare at Tunney's Pasture and, if so, what steps are being taken to ensure that the granite being used meets the standards of quality specified?

2. Has any of the granite supplied to date failed to meet such standards?

Mr. Fulton: 1. Yes; to ensure it meets specifications the granite is checked by visual inspection. Samples of the stone are also tested in the laboratory.

2. Yes; about one third of the granite supplied to date shows white markings or streaks which are prohibited by the specifications and will not be used in the building.

*DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE AGENDA

Question No. 1,339—Mr. Rinfret:

1. Will the federal government include a definite agenda in invitations shortly to be sent to the premiers of the provinces to attend a dominion-provincial conference and, if so, will the following subjects be contained in such agenda: (a) a distinctive national flag (b) a national anthem (c) bilingualism and biculturalism (d) a draft amendment to the constitution with regard to pensions?

2. Will other matters be discussed and, if so, what subjects?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, when the invitations have been sent out a copy thereof will be tabled in the house. I cannot in advance of these invitations deal with what will or will not be included.

PLACEMENT DIVISION SUPERVISORS, NATIONAL EMPLOYMENT SERVICE

Question No. 1,341—Mr. Laniel:

1. Do supervisors grade 4 of the placement division of local offices of the national employment service receive the same salary as some of their subordinates?

2. In some local offices of the service, is the supervisor classified as a placement officer grade 2, and, if so (a) is he responsible for the supervision and rating of employees of equivalent grade and salary (b) are employees in local offices remunerated for supervisory duties (c) are employees in the regional or national offices remunerated for similar supervisory duties (d) did the fitness review board of the civil service commission make any recommendations during 1960 concerning additional remuneration for supervisory duties in local offices of the service and were any such recommendations not implemented and for what reason?

Mr. Hales: 1. No. The positions of subordinate employees are classified at grades below the level of grade 4.

2. (a) and (b) As a result of a recent upgrading of positions in the national employment service there are some instances where supervisors at the employment officer 2 level have one or two employees on their staff at the same classification. Studies are now being conducted to determine the proper classification for local office supervisory positions in the national employment service with a view to correcting these anomalies. (c) Yes. (d) The fitness review committees were departmental committees whose function was to make recommendations with regard to the suitability of employees for the higher grades which were introduced in a general program designed to provide more appropriate classifications for the duties being performed. In some cases certain committees recommended higher classifications than those that had been approved for the duties being performed, and in such cases the employees concerned were classified at the level that was appropriate for their positions and which was at the grade that was authorized for other employees in the national employment service who were performing similar duties.

PAYMENT FOR BRIDGE AND FEEDER CANAL, DUNNVILLE, ONT.

Question No. 1,344—Mr. Pennell:

What vote of the revised estimates for 1962-63 contains the sum of $420,000 required by the St. Lawrence seaway authority to pay to the corporation of the county of Haldimand to carry out the terms of the agreement entered into by the said authority and county relating to the bridge and feeder canal situated at the town of Dunnville in the county of Haldimand?

Mr. McBain: The St. Lawrence seaway authority advises as follows: vote 230(a), supplementary estimates (A) 1962/63.

HOME MAIL DELIVERY, HAWKESBURY, ONT.

Question No. 1,346—Mr. Ethier:

Has the Postmaster General reached a decision concerning the provision of home mail delivery for residents of Hawkesbury, Ontario, and, if so, when will such service be inaugurated?

Mrs. Fairclough: Yes. Service will be inaugurated on Monday, March 18, 1963.

*CONTROL OF FINANCE COMPANIES IN BANKING FIELD

Question No. 1,357—Mr. Ryan:

Does the government plan to introduce legislation to control finance companies in their entry into the banking field and particularly in their pursuit of deposits from the public?

Mr. Grafftey: This is a matter of government policy. Any announcement would be made by the government in the usual manner.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE FUND—PRESENT SITUATION AND MONEY PUT INTO IT

Question No. 1,362—Mr. Deschatelets:

1. How much money is there in the unemployment insurance fund as of this date?
2. Apart from statutory contributions made by employers and employees, was there any money put into the unemployment insurance fund in the form of loans or otherwise and, if so, for what amounts and at what rate of interest?

Mr. Grafftey: 1. On December 31, 1962, the last date for which information is available, there was $98,975,326.02 in the unemployment insurance fund.

2. The following loans have been granted to the fund:

Amount of loan	Rate of interest	Interest paid
$ 80,000,000.00	5%	$1,470,136.98
42,000,000.00	5¾%	273,036.99
70,000,000.00	5%	1,599,726.03
70,500,000.00	5¼%	1,538,106.16
$262,500,000.00		$4,881,006.16

All those loans have been paid back.

LIGHTING ON PERLEY BRIDGE

Question No. 1,371—Mr. Ethier:

Is the Department of Public Works or any other department of the federal government responsible for the maintenance of Perley bridge between Hawkesbury, Ontario, and Grenville, Que., and, if so, will action be taken to improve lighting on the bridge?

Mr. Fulton: The Department of Public Works is in charge of the maintenance of Perley bridge. Tenders have been called for the setting up of a lighting system on that bridge. Those tenders will be received on February 12, 1963.

(Text):

SUBSIDY ON WHEY BUTTER

Question No. 1,372—Mr. Ethier:

Does the government propose to include whey butter in the same category as ordinary butter upon which a subsidy of 12 cents per lb. is paid?

Mr. Pigeon: The present dairy support program authorized payment of the 12 cent subsidy on creamery butter only. No decision has been made concerning the support program for the coming year.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

*STRONTIUM 90 LEVEL IN NORTH

Question No. 1,276—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

1. What is the national average concentration of strontium 90, according to latest measurements?
2. What is the average concentration of strontium 90 in the Northwest Territories and Canadian Arctic regions according to the latest measurements?
3. What does the Canadian government consider as a "safe level" of strontium 90?
4. When did the Canadian government first take measurements of strontium 90 concentration in the Northwest Territories and the Canadian Arctic?
5. When did the Canadian government first publish its findings regarding strontium 90 concentration in the Northwest Territories and the Canadian Arctic?

Mrs. Casselman: Return tabled.

IMMIGRATION AND EMIGRATION, 1950-1962

Question No. 1,333—Mr. Beer:

1. How many persons came to Canada in each calendar year 1950 to 1962 inclusive, from which countries did they come and what are the numbers from each country?
2. How many persons left Canada during the same period by years, and to which countries did they migrate?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

REPORT ON FORT ST. JOHN INDIAN AGENCY

Motion No. 54—Mr. Howard:

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of any reports of conditions at the Fort St. John Indian agency and in particular the situation at Prophet river since January 1, 1962.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether with the permission of the house I could request that this notice be withdrawn and the order discharged.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the notice of motion shall be withdrawn?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

TELECOMMUNICATIONS CONTRACT FOR RADIO STATIONS

Motion No. 59—Mr. Cowan:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this house a copy of all correspondence dated August 15, 1962 to December 1, 1962, between the government of Canada or any minister, department or agency thereof and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Bell Telephone Company of Canada, respecting the contract for telecommunications for the approximately 195 radio stations, the previous ten year contract having been replaced by a new contract effective October 1, 1962.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for York-Humber is not here.

Mr. Halpenny: Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the hon. member could this motion stand?

Motion stands.

WINNIPEG—HEALTH OF SCHOOL CHILDREN IN RELATION TO SMOKING

Motion No. 64—Mr. Knowles:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this house a copy of all correspondence, dated since July 1, 1962, exchanged between the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Winnipeg school board concerning the subject of smoking in relation to the health of school children.

Motion agreed to.

REGULATIONS RESPECTING EXECUTION OF DEATH SENTENCES

Motion No. 65—Mr. Matheson:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this house a copy of all regulations made by the governor in council pursuant to section 653 of the Criminal Code of Canada with respect to the execution of sentences of death.

Motion agreed to.

CAMPOBELLO, N.B.—CUSTOMS SERVICE ON BRIDGE

Motion No. 66—Mr. Robichaud:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this house a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other communications as from December 1, 1962 to date, between the government of Canada, its officials or any interested persons regarding the closing restrictions on the Roosevelt memorial bridge linking Campobello island in New Brunswick with Lubec, Maine.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, there is no objection to producing the documents requested, but permission will have to be secured from the interested parties, the provinces, and perhaps even the state of Maine, I think. With that reservation the motion is quite acceptable.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Speaker, I hope there is no restriction on correspondence from individuals, including the leader of the official opposition in New Brunswick.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the reservation expressed by the minister, is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Motion agreed to.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH ASSOCIATION OF UNIVERSITY TEACHERS

Motion No. 67—Mr. Orlikow:

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of all correspondence between the Minister of Justice and the Canadian association of university teachers, since September 21, 1962.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I understand the hon. member is willing that this motion should stand.

Motion stands.

CANADIAN TRADE POLICY WITH U.K.

Motion No. 68—Mr. Matheson:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this house copies of all communications received from the United Kingdom since the visit of Mr. Peter Thorneycroft to Canada in September 1957 alluding to Canadian trade policy with the United Kingdom.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, I would ask that this motion be allowed to stand.

Motion stands.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO EXTENSION OF TERRITORIAL WATERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether the government now proposes to establish by national action a 12 mile jurisdictional zone of waters adjacent to the Canadian coastline.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add to what has already been stated in that connection. The matter was reviewed on an earlier occasion, and there has been no change.

Mr. Pearson: As a supplementary question may I ask whether it is the attitude of the United States of America to this proposed action that is holding up a decision?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, it is not a question of one country or another. As the hon. gentleman knows, there were two lengthy conferences on this subject and we almost succeeded in securing that which all the nations desire. At the last conference we lost out by half a vote, and since then there have been discussions taking place with a view to ascertaining what might be achieved through individual agreement or multilateral agreement among nations favourable to such a change.

TRADE

INQUIRY AS TO RELATIONSHIP OF FORTHCOMING NEGOTIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Prime Minister arising out of his statement to the house, after the close of the question period yesterday, with regard to trade. Can the Prime Minister indicate to the house the relationship between the forthcoming trade negotiations referred to by him yesterday and those to be conducted in the forthcoming United Nations conference on trade and development?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman will study both he will see there is a vast difference. The President of the United States realized there was a difference when he accepted the suggestion of the Canadian government. I would ask the hon. gentleman to make an examination, and I believe when he does he will understand what the government is proposing.

SUGGESTED TARIFF ADJUSTMENTS TO STIMULATE TRADE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Before the house commences labour I wish to address a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the miscarriage of negotiations with respect to the admission of Great Britain to the common market, is the government giving consideration to tariff adjustments that will stimulate trade for Canada with Great Britain, the commonwealth and other countries?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman was kind enough to give me notice a moment ago of the question he intended to ask. The government has always sought to stimulate fruitful two-way trade with Great Britain, the commonwealth and other countries, and to this end it has taken a lead in seeking a conference of the countries of the commonwealth, the countries of the European economic community, the countries of the European free trade area, the United States, Japan and other like minded countries, at as early a date as possible.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF MINISTER'S PRESS RELEASE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the Minister of National Defence. In order to make the record complete will the minister agree to ask the unanimous consent of the house to make his release of January 28, interpreting the speech of the Prime Minister on Friday last, an appendix to today's Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I am asking the Minister of National Defence a very serious question. Will he agree to table the release and ask the house to make it an appendix to today's Hansard?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has seen this in print, and I shall be glad to send him a copy of it if he wants another one.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No; the privilege of the house is involved in this. It is not a question of my having seen it.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am asking the Minister of National Defence—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The reply may be unsatisfactory to the hon. member, but I do not think he is in a position to comment on it. I recognized the hon. member for Athabasca.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a question of privilege—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What about the rules of the house?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am rising on a question of privilege dealing with one of the most important matters facing this country at this time—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —and it does not add to the solemnity and importance of our deliberations for hon. gentlemen to display the reactions they now manifest. Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has made a statement to which—

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I have a succinct statement of the privilege that is being sought?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I am stating my question of privilege. The Prime Minister made a statement with regard to defence policy on Friday last and the Minister of National Defence, although he sat here during the deliberations on Friday last, issued a release outside the house in which he gave his interpretation of the Prime Minister's remarks. In the opinion of many people—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Order.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —this seems to be—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am having some difficulty in seeing the privilege at the moment. I think we are getting argument rather than privilege.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should think there would be no difficulty in seeing the question of privilege on this matter. This release has been discussed in the house. The minister refuses to table the release on the grounds that I have seen the statement. It is not a question of whether I have seen the statement. This is a matter of public interest. I say the privilege of the house consists in the obligation of the minister to table this document so that it can be part of the record and so can be a key to judgment with regard to the division of opinion in the ministry on so vital a matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Having heard the hon. member in extenso I am still convinced there is no question of privilege here. There is no statutory obligation on the minister to table this document, and he is within his rights not to table the document. The only way this document could be tabled or produced in the house would be by way of a substantive motion.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I now table this release of the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member cannot table the document.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There is no substitute for the rules.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Don't lose your temper, Mr. Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Athabasca has the floor and I wish he could be heard.

[Later:]

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Prime Minister if in addition to the system of simultaneous translation the government is thinking of instituting a system of simultaneous interpretation.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, after some of the remarks that have emanated from that side of the house all I can say is that charity begins at home.

[Later:]

Mr. Malcolm MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, in another attempt to clarify for the Canadian people the position of the government with respect to the important question of nuclear weapons, would the Prime Minister indicate to the nation the extent to which he disagrees with the interpretation of the Minister of National Defence?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is a quite improper question at the moment.

[Later:]

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, in view of your ruling I should like to try again, and rephrase my question. Would the Prime Minister indicate to the house whether or not the government is at present pursuing policies aimed at the acquisition of nuclear weapons?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, this is going far beyond the orders of the day, I submit with great deference. That question was asked and answered in full. While the answers do not satisfy the opposition, I believe it is proper—and I have not raised any objections yet—to suggest to Your Honour that these questions are no longer within the purview of questions to be asked on orders of the day.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Chair will decide on the matter of questions from all sides of the house. I think we will go along with that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: But in this regard, before anybody gets overly exercised about it, I suggest to hon. members that they might perhaps review some of the rules in so far as questions are concerned. Again I would ask the co-operation of the house in this regard. I do not know that it should necessarily become a game to see how many can be drifted past the Speaker.

Mr. Pearson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, and notwithstanding the intervention of the Prime Minister I would ask you to rule whether you consider the previous question out of order.

Mr. Speaker: Oh, yes, I do. The question was of the same nature. It goes far beyond the realm of questions to be asked on orders of the day, and I think the Leader of the Opposition recognizes that.

Mr. MacInnis: On the point of order, I should like to ask Your Honour why you permitted the Prime Minister to rise in answer to the question without making a ruling.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is not necessarily up to the Chair to pass on every question as it goes by. If the minister is prepared to give a reply and says that it is not a proper question to be answered, that is up to the minister. That is the course I intend to follow.

Mr. Pearson: On a point of order—

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order. One at a time. I think that is quite clear.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I would appreciate your ruling as to why my latest question was out of order. You have not indicated so far.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Read the book.

Mr. Speaker: The question, as I have indicated, went into a matter of policy and was far too wide to be allowed on orders of the day.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, are you ruling that questions in regard to the collective responsibility of the government on matters of defence or other policies are out of order?

Mr. Speaker: That is not so, and many questions have been put in that regard. But there are ways of putting questions that do not offend the rules.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Thomas R. Berger (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Prime Minister which I think Your Honour will not find unacceptable. May I ask the Prime Minister whether he disagrees with the press release issued by the Minister of National Defence, which has been referred to in the house?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have said over and over again in answer to that question, and repetition does not improve the situation, that I made the statement of policy, and I am not here for the purpose of determining what interpretations may be placed thereon.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether the statement of the Minister of National Defence, which was not tabled this afternoon, was a statement of government policy in the matter of defence and nuclear arms?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Repetition.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has there been any change in government policy regarding the acquisition of nuclear arms since last Friday?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I made a full statement on Friday, and I have nothing further to answer. This is simply an endeavour to repeat over and over again something they realize was ended on Friday.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think we should get into a controversy on motives in asking questions.

SPORTS

HOCKEY—ASSISTANCE FOR WORLD TOURNAMENT IN OTTAWA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Athabasca): My question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Alderman Don Kay of Ottawa has been elected to an international commission set up to host a world wide silver stick hockey tournament to be held in Ottawa during the centennial year. Would the government give early consideration to providing assistance to the civic authority in Ottawa so that a civic centre can be made ready for that important occasion?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member could make his representations during consideration of the estimates, or put a suitable question on the order paper.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

INQUIRY AS TO POLICY RESPECTING SECOND ROUTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, may I also direct a question to the Prime Minister and ask him whether his government has endorsed the proposal of the Yellowhead route association with respect to the route of the second trans-Canada highway?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I gave a report on that question yesterday. If the hon. gentleman will look at Hansard I think he will have his answer.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might ask the Prime Minister whether he is in a position today to answer the question I asked him yesterday as to whether the government was considering any additional financial assistance over and above the 50 per cent contribution now provided by law—

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Fulton: And 90 per cent of 10 per cent of the route.

Mr. Pickersgill: —and 90 per cent of 10 per cent of the route, as the minister has said—and the 90 per cent in all provinces except Quebec has already been spent. In addition to the present provisions of the law I wonder whether the government is contemplating any additional contribution to the completion of the trans-Canada highway now under construction?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the question of the trans-Canada highway is a matter that is under constant study, but there is no present intention of amending the act.

FISHERIES

REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF REPORT OF NORTH PACIFIC COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack Davis (Coast-Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Fisheries or the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the urgent representations which have been made in the last few days by the fishermen and the fishing industry on the west coast, is the government prepared to refer the recommendations of the north Pacific fisheries commission to the standing committee on marine and fisheries?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I have answered that question a couple of times already. I have nothing to add to what I have said. The matter is still under consideration by the government. It has not been approved by any of the three governments which are parties to the treaty.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is it not a fact that the one of main concern to us is Canada's approval, and not the approval of the other two governments?

Mr. Arthur Laing (Vancouver South): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister aware that representatives of the fishermen and the industry are here at this time and will be returning to Vancouver shortly?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That matter has already been dealt with.

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): May I direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries, Mr. Speaker. Is it the fact, as has been reported in the press, that in mid January in Tokyo he expressed himself as being in favour in principle of the recent recommendations of the north Pacific fisheries commission?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I expressed no opinion on that matter on that occasion.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

SUGGESTED ROYAL COMMISSION TO STUDY CANADIAN CULTURAL SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. On Monday he indicated that today he would announce when he would make his statement on the request for a royal commission on biculturalism. I wondered whether he wanted to make any such statement today.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I at no time said that I would make a statement on a royal commission on biculturalism. I said I would make a statement in regard to the problem as we saw it and the need for convening a federal-provincial conference.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I think the Prime Minister misunderstood me. On Monday his words were "The day after tomorrow I will indicate when I am going to make the statement". I just wondered whether the Prime Minister could make a statement today.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman mentioned a royal commission on biculturalism and that is what my answer was directed to. I think the statement will be made on Monday.

(Translation):

[Later:]

Mr. Gilles Gregoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. Are we to understand from the Prime Minister's remarks that he has discarded all plans for a royal commission on biculturalism?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Such a question should not be asked on orders of the day.

(Text):

BRIDGES

CHAMPLAIN BRIDGE, MONTREAL—INQUIRY AS TO REMOVAL OF TOLLS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. B. S. Mackasey (Verdun): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Since the installation of direction signs has not appreciably increased traffic on the Champlain bridge, does the minister feel that the time has now come to remove the tolls on that bridge?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think this is a question that should be put on the order paper.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

CORRECTION OF REMARK BY MINISTER OF JUSTICE RESPECTING UNEMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, on January 24 the Minister of Justice interrupted the Leader of the Opposition to say that he had corrected a statement which appeared in the Japanese press, which the minister was alleged to have made, that Canada had the highest level of unemployment in the western world. I wonder whether the minister could make this correction available to the house before we go into committee of supply on the estimates of the Minister of Labour.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Justice): Of course, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, as is not unusual, has misquoted me.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What I said was that I had taken steps through the press—and, I may say, otherwise—to correct as far as it is possible for one individual to do so this palpable error that appeared in the Japanese press. I made it quite clear at the time that at no time did I make the statement that was attributed to me in that press, and which was quoted with some glee by the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think we are going to get ourselves on very thin ice here.

Mr. Pickersgill: A supplementary question to the minister, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister consider that the Japanese press is as inaccurate as the Canadian press?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. We are just getting into an area of controversy here which is not going to advance the business of the house at all.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is not as inaccurate as the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

DIVORCE

INQUIRY AS TO PROGRESS TOWARD SOLUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister and ask him what progress has been made toward finding a solution to the subject matter of divorce.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the subject of divorce is in the same position as it has always been.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Chown in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

General administration—

1. Department administration including a grant of $10,000 to Frontier College and the expenses of the international labour conferences, $1,321,700.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): It is my intention, Mr. Chairman, to make a comprehensive statement on the work of the Department of Labour in introducing the 1962-63 estimates of the department. I hope members of this committee will give every consideration and co-operation as we address ourselves to the various items which are before us in these estimates. I am prepared to reciprocate in like manner and give every co-operation in answering questions which may be in the minds of members. As a result I hope these estimates will be passed expeditiously.

The Department of Labour, during the period in which I have been Minister of Labour, has endeavoured to co-operate with each member of this house in every possible way, and to be as helpful as possible to each and every member of parliament. I doubt very much whether any member, regardless of where he sits in this chamber, has found our attitude to be one of discourtesy or lack of co-operation in giving out information or assisting with regard to any problem which relates to one or another aspect of our work. We have tried to afford this co-operation to all members of parliament for their benefit and for the benefit of their constituents.

I hope in my statement to be able to deal with every aspect of the department and every phase of its jurisdiction. However, to give a complete picture of all the various phases of the department's work and responsibilities would necessarily take up a great deal of the time of this committee. I do not intend to do that, but I shall endeavour to give a brief résumé of all the aspects of our work in as few words as possible. After that I hope I shall be in a position to answer any questions which may be in the minds of the members when we reach the particular items in our estimates to which they relate.

Mr. Chairman, the committee will be asked to provide $217,577,700 in the main estimates and $80 million in supplementary estimates (A). The Department of Labour requires $192,809,700 out of this amount and the unemployment insurance commission requires $104,768,000. This represents an increase of $47,534,597 over the 1961-62 main and supplementary estimates. Members of this committee will notice that this increase in relation to the 1961-62 appropriation does not agree with the figures shown on page 169 of the blue book. The explanation is that further supplementary estimates for 1961-62 totalling about $93,400,000 were passed by the house after the main estimates were prepared and, of course, the $80 million supplementary estimates for 1962-63 are not shown in the summary. The supplementary estimates for 1962-63 to which I have referred include $30 million for the municipal winter works incentive program and an additional $50 million for technical and vocational training organizations.

I should like now to deal generally with the main activities of the Department of Labour. I wish to put on record my sincere appreciation, first of all, of the excellent work performed by the staff of the department and of the co-operation I have received from labour and management groups, the provinces and the many other organizations with which we work across Canada. The high level of competence associated with the work of the department will, I am sure, be a source of satisfaction to all members of this committee, as it is to me.

Vote No. 1 includes costs relating to the general administration of the department, international affairs and the women's bureau. In the field of international affairs, as hon. members know, the department serves as our official link with the international labour organization, and it is this co-ordinating activity which is provided for in the item. The highly constructive work which the I.L.O. carries forward is so well known as not to require recounting at this time. The department has played an increasing role in these significant activities as the I.L.O. becomes increasingly more important in making a special contribution to the manpower and labour relations development of many countries less developed than our own.

In the women's bureau we are interested, of course, in the activities of women in the labour force of this country. Women are playing an increasingly important part in Canada's labour force, and the work of the women's bureau makes a significant contribution to a wider understanding of the problems and needs of women at work in addition to encouraging progressive standards in that field. The bureau works closely with the provincial departments of education and labour, employers' organizations, the labour movement and the national women's organizations.

In the economics and research branch, research plays a key role in the Department of Labour in helping us deal with the complex problems we face in providing a sound factual basis for the development of our programs and policies. The work is carried out by the economics and research branch provided for in vote No. 5. This research has made a vital contribution to the development of the Technical and Vocational Training Assistance Act which was passed by this house in December, 1960, and to the preparation of the industrial change and manpower adjustment act which is now on the order paper to be placed before the house this session. I hope we shall have an opportunity of discussing this legislation.

The results of this research have contributed to our understanding of the consequences of automation to workers, management and governments in Canada, and have made a most practical contribution to the consideration of measures dealing with this important problem. Work on a study of changing technology and manpower in one of the regions of a Canadian railway was completed this year, and a report will be published. Work began on a similar study in two large railway shops and a report on this is under preparation. A second study of the extent of electronic data processing in Canada is under way and a detailed examination of the effects of office automation on manpower and training needs is being carried out. Five reports on studies in other industries have already been issued. A survey of employers' current and future needs for engineers and scientists was conducted during the year and a preliminary report has been issued. The joint federal-provincial studies of seasonal unemployment in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick will be concluded shortly. A range of special studies of the characteristics of the unemployed were initiated during the past year in co-operation with the dominion bureau of statistics. As a result of this, additional information on unemployment has already been published and more information is currently being developed.

In the field of conciliation, during the fiscal year ending March 1962 the more important collective agreements between the major railways and the running trades expired and new agreements were being negotiated. I am pleased to report, Mr. Chairman, that all of these disputes have been settled, including those involving the major railways and the brotherhood of railroad trainmen, the brotherhood of locomotive firemen end enginemen and the brotherhood of locomotive engineers. Collective agreements are to run through to 1964. Also negotiations commenced in the year ending March 31 for the renewal of collective agreements between the major railways companies and the unions representing over 100,000 non-operating employees. A conciliation board was appointed and I am happy to report that in August, for the first time in recent years, a settlement of all issues in dispute was made by the board. I want here to say what tremendous work the hon. member for York South did on the board, representing, as he did, the unions, as one of the members of three.

The field of labour-management co-operation is very important indeed and is a field that has now been recognized by a great many people of this country, in which these same people are beginning to become more interested. As hon. members know, I have stressed the importance for over four and a half years now of developing effective labour-management co-operation in this country in order to improve the performance of our economy and to eliminate the distrust between the parties to industry. I am happy to say that great strides have been made in this respect. The lessons to be learned about the contribution of labour-management co-operation to a more efficient economy and rising standards of living have been emphasized for us by the European experience. The recent national productivity council mission to Europe has emphasized the fundamental need in this country for a substantial development of labour-management-government co-operation. As hon. members know, the productivity council reports both to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and to the Minister of Labour. The council has held two significant labour-management conferences at Kingston and at Halifax which have played an important role in the development of consultation between top level labour and management in this country. In the past year, the Department of Labour has organized area conferences of labour and management at Winnipeg, Cornwall and Kitchener to promote labour-management co-operation through exchange of experience on improving the effectiveness of joint committees. The productivity council as recently as last week held another conference in Saskatoon, and the reports I have received indicate that it was highly successful, in fact more successful probably than some of the others. In other words, we are getting into an area of understanding, where these conferences are beginning to bring about a better understanding of labour and management in their own particular spheres. It is planned to hold more of these conferences over the coming months.

All of these conferences have played a significant role in improving the atmosphere of labour-management relations and stimulating discussion of ways and means of bringing about greater labour-management-government co-operation. The labour-management co-operation service of the department is responsible for promoting better labour-management relations throughout Canada. This kind of co-operation at the plant level is one of the important keys to increased productive efficiency and high morale in industry. I might say, Mr. Chairman, that we formed 1,700 such committees at the plant level across this country. We have increased these committees in the past year by 100, and they are doing a very important job in labour-management relations.

I want to remind hon. members that in the field of civilian rehabilitation this house, in May 1961, passed the Vocational Rehabilitation of Disabled Persons Act. That is an important milestone in giving greater economic and social independence to our disabled citizens. Most of the provinces have responded to this legislation by developing a more comprehensive program of vocational rehabilitation. As a result, we have doubled our estimate for this fiscal year, which is only the beginning of a greatly expanded program. Similar substantial increases have been requested in the estimates for vocational training for disabled persons as part of this program. While this government will continue to provide for those unable to provide for themselves, we now know that through the co-operation of provincial governments and voluntary organizations a considerable number of these seriously disabled persons can be usefully employed and can make a contribution to our society.

In the field of special services we have under vote 30 a provision for the special services branch which administers the municipal winter works incentive program, the federal-provincial farm labour program and the program of organized movement of workers between Canada and the United States. It is also involved in our regular winter employment campaign, more familiarly known as the "DO IT NOW" program. I would pay tribute to public-spirited citizens across Canada, the press, radio and television for their co-operation in making this program successful.

Under the farm labour program, agricultural workers are moved within and between the provinces and Canada and the United States to meet seasonal requirements. On October 17 and 18, the department held a most successful conference on training in agriculture. The conference was attended by representatives of provincial departments of education and agriculture, representatives of farm organizations and of industries related to agriculture and of professional agriculturalists. The conference identified and discussed the issues which must be faced in the development of effective agricultural training in Canada and should stimulate the development of greatly improved training programs for agriculture by the provinces under the auspices of the Technical and Vocational Training Assistance Act.

For a few moments I should like to deal with the municipal works incentive program. Last winter's municipal winter works incentive program gained an increased response from the provinces and municipalities and made a fundamental contribution in securing winter work for thousands of Canadians who would otherwise be unemployed. The 8,269 projects that were authorized provided an estimated 148,000 jobs involving almost 6 million man-days of work. The Canadian Labour Congress in its research bulletin for May and June of 1962 has commended this program in the following words:

> There can be no question that the program has been effective and increasingly so—145,000 jobs in the 1961-62 season, lasting an average of about 40 days each for a total of 5,784,374 man-days work —this is not to be sneezed at. Moreover, there is little doubt that at least an equal number of jobs were provided indirectly in the industries which manufacture, sell and transport materials used in these jobs. The program certainly has not solved the problem of seasonal unemployment but it has made a substantial contribution.

In July the government announced that the program would again be in operation this winter on the same basis as last year. All of the provinces accepted this offer and the program got under way on October 15 last. As of January 25 of this year 5,853 projects from 2,293 municipalities have been accepted and approved. The total cost of the projects so far authorized is estimated at something like $319 million. That is, indeed, a substantial public works program for this winter instigated under this program. These projects will provide 107,011 jobs and some 4,949,229 man days of work.

Based on municipal estimates of cost the federal contribution towards these authorized projects is something in the neighbourhood of $35,811,000. These figures represent an increase over last year at the same stage of the program. Since the inception of this program in the fall of 1958 the amount of work provided under the program has increased each and every year and the figures I have quoted with regard to employment provided apply only to on-site employment. It is estimated, as the Canadian Labour Congress points out, that at least an equal number of workers will be employed through the production and supply of materials used on various projects.

I should like to deal for a short while with technical and vocational training in Canada. The provision for the Technical and Vocational Training Assistance Act is made in votes 35 and 40. The Prime Minister recently described this program as "the most massive effort in the field of human training ever undertaken in Canada".

The program of capital facilities and expanded training programs which the Technical and Vocational Training Assistance Act provided represents a massive intervention on the part of this government to equip the manpower resources of Canada, and particularly its youth, to meet the economic and technological challenges of the future.

Effective technical and vocational education is a fundamental prerequisite for the development of sound economic growth in Canada. A few of the reasons for this major initiative on the part of this government may be pointed up by some fundamental facts.

Skilled, professional and white-collar occupations make up 70 per cent of our labour force today while the unskilled and semi-skilled account for the balance of 30 per cent. Over the past ten years alone, professional workers have grown by 70 per cent; skilled by about 38 per cent and white collar workers by 34 per cent. On the other hand, unskilled and semi-skilled workers have increased by only 19 per cent and some unskilled primary industry occupations have declined in numbers.

This vast upgrading of the educational and training requirements of our labour force has been necessary because this country faced a serious problem of youth leaving school without sufficient educational qualification. About 35 per cent of our young people who entered elementary school in recent years have left school at or before grade 8; another 35 per cent left before obtaining their junior matriculation.

Over the next four years, it is estimated that there will be an increase of 280,000 in the numbers of youth attending secondary schools. Already this program is having a substantial impact on our early-school-leaver problem.

In September there were 80,000 more in the 14-19 year age group than last year, but only 8,000 more youth were in the labour market. This has meant that in spite of the very substantial increase in the numbers of youth in this age group, many more of them are staying in school longer to complete their educational and vocational training.

The capital building program, of which I shall give the members of this committee some detail, at its present stage of development will provide facilities to train almost 130,000 Canadians each and every year. In the light of the figures and the increased number of youth who will be attending school and entering post secondary school training facilities, there is absolutely no reason to fear that these facilities will be underutilized as some critics assert. If anything, they may be overcrowded.

Under this act, between April 1, 1961, when it came into effective operation and January 28, 1963, of this year, I as Minister of Labour have approved for federal contribution 468 provincial capital projects for institutes of technology, adult vocational schools, trade schools, and technical and vocational high schools.

The progress of this technical education and capital building and equipment program is so important and of such interest to every member of this committee, I am sure, that I would request the permission of this committee to table a statistical statement which will indicate the details of this program as of January 28, 1963, by provinces and for Canada as a whole. If I may have this permission at this time, I should be glad.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Order. Is the table a very substantial one?

Mr. Starr: About one page.

The Chairman: I believe the minister is asking that it be included as part of his speech. As the committee realizes, I cannot accept any document for tabling. Is it agreed that this table will be included as part of the minister's speech?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Laing: At this stage may I ask the minister whether I heard him correctly as saying that this table shows the apportionment between the provinces?

Mr. Starr: Yes; and for Canada as a whole; for both.

[Editor's note: The table above referred to is as follows:]

The Chairman: Order. Before the minister continues I should like to inform him, as I do not want to interrupt again in a minute, that his time will expire in a minute. Is it agreed that he has the unanimous consent of the committee to carry on?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Starr: Thank you, Mr. Chairman and members of the committee. As there are many new members of the house who perhaps are not familiar with the contribution which this government has made under this act I should like at this moment to cite its main provisions. Under the act agreements with the federal government were entered into by all the provinces in this country. They provide for a federal contribution of 75 per cent of provincial expenditures on buildings and equipment for vocational training purposes up to March 31, 1963. After March 31, 1963 the federal contribution reverts to the 50 per cent level. In other words, we gave an incentive of an additional 25 per cent up until that time and then the contribution goes back and provides for the paying of 50 per cent from then on.

It is, I think, of special significance that of these 468 projects 226 were for completely new schools. Of the remaining projects 168 were for additions and alterations to or equipment for existing schools or institutes, and 74 were for minor alterations or equipment costing less than $10,000. The total cost of these 468 projects is around $458.1 million and the federal share will be approximately $292.8 million. These figures do not represent the total building program because new building submissions are still being received and new buildings are being forecast by the provinces for the next four years. My original objective in this program will be surpassed by a considerable margin by March of this year.

Training facilities will be available for our Canadian youth and adult workers to enable them to undertake the training they require to follow satisfying careers in skilled and technical occupations and to meet the continually growing needs of our economy. We have other training programs under our jurisdiction and I will deal with them a little later.

The provision of buildings and equipment, of course, only provides the physical facilities for the technical and vocational training. Teachers, courses and the many other aspects of training must be made available and the legislation fully provided for this. There are 10 programs which are being developed under the agreements on a joint federal-provincial basis. They meet almost every conceivable need for training, including the training of technical and vocational teachers.

I will mention some of the highlights of some of the more important programs. The federal government contributes 50 per cent of the cost of these federal-provincial programs with the exception of training for the unemployed to which our contribution is 75 per cent. To meet the growing demand for technicians we are providing for post-high school technical programs in all provinces except Prince Edward Island. This is a new and very important area of our manpower development program and will add greatly to the opportunities for our young people and to the total skilled manpower resources of Canada.

The trade and occupational training programs are being expanded and improved in order to provide a wider range of opportunities in the semi-skilled and skilled trades, the service trades and commercial and business occupations. These are, in the main, the pre-employment programs at the trade level.

In the field of upgrading and retraining I would point out that in the past we have not had an extensive program for employed workers through which they can upgrade their knowledge and their skills. New programs are now being developed in co-operation with industry to meet this need of our adult workers. With rapid changes in production and manufacturing techniques, which give rise to new occupations and displacement in others, it is extremely important to provide adequate training services for those who are now employed. In this connection I would mention the project at Leaside, Ontario, where three companies have joined in a training program for their employees in co-operation with the federal and provincial governments. This is a pilot project in this respect. I can foresee great developments in this program which will help to minimize the less desirable effects of technological change in conjunction with the manpower legislation currently before parliament.

For several years we have been developing and expanding our training program for the unemployed. In this area we are contributing 75 per cent of provincial expenditures on this program provided, of course, the province reaches an agreed upon minimum volume of training. In this area there has been an increase which is not entirely to my satisfaction but during the past year the figures that I have available to me show that some 19,000 people have been retrained under this program, and I hope that the provinces will undertake more and more of this work because of the results that have been achieved in those municipalities where the program has been taken seriously. This program is being expanded in all provinces as a significant step in creating much wider employment opportunities for those unemployed who take advantage of it.

I wish I could take the time of the committee to tell members what has been done in this field in the city of Cornwall, Ontario where, upon completion of the St. Lawrence seaway and the closing down of the textile mill, the authorities found themselves at odds as to what to do with the labour force. During the past few years, with everyone working in co-operation with the federal and provincial governments, it has been possible to retrain 800 unemployed workers in that area and place them in useful employment to the extent of some 85 per cent of those who were unemployed before. This is a good example.

In the field of the physically handicapped, the training of physically handicapped persons has been going on for some years and, like our other programs, it too is growing. As new facilities become available we will be able to offer even more to those who are in need of vocational rehabilitation because of some physical handicap.

One of the very important new programs in our agreements is for the training of vocational teachers, supervisors and administrators. Many new and improved programs are developing. The staff of our training institutions and our vocational co-ordinators and supervisors are so important that we must place special emphasis on this program. A lack of adequate programs in Canada in past years resulted in a great shortage of competent people for this work. However, progress already made in planning and establishing facilities and classes provides ample evidence that most anticipated requirements for teaching personnel will be fully met as they arise.

Our apprenticeship program is operating through a ten year agreement with all of the provinces except the province of Quebec. This program provides for the long range development of journeymen in the highly skilled trades, and many changes are taking place in apprenticeship programs to meet current and future needs.

Now for a few moments I should like to deal with employment conditions in Canada. During the past two years, and particularly since the beginning of 1961, production, employment and incomes in Canada have risen substantially. The improvement has been reflected in such economic indicators as the gross national product which in volume terms has increased by 8.8 per cent, and the industrial production index which has risen by 7.9 per cent. Employment in the third quarter of this year was between 4 and 5 per cent higher than two years ago, and 6 per cent higher in non-farm industries.

[Mr. Starr.]

In addition to the increase in numbers employed, short work weeks have been eliminated in some plants during the past year and substantial overtime has been worked in others. As a result the average work week in manufacturing in the first seven months of this year was almost half an hour longer than the comparable period of 1961, which is a clear sign of the rising level of industrial activity.

Incomes of Canadians have kept pace with the higher levels of average hours and employment. Personal income in the first half of 1962 was 7 per cent higher than the first half of 1961. For those who like to compare incomes in terms of real dollars per capita, let me repeat what I said during the throne speech debate. In the second quarter of 1962 the gross national product per capita, in 1957 dollars and seasonally adjusted at annual rates, was $1,978. This is $65 higher than in 1957, five years ago.

It has been encouraging to note that a good part of the employment expansion of the past year has been in industries that employ a high proportion of male workers, who form a major part of the unemployed. This year manufacturing provided more than 60,000 new jobs, on average. This summer, for instance, construction employment was at its highest level in three years, up 7 per cent over 1961, and the service industries provided 121,000 additional jobs over the past year.

Seasonal factors remain the major influence in creating unemployment in this country. It is worth noting as an example that some six weeks of severe winter in Britain were recently blamed for an increase of some 100,000 in the ranks of the unemployed in that country. This is a problem with which we have to cope in an even more extreme fashion each and every winter.

In December unemployment reached a total of 6.3 per cent of the labour force, compared to 6.4 per cent a year earlier and 8.2 per cent in 1960. More than three quarters of the total number of unemployed had been out of work for less than three months, and the decline in the number of long term unemployed is particularly encouraging. In September less than one fifth of the total had been seeking work for six months or more.

The combination of increasing job opportunities and declining unemployment resulted in scarcities of workers this summer in specific occupations and specific areas despite the fact that the over-all supply of labour was still plentiful. National employment services across the country have reported a substantial increase in job opportunities this year, and for many jobs qualified applicants were not available.

As most hon. members are aware, the accelerated depreciation program was initiated last year to encourage new firms to locate in areas of heavy unemployment, and to produce new products in Canada generally. The response on the part of municipalities and business interests has been encouraging. In the early part of November accelerated depreciation had been certified for assets valued at a total of $186 million. That is to say $186 million worth of productive facilities had been or are in the process of being installed to produce products that are either new in Canada or are new to a particular area or locality, and these companies will provide some 5,642 new jobs.

These are among the indications of the many forces at work in the economy to sustain and increase the level of activity. Investment has been substantially higher than last year and there is no sign of weakening in this field. Manufacturing has improved in many fields on account of actions taken by the government in recent years and in recent months. A stimulating effect will be provided by the near record western grain crop.

Export and import industries have been aided by dollar devaluation, as it was expected they would be. Domestic demand is expected to remain high because of the increase in consumer savings. The increase in employment last summer was more than normal and it is expected that the drop during the winter months will be below average. In spite of general improvement unemployment remains a serious problem.

As hon. members know, over the past several years a number of measures designed to implement economic expansion have been approved by parliament, and the effect of these measures has been felt in the general upward movement in the economy. These measures have taken the form of increased works projects, incentives to industry and a general upgrading of the labour force through training and retraining. As the full effect of these measures is felt through the economy, the upward movement will continue. An indication of this is to be found in the economic growth figure expressed in the large and continuing increase in gross national product over the past year, in the improved balance of payments situation, in generally improved conditions in industry and in the greatly increased volume of exports.

Mr. Chairman, for the benefit of hon. members of the committee I have endeavoured to give them—because I do not want to take up too much of the committee's time—what might be termed a bird's eye view of the activities of the Department of Labour. When we come to the particular items I am prepared to be of as much assistance as is necessary to answer questions that might arise in hon. member's minds, and provide them with all the information they need. I would now ask for their co-operation in the expeditious passing of the estimates of the Department of Labour.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Chairman, we have listened with interest to the minister, as we always do. I wish to assure the minister, who is seeking the co-operation of this side of the house to expedite the passing of his estimates, that we are always pleased to co-operate with the genial Minister of Labour. He may be assured that while we shall leave no stone unturned to examine carefully the estimates he has presented, we will afford him the fullest co-operation. It is unquestionable that the minister has a fine department. He has officials who are doing and have done over the past years a very fine job of administration. There is certainly no question about that. We had experience with them in former administrations and I am sure their high calibre has continued into this one.

The minister has painted a picture of very great economic activity and social well being in the country, to which I am afraid we will have to take some exception. I have made a few notes and I should like to refer to some of the remarks made by him. First I wish to say that we have no quarrel with his retraining and training program except, of course, that it has not reached its acme, by any stretch of the imagination, and can be improved upon. But this, in my opinion, is one of the greater accomplishments of the present Minister of Labour. The winter works program was outlined by the minister. The figures in relation to the operation of the winter works program and the co-operation of various municipalities show that the federal government expended some $36 million in the last fiscal year. This required the greatest co-operation on the part of the municipalities with whom the minister was dealing. I think it is certainly a reflection of the very great interest shown by the municipalities which has contributed to the success of this so-called winter works program.

This program, of course, has been made even more urgent since 1957 because unemployment has been such a serious problem since that time. When the figures presented by the minister are considered, together with the assistance which has been given under the unemployment assistance act and the contributions of the municipalities, it adds up to quite a large, glorified relief program. The sum of $319 million was contributed by the municipalities in order to alleviate this serious unemployment situation. On the other hand, in 1961-62 the federal government, under the unemployment assistance act, expended some $92 million, representing part of the relief given to those who were not in a category which would provide them with unemployment insurance. This means that we have expended $184 million in relief measures. We have no figures, of course, to show the amount which must have been expended by the provinces and the municipalities for direct relief. When totalled up it will be seen that our relief programs over the year amounted to many, many millions of dollars. So that while the picture the minister paints in this chamber may have the aspect of an aurora, it is not quite in accordance with the facts.

I should like to go back a short way into the history of this question. Let us see what the government was saying in the early months of last summer in regard to our unemployment situation. I am happy that the minister, at least, before resuming his seat did say that unemployment represented a very serious problem in Canada. On June 13, 1962 the Prime Minister said, "We have the unemployment problem in Canada licked now as a result of the policies we have instituted". I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that the Prime Minister said we had the problem of unemployment licked. How does that square with the facts given to the committee by the minister this afternoon?

An hon. Member: It is a question of interpretation.

Mr. Byrne: Yes, we do not have the simultaneous interpretation that was requested here this afternoon. The Prime Minister has made quite a number of statements. In all fairness I wish to say that I cannot connect the Minister of Labour with any of these profound statements of untruths that were made during the election campaign. The Prime Minister made a profusion of statements and said there was no longer any problem. He said our economy had reached its apex and we no longer had any problems as a result of the administration of the Conservative government. I do not know whether the Minister of Labour had a hand in drafting any of the election campaign messages, but his department contributed some very profound statements, statements that if they were believed—and I think they were, by a fairly large number of the electorate—would lead unquestionably to a Conservative government being re-elected. On June 16, I think it was—in any case it was the Friday prior to the election—Conservative party headquarters issued a news release purporting to emanate from the Department of Labour in Ottawa. It said:

> The Department of Labour economists flatly predict that June will see for all those who want to work full employment in Canada.

How does that square with the facts which the minister himself brought to light this afternoon? I took the trouble to put a question down on the order paper this session. It asked:

> Did the Department of Labour issue a press release in June, 1962, which indicated that there would be full employment in Canada during that month.

Of course, as I expected, the answer was, no. The same news release emanating from Ottawa had this to say:

> We repeat—

They were repeating an earlier statement.

> —the bureau of statistics this morning announces the greatest increase in jobs in any month in Canadian history.

In an earlier address to this house given, I believe, during the so-called budget debate, I referred to this matter as being an instance of duplicity on the part of the government. I am using it now to show that the actual facts regarding our unemployment situation are not as the government wished to have us believe either at that time or since. I showed then, on the basis of the actual figures, that the statement which had been put out was untrue, that is, that the actual figures were not correct. I also took the trouble to put down a question asking whether the dominion bureau of statistics had announced in the month of June, 1962, that the greatest increase of jobs in any month in Canada's history had taken place in the month of May. Again, the answer was a categorical no. This afternoon the Minister of Labour himself proved to us that this was a sham—that it was merely advertising which was contrary to the provisions of the Canada Elections Act and contrary to those of the Broadcasting Act.

The minister has said that the rate of unemployment today, that is, the percentage of unemployment to the labour force, is 6.3 per cent. He says that this is average or normal, because it was 6.4 per cent at the same time last year. Let us admit, then, that our economy is sick. Because its temperature has improved by one tenth of one degree, does not give us anything about which we can be satisfied. If this is the attitude of this government, that we should be satisfied with an unemployment figure of 6.4 per cent at that time of the year, in December, when we had the most open fall or early winter of the last half century, it is no wonder that our economy is failing to move forward as it should. By the time the January figures or even the December figures are published we shall undoubtedly find that the unemployment picture is much changed and, perhaps, unemployment will amount to more than 8 per cent. Is this a situation which the government is prepared to accept as normal? If it is, it is time for the present administration to remove itself from office and make way for another which would be prepared to face the facts of our economic situation.

We have in recent days heard reports of a member of the cabinet, who is apparently not answerable to this house, making statements abroad that those of us who say our economy is not in a good condition should consider our position as Canadians. I am referring, of course to the so-called barefoot boy from Bay street who went to Toronto to lecture the Liberals on the attitude they should take toward this government. I have here a copy of the Toronto daily Star of January 29.

Mr. Berger: Would the hon. member yield the floor to permit a question? A reference was made by the hon. member to a certain individual whom he described as a barefoot boy from Bay street. Some of us from the Pacific coast are not familiar with these eastern terms. I realize the hon. member comes from the western side of the Rockies, but he is familiar with eastern terminology; so perhaps he could enlighten the committee and tell us the name of the individual he has in mind.

An hon. Member: Is it Walter Gordon?

Mr. Byrne: If the hon. member will bear with me I will inform the committee of some of the business dealings which this particular minister has had with British Columbia forest industries. If he would contain himself I might proceed further and make my identification more explicit.

I am reading, as I said, from the Toronto Star. According to this report the minister from the other place had this to say:

> Those who go around this country predicting crises in its foreign exchange position, predicting economic calamity internally, should give serious consideration to their position as Canadians.

It is unfortunate that this minister cannot come before the house in order to give hon. members the benefit of his thoughts on this subject.

An hon. Member: Read on.

Mr. Byrne: An hon. member has asked me to read on and I will do so. The minister indicated that those who were not happy here could find their livelihood elsewhere. That is certainly not the proper attitude for a minister of the crown to take toward anyone who wishes to criticize the operations of this government or the manner in which it has handled our affairs. However, he went on to point out that there were very serious factors, such as the chronic deficit in the international balance of payments, unemployment, and the need to set up the nation's rate of economic growth. Well, he had better get down to doing just those things, rather than going across the country and criticizing those of us who have for years been telling the government to do just that sort of thing.

Mr. Chairman, what do we propose by way of eliminating unemployment? We do not intend to undertake this over-all state planning as the hon. members of the New Democratic party suggest we should. It is not so long ago that I referred them, in a debate in this house, to some of the recent prognostications of Mr. Khrushchev, who has unquestionably gone the full wheel in the matter of state planning and suggested that in order to stimulate the economy of that great country they should look towards the free enterprise of the western world. So before they go too far around that circle I advise that they be prepared to accept the Liberal middle of the road policy which in the past has brought the very greatest of prosperity to Canada, a prosperity which has not been outdone by any other country in the world.

We shall first establish a department of industry. The government of the day has set up innumerable boards. The strange thing which I found about the throne speech debate was that after the Prime Minister had gone about saying that we had never had it so good, that the economy was buoyant and unemployment was licked, the throne speech contained the outline of the development of at least four economic boards to deal with the problems which he said a couple of months previous to the speech just did not exist. Is it any wonder that the people of Canada today have lost faith in the ability of this government to take the proper measures to deal with the serious problems which face us?

Mr. Chairman, I said that we would establish a federal department of industry. We would undertake to develop true co-operative economic planning through government, management and labour. This does not mean state planning from the top, but a co-operative effort to bring about the very best in economic development. We would undertake to promote on a gradual basis means for more plentiful credit and tax incentives; in other words a public capital works program which would assist in the expansion of trade. We are not completely—

Mr. Gregoire: Why did you not do that when you were in for 22 years?

Mr. Byrne: The hon. member asks me why we did not do that when we were in power. During those 22 years the Canadian economy was never in better circumstances.

Mr. Gregoire: Nonsense.

Mr. Byrne: It has always been true.

Mr. Gregoire: You never did anything.

Mr. Byrne: If the hon. member will contain himself for a few minutes—

Mr. Gregoire: I find it very difficult. It is so discouraging to hear that.

Mr. Byrne: —he will hear what our plans are. We will provide special help to new industries in distress areas.

With regard to the question of assistance to the young members of the community, we would assist boys and girls to stay at school by continuing the family allowance beyond the age of 16, so long as they were at secondary school. We would improve their skills, as has been attempted by this government, and leave them to seek employment in the skilled trades rather than in the labour market today where there are no job opportunities for untrained people. We would also provide scholarships and loans to the more deserving boys and girls who wish to attend university. I think this is one of the more important matters which should be undertaken. It is a tragedy that so many of our young people otherwise qualified are unable to attend university because of the financial deterrent they face. We would establish an arrangement for job training in industry to retrain people who are unemployed or threatened with unemployment. This would be an extension of the program already undertaken, and I am sure that it could be made to work with greater vigor than has been shown under the present government. We would also have national housing insured mortgages made applicable to older homes. We feel that it is extremely important to do this in order that young families would not have to raise the very large down payment required for the building and purchase of a new home. It would also provide for younger families being able to move from a community and establish themselves in another community should their employment cease in that area. We would also make loans and grants to municipalities, which would have the effect of creating immediate employment. We would provide more capital assistance for urban renewal plans.

Mr. Gregoire: Electoral promises, that is all they are.

Mr. Byrne: We would provide federal aid for more building of power projects in other basic work, particularly in areas which need development. There is certainly one area in British Columbia where this government could have expedited the work, and that undertaking is the Columbia river development. In 1957 the federal government offered to pay half the cost of the development of the Columbia river, repayment to be made as the earnings accrued. This government has either delayed or muddled negotiations which should have been settled, and undertakings made to develop these projects, at least two years ago. These are developments which are required and which would certainly provide jobs not falling into the category of the glorified relief programs which we have today. We would provide federal aid for redevelopment of slum clearance, and so on.

So far as the older people are concerned, those who are reaching retirement age, we find today that many of them are forced to stay in the labour force beyond the age of 65 because of their inability to provide a retirement pension for themselves. We would—

Mr. Gregoire: You would do lots of things, I can see that.

Mr. Byrne: The hon. member admits that we would do lots of things. We have done many things in the past. Give us the opportunity and we will do them again in the future; there is no question about that. We would institute a truly contributory plan for portable pensions.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the committee give unanimous consent?

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to take up more than my allotted time in this house. Thank you very much for your co-operation.

(Translation):

Mr. Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) has just tabled the estimates of his department, as prepared in April last, and as revised at the beginning of this session.

Normally, those estimates should have been considered and approved during the last spring session, if parliament had not been dissolved at that time. Therefore, we now have to discuss and approve expenditures of which ten twelfths have already been approved, which puts us in a rather unusual situation. In fact, I think it would be pointless to lose precious time in discussing at length the figures which are now submitted to us, and I can assure the house that we, Social Crediters, are prepared to co-operate in order to keep the debate within a strict minimum.

We also take into consideration the fact that these estimates will be referred to the public accounts committee where they will be closely scrutinized. So I see no reason to prolong indefinitely this discussion which, for all intents and purposes, will produce nothing and will not make the government change anything to what has already been submitted.

Besides, I am sure that all hon. members would be far more interested in a discussion of the estimates that the minister will submit in his next budget, for then we would be in a better position to judge the attitude that the government will consider taking in relation to the problem of unemployment and of economic and industrial development in Canada.

Mr. Chairman, we note that the amount of money put at the disposal of the department has more than doubled; in fact, it has jumped from $53,935,000 to $112,809,000. I think that, in principle, all members will agree that such an increase was desirable. However, the only remark I should like to make is about the distribution of that money among the various items of that department.

I should like to deal in particular with the technical training assistance, which is increasingly important, and of which the provinces do not seem to have benefited in a fair way.

The figures issued recently have shown that, out of an amount of $285 million, provided by the federal government, the province of Ontario alone secured $186 million, while the province of Quebec received only $13 million. This is quite significant of the problems brought about by a centralized administration which cannot think of any legislation or regulation in terms of the needs of all provinces.

This legislation, having been developed by the federal government, without any detailed study by the provinces, has allowed a particular province to benefit substantially from the situation, to obtain much more than the others, due to the fact that this legislation was developed and drafted in terms of the needs of that particular province.

At his recent meeting with provincial representatives, the minister had the opportunity of listening to their grievances on this particular matter, and I hope he has given full consideration to the requests which have been made to him.

In my opinion, it would have been proper to consider the possibility of maintaining and increasing that assistance of 75 per cent to the construction cost of technical schools in the provinces. This would allow the other provinces, which have not originally benefited from the advantages of this legislation, to benefit this year from that federal offer. That also brings to light the fact that the provinces alone have not enough income at this time, to carry out their tasks with regard to vocational training and the training of the teachers who are to give courses in the technical schools. Here again, we have the problem of the distribution of taxes and of the whole fiscal field.

Mr. Chairman, the training of workers is one of the many aspects of the problem created by the unemployment which now prevails in this country. We seem unable to solve this problem. To increase the number of jobs is the main objective now, so that we may eliminate unemployment.

It is all right to appoint research bodies, to send missions abroad to examine the situation and to propose training people for a higher level of efficiency by increasing the number of our technical schools. The fact remains, however, that all those measures are subject to an increase of employment opportunities in this country.

How can we increase the number of jobs in Canada? To enlarge our plants and to create new ones seems to be the only solution at this time, and I wonder how the government intends to obtain that increase in production through the increase in the number of our industries.

The government made an inquiry, sent missions in Europe and in almost every country in the world to observe what is being done there to deal with unemployment and promote industrial development.

It seems to me that all those things are closely related to a new conception that we must have as regards the needs and the goals of labour.

Here I should like to bring to the attention of the committee an editorial which appeared in the Toronto Star and which dealt precisely with a problem related to the present unemployment situation. And, in this regard, I shall refer to disarmament, about which so much is being said nowadays. A world wide campaign is going on at the present time for complete disarmament. Well, that editorial mentions that, at this moment, armed forces and war industries are providing jobs for 50 million men and women. Therefore, although in our hearts we all want disarmament, it is normal for our administrators to ask themselves how they would provide for 50 million additional employees because, even now, our leaders cannot organize our economic system in such a way that the available labour force will be kept busy.

It makes one wonder whether our administrators are really serious when they ask for world disarmament. Do they really want that disarmament which, after all, would create other problems for them, much greater problems probably, in the field of employment?

That brings up the problem of the false economic conception we now have, of the false conception of the purpose of labour. If, at the present time, we can provide a livelihood and pay salaries to 50 million men and women in the armed forces, when, to all practical purposes, they do not offer any services nor produce any consumer goods whatever, I wonder why we cannot provide them with a livelihood outside of that war production and those armed services.

I know, Mr. Chairman, that it is a very complicated problem which calls for a thorough retraining of that mass of people who, for many years, have performed military functions.

I know that the governments which, at present, realize this problem and consider such a contingency, are wondering how to provide the jobs which would be required at that time, due to the discharge of these military people who would come on the labour market, which would likely cause as great a threat as the present nuclear threat. That is why we can see in the world today economically strong countries, for instance the western countries, a war policy being promoted because it serves their interests and it hides a colossal failure with regard to the economy and the understanding of human needs.

I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that as long as we consider work as an end in itself, we shall always encounter these same problems.

To go back to the possibility of increasing the number of jobs here in Canada by increasing the number of our industries, unfortunately I must say that now, with the present world economic doctrine, with all those circumstances which exist, with all the international agreements, I think that the government will have to impose tariff protection measures for new industries. It will have to do it on a temporary basis, so as to enable those new industries to compete with foreign producers, within our home market.

At present, there are foreign manufacturers who sell in Canada. We should interest Canadian businessmen to manufacture those products sold in Canada by foreign manufacturers.

I know very well, of course, that it is impossible to make everything we need and everything we consume. From an economic standpoint, it is probably difficult to do so. But I think that between the present situation and an improved one, there is a long way, and we can work and achieve some objectives.

The possibility of resorting to tariff measures to help our industries undoubtedly represents one solution. I would not say it is the best solution, but it is one of them and of course, it should be temporary.

Now, there would also be special tax abatements. There would be the accelerated depreciation of investments and a wider use of the industrial development bank which I think does not play its part any too well. That bank should not be only an industrial development bank, but also an industrial creation bank, because we shall certainly need funds to finance those new industries.

At this time, I should like to quote an item which I noted recently in a newspaper. It is about an economist who was considering the economic situation of Canada in relation to our external trade. He was analysing our monetary deficit. He was pointing out the interests and dividends we pay each year on American investments in Canada. He was mentioning our imbalance of trade with the United States which amounts to $1 billion and several hundreds of million dollars each year, with respect only to interests and dividends paid on American investments in Canada.

According to him, we are not even able at the present time to correct this imbalance; we are even unable to suppress its cause.

Only yesterday, one could read in the papers that in 1962, American investments in Canada reached $1,100 million. This means that we will have to pay to our southern neighbours additional interests which, in any case, sooner or later, will always show up in the continual deficits we have known in the past and which will keep on increasing as long as we will not change our economic concept respecting the development of our industries and of our natural resources by Canadians and, as far as possible, with Canadian capital.

I feel, however, that the industrial development bank will be the most appropriate organization, after its regulations are amended, to promote the economic development of Canada.

I know that Canadians have savings which they could invest in industry, but at the present time, the different levels of government, through their various bond issues, create a scarcity of capital available for the development of our industries.

Then, if the government cannot think of any other way of financing its management, well, it will have to be in a position to create the source of capital it needs to make the development of our industries possible.

Mr. Chairman, may I call it five o'clock?

The Deputy Chairman: Order. So that the house may proceed with the consideration of private members' business, pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15, it is my duty to rise, report progress and request leave to sit again later this day or at the next sitting of the house as the case may be.

Progress reported.

Mr. Speaker: It now being five o'clock the house will proceed to the consideration of private members' business, which is today notices of motion as found on page 25 of the order paper.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ESTABLISHMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON PROCEDURE

Mr. Gerard Chapdelaine (Sherbrooke) moved:

That this house is of the opinion that a select committee be appointed to consider with Mr. Speaker the procedure of this house for the purpose of suggesting any changes that may be desirable to effect a more expeditious dispatch of public business.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this motion is to shorten the duration of sessions and to save the Canadian taxpayers' money. The mere fact of having shorter sessions might make us forget any idea of raising our salaries as members of the house.

As a newcomer to this venerable assembly, it was my privilege, at the opening of the session, to attend a ceremony which is most impressive but which has no meaning in the twentieth century. In my opinion, it is most childish on the part of so-called adults to go through such motions.

Without harming anyone and setting aside the question of age, we could—

Mr. Speaker: I trust the hon. member is not suggesting that the role played by His Excellency the Governor General is childish. Otherwise, I will have to remind him of the standing order which forbids any allusion to the crown or its representative in such terms as those I have just heard. I hope the hon. member will explain himself.

Mr. Chapdelaine: Mr. Speaker, I am not referring to the participation of the representative of Her Majesty the Queen to the opening ceremony of parliament. I am just talking about a time-consuming and costly ceremonial.

I merely wish to point out that in the twentieth century, we should no longer have to observe the sort of formalities in honour at the court of Louis the Fourteenth. To revert to the principle of my motion, I suggest that the throne speech debate should not take place. In my opinion, this eight day period used by the leaders of opposition parties to derive probably some degree of political capital, but which promotes in no way the public welfare, should be abolished, thus enabling us to consider without delay the business of the house and to hasten passage of legislation brought before the house.

I had the opportunity to attend the opening session of the United Nations and I found out that in this world assembly, no time is lost on such a trivial matter as the reply to the president's speech.

I also suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the time allowed to hon. members be cut down from 30 to 15 minutes. Moreover, the sittings should be from 2 to 7 p.m. instead of from 2.30 to 6 p.m. and from 8 to 10 p.m. Thus the members could attend to their work as representatives of the people, in the evening and in the morning.

At this time of day, members introduce notices of motions and everyone knows, Mr. Speaker, that all of them get a first class burial.

I think that all hon. members are of the opinion that this time is put at our disposal merely to give us the opportunity to make speeches, and the administration of the public business does not benefit from it in any way. The time provided for the consideration of private members' business could be abolished, which would give us an extra hour a day.

If some do not agree that this hour should be abolished, we might get in touch with the other parties and find out if one of them intends to kill a motion. Under the circumstances, the sponsors of such motions could withdraw them so as not to waste their time or take up the time of other hon. members.

I would also suggest, sir, that we abolish debates on resolutions submitted to the house by committees. We do not have the bills before us during such debates and that is a loss of time because such legislation comes before the house at a later date and we then have to engage in another time-consuming debate.

Consideration should also be given to shortening the question period.

The question period, that lasts over an hour and a half at times, has become a real free for all. In my opinion, it could be limited to half an hour; each party would have the right to ask only so many questions and each member would be allowed only one question. We could thus dispatch more expeditiously the public business. We would not see ridiculous situations happen every day, which has been the case since the beginning of this session.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member allow me to ask him a question? Has the hon. member for Sherbrooke read the comments made today by Mr. Marcel Gingras in La Presse? They could enlighten him.

An hon. member: We have no time to read La Presse. We have work to do.

Mr. Speaker: May I remind some hon. members that they should not make remarks when one of their colleagues has the floor?

Mr. Chapdelaine: Mr. Speaker, we should also consider immediately giving to the other place the responsibility to settle divorce bills. We lose considerable time on those bills and I think we all agree that the other place has the required competence in that field and should look after it.

Mr. Speaker, since I do not want to talk out my own motion, I suggest that some postures we have to assume in the house, and more particularly the kowtowing, be eliminated, not to cut down the time reserved for the business of the house, but rather because that puts us in some ridiculous positions.

(Text):

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on this motion I can say at the outset that I am in favour of it. I think the time has arrived when the special committee should be reconvened in order to consider further the rules under which we carry on business.

It was mentioned in the speech from the throne that the committee would be reconvened, but in view of the initial remarks of the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Chapdelaine) in which he bypassed this formality, I presume he did not wish to refer to it. Nevertheless that particular proposition is in the speech from the throne, in somewhat similar terms. In any case I am in agreement with both propositions.

I think the reason for inefficiency in this house is that we spend many hours discussing matters on which there is agreement, just for some procedural advantage. This is the sum and substance of all our difficulties, and we can avoid a lot of the lost time if we are able to remove some of the advantages that accrue from talking on things on which there is general agreement.

I should like to mention a few now in the hope that this committee, if set up, will consider them. The first subject with which I wish to deal is the private members' hour, which we are in at this moment. I have always felt that a good deal of time is wasted in private members' hour by hon. members carrying on a debate for the purpose of filling in the one hour allotted. In this particular matter I accept equal responsibility with a number of my colleagues.

Mr. Knowles: You are the first among equals.

Mr. Aiken: I am glad that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) gives me first place somewhere. However, Mr. Speaker, this is one of our major problems. I think it could be cured and I am going to put forward a proposal in connection with private members' hour which I think will help. When the rules were last revised private members' hour was put on daily. That was a great advantage because now a tremendous number of notices of motion are put before the house. Before this amendment only about four private members' notices of motion ever came before the house, and those generally were talked on for a whole day. The present system is certainly much better. However, I would suggest that we could improve it if, after all hon. members who indicate that they wish to speak on the subject have spoken, and no other person appears ready to rise and continue the debate, the minister under whose jurisdiction the particular subject comes, or his parliamentary secretary, were to rise and take one of three choices. First, he could indicate that the government accepts the resolution or bill in general terms. Second, he could indicate that the government rejects the resolution or bill. In the case of either of these two alternatives the question should immediately be put, subject to the right of the sponsor to close the debate. The third choice I would suggest is that the minister could state that the government desires to give further study to the resolution or bill. In such event the minister or parliamentary secretary could move the adjournment of the debate.

This would not in any way be limiting the rights of private members on private members' hour, because this situation would only arise if no other hon. member appeared ready or willing to speak on the subject, in which event the minister or his parliamentary secretary could rise in the same manner as does an hon. member who closes the debate and state that the matter is worthy of consideration and will receive further study; and the debate should be adjourned for the time being. I think this would be very helpful because the house could then go on to another resolution or bill. In some of these cases only one or two hon. members are prepared and willing to speak on the subject, and sometimes these matters are brought forward in a hurry due to the previous motion or motions having been stood over. I think in this way we could save a good deal of time. As I have said, I am the first to admit that on various occasions I have been guilty of speaking on private members' hour when perhaps I was in favour of the resolution or bill and might better have let it come to a vote. But we have to be honest about this. Because of the way the procedure is set up it is sometimes advantageous that certain resolutions should not come to a vote. With this very honest approach to the matter I believe we could go a long way toward making private members' hour more efficient and effective.

I have another suggestion for saving time, Mr. Speaker. I think that the question of appeals from decisions of the Speaker should be reconsidered. I believe that the Speaker's decision should be final and not subject to appeal to the house.

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Aiken: I will come to the point in just one moment. The main reason is that appeals to the house never decide whether the Speaker was right or wrong. They are never voted upon on the basis of whether the Speaker made a correct decision. I have observed over a period of almost six years the question of appeals from decisions of Speakers and have noticed that in every case the appeal is voted upon on party lines. This does not mean anything. It does not mean that the Speaker was either right or wrong in his decision. I feel that in order to have an orderly growth of a body of precedent in the House of Commons the Speaker should make a decision to the best of his ability and that decision should be final. I say again that when voting on an appeal the minds of hon. members in the house, I am sure, are not always on the correctness of the Speaker's decision or on precedent, but are on other matters which possibly are quite beyond the correctness of the decision. I think there is a great deal of inconsistency in connection with appeals to the house from the Speaker's decisions. We find in one parliament that a certain ruling by the Speaker, which may have been in accordance with precedent, is reversed in another parliament simply because of the system of voting on party lines. In this way different conclusions are reached in different parliaments.

Therefore it does not follow that any body of precedent can be established or that an appeal from the Speaker's ruling means anything at all as far as the correctness of the decision itself is concerned. I think that errors which Speakers make and have made in the past are matters all of us must accept in electing a Speaker to make decisions on our behalf. I do feel that the Speaker's decisions should not be subject to appeal to the house.

In a similar category is the question of appeals from decisions of committee chairmen. As I understand the situation, Mr. Speaker, we are in a considerable state of confusion in this house with regard to an appeal from a decision of a chairman of a standing committee. There is nothing in our rules of practice and procedure relating to appeals from committee chairmen and there has never been, to my knowledge, an established practice with regard to whether there is an appeal, and if so, to whom. In the first section of our rules it is stated that if nothing is provided to the contrary in our rules, the practice of the House of Commons at Westminster shall be followed. In the House of Commons at Westminster there is no appeal from the decision of—

(Translation):

Mr. Gilles Gregoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. In my opinion, the hon. member who is speaking now does not refer at all to the matter under consideration. In fact, the proposal of the hon. member for Sherbrooke does not mention at all the changes to be made, but simply suggests the setting up of a special committee that would study what has to be changed. Consequently, the hon. member should stick to the motion.

Mr. J. A. Habel (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, as far as the rules are concerned, I believe that the mover of the motion himself proposed some changes, and I am of the opinion that the remarks of the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) are quite in order.

Mr. Gregoire: Mr. Speaker, if some of the remarks made a few moments ago were not in order, that is no reason why everybody should be out of order.

Mr. Speaker: One can go back briefly to certain previous remarks, in order to indicate the reasons why one is in favour of the creation of a certain committee. I think that at this stage of the business of the house one can discuss that and I feel sure that a few hon. members would like to make themselves heard on that subject. Perhaps the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Gregoire) will want to make some remarks also in this debate.

Mr. Gregoire: I intend to, in a moment.

Mr. Speaker: In that case, we shall proceed.

(Text):

Mr. Aiken: My point in drawing attention to these things is that these are reasons why a committee should be set up. I am setting forth what I believe to be inequities in our present procedure, deficiencies which could be corrected by such a committee. I believe these are perfectly good reasons for supporting the motion.

Perhaps I might continue on the subject I had raised earlier with reference to appeals from decisions by committee chairmen. The present situation is confusing. Under its rules, the house of commons in the United Kingdom has no provisions for such appeals. If we refer to the United Kingdom rules—and there is nothing in our own rules to deal with this particular case—we find there is no provision for an appeal from rulings of the Chair, and it follows there is no appeal from the ruling of a committee chairman in Canada. I have taken this position in the committee of which I have the honour to be chairman. Even if there were the right of appeal there is some doubt whether the appeal should be to the house or to the committee itself. I do not wish to pursue this matter but I think it is a subject which might well be considered by a committee such as is proposed.

There is one other thing we might well do to prevent too much jockeying for position during the session and to facilitate the expeditious dispatch of business. I believe the time has come when the proposed date of the prorogation of the session of parliament should be announced at or near the beginning of each session and that unless the session is extended by a vote of two thirds of the members it should be prorogued on that date. The responsibility for delay, extension, failure to bring forward legislation, failure to act on legislation and so on could not then be shifted back and forth between one party and another. It would then be up to the house to conclude its business within the time allotted. I think that if such an announcement were made it would prove of great advantage.

I also think the time has come when the length of the sessions of this house should be considered. Certainly, as a collateral question, the subject of members' pay has come up as was mentioned by the proposer of this motion. But I think that if the work of the session were dealt with expeditiously and if members could return to their private business for at least half their time during the year, they would have no financial difficulties. I certainly believe that if such a procedure were adopted it would prove satisfactory. Should certain matters arise requiring an extension of time, this could be arranged by a two-thirds vote.

In the same vein I would suggest that no legislation should be introduced later than two weeks prior to the proposed date of prorogation. I think if this suggestion were adopted the house would be in a position to conclude its business in good order and, when the time arrives, there would be no last minute legislation likely to warrant extending the time of sitting of the house except, as I have said, in the case of an emergency, in which situation a vote of two thirds of the members would be required.

These are just a few of the many subjects which require discussion in such a committee as is proposed. I support the motion. I hope the committee will be set up and that these matters will be dealt with. I think this is more than a routine debate and a routine resolution. It is a most serious matter. Right now, as far as this house is concerned, we are wasting time. But who is to blame? It is easy to throw accusations back and forth that it is this party or that party which is causing the difficulty. We have to face the situation which confronts us. I think the time has come when it must be faced and the only way in which it can be done, as far as I know, is by revising the rules so as to impose on ourselves some restriction to prevent our wasting the time of this house and the people's money.

Mr. A. J. MacEachen (Inverness-Richmond): The theme of the motion by the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Chapdelaine) is that the House of Commons ought to make haste speedily, that it ought to engage in a more expeditious dispatch of public business. He suggests that the way to do this is to set up a committee on procedure to consult with Your Honour and to effect changes in the rules.

We all want to save time. We all want to shorten debate and shorten sessions, provided this objective is reached without failing to achieve an even more important objective, namely the preservation of the rights of private members of the House of Commons. One of the main purposes of the rules is to protect the rights of individual members elected in their individual capacity to serve their constituents. The rules also provide a systematic method of dealing with public business and they ensure that there is an opportunity as the life of each session unfolds for each item of public business to be discussed in a systematic way. The rules under which we operate have been tried and tested by experience and I believe it is a mistake on the part of hon. members, and especially on the part of the mover of this motion, to believe that all our parliamentary difficulties and frustrations flow from faulty rules and that these difficulties could be removed by a formal change in the rules.

I was surprised that the hon. member should recommend that the opening ceremony in connection with parliament ought to be abolished, that we ought to save a few hours and thereby deprive ourselves of a reminder for example, of the symbolic importance of the mace and of the importance of the first bill the Prime Minister introduces. These are ceremonies, but they remind us in a short space of time of the struggle that has taken place over the centuries to reach a position where we have a free parliament, where free discussion is possible. On reflection, I am not surprised, because this attitude is consistent with the anti-parliamentary, anti-discussion approach which has been manifested by the hon. member's particular group since they came into the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker: This debate has been conducted on a pretty high level so far. Therefore for the good of this debate we will keep partisan references out of it. If I can I should like to avoid recrimination, and I hope we will not get into that field. I am not suggesting that the hon. gentleman is doing so now, but there may be a tendency to get into it.

Mr. Pickersgill: We might have a debate.

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member is not the first member of parliament who has tried his hand at streamlining our work. He is not the first among the present members of this house who has made sincere proposals to streamline the work of the House of Commons. The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) not so many years ago held out great hope that the expansion of the committees system would make parliament a more effective instrument in dealing with the public business. If I may quote from a comment made by the right hon. gentleman in 1960, he stated as follows:

> In pursuance of our desire to bring about an expansion in the opportunities for all members of the house as a whole to make their contribution, we have in the last two sessions set up a number of committees... I hope we will be able to expand the system in this regard to the end that we can use committees to a larger extent than in the past, thus rendering parliament more effective.

The house has attempted in the organization of its work in the past five years to make the committees system a more effective instrument and to relieve the House of Commons of certain burdens. I noticed that the Prime Minister confessed with candour not so many days ago in this house that the hopes he had held for an expansion of the committees system were not realized, and that this effort he had in mind had not reached its objective. I believe there is a resistance among members of parliament in transferring from this national forum to other subsidiary bodies certain functions, including committees of the house, and I believe there will be a resistance to the changing of any rules that hon. members might feel will in the future restrict at a critical time the right of any individual member to express his opinions.

In saying that, Mr. Speaker, I am aware that the committee on procedure sitting under your predecessors has accomplished a good deal in streamlining, and especially reducing, the time spent on debate. That work was done, as we know, with the active co-operation of Liberal members sitting on that committee. Private members' days have been reduced in number. The length of speeches has been reduced. The number of days spent on the budget debate and on the address in reply has been reduced. As all this has happened, serious parliamentary observers have wondered how far the erosion of the rights of private members is going to continue.

Where is it going to stop? We have had from the hon. member today a proposal that we abolish altogether the address in reply, which is the first opportunity, maybe the only opportunity, new members elected to the House of Commons will have to address the Commons on behalf of their respective constituencies. Abolish that altogether, is the view of the Social Credit party. Again they say, abolish the private members hour, which time has already narrowed down, but is still there to give private members an opportunity of bringing before the house subjects in which they are interested. Even though no action might be taken on them, at least public opinion is formed and views are expressed.

Mr. Chapdelaine: Would the hon. member permit a question? Has the private members' hour ever done anything good for him?

Mr. MacEachen: Well, I think, Mr. Speaker, I have answered that question by anticipation. I ask myself whether there are important changes which can be made in the rules of the house which would effect real economies in time. We have reduced the time on the address. Shall we reduce it two more days and thereby deny more members the opportunity to take part? Shall we reduce the budget debate and thereby deny more members an opportunity to take part? Shall we reduce the number of supply motions and deny private members an opportunity to raise votes of non-confidence against the government? Shall we reduce the number of readings of a bill? Shall we have only one reading and pass the bill at one stage? This is the kind of important change which will have to be made in the rules in order to effect real economies.

Mr. Speaker, in the light of the remarks made by the hon. gentleman, and in the light of his desire to achieve economies through cutting down opportunities for debate, I was surprised how fully and effectively the members of his party have taken advantage of their opportunities for addressing the House of Commons since they have come here, and how fully they have been reported in the press of the country.

Mr. Valade: Are you jealous?

Mr. MacEachen: For example, on the budget resolution, the ways and means debate, there were 14 Social Credit speakers, more speakers than any other single party in the House of Commons put forward. Eight days were spent on that. Perhaps four days would have been saved if the hon. gentleman had imposed the self-denying ordinance he now wishes to translate into the rules. That same point can be made in connection with the participation of other hon. gentlemen in that group in debates in this house. I have no objection to it, but I do wish these gentlemen would admit that they are taking part in debates under certain rules enshrined in the standing orders of this house which give them the opportunity to speak freely and be reported in the press of this country freely.

I do not believe that the work of this session has been so unimpressive that it ought to lead to an immediate drastic change in the rules. In the first 60 days of the current session we passed 17 bills; these were government bills. That is a better record than any session in the recent past. In 1958, in the first 60 days we passed nine bills. In 1959 we passed nine bills, in 1960, nine bills and in 1960-61 we passed only six. Why all this talk of obstruction? Why all this talk about holding up the business of the country, when our legislative output in this session is more impressive than that of any session in the past five years as a result of members of the opposition having co-operated within the rules in a spirit desirous of completing the public business?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gregoire: You are supporting the government there.

Mr. MacEachen: I am supporting the possibilities given under the rules for free discussion in this house. By putting forward the legislative output of this house I want to answer the charge of obstruction which is either traceable to a deficiency in the rules or to a deficiency in hon. members of this house.

There is another thing we must remember, namely that the business of the country is becoming more complicated. The burdens of government are becoming heavier and greater opportunities must be given for debate. Let me remind hon. gentlemen that in the years 1945 to 1950, that five year period, an average of 20 days was spent in the discussion of the main estimates. In the period from 1952 to 1957 a total of 40 days on the average was spent in the same fashion. Is that doubling of time traceable to obstruction on the part of hon. gentlemen who now, in the main, sit on the government side and who doubled in their years in opposition the time taken to deal with the main estimates?

Mr. Jones: It is 60 days now.

Mr. MacEachen: We are being criticized because in this session up to now we have had five days in which to deal with the main estimates whereas in a normal year, when these hon. gentlemen were in opposition, 40 days were taken to deal with those estimates. Yet the Prime Minister says, "Let us get through with these estimates; there is obstruction; you have had five days; we must get on with the budget".

I think one of the important matters we must remember is that the government of the day has a place in the organization of the business of the house. It is the government, and nobody else, which decides every day the business that will be dealt with the next day. All the opposition can do is to react: it cannot initiate. It is not the responsibility of the opposition to organize the business. It is because the business of the house has been so badly organized that we have had only five days on the main estimates, and only one supply motion. There is frustration among members of the house. There is a false idea that we ought to improve the situation by changing the rules.

Mr. Speaker: Order. In embarking upon this type of argument the hon. member is getting out into space, as far as this motion is concerned. No charge has been made. There is a question here as to whether there should be a committee to speed up the business of the house and generally consider the rules. No one has been making charges and answering in this debate. I think we will keep the matter on that basis.

Mr. MacEachen: I appreciate the point you made, Your Honour; but surely in a discussion of the way in which to deal expeditiously with public business we must ask ourselves the question whether this purpose can best be served through a change in the rules or whether there is another way which might yield greater results. I think that establishes the relevancy of my comments to the effect that the government is responsible for the agenda. If the house does not get the agenda, it cannot move ahead. I could give many illustrations but, in the light of your admonition, Mr. Speaker, I will give only one more.

In the session of 1960-61, the opposition agreed to waive the debate in reply. The opposition gave up its rights and it was unanimously agreed upon by all members of the house. How many bills were passed in the first 60 days? Six bills were passed. What was the reason for that situation? The reason was that the government was not ready. The government could not bring on its legislation and the house wasted its time in fruitless discussion, with no results. That is why I say that, although we will agree to the setting up of a committee on procedure and will co-operate with other members in making whatever changes are to be made, nevertheless there are other more important ways by which the public business can be expeditiously dispatched.

I agree that certain constructive ideas are coming forward in this debate. A suggestion has been made by the mover that we ought to reduce the time of the question period. I go along with that idea. I am sure Your Honour would appreciate a suggestion in the committee on procedure that some arrangement, possibly on an experimental basis, could reduce the oral question period to half an hour per day.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member as he may be touching on, shall we say, a subject of interest to the Chair. However, the clock unfortunately has imposed its sanction on the hon. member, and I will recognize the hon. member for Greenwood.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member who last spoke, namely the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. MacEachen), was a little bit less than fair to the mover of the resolution. I think the mover intended to improve parliamentary procedures and to make this parliament more effective. I do not think he proposed in any sense to cut down discussion or to abridge the rights of private members or of parliament.

I support this resolution because I, as I think do many other hon. members, feel strongly that this parliament, being the central institution of democracy, should function with just as much efficiency as is possible. If the procedures in this parliament are obsolete and lend themselves to endless repetition and to long winded and unproductive discussion, then to that extent parliament itself falls into disrepute. In suggesting, in accordance with what has already been promised in the speech from the throne, the setting up of this committee, I feel that the hon. member intended, as do we in this group, to improve the procedures of parliament. We believe it is urgent to improve the procedures of this parliament and not in any way to abridge its rights. It struck me that the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond showed some of the complacency and conservatism which one also associates with his party.

I suggest that the committee should be set up. I wish to make one suggestion, namely that many of its members be new members of this house. In discussion with members in all parts of the house who have been here for some time I have observed that they have relapsed into a state of despondency, despair and discouragement, and have become inured to the procedures of the house. They have got themselves into a condition in which they do not believe anything can be done, and sometimes they doubt whether it should be done. As one of the new members I wish to say, and I believe I share this view with many new members, that I am a little bit horrified by the time that is wasted, and by the amount of repetitiveness in debate, which I believe brings this house into disrepute. I suggest one reform that is obvious, namely that we should not give way to our national Canadian weakness for long windedness in speeches.

As hon. members will recall, apart from the formalities, we started this session with a three hour address from the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), followed by a three hour address from the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker). I am saying nothing disrespectful to these two gentlemen when I suggest that their speeches would have been infinitely more effective if they had taken not more than an hour each. It is my conviction that all the members of this house would make more effective speeches if, instead of speaking for their full time of 40 minutes, they disciplined themselves and spoke for half that time. I understand that in the mother of parliaments there is no rule as to the length of speeches, but that it is the custom of members who speak to speak for only 15 or 20 minutes. Should they exceed that time, not only are they drowned out by their colleagues but the Speaker seldom, if ever, recognizes them again.

I know that is not a responsibility we can put upon you, Mr. Speaker, because, by long custom of this house, it has been the practice for each hon. member who speaks, whether he has anything to say or not, to speak at interminable length and to the full extent permitted by the rules. I suggest that one real reform would be to cut in half the time allowed for speeches. By that means we would get more speeches from more members and better speeches, than we get at the present time. There would be an improvement in our democratic procedure which might save time. I am not suggesting, Mr. Speaker, that saving time is the only object of reforming the rules. We could save time, of course; but I am suggesting that streamlining the procedure would not only save time but make the time we do spend more productive and more worth while.

I have often noticed that those who have to speak in 20 minutes speak a lot better than those who are given 40 minutes. I have not addressed this house very often myself, but on one occasion I realized it was seven minutes to six o'clock, the time it is now, and I had a 20 minute speech prepared. I boiled it down to seven minutes, and several members of the house were kind enough to tell me it was by far the best speech that I had made in the house.

Mr. Churchill: Stop now and you will get the same compliment.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I am going to practise my own principles, but by trying to confine myself to about 10 minutes rather than seven minutes. The recommendations I have made should be considered by this committee.

The question of committees has been brought up. I do not care whether or not it has been tried before. I suggest most seriously that the committees system should be employed more effectively than it has been. I remember thinking it was a great honour to be appointed to the committee on external affairs, and that as a new member I might learn something. In four months, Mr. Speaker, that committee has never met. What sort of system do we have? We have members who are anxious to find out about these subjects that concern all members who have been appointed to various committees, presumably because they have some special interest in the subject; but they have no opportunity to learn about them through the effective working of committees. If the system has been tried and found wanting, then let it be tried again, because in my respectful submission it would vastly improve the efficiency of the members of the house.

I am not singing a new song, Mr. Speaker. Mr. Cardin, a Liberal cabinet minister, said in 1943 that the rules were obsolete and that there was an urgent necessity for changes in procedure. Just to show that I pick authorities impartially, Mr. John Bracken described procedure in the Canadian parliament as being still in the oxcart stage of half a century ago. I know there have been some changes made but in my submission they have not been enough and have not gone far enough.

Mr. Nesbitt: The voice of experience.

Mr. Brewin: Somebody says "the voice of experience". Some of us have had experience outside of this house as well as in it, and I suggest that outside this house the procedures of the house would be regarded as intolerable, wasteful of the time of members and urgently needing reform. I have in front of me a book by Professor Dawson entitled "Procedure in the Canadian House of Commons". Having referred to all the revisions that have been made hitherto he goes on to say:

> These revisions, however welcome, are only partial ones and leave many of the important defects of procedure untouched. The house still takes too long to do a relatively small amount of work. Debate during most of each session remains largely disorganized and repetitive. The committee system could be used to greater effect. The house does not give proper scrutiny to the public accounts and the estimates. These important problems are with the house today and seem likely to remain so indefinitely into the future.

That is the view of an impartial observer outside the house and my experience in the house, brief as it is, makes me believe it entirely justified. To those members, and I am sure this includes all members, who believe in the essential importance of parliament as an instrument for the welfare of the Canadian people I suggest that reform is urgently necessary, if this institution is not to fall into disrepute. There is still time to vote on this resolution, Mr. Speaker. I have now spoken for only 10 minutes so I will obey my own injunction and sit down.

(Translation):

Mr. Georges Valade (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, I deplore the fact that the hon. member who just resumed his seat, while advocating freedom of speech, prevented a member from another group to express his views on this proposal.

In my opinion the purpose of the mover of this motion is most commendable and I believe that it fills an urgent need to reduce useless loss of time and to enable us to do constructive work.

Mr. Speaker, I am most surprised at the stand taken by our friends in the Liberal party, and more particularly to hear the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. MacEachen) say that the motion should not restrict the liberty of members to express their views before the house on all the amendments to be made to the standing orders.

I also deplore the use the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond made of the word freedom, because we, Conservatives, are not responsible for applying the closure rule. We remember the now famous pipe line debate. I cannot see how the Liberals, who do not like to be reminded of the circumstances which surrounded that debate, can now support the advisability of amending the procedure of the house.

I do not feel either that we should restrict freedom of speech, but after the remarks of the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond about freedom and the intention of the house to reduce the members freedom of speech, I must take exception to some of his statements.

I appreciate that some members of the Liberal opposition would profit enormously by keeping their seats during the debates of this house, particularly so when 95 per cent of them have nothing to say about the business submitted to us.

Mr. Speaker: I should have reminded the house before this of what I said a moment ago about partisan considerations.

It now being six o'clock, the hour appointed for consideration of private members' business is expired and the house shall revert to the business interrupted at five o'clock.

(Text):

Mr. Pickersgill: If I may be permitted, respectfully, Mr. Speaker, to raise a question of privilege for just one moment, I suggest that the idea that any debate in this house should be non-partisan is foreign to our whole parliamentary system.

Mr. Speaker: I fail to see that the question of privilege is a question of privilege. The hon. member is putting forward a point of view.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I would think it would be a convenience to have in Hansard again the business for tomorrow and Friday. I have read what the hon. gentleman said last night and I would ask him if he could be quite specific—he seemed to be last night but I was not quite certain after reading his words —that there will be a supply motion on Monday.

Mr. Churchill: Tomorrow and Friday we will continue discussion of the estimates, the Department of Labour and the Post Office Department. If those are finished I will call a third. On Monday and Tuesday we will have a supply motion. I should say that starting on Monday we will have a supply motion because it does not have to run for the two full days, although that is quite normal.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, January 31, 1963

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PRESS RELEASE ISSUED BY U.S. DEPARTMENT OF STATE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, yesterday at 6.15 p.m. the department of state of the United States issued a statement to the press, in both Ottawa and Washington, on which I should like to comment.

That release was communicated to our ambassador in Washington and to our Department of External Affairs in Ottawa one half hour before it was handed to the press.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I find it difficult to understand such an extraordinary procedure. I want to speak, as always, on matters affecting a great neighbour and friendly nations with restraint, but also with responsibility. Quite apart from the terms of the statement, this action by the department of state of the United States is unprecedented, and I weigh my words when I say that it constitutes an unwarranted intrusion in Canadian affairs.

Mr. Speaker, in the statement the views of the department of state are expressed as to what it considers measures which Canada ought to take in relation to NATO and NORAD defences. These are surely matters for decision by Canada. As I read the document which was issued, it bears a striking resemblance to the statements made here last Friday by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson).

On Friday last I expressed the views of the Canadian government on these matters, and I am not going to enter into any argument regarding the questions of detail dealt therein, except to say that the government sees no need to modify the views then expressed. The government of Canada does not consider that open public pressures by way of press releases or otherwise are appropriate methods of exchanging views as between equal sovereign nations and allies. There are well recognized channels for the exchange of points of view between sovereign countries and allies even when these points of view differ, as they must; and I express my very great regret that the United States department of state did not see fit to follow the usual course in communicating its views. We have asked the Canadian ambassador to Washington to return to Ottawa in order to give us his first hand views regarding this matter.

Having said that, I want to emphasize this. The Canadian government will continue to work and strive for understanding and cooperation. It will, as always, honour its obligations. But it will not be pushed around or accept external domination or interference in the making of its decisions. Canada is determined to remain a firm ally, but that does not mean that she should be a satellite.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: Go ahead, Yankee.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I will not demean myself in beginning by recognizing these insulting observations that have just been made from the other side of the chamber. It is what I have been accustomed to expect from some hon. gentleman opposite, so I will let the matter go at that.

However, I do not intend to overlook, before I reach the substance of what I have to say, the insinuation made by the Prime Minister in his statement, repeated by the Prime Minister in the house last Friday and repeated outside the house, to the effect that my statement on defence was worked out after consultation with the United States government and that the United States statement to which the Prime Minister referred bears a striking resemblance in some of its words to the statement I made last Friday. That statement coming from the Prime Minister of this country, Mr. Speaker, is unworthy of him.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It was not denied.

Mr. Pearson: It is a cheap and false insinuation. I hope that assertion will deal with that matter.

The Prime Minister has referred to a statement issued last evening by the department of state in Washington. Immediately on receiving that communique I myself said, in a statement made public, that it was surprising—and I repeat this—that the United States government considered it necessary to issue any such statement about the speech of the Prime Minister and about the public statement on national defence of the Minister of National Defence. Questions of Canadian policy should be left entirely for discussion and decision to Canadians.

Mr. Churchill: You did not say that last night.

Mr. Pearson: The Prime Minister and his party have no monopoly of the determination of any party to stand up for Canada's rights in these matters against anybody. I suggest, however, that the rule also applies to Canadian governments and should be observed by them.

Having said that, may I add that it is important to be absolutely clear about what is involved in this matter. The statement made by the government of the United States, as indeed in large part the statement made by the Prime Minister of Canada last Friday and the clarification statement made by the Minister of National Defence subsequently—all these concern, Mr. Speaker, joint arrangements of the two countries for our common defence, joint arrangements entered into by this government for Canada.

The real issue for Canadians is, what are the facts and what is the truth? What is the truth about our defence policy in this common effort on this matter? The Canadian people and their representatives in parliament are entitled to learn the facts and to know the truth. On Saturday and again on Monday the Minister of National Defence, in a public statement of clarification, contradicted certain of the Prime Minister's statements.

Mr. Harkness: I did not.

Mr. McPhillips: That is what you say, but it is not true.

Mr. Pearson: Yesterday the United States government contradicted other statements, and I feel that it was inappropriate for them to have done so. But it is this parliament's right and this parliament's duty now to find out at once what the truth is. So let us get the truth. Let us find out what the facts are without any further shilly-shally or delay.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When are you going back for further instructions?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, in the search for the facts and in the search for the truth let us remember Prime Minister Macmillan's words in the British parliament yesterday, when he said that the free nations are friends and allies and must remain friends and allies. Let us also remember that the real threat to Canada's security does not come from the United States but from communist imperialism, and unnecessary disputes among the western allies will weaken us all. There are at the moment enough differences in the free world today without adding one between Canada and the United States.

So, Mr. Speaker, any political leader in either country who for political, partisan purposes stirs up or enlarges any difference between the two countries—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: You are condemning yourself.

Mr. Pearson: —would be putting his party ahead of his country—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Are you speaking for yourself?

Mr. Pearson: —and would be putting the vain hope of immediate political advantage above the mutual interests in peace and prosperity which the two countries share.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, we have witnessed in the last few hours an unprecedented action by a friendly government, that of the United States of America, against this country, Canada, in a way that to me is blatant interference in Canadian affairs. As has already been stated publicly through the press, the action taken by the United States government is the most severe ever taken during peacetime toward Canada. It would seem to me that there could have been far more friendly and effective ways of expressing a statement which obviously, through our own indecision in Canada, we have goaded the United States into making.

We have been told that we are in conference with the United States concerning what should be the policy of our two governments concerning defensive nuclear armament. Surely this conference table could have been one means of expressing the thoughts of the United States government. Then there are the normal diplomatic channels. I am sure that I express the sentiments of the Canadian people from Newfoundland to Vancouver island when I say that we resent the action the United States has taken, not so much for what was said but for the way that government has seen fit to say it. I agree that the United States of America is our closest friend and our best customer. However, I agree also with our Prime Minister that we, as Canadians, will not be pushed around.

The Prime Minister has said he will not be pushed around in the making of decisions. I ask him again, what are those decisions? This is not a question that has been asked only by those who are members in this House of Commons. This is a question that is being asked by Canadians across the country. This is a question that the members of the press are asking as well. I should like to quote from an editorial that appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of last night.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before the hon. gentleman gets too far may I remind him that this is not a debate. This is a comment upon a statement that was made. I realize the difficulty, but I would ask the co-operation of hon. members who have the right to speak now.

Mr. Thompson: I believe I have as much right to make a statement as anyone else here, and I am making that statement. I would say this, that there is general confusion in Canada as to what our position is. When we have a statement made by the Prime Minister, we have it defined in another way by the Minister of National Defence. We think we have a right to know what the actual decision of the government is in this matter. On the other hand I do not believe it is enough for the leader of the official opposition to stand up and merely try to justify himself by accusing the Prime Minister of making accusations against him. Certainly we ought to have a sense of responsibility in this matter so that we can make clear something which is not very difficult, because I do not think any of us are too far apart on it. Then we would not be forcing the United States into making statements which define our policy for us.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is not the time for a debate in connection with this problem. I believe we would never have been in this particular situation if a little different action had been taken. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it is my opinion that we ought to be moving immediately into a debate where we can have this matter fully clarified. Consequently I move—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Thompson: —the adjournment of the house under standing order 26 for the purpose of discussing the matter of defence policy.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would draw to the attention of the hon. gentleman the fact that the provisions of standing order 26 do not permit him at this time to move such a motion.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, in the opinion of the members of the New Democratic party the statement issued yesterday by the United States state department constitutes an unwarranted and unprecedented interference in the internal affairs of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas: It is unusual for a state department to issue a statement contradicting statements made in a house of commons by the prime minister of another country. It is even more unusual to have the release issued by the embassy here in Washington—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Douglas: —here in Ottawa. The statement which was released in Washington yesterday was one thing, but the release which was issued to the press, a copy of which I have in my hand, was issued here from the United States embassy in Washington—

Some hon. Members: Ottawa.

Mr. Douglas: —in Ottawa. Mr. Speaker, it seems to be increasingly difficult to differentiate between these two capitals at the present time. We in this party have very fundamental differences with the government on the questions of external affairs and defence policy, but we will not brook nor will any other group in Canada brook interference from the United States or from any other power in the discussion of our internal affairs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas: I think the government of the United States should know from this parliament that they are not dealing with Guatemala, where in 1954 the state department had a substantial hand in throwing out the Arbenz government; nor are they dealing with Cuba, where in 1961 they promoted, financed and mounted an invasion of that country which was an inexcusable interference in the affairs of another member of the organization of American states, an action, I may say, which was in my opinion taken for no other reason than to make the world safe for the United Fruit Company and the Standard Oil Company in order that the latter might continue their policies of commercial exploitation.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, there are two parts of this statement which was issued yesterday to which I think the house ought to have its attention drawn. The first is this:

> The provision of nuclear weapons to Canadian forces would not involve an expansion of independent nuclear capability, or an increase in the "nuclear club". As in the case of other allies custody of U.S. nuclear weapons would remain with the U.S. joint control fully consistent with national sovereignty can be worked out to cover the use of such weapons by Canadian forces.

That is the end of the statement. I wish to point out first, Mr. Speaker, that this is not the view which the United States took when nuclear missiles, presumably under the control of the Soviet union, were stationed in Cuba. The United States quite properly took the position at that time that this was an extension of the nuclear club, and that it did alter the balance of nuclear power.

May I point out, second, that it is for the Canadian people, through their elected representatives, to decide whether or not the acquisition of nuclear arms will expand the nuclear club and increase the danger of nuclear war. We in this party contend that stopping the spread of nuclear arms is a prelude to securing a cessation of nuclear tests and to reaching a treaty on nuclear disarmament. This is a Canadian decision, which has to be taken by Canadians and any attempt by any outside government to dictate to Canadians what their policy should be regarding the acquisition of nuclear arms will be both resented and ignored.

The other sentence in this statement to which I should like to draw the attention of the house is this:

A flexible and balanced defence requires increased conventional forces, but conventional forces are not an alternative to effective NATO or NORAD defence arrangements using nuclear-capable weapons systems.

Our membership in NATO is not conditional upon our accepting nuclear weapons. That is shown by the fact that other members of the alliance have not accepted nuclear weapons. If the Canadian people want to decide, as we think they should decide, upon a non-nuclear role for Canada, that is a decision which they have a right to make without any advice or any attempted intimidation from outside.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas: In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that the statement issued yesterday points up the need for a full discussion of this whole question. The Prime Minister in his remarks today said that the government sees no reason to change its statement. I should like to ask, which statement, the Prime Minister's or that of the Minister of National Defence?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas: The statement issued yesterday simply points up the fact that we have had no clear cut statement of policy. Indeed, two statements of policy have been issued, one contradicting the other. Your Honour quite properly interrupted the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) to say that this subject could not be debated on motions. But the need for a debate is beyond argument. Mr. Speaker, I therefore propose, at the proper point in the proceedings, to move under standing order 26—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think one can anticipate, when commenting upon a statement at this time, the action that may be taken in the future.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, I am simply saying that I think there ought to be a debate, and I certainly, if no one else does—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Douglas: —will move to provide an opportunity for such a debate.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. gentleman has indicated what he proposes to do, but it is still quite improper at this time when commenting upon a statement.

Mr. Douglas: I would say, Mr. Speaker, before I resume my seat, that it seems to me completely inadequate to deal with a matter of this vital importance by having a brief statement made under motions without giving this house and the country an opportunity to fully clarify what is the government's position, in order that we may know what Canada is going to do in the near future with reference to the acquisition of nuclear arms for Canada.

U.S. STATE DEPARTMENT PRESS RELEASE— MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 26

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to move adjournment of the house under standing order 26 for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent and public importance, namely the statement made last night by the United States department of state contradicting recent statements of the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence concerning the joint defence arrangements of the Canadian and United States governments.

Mr. Speaker: I will be interested to hear remarks about the urgency of debate.

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax): I wish to make four points, Mr. Speaker, any one of which might be considered fatal to the motion to adjourn the regular business of the house as proposed by the Leader of the Opposition. First of all I think we should be setting a dangerous precedent for ourselves if we were to allow every unfavourable press release by a foreign power to precipitate us into debate while we are running the affairs of our own country. It does not take much imagination to foresee that if we postpone our regular business at this time for such a reason, as suggested by the Leader of the Opposition, other countries might be quick to use this as a tool against us.

The second point I wish to make has to do with citation No. 100 to be found on page 90 of Beauchesne. Paragraph 3 of that citation states that urgency within rule 26 does not apply to the subject matter itself but means urgency of debate when the ordinary opportunities provided by the rules of the house do not permit the subject to be brought on early enough and public interest demands that a discussion take place immediately. I submit, without argument as to the urgency of this subject matter, that there is not the urgency of debate required within the framework of Beauchesne's interpretation of the rules and practice of the house.

The third point I wish to make again relates to Beauchesne, and the point is whether the public interest would suffer if this matter were not discussed at once. As Dr. Beauchesne has written in citation 100, paragraph 2:

> The "definite matter of urgent public importance", for the discussion of which the adjournment of the house may be moved under standing order 26, must be so pressing that public interest will suffer if it is not given immediate attention.

We have heard the statement from the Prime Minister that the Canadian ambassador will shortly be in Ottawa to report on this matter, and I submit it would be more in the public interest to defer debate until the government had received the benefit of such briefing.

The fourth and final point I wish to make —and I think it will be equally effective in disposing of this matter—concerns the rules of this house, in particular standing order 26 paragraph 6(c) which states:

> The motion must not revive discussion on a matter which has been discussed in the same session.

I submit to you, sir, that the burden, the substance of what we have been dealing with today has been dealt with already in the debate which took place in this house on Thursday and Friday.

For these reasons I submit this is not a motion you should rule in order.

Mr. Pearson: I think the hon. member for Halifax should be congratulated on having done his best on behalf of the government side to avoid a discussion of this matter in the terms in which the motion is being put forward. I am afraid, however, he does not find himself, in so far as his main argument is concerned, in harmony with the leader of the house or with the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister has considered this statement by the United States government to be of such an unprecedented character that he felt it necessary to bring it up at once in the House of Commons under motions. The Prime Minister himself admits this is a matter of unprecedented urgency, and if that is the case surely we should be permitted—indeed, it is our duty—to discuss a matter of such unprecedented urgency at once in this chamber.

There is one alternative procedure which, if the government saw fit to adopt it, might justify the withdrawal of this motion. If the leader of the house would inform us that at once, when we finish the orders of the day, we would consider the estimates of the Department of External Affairs, which are already before the house, that would also provide a good opportunity to discuss this whole business.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, if you should decide, as I hope you will not, on some technical ground that this motion is inadmissible, I hope the government will not run away from the discussion, because they have the opportunity of bringing on the estimates of the Department of External Affairs this afternoon which would provide an ample basis for such a discussion as I am proposing.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): To assist you, Mr. Speaker, in reaching a decision as to whether this is urgent I wish to submit that we have had several interpretations of what the defence policy of this country is supposed to be, even since the debate we had on defence policy last week end. Because of this situation I think it is urgent that the members of this house and the country generally should have a clearcut statement of policy from the government. The urgency of the matter involves clearing up this confusion. Delay involves placing the friendship of this country with one of our great neighbours in jeopardy. Therefore I think the urgency of debate is unquestionable.

I should like to say that members of this party do not agree in its entirety with the motion which has been put forward; in other words, that the department of state has contradicted recent statements of the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence. We do not read that out of the release. However, we do feel it urgent that this matter of defence policy should be cleared up.

U.S. State Department Press Release

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it must surely be clear that if in recent years there has been a subject concerning which there was urgency of debate, this is it.

I thank the hon. member for Halifax for drawing attention to the key sentences, in Beauchesne as far as motions of this kind are concerned. He is perfectly right in saying there must be urgency of debate. I thank him also for reading the sentence which says that the issue must be so pressing that the public interest would suffer if it were not given immediate attention.

Aside from the views expressed by the hon. member for Halifax we find, on the question of urgency, almost unanimous support from the floor of the house. The Prime Minister found it a matter of such urgency, as the Leader of the Opposition noted, that he rose to speak on the matter immediately motions were called. The Leader of the Opposition came into this house with a motion ready under standing order 26. The hon. member for Red Deer tried to move one as well, and my own leader indicated he had one ready. This means that in all four corners of this house it has been recognized that this matter is one of urgency in terms of having a debate today.

I also suggest, Mr. Speaker, that there is real point to the words quoted by the hon. member for Halifax, which I read a moment ago, that the issue must be so pressing that the public interest would suffer if it is not given immediate attention. I submit that is precisely the case. I submit that unless this statement which was issued at a quarter after six last night by the United States department of state is discussed in this House of Commons, unless we in this House of Commons make our views known, and unless we get a clarification of the position of the government with regard to this whole matter, the Canadian public interest will suffer on all counts. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that although you were acting as you should in inviting comments on this question rather than ruling immediately, the burden of the argument is crystal clear, that this is a matter which comes under the designation of urgency of debate.

One of the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Halifax is, I confess, so weak that one should hardly mention it, but he put it forward. He cited the section of standing order 26 which says that one cannot move under that standing order to debate something which has been discussed previously in this session. This house adjourned at six o'clock yesterday. The press release which has given this country such great concern was issued at a quarter after six last night, so there could not have been any discussion of this matter prior to this occasion. Therefore I suggest that that part of the hon. member's argument should not have been made at all.

Like the hon. member for Medicine Hat I must say that had my leader been able to put forward a motion under standing order 26 there might have been a slightly different turn put on the matter, and if he gets the chance to speak he will so indicate. But what is before us is not any particular implication in the motion of the Leader of the Opposition. What is before us is a request that this house adjourn all its other business to discuss this most urgent and most important matter, the determination of which I suggest should be discussed by this house.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, one point was raised by the hon. member for Halifax to which I would like to draw particular attention. He said that under motions we had already discussed this matter, and that it would be out of order to adjourn the house to debate the subject further.

Mr. McCleave: No, I said there was a debate last week.

Mr. Knowles: He said there was debate last Thursday and Friday.

Mr. Douglas: Well, I simply wanted to point out that under motions all we had discussed was the propriety of a statement made by a department of another government. What this motion calls for is a discussion of the joint defence arrangements between Canada and the United States government. Surely the people of Canada are vitally concerned in this matter. There has been no opportunity to discuss it, because the press release was issued yesterday and the debate on external affairs was held last Thursday and Friday. I submit that all the discussion this afternoon on motions simply points up the fact that this house and the country are clamouring to know what those defence arrangements are between the two countries, what commitments have been made by this government, and what the government's policy is with respect to this matter.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, may I clear up some confusion as to one of the points I made, which the last speaker dealt with wrongly at first and then I think was seized of the true facts and did admit that there was a debate in this house last week on United States-Canadian joint negotiations.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think we need belabour the point. It was cleared up.

Mr. McCleave: But my point is that surely this is the whole purport of the motion of the Leader of the Opposition, which refers to the U.S.-Canadian joint defence arrangements. I am saying that the major part of the debate has already taken place in this house.

Mr. Douglas: If the hon. member will look at the motion, it is to discuss the statement made last night by the United States department of state. We certainly did not debate that last Thursday and Friday. This is a matter of immediate interest.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on occasions when you are faced with decisions dealing with motions of this nature you have to take into account a number of factors, the chief one, of course, being urgency of debate. On a great many occasions the subject that is introduced is a matter of very great interest. But then your habit has been to examine the procedure of the house to see whether or not the business set for the day in question should be put aside, as it would have to be put aside to provide for debate if no other opportunity was evident in the near future. Time after time successive Speakers have considered matters of this sort, and if they have been informed or have seen that opportunities for debate would arise in the near future they have not accepted the motion.

In this instance, despite the active interest displayed in this particular matter, there will be opportunities for complete debate on the subject if so desired by the house, and at much greater length than would be the case today, if the general order of business is followed. I announced in the house last night that today and tomorrow we would be discussing estimates; and these are very important estimates, the Department of Labour, Post Office Department, and others. There has been a great demand for discussion of the estimates put forward time and time again by members of the opposition. Now we are being asked to set aside an urgent matter of importance to the Canadian people, namely the spending program of the Canadian government. We are asked to put that aside in favour of entering upon a debate based on a statement made by a foreign country.

In the order of business that I announced yesterday there was a supply motion for Monday and Tuesday. That provides a two day debate on a subject selected by the opposition and leads to a conclusion, because votes are called at the end of supply motions. The debate today would not be a conclusive debate, because it would end when the automatic adjournment of the house occurs.

Mr. Speaker, basing myself on citation 100(3) on page 90 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, fourth edition, which states that—

U.S. State Department Press Release

"Urgency" within this rule does not apply to the matter itself, but it means "urgency of debate", when the ordinary opportunity provided by the rules of the house do not permit the subject to be brought on early enough—

—I suggest that the subject would be brought on early enough, all factors being considered, on Monday and Tuesday.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word on the question of urgency. In this connection I should like to recall to Your Honour what Mr. Speaker Michener had to say regarding a motion for adjournment under standing order 26, which had been put forward by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) on February 18, 1959, as reported on page 1133 of Hansard. Mr. Speaker Michener said:

The question that concerns me is whether there will be an opportunity to discuss this important matter, such that we do not need to interrupt the proceedings to deal with it today, or whether there has already been ample opportunity this session.

It seems to me this is one of the essential considerations which Your Honour will wish to bear in mind. From the nod of Your Honour's head, I gather that you concur in this observation. As the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) has pointed out, this question arose only as the result of a statement issued by the United States state department last night at 6.15 p.m. Hence one aspect of Mr. Speaker Michener's concern is covered by the facts of the situation which now engage our attention.

The fact that this is a matter of urgency is, in my opinion, reflected in the very character of the circumstances which brought the Prime Minister to his feet when Your Honour called motions. In his own words is to be found the justification for our plea of urgency. The Prime Minister said in substance that never before in the relations between the two countries had there been so unwarranted an intervention by the United States in the affairs of this country. That statement in itself, in the light of the situation that confronts us in the world, surely should constitute evidence of the urgency of the matter. Do we need any further evidence? In the statement of the Prime Minister we have evidence that so urgent is this matter, that the government has given instructions to our ambassador in Washington to return to Canada at once for consultation with the government at home. Can there be anything which reflects more seriously than does that action the urgency of this situation?

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that if you were to determine that there was no urgency

U.S. State Department Press Release

in this situation in effect you would be denying the implications of the statement made by the Prime Minister with regard to the intervention or the implications of that intervention, supported by everyone who spoke for the political parties in this house today and for the people of Canada. This matter is so urgent that unless an opportunity is given to ascertain the facts there will go on for days controversy and difference of opinion between two friendly nations which will create a situation conceivably even more difficult than that which attends us at this moment.

I submit to you with confidence, Mr. Speaker, that for these reasons and for the reasons contained in the speeches of the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition, this is a more urgent matter than any we have had in this house for many years.

(Translation):

Mr. Gilles Gregoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I only wish to urge the government to agree to the suggestion made to consider that matter. Since the public could have been misled and confused following the debates of last Thursday and Friday, I feel that this is a matter of public importance.

On the other hand, I do not see why the government would deny the house such a debate, since the statement on which a special debate is proposed goes exactly to prove that the leader of the Liberal opposition (Mr. Pearson) was mistaken or that he misled the people when he made his statements.

Therefore, I believe that the government should allow the house to consider the matter which the hon. members seem to want to discuss today.

(Text):

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I am sure Your Honour will wish to listen to all the points that can be brought forward at this time in order that you make a decision having regard to what Your Honour has heard with reference to this motion to adjourn the house. I am prompted to rise particularly for one reason, namely that which was raised by my hon. friend the house leader, when he led us to believe that because of certain business of the house announced prior to this time, there would be an opportunity to discuss this matter at a later date. In fact, to use his own words, he said that it would not be opportune to put aside the spending program of the government.

My reply to that statement—and I am sure that of most of us who sit on this side of the house—can be none other than that the government was lax in not bringing that spending program before the house long before this time. In fact the government has had many opportunities to do so, beginning with this week when it called the bill dealing with the national economic development board, whereas it could have discussed the spending program. It was then made quite clear that that is not the reason.

However, there is another important reason. Over and above the fact that there seems to be unanimity in this house with regard to urgency of debate—and surely there should be unanimity on a matter of this nature arising out of the statement by the United States state department last night concerning the terms of our alliance and contradicting the statement made by the Prime Minister—it strikes me that not only the members of the government but the Prime Minister himself should be the first to rise and say, not that this matter is of such unprecedented importance that I shall make a statement on motions, but that the house shall immediately be free to debate this matter of utmost importance.

Mr. Terry Nugent (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, may I say a word on this matter?

Mr. Speaker: On urgency?

Mr. Nugent: Yes, on urgency. It seems to me that the only change in position since we finished our debate on Friday last is not in the relations between Canada and the United States or in the international situation, but only in the fact that there has been a news release from the United States. I suggest that when this house has so recently had an opportunity to debate the subject matter of that news release it is hard to understand how anyone, much less one occupying the responsible position of Leader of the Opposition, should be so greatly alarmed by a mere news release, and that this should be taken as such an urgent matter of public importance that we have to put aside our business in order to take up consideration of it.

Mr. Speaker: I wish to thank all hon. members who have assisted me at arriving at a decision in this regard. The motion of the Leader of the Opposition refers to a statement which was released yesterday contradicting certain statements of the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence concerning certain joint defence arrangements of the Canadian and the United States governments.

I think everyone agrees that this matter is one of great importance. Hence the question to be decided is whether or not we should spend some time in discussing such a matter. The question that concerns me is that of urgency of debate at this time.

As I have indicated, and as have my predecessors on many occasions, rule 26 is a very extraordinary remedy. There are ample references to it on precisely the key point, namely the urgency of debate. If, as seemed to be indicated by certain hon. members, the question was that of the acquisition of nuclear weapons, then I would immediately say no, as that matter was debated last week. So on that ground the proposition, as it affects the country as a whole, would fall to the ground.

As to the question of urgency of debate by reason of the fact that this was the first item on motions, we have motions called five days a week, and I fail to see how in many instances there can be differences as to the timing or as to what person puts forward a matter when the Speaker calls motions.

There is another point urged with regard to urgency of debate, and that is the necessity of ascertaining the facts. On the basis that this statement was issued at 6.15 p.m. yesterday, and as hon. members are here, I find some difficulty in seeing how a general debate in this connection could ascertain more facts than have been disclosed at the present time. In combination with something else I feel that if the purpose is to ascertain the facts today, this is not necessarily the most appropriate time.

It has been indicated by the hon. member for Essex East in citing a ruling of my predecessor that there should have been a recent opportunity in the past to discuss the matter, and I agree with him that in so far as the narrow confines of this statement are concerned there was not that opportunity. But there will certainly be an opportunity in the relatively near future. This is not a new indication this afternoon but something that was indicated yesterday and even the day before. It has been announced that the business for next Monday will be a supply motion. This provides for a two day debate if required and also provides for some form of conclusion if such shall be the case, whereas the adjournment of the business today would merely result in the discussion of this matter without any conclusion.

Notwithstanding the fact that there is a great deal of interest in these matters, I still find on these grounds that such a motion does not meet the requirements in so far as urgency of debate is concerned. Therefore I would not accept the motion.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, with great respect and with regret I should like to appeal your decision.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. In this regard I would cite Hansard, volume 1 of 1960, page 1153, where Mr. Speaker Michener, in referring to a previous decision by Mr. Speaker Beaudoin in 1955, said:

> I refer the hon. member to the Journals of the House of Commons for 1955, page 858, where the same point was dealt with by the Speaker of the day, who said:
> "In the future, whenever I make a ruling to the effect that the motion should not be accepted because it is not in order or is not of urgent public importance—that is, that there is no urgency of debate—I will not grant an appeal from my decision that there is no appeal."

On this point I say that there is no appeal from a Speaker's ruling. In so far as urgency of debate and acceptance of the motion are concerned, it has been traditional that there has been no appeal from the decision of the Speaker, and in support of that I am citing the decision of my predecessor which on that occasion was accepted by the house. Therefore I am ruling in the same way.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, it is with regret that I appeal against your ruling that there is no appeal. I am so anxious that Your Honour should listen to the citation I have that I have allowed this discussion to take place between the Clerk and the Speaker, and quite properly. Your Honour has referred to a citation. May I refer to one that has the strength of long recognition because of the circumstances in which it was taken. I refer Your Honour to page 90 of Beauchesne, fourth edition, paragraph 7:

> The house affirmed, on the 19th of February, 1932, that there is no appeal from the Speaker's decision, that a motion, to adjourn the house for discussing an urgent matter of public importance, cannot be made unless the member's statement shows that there is actual urgency for debate. The Speaker decided that his decision on this particular point was final. Mr. Ralston appealed from the "Speaker's refusal to permit an appeal from his decision." The Speaker was sustained—

The right of Mr. Ralston to appeal against the ruling that there is no appeal was sustained, and that is the appeal that I now make. In making it may I point out to Your Honour, with respect, that in the following paragraph a way is opened in doubtful cases.

> In doubtful cases, the question of urgency and of importance are left for the house to decide, by giving or withholding its support.

Because of the seriousness of this situation I appeal against your ruling that there is no appeal.

Mr. Speaker: I find—

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: If it is on a point of order, although the appeal, of course, is without debate—

U.S. State Department Press Release

Mr. Fulton: Is what?

Mr. Speaker: Without debate.

Mr. Fulton: I wish to speak on the point of order as to whether there can in fact be an appeal from your ruling. The hon. member for Essex East spoke on that point, contending that there is a right of appeal from your ruling that there can be no appeal from your ruling on this particular subject. That is just how complicated it is; and the absurdity of the proposition which the hon. member for Essex East wishes us to support is illustrated by the fact that the citation read by him establishes that the house itself confirmed the position that there is no appeal from the Speaker's ruling on this point.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fulton: I know my hon. friends do not like it when the rules are properly applied if it does not happen to suit their convenience, but I recall at least one occasion, if not more, when that very point was made on this subject at the time we were in opposition on the other side, and the Speaker of that day pointed out that ordinarily he would be inclined to permit an appeal to the house from his ruling under this standing order, but inasmuch as the house on a previous occasion had upheld the position that there was no appeal, then that decision, he said, is final and binding.

This has become part of the rules of the house decided by the house as reported in this citation in Beauchesne. Unless we are to change the rules of the house, which can only be done by unanimous consent or by motion after notice, then I submit that rule is binding. It is a rule which the house has imposed upon itself, and it cannot be changed except by unanimous consent or by motion after notice which must be carried by a majority.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, on this matter may I suggest first of all that the Minister of Public Works is in error when he says there is a rule on the point. There is no rule and no standing order on the point. But, Mr. Speaker, reference has been made by both the hon. member for Essex East and the Minister of Public Works to the ruling that Mr. Speaker Black made in 1932 to the effect that there was no appeal against his ruling that there was no appeal. The hon. member for Essex East has pointed out that the Speaker was sustained. The Minister of Public Works states that that settles the matter.

The fact of the matter is, Mr. Speaker, that later in the same year, on November 2, 1932, the same Mr. Speaker Black was in the chair and there was a motion to adjourn under the corresponding standing order. The motion was not allowed by the Speaker but there was an appeal directly against his decision that the motion was not in order and that appeal was put to a vote. Subsequently, on March 27 and on May 22, 1935, under Mr. Speaker Bowman, appeals were allowed without even going to this second stage.

Mr. Speaker, I have browsed enough in the procedures and practices of parliament to know that there are incidents since then when rulings have been given the other way. I suggest the rulings have been back and forth to such an extent that there is no clear decision by the parliament of Canada on this point. If the Minister of Public Works is going to rely on the stand taken by Mr. Speaker Black on February 19, 1932, I suggest he should look and see what Mr. Speaker Black did on November 2, 1932, some months later in the same year, when he allowed an appeal.

This is a new parliament, and we have our own problems to deal with. There is no clear precedent. There are precedents both ways. I submit that in effect you have ruled today—you, Mr. Speaker Lambert, have ruled —that there is no appeal against your ruling. It is your ruling that must be tested. I submit that the hon. member for Essex East has every right in this parliament to appeal against the ruling you have made today.

Mr. Speaker: I thank hon. members for what they have had to say in this regard. I think hon. members will appreciate the position in which I am. Based on the precedents of my predecessors I have full authority for the proposition I put forward. Further, on the basis of the appeal principle, an appeal regarding my decision, by advancing it one step further, it would eventually result in an appeal. The only thing I can do at the present time, since an appeal has been taken, is to put the question.

All those in favour of sustaining the Speaker's ruling that there is no appeal from his decision in regard to section 26 of the standing orders, will please say aye.

Some hon. Members: Aye.

Mr. Speaker: All those against the Speaker's decision in that regard will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the ayes have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

Mr. Speaker put the question as follows:

The question before the house is an appeal from the Speaker's ruling. The Leader of the Opposition moved the adjournment of the house under standing order 26 for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely the statement made last night by the United States department of state contradicting the recent statements of the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence concerning the joint defence arrangements of the Canadian and United States governments.

The Chair ruled that this was not a matter of sufficient urgency of debate to be permitted under the terms of standing order 26, whereupon, the Leader of the Opposition appealed from the ruling of the Chair.

The Chair ruled there was no appeal from a ruling of the Chair in this regard and quoted from Hansard, volume 1, of 1960, page 1153, where Mr. Speaker Michener, in referring to a previous decision by Mr. Speaker Beaudoin in 1955 said:

"I refer the hon. member to the Journals of the House of Commons for 1955, page 858, where the same point was dealt with by the Speaker of the day, who said:

'In the future, whenever I make a ruling to the effect that the motion should not be accepted because it is not in order or is not of urgent public importance—that is, that there is no urgency of debate—I will not grant an appeal from my decision that there is no appeal.' "

The house divided on the question: Shall the Speaker's decision be sustained? And the decision of the Chair was not sustained on the following division:

Mr. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, I was paired and did not vote. Had I voted I would have voted against your ruling.

Mr. Speaker: The decision of the Chair has not been sustained. There is now a further question, which is that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) appeals from the ruling that I made under standing order 26 that this matter is not one meeting the requirements of urgency of debate. Those in favour of sustaining the ruling of the Chair will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those against sustaining the ruling of the Chair will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it. The motion is that the house adjourn to discuss a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely the statement made last night by the United States department of state contradicting the recent statements of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Harkness) concerning the joint defence arrangements of the Canadian-United States governments. Has the hon. member the leave of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have moved this motion in order to discuss a matter which we in this party and in other opposition parties have considered to be a matter of the utmost urgency and importance, namely the statement made last evening by the department of state of the United States government. This statement among other things contradicted recent statements of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Harkness) concerning the joint arrangements of the Canadian and the United States governments.

Mr. Speaker, I am amazed that this motion would not have commended itself at once to the Prime Minister and the members of the government—

Mr. Diefenbaker: You have Monday and Tuesday.

Mr. Pearson: —in view of the statement made at the beginning of this sitting by the Prime Minister himself who considered the matter of unprecedented urgency and of unprecedented importance and constituting, in his view, a gross intervention in the affairs of Canada; as of such importance as to warrant the recall from Washington to report to the government of our ambassador in Washington.

An hon. Member: Why did you not want to vote on it?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I am asked why we did not want to vote on it. That is what we are trying to bring before this House of Commons and, in spite of the obstruction of the government, I hope we shall have a chance to vote on this matter.

As has already been pointed out, this motion brings up the whole question of joint arrangements for defence—the fact is that they are joint and indeed some of them are collective. They have been made between our two governments, namely the Canadian government and the United States government. It is of the greatest possible importance that these arrangements should now be discussed having regard to the statement issued in Washington by the state department last evening, the statement made by the Prime Minister in this house last Friday, and the clarification, to use his own word, of the statement of the Prime Minister by the Minister of National Defence without the knowledge of the Prime Minister. I think it is a matter of first importance—indeed I think it is essential—that, before this discussion concludes this evening, we have a statement on this matter from the Prime Minister of this country, from the Minister of National Defence who has not said a word on this issue, and also from the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sevigny) who presumably supports the statement of clarification made by his associate minister and who undoubtedly will wish to explain to the house why he supports it; and also by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, (Mr. Green) as this has now become a matter of high policy between our two governments in the realm of foreign affairs.

I wish to keep my remarks short so that I will give the four hon. gentlemen time in which to state their position in this house. I understand that, according to the rules, we have from now until ten o'clock for that purpose and that the ordinary hour for private members' business is dispensed with.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No.

An hon. Member: Why should it be dispensed with?

Mr. Pearson: I am not asking that it should be dispensed with. I understood that, in these circumstances, it automatically was dispensed with. If I am wrong about that matter, I should like to know it.

U.S. State Department Press Release

Mr. Speaker: For the information of the Leader of the Opposition may I say that the standing order with respect to private members' business is not suspended by this motion for adjournment.

Mr. Pearson: Very well. We then have from eight o'clock until ten o'clock for spokesmen of the government to explain their position with regard to this statement and we shall have before long, I hope, occasions on which to continue the debate on this matter.

This statement of the state department of the United States was issued, in my view, inappropriately. It should never have been issued. I said that last evening, when I commented on it at once. Irrespective of the provocation—and there was provocation—it was wrong of the state department of the United States or the foreign office of any government, however friendly, to issue a statement of this kind commenting on—and by commenting on in this way, intervening in—a matter which is before the House of Commons of this country. In my view the only situation which would justify this course at all would be if the state department had already protested by formal note to the Canadian government certain observations made by the Canadian Prime Minister last Friday. If no attention was paid to that note, then perhaps it could be said that they had the right to make their position public. No doubt in the course of this discussion the Prime Minister or a spokesman for the government will tell us whether any note on this matter has been received by the Canadian embassy in Washington or from the United States embassy in Ottawa dealing with this matter, or whether any oral representations were made in this matter.

This United States statement, because it is a foundation for the discussion, I think should be put on the record. I propose to do that and then to enable the spokesmen for the government to reply. The text of the statement is as follows, and I commend the first paragraph of this statement to the house:

The department—

—that is the department of state—

—has received a number of inquiries concerning the disclosure during a recent debate in the Canadian House of Commons regarding negotiations over the past two or three months between the United States and Canadian governments relating to nuclear weapons for Canadian armed forces.

In the first place, Mr. Speaker, it should be emphasized that the department of state refers to disclosures made by the Prime Minister of this country in a recent debate in this house concerning negotiations or discussions which had been entered into between the two governments two or three months ago and about which we in this house knew nothing. These disclosures were made by the Prime Minister on a matter which affected the United States government as much as it affected the Canadian government.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Did you object?

Mr. Pearson: I will ask the Prime Minister when he speaks on this matter, or the Minister of National Defence to tell the house whether these disclosures in the House of Commons about these talks between the two governments on a matter of such importance, were made with the knowledge and approval of the other government concerned with the conversations.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would ask the Leader of the Opposition this question. Did he object to having the information he asked for?

Mr. Pearson: One of the extraordinary things about this disclosure made by the Prime Minister is that it did not give us any information.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: And when we asked next day questions about the disclosure, even about who was carrying on the negotiations, the Prime Minister and the members of the government said these were improper questions. These discussions were news to the House of Commons. The last time we had heard in this house anything about discussions in this matter was from the Prime Minister two years ago when he told us that they were finished. Apparently they were begun again, no doubt between the representatives of the two governments. We do not know who they were. We do not know what departments are carrying them on. However, we know they were confidential negotiations and we know they were referred to in this house by the Prime Minister. However, we do not know whether he made those disclosures about those negotiations after having informed the government of the United States that he was going to do so. I ask him if he even gave them half an hour's notice.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Did the Leader of the Opposition object? He will not answer that question.

Mr. Pearson: I ask the Prime Minister, in case he did not catch my question, will he tell the house when he speaks whether he gave the United States government any advance notice, even half an hour's notice, that he was going to bring out in this house that confidential discussions were going on? Did he give the government of the United States any notice about this or did he just come into the House of Commons and mention these matters to the surprise, no doubt, of the other party to the negotiations, which happened in this case to be the government of the United States?

U.S. State Department Press Release

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I ask the hon. gentleman where he gets the idea that they are confidential? Did he get that when he was down in Washington or New York?

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I have not been in Washington for many months.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, New York.

Mr. Pearson: There have been a good many visits to Washington, since my last visit, by members of the government, who must know much more about these matters than I do. The Prime Minister went to Nassau a little while ago where he had luncheon with the President of the United States. No doubt he talked with the President of the United States about these matters on that occasion. May I ask him whether he discussed with the President of the United States the propriety of bringing these matters into the House of Commons and giving the United States government notice that he was going to do so? I am sure that in this luncheon conversation between the President of the United States and the Prime Minister they went over the whole question of Canadian-American relations.

With respect to these negotiations about which we heard for the first time last Friday, having been told two years ago by the Prime Minister that discussions on this matter had ceased, there is a paragraph in the United States communique which should be put on the record because it bears on the origin of these conversations, these discussions, these negotiations, which were first made public by the Prime Minister of this country without any consultation with the government of the United States. I read from the United States communique:

Shortly after the Cuban crisis in October 1962—

Shortly after the Cuban crisis.

—the Canadian government proposed confidential discussions—

The initiative for these confidential discussions came not from the United States but from the Canadian government. The proposal was made by the Canadian government for such conversations, for such discussions. Surely that makes it all the more important that if disclosure of these confidential negotiations was to be made by the Prime Minister in a debate in the House of Commons it would have been done with the knowledge and approval of the other party to the negotiations. I know the Prime Minister is a stickler for the proprieties in these matters. I know how he feels when he does not get more than half an hour's notice. How does he think the United States government felt when it got no notice at all?

Shortly after the Cuban crisis in October 1962, the Canadian government proposed confidential discussions concerning circumstances under which there might be provision of nuclear weapons for Canadian armed forces in Canada and Europe.

This was the proposal made by the Canadian government for conversations with the United States government. The communique goes on:

These discussions have been exploratory in nature; the Canadian government has not as yet proposed any arrangement sufficiently practical to contribute effectively to North American defence.

So much for the negotiations about which we have been unable up to the present to secure any information in this house, although the Prime Minister himself in the debate last Friday, and the Minister of National Defence, did tell us they were going on. Perhaps we will hear this evening from the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green) at least what department of the Canadian government is carrying on these confidential negotiations, what progress is being made, if any, and why it is that the Canadian government, having proposed them for the purpose set out in this paragraph, has not been able to put forward any practical suggestion which might contribute effectively to the joint defence? The communique also has this to say:

In 1958 the Canadian government decided to adopt the Bomarc-B weapons systems. Accordingly two Bomarc-B squadrons were deployed to Canada—

At the expense, incidentally, of the United States government.

—where they would serve the double purpose of protecting Montreal and Toronto as well as the U.S. deterrent force. The Bomarc-B was not designed to carry any conventional warhead.

Of course, we all knew that.

The matter of making available a nuclear warhead for it and for other nuclear capable weapons systems acquired by Canada has been the subject of inconclusive discussions between the two governments. The installation of the two Bomarc-B batteries in Canada without nuclear warheads was completed in 1962.

That confirms what we on this side felt to be the case, that by the end of 1962 the point of no return had been reached in so far as these two Bomarc squadrons were concerned in regard to keeping them there without any warheads or giving them the warheads without which they would be completely useless. Then the communique goes on:

In addition to the Bomarc-B, a similar problem exists with respect to the modern supersonic jet interceptor—

I believe that is the CF-101.

—with which the R.C.A.F. has been provided. Without nuclear air defence warheads, they operate at far less than their full potential effectiveness.

One of the statements made by the Prime Minister in the debate last Friday which must have caused some confusion in the mind of the Minister of National Defence and, indeed, of the other party to our defence arrangements, the United States government, was a statement made by the Prime Minister who has stated more than once in the discussions we have had on this matter in the house that there is no contradiction between anything he said last Friday and the clarifying statement issued by the Minister of National Defence. No contradiction, the Prime Minister has told us. But the Prime Minister said last Friday, as found on page 3133 of Hansard, that these aircraft, the CF-101 that is referred to in the paragraph in the communique which I read, "title to which will be vested in Canada, will be armed with conventional weapons".

But if you look at the statement by the Minister of National Defence, which no doubt he will clarify further in the course of this discussion, you will find that he says:

So far as NORAD is concerned, Canada has been negotiating with the United States for the past two to three months in order that nuclear warheads will be made available for our two squadrons of Bomarcs and our F-101 interceptors.

That is only one contradiction between the policy as laid down by the Prime Minister and the policy on defence as clarified by the Minister of National Defence, so perhaps in addition to dealing with the statement from Washington the two hon. gentlemen concerned will reconcile their own clarifications, with assistance from the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sevigny). Then the communique goes on to say:

The discussions between the two governments have also involved possible arrangements for the provision of nuclear weapons for Canadian NATO forces in Europe—

That is a straightforward statement.

The discussions between the two governments have also involved possible arrangements for the provision of nuclear weapons for Canadian NATO forces in Europe, similar to the arrangements which the United States has made with many of our NATO allies.

We will expect the Prime Minister or the Minister of National Defence or both to clarify that statement in the light of its relation to statements made by the Prime Minister in the house last Friday. I continue with the communique:

During the debate in the House of Commons various references were made to recent discussions at Nassau.

U.S. State Department Press Release

Now, the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) made a great play on the fact that the conference at Nassau between the United States president and the United Kingdom prime minister had a very direct and definite bearing on Canadian defence policy in NATO and perhaps even, so far as I know, in NORAD.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And all the nations of NATO.

Mr. Pearson: If that happens to be the case, and of course it is not the situation, why is it that the Prime Minister then would make a statement of that kind, which would certainly be a great surprise to the other members of NATO who were not at the conference, and which is not borne out by anything in the Nassau communique from the United Kingdom and the United States. Either the Prime Minister had some secret information which he is disclosing to this house and which the other NATO governments know nothing about, or he is basing his statement on a communique that does not support it.

After all, the United States was a party to this conference and presumably the United States government knows more about the implications of the Nassau agreement between President Kennedy and Prime Minister Macmillan than the Prime Minister of Canada could hope to know, because he did not take part in these discussions. He had lunch with the two leaders but, regrettably, he did not take part in the discussions. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, this paragraph on Nassau has very special significance. It reads:

During the debate in the House of Commons various references were made to recent discussions at Nassau. The agreements made at Nassau have been fully published.

Apparently there are no secret agreements; they have been fully published.

They raise no question of the appropriateness of nuclear weapons for Canadian forces in fulfilling their NATO or NORAD obligations.

The Prime Minister told us that this statement made by one party to these discussions at Nassau is inaccurate. Does he continue to insist on the validity of his own argument that the Nassau communique and the Nassau conversations did have that effect which the United States government says in its communique they did not have?

Then, Mr. Speaker, the second last paragraph of this United States communique reads:

Reference was also made in the debate to the need of NATO for increased conventional forces. A flexible and balanced defence requires increased conventional forces,—

We on this side have said this more than once both in and out of the house.

U.S. State Department Press Release

—but conventional forces are not an alternative to effective NATO or NORAD defence arrangements using nuclear-capable weapons systems.

Perhaps the Prime Minister or the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Harkness) or both hon. gentlemen could comment on the authority for that particular statement. The United States statement continues:

NORAD is designed to defend the North American continent against air attack. The Soviet bomber fleet will remain at least throughout this decade a significant element in the Soviet strike force. An effective continental defence against this common threat is necessary.

Then, the last paragraph reads:

The provision of nuclear weapons to Canadian forces would not involve an expansion of independent nuclear capability, or an increase in the "nuclear club". As in the case of other allies custody of U.S. nuclear weapons would remain with the U.S. joint control fully consistent with national sovereignty can be worked out to cover the use of such weapons by Canadian forces.

Well, Mr. Speaker, this communique is extremely interesting, regardless of the impropriety of issuing it at all, and I claim it was improper to issue it. This is extremely interesting because of the light it throws on the confusions and contradictions of Canadian defence policy. Anyone who has listened to the Prime Minister's statement, to the Minister of National Defence's clarification, to the Secretary of State for External Affairs' (Mr. Green) statements, can understand how confusion can be caused in these matters by these contradictory statements.

May I just refer to one such contradiction? In the statement made by the Prime Minister last Friday, as recorded on page 3127 of Hansard.

—we will act to do those things that will carry out our responsibilities.

I think no one will take any exception to that statement. Then he went on to say, in respect of responsibilities.

We will do nothing to extend the nuclear family.

But having made that statement, on page 3128, the following page, he added this:

—those forces—

He was talking about some of the Canadian forces with NORAD and NATO.

—would have to be equipped, in order to be fully effective, with defensive nuclear weapons if and when the need arose.

The Prime Minister will do nothing to extend the nuclear family but he has accepted, on behalf of the government of Canada, equipment which cannot be effective without nuclear warheads and he is willing to accept those nuclear warheads if and when the need arises.

The Minister of National Defence is a little more specific on this matter. I refer to his statement, no doubt in clarification of the Prime Minister's statement that we will do nothing to extend the nuclear family, when he said:

—our obligations to equip certain weapons systems with nuclear arms are reiterated together with the determination to honour those obligations.

Take your pick, Mr. Speaker, the remarks of the Minister of National Defence or the remarks of the Prime Minister of Canada. How both of these hon. gentlemen can reconcile these contradictory remarks and maintain there is cabinet solidarity is difficult for anyone on this side of the house to understand. The Minister of National Defence brings it all to a conclusion in his clarifying statement when he says this:

Those paragraphs—

He is referring to certain paragraphs in the Prime Minister's speech.

—state a definite policy for the acquisition of nuclear arms.

Well, Mr. Speaker, surely I have said enough to underline the contradictions, the confusions that have been created by the Prime Minister, not by the United States government, in his statement of last Friday. Surely, I have said enough to indicate that if it was improper for the United States to issue this release, as it was, it was equally improper for the Prime Minister of this country to make public the fact that there were negotiations going on between the United States and this government without getting the approval of the other party to the negotiations, and without even informing them of the disclosure.

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock, the house will now proceed to private members' business which is on today's order paper.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I suggest that it would not be inappropriate for me, since there is a motion standing in my name, to request unanimous consent of the house, in view of the importance of this hour, to the suspension of private members' hour between five and six in order that we might continue with this debate?

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Before Christmas, when we were discussing this motion, we asked the hon. member for Essex East if he would agree to the suspension of this hour at a time when important business was being discussed. He said no in a very Scrooge-like manner. I, for one, would not agree to the suspension of this hour.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Closure.

Mr. Speaker: This requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent to the proposal?

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: I regret that there does not appear to be unanimous consent to the adjournment of private members' hour. Therefore, we will proceed with the notice of motion.

FINANCE

CORRESPONDENCE RESPECTING SURCHARGE ORDER IN COUNCIL

The house resumed from Thursday, December 20, 1962, consideration of the motion of Mr. Martin (Essex East):

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this house copies of correspondence or any documents exchanged between the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance or any other minister of the crown and officers of the Department of Justice or the privy council or any other government department or agency on the subject of surcharge and imports order, P.C. 1962-902, dated June 24, 1962, and the amendment to the surcharge and imports order, P.C. 1962-987, dated July 11, 1962, and the import control list as amended by P.C. 1962-903, dated June 24, 1962, with particular reference to the legality of such orders.

Mr. H. F. Jones (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this debate has ranged over fairly wide ground, as hon. members who have been following it will recall, despite the admonitions of Your Honour to restrict it to the question as to whether or not the papers that are called for should be produced.

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I suggest that some of the little private conferences be held elsewhere, or in a lower tone of voice so that we may carry on with the business of the house.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Speaker, when this motion was introduced it was billed before the country as being a matter of the greatest urgency and importance that this question be decided. That has been the tenor and tone of the speeches of members of the official opposition. That position has not been borne out by their actions, however. The question we are being asked to decide today is whether, in the words of the motion, "an humble address should be presented to His Excellency," and the motion continues in these words:

—praying that he will cause to be laid before this house copies of correspondence or any documents exchanged between the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance or any other minister of the crown and officers of the Department of Justice or the privy council or any other government department or agency on the subject of surcharge and imports order, P.C. 1962-902, dated June 24, 1962, and the amendment to the surcharge and imports order, P.C. 1962-987, dated July 11, 1962, and the import control list as amended by P.C. 1962-903, dated June 24, 1962, with particular reference to the legality of such orders.

The mover, when putting this motion, stated what in his opinion was concerned therein. I quote from page 1425 of Hansard for November 9, 1962:

Mr. Speaker, my motion has to do with the production of the opinion of the law officers of the crown on the legality of the government's austerity program, and more particularly the legality of the surcharges on imports order in council.

That is to say, the production of those documents which have some bearing on that legality. That was the situation when this motion was originally introduced by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin).

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Jones: This debate has gone into—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Nicholson) apparently has a question. I did not know whether the parliamentary secretary was willing to yield the floor.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, I would ask the parliamentary secretary if I heard him correctly when he referred to the government's austerity program.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is right; that is what he said.

Mr. Jones: I was quoting from the remarks of the hon. member for Essex East.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): He was wrong, as usual.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Speaker, this debate and the arguments which have been developed in it turn in two directions. One is really not germane to the debate at all and yet there has been a good deal of discussion on it. I refer to the question as to whether these surcharges are in fact legal. I shall later deal with that matter at some length, even though it may appear to be out of order. I shall do so for this reason, that much of the time of the house has been taken up in discussing that very point. I suggest it is really because of the lack of understanding of the point and why it is irrelevant to this debate that hon. members in certain parts of the house have in the past indicated that they would support this motion.

In order that we may deal with this situation comprehensively I should like to draw to the attention of hon. members that the argument for having these documents produced, based on precedent, was completely demolished by my friend the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Smith). He completely demolished the arguments of the hon. member for Essex East and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill). He made a very interesting analysis of the arguments that had been put forward up to that time, and the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Simcoe North have shown completely that there is no precedent worthy of consideration that supports this motion. I should like to refer hon. members to Hansard of November 22, starting at page 1912 and continuing through the remarks of the hon. member for Simcoe North, who made a brilliant speech. Perhaps the ability with which he presented his arguments and the validity of those arguments can be demonstrated by the fact that he was interrupted on no less than 17 occasions by members of the opposition and that on no less than seven occasions Your Honour had to restore order and intervene in the debate, in order to allow the hon. member to continue his remarks.

The arguments of the hon. member for Essex East which were demolished by those put forward by the hon. member for Simcoe North commence at the beginning of the second column of page 1912. He quotes them chapter and verse. I shall quote them in summary so that hon. members may understand that there is no substance at all in the arguments and there is no precedent for the production of these documents. The precedents cited originally by the hon. member for Essex East are as follows. He first referred to an opinion given by the minister of justice in 1935, which is referred to at page 1427 of the current Hansard. As reported on that page, the hon. member for Essex East said:

> Not only did he give without any prodding the opinion of the law officers of the crown but as well he volunteered opinions on the very point in issue which had been tendered by two eminent counsel, namely Mr. W. N. Tilley, K.C. and Mr. Aime Geoffrion, on the very point. Those opinions are now to be found in Hansard for 1935, volume III, at page 3166.

That is the end of the quotation from the remarks of the hon. member for Essex East. Then we have the observations and comment of the hon. member for Simcoe North clearly destroying that argument. He said, as reported at page 1912 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, the opinion of the law officers of the crown on that occasion was not given.

That is the answer to that argument. Then he said:

> There was no request for it. All that was done was that Mr. Guthrie, as reported at page 3166 of volume III of Hansard for 1935 said:

> "The opinion of the law officers of the crown is that clause 5 presents some difficulties."

Then a little further on he said:

> "The opinions of counsel who I have named are summed up in the following statement by Mr. Tilley:"

The hon. member for Essex East had read Mr. Tilley's opinion, he being an independent counsel. This question was pursued in the house on that occasion by the hon. member for Simcoe North, who said:

> On that occasion, notwithstanding what was said by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and the hon. member for Essex East, the opinion of the law officers of the crown was not produced.

It was the same dispute. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) said it was given in the house. My hon. friend from Simcoe North (Mr. Smith) said it was not. The reply given was: "You have just read it." To this the answer, naturally, was that only the substance had been given. That completely disposes of the argument of the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin).

The second precedent the hon. member quoted appears at page 1427 of Hansard for 1962 as follows:

> ...we have as perhaps the most recent precedent in this house the action taken by Mr. St. Laurent when he was minister of justice. In May of 1942 the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cardiff) and the present member for that constituency moved for a copy of all opinions rendered by the Department of Justice with reference to the power of the governor in council to conscript men for service in any theatre of war.

Subsequently Mr. St. Laurent tabled those opinions. The hon. member for Simcoe North effectively disposed of that argument when he referred hon. members to a motion which is to be found on page 2290 of Hansard for 1942. The motion is as follows:

> For a copy of all opinions rendered by the Department of Justice with reference to the power of the governor in council under the War Measures Act to conscript men for service in any theatre of war.

Mr. Cardiff had asked for a copy of all opinions rendered by the Department of Justice with respect to this matter, and Mr. St. Laurent replied:

> I have been advised by the departments of government concerned to say that they do not object to the production of the opinions mentioned in this motion, but it will be done without prejudice to the general rule—

Mr. Pickersgill: On a point of order, I think it is a rule of this house that hon. members must make their own speeches. This is a very short debate, and all the hon. member is doing is reading speeches which have already been made. I suggest this is contrary to the rules and that it is being done solely to prevent a vote.

Mr. Jones: May I say, on that point, that nothing could be farther from the truth than the statement made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. As I said at the beginning of my remarks, I wish to set forth in summary form a complete disposition of the legal arguments made in support of this motion in order to reach as rapidly as possible the issue which was raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I suggest that the objection put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is the real issue which agitates members of the opposition. I wish to point out the consequences which would follow if the view of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was put into practice. I am sure that when we reach that point and get into a discussion of this matter he will agree with me that the interpretation we place upon the situation is a correct one. Meanwhile, I believe I am entitled to place before the house a summary of the arguments already advanced in order that we may move forward to the stage we should all like to reach.

An hon. Member: You have five minutes left.

Mr. Jones: I should like to continue. As I was saying, the second argument raised by the hon. member for Essex East was disposed of by the hon. member for Simcoe North.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Would the hon. member tell us the page from which he is quoting?

Mr. Jones: I have done that. He will find this at page 1913.

Mr. Pickersgill: Get to 1963.

Mr. Jones: The third reference made by the hon. member for Essex East is to some remarks by Mr. Abbott to be found at page 1428 of the current Hansard. The hon. member for Essex East said:

> It was not rejected. As my hon. friend knows, it was an oral opinion. Perhaps by this time my hon. friend understands that it is not possible to produce by way of a document an opinion which has been given orally; that was the situation in 1948.

If hon. members care to refer to Hansard at page 1913 and read there the argument advanced by my hon. friend from Simcoe North they will see that this contention by the hon. member for Essex East was completely demolished.

All this brings me to what is, I think, really behind some of the feeling, on the part of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and others, that these documents should be produced. I think it is fair to say that the underlying sentiment of hon. members who have asked for the production of this document, the basic position taken by them and particularly by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, is that the taxes in question should not have been imposed by the government in the way in which this was done—that, in effect, it was an improper imposition of taxation. I think that is probably a fair summary of the position taken.

Mr. Knowles: Taxation without legislation.

Mr. Pickersgill: Taxation by order in council, which the Prime Minister promised never to do.

Mr. Jones: No. It was not a question of taxation by order in council. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre says, and he has agreed, that the gist of his complaint is that it was taxation which was, in effect, illegal —taxation which should not have been imposed.

Mr. Knowles: Because it was not authorized in any of the statutes.

Mr. Jones: That is the position taken by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and that is the subject to which I wish to draw the attention of hon. members at this time, because I think it is germane to the question whether or not these documents should be produced.

Here I should like to point out to hon. members and especially to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that the legality of these surcharges is a matter for the courts to determine if requested to do so. Various hon. members have observed that since they were imposed millions of dollars have been collected under these charges. They have been collected from companies large and small. If the companies in question had seriously believed that these taxes had been imposed illegally they would surely have made an appeal to the courts, where the matter would have been determined. The provision of the papers referred to in the motion would not decide the question of legality in any way; they would still be nothing more than an expression of opinion alongside which other people could place their opinions. We would get into an interminable wrangle.

Mr. Knowles: Would the hon. member permit a question? Is he aware of the fact that the Prime Minister refused our request to refer this question to the Supreme Court of Canada for a determination as to the legality of the charges?

Mr. Jones: I am aware that the hon. member has made that assertion on a number of occasions, but it does not meet the objection I am raising, because the very people who are directly affected by these taxes, the large companies and others who are involved, could take this matter to court and have the validity of these taxes determined in court, which is the only place where it can be determined. This could be done in accordance with the regular processes of law. However, despite the fact that millions of dollars have been collected under the surcharges since they were first imposed, no company to my knowledge had entered suit in any court in this land to dispute these charges. Even if one or other of the people directly concerned had done this it would not amount to a definite answer, because until decision was reached ultimately this is a question which the courts must decide. As I say, it is open to anybody to dispute the validity of any taxation imposed upon them by the government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paul): I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. H. E. Gray (Essex West): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak very briefly on this particular motion so that the issue can come to a vote this afternoon. I suggest to the hon. member who has just spoken that one important reason why this question has not been submitted to the courts by various business firms involved is that there are still some people in Canada who think that parliament should have the opportunity to discuss and decide matters of importance. That view apparently does not seem to be shared by the so-called government of the day.

Further, I should like to suggest that the fact that I have not interrupted the parliamentary secretary should not be construed by any means as implying that I think his argument is cogent and strong. He seems to think that the arguments of the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. Rynard) some weeks ago gained some weight from the fact that other hon. members made certain interventions. I should not like him to think that my failure to make interventions of that sort implied my belief in the validity of his argument.

The hon. member who has just spoken felt that the arguments of the hon. and learned member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) based on precedent have been completely demolished. He suggested that there is not one precedent worthy of consideration which supports the side of the hon. member for Essex East on this question. I should like to bring something to the attention of the hon. member who has just spoken and to this house. I refer to Hansard for March 10, 1960, page 1929. Apparently the Indian Act was under discussion, and the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) was at that time concerned about 122 Indians who had signed certain taxation waiver exemption forms and whether or not they were going to have these taxation waiver forms invalidated by statute. The then minister of immigration, now the Postmaster General (Mrs. Fairclough), said this—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Would the hon. gentleman make sure that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fleming) is listening?

Mr. Gray: I gathered that due to his long experience in this house he would be listening. I would be most surprised if he would not in view of the importance of this matter; and I am sure that the people of Canada would be most surprised to find that he did not consider this basic question of constitutional law sufficiently important to listen to these remarks at the present time. In any event, Mr. Speaker, the then minister of citizenship and immigration said:

> With your permission, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I have a legal ruling on that point from the Department of Justice and perhaps I might refer to it in order to help the discussion along and so subsequent speakers will not misunderstand. I will read the ruling.

At that point the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) said:

> Could the hon. lady speak a little louder?

Perhaps he was guessing there that these words might have to echo down through the years to this very day.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): We all know the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) is clairvoyant.

Mr. Gray: Clairvoyance is another quality that the hon. member who just spoke seems to lack, along with intelligence, and I sympathize with him for this lack. Then the minister went on:

> This is from the Department of Justice. It reads as follows:
> "... in my opinion, an Indian who has executed such a waiver will enjoy the exemption provided by section 86 (1) of the Indian Act in respect of any liability for tax that would otherwise arise after the day upon which the proposed acts are brought into force by proclamation".

Mr. Speaker, this is not a summary. It is not a conclusion. This is a quotation of the actual words of a law officer of the crown. I realize that the hon. member who has just spoken may not consider this to be a precedent worthy of consideration, and I think he should blush at thinking so little of the opinion taken by a learned minister of the crown. They really should get together and discuss this point, and I think he would have some regard for his colleague in the government of the day. Even though he might not consider this to be a precedent worthy of consideration, I submit to you and to the members of this house that this is a precedent most worthy of consideration. It is certainly worthy because of its recency, and worthy also I think because of its source, the most distinguished and learned Postmaster General, then the minister of citizenship and immigration.

In conclusion—

Mr. Pickersgill: Before the hon. gentleman concludes, would he permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. Gray: Certainly.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could he read the opinion again, because I understood that it had reference to taxation.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Filibuster; repetition.

Mr. Gray: It would be a privilege to accede to the hon. member's request.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Come to a vote.

Mr. Gray: I will conclude in about five minutes and then we will see if this is permitted to come to a vote. This was a matter involving taxation and the minister of citizenship quoted these exact words:

"...in my opinion, an Indian who has executed such a waiver will enjoy the exemption provided by section 86 (1) of the Indian Act—"

etc. It is most interesting to see that the government of the day found it necessary, worth while, appropriate and correct to bring into the house the exact words of an opinion of a law officer of the crown when only 122 individuals were concerned. But it did not have enough consideration and concern for the seriousness of this question when there are 18 million people and $200 million of taxation involved. Therefore, I urge this house to permit this matter to come to a vote immediately and to vote in favour of the motion of the hon. member for Essex East.

(Translation):

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should like to emphasize some points of interest concerning the motion now under discussion.

As our distinguished Minister of Finance (Mr. Nowlan) already mentioned in the house a few weeks ago, one can readily realize, just by reading the motion introduced by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) this afternoon, that it is drafted in too general terms.

First of all, we note that the hon. member for Essex East is asking:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this house copies of correspondence or any documents exchanged between the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance or any other minister of the crown and officers of the Department of Justice or the privy council or any other government department or agency on the subject of surcharge and imports order, P.C. 1962-902, dated June 24, 1962, and the amendment to the surcharge and imports order, P.C. 1962-987, dated July 11, 1962.

An hon. Member: Would the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Grafftey: Let me read the motion first.

(Text):

An hon. Member: We can all read it.

(Translation):

Mr. Grafftey:

—and the import control list as amended by P.C. 1962-903, dated June 24, 1962, with particular reference to the legality of such orders.

At the very end, the hon. member states the following:

—with particular reference to the legality of such orders.

If we read this motion carefully, we note that even though the hon. member mentions at the end the legality of such orders, the motion is obviously too vague and thus unacceptable to the government.

Now for the second principle I want to bring up this afternoon. It is also easy to see that it would be impossible for a government to administer the country's business if it were obliged, each time the opposition requests it, to communicate to the house advice received from various government officials, either verbally or in writing.

I am convinced that the hon. member for Essex East, who has been here a long time, is well aware that documents giving such advice to the government are privileged.

Third, those opinions, as has been said many times in the house, are given usually to the government by the attorney general of our country.

The fourth principle I want to bring up has already been established by the Minister of Finance, namely that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fleming) is not obliged to give legal opinions to the house. He does not even have the right to do so. In that respect, I refer you to Todd, volume 1, page 576.

(Text):

In continuing may I say this. While I cannot be too precise in this instance, I myself as parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance well remember the following incident. When I say I cannot be too precise, what I mean is this. It was either in answer to an ordinary written question or a starred question that I tabled in this house not so long ago matters concerning the legal opinion offered by the officer involved. I should like to simply state this. The hon. member for Essex East has, just at the end of his motion requesting the production of these papers, inserted the expression, "with particular reference to the legality of such order". I know that one may not impute motives in debate, and in the truest sense of the word I am not doing that. However, I should like to say that it is my opinion that what the hon. member really desires in this debate is this. I am not quite sure that he desires it today, but when this motion was originally conceived he perhaps desired a full dress debate on the surcharges as such. Now that we have today the results which these surcharges have had—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I disabuse my hon. friend's mind. I want two things. I want the legal opinion—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend has invited this intervention. I want the legal opinion on which the government's action was based. Also, as a member of this house, I want the right to pass on a decision of the government of Canada to impose taxation to the extent of $200 million on the people of Canada.

Mr. Grafftey: I will answer that statement in two very brief sentences. If that is all the hon. member wanted, why did he not word his motion in that way? It has been suggested time and time again in this house that the motion is far too general. He says that is what he wants at the very tail end of his motion. However, I suggest that what the hon. member says he wants now and what he says he wants in the motion are two entirely different things.

An hon. Member: Double talk.

Mr. Grafftey: I suggest that this is one of the many reasons why the government cannot accept this motion. In its original concept in drafting it is far too general.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. Grafftey: I have been trying to answer the question of the hon. member of Essex East. As to the second question he asked, may I say that he has had offered by the deputy attorney general of Canada an opinion that the action taken by the government was legal.

Mr. Pickersgill: Where is it?

Mr. Grafftey: I have already cited, as has the Minister of Justice in a previous debate, and as have my colleagues time and time again in this particular debate in the house, precedent after precedent to the effect that advice, written or otherwise, given to members of the government by senior officials or ordinary officials is normally considered to be privileged.

Mr. Pickersgill: What about the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration?

Mr. Gray: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Grafftey: I should like to finish answering one before attempting to answer another.

Mr. Gray: I have not asked it yet.

Mr. Grafftey: The hon. member may ask his question later. I should like to say this, Mr. Speaker. The fact that this whole question has been raised by the hon. member for Essex East surprises me. Just the other day a very honourable and distinguished member of the other place in years gone by, before the present administration formed the government, said that the Liberal administration was forming a veritable establishment in this country. While we have often differed, I have always considered that the hon. member for Essex East is one of the men opposite on the front benches, who have what I call a feeling for parliament, and perhaps he is the only one. That is why it surprised me that he should raise this question. That is why it surprised me that he of all people should bring this question forward.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman seems to be on a flight of fancy. Would he permit my question?

Mr. Grafftey: I am dwelling on a principle which means a great deal to me. I know it does not mean too much to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the hon. member answer my question? It has to do with a matter of principle. The hon. gentleman said the motion was too vague. Will the hon. gentleman, as the representative of the Minister of Finance to whom this advice was given, say that the particular piece of advice about the legality of these surcharges will be tabled voluntarily?

Mr. Grafftey: I think the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate must recognize the fact that this would be a government decision and that I have no authority whatsoever in the matter.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the hon. gentleman ask his minister the next time he sees him?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I would ask the hon. gentleman to have a little bit of feeling for parliament.

Mr. Grafftey: I should like to go back to an old point that I have often raised previously in this House of Commons. It surprises some people. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, as a former clerk of the privy council, had a great understanding about the government when he was a clerk of the privy council. It is no wonder that he has such a great understanding of the workings of government. I am not sure whether I am on firm ground when I say this but I believe that the clerk of the privy council was and is today the senior civil servant. I could be corrected on that matter, but that is an opinion that I have.

Mr. Pickersgill: Instead of giving opinions on this subject I think the parliamentary secretary should confine himself to the motion. I think I should draw Your Honour's attention to the fact that, up until now or until the distinguished parliamentary secretary began to speak, this debate has been restricted to discussion of whether or not these documents should be produced. When he starts to go into the history of the privy council or the biography of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, I think the distinguished parliamentary secretary wanders a long way from the motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paul): I am greatly interested in the remarks made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. If he thinks that the hon. member who has the floor is out of order, may I ask his cooperation and that of all hon. members in abstaining from asking questions that are out of order.

Mr. Grafftey: I should just like to return to my original thesis.

My original thesis was simply this, that if any of the hon. members on the front bench opposite had a feeling for parliament it was the hon. member for Essex East. The hon. member for Essex East often asks me why I left the Liberal party.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes.

Mr. Grafftey: Among many reasons, as a young man—

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paul): Order I think the hon. member is straying very far from the motion under study. I believe there are members who are interested in speaking on this motion and I am sure he will try to bring his remarks back to the motion.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will my hon. friend permit me to ask him a question? Is it not a fact that he has already spoken in this debate?

Mr. Grafftey: I do not believe so.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think he has, and if he has then I regret to say that my hon. friend does not have the right to continue.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): A painful interruption.

Mr. Grafftey: It is certainly my belief that I have not spoken in this debate. I intended to be very brief in putting across this point of principle and if I seem to be out of order it is because of the numerous interruptions which have caused me to take a longer time to get my point across. It is simply this. I felt that the hon. member for Essex East, unlike some of his colleagues on the front bench who confuse parliamentary principle with bureaucratic control, at least had a feeling for parliament, and that is why I am surprised that under any pretense he should believe it is a good idea to make public an opinion such as the one he wants made public.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is an argument for bureaucracy you are making.

Mr. Grafftey: I can only suggest in all sincerity that over the last number of weeks we have seen in the House of Commons the opposition trying to—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Habel: Trying to get information.

Mr. Matheson: Trying to bring the facts before parliament.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I should like to be heard and if there are points of order I would ask that they not be made from members' seats. This is closure by noise, Mr. Speaker. If there are any points of order, let them be brought forward. I wish hon. members would do so.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sure you do.

Mr. Grafftey: I should simply like to say that I am not sure the once great Liberal party has points of principle, points of real doctrine, that they can bring before the House of Commons.

Mr. Matheson: May I ask a question?

Mr. Grafftey: We have seen motions of this nature brought before the Canadian House of Commons. We have seen attempts by hon. members opposite to try to defeat the government on little procedural matters.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We did today.

(Translation):

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paul): Order. The hon. member must not attribute motives to the mover of this motion. The wording of the motion speaks for itself. I expect that when he continues the hon. member will obey the rules and stay within the limits of the debate.

(Text):

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I am only bringing to the attention of the house that the very way this motion is worded makes me feel that what is really wanted—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Grafftey: Hon. members are saying "order". The fact is that this motion asks for one thing, and less than ten minutes ago the hon. member for Essex East rose and said that he wanted something else. What are we expected to believe? If this is the case, then I have every right to imply, not knowing what they really want, what I believe they really want and that is a broad and general debate on the surcharges.

Mr. Pickersgill: Hear, hear. Let us have it.

Mr. Grafftey: That is not what the motion asks for. The motion is far too general and that is one of the reasons why the government cannot accept it. I would suggest that hon. members opposite think about getting down to the real business of governing Canada. The people of Canada want us to get down to the nation's business and forget these procedural matters.

Mr. Matheson: It is about time.

Mr. Grafftey: The people of Canada want us to get down to the major business of the house and put our national interests before party interests.

Mr. McIlraith: Why does the government not do that?

An hon. Member: Liberal obstruction.

(Translation):

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paul): Order. I do not know of any changes in the rules of this house, and the one I read is to the effect that only one member, at a time, can speak. Therefore, I am sure that everyone will understand that the member who has the floor at this time is the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey).

(Text):

Mr. Grafftey: The fact that the hon. member for Essex East says that he wants one thing and the motion asks for another leads me to believe that hon. members opposite do not know what they want. This is another reason why we cannot accept the motion. When in the history of parliament has a government accepted a motion from an opposition that did not know what it really wanted?

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paul).]

I suggest that this motion shows that members opposite would like to defeat the government at any cost, not on a question of principle because they have forgotten what principles are.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether I might ask the hon. gentleman a question? Does he think there is any higher principle than the right of parliament, and parliament alone, to tax?

Mr. Grafftey: Parliament is the voice of the people, and the voice of the people of Canada today is saying to parliament: Get on with the nation's business and do not present such phony motions to the house in an effort to defeat the government on procedural niceties. If parliament truly reflected that spirit today, if hon. members opposite were listening to the people of Canada they would not be presenting such fractious motions to parliament. That is why I have every right to voice cynicism when hon. members opposite ask for one thing in a motion and then another thing on the floor of the house. I suggest to hon. members that they get together and decide what they really want. Then the government can at least begin to consider whether or not it can accept their motions. For these reasons, which I have attempted to outline amid many interruptions, it is absolutely impossible for the government to consider accepting such a motion.

(Translation):

Mr. Real Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, we just heard the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) discuss the order or orders in council passed by the government on June 24, July 11 and again on June 24, 1962. I wonder why the government persists in not tabling in the house the correspondence asked for by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin).

It seems to me that this request is a usual and normal one which should help and inform every member of this house.

Here is what is asked for in that notice of motion:

> That an humble address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this house copies of correspondence or any documents exchanged between the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance or any other minister of the crown and officers of the Department of Justice or the privy council or any other government department or agency on the subject of surcharge and imports order—

The surcharge on imports might be of some value but we believe that it would be preferable, instead of imposing a surcharge, to grant a compensated discount on products made in Canada as an incentive for Canadians to buy our own production.

Nevertheless, we would like to know what correspondence was exchanged concerning that "surcharge on imports".

—P.C. 1962-902, dated June 24, 1962, and the amendment to the surcharge and imports order, P.C. 1962-987, dated July 11, 1962, and the import control list as amended by P.C. 1962-903, dated June 24, 1962—

We go to July and we come back to June. That is somewhat the game the Liberals played for 22 years in Canada, going forward and coming back after.

—with particular reference to the legality of such orders.

It is a matter of legality. It is also a matter of receiving the appropriate documents, the documents or correspondence in respect to those orders.

We, of the Social Credit party, believe that even if there is here a point of law on which lawyers can fight, in the first place, even before this motion or request for correspondence and orders is passed, we should ensure that an incentive system to help production in our own country is established.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paul): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but it seems to me that his remarks are out of order since we are considering a motion for the tabling of some documents. I do not think that on this occasion it is in order to discuss the advisability of applying this or that measure.

Therefore, I ask the hon. member to limit his remarks to the wording of the motion under study.

Mr. Caouette: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will restrict myself to the wording of the motion.

Like the hon. member for Essex East, we ask that all the documents required to inform the house about the surcharge or about any surcharge whatever on imports coming either from the United States or from any other country in the world be tabled, so that the members may know exactly how they stand regarding these orders in council of June 24 and July 11.

(Text):

Some hon. Members: Question, question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paul): The hon. member for York-Humber.

Mr. Cowan: I will gladly yield the floor for the question.

Mr. Pigeon: He wants to speak.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I think the hon. member for York-Humber should be heard. He has been trying to get the floor for quite a few minutes.

Mr. R. B. Cowan (York-Humber): I appreciate the opportunity of saying a few words on this matter of producing the opinion of the deputy attorney general, particularly on this last day of the month of January which is named after the two-faced god Janus who, as you know, looked both ways.

I should like to point out that five years ago this very month there was an opinion of the deputy minister of trade and commerce being bandied around this house. The then minister of finance, now the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fleming), was screaming that the Liberal party had concealed the facts. It was not enough that they concealed advice they received from competent sources; it was not enough—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paul): Order; the hon. member cannot choose this time to make a political statement.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Benidickson: He is giving a precedent.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paul): I am sure the hon. member will try, after his introduction, to make his remarks relevant to the motion.

Mr. Cowan: My reference was to page 3568 of Hansard for January 21, 1958. I am a new member in the house, but I was present on October 9 and again on November 8 when the Minister of Justice made a remark which I consider ridiculous in commenting on this situation. I quote:

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, on the subject of the validity and legality of these orders in council let me say that the government has proceeded on the highest advice, and that the legality of these orders is not questioned unless hon. members choose to question the opinion of the deputy attorney general of Canada.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Benidickson: You are just running scared.

Mr. Speaker: The hour appointed for private members' business having expired, the house will now revert to the business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

U.S. STATE DEPARTMENT PRESS RELEASE—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 26

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson for the adjournment

U.S. State Department Press Release of the house under standing order 26 for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely: the statement made last night by the U.S. department of state contradicting the recent statements of the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence, concerning the joint defence arrangements of the Canadian and United States governments.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, in my remarks this afternoon I was asking the Canadian government to take advantage of this motion to discuss Canadian defence policy, and in doing so to examine, if it so desires, the United States government statement which, I repeat, should not have been issued in the first place but which, having been issued, is a further link in the chain of evidence which exposes the confusions, the contradictions, the weakness and the indecision of Canadian defence policy today as part of continental, and indeed collective, defence policy. The reason we on this side of the house believe that such a discussion is a matter of urgent importance, and the reason we are joined in this opinion by two of the three other parties in this house, has nothing to do with United States opinions about Canadian policies which may be implied in that statement. As I have said, such an expression of opinion in these circumstances was unwarranted and unjustified. I know that the United States government had plenty of provocation. It had before it the spectacle of the government which had joined with it in continental defence, the government which had made in July, 1957 the NORAD agreement with it, apparently publicly divided about matters which were of course of close concern to the United States, with the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) saying one thing and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Harkness) saying something else, with the Minister of National Defence apparently engaged in negotiations with the United States to carry out his policy, and the Prime Minister disclosing these confidential negotiations last Friday but certainly not explaining them.

However, Mr. Speaker, whatever the provocation, two wrongs do not make a right and to the extent that it expressed or implied opinions, the United States government was wrong in making this public statement. But the primary interest of this house is not in the opinions of the United States government. Our interest lies in finding out the facts for and about Canada, the facts as to what is the present defence policy of this Canadian government. The Prime Minister has told one story, the Minister of National Defence has told another; the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green) and the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sevigny) sit silent. It is left to our neighbour and ally to tell yet another story, one much closer to that of the Minister of National Defence than to the Prime Minister's, but different in important respects from both. We want the facts, Mr. Speaker, all the facts, about the defence policy of Canada.

The Canadian people have the right to know. If our allies want to know too, as they apparently do, that is natural in a coalition, but it is secondary. It is of first importance however that the Canadian people know. Any government that evades any longer telling them, that evades saying what are its own policies in this vital matter, is guilty of neglect of its duty to the Canadian people.

This motion, which the government opposed, does give the government another chance to tell us now. However, Mr. Speaker, it will not be helpful, to say the least—and it could be harmful—if, instead of doing this, government spokesmen retreat into cheap slanders about the motives of those of us on this side in the statements that we make on defence. So far as my own motives are concerned, I will let the record speak about my service to my country, and of my pride in that service over the many years as a Canadian, but as one who knows that service to Canada cannot be divorced from service to peace and to freedom. These irritating but idle slanders, Mr. Speaker, are merely a smokescreen for those who wish to obscure their own defaults and take people's minds off the serious problems which we face in this country today and which we must solve. It would be a sorry day for us all if we allowed—or, even worse, if we encouraged—differences and disputes between our two countries to weaken, and perhaps even destroy, the good neighbourhood which we have built up over the years and which of course has had to stand, and will have to stand, many strains. It is now more essential than ever that both countries, as partners in a coalition of other free and democratic nations for peace and progress, preserve and strengthen that good neighbourhood inside the coalition in which the United States alone have the power to give the leadership that is required—I pray that it also has the wisdom—in that coalition in which Canada has played and, I hope, will continue to play, a good and responsible part. I do not propose, and we on this side do not propose, to do anything which would blur or weaken that part. Whenever the western alliance is weakened and divided, only Moscow and Peking are happy; and there are sombre signs of such a division in Europe today. I hope they will disappear. In any event, let us not carry this division across the Atlantic or do anything which would injure good relations on this continent. At least, let us make sure that if this is done we do not have any responsibility on our side of the border for that deterioration.

It was said this afternoon that Canada and Canadians are not going to be pushed around by anyone. Of course we are not. Canada will manage its own affairs. But we cannot do this in isolation from our friends or by quarrelling needlessly with them. Canada first, yes: The right kind of nationalism is a healthy and strong thing in the building of a country. Canada first, yes: But to say "Canada only" would be wrong and impossible. Let us be mature enough to accept both these guides for conduct in our relations with the United States of America and with our other friends. If our two countries sharing this continent, so close together in so many ways, cannot maintain a solid structure of friendship and close co-operation founded on respect for each other's national identity and national independence, then ideed there is little hope for peace, security and progress in the troubled world of today. I say this: in defence and in everything else we can stand up for Canada, as we will; we can protect our rights and safeguard our interests, as we will. But I insist on believing we can do this while maintaining close and good relations with our neighbours. As Canadians—and all members of the house are Canadians and proud to be Canadians—we on this side will do our best to avoid any such disastrous results coming from any temporary differences which may exist between our two countries and which, I do believe, by good sense, moderation and understanding on both sides, can easily be solved.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): The debate in which we are taking part today is an example of sheer pettiness and petty politics at their worst. To me, the whole thing smacks of hypocrisy. I cannot help but go back in my mind to the middle of last June when we were told that the financial situation of Canada was better than it had ever been—that there was nothing wrong with it. I recall that on June 20 or June 21, just after the election, there was a television forum in Ottawa at which the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton) came out from a cabinet meeting and joined us in the forum. In the course of that program he declared that Canada was in better shape than it had ever been before. The very next day, the austerity program was announced and news of the financial crisis was made known.

I am concerned at this time because, once again, the people of Canada are being deceived as to the actual facts, not only by the government but also by the official opposition. This is why the people in Canada are getting fed up with politics in running the management of their affairs. Certainly, in a question as important as defence the people of Canada and their representatives in this house deserve to know what are the actual facts of this situation. To me this is something which should not be political. It should transcend political barriers because it is something with which every one of us is vitally concerned if we are to fulfil our own obligations and responsibilities to our country. What we really want here tonight is a statement of what really is the defence policy of the government of this country. What we need to do is to lift this thing out of the political muck it has got into and set it up according to principle; to state what is our principle as far as defence policy is concerned. This is what the people of Canada expect from this house and from this government. It is our obligation to fulfil this responsibility to our electorate.

I am disturbed by a number of things which have been said. We find that the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Pearson) is accused of having gone down to the United States to get advice to guide his policy. But what is the difference between that and going to have a meeting with the President of the United States to find out what should be done? What we need to do is to lay down Canadian policy. Leave politics out of it, and let us bring this debate up to the level where it should be. It is not so much a question of Canadian policies which are in opposition to United States policy. That is not what is involved in this document issued by the U.S. state department last night. The real issue is simply this: what is our policy —what is the Canadian policy, not the American policy? That is why, if we are going to blame this on the United States, although in this case I believe they were entirely wrong in how they did it, we should be careful how we proceed. I believe the real key to this situation which has developed between the United States and Canada—and these things ought not to happen, because the United States is our friend whether we like it or not—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

U.S. State Department Press Release

Mr. Thompson: The first line of defence in this nation, if there should ever come a day when there is the danger of invasion from without, would be carried by the United States of America, again, whether we like it or not.

Coming back to the issue, it seems to me that we should not and cannot make this question of defence a political football. It is not difficult or should not be difficult to define a defence policy for this country. I do not find it so difficult. Let us face up to a few facts and have the courage to put them down and state them, and get rid of this uncertainty. Let us pull this matter out of the realm of emotions we are playing to today. There are other things more important than that. That is why I am convinced, and I am still convinced even though the Prime Minister says it cannot be done, that we should have a defence committee composed of representatives from each of the parties. It need not be a policy making committee. I agree that the final policy is the responsibility of the government. Certainly, if we had such a committee, we would never be in the mess we are today because together we would have carried the responsibility and together met the question posed as a result of what happened last night. I am not alone in saying that this should be done because I hear it from across the country. I picked up a paper of the city last night, the Ottawa Citizen, and read an editorial which said that at no time more than in the past two years had it been so apparent that parliament should either set up a committee to examine the country's defence policy, or that the government should issue a white paper on its defence program. The article went on to say that it is not necessary that a committee make policy, that only the government could do that, but that a committee could define the policy that does exist.

An hon. Member: If it exists.

Mr. Thompson: The editorial said that a white paper could serve the same purpose; that the nation would then have a basis for discussion of the government's defence policy. This, to me, makes a lot of sense, and I think this would be the logical action to take.

Instead, what do we have? We have delay. We have confusion. Yes, and we have deceit; and on top of that we have frustration across the whole country. We see this spectacle of a government where the minister of external affairs follows one pattern of policy, and carries it through very determinedly and with a good deal of conviction. We see on the other side the minister of defence with another policy, and I believe he carries that through with an equal amount of conviction as to what the facts really are. And in between we have the Prime Minister walking a tightrope and trying to balance between the two. If I were the minister of defence it seems to me that the only thing left to do would be to quit, and maybe that would not be a bad suggestion. He would not be the first one in the cabinet to do that. In fact, I suggest to him that he could go out to his home province and probably take over the leadership of his party, because certainly the present leader is making a shambles of it. I am not a lawyer and certainly not a criminal lawyer, but nevertheless I could find a precedent not too far away which he could follow on that matter.

I think that this brings us back to the point that we are in a position of indecision and confusion because we are not being told the facts of the case. Let us go back for a few moments to the document of last night. I find it very interesting to read in the third paragraph that—

> —in 1958 the Canadian government decided to adopt the Bomarc-B weapons systems. Accordingly two Bomarc-B squadrons were deployed to Canada where they would serve the double purpose of protecting Montreal and Toronto as well as the U.S. deterrent force. The Bomarc-B was not designed to carry any conventional warhead.

If it were not designed to carry any conventional warhead, and if it were brought here to defend Toronto and Montreal, for goodness sakes what are we thinking of? It means only this, that we intended to put nuclear warheads on them; and whether we have any written commitment or not, we have a moral commitment to put nuclear warheads on the Bomarc-B missiles because we spent $700 million of the taxpayers money to bring them here, and other carriers as well—to do what? Was it to dig a hole in the ground or to give our pilots some planes to fly? No. We did it because we had a moral obligation. The statement continues:

> The matter of making available a nuclear warhead for it and for other nuclear-capable weapons systems acquired by Canada has been the subject of inconclusive discussions between the two governments. The installation of the two Bomarc-B batteries in Canada without nuclear warheads was completed in 1962.

Then comes another point when we read on a little further. The statement says:

> The discussions between the two governments have also involved possible arrangements for the provision of nuclear weapons for Canadian NATO forces in Europe, similar to the arrangements which the United States has made with many of our other NATO allies.

As I read this statement, I find that no legal commitments on paper have been made. I cannot understand the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Pearson) saying that we must fulfil our commitments. Yes, we have a moral commitment to do so, but as far as this document is concerned there is no written commitment. If we are going to say that we must have these weapons in order to fulfil our commitments and because we are advised by the military on the United States side that we should have them, then we are as hypocritical as they are and are deceiving the Canadian people or trying to make them think that we have something which we do not have. This is the matter which is confusing. I think that what we must do and is our obligation to do is to clarify the picture, and it is the responsibility of the government to clarify it. That is all we want. It is only then that we can in any effective way deal with this statement which has been issued by the United States defence department.

Mr. Speaker, let us go back a little bit. Last week we were supposed to have a full opportunity to discuss Canada's defence policies. When the estimates of the Department of External Affairs were brought up for examination, the Prime Minister announced that this action was being taken to provide a full scale debate on foreign affairs and defence. And yet we did not hear one word from the minister of defence. We never heard one word from the associate minister of defence. All we heard was an attempt by the confused minister of defence to define what the Prime Minister said. In his speech, which went on for an hour and 50 minutes or something like that the Prime Minister gave a very capable display of tearing the leader of the official opposition to pieces, without giving any clear statement of policy from the Prime Minister. This again is not good enough.

The disappointment about this debate was that the minister of external affairs lost his voice during his opening remarks, and he did not in fact say anything about Canada's defence policy, either. He merely reviewed the world situation and Canada's activities in the United Nations. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Harkness) did not make any contribution; nor did the associate minister. This was frustrating to us, as we tried intelligently to understand what was the government's policy. The Prime Minister got into the debate late on the last day, and while he spoke for a long time, again I say that he did not clarify the government's policy. He did not tell us what our commitments were or even what he felt our responsibilities were. Again it is not only myself who is confused. I find in the Ottawa Citizen for January 23 an article by Norman Campbell which says that confusion is added to what actually happened at Nassau and the statements that were made, in light of what the Prime Minister had said. Yet we find in this communique that it said clearly in relation to the U.S. State Department Press Release Nassau discussions that there should not be any doubt about what these conclusions were; that was stated very definitely and clearly.

Later the state department of the United States issued a press release. This press release has stated that Canada has given certain commitments and is taking part in certain negotiations with the United States in regard to the joint effort of defending this country both in NATO and in North America, but that we have not provided armaments with which to discharge those responsibilities. I am sure that if the government had only clarified its responsibilities when we had our discussion the other day, this situation would never have come about. It is therefore unfortunate indeed that we must now witness a repetition of bewilderment and deceit. I can forgive mistakes and I think we will agree on that matter. We can even forgive and forget instances of poor judgment. However, we cannot forgive deceit or the withholding of information or the giving of impressions other than those which accord with the actual facts in matters as important as national defence policy and those things which relate to our foreign policy.

I come back again to this editorial in last night's Citizen. A little further down I read as follows:

> Mr. Diefenbaker has described his statement on defence as "very direct, very clear, and very comprehensive". If that were a television commercial on behalf of his own speech, he might stand accused of using misleading advertising. It is high time the confusion on this important national issue were dissipated.

This is just where we stand and this is where I think we must come back again to the very point with which I started out, namely that we must lift this thing up to a principle level and must state what our policy is. We owe it to our Canadian people. We owe it to our own nation. Then and only then can we deal properly with the United States and our joint responsibilities with her in the defence of the country.

I look across at the Leader of the Opposition and again I repeat that he is a man who has been respected not only in this country but throughout the world for his understanding of and contribution to international affairs. It is a shame that his record must be blurred by the same kind of thing of which he accuses the Prime Minister. I read from his statement made last Friday in which he says we actually have made commitments and that therefore we must stand by those commitments. Yet when the truth comes out today, we find that we do not have those commitments. Is he trying to justify himself with regard to what he has said, instead of coming to grips with the problem and assisting us to come out of this maze of confusion and uncertainty in which we find ourselves?

U.S. State Department Press Release

This is the situation before us. The reason why we are in this particular discussion tonight is that the government of the United States has become exasperated at our indecisiveness and our unwillingness to go along with what is apparent responsibility, whether it be in the form of moral or written commitments. While again I do not agree with the manner in which they did it, I feel they have been obliged to come out and to clarify for us what our commitments are. This situation is wrong. Thus I believe we in the opposition parties have come here representing what is the general feeling across this country tonight, namely that we want to know what the policy of the government is.

An hon. Member: Would you understand it if you did know what it is?

Mr. Thompson: Such statements are just typical of more of the petty politics we have here, and the less we have of them the better. Again may I say that what we want is a statement of government policy or else a demonstration from the government that they are willing to come down and work out what seem to be legitimate and sound policies for the defence of our country, not only through what we have within ourselves in our own ability to develop but also that which we share with the United States for the overall defence of this continent.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, this debate has been precipitated by a press release which was issued by the United States state department yesterday. All parties in this house have gone on record as regretting and resenting this interference in what is a matter of public debate in the House of Commons and something which should be settled by the people of Canada alone. However, Mr. Speaker, we ought not to allow any feeling of resentment to cause us to lose our sense of perspective with regard to this matter. I think we have a right to tell the Americans that we will decide this matter for ourselves. But even this course need not interfere with the good relations between Canada and the United States. We have strong bonds of blood, language and trade as well as common ideals of justice, democracy and liberty which will always bind us closely together.

The Leader of the Opposition made a great play with regard to the importance of friendship between these two neighbouring countries. With that sentiment all of us will agree. However, I submit that independence of thought and expression need not mean division. In the communist bloc where a group of satellites are held in thrall by the Soviet union, obedience is the watchword. However, in the west we have always prided ourselves on the fact that what we have is a free association of free people and that where there is a free association of free people we should have the right to express our differences of opinion. This ought not to diminish our friendship. As a matter of fact, it is sometimes easier to tell your neighbour and your friend to mind his own business than it is to tell a stranger to do so. That is all we have tried to do today, without in any way meaning that we are seeking to divide these two nations in the many things which they have in common.

Independence in matters of international affairs is something for which the Canadian people have struggled over the years. There was in our history a time when we were still tied to London by strings of colonialism. Men like Sir Robert Borden in the first world war and Right Hon. Mackenzie King at the beginning of the second world war insisted that Canada had a right to make its own decisions and that we did not take instructions from Whitehall. In the second half of the twentieth century it is equally important that, without being offensive, we can say that we are not prepared to take instructions either from the pentagon or Whitehall.

What I resent most about the statement which was issued yesterday by the state department of the United States is not just that it criticized the head of a government of a friendly country but that it sought to put pressure on the Canadian people to adopt a policy with which I disagree. But irrespective of whether I disagree with it or not, it is a policy which the Canadian people have the right to adopt or reject on their own, without interference by others.

The second thing I think we should keep in mind is that this statement which was issued yesterday simply points up the fact that the Canadian government has not been straightforward and honest in acquainting the Canadian people regarding its intentions concerning the acquisition of nuclear arms. This afternoon the Prime Minister said that this statement from Washington would in no way change the government's statement. As I said this afternoon, which statement? We have had two policies enunciated by the government and all this furore has been because we are trying to get the government to come down on one side or the other so that the Canadian people will know what our policy is in respect of the acquisition of nuclear arms.

Over the years this government has accepted commitments to acquire equipment and planes which were virtually useless unless they were equipped with nuclear warheads. Yet the government has continued to give the impression that even though they were buying this equipment no irrevocable decision had been made to acquire these nuclear warheads. Always the suggestion has been thrown out that "some time in the future we will be able to make this decision". What we have really been doing is to spend hundreds of millions of dollars of the taxpayers' money buying equipment which is worthless if we do not accept nuclear warheads, and which puts us into the nuclear club if we do.

The Prime Minister himself put on the record last Friday his well known statement at Brockville during the election campaign where he said:

> We shall not, so long as we are pursuing the ways of disarmament, allow the extension of the nuclear family into Canada ... We do not intend to allow the spread of nuclear arms beyond the nations which now have them.

That seems a very clearcut statement. Now we find as a result of the statement that was made first by the Prime Minister and then by the Minister of National Defence, and now by the state department, that negotiations are going on at the present time to acquire nuclear arms even though the prospects for disarmament are much brighter now than they have been for some time.

Let me point out some of the inconsistencies. In his statement last Friday the Prime Minister, as found on page 3128 of Hansard, said:

> In 1958, when the Bomarc was first laid down as a plan, the great challenge to North America was believed to be bombers carrying bombs ... Today that is changed. More and more there is a phasing out in connection with the bomber threat as more and more intercontinental ballistic missiles are increasing in number.

That statement by the Prime Minister is supported by the statement which appeared in today's press containing an announcement made by Mr. McNamara, secretary of state for defence in Washington yesterday. Mr. McNamara said:

> Bomarc anti aircraft missiles, which cost the United States about $2 billion, have only a limited life. These weapons suffer from the same defects as manned interceptors, vulnerability to ballistic missile attack. But because the United States already has paid for its eight Bomarc sites, the Bomarc system will be continued for several years. Canada has two Bomarc squadrons, but no nuclear warheads for them.

In the same statement Mr. McNamara said:

> The main continental concentration must be in defence against the expanding intercontinental missile threat. The United States is moving ahead with research on a more advanced form of anti-missile defence known as the Nike-X, but there will be no production until the system is able to discriminate between a real nuclear missile and a decoy.

If it is true that the Bomarc has a very short life, a very limited effectiveness, and

U.S. State Department Press Release

that manned bombers are no longer a real threat, then it seems to me the government ought to tell us why it is that they now propose, according to the Minister of National Defence, to negotiate agreements to accept nuclear warheads for them. In the same speech of last Friday the Prime Minister made this significant statement:

> More and more the nuclear deterrent is becoming of such a nature that more nuclear arms will add nothing materially to our defences. Greater and greater emphasis must be placed on conventional arms and conventional forces.

I ask the house to consider that statement in the light of the statements which were made by the Minister of National Defence and by the state department. As found on page 3136 of Hansard the Prime Minister said:

> Delivery of the F-104G has commenced, but the strike reconnaissance role has been placed under doubt by the recent Nassau declaration concerning nuclear arms...

He went on to say:

> It will be necessary, therefore, at this meeting in May, for Canada to give consideration to this matter and we will, in co-operation with the nations of NATO, undertake a clarification of our role in NATO defence plans and disposition.

In the light of these statements let us look now at what the Minister of National Defence said. I must say in passing that to the best of my knowledge this is the first time that 72 hours after a prime minister has made an important statement on policy in parliament one of his ministers has found it necessary to issue a statement of clarification and interpretation and to make it outside of the house where he could not be questioned or interrogated on the matter. The Minister of National Defence, referring to page 3136 of Hansard for January 25, sums up the Prime Minister's statement by saying:

> Those paragraphs state a definite policy for the acquisition of nuclear arms in these terms.

That certainly is not the impression that those of us who listened to the speech or those of us who read it carefully clause by clause next day got from it. The Minister of National Defence then sums up the three paragraphs and says:

> First, our obligations to equip certain weapons systems with nuclear arms are reiterated, together with the determination to honour those obligations.

What obligations? This is what we want to know; what are the obligations? If the Canadian government decides to commit Canada into the nuclear club, then the Canadian people ought to know it. They ought to know what obligations have been assumed. If the minister says we are going to honour those obligations, then this parliament and the people of this country ought to know what it is we are going to honour, and what it is we are going to do. The minister who says we are going to honour these obligations has not yet spoken in parliament, although we have been sitting for months, to tell us what our obligations are.

Second, that the strike reconnaissance role of the F-104's has been placed in some doubt by the recent Nassau declaration, as well as other developments in the defence field; thus, it is necessary for Canada to seek, on the part of NATO, a clarification of her role in NATO defence plans and dispositions; this clarification to be provided when the NATO ministerial meeting is held in Canada next May. Should NATO reaffirm for Canada a role involving nuclear weapons, Canada will equip her NATO forces to discharge her obligation.

Surely, that is crystal clear, beyond any shadow of doubt. It is not this parliament, it is not this government; it is our NATO allies who will decide whether or not to reaffirm Canada's role involving nuclear weapons. Now, it is bad enough when any one country, even a friendly neighbour, is going to lay down our policy; but is the NATO council now going to lay down our policy? This is certainly the implication in this statement. Of course, as the release from the state department points out, this whole question of the Nassau declaration placing this matter in doubt is a sheer hallucination and is simply another means of postponing making a decision, a decision which this government has been putting off month after month and year after year.

I say it is time for them to take their courage in their hands. Sooner or later, they have to come down on the side of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green) who has been against nuclear weapons, or the defence minister who has been for nuclear weapons. Any government, any individual who tries to ride two horses going in opposite directions is bound to find himself sitting in a most undignified position. This is exactly the plight into which the government has brought itself at the present time.

I continue with the minister's statement:

Third, so far as NORAD is concerned, Canada has been negotiating with the United States for the past two to three months in order that nuclear warheads will be made available for our two squadrons of Bomarcs and for the F-101 interceptor squadrons. These negotiations will be continued in order to reach a satisfactory agreement. I believe such an agreement can be arrived at in the near future.

I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that in both the statement of the Prime Minister and the defence minister, only NORAD is mentioned as being the subject of nuclear negotiations with the United States. However, the state department release yesterday says that there have been confidential discussions proposed by the Canadian government concerning circumstances under which there might be provision of nuclear weapons for Canadian armed forces in Canada and Europe. We were not, therefore, told all the story. I might point out also that the minister's statement refers to nuclear warheads for the F-101 interceptor planes, but the Prime Minister's statement says that these would be armed with conventional weapons.

I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, it is necessary to labour the point. I feel it is quite clear that the government has been unable to make up its mind. Since 1958 it has been playing both sides of the street. Now, events have caught up with them. The Prime Minister said last Friday that the government's policy was flexible and fluid. It has not been either flexible or fluid, it has become wiley and wobbly; it has wobbled from one side to the other. Theirs has been a program of postponement and procrastination. I hope the government will make up its mind. I hope it will make up its mind in favour of a non-nuclear role for Canada. But what I fear is that we are, behind closed doors, being committed inch by inch to nuclear weapons, so that suddenly we will wake up to find ourselves members of the world's nuclear club.

The statement by the minister of defence, and the statement by the state department yesterday, make it fairly clear to me at least that the policy of the government on nuclear weapons is not substantially different from that of the Liberal party, except that the Liberal party has come out forthrightly now and said that they are in favour of accepting nuclear weapons for Canada. The government seems to be edging into it backwards, bit by bit, by secret negotiations and the buying of equipment which is worthless without nuclear warheads. The end result, of course, will be the same. The Liberal party wants to go into the nuclear club through the front door and then, if they can, negotiate themselves out the back door. The government, apparently, wants to sneak in under cover of darkness through the back door so nobody will see them going in.

We in this party have made our position abundantly clear. We say that Canada should negotiate itself out of any nuclear commitments under both NORAD and NATO. I do not need to reiterate the arguments. The Prime Minister himself gave some of them last Friday when he said that nuclear arms would not add materially to our safety, that the real threat in the future is from intercontinental ballistic missiles, that our contribution could be made by the use of conventional arms or conventional forces. They are all there. The official opposition, the Liberal party, really do not want a nuclear role for Canada either, because they say that even if they get nuclear weapons, the moment they get them and train people to use them, they are going to try to get rid of them. Then why not start by not accepting them in the first place.

We think this is the time to speak out independently, as other nations in NATO have done, Norway, Denmark and others. We say there is nothing to be gained by joining the nuclear club, but there is much to be lost; that the whole trend today in military strategy is away from the limited nuclear, tactical war; that the two great powers now have the ultimate nuclear deterrent; that as long as it is restricted to these two powers, the horrible consequences of a nuclear war may deter them both, and that therefore Canada's best contribution lies in containment, in preventing nuclear weapons from spreading to nations other than the two which now have them. We say that this is the first step as a prelude to getting a ban on nuclear tests and ultimately an international treaty for nuclear disarmament under international inspection and control.

We are not suggesting that Canada should wash its hands of its responsibilities. We are a member of the west. We have great responsibilities in this world. But we maintain that those responsibilities, in view of our size, our location and our resources, can best be discharged by giving increasing support to the United Nations, by supplying conventional forces for a world police force, by making available some of our vast resources of food, capital goods and consumer goods to help the underprivileged and needy countries in the world.

May I close by saying this one word, Mr. Speaker. Around the corridors there are constant rumours of a dissolution of this parliament so that this matter can be settled by the people of Canada. I for one believe that if this government or any government, having in mind that all the parties in the last election were against acquiring nuclear weapons for Canada, is going to acquire nuclear weapons, it has a responsibility to go honestly to the people of Canada for a mandate before accepting nuclear weapons which involve the lives, the welfare and the future of the people of this country. I want to say that as far as we in this party are concerned, no talk of a dissolution will intimidate us from trying to find out what our obligations are and from seeking to discover the extent to which this government has committed us to the acquisition of nuclear arms. After all, arguments about United States intervention and arguments about whether or not the government's policy is a made in Canada policy rather than a made in the United States policy are pure irrelevancies. They constitute a smokescreen, a smokescreen that is laced with double talk.

There is only one question at issue in this debate. That question is, to what extent, if any, has the government of Canada committed itself to the acquisition of nuclear arms for its forces? That is what we want to know. We have had contradictory and conflicting statements. We would be derelict in our duty, Mr. Speaker, if we did not insist that the government tell us. It is not a matter of mere academic debate or political manoeuvring. Joining the nuclear club is something which can affect the lives of all the people in this country, of generations yet unborn, and the peace of the world. We have a right to know what is the government's policy. We have a right to know what commitments they have made. We have a right, above all, to have the government come down on one side or the other. We in this party plead with them to come down on the side of giving Canada a conventional and economic aid role in the world, and to stand up before the world and say that in order to promote peace, in order to prevent the spread of nuclear weapons, Canada will not become a member of the nuclear club and will not accept nuclear arms.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I thank the house for the very kind reception it has given me including, I see, applause from some hon. members opposite, to which I am totally unaccustomed. This debate was supposed to be on the statement made last night by the United States department of state concerning defence arrangements between the Canadian and United States governments, as moved by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson). I must say that it has moved far, far away from that. However, I do not complain on that score and I think it is perhaps inevitable in a debate of this kind that there be quite a wide range of subjects introduced. I was a little surprised, however, to hear the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) make the suggestion that I should go out to Alberta to lead the Conservative party there. I am quite sure that he did not get that suggestion from the premier of the province, Mr. Manning, who I think I see in the gallery, because I am quite sure Mr. Manning would be as discouraged over any such move as is Mr. Bennett over another move along that line to which hon. members have made reference regarding British Columbia.

Mr. Speaker, to begin with may I say that having regard to the contents of the press release which we are supposed to be debating, the method chosen by the United States state department is, I think, unparalleled in the long history of relations between our two countries. In fact, it constitutes an unwarranted interference in our national affairs—

U.S. State Department Press Release

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Harkness: —an interference that must be deplored in the strongest possible terms. I find it extremely hard to understand the course of action the state department has adopted, since it would seem elementary that such a course could only cause a needless obstacle to our efforts to reach an agreement on matters vital to the national security of both our countries. Of course, we must recognize that differences of opinion do arise from time to time between even the best of neighbours. But there are recognized methods and procedures of resolving such difficulties. Such methods as the state department has seen fit to utilize are not among them. Hon. members know that criticism from one's own nearest neighbour in our every day lives is usually resented by everyone, even when it is given in private. But when such criticism is given in public it can only do damage. I trust we shall have no more instances of this sort.

There has been a terrific amount of rumour and speculation in the past few days in connection with defence and other matters, some of which have been referred to by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas). I suppose it is only to be expected that such would be the case. But what surprises me is this—that attention should be paid to these speculations, rumours and so forth. As a good example, I find in tonight's Citizen a story by Bruce Phillips, an old friend of mine, in which he says "Man in the middle of the disarmament tug of war, Mr. Harkness, is reported close to collapse." Mr. Speaker, I ask every member of this house if I appear to be a man who looks, talks or acts as though he were on the point of collapse? I may say that this story reminds me of a well known saying of Sir Winston Churchill—"some chicken, some neck" which I paraphrase in these circumstances as "some story, some collapse." But this is symptomatic of the sort of thing which has been going on for the past several days.

As I say, I find it hard to understand why so much credence should be given to rumours, speculation and things of that kind. The same amount of credence should be given to them as should be given to the story I have just mentioned, which is typical of the kind of thing we have been hearing.

An hon. Member: Don't collapse.

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. Harkness: Do not worry, my friend. I know there is a doctor in the house and he will look after you if you need him.

Assertions have been made, particularly by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), both today and previously, both in this house and out of it, that I have contradicted the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker). The hon. gentleman is not the only one who has made such assertions. It is simply not true. I would like to make that as flat and definite as it is possible for me to make it.

Mr. Chevrier: It is flat, all right.

Mr. Harkness: Hon. members over there like to have their little joke but often they go somewhat beyond joking with regard to this matter. I think they should realize we are discussing a subject of some seriousness. I should like to outline exactly what the situation is so that there will be no question and no doubt about it. I complained to certain pressmen about the interpretation which had been given in the newspapers to the speech which the Prime Minister had made—an interpretation which, I believe, was unwarranted. When I got up on Saturday morning I was met with a headline: "$700,000,000 worth of weapons carriers to be scrapped". As I said immediately, there had never been any intention of scrapping the aircraft we had bought. As a matter of fact, such an interpretation is completely ridiculous. We secured, to give the latest example, some 66 F-101 or Voodoo planes not very long ago at which time it was stated that they would be armed as we secured them with conventional weapons. We are using them in that form. Any idea that they would be scrapped, or that the other weapons carriers would be scrapped, bear no relation to the facts whatever.

In any event, the interpretation which was placed on the Prime Minister's speech was a completely erroneous one. It was one which I believed it was my duty to deny as soon as possible, and I think other members of the house shared this view. I mentioned this matter to the reporters with whom I talked, and later, in what has since become a well known statement issued to the press, I drew attention to a particular part of the Prime Minister's speech which some of those people had apparently neglected even to read. They were trying to read into this speech something in connection with the scrapping of nuclear weapons carriers and things along those lines, that were never there and never intended to be there. What I did, as a matter of fact, was to put down in my own words, which are naturally different from the Prime Minister's words—everybody's words in connection with these things are not exactly alike—what the Prime Minister had said.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Harkness: I put down absolutely nothing which is not contained on page 3136 of Hansard. I would just like to read what is stated there in order to demonstrate that to be a fact.

On page 3136, about half way down the left-hand column, the Prime Minister is reported as saying:

> What course should we take at this time?

This is in connection with nuclear weapons, and so on.

> I emphasize what I have already stated, that we shall at all times carry out whatever our responsibilities are.

An hon. Member: What are they?

Mr. Harkness: I turn now to the next column. The Leader of the Opposition interrupted, of course, but we find a statement beginning near the top of the page:

> Following SACEURS's recommendation, as we saw the situation in 1959 and as I said earlier in my remarks, we undertook to equip our squadrons assigned to NATO for the strike reconnaissance role, which role would include the mission of delivering nuclear weapons. No one was under any misunderstanding in that connection. Parliament approved this program and appropriated the funds.

To continue; there were three which I wish to deal with. The first was in connection with our obligations, which I have dealt with. The next was in connection with the F-104's. The Prime Minister said, on this point:

> Delivery of the F-104G has commenced, but the strike reconnaissance role has been placed under doubt by the recent Nassau declaration concerning nuclear arms as well as other developments both technical and political in the defence field. It would be necessary, therefore, at this meeting in May for Canada to give consideration to this matter and we will, in co-operation with the nations of NATO, undertake a clarification of our role in NATO defence plans and disposition.

The Leader of the Opposition is always talking about my having clarified the Prime Minister's speech. I never used the word "clarification". I had no such word in mind. The only place where clarification occurs is right here. I have just read it. The Prime Minister's statement goes on:

> We are united in NATO. We have never and will never consent to Canada breaking any of her pledged words or undertakings. It is at that meeting, where there will be reviewed the entire collective defence policy, that we shall secure from the other member nations their views, and on the basis of that we will be in a position to make a decision, a consistent decision, first to maintain our undertakings and secondly to execute, if that be the view, the maintenance of our collective defence. In the meantime the training of Canadian forces in the use of these weapon systems can continue.

U.S. State Department Press Release

There is absolutely nothing in my statement in connection with that matter which is not contained in the passage I have just read.

Then the Prime Minister went on to deal with NORAD.

> So far as NORAD is concerned I have said at the beginning of my remarks that Canada's sovereignty must be maintained. We shall continue our negotiations. They have been going on quite forcibly for two months or more.

Then the Prime Minister turned to me and I said "For two or three months". The Prime Minister continued:

> Yes, they have been going on for two or three months. Sometimes I wonder whether that is the reason the Leader of the Opposition rushed in with his statement the other day, because he found that out and knew about it. But there was never any concealment of the fact. We will negotiate with the United States so that, as I said earlier, in case of need nuclear warheads will be made readily available.

Mr. Speaker, I defy anybody to find anything in my statement which is not contained in what I have just read.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Harkness: I think I have the floor.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I will accept that defiance right now.

Mr. Speaker: The minister has the floor and no one can force his way on to the floor.

Mr. Chevrier: He is asking a question.

Mr. Harkness: The loquacious and excitable member for Essex East finds it extremely difficult to keep the seat of his pants on his chair when he gets excited. I do not wonder that he is excited, because he has found out, and knows it is the truth, that all the allegations that he and his leader have been making in this connection are completely false.

Now, I think I have dealt with that matter. However, there is one point that the Leader of the Opposition brought up. He tried to make out that there was a contradiction between the Prime Minister and myself, that I had said something which he did not say, and so on and so forth. He was referring to the fact that I had mentioned in this statement our squadrons of Bomarcs and our F-101 interceptor squadrons. Then he referred to page 3133 of Hansard, part of the Prime Minister's speech. On that page and the preceding page the Prime Minister was referring to the statement which had been made when the F-101's were acquired; and at the very end of the statement at the top of page 3133 he said:

> These aircraft, title to which will be vested in Canada, will be armed with conventional weapons.

U.S. State Department Press Release

I said that the Prime Minister had read the statement which was made when we acquired these aircraft and when the announcement was made. On page 3136 of Hansard, when the Prime Minister was dealing with NORAD, he was speaking of the negotiations which we had been carrying on. I was also speaking of the negotiations which we were carrying on.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas) is trying to make out that there is a contradiction here as well, and that there is no mention, as far as the Prime Minister was concerned, of Bomarcs, F-101's, and so forth. What the Prime Minister stated concerned NORAD; and the two weapons systems we have as far as NORAD is concerned which are capable of carrying nuclear warheads are the Bomarc and the F-101's. They are the only ones we have. Therefore, when you are talking of NORAD, they are the things about which you are negotiating. That is all there is to that contention.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Harkness: I will be quite happy to take a question when I have finished.

As I said at the beginning, the reason for this debate was the statement made by the United States. I think we must all realize that the security of the western world is dependant on the co-operation of the NATO countries, all 15 of them. Anything which disturbs that co-operation and disturbs relations amongst the 15 countries of NATO is not a good thing for any one of those countries. I should like to point out, however, that there have been other cases than the unfortunate one we are now discussing. I do not think I need point any fingers; it is never wise, I think, to point any finger at a particular country in Europe. However, everyone here is aware of the fact that the maximum of co-operation and exchange of views has not always prevailed as far as some of the European countries who are members of NATO are concerned. But I think the important thing is that the NATO alliance, that great alliance of the countries of the west, be maintained because on it depends the security of all of the free world.

Now I should like to deal briefly with some of the remarks made by the three hon. gentlemen who have preceded me in this debate. First of all there was the speech of the Leader of the Opposition. I must say that it reminded me of a story they tell about Paddy Nolan, who was a famous lawyer in the early days in Calgary and of whom Your Honour has no doubt heard many stories. Poor Paddy was in the hospital on one occasion. The nurse brought him in his meal. He looked at it and said: "That's a dog's breakfast". Then he said: "Will it keep?" "Yes, sir", said the nurse. "Well then," said Paddy, "keep it". I think that story describes the hon. gentleman's speech pretty well. It was a dog's breakfast and he should have kept it.

An hon. Member: It won't keep.

Mr. Harkness: I must say that he did give us some high-sounding rhetoric, which did not mean very much, however, after the dinner adjournment when he had managed to get something written out along that line. As to some of the statements he made, he stated—and I have already dealt with this—that I had contradicted statements made by the Prime Minister. I think there is no doubt about the situation there. Such a thing did not take place. He complained about the disclosure of the negotiations, and immediately after he was pounding his desk and saying that every detail in connection with these negotiations must be revealed to the House of Commons.

Mr. Pearson: I never said any such thing.

Mr. Harkness: Surely he cannot expect to have it both ways. I would ask him, how is that for a contradiction? I think it would qualify very highly. He also mentioned something about the Nassau agreement in connection with this statement issued by the United States state department. The Prime Minister was at this meeting and he has certain opinions in connection with this matter which he expressed. It is quite evident that his opinions and the opinions of the people in the state department who issued this press release are not the same; but this is a matter of opinion, not a matter of fact. It is a question of what the Prime Minister believes is the situation and what the authors of this particular statement apparently believe is the situation. This does not mean that there is anything very serious in the way of what the Leader of the Opposition I think called a great contradiction and so forth.

The Leader of the Opposition stated, "We want the facts, all the facts, about the defence policy of Canada". Mr. Speaker, may I say that I have been giving these facts for the past two years or more. Moreover, when the estimates of the defence department come before this House of Commons, and I hope they will do so very shortly, I shall be delighted to answer any of the questions members wish to ask in regard to defence.

I can only think back to the last time when the estimates on defence were before the House of Commons some considerable time ago. If anybody reads that record I think he will find that there were not too many intelligent questions asked from across the floor with regard to defence matters.

The hon. member for Red Deer said this, "What we want is a statement of what the defence policy is". Mr. Speaker, I think I shall have to send him copies of Hansard for the period when defence was up for debate and the estimates were being gone over the last time, and perhaps a few of the speeches out of the dozens I have made across this country on defence policy during the last two years or more.

Mr. Thompson: Send them to the press and across the country too.

An hon. Member: Send us a policy.

Mr. Harkness: I have been stating defence policy and have been doing so in very definite terms all during the more than two years that are past. This cry "We do not know what the defence policy is" and so on is, I think, due entirely to the fact that they refuse to read anything that has been said, or that they refuse to accept anything that has been said about it. They just want to go around in circles.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam gave the usual type of anti-nuclear speech which characterizes his party. All I can say in connection with it is that every time I hear one of these speeches or every time I read one the impression is borne in on me more and more forcibly that these hon. gentlemen have never understood the situation or that, if they have understood it, they have certainly concealed that fact very well. I do not propose at the present time to go into all the arguments in connection with that matter.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Tell us what the policy is.

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam went on to say, "What are the obligations? We were not told what these were". I have referred to the Prime Minister's speech. I wish he would read it again. I wish he would study it. If he would do that, he would find out what the obligations are. I do not know how often it is necessary to state these things in order to penetrate the skulls of some people. However, that is the situation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Harkness: These hon. gentlemen do not like this speech. I have often observed that there is nothing that hurts like the truth. The statement which was made by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, and which I think everyone will recognize as having no validity, was that the policy of the government is not materially different from that of the Liberal party. May I say, Mr. Speaker, that our policy throughout has been and is at the present time so different from that of the Liberal party that I find it difficult to understand how the hon. member could make that sort of statement. The Liberal party has been right around the complete circle with regard to this matter. Nobody ever knew from day to day where they stood on it and we do not yet know. I think everybody was delighted when the Leader of the Opposition about two or three weeks ago finally made what looked like a definite statement, so that we would at least know where he stood; but as soon as he made it he began to draw back from it, retreat from it, qualify it, and change it around so that we are back in the same old position in which we have been right through the piece. We do not know where the Liberal party stands or where the Leader of the Opposition stands. He just will not take a position and stand by it. That is all there is to it. This procedure, I am afraid, has characterized his so-called stand in connection with almost every subject with which he has dealt. On the contrary, we have followed a clear and responsible policy.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Harkness: I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that we have followed a clear and responsible policy for the past five years. It has been explained in very considerable detail. We shall continue to follow that policy.

Mr. Pearson: I wonder whether the minister would permit a question before he sits down, although I may say that he has sat down.

Mr. Harkness: Yes.

Mr. Pearson: Will he now tell us what the nuclear defence policy of the government is?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I am beginning to think that no matter what one says with regard to these matters, or no matter how clear the words or how clear the terms, the Leader of the Opposition will refuse to understand. In fact, I think only God will put sense inside that head.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, we are all agreed in this house that Canada must determine its own foreign policy, that it must be master of its own defence policy and that we must exercise all the sovereign power capable of being exercised by a sovereign state in this period of interdependence. On this question there is no issue between any of the political parties in this house. However, there is an issue as to the extent to which we have been informed by this government of its defence policy, its attitude toward the acquisition of nuclear weapons, and our full role in NATO and in NORAD. It is regrettable that, as a result of the speech to which we have just listened, by the Minister of National Defence, the first statement on national defence by this minister in a long time, we are no further ahead in our demand for a full statement of defence policy.

It has been difficult for us to get this debate. The Leader of the Opposition has repeatedly, as have other leaders and other members, asked this government to give this house an opportunity to discuss defence policy. The Leader of the Opposition in particular has asked that there be set up a defence committee so that we could ascertain the facts about a matter of such consequence to this country—

Mr. Diefenbaker: A defence policy committee?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —to this parliament and to our contribution in the free alliance of nations. The difficulties for debate which we have had today could all have been avoided if the government, recognizing our right to information on defence, had removed from this house the necessity of the procedural wrangle which lasted several hours. We should have had this debate when the request for it was made this afternoon at 2.30 following publication of the statement of the state department last night shortly after six o'clock.

Mr. McPhillips: You want to dance to Uncle Sam.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says that we want to dance to Uncle Sam. We have already dealt with that. We want to dance to our responsibilities to the Canadian people in defending the free world against the challenge which faces us.

The Minister of National Defence talked about unity in the cabinet. They all speak the same language. He asserts there is no difficulty with regard to the positions of the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and himself. He says nothing, of course, about the views of the Associate Minister of National Defence. We know what the views of the Secretary of State for External Affairs are. He said in a speech in Vancouver on December 4:

> There has been no change in policy—that is to decline nuclear weapons until there is a deteriorating world situation or war.

On January 25 the Prime Minister said in this house:

> More nuclear arms will add nothing materially to our defences.

That is the statement of the Prime Minister. Then, on the 28th of January in the release, in the statement of interpretation—the minister does not like the word "clarification"—the Minister of National Defence said that the government is committed to a definite policy for the acquisition of nuclear arms. These excerpts, and I am going to come to more extended ones, clearly indicate that the challenge of the Minister of National Defence is answered, because there is and there continues to be in the very statement he made tonight a clear division of opinion between himself and the statements the Prime Minister made in this house last Friday.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the fact that the Minister of National Defence issued a press release, resorting to that extraordinary action, indicates in itself a serious division of opinion between the Prime Minister and himself as Minister of National Defence. Otherwise, why issue a statement.

Mr. Balcer: He just explained it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Otherwise, why issue a statement? Surely the Minister of National Defence could have met the press, could have been subjected to questions, could have referred the reporters to specific responses of the Prime Minister. But he issued this statement on Sunday last because, I suggest—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It was not Sunday.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —there was a serious division between the Minister of National Defence and the Prime Minister to the point that the Minister of National Defence had threatened to resign over the week end. I challenge the minister to deny that statement.

Let us take the minister's statement and see whether or not there are any contradictions. Here is what the Prime Minister said last Friday, as found at page 3136 of Hansard, the page mentioned in the press release of the Minister of National Defence. Here is what the Prime Minister said among other things as reported in the left-hand column on that page:

> What course should we take at this time? I emphasize what I have already stated, that we shall at all times carry out whatever our responsibilities are. I have said that strategic changes are taking place in the thinking of the western world, and there is general recognition that the nuclear deterrent will not be strengthened by the expansion of the nuclear family.

Listen to this.

> With these improvements in the international situation, this is no time for hardened decisions that cannot be altered. We must be flexible and fluid—

An hon. Member: What is wrong with that?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I will tell you what is wrong. Here is what the Minister of National Defence said, referring to the speech of the Prime Minister:

In the speech nearly all the varying theories and ideas which have been put forward on nuclear arms were mentioned, but the definite policy of the government is contained in a few paragraphs which appear in the right hand column on page 3136 of Hansard for January 25th.

Here is what is wrong. Here are the words of the Minister of National Defence, and let them be contrasted with these expressions of fluidity and flexibility, this taking of all kinds of positions. Here is what the Minister of National Defence said:

Those paragraphs state a definite policy for the acquisition of nuclear arms in these terms.

Mr. Sevigny: Read on.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister said that those paragraphs of the Prime Minister's speech clearly indicate that the government is in favour of a definite policy for the acquisition of nuclear arms.

An hon. Member: Do you agree with that?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is not the point. I will tell you what I think later. What I am doing now is to discuss something more important, the views of the government of Canada with regard to so vital a matter. There were no hardened positions in the statement of the Prime Minister, but there was a hardened position in the statement of the Minister of National Defence. There is no doubt where he stands. If there was any doubt before last Sunday it has been removed by this release. He stands for the acquisition of nuclear arms and the Prime Minister does not state any position at all except I must say, in fairness, that he does observe that after the NATO ministerial meeting, an opportunity will be given, in the light of a flexible and fluid situation, to arrive at a policy. That is the position. I contrast these two positions. I challenge any hon. member opposite to say that this does not represent a fundamental difference of approach and view by these two members of the government.

Mr. Balcer: It is all in your mind.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Here is another contradiction. The Minister of National Defence says in his release:

Third, so far as NORAD is concerned, Canada has been negotiating with the United States for the past two to three months in order that nuclear warheads will be made available for our two squadrons of Bomarcs and for the F-101 interceptor squadrons. These negotiations will be continued in order to reach a satisfactory agreement. I believe such an agreement can be arrived at in the near future.

It must be emphasized that in what I have read the minister says:

U.S. State Department Press Release

—so far as NORAD is concerned, Canada has been negotiating with the United States for the past two to three months in order that nuclear warheads will be made available—

There is no qualification—"will be made available". That is not what the Prime Minister said. As found on page 3136 of Hansard, the Prime Minister said:

We will negotiate with the United States so that, as I said earlier, in case of need nuclear warheads will be made readily available.

Mr. Sevigny: What is the difference?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says "what is the difference". In the one statement the adverb "readily" appears and that suggests that if the government wishes nuclear weapons they will be readily available. But that is not what the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Harkness) said. He said we are negotiating towards a situation that will make nuclear weapons available to Canada. If my hon. friend does not understand that language, then I want him to know that I am sure the vast majority of the people of Canada will see in this statement, as contrasted with that of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), a further contradiction which reveals the situation under which the Minister of National Defence finds himself tonight, and the situation that he found himself in during the week end when he threatened to resign from this government over differences with the Prime Minister and some of his colleagues.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I might well ask the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sevigny), who has a responsibility as associate minister, what his views are. We saw a story in today's press to the effect that the Associate Minister of National Defence was complaining about the release made by his colleague, who was endeavouring to put his interpretation on the remarks of the Prime Minister.

(Translation):

Mr. Sevigny: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

I wish to assure hon. members of this house that I have never complained to anyone about the statements made by my colleague the minister of defence—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think there is here any basis for a question of privilege. The minister could make his point if there were a dispute at this time, but there is now no basis for a question of privilege.

(Text):

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, if the Associate Minister of National Defence feels that his views should be made known,

U.S. State Department Press Release

I think he may feel certain that this house will welcome his participation. We regard as part of his responsibility—

Mr. Sevigny: You will get it, and you will regret it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —that he should tell us if he shares the views of the Minister of National Defence or those stated by the Prime Minister on Friday last. This is his obligation and his duty, certainly, as Associate Minister of National Defence.

(Translation):

Mr. Sevigny: There is no disagreement between us.

(Text):

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We have expressed our view on the propriety of the form of intervention exercised by the United States with regard to its reaction to the debates of this house, and particularly to the statement of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You are building your argument on them.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What is that?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I say to you, you are building your argument on statements made by those people in the United States.

Mr. Pearson: Those people?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am sure the Prime Minister will agree, on reflection, that he—

Mr. Speaker: Order; I hope we do not have quite so many interventions, in order that we may get along.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am sure the Prime Minister will agree, on reflection, notwithstanding the provocation, that he will find it unsatisfactory, as Prime Minister, to have referred to the people in the United States as "those people". We do not agree with the United States on all its policies, but we are bound with them in a supreme and challenging task, that is to be joined with them, with the United Kingdom and the other NATO countries, in seeking the preservation of our freedom and unity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We have a right to ask the Prime Minister, we have a right certainly to ask the Minister of National Defence to comment on a statement which was given by the United States in a manner that is not in conformity with recognized international intercourse.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You are accepting all the criticisms.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This statement indicates that the state department has received a number of inquiries concerning disclosures during the recent debate in the Canadian House of Commons regarding negotiations over the past two or three months. The Prime Minister, on another occasion has spoken of unity in NATO and the necessity for maintaining that unity. The Prime Minister, however, in some gratuitous remarks made today, and which he made during his speech on Friday, did not take into consideration the implications of his words, in so far as other NATO members were concerned, not the great powers of NATO but some other countries, of the stature of Canada who are vitally affected by some of the implications made by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Herridge: Which countries?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There are many countries, such as Norway. What about Norway? What about Belgium? What about the other countries who may be embarking on important negotiations now with the United States?

An hon. Member: Guess again.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says, "guess again". I know why he says that. He does not believe in NATO.

Mr. Berger: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Berger: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I may say I resent the cheap, political insinuations made by the hon. member.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I sincerely trust that, having heard tonight from the Minister of National Defence we will not wake up tomorrow morning and see in our newspapers a release by the Prime Minister interpreting the speech of the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. Speaker: It is now ten o'clock, and by standing order this debate has come to an end.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I inquire from the house leader what the business will be for tomorrow and next week?

Mr. Churchill: Tomorrow we will continue with the estimates of the Department of Labour and catch up on time by dealing with the estimates of the Post Office Department as well.

Mr. Chevrier: May I inquire what it will be for Monday?

Mr. Churchill: I have already announced a supply motion for Monday.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, February 1, 1963

The house met at 11 a.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. HOWARD—RESPONSIBILITY OF JUSTICE MINISTER UNDER BILL OF RIGHTS

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege affecting this house and every member of it. My question of privilege involves the failure or neglect on the part of the Minister of Justice to discharge a responsibility and a duty which parliament gave to him. That responsibility and duty is that which is contained within section 3 of the bill of rights and the regulations made with respect to section 3.

I wonder whether I should read to you the relevant part of section 3 of the Canadian Bill of Rights, which is as follows:

> The Minister of Justice shall, in accordance with such regulations as may be prescribed by the governor in council, examine every proposed regulation submitted in draft form to the clerk of the privy council pursuant to the Regulations Act and every bill introduced in or presented to the House of Commons, in order to ascertain whether any of the provisions thereof are inconsistent with the purposes and provisions of this part and he shall report any such inconsistency to the House of Commons at the first convenient opportunity.

The regulations pursuant to that section provide the mechanics for dealing with bills presented to or introduced in the House of Commons, and regulation P.C. 1960/1792 sets up the procedure and allows in clause 3(b) of the regulation that the minister shall:

> —cause to be affixed to each of the copies thereof—

—that is, copies of bills—

> —so received from the Clerk of the House of Commons a certificate, in a form approved by the minister and signed by the deputy minister of justice, stating that the bill has been examined as required by the Canadian Bill of Rights.

Mr. Speaker, the total number of bills introduced in the House of Commons this session prior to yesterday was 109. Of those bills, the period of time which elapsed between their transmission by the Clerk of the House of Commons to the Minister of Justice and their return to the Clerk with the affixed and approved stamp on the front of them, indicating that they had been examined pursuant to the bill of rights, was statistically as follows. There were six of those bills in which the time which elapsed was only one day. There were 40 of those bills in which the period of time which elapsed was two days. There were 19 of them in which the period of time which had elapsed was three days. There were 16 bills in which the period of time which had elapsed was four days. Ten of them took five days. Five of them took six days. Three consumed a period of eight days. One of them took 13 days. Another one took 14 days; and six of them had no indication of the number of days on the approved stamp affixed to the front of the bill, although there was an indication that they had been received back by the House of Commons in a period of time not longer than eight days.

Even with respect to the one which took 13 days and the one which took 14 days to examine, that was over the Christmas and New Year's holiday. Hence we can extract from that figure a reasonable number of days upon which the people were not working and thus were not examining bills.

There is one bill which was introduced on October 1 of last year, at the start of this session, and which has not been so returned and, I submit, has not been examined as required by section 3 of the bill of rights. That date is 123 or 124 days ago. That bill is C-14, an act respecting Indians, one which I myself submitted.

I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that this question of privilege is that the Minister of Justice, either by failure or neglect, has not examined that particular bill and has not, as is required by the bill of rights, returned it to the House of Commons. Accordingly, based upon that premise, it is a prima facie case of privilege and I move as follows, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

> That the standing committee on privileges and elections be authorized and instructed to inquire into and study the responsibilities attendant upon the Minister of Justice by virtue of section 3 of the Canadian Bill of Rights and whether those responsibilities were properly carried out with respect to Bill C-14, an act respecting Indians.

Mr. Speaker: Order. At the moment I am not even considering whether this is a prima facie case of privilege.

Question of Privilege

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, it is very hard to find in what the hon. member has said anything which bears very much resemblance to the case he is trying to make out. It is about as far fetched a presentation of a question of privilege as this house is likely to see.

First of all, may I say that there was no intimation to me at any time by the hon. member that he was concerned about any aspect or delay in relation to the review and certification by the deputy attorney general under the regulations in relation to any measure. The review by the hon. member of a statistical nature I think points to the fact that, in the midst of a session in which the deputy attorney general is carrying other very heavy responsibilities, the certification of bills in the form prescribed has been carried out with efficiency and celerity.

After wandering over the whole sessional program and over 100 measures the hon. member finally came around to the burr that apparently was under his collar. He finally referred to Bill C-14, his own bill. Before any hon. member pays any attention to or takes seriously what has been said by the hon. member this morning, I suggest that reference might be made to what was said on October 1 in relation to this bill when the hon. member sought to introduce it. Some discussion on this question will be found at pages 33 and 34 of Hansard when the bill was read the first time.

Let me say very briefly, Mr. Speaker, that the responsibilities which are laid upon the minister by the bill of rights and the responsibilities which are laid upon the deputy minister of justice and deputy attorney general by the regulations passed in pursuance of the bill of rights have been fully and faithfully discharged.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, this appears to us to be a matter of pretty serious import—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: A breach of the law; that is all.

Mr. Chevrier: —more particularly because of the fact that the bill has been held up from October 1 until now, and my suggestion to you, sir, is that this matter be taken under advisement.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Particularly because of the violation of the act by the Minister of Justice.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think there have been quite sufficient extraneous comments. This matter will be taken under advisement by the Chair. I should like to indicate to the hon. member for Laurier that he may not have been here on the occasion when this bill was called in November was not proceeded with and was dealt with under the rules, but in so far as the question raised by the hon. member is concerned I will take it under advisement and will make a ruling in due course.

[Mr. Speaker.]

ROYAL CANADIAN MINT

AGREEMENT WITH COBALT REFINERY FOR SILVER BULLION

Hon. Paul Martineau (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, I wish to inform the house that the governor in council has approved the treasury board recommendation to authorize the director of the Royal Canadian Mint to reach an agreement with the Cobalt Refinery Limited of Toronto, Ontario, for the supplying of silver bullion.

The agreement would become effective on April 1, 1963, and would be for a period of five years. It stipulates that Cobalt Refinery will deliver to the mint from 2 to 6 million ounces of silver per year, at competitive prices to be determined by negotiation every year the agreement is in force.

Cobalt Refinery Limited operates a silver refinery at Cobalt, Ontario. Its contract with the Canadian mint will enable it to buy larger quantities of silver ore concentrates already produced in the Cobalt and Gowganda districts. Since the closing of the Deloro Silver Refinery in 1961, those concentrates have been shipped to other countries to be refined.

It is expected that the transaction will help maintain in operation a new silver ore processing plant in Canada and that it will also benefit the mining operations in that region of Ontario.

(Text):

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the minister for the statement he has just made. I believe that recognition of the silver treating plant at Cobalt will prove advantageous, in that there has always been some regret that the silver we produce in Canada has had to be processed in the United States. I know that the people of the area and particularly the silver producers will certainly appreciate the statement of the minister. It is to be hoped that on the strength of what is now available under this agreement Canadian producers will be able to send all their silver to this refinery for treatment.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED MEETINGS OF JOINT U.S.-CANADA COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he proposes to call together the Canada-United States ministerial committee on defence which was set up by the present government and which last met in July, 1960, in order to discuss current joint defence problems between the two countries.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, no consideration has been given to that matter.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Prime Minister if he will take up with Mr. Speaker the suggestion of Senator Aiken of Vermont, which appears in today's press, that the parliamentary-congressional committee be called to discuss Canadian-American problems?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that committee has done great work in bringing about good relations. The government has nothing whatever to do with the committee. Any discussions that take place in that connection are the result of arrangements between you, Mr. Speaker, the organization here and the organization in Washington.

INDIA—SITUATION RESPECTING JOINT AIR DEFENCE MISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ralph B. Cowan (York-Humber): I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for Exernal Affairs and ask him if amicable relations still exist within the joint Canada-United States air defence mission which is now in India investigating air defence problems in that country, with instructions to report back.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for Exernal Affairs): That is a commonwealth-United States mission, and it is carrying on its work in the normal way.

U.S. STATE DEPARTMENT PRESS RELEASE—CANADIAN NOTE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if any formal note, or any note, has been sent by this government to the United States in answer to the release of the U.S. state department of the night before last.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this is obviously an attempt to continue on the orders of the day the debate which took place yesterday.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think there should be comment on questions.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Is the answer "No"?

Mr. Green: Perhaps I could finish my answer. The question has the significant feature I mentioned, also another, which is that the Liberal party is still following—

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is quite wrong.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No protest by the government.

TRANSPORT

RAILWAY BRANCH LINES—MEETING WITH PROVINCIAL PREMIERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Will he inform the house whether the meeting with the provincial premiers concerning rail line abandonment has been concluded, and if so whether an agreement on the approach to this question has been reached?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The answer to the first part of the question is no, so the second part does not apply.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

INVITATIONS TO PROVINCES TO ATTEND BICULTURAL CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Horace A. Olson (Medicine Hat): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister and ask him whether the invitations have been extended to the provinces to attend a bicultural conference, whether the have gone out as yet?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): As the hon. gentleman will recall, a question was asked yesterday, I think it was by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, and I advised on Monday I would be making a statement in this regard. At that time the whole situation will be placed before the house.

Inquiries of the Ministry

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER INTERIM SUPPLY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Walter L. Gordon (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance a question. Since the government spending authority in terms of ten months' interim supply expired at midnight last night, will the minister say if and when he intends to ask this house for further interim supply?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of Finance): I think that would be a matter, Mr. Speaker, to be determined by my colleagues and announced by the house leader in due course.

(Translation):

TRADE

WORLD FAIR—APPOINTMENT OF DIRECTORS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence. Could he explain the delay in appointing the directors of the Canadian World Exhibition Corporation whose appointments he said were to be announced some ten days ago?

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the question put by the hon. member for Laurier, I wish to tell him that the names of the directors of the world exhibition will be announced early next week. There has been no delay in these appointments which required discussions between the three levels of government concerned, that is the federal government on the one hand and, on the other the provincial government and the authorities of the city of Montreal.

Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the house, may I say also, in relation to that world exhibition, that contrary to statements which are found in some newspapers there is no delay in the setting up of the organization in charge of preparing that exhibition.

I shall be very brief, Mr. Speaker.

Invitations have been sent to all countries interested in that exhibition. Town-planners' studies respecting selection of a site are in progress, and we think that as early as next week we will be able to give precise details to the public, who seem to show a keen interest for all matters related to that world exhibition.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, may I ask a supplementary question following the long answer the minister has just given to a short question?

May I suggest to the minister to pay close attention to rumours going around at the present time to the effect that the appointments will all be of a political nature. I hope that he will see to it that such is not the case.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am of the opinion that it is out of order to make remarks of that kind.

FISHERIES

REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF REPORT OF NORTH PACIFIC COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Fisheries if any progress has been made in the matter of referring the recommendations of the north Pacific commission to the committee on marine and fisheries?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): I have nothing to add to the answer which I have given on, I think, three previous occasions.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister and ask him whether any action has been taken by the government to approve by order in council the two specific recommendations by the international north Pacific fisheries commission that Japan be allowed to fish herring off the west coast of the Queen Charlotte islands and halibut in the Bering sea.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

PUNTLEDGE RIVER, B.C.—WORKS TO PROTECT FISH RUNS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Has the minister received any commitment from the government of British Columbia that they are prepared to see that protective works are constructed on the Puntledge river to protect the fishing runs which are at present being damaged by the installations of B.C. hydro?

Mr. Speaker: I think that question should go on the order paper. It is important, or may be important, locally, but it is a matter of detail.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

COMPARATIVE EXPENDITURES BY U.S. AND CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Defence Production. Is the minister in a position to tell the house whether U.S. expenditures for defence production in Canada in 1962 were greater than Canadian expenditures for defence production in the United States in the same period?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member will recognize that this is a question which should be on the order paper. I do not think it is absolutely urgent that we have the information at this present time.

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I notified the minister of my intention to ask the question and I think the minister has the answer.

Mr. Speaker: The decision is still left to the Chair in these matters.

TRADE AND COMMERCE

INFORMATION SUPPLIED TO BUREAU OF STATISTICS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce relative to the present government's policy. Is the minister aware that business firms unable to supply information required by the bureau of statistics have been advised by the bureau to make a guess, as their guess is as good as that of the bureau?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is putting forward a certain point of view.

(Translation):

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

PROTESTS RESPECTING TELEVISION BROADCAST "FATHER GEDEON"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Georges Valade (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State.

Following the many protests I have received concerning the obscene and even pornographic character of the television programs of January 17 and 20 entitled "Le petit monde du père Gédéon"—

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order. I cannot allow the hon. member to go on with his question, since some members have wanted to ask similar ones this week and I suggested that they put them on the order paper.

Mr. Valade: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: No point of order may be raised in this regard.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—REFERENCE OF TREATY TO HOUSE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack Davis (Coast-Capilano): I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Will the government consider referring the Columbia river treaty to the external affairs committee of the house for immediate discussion and review?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have already explained on quite a few previous occasions that before the treaty is ratified it will be referred to the standing committee on external affairs.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will you do it now?

Mr. Arthur Laing (Vancouver South): I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Will he tell us which department of government is currently carrying on negotiations with the government of the United States in respect of the Columbia river treaty?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, that also has been explained in the house on more than one occasion.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It has never been.

LABOUR RELATIONS

NORRIS COMMISSION—INQUIRY AS TO COMPLETION OF WORK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Douglas Fisher (Port Arthur): I would like to ask the Minister of Labour whether he has any information on the likelihood of the commission of inquiry into shipping matters on the great lakes being completed by the opening of the navigation season and, if not, whether the minister is planning any particular steps to ensure that we will not have a continuation of labour strife on the great lakes?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, my information is that the commission of inquiry expects to have its work done prior to the opening of the navigation season on the great lakes. So far as strife or disruption on the great lakes is concerned I must say that in the past few years there has been very little of it.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

REPLACEMENT OF DAMAGED OR DESTROYED F-101 PLANES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John R. Matheson (Leeds): May I direct a question to the minister of defence. Have provisions been made for replacing wastage in respect of F-101's in the R.C.A.F.?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that is a question which should better be placed on the order paper.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

WINNIPEG—INQUIRY AS TO TRANSFERS OF EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. My question is based on the welcome statement he made the other day with regard to transfers of employees from the T.C.A. overhaul base in Winnipeg. Can the minister clarify what will be the position of an employee at Winnipeg seeking promotion in some other area in the system?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): I am pleased that the hon. member has asked for this clarification, because several inquiries have been made of me following the statement to which he has referred. I wish to say that of course there was no intention to prevent an employee bidding for a position anywhere in the corporation. What I meant by saying there would be no transfer was that there would be no transfer of positions. If a senior employee were to bid for a position outside Winnipeg and was successful, he would be replaced by a junior employee and the position would be maintained. Thus the number of positions in Winnipeg would remain exactly the same until the discussions between cabinet representatives and representatives of the crown can take place and a decision can be reached on this matter.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

INQUIRY AS TO HEALTH PROTECTION IN NORTHERN AREAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas R. Berger (Vancouver-Burrard): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Last week I asked the minister what measures were being taken to protect the health of Canada's Eskimo population in view of the dangerously high levels of strontium 90 in northern Canada. Has the minister anything further to report to the house in connection with this matter?

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): As I indicated to the hon. member when this question was asked last week, we have a committee working closely with representatives of the Department of National Health and Welfare. As soon as there is useful information available I shall be happy to report to the house.

Mr. Berger: A supplementary question. Can the minister inform the house whether he has any knowledge at the present time as to when the facts may be available, and the time which is likely to elapse before he can advise the house concerning this situation?

Mr. Dinsdale: I shall be glad to check and give this information to the hon. members.

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY AS TO PROBABLE DATE OF PRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Walter L. Gordon (Davenport): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Finance. Will the minister inform the house when he proposes to bring down a budget for the next fiscal year?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of Finance): I have answered that question on a number of occasions. The last time I did so I believe I said "In due course, and without undue delay".

SECRETARY OF STATE

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REQUEST FOR APPOINTMENT OF RETURNING OFFICERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arthur Laing (Vancouver South): I wish to address a timely question to the Secretary of State. Would the hon. gentleman undertake to see that early appointments are made to fill several vacancies which exist in the province of British Columbia in the position of returning officer?

Hon. G. E. Halpenny (Secretary of State): I shall be glad to.

VOCATIONAL TRAINING

CONSIDERATION OF SUBMISSIONS BY PROVINCIAL MINISTERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I ask the Minister of Labour whether the government has now given consideration to the brief presented to the hon. gentleman by the standing committee of ministers of education regarding federal-provincial technical and vocational training, and whether amendments will be introduced to the act?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Yes. Consideration is being given to the presentation to the government of the suggestions made by the ministers, at which time the government said it would give this matter careful study. A decision will be announced in due course.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MESSENGERS AND CLEANING STAFF—REQUEST FOR SALARY REVIEW

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Can the minister say whether the commissioners of internal economy have as yet undertaken a review of the question of salary increases for messengers and the cleaning staff of the House of Commons?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of Finance): No, not yet.

AGRICULTURE

ARDA—PILOT AREAS UNDER RURAL DEVELOPMENT PROVISION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture arising out of the announcement in the Ottawa Journal that Renfrew county has been selected as the pilot area for Ontario under ARDA and that another county will be selected for Quebec. My question is this. Will there be any general application of this act in other counties this year or will the ARDA projects be confined to a few pilot areas?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): I should be happy to have a chance to get my estimates before the committee again so as to deal with this question in detail. I cannot possibly give a complete answer during this part of our procedure. A short answer might be that each of the provinces has been asked to propose trial counties or districts under the rural development section of the act. This is what the news story is referring to in Renfrew.

Mr. Argue: Will this be the only application of that section in this province this year?

Mr. Hamilton: No. I asked the provinces to select these counties or districts under the rural development section. There are other sections of the act in addition.

PUBLIC SERVICE

GLASSCO COMMISSION—IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to ask the minister responsible for replying in the house on behalf of the Minister without Portfolio from Gormley when we can expect a progress report in this house on the progress being made by this gentleman in implementing the recommendations of the Glassco report, particularly the major ones relating to the reform of the treasury board.

[Later:]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should like to ask the Prime Minister in his capacity as reporter to this house for the Minister without Portfolio whether any concrete steps have been taken since that minister was made head of the cabinet committee to carry out the recommendations of the Glassco report.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Pickersgill: A supplementary question. Can the Prime Minister tell us what they are?

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. gentleman being an authority on the rules, I suggest he put that question on the order paper.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REPRESENTATIONS FROM B.C. TRADE UNIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Has the Minister of Labour received representations from trade unions in British Columbia urging delay in the introduction of amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act based on the Gill commission report until organized labour has had an opportunity to discuss this question thoroughly among its membership and, later, with the government?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That question might preferably be asked when the estimates of the minister are before the house. I understand they are to follow immediately upon the completion of orders of the day.

COMBINES

DRUGS—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): The other day the Minister of Justice indicated in response to a question that he expected the report of the restrictive trade practices commission relating to drugs to be made available "any day now"; I believe those were his words. May I ask the minister whether he has yet received this particular report?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Justice): Yes, I have received the report. It was delivered to my office a week ago yesterday, late in the day, and it reached my desk the next morning.

Mr. Howard: Can the minister indicate when this report will be made public?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In accordance with the statute, within 30 days of my receipt of it.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether he has with him today the document which Arthur Blakely says he had in his pocket yesterday, namely an order for the dissolution of parliament?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is quite hypothetical.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Chown in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

General administration—

1. Department administration including a grant of $10,000 to Frontier College and the expenses of the international labour conferences, $1,321,700.

(Translation):

Mr. Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Chairman, when the house adjourned Wednesday evening last I was recommending greater participation by the industrial development bank to the setting up and creation of new industries in Canada.

Certainly, if we want to reduce unemployment and recapture economic control over our industries, which are now in American hands, we must also find the financial means required by our industrial development.

I should like also to draw the attention of the house to a comment found in this morning's press, to the effect that the lack of development of the Canadian financial system, the lack of expansion of the monetary supply is at the very root of unemployment now prevailing in Canada and of the "non-development" of our industries.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the house and this government are duty bound to ponder seriously that lack of financial possibilities for the development of our industry in Canada.

I think that the present regulations of the industrial development bank will have to be modified in order to supply the capital required for the multiplication of Canadian industries.

Of course, it is perhaps difficult for the government to require private enterprise to create new industries. But I believe that the Department of Trade and Commerce, which must provide for the development of our industries, is in a position to convince our industrialists that certain imported goods could be manufactured economically in Canada. It is the duty of that department to make the necessary publicity to that effect, and it is also its duty to develop the interest of our industrialists toward certain particular fields.

In my opinion, it is up to the government to provide the necessary facilities for those industries to establish themselves preferably in communities where unemployment is most acute.

The government's winter works program has greatly contributed to the stabilization of the economy. However, I should like to point out to the minister that as long as the unemployment situation has not improved substantially in Canada, he will have to allow certain works to be carried out at a more appropriate time of the year.

At present, the program is in effect from October to May but I call the minister's attention to the fact that certain projects can be undertaken by municipalities only in the fall, a period which is too short in some cases.

It should be taken into account how ridiculous it is that workers are idle in the summer and can only find jobs for a few months during the coldest period of the year, that is in January and February.

This is not logical because those workers who were unable to find jobs in the fine summer months, must buy warmer and very expensive clothes to work outside in the winter months. Now, they often work only a few days and their earnings are barely enough to pay for those clothes.

There is also another aspect to winter works. I should like to point out in particular the serious problem which will probably prompt several municipalities to curtail their winter works. A great number of our municipalities are hard put to find the necessary funds to take part in the winter works program, because we know that even though the government pays 50 per cent of the labour costs, nevertheless municipalities must provide 10 per cent and pay, in addition, the material, equipment and machinery required for the carrying out of those winter works.

In fact, most of our municipalities are so involved in debt that they cannot spend any more money without increasing the already too heavy burden of taxes resting upon the citizens' shoulders.

I believe the only possible solution would be that the government set up a municipal development bank to enable our municipalities to borrow on easy terms, to increase their contribution to the winter works program, and even to carry out certain projects which nearly all of them have been looking forward to for a long time.

Mr. Chairman, the government has also shown that it was conscious of the problem arising from automation and its effects by introducing Bill No. C-83 at the beginning of the session. When this bill comes before us again, we shall give it a more thorough consideration. Since my time is running out, I shall await another opportunity to discuss it at greater length.

The Minister of Labour now has in his hands several briefs which were submitted to him by trade unions, as well as the Gill report on the unemployment insurance commission and the national employment service. Worthy recommendations have been put forward by everybody and I hope that with the co-operation of all the groups concerned with the matter—there is quite a number of them—improvements can be made to increase the efficiency of this branch which is trying to find jobs for the unemployed.

I am of the opinion that the development of these services has been completely neglected in the past, although they are of the utmost importance and should have deserved the continued attention of the responsible authorities. I will leave the more thorough discussion of the problems concerning unemployment insurance to others who wish to take part in this debate.

Before bringing my remarks to a close, I should like to point out to the minister my satisfaction in seeing that he is fully conscious of the problems resulting from unemployment in our country, but I believe other measures as well would also be desirable besides those which have been adopted so far. I am myself interested in labour conditions, and I know that the solutions are not easy to find. However, with the co-operation of the members of the cabinet and of his colleagues, I believe the minister should obtain, even demand that a greater share of the estimates be provided for areas which are more heavily affected by unemployment. On the other hand, I know that their budgets are limited but, nevertheless, since the Minister of Public Works is responsible for the carrying out of government projects in the country, he should take into consideration, while preparing his budget, the areas affected and provide special projects for them. The areas with surplus manpower should benefit from a greater share of the budget. In these areas, several projects have been submitted to the minister concerned. Therefore, I should like above all to ask the Minister of Labour to exert pressure on his colleague the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fulton) to put at the disposal of those areas larger amounts of money for the works likely to improve their economy.

The formula is merely a temporary one. Only an increase in the number of industries will bring stability and will substantially reduce unemployment in the various sections of the country.

Statistics reveal that we have 414,000 unemployed in the country, 154,000 of whom are in the province of Quebec. In my opinion, this situation should make the cabinet members conscious of their responsibility to adopt means likely to reduce unemployment in all parts of this country. In fact, the province of Quebec is just as much entitled as any other part of the country, if not more so, to its share of government expenditures and investments.

Mr. Chairman, I know that my time has expired. On behalf of our group, I should like to assure the minister of our co-operation in making the discussions as brief as possible so that he may introduce without delay new estimates for 1963-1964 which will show us what he intends to do next year, provided of course, this session continues.

(Text):

Mr. Berger: I think it is entirely fitting that, having discussed yesterday the No. 1 problem which Canada faces in the field of foreign affairs, we should devote today to discussing the No. 1 problem which Canada faces in the field of domestic affairs, namely that of unemployment. It seems to me that when the estimates of the Minister of Labour come before the committee the minister ought to deal primarily with this problem of unemployment, and that the committee ought likewise to devote its time primarily to this problem.

Many of us recall that when the session opened the government, when it brought down the speech from the throne, promised to create a million new jobs. Since that time the government has created many new jobs. However, the trouble is that all these new jobs have gone to defeated Tory candidates. In the meantime, according to the latest unemployment figures which we have, covering the month of December, 1962, 414,000 Canadians were unemployed. This figure represented 6.3 per cent of the labour force. That figure meant that 414,000 men and women did not have jobs. It meant that they and their families were suffering. It meant that they were deprived of the opportunity of taking an equal part in the development of this country.

I think it is essential that the minister and this committee should realize the magnitude of that figure; I refer to the figure of 414,000 wage earners and salary earners who are out of work. That figure is equivalent to the entire male labour force of the province of British Columbia. The situation is just the same as it would be if every man in British Columbia were without a job. Surely under those circumstances the committee would be able to persuade the Minister of Labour and the government that the unemployment situation was critical, that we faced an emergency condition, and that something ought to be done about it.

I am going to discuss later what the government has done about it and what we think it ought to do about it. Before doing that, however, let me point out to the committee that the figure of 414,000 unemployed is equal to two thirds of the labour force of the Atlantic region. This unemployment figure is one which although it is less than that of a year ago, remains nevertheless a figure which ought to be of grave concern to the minister, the government, the committee and the house. If the entire male labour force of British Columbia were out of work, or if two thirds of the entire labour force of the Atlantic region were out of work, this committee would demand that the government mobilize the resources of this country in order to put those people back to work. I suggest that under the present circumstances we ought to treat the situation as being just as critical. I suggest that we ought to require the minister and the government to mobilize the resources of the country in order to make sure that those 414,000 people go back to work at the earliest possible opportunity.

It is easy in Canada to get people worked up over a strike. Editorial writers rush into print as soon as a strike or a lockout takes place. However, the time lost as a result of strikes over the last 50 years of Canada's history averages less than 0.2 per cent of the total working time each year. The secretary of labour in the United States Mr. Wirtz, said recently that he was appalled by the realization that in the United States more man hours were lost as a result of unemployment in 1962 than were lost from strikes in the preceding 35 years. Yet editorial writers become concerned about the loss of employment, the loss of man hours and the loss of production which results from strikes and lockouts while this tremendous problem of unemployment which we have had in Canada for many years has ceased to agitate them.

I put the matter in this vivid way in order to bring home to the members of the committee the importance of the problem. If the entire male labour force of British Columbia were out of work we believe that editorial writers would not accept half measures; they would demand action on the part of the government. Instead, when facing just as critical a problem as that, what do we have from the government? No one suggests that the Minister of Labour has not tackled this problem in all sincerity. What we object to is the fact that the government's program has not been adequate to meet the emergency. What we object to is the fact that the government's program affects only the fringes of the unemployment problem.

What have the government done about unemployment? They have instituted a do it now program. They have instituted a winter works program. They have instituted a system of capital grants to the provinces to enable the provinces to carry on technical and vocational training. All these things reflect credit upon the minister and the government, but they do not go far enough. They do not get to the root of the problem. They constitute a form of unemployment after-care. Nothing has been done to eradicate the hard core unemployment problem, a problem that we have had in this country for many years. This hard core of unemployment has existed ever since world war II.

I know that earlier this week the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate told the house that during the 12 years following the war we had full employment in this country. Those are the very words he used; they appear in Hansard. I think it will be acknowledged in all parts of the house, even among members of his own party, that the hon. member's statement was entirely inaccurate. As a matter of fact his own leader, the Leader of the Opposition, during the debate on the speech from the throne told us that during the 12 years following the war under a Liberal regime unemployment averaged 3 per cent each year. I do not blame the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate for not listening to the speeches of his leader, but I suggest that at least he ought to read them occasionally if only to avoid being unaware of the abrupt changes in policy that the Leader of the Opposition makes from time to time.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege, I apologize to the hon. gentleman because I was not listening to his speech at all. Could he tell me what he was complaining about in my conduct?

Mr. Berger: I was not complaining. I do not think the hon. member's conduct can be a matter of complaint. I was talking about a speech the hon. member made in the house earlier this week in which he said, and this appears in Hansard, that during the 12 years following the second world war we had full employment in this country. I pointed out that this was entirely at variance with what the Leader of the Opposition said during the debate on the speech from the throne, when the Leader of the Opposition stated that during those 12 years unemployment averaged 3 per cent each year. I suggested to the hon. member that he should read the speeches of the Leader of the Opposition even if he was not prepared to listen to them.

At any rate, the point I was seeking to make was that the statement that we had full employment in this country for 12 years following the war is nothing more or less than arrogant nonsense. Many of us had friends and relatives who were unemployed for years during that 12 year period, and I suggest it is not doing justice to the problem or being fair to the house to make statements of that kind.

Today unemployment is declining. From 1953 to 1961 unemployment rose from 3 per cent to 7.2 per cent on the basis of the annual average. During the same period the average during the winter months rose from 4.3 per cent in 1953 to 11 per cent in 1961.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the hon. gentleman say what figures those are? Are they bureau of statistics figures?

Mr. Berger: Yes, they are. In 1962 the unemployment figure was 5.9 per cent. This represents a decline but, as I said earlier, this represented 414,000 unemployed. The Minister of Labour and the government do not know why unemployment rose sharply from 1953 to 1961. They do not know why it declined slightly from 1961 to 1962. They do not know whether it is going to rise again. They do not know whether it is going to decline further. They do not know what to do about the hard core unemployment that we have had in this country for so many years. The government simply do not know where unemployment comes from, and I suggest they do not know where it goes.

What is most regrettable about the vast unemployment that we have in this country is not the loss of production involved but the demoralizing effect that idleness has upon men and women. Enforced idleness breeds a sense of frustration and uselessness, a consciousness of personal degradation, and this is far more damaging to our society than the loss of production which their idleness represents.

The government's program is one which over a six year period has proved inadequate by any standard. The government have had almost six years to cope with unemployment and do something about it, and they have failed utterly. After six years in office unemployment averaged almost 6 per cent last year. We had 414,000 Canadians unemployed in December, 1962, after the government had had six years to do something about the problem. Many of us recall the empty promise that the Prime Minister made during the election campaign of 1958, when he said that no one would suffer from unemployment as long as he was Prime Minister.

In view of the government's failure, why does the government not adopt a program of genuine economic planning? This is the means by which other countries in the world have cured the unemployment problem. This is how the countries of western Europe and the Scandinavian countries have achieved prosperity and full employment. Why does the government persist in refusing to adopt a program of genuine economic planning? This would involve the expansion of public investment and the regulation of private investment. It would involve the location and relocation of industry. It would involve other measures which come under the heading of modern, genuine, economic planning.

Why does the government not adopt such a program? After all, what is more important than the provision of jobs for more than 400,000 Canadians who together with their families are suffering, who are not able to enjoy the good things of life that should be the right of every citizen in a country with the abundance that Canada has? What is more important, to provide these people with jobs or to continue to pay homage, as the government does, to economic clichés that have no validity under present day conditions?

When we in the New Democratic party talk about full employment we are talking about something that cannot really be measured statistically. We believe that we will never have full employment in this country until there are more jobs than there are people to fill them. When we reach that situation, Mr. Chairman, it will mean that if there are people moving from job to job, if there are people temporarily unemployed, all of them will live secure in the knowledge that there is useful work for them to do when they are able to do it and when they are required to undertake it.

Speakers in the government party and in the Liberal party, as well as spokesmen for some segments of business and industry in this country, have talked about what they call tolerable levels of unemployment. We in this party do not talk about tolerable levels of unemployment; we regard unemployment as intolerable.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is not just the manual workers, the craftsmen and the labourers who are the victims of unemployment in Canada today. The white collar worker is increasingly becoming the victim of unemployment. We are all aware of the enormous effect which automation has had upon those engaged in manual work. But we should all realize, and this was apparent from a study made by the economics and research branch of the Department of Labour a year ago, that although automation has increased the number of people required to tabulate and administer and distribute the products of our industrial machine, office mechanization and automation has already cut into that increase. The rate of increase of employment for the white collar worker is already declining. Office mechanization and automation has resulted in the displacement of people employed in sales, administrative and clerical work.

As a matter of fact, an article appeared in the Globe and Mail for November 23, 1962 headed "Automation May Soon Cut Middle-Management Ranks". It is a report by Ronald Anderson and reads in part as follows:

> Automation, which has been blamed for high unemployment among unskilled workers, may soon cut into the ranks of middle-management.
> Professor J. A. Sarjeant of the University of Toronto school of business told a graduate seminar this week the number of middle-management jobs will be reduced during the next ten years as computors take over many of the planning operations.

Now, Mr. Chairman, business plans ahead, industry plans ahead, so why should not the government of Canada plan ahead? It is essential that the government plan ahead, that the government set some course for Canada's economy, that the government lay down an economic blueprint for this country; otherwise the unemployment problem will get worse and worse as the years go by. It is going to have an increasing effect not only upon the manual worker but also upon the white collar worker.

We in this party believe that in years past we have been governed in this country by people who felt no sense of challenge; we have been governed by people who had neither the imagination nor the will to grapple with the difficulties we face. We have a Prime Minister who cannot make up his mind. We have a Leader of the Opposition who keeps changing his mind.

We observed them yesterday indulging in childish recriminations. These people have no solutions, they offer no solutions to the enormous problems that face us. They denounce a party that proposes a program of genuine economic planning and refer to that program as "magic nostrums". At the same time they propose, for purely political considerations, policies of debt free money. The two party system in this country is today a thing of the past because the two old parties have utterly failed to comprehend the problems that Canada faces in the second half of the twentieth century. We saw yesterday their paucity of ideas and the inconsistency of their policies in relation to foreign affairs. We have seen in this debate, as we have in previous debates during this parliament, evidence of the fact they are at a loss to know what to do about unemployment.

We in this party, Mr. Chairman, believe it is the responsibility of the government of this country to plan our economy to make sure that we achieve prosperity and full employment, to make sure there is useful work for every man and woman who wants to work. We believe it is the responsibility of the government of this country to bring about that situation. We think it could be done if only the government had the imagination and the will to do it, because it has been done in so many other countries in other parts of the world.

We in the New Democratic party, Mr. Chairman, so long as this parliament lasts will fight to make sure that the government discharges its responsibilities to the people of Canada, and more particularly to ensure that this government discharges its responsibilities to the unemployed of Canada by providing jobs for people who should have had them long ago.

Mr. Rapp: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate the Minister of Labour upon the tremendous work he is doing in his department. I must say that the minister is not only familiar with labour problems and with employment, but he is also an authority on agriculture. I have had the privilege of having the minister speak in my constituency, and to say the least I was very much surprised that a person in his occupation would be so familiar with agriculture in the west. My people were really much impressed with his knowledge of this subject.

With this background of knowledge about agriculture and agricultural problems, I should like to bring to his attention one problem with which we are faced in the west. I refer to the problem of farm labour. Over the years science and technology have advanced to the point where some of our farms are getting bigger and some of our farms are shrinking in size. As a result the farm labourer seeks employment somewhere else. One reason a farm labourer seeks employment somewhere else is the discrimination against farm labour. His counterpart may seek employment in the cities and have available to him the advantages of unemployment insurance. This is not available to the farm labourer. I was very much disturbed in 1957 when I read that another class of employee had been covered by unemployment insurance. I refer to the fishermen. In 1957 it was not only the employees in the fishing industry who were covered by unemployment insurance but also the self employed fishermen.

Before I continue I should like to make one statement, and it is this. I am not against fishermen receiving the benefits of unemployment insurance; far from it. If there is a problem in the fishing industry it should have been taken care of under the Unemployment Insurance Act or by other means. At the time the then minister of fisheries, Mr. Sinclair, and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate saw to it that the act was amended to give benefits to unemployed fishermen, there was not one member of the Liberal party or of the Liberal ministry who was concerned about the unemployed farm labourer. This was the time when they should have made representations, when the farm labourers should also have been covered by insurance, but this was not done.

I have brought this problem of the unemployed farm labourer to the attention of the house on many occasions.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And I supported you many times.

Mr. Rapp: However, since a royal commission was appointed in 1961 I could not continue introducing bills and bringing this matter to the attention of parliament until the report of that commission was tabled. That commission has done good work in reaching some conclusions and recommendations, but there is one point on which I cannot agree with the report. Paragraph 20 of the report contains this statement:

> We recommend that the general principle be followed of extending coverage as broadly as possible so long as the necessary administrative procedures may be carried out to see to it that the rules of the plan are adhered to in a satisfactory fashion.

That is dealing with farm labourers, but on the other hand the commission says it is not able to recommend administrative procedures. What is the difference between administrative procedures for the farm labourer and administrative procedures for the self employed fisherman? If it was possible to include the self employed fishermen without encountering administrative difficulties, then I am certain farm labourers should also have been included. In my opinion this was discrimination against the farm labourers.

I would like the minister to give this particular paragraph of the report his earnest consideration when he comes to deal with the matter. From personal experience I know many small farmers experience difficulties in obtaining labour during the harvest time or any other rush season. I also know that many farmers who have increased their acreage over the years must now either dispose of some of their holdings or discontinue farming altogether. Last year, when we had a fairly good season and the crops were satisfactory, many farmers had to leave bales in the field because they could not get farm labourers to draw them in. I myself approached the unemployment insurance office in Saskatoon, but although there were many labourers on the unemployed list, casual labourers, they did not want to take the work because they said "If we go out we will not be able to put stamps into our unemployment insurance books." They said had farm labourers been covered by the Unemployment Insurance Act they would be glad to come out and have an opportunity to put these stamps on their books, thus extending their eligibility for unemployment insurance.

Over the years since 1958 this matter has been raised in the house more than once, and from all sides of the house. There seem to be many members who are in full agreement that the farm labourer should be dealt with in the same way as other labourers, and it is time this was done. The commission report, dealing with administrative difficulties, says there is difficulty on account of a father and son claiming unemployment insurance, but that problem does not apply only to farm families. This is a difficulty which concerns other employees too, and I suggest regulations could be introduced to prevent such collusion.

I know the minister is very anxious to have his estimates approved and I shall not take much more of his time, except to ask him to take into consideration my representations and the representations of many farm organizations and other interested parties, in seeing that the farm labourer is brought under the Unemployment Insurance Act, the same as other segments of our labour force. In my opinion the time is long overdue for this discriminatory section in the act to be removed.

Mr. Munro: Mr. Chairman, I have read with considerable interest the remarks of the Minister of Labour when introducing his estimates. I do not intend, and I do not believe anybody in this party intends, to prolong introductory remarks because there are so many fields the minister touched upon that will require detailed questioning as we deal with the estimates item by item.

The most serious problem is that of unemployment, which has been dealt with by the hon. member for Kootenay East on behalf of this party, and by other party spokesmen. On January 30 the Minister of Labour dealt with this topic more or less at the tail end of his speech and did not express too much concern about the unemployment figures, other than to reiterate that on the basis of those figures things were looking up.

The latest figures issued by the dominion bureau of statistics indicate that there are over 400,000 people unemployed. This is disturbing enough, but the statistics also refer to 374,000 people claimants for unemployment insurance. When one relates that figure of 374,000 to the total of 414,000 it leads me immediately to question, as many have done, the accuracy of these statistics so far as the dominion bureau is concerned. Not for one moment do I think the figure of 414,000 unemployed, serious and grave as it is, is a true reflection of the number of unemployed in the country. Winter works programs and the like take many people off the unemployment rolls for a week or ten days, and I do not think those people properly reflect the number of casual workers. I know that in years gone by discussions have taken place in parliament in which it was advocated that a committee be set up to study the accuracy of these figures.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The government has always refused to set it up.

Mr. Munro: I certainly would welcome such a committee and I may say so far as this party are concerned we challenge the accuracy of the figures. I for one accept them as a minimal indication of the number of unemployed, but I think the number is much greater. I think the sooner we have the means of getting accurate information about unemployment in this country the better it will be, especially with regard to the taking of concrete steps to deal with this problem.

As a new member of parliament I find it frustrating and disappointing to have been appointed to the industrial relations committee, which is a standing committee of this house, only to find it has never held a meeting and that presumably there is no likelihood of any meetings being held before the dissolution of this parliament. We hear screams about obstruction by this side of the house, but it should be realized that we have been sitting since September 27 and that four months have now passed during which the government could have convened this committee, when we might have examined in detail within that committee not only the accuracy of the figures and the means taken to record those figures, but the nature of the solution which has been proposed for this cancer in the economy.

The programs to which the minister has referred have been beneficial to an extent, and the idea behind them is good. However, their execution has left something to be desired, especially in urban areas. I think many of the retraining programs designed to deal with unemployment leave a great deal undone, especially in specific urban areas such as Hamilton and Toronto. Thousands of people who do not speak English adequately have come to this country in the last four or five years. They have found it almost impossible to qualify for any of these courses because of this language handicap. Yet these are the very people who are suffering most from the effects of unemployment because they are, for the most part, construction workers; they were unskilled when they came here, and they qualified as labourers in the construction industry. They are subject to all the griefs associated with this type of work, the seasonal nature of the occupation and so on.

I would be interested to hear from the minister what concrete policies his government is willing to adopt to tackle this problem. I should like to find out whether the government, in co-operation with the provinces, has made any detailed plans for the setting up of teaching staff so this difficulty can be overcome, perhaps by arranging for a preliminary language course in connection with these training programs so that those concerned might qualify. As I indicated, there are thousands of these people involved, and they are receiving no attention from the government. A number of organizations, Italian, Ukrainian and the like, have submitted briefs to both the provincial and federal governments asking that action be taken in this regard, but they have received no concrete assurances regarding a solution of this difficulty.

I do not wish to be redundant in speaking about the seriousness of unemployment. We all know how tragic unemployment is and what a cancer it is in our society. Hon. members from urban areas understand this especially well because they are constantly exposed to the representations of those who are not able to find steady work and who do not have sufficient income to take care of their families. The situation is almost unbelievable when one contrasts it with the usual terms in which one thinks of Canada as being a country of wealth, prosperity and unlimited resources. We look around at each other and see how well we live and how well we dress. I think we are isolated here from what goes on in the rest of the country.

If this situation continues it can only lead to loss of confidence among these people not only in Canada but in themselves. This problem of unemployment is one which all the resources of government should be centralized to cure. It is the foremost and outstanding problem now before the present administration. In my opinion it is questionable whether the Department of Labour has the facilities needed to cope with it. So it has come up with stopgap measures. The winter works program is, I believe, strictly a stopgap measure. I do not see in it the promise which the Minister of Labour discerns, one reason being that it requires such large scale financial participation by the municipality in order to make it work. The government, as hon. members know, contributes only labour costs. How long can the municipalities go on submitting these projects in the light of their depleted treasuries and constantly growing financial responsibility?

I know this question arises as far as Hamilton is concerned, because with regard to unemployment Hamilton at times attains the status of a depressed area. It is my belief we shall not be able to submit many more applications under this winter works program simply because the civic budget will not stand the strain. Thus we shall not be able to take advantage of even the temporary benefits which accrue under this program.

I have pointed out the shortcomings of the training programs as far as they affect new Canadians. It would be highly interesting, I think, to have a breakdown of the unemployment figures showing the racial origins of those without work, the length of time they have been in this country and so on. I think those figures would be a surprising revelation. Obviously the Department of Labour has been unable to find any solution to unemployment except stop gap measures. I do not think that is the fault of the department itself. I think because of its very nature the department is limited in what it can do. It will require all the resources of the government as well as of the department directly concerned in order to tackle this question; it will need monetary and economic policies designed expressly for its solution.

The speech from the throne indicated that the government intended to present a bold new program to combat unemployment. Well, several new boards have been or are to be set up. There is the national economic development board, the Atlantic development board and the manpower adjustment council which is going to set up yet another board. But it should be remembered that after four months we still have not got the national economic development board. On the other hand, having looked at the terms of the bill, which seem to me devoid of any substance, it appears questionable how effective this board would be, especially in the absence of any statement from the government about its relation with the other boards, some of which I have mentioned. I suggest the government has dragged its feet with regard to explaining the power this board would have to set economic goals.

The minister referred to the national productivity council and talked about consultation which had taken place between management and labour, but nowhere in his speech could I find any indication of precisely how the government intends to implement the findings of the mission to Europe or the discussions which took place at the conference. They obviously came to the conclusion that certain government action was required in this area, but nowhere do we see any concrete, detailed government planning into which any of the opposition parties can put their teeth so as to implement their findings. Obviously the only way we can implement the findings, not only of the mission to Europe but resulting from consultations across the country, is by some type of legislation which we have not yet seen.

It has often been expressed by many speakers in this house, and I reiterate, that it would appear the government does not really and sincerely advocate planning in order to combat our problems. Without going into the origin of this idea I think we all agree now that something has to be done and that planning should be instituted. Until we pass the concrete measures which are necessary in order to show in what direction this country is going and how we intend to combat this problem, this tragic condition of unemployment will continue.

Another matter sadly lacking in the opening speech of the minister is any indication of the basic philosophy which lies behind his department's program. We do not have any indication of how we stand in relation to labour. Perhaps this lacuna has gone on year after year and it is felt that it is not necessary. As a new member looking at the estimates of the department, there seem to be certain basic principles and tenets which the department accepts and adheres to as far as the rights of labour and management are concerned, and perhaps the department is prepared to acknowledge this. Or maybe it feels that this is too controversial and will not even indicate a general philosophy in these two areas.

I think before the department can realistically go into all these matters of conciliation procedures, the encouragement of labour-management co-operation, and economic and research areas, they certainly must have a basic program of beliefs as far as the rights of labour are concerned. I see no government position—and I think this is an area where you would expect it—enunciated with respect to employees of the civil service and their demand for collective bargaining rights and arbitration. That is not even referred to. To my mind a general statement outlining the estimates and activities of the department for the forthcoming year would be just the place. Again perhaps this is an area of responsibility which the Department of Labour wishes to evade.

Nowhere do I see any basic philosophies or beliefs on the part of the Department of Labour with respect to minimum wage legislation, weekly working hours or vacations with pay. I think every country has accepted certain standard regulations with respect to these questions, but not Canada. Apparently it is an area which the Department of Labour wants to avoid. I think when we go over the estimates item by item it will be seen that the government must be prepared to take their stand on these controversial matters.

In conclusion all I can say, coming from an urban area with a great amount of unemployment, is that I am terribly disappointed to find there has really been no concrete action taken by the government other than, as I say, a winter works program and what I consider to be stopgap, temporary measures. There has been no concrete long range program or policy enunciated by the Minister of Labour to show in what direction his department is going, or in what direction the government intends to go in the forthcoming years to cure a cancer such as 6.3 per cent of our labour force out of work. Until the government and the Minister of Labour are prepared to come before this house and the Canadian people and show, apart from temporary measures, a longe range program of how they intend to cope with this question and provide for one million more jobs in the next five years, there will be no satisfaction in the government indicated either by this opposition or by the Canadian people.

Mr. Scott: Mr. Chairman, I have a few remarks I should like to put on the record at this time. In keeping with the spirit of co-operation which our party is exhibiting in passing these estimates, I will use up only a portion of the time which would normally be available to me.

I should like to say something about the unemployment problem. I have read with a great deal of interest the speech of the minister delivered at the commencement of our consideration of his estimates, particularly the section dealing with unemployment. The most disturbing thing about the minister's speech with regard to the question of unemployment was that it exhibited a smug, self-satisfied attitude toward this problem. It indicates that as far as the government is concerned unemployment is treated as an inconvenient problem which it does not know how to deal with and somehow wishes would quietly fade away.

I think the real trouble, or one of the troubles, is that since this parliament assembled and began discussing problems such as unemployment both the government and the official opposition have treated the whole problem as some sort of statistical matter. We have spent hours in this house listening to the government and the official opposition arguing between themselves as to who had the highest rate of unemployment when they were respectively misgoverning the country. We have heard these endless quarrels, and the result of all this shadow boxing, treating unemployment as just a mass of statistics, is that we are losing track of the fact that people who are out of work are not statistics. They are men and women with children. They are Canadians.

Every week end my office in my constituency, which is an urban one, is flooded with people who are out of work and who are bringing problems they ask us to try to solve. The most discouraging thing about this is that with the policies in effect in Canada today, with the lack of programming which seems to face us, there is no way in which I can hold out any real hope to these people that jobs will become available for them. The minister tells us that there is only 6.3 per cent of the work force out of work, instead of 6.4 per cent at the same time last year. This is very nice and we are very glad to hear it, but the fact remains that there are still 414,000 people in this country unemployed. This means in reality that the cold, ruthless hand of unemployment is reaching out and gripping the lives of nearly a million Canadians, if you add to the number of unemployed their families and the other people depending upon them.

Where is our sense of urgency about this problem? Why must we always consider it merely a statistical matter? Where is our belief and our determination that the problem of unemployment is not a statistical question but is one of the most pressing, vital and compelling problems facing Canada today? Why can we not get rid of this passive acceptance of unemployment, this smug idea that all these people out of work is somehow a normal thing and that there is nothing very much we can do about it; that it happens every winter, and we are just going to have to endure the fact that a million of our fellow Canadians are being affected by it?

Let us try to look at this problem in terms of what it is like to be unemployed. For example, the maximum income obtainable under unemployment insurance is $33 a week.

Mr. Starr: It is $36.

Mr. Scott: Well, $36; it does not really matter that much. I have with me the brochure of the Montreal council of social agencies in which they have examined the problems of family life in Canada and set out the minimum requirements for adequate living. If we take a family of a man, his wife and two children we find that just for the bare subsistence level they are obliged to spend $87 a month on food, $14 a month on fuel and $70 a month on rent. This is a total of $171, a figure which exceeds the maximum amount which they can obtain in a month under unemployment insurance.

What does this mean to the man who is unemployed? It means that even if he is able to adequately feed his family and keep his premises, he will have no money left over with which to pay the mortgage on his home, taxes, light, or water, anything for clothing, or to have anything at all left over for recreation. This is what it is like to be on unemployment insurance.

These are the statistics we are talking about. These are the conditions under which our fellow Canadians are forced to live in this society of ours today. No bills can be paid. Mortgages fall behind. Insurance policies lapse. Creditors chase them. There are garnishee orders and court actions. Tension grows in the family. A sense of frustration develops in the man of the house, and it is not long before he begins to feel that our society does not really care about him, that he is an inconvenient problem and ought to go away somewhere. How are we going to justify our system to this man? Why should he continue to have faith in a society which does not really care about him and which is prepared to cast him aside?

It is because week after week we see conditions of this kind in our ridings that we are nauseated by the monthly spectacle of the Minister of Labour. Every month when the unemployment statistics are released we have this nauseating spectacle of the minister doing a dance of joy because there are only 414,000 persons out of work instead of 550,000. It is a dreadful spectacle for us to witness.

If one looks at the people whose unemployment insurance benefits have run out and who are forced to take welfare, one finds that the situation is even worse. A single person is allowed $7.45 a week for food and $5.75 a week for furnished, heated shelter. Nobody could even exist on an allowance of that type. A man with a wife and family is allowed $42.95 a month for heated accommodation and $64.50 a month for food. Again, Mr. Chairman, these are the conditions under which we are suggesting that our fellow Canadians should live.

I say that behind the statistics lies a tale of national tragedy and national suffering which ought to make us in this chamber ashamed of the unemployment situation. That is why when I commenced my remarks I asked this question. Where is our sense of urgency about this matter? Why can we not recognize that the unemployment problem is probably one of the greatest questions confronting our country? Why can we not set full employment as an objective of government? As I said previously, I do not think we in this House of Commons really understand what our fellow Canadians are going through. Sometimes I think that we here are five or six light years removed from reality.

I should like to suggest that the entire cabinet and the whole House of Commons have their parliamentary salaries suspended and that they be placed on unemployment insurance for three months. I should like to suggest that the hon. gentlemen in the other place have their salaries suspended and that they go on welfare for three months. Let the members of the House of Commons and the members of the other place try to live on the income on which one million Canadians are being obliged to live. I suggest that, when the three months were over, we would come back here very much convinced of the urgency of this matter and very much prepared to do something about it, and to bring in a program that we have failed to bring in up to this time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Why did not your party help us in this house during the last four years in our opposition to the government because it did nothing? We had to fight all alone.

An hon. Member: They did as much as your government did.

Mr. Scott: Here we go again, Mr. Chairman, with the old shadow boxing back and forth. Every time this matter is raised the hon. member for Essex East has some inane comment to make about the government, and they have the same comments to make about him. It is the old shadow boxing back and forth between the two old parties. They do not have an answer for this problem. They do not have any programs that are designed to cure it. Because they do not wish to face up to it they spend all their time in this House of Commons fighting each other back and forth, trying to justify the situation.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What about your party?

Mr. Scott: That is all we get from the old parties. The Liberal party is no better than the Conservative party. It has not a program either, in spite of all the hogwash they are trying to deliver in this House of Commons.

An hon. Member: Just a family quarrel.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Loud but limited cheers.

[Mr. Scott.]

Mr. Scott: As I was saying, the future problems of unemployment will become even more difficult. The members of our party and the members of the other opposition parties have tried to emphasize the fact that the whole problem of unemployment will become even greater in the years ahead; that the number of children between the ages of 14 and 19 who are still at school, probably 1,200,000 or more, whose education is acting as a dam to hold them back, one of these days will begin to spill on the labour market at the rate of a quarter of a million a year. We have the increasing dislocation through automation mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard. I think the minister should be very much worried about the statistics.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce stated that we have had a 7 per cent increase in the gross national product. That is a very good thing. It is one of the best years we have ever had. However, in the same year unemployment dropped by only 1 per cent, something which gives the ominous information that automation is working far faster than any of us thought it might work, and that even a large growth such as that which we had last year is not sufficient significantly to cut into the very large core of existing unemployment.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Scott: Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose for lunch I had been setting forth the view that unemployment as it now exists will probably continue to be an even greater problem in the future. This will be due to the increased displacement of workers as a result of the inroads of automation, because of the very large number of young people who will be coming on the labour market at the rate of a quarter of a million a year, because of immigration and because of the need to eat into the very large backlog of unemployment which we now have in Canada. Indeed, Mr. Chairman, it is not unfair to say that if some sort of action is not taken now to prepare for these difficulties in the future we will be building for ourselves a problem of almost nightmare proportions.

Those of us in the house who come from urban ridings have sat here since the session started last September and have listened with patience to all the problems of the farm people in Canada and the problems of other sections of the country. We have been glad to hear their problems and to see them getting solved but I feel it is about time that we got down to the problems of the city people too. While we have sat patiently up until this time we will not sit patiently too much longer.

I was pointing out before the recess the great human hardship and suffering that unemployment brings to families, but more than that it constitutes a great waste to the community. It is interesting that Mr. Willard Wirtz, secretary of labour in the United States, said in testifying before one of their committees:

> I find it almost intolerable that the country takes unemployment with such a degree of acquiescence.

He went on to say:

> I am appalled by the realization that we lost more man hours in unemployment last year than we lost from strikes in 35 years.

This indicates to some degree the great loss to the community, the great loss to the country in production and income as a result of the high levels of unemployment we have endured. One thing is certain, I think, and that is that we will never deal with unemployment in Canada on the basis of an insurance scheme, nor will we ever really deal with it on the basis of a welfare scheme. In both regards we are still chasing a will-o'-the-wisp.

The solution to unemployment lies in far deeper problems in our country, problems of growth, problems of expansion. It is only when these are taken care of that we have any real chance of solving unemployment at all. That is why I was urging this morning that the house and the government accept the idea of full employment as a national goal in itself instead of chasing the will-o'-the-wisp of a balanced budget. What we should really do is that all our energies, skills and resources should be devoted to and concentrated on the great national goal of eradicating unemployment. For those of us from urban ridings who go back to our constituencies on the week ends and see the results of unemployment, it is a sickening and frustrating thing that leaves everybody whose lives it touches with a feeling of helplessness and with a feeling that the rest of the country has forgotten about it.

Today in the house we have heard very little that would encourage us to think that the government is really serious about this matter. I know the Minister of Labour is a man of good will and undoubtedly he is doing his best, but like everybody else in the house he must be frustrated by the indecision and the lack of leadership we have received from this government. I hope that when we hear from him again we will not be treated to another Alice in Wonderland tour of Canada and that he will tell us what plans the government has in mind to meet this problem. To date we have heard very little in this regard. It is a source of great regret that nothing laid before us thus far in the session indicates that the government has any real awareness of the great urgency of the problem or any real method of solving it, but I know we will be hearing from the minister again and I assure him we will be waiting to hear these plans.

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Knowles: What is the name of your union?

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Chairman, I seem to hear a noise from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre—

Mr. Knowles: Correct.

Mr. Gordon: —who asked me what the name of my union was.

Mr. Pigeon: The brass union.

Mr. Gordon: I would remind him that there are a great many working people in this country who do not belong to unions and as the member for Davenport I represent a great many of them as well as union members. I am here, as he is, to discuss the labour estimates and the question of unemployment. I hope he will not interrupt me again with a facetious question of that kind.

In rising to participate in the discussion of the labour estimates I should like to state at the outset that I fully realize, as I am sure others realize, that responsibility for the unemployment problem in Canada does not rest alone and cannot rest alone on the Minister of Labour. The extremely high levels of unemployment in recent years have been the result of the fact that Canada has been in the economic doldrums. We have been in the economic doldrums for a period of six years and all the members of the government must accept some share of responsibility for that.

There has been a tendency lately for some people to become complacent about this question of unemployment. I remember that during the last election campaign the Prime Minister made the astonishing statement that the unemployment problem had been resolved, and that in a few weeks there would be no more unemployment in Canada. I challenged the Prime Minister, as soon as he made that statement, to come and say it again in Davenport where a great many people could not find jobs and many more people are in that same plight today.

Mr. McGee: Is that the same place where your leader was predicting 800,000 unemployed this winter?

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Pigeon: What leader?

Mr. Gordon: —the parliamentary secretary will have lots of chances in a very few weeks to tell the people of Scarborough what he knows and what he has been doing about unemployment. I would suggest he keep quiet in the meantime, or at least until he gets up to support the minister on these estimates.

The Prime Minister did not accept my challenge last June. Instead, he went around the country making personal remarks about me and a number of others. I was rather surprised about that because even an amateur, such as I was then, and I believe I am a little less of an amateur now perhaps,—

An hon. Member: But not much.

Mr. Gordon: —knows it is poor politics to go around publicizing anybody on the other side. It certainly did not do the Prime Minister any good last June, as I remember. In fact, I understand there are a number of people, and I think some of them sit on the opposite side of the house, who are beginning to question the wisdom and the infallibility of this man whose political intuition was once thought to be so great.

Mr. Kindt: What has that got to do with labour?

Mr. Woolliams: Is this another personal attack on the Prime Minister?

Mr. Gordon: May I answer one question at a time?

An hon. Member: Try them both.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The Chair cannot permit members, while remaining seated to ask questions of the member who has the floor. If hon. members do not like the remarks made by the hon. member who has the floor, they will have a chance to answer him.

Mr. Gordon: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. The fact is that many people in Canada are unable to find jobs. If any members of the government do not know this, I will be glad to prove it to them. Sometimes, as the hon. member for Danforth said a few minutes ago, people forget what it means for unemployed people to be unable to find jobs and to be on relief month after month. I, like the hon. member for Danforth and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, see these people continuously whenever I am in Toronto. Believe me, the people who come to my office and who write to me from Davenport about their desperate need to find jobs do not find it too encouraging when people across the aisle make the sort of remarks they have just been making. This is a serious subject and should be dealt with in a serious manner. There is a very personal subject, and it represents human tragedy for thousands of people in this country who, in the last six years, have been unable to find jobs. There are people in this country—again I suggest we had better not throw any stones or I will be inclined to mention names—who seem to think that the people who are unemployed just do not want to work. Well, the fact is that the level of unemployment in the last six years has been double what it was in the previous ten years. If people in Canada were anxious and willing to work during one period, it is most unlikely they would not be just as anxious and just as willing to work if they were given a chance to do so under present conditions.

Mr. Kindt: May I ask the hon. member a question? Were his figures on a percentage basis or numerical?

Mr. Gordon: My figures were on a percentage basis, as I am quite sure the hon. gentleman would know if he cared to look them up.

Mr. Kindt: I have looked them up.

Mr. Gordon: He has looked them up, his question was quite unnecessary and I will go on with my remarks.

There are seasonal variations in unemployment as everybody knows. It is dishonest, in my opinion, to compare the actual figures on unemployment during the summer months with averages or with the corresponding figures during a period of the year when unemployment is always higher. But on the average, month by month during the last five years, six or seven of every 100 members of the working force have had no work to do. I have said before, and I should like to repeat, that this is a shame and a national disgrace. Something must be done about it. Again, as I have said before, I think that something can be done about it. If the election that seems to be upon us or will be within the next few days or weeks turns out the way I think and hope it will, then something will be done about it.

An hon. Member: Are you going to Nova Scotia again?

Mr. Woolliams: He is speechless.

Mr. Gordon: I am not speechless, Mr. Chairman, I just wish some hon. gentlemen on the other side would occasionally get a new idea. I am not worried about what will happen in Nova Scotia in the next election.

Mr. MacEwan: You should be.

Mr. Gordon: Some hon. member is shouting that I should be.

Mr. MacEwan: Yes.

Mr. Gordon: Well, we will find out who should be when the time comes.

There are two problems in particular that must be tackled if we are to restore prosperity in Canada and cure the unemployment problem. I have not got the time this afternoon to deal with all the problems, but I am going to mention two. The first of these is the annual deficits we have been incurring in our transactions with other countries. I would like to say a few words about this because I think it is central to our whole economic problem.

In 1961 the deficit in our transactions with other countries was just under $1 billion, and while the figures for 1962 are not yet available it has been predicted by ministers of the crown that the deficit will again be just about a billion dollars. The deficit in 1961 was made up of an imbalance in our transactions with the United States of roughly $1,400 million, with a surplus in our transactions with all other countries of the world combined of about $400 million. This imbalance in our transactions with the United States, means that we have been importing some of the things that we could have been producing ourselves in Canada, or alternatively that we have been unable to find markets for some of the goods we could produce for export.

Mr. Nasserden: They were one of our best customers.

Mr. Gordon: Is that the Prime Minister speaking? It was estimated a year or so ago, by a well known economist in western Canada, that if we could bring our international accounts into balance it would be the equivalent of producing roughly 200,000 more jobs in Canada. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, if we are sincere, and we certainly should be, about getting to the root and doing something about this unemployment problem, instead of wasting time in the way we have in the last five years, we should have been dealing with the balance of payments problem. There is no simple way of doing it. It has got to be done on an industry by industry basis.

Mr. Pugh: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Gordon: I shall be glad to answer this question, but from then on I shall answer questions at the end of my speech.

Mr. Pugh: I am glad the hon. gentleman accepts the question. He put figures on the record for 1961 and what he thought they were for 1962. Would he be prepared—I know he has the figures in his own mind—to put the figures on record for 1956-57, the imbalance of trade with all other countries?

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, that is a good question.

Mr. Pugh: Damned right.

Mr. Gordon: The hon. gentleman thinks this is a good question. I gave the figures for 1961, and the figures for 1962 have not yet been finalized or published. As the hon. gentleman probably knows, we started to run a deficit in our transactions with other countries about 1950, and from 1950 to 1955 inclusive the average deficit was under $400 million a year. The problem became acute in 1956; it has remained acute from 1956 until now, and nothing has been done about it.

Mr. Pugh: Would you be prepared to put the figures on the record?

Mr. Gordon: The average figure from 1956 to 1962 has been running at about a billion and a quarter dollars a year, and in the last two years at a billion dollars.

Mr. Pugh: Would you be prepared to put the figure on the record?

Mr. Gordon: I have been putting the figures on the record, and if the hon. gentleman will be quiet for a few minutes I shall put some more on. If we are going to do anything about this problem, if we are going to cure unemployment in Canada, we must approach it on an industry by industry basis. There is no simple way, by waving a wand or making a speech, to cure the problem. It requires action and that is what we badly need in Canada.

The other day reference was made to the automobile industry and on other occasions I have used this as an example of what should be done in order to solve this problem of our balance of payments. In 1961, and again that is the year for which the latest figures are available, we imported approximately $360 million worth of automobile parts into Canada. We believe that a separate department of industry should be created to deal with this problem, and that one of its functions should be to go to the automobile industry and say that the government has concluded that this very large amount of imports should be reduced by, say, two thirds over a period of a year or so—two years at the very most. That in itself would produce an extra 35,000 to 45,000 jobs in Canada in places like Windsor and Oshawa.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): What about the last few weeks?

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. Since the opening remarks of the hon. member for Davenport (Mr.

Gordon), members of the Conservative party have kept on interrupting him in spite of your call to order.

Consequently, I would ask you to put an end to that.

(Text):

Mr. Horner (Acadia): What about the last few weeks?

The Deputy Chairman: A few moments ago I asked for the co-operation of all hon. members. If hon. members do not like the remarks made by the hon. member for Davenport they will have a chance to answer him. With real co-operation we will be able to report real progress at five o'clock this afternoon.

Mr. Gordon: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. To go back to my example of the automobile industry I suggest that the appropriate arm of the government—and in my view it should be a separate department of industry—having decided upon the target should then call in representatives of the industry and ask, "How do you recommend we should accomplish this objective quickly and without adding to costs?" I suggest that representatives of the industry be consulted, because after all they are the people who are most familiar with the technical processes and who can provide valuable assistance to the government in this sort of thing if they are consulted. I also suggest that labour unions be consulted in a matter of this kind. In our view, in doing this if the industries concerned can suggest ways by which they can increase exports instead of reducing imports that will be so much the better.

The royal commission of which Professor Bladen was chairman suggested a formula which in principle has a lot to recommend it. It is this formula, or a modification of it, which was introduced last October by the Minister of Finance. I thought that move was a good one. It was a move in the right direction, but it did not really go far enough. That particular move if it is successful, as the minister stated at the time, might reduce the imbalance in our transactions so far as automobile parts are concerned to the extent of $30 odd million. That is an insignificantly small part of a $360 million deficit in that particular industry. It did not in my view show any real sense of urgency in tackling this problem.

There are many other industries which will have to be dealt with in exactly the same way. During the past four months various members on this side of the house have been meeting privately and have worked out plans which could be made applicable to many other industries in Canada. This approach would go a long way toward reducing this tremendous imbalance in our international transactions. We would be well on the road to reducing unemployment in Canada to levels at least considerably lower than those we have today. That is the kind of approach which is needed. We are not going to solve this problem by shouting at each other across the House of Commons. We can only solve it if we start off with some real understanding of the difficulty and then, with determination and a power of decision, do something about it.

The second of the two problems which I said must be tackled head on if we really intend to balance our international transactions, restore prosperity and cure unemployment in this country is of a different kind. It has nothing directly to do with the balance of payments question. It is the unsatisfactory and much too low rate of investment in Canada in both the private and public sectors of the economy. As far as investment in the private sector is concerned, there is a great need to expand existing industry and to develop new industries in Canada. I am one of those who would prefer to see this done by private investment because I believe in the decentralization of decision making, particularly when we see how difficult it is for some governments to make decisions of any kind. However, I think we must recognize that there is in private hands in Canada a shortage of the kind of capital which is needed in order to expand certain industries. Certainly there is a shortage of the kind of capital needed to develop new undertakings in the extractive industries. In the past we have allowed too many of these developments to be financed by foreign capital and that is, in my view, one of the reasons why we are facing the problems which confront us today.

While on balance I should prefer to see as much private capital as possible invested in such undertakings, if it were available, I certainly would not like to see the expansion of industry and the development of new projects curtailed merely because there is a shortage of private capital for such purposes. In that event it seems to me that public capital should be made available. What was done in the case of the Polymer Corporation is an excellent example.

An hon. Member: Remember the shoe factory in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Gordon: I am not thinking about small shoe factories and other things which were done in Saskatchewan. The hon. member can ask his friends over there in the New Democratic party to talk about Saskatchewan at the proper time. I am saying that if it is a question of unemployment or of investing public funds in new developments then we should use public funds for such purposes.

Now, in what is usually looked upon as the public sector of our economy it seems to me that if we in Canada are to resolve our unemployment problem, restore the prosperity of our nation, and make our cities and towns better places in which to live and work we should make grants and low interest loans available to municipalities. This would permit them to get on with the job of improving our cities and towns and, in the process, stimulate the construction industry in Canada and thus provide the kind of jobs which can only be provided in that industry. The Liberal party has proposed that this should be done through a municipal loans fund and I suggest that the sooner a loan fund of this kind is created and the earlier we get on with projects of this sort the better it will be for the people in my riding of Davenport, the people in Danforth, the people in Winnipeg North Centre and the people in a lot of other ridings in this country who need that type of work. In some cases it is the only kind of work they are accustomed to doing. I, for one, would prefer to see public moneys spent in that way than that they should be spent in keeping these people unhappily on relief which, as a previous speaker has pointed out, means misery not only for the head of the family but frustration and difficulty for all its members. Sooner or later this represents a big bill in terms of broken homes and—I do not like the phrase "juvenile delinquency", but it is the one which comes to mind.

I cannot this afternoon, certainly not on the estimates of the Department of Labour, outline a complete program of what the Liberal party would do to deal with unemployment in this country.

Mr. Starr: It would be agreeable to me if the hon. member for Davenport would do that.

Mr. Gordon: All right, I will come back later and do it. At this stage I wished to outline two major aspects of our program for dealing with unemployment. One is to bring our international accounts into some kind of balance by producing ourselves some of the things we are importing, as well as by exporting more of the things we can produce. The second item in this program is the creation of a municipal development fund which would really put some juice into the construction industry and provide many more jobs.

The Deputy Chairman: I see the hon. gentleman's time has expired. Does the committee agree to give some extra time to the hon. member for Davenport?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Gordon: Thank you very much. I am glad to have this opportunity of continuing because I was talking about this problem of our balance of payments in western Canada a few weeks ago and I pointed out then that this imbalance in our international transactions had a great deal to do with bringing on the financial and exchange crisis last year. I suggested that if we fail to put our national house in order, if we fail to clean up the mess we see around us, we run the risk of facing another financial crisis.

I tried to find out this morning from the Minister of Finance whether he had any ideas about when he might ask for further interim supply in order to carry on the business of the country for the present month of February because this government has run out of money and will soon be unable to pay its bills. If this is the way the government runs its own affairs or runs the affairs of the country, it does not leave me, and I doubt whether it leaves many other people, with very much confidence as to what we may expect to encounter in the near future. It is clear evidence that the government does not know how to manage its own affairs. And surely that means it is incapable of dealing effectively with the question of finding work for Canadians.

By a strange coincidence, shortly after I made the remarks to which I referred, the sometimes invisible Minister without Portfolio made a speech in Toronto to the Toronto board of trade. It was last Monday, January 28, and I should like to read two sentences from one paragraph of this speech. He said:

> Those who go around this country predicting crises in its foreign exchange position, predicting economic calamity internally, should give serious consideration to their position as Canadians. This is still a free country—

—said Senator McCutcheon—

> —and if I felt as they appear to feel I would pack up and leave.

That is the end of the quotation. Senator McCutcheon analysed the economic picture for the benefit of the large audience he was addressing, and then made that comment. I suggest that this is an incredible statement for a member of any government to make. It is an incredible statement even from a non-elected member of an arrogant government like the present one. There are four to five hundred thousand Canadians without jobs at the present time and the ones I have talked to are critical of the government, very critical. Does the hon. senator suggest that they should all move out? If so, may I ask him where he thinks they should go and who is going to pay their bills?

Mr. Nesbitt: That is a disappointing interpretation.

An hon. Member: You are.

Mr. Gordon: Hon. members on this side of the house—Mr. Chairman, there seem to be murmurings going on, but I am not going to pay any attention to them.

Mr. Robichaud: They cannot swallow their own words.

Mr. Gordon: If they have anything to say they can get up and I will be glad to hear them in due course. Hon. members on this side of the house, myself included, have been highly critical of the government's incapacity and indecision, of its inability to come to grips with any problem, of the frightful failure it has made in dealing with this human, personal problem of unemployment, with all the misery which that word implies. So I say to the Minister without Portfolio and to the members of his government that we intend to stay in Canada. We have a responsibility to stay under our democratic parliamentary system, and if after an election—which I was about to say can be only weeks away, but perhaps is only hours or days away; I noticed the Prime Minister did not answer the question whether he saw the Governor General yesterday—if after the election we are called upon, we intend to clean up the mess that this government has got our country into. And we intend to do something to cure the unemployment problem.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, I might say that the reason I gave my consent for the hon. member to have additional time was that he intimated that he would put forward a program on behalf of the Liberal party which he would put into effect should that party become the government, and I am sorry indeed that he took advantage of that time without saying a word about it.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, since this house went into labour yesterday the pains seem to be coming more frequently and severely. I should like to say that we in this party are not happy with the levels of unemployment which we see in Canada today. Furthermore, whether or not they are less than or equal with the levels of last year, or even the preceding year, is not a valid argument for saying that the levels are all right. I think the Minister of Labour agrees that he is not satisfied with these levels, but I must say in all fairness that some of the charges being made to the effect that nothing is being done simply are not true. I know that there are not particularly large numbers of unemployed in my constituency, but there is far more unemployment than I like to see. I also know that, as has been stated time after time both in this house and outside, even though it may not be as bad as it was at some other time, if you are unemployed it is bad at any time.

There is one other matter we are going to have to give a great deal of consideration to, namely some of the recommendations made in the Gill committee report. This is, in my opinion, a very agonizing reappraisal of the unemployment insurance commission, and if we were to implement these recommendations suddenly there would be some adjustments which would be very painful. I think there are some good recommendations in this report, and perhaps most of them can be implemented gradually. I want to say a little more later on about some of the things being done to try to solve the unemployment problem, but I am not going to let some of the remarks of the hon. member who preceded me pass without a comment or two.

For example, he mentioned the shortage of private capital in Canada as being one of the major contributing factors in the unemployment problem, that is to say, that because of this there are not sufficient jobs being created. He also mentioned—at least, I took this meaning from what he said—that this was also the reason which aggravated the problem of investment of foreign capital in the industry of Canada. I agree that this is certainly true.

I think the reason that private industry has difficulty in finding the long term capital requirements needed for expansion is that the federal government is in the private money market on such a level, forcing the interest rates up to such a level that private industry is a little bit hesitant about taking on long term commitments at these interest rates, which are established in competition with the federal government. I suggest that it is in line with Social Credit policy that public capital for social expansion should be provided by the Bank of Canada, and that the government should move out of the private money market and leave private capital for private enterprise.

There are two or three other points I should like to make. I am not going to speak for very long. One is the matter of the increasing unemployment problem in the flour milling industry. I raise this matter specifically because that is one section in the labour market in which we have steady increases from one year to the next. If you go back and compare this year with last year, last year with the previous year and so on, you find that in each succeeding year more plant capacity is being shut down in this particular industry. What I should like to suggest is that the Minister of Labour use his influence with the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Trade and Commerce so that in some of these wheat deals we have been making some portion of the total volume could be delivered in the form of flour.

A few months ago I had the privilege of visiting in Africa. In one of the countries there I found a brand new, almost automatic flour milling plant which, in fact, turns out something like 8,000 hundredweight of flour per day. This figure is 2,000 hundredweight per day more than the total domestic requirements of that country. Here we see a situation in which they are importing all of the wheat they need to make flour. They are providing a few jobs, but they are also providing some national income; so I do not blame them for setting it up. However, the fact is that we are supplying them with the raw materials and they are processing them, when we have right here in Canada the plants and the men who could be doing this same job.

I should like to read into the record a little bit of information to show what has happened to the flour milling industry, as of just a few weeks ago. For example, there is one mill in Medicine Hat that is completely closed down. Another one is running at about 50 per cent of capacity. Another one is running at about 55 per cent of capacity. I understand there is a plant at Goderich, Ontario, that is completely shut down and another one at Peterborough that is shut down. There is one at Brantford that is shut down. There is a plant at Port Colborne, with a capacity of 26,000 hundredweight daily which is now operating at a rate of 7,000 hundredweight daily. At Keewatin there is one plant which is completely shut down, and there is another mill which is running only part time. In Winnipeg there is a mill that is being remodelled. It is shut down completely now and is in the process of renovation. It had a capacity of 7,000 hundredweight daily. After the remodelling is completed, its capacity is going to be reduced to 3,000 hundredweight daily. All the mills in Calgary are running much below capacity. There is at least one that is completely shut down there, if not two. The largest mill in Lethbridge, Alberta, is running at below 50 per cent of capacity. This situation is fairly serious. I believe that some relief should be given to this situation if the Canadian negotiators, in our export marketing of wheat, would try to have some flour included in the total deal. I understand that in one of the wheat deals made with red China, for example, one of the provisions was that they should take some of the wheat in the form of flour, but that this has not been done.

We know that there is competition in this field, and I fully appreciate that fact. I believe that the United States government are providing some wheat subsidies that are applied to flour being exported. We also know that there are perhaps some lower labour charges that go into the production of flour in some of these other countries. At the same time, however, since we grow the raw materials here I think we should be concentrating on trying to provide some of the finished products as well.

If I may, I should like to deal just for a moment with some of the things that I think are being done. I am not saying that they are adequate or that they are completely doing the job. However, a few things are being done about solving this unemployment problem. One of the major things that has happened recently is the action that was taken by this government in co-operation with the provincial government in providing vocational training schools and schemes. It was only last week that the keys to the one built in Medicine Hat were turned over to the local school board. I should like to congratulate all of those responsible not only in that constituency but all over Canada for the good work they have done in setting up this kind of plant. We realize that they were breaking new ground nearly all the way. It is a tremendous undertaking to line up courses, curricula, staff and all of the other things required when there is not anything to look at—more or less set up a program to follow, if I may put the matter in that way. For example, for the one in Medicine Hat—and I am not sure that this applies to other schools as well—we had to find journeymen and people who were skilled in many trades and technicians who did not have any teacher training. So they have hired a number of people who had the skills they were supposed to teach, and now they have them on the staff and they are taking teacher training so that they will have the ability to pass that information on.

In Medicine Hat there have been outlined programs which have been prepared with a view to better meeting the ability, interests and needs of six groups of students. They include, first of all, the business education group. Then there is the vocational group, the technical group, the professional matriculation group, the pre-employment group and the adult group. It should be pointed out that these new programs are the inevitable outcome of, for example—at least this is the premise which is used in working out these programs—of the rapid advances in technology which are changing the entire pattern of industrial occupations and the demand for more workers with higher levels of technical knowledge and skills. Then the other problem they looked at was the school drop-out problem which sees large numbers of young people entering the world of work unprepared to meet its demands. Then there is the need for a new program more adequately designed better to meet the ever widening range of pupil abilities and interests.

In the business education branch, for example, they are working out programs for secretarial training, including shorthand, typing, office practice and so on. They are working out bookkeeping and clerical training, and retail clerical training. Then there is a special one year course for graduate students and those with 70 high school credits will concentrate training in skills for office work. I think this program is very important but there are other programs and other parts to the programs. There are industrial, vocational and beauty culture programs, and in this particular area I do not believe there is any precedent anywhere in Canada as to what might be included in the programs to turn out students with the required skills. As I mentioned, there is a technical and vocational program and with regard to this particular segment I think this short paragraph is rather significant. They say that prospects for employment for this technically trained group are excellent, and go on to say:

> Up until about 1959 a large percentage of our technicians came to us from Europe and the British Isles. This is no longer the case and Canada must educate its own technicians.

Obviously we have the people in the ranks of the unemployed and if they take this training Canada will not only be provided with people to do the work in this field but we will also not have to bring in people to do these jobs, though I have no objection to immigration at all. They are also setting up three and four year matriculation programs for those who would like to enter a profession, as well as pre-employment programs and adult education programs that will be carried on at different hours when the school is not being used by the regular students.

There is only one other point I want to make and that will conclude my contribution to this debate for the present. While I was overseas visiting some of what have been commonly referred to as the emerging nations of Africa I was struck immediately by the almost complete lack of a middle class in their social and economic structure. In Nigeria, for example, they have opened five new universities in the last two and a half or three years or since the program started. This will certainly provide highly trained persons in specialized fields and perhaps in general as well, but there is a problem in that large numbers of workers are required to provide the supporting administrative staffs for these university graduates. They do not have any facilities for training this type of student.

It must also be recognized that the entrance requirements for vocational training schools would be substantially lower than for universities and such schools widen the possibilities for people without university qualifications to get some kind of training that will fit them for a useful life. I believe that those of us who have looked at the new vocational training schools recently built in Canada are aware that there is space available for a greater number of students. I am not too familiar with the situation in other parts of Canada but I know that in Alberta so much capacity has been provided that some of it will be unused in the immediate future.

I should like to suggest to the Minister of Labour that through the Department of External Affairs the government invite some of these countries to send students to Canada to make use of the extra capacity we have now, because I really believe that there is a very great need for technically trained people in those countries. Certainly it would be a great contribution toward helping them to help themselves. We cannot provide all of the technically trained people they need to operate their industries, but we can invite them to send some young people here who will undertake to learn a trade and acquire teaching skills so that they can go back to their countries and in turn train more people.

In my opinion this is by far the best kind of foreign aid that Canada can provide, the kind of assistance that will help these people to help themselves. They do not want us or anyone else over there running their affairs for them, but they recognize that we have made advances in education and technical skills from which they can profit. It is our responsibility to help them and I hope that something can be done to invite these governments to make use of the facilities we now have. As I said, I do not think we are going to be able to use all of our capacity immediately.

(Translation):

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, I listened very carefully to the speech made by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) last January 30, when he introduced his department's estimates. His remarks were impatiently awaited because the unemployment situation remains serious in our country.

The minister spoke about the activities of his department in the fields of research, economics, conciliation, civilian retraining, etc.

All these subjects are no doubt interesting but, as the representative of a riding made up mostly of working people, like many of my colleagues, in the name of the unemployed who have been forsaken in the last few years by the Conservative government, I must complain once again about the complete lack of interest shown by the minister, once more, in the speech he made last Wednesday about the most important problem in Canada today, that of unemployment.

In fact, when the minister states that the unemployment problem is serious, we would expect him to show us, through his estimates, that short-term concrete steps are being taken to deal with that situation immediately.

Well, apart from the winter works program to which I shall refer later on, the minister has done nothing except leave the unemployed to their own fate and, unless favourable circumstances come up unexpectedly, circumstances with which the Conservative party will have had nothing to do, we shall have to face the fact that those unemployed will receive, this year, nothing but their unemployment insurance benefits and unemployment assistance payments.

To my way of thinking, Mr. Chairman, it is time the government should realize that the unemployed cannot pay his rent, his doctor and even less his grocer with statistics.

I said earlier that the unemployed was left to his fate because this year the government brings in no new short term measure to solve that problem and it is quite easy to prove it.

In fact, the 1962-63 estimates exceed by only $47 million those of 1961-62. Now, I challenge the Minister of Labour to prove that a substantial portion of those $47 million will be used to implement short term projects which will be of some assistance to the unemployed in this country before the year is out.

Mr. Chairman, we cannot expect a substantial increase in the winter works program this year, and the minister knows it. If you refer to page 3268 of Hansard, you will see that the federal contribution to those projects will amount to $35 million while they amounted to $34 million for the fiscal year 1960-61.

Again I ask the question: apart from the winter works program, what short term measures is the government considering to help the unemployed? The answer is none. There were none to be found in the speech from the throne, none in the minister's statement. We shall again have this year the same situation in this respect that we had last year and the years before.

We know that the minister, in all his statements, stresses the fact that there has been a continuous increase in the number of people in Canada who are working. As if there was anything new in that, when in a country such as ours there is a constant natural increase in population. I submit that this is a very poor screen to use to hide not only an unfortunate situation that has been going on for too long, but also the government's inaction and lack of imagination and boldness concerning the unemployment problem.

What is, in fact, the extent of unemployment right now, in February 1963? What do the statistics show? That, possibly, is the most important aspect of the question, but the minister carefully avoided it in the speech he made on January 30, as shown on page 3272 of the official report, where he said:

> In December unemployment reached a total of 6.3 per cent of the labour force, compared to 6.4 per cent a year earlier and 8.2 per cent in 1960.

How can you discuss intelligently a problem such as unemployment if you do not know its scope and its ramifications? At the end of January 1963, I asked the following question: How many unemployed are drawing unemployment insurance benefits in Canada?

How is it that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr), who answers in the house for the unemployment insurance commission and the national employment service, cannot tell us, in introducing his estimates, how many unemployed are drawing unemployment insurance benefits in Canada right now? Why conceal that information which I consider as essential to all these discussions on unemployment?

But I should like to discuss that matter a little further. A few days ago, on January 28, I put question No. 1,324 on the order paper and asked the minister for the following information:

> What are the latest statistics of the unemployment insurance commission concerning the number of unemployed persons who are receiving unemployment insurance benefits?

The minister answered that at the end of November 1962, the number was 347,000.

Now, I ask the minister this question: How can he explain that concerning such an important matter, the only statistics available to answer my question of January 28 were those available at the end of November 1962?

Is it that our employment service or the unemployment insurance organization is so inadequate that it is impossible for a member of parliament to know the number of unemployed receiving benefits for a period of less than two months? I do not believe that.

I know that the minister has the most recent figures in hand. I know that every week he gets figures from the various offices.

It is, I think, very strange and most unfortunate that members of parliament are unable to secure the information they believe necessary, at least in a discussion like the one we are having now.

(Text):

Mr. Starr: I should like to interrupt on a point of order. The hon. member just stated he knows—I repeat he stated he knows—I receive these figures each and every week. If that is the case, I would ask him to give me some specific proof how he knows that I do.

Mr. Deschatelets: Well, Mr. Chairman, we are going to deal with this on a different basis. Now that the minister is adopting this attitude I want to know, and I am entitled to know, the number of persons drawing unemployment benefits in Canada. I should like to have the latest figures. Now, is the minister aware of this? Is he able to give us these figures at a time when we are discussing his estimates? This is what I should like to know, and then I might come to another conclusion.

Mr. Starr: I asked the hon. member to give me proof how he knows that I get them each and every week.

Mr. Deschatelets: This is an extraordinary attitude on the part of the minister.

Mr. Starr: You made the charge.

Mr. Deschatelets: He is asking a member to prove that the minister is receiving weekly reports from his officers. I have said this and I am going to repeat it and the minister can do what he likes: The minister is receiving from the officers of the national unemployment service weekly figures about the unemployment situation. The thing I deplore is that members of parliament are not being made aware of these figures so that they can discuss these estimates in the way they should be discussed. Now, this is an important aspect of this point.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, on January 28, I finally put a question to the minister, asking him what were the unemployment figures registered in our unemployment insurance offices regarding the number of unemployed people. The results were the same as those I had had for November 30.

But, in any case, we are sufficiently aware of the facts to be able to put the blame on the department, not only on account of the scanty information it gives the members but also on account of its inaction, of its lack of administrative ability and originality in the means that should be taken to deal with such a situation.

Mr. Chairman, on January 30, I also put a question on the order paper regarding the unemployment insurance fund. I was told that as of December 31, the fund amounted to $98 million. The same question comes up now. We are at present examining the estimates of the Minister of Labour. Would it not be normal for us to know, on this February 1, 1963, the balance in hand in the unemployment insurance fund?

I understand that loans totalling $262 million have been made to the fund and that these amounts have been paid back. But I should like to know from the minister, at the closing of his remarks, why, during his speech, he avoided mentioning such an important question as the unemployment insurance fund.

I listened to his speech, I read it again and I do not even find one reference regarding one of the most important questions concerning the Department of Labour.

In 1955 and 1956 we sat together on the industrial relations committee and I clearly remember that the government actuaries told us then that if the unemployment insurance fund stood at less than $500 million it was in a precarious position. Therefore, I say this to the minister: What steps does the government intend to take in order to restore to its proper balance the unemployment insurance fund?

Here is another important problem that the minister avoided mentioning and I take this opportunity—

(Text):

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member wanted to know what is the balance in the unemployment insurance fund. The answer was given to him in a reply by the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance as reported at page 3259 of Hansard for January 30.

Mr. Deschatelets: Mr. Chairman, I am afraid that the minister was sleeping during the last few minutes I was speaking. I have already said I asked this question and that I received an answer. I had even mentioned that the amount is now $98 million. That is not the point. I say to the minister that he has not mentioned this insurance fund in his speech. It should have been a topic of his speech because of its importance. We have only $98 million in it. This is the point and I hope the minister will follow my speech more closely from now on.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, I was saying that there are now only $98 million in the unemployment insurance fund, and I would like to stop here for a moment to recall a particular fact to the Conservative and Social Credit members who are conspicuous by their absence.

When the Liberal administration is blamed for unemployment, I ask them to remember a very important fact: when the new administration took over in 1957, there were $926 million in the unemployment insurance fund. Thus, if there had been anything but full employment in Canada during the years preceding 1957, that fact would obviously have been reflected on the unemployment insurance fund.

Now, if one considers that we had then $926 million in the fund, that answers the childish argument often raised by the hon. member for Villeneuve. So, Mr. Chairman, we must make the best of it.

The only short term concrete measure which the government has to fight chronic unemployment, is the winter works program. We know that only an extension of the scope and duration of the program could constitute a short term measure likely to improve the situation.

Even though I have never considered them as anything more than an unemployment index, the figures published by the dominion bureau of statistics show most eloquently that we have a serious situation on our hands.

Mr. Chairman, a few years ago, the present Minister of Labour claimed that there was a state of national emergency when, in 1954 and 1956, the unemployment level reached only half of what it is today. He seems to have forgotten the speeches he made in those days.

Mr. Chairman, we must realize that the government is at present going through a most serious crisis. I know that if I was unemployed I would consider myself in a desperate situation. There is nothing to expect from the government which has remained at the helm because it had the support of the Social Credit party about which I will have a few things to say in a moment.

I hope that in the near future the voters of this country will be given an opportunity of electing a stable administration, a majority government and none but the party I belong to will ever be able to lead this country toward prosperity because it will prove that if in the past it has succeeded in creating full employment in a country such as Canada, it can repeat the performance.

Mr. Chairman, I admit that the government pays 50 per cent of the labour costs involved in the winter works program, but I wish to point out to the minister that the government of the province of Quebec is the only one to supplement this program with a 40 per cent contribution program of its own.

An hon. Member: And what did it do?

Mr. Deschatelets: Has the question been put? I would like to say a few words on unemployment in the province of Quebec, Mr. Chairman. Its causes can readily be traced. For several years, the provincial authorities refused to accept from Ottawa the money which Quebec taxpayers contributed to the federal government's coffers, and which they were entitled to get back in part. Take for instance the trans-Canada highway: Quebec received only a few million dollars, while Ontario received $108 million.

I submit that the situation is serious. The government would do well in expanding its winter works program. We should have emulated the Kennedy administration, which lost no time in launching a program of on-the-spot inquiries, in the sections where unemployment was heavy. I think that in the provinces which, today, are suffering much more than others, we might have extended this works program over the whole year and also doubled the government's share.

If the winter works program costs the government $35 million, I think nobody can pretend that we cannot double our contribution in the present circumstances when provinces like Quebec, for instance, and others, are facing the most acute unemployment problem.

Mr. Chairman, I would now like to say a word about our hon. friends of the Social Credit party. I want to tell them that they are quite as responsible as the Conservative members for the present situation. They systematically supported this government, when they were quite aware that the throne speech mentioned nothing but the winter works program to solve the unemployment problem.

The unemployed in Canada will not forget that if the government has been able to hang on to power these last few months, if it has been able to survive in spite of its inaction these past few years, it is thanks to our Social Credit friends who have placed the interests of their party above those of their country.

This is the last opportunity I will have to remind the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) that the first duty of a member of parliament is to attend the sittings of the house, not to look after the organization of his party.

Mr. Chairman, the Social Credit members who have participated in this debate on unemployment would have us believe that the solution is to be found in their monetary theory. I do not have the time to challenge that contention now, but I should like to ask the hon. member for Villeneuve—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Perhaps the house would find some advantage in listening to the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont. His remarks seem to create unusual interest, but we can hardly hear him on account of the noise. I would therefore ask the hon. members to listen closely.

Mr. Deschatelets: According to the Social Credit members who spoke during this debate, the adoption of their monetary theory would be one way of creating full employment in Canada. If the hon. member for Villeneuve does participate in this discussion, I would ask him to comment on the following. During the last election campaign, when he stated before Canadian workers that the monetary theory of Social Credit would be one way of fighting unemployment, why did both his leader and himself hide from their audience that in 1956, their monetary theory was condemned as inflationary by a royal commission in New Zealand and that since then, Social Credit has never been heard from in that country? I ask the hon. member for Villeneuve why he tries to deceive the people by telling them that his theory could solve the problem.

Mr. Chairman, in concluding may I say this: My hon. friends of the Social Credit should not worry, they will soon pay for having supported a government which they knew very well was unable to settle any situation at all; but they did it precisely in a petty party interest.

I am convinced this is the last time we shall have the opportunity of studying the estimates of the Department of Labour. The situation is hopeless. The unemployed have completely lost confidence and hope in the government. They will soon be asked to judge it again and they will take advantage of the occasion to judge also the hon. members of the Social Credit who, to this date, did but one thing in the House of Commons, namely fill the shoes of the Conservative members they had defeated.

[Mr. Deschatelets.]

Mr. Valade: Would the hon. member allow a question? Does he agree with Mr. Lesage that unemployment is a provincial responsibility, as he said during the 1960 election campaign?

Mr. Chevrier: He never said that.

Mr. Deschatelets: The hon. member is giving me the opportunity of paying tribute to the premier of Quebec, for the courage he has shown in this regard. In fact, he was the first among all provincial premiers, to recognize that unemployment was a national problem, that could not be solved without the co-operation of the federal, provincial, and municipal governments.

Mr. Valade: I have asked a question to the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont and the hon. member for Laurier has replied that Mr. Lesage had never said that, while the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont replied that it was a provincial responsibility. I should like to know who of the two is right?

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, if you will allow me, I will say that the question was badly put, because the hon. member has asked whether Mr. Lesage said it was a provincial responsibility. Mr. Lesage never said that; he said it was a responsibility which must be shared between the three levels of government, as my colleague has just said.

(Text):

Mr. Knowles: Earlier today my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard pointed out that yesterday and today we have been discussing two of the most important questions which are facing us, on the one hand the question of what we are going to do about nuclear weapons and on the other hand the question of unemployment, the subject which has occupied most of our time today.

I find it interesting that this parliament, for all its faults, has been discussing these two important questions yesterday and today. I find it particularly interesting in view of the rumours and reports which are drifting into this chamber.

About half an hour ago a report came in that the Prime Minister was at government house. I suppose he was just taking tea with the Governor General or recommending some appointment, but he could have been doing something else. The most recent report is that he is back in the east block.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. English: What is the hon. member talking about?

Mr. Knowles: I am talking about the labour estimates.

Some hon. Members: Oh.

Mr. Knowles: I am beginning to wonder, in view of the reports that are coming in, whether this parliament is going to have a chance to complete the labour estimates or any other estimates. As a matter of fact, the prediction I made on December 17 may well come true. Maybe we shall go through the fiscal year 1962-63 without parliament approving the estimates.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if the hon. gentleman will permit a question. Does he know of a rumour, widely current, that the Prime Minister has already slipped through the tunnel to the West Block en route to an unknown destination?

Mr. Knowles: Apparently the hon. member has had an even later report than I have had.

An hon. Member: He has a pipe line.

Mr. Knowles: I am reminded, of course, that this is February 1, 1963, and that on February 1, 1958, just five years ago today, the Prime Minister went to see the governor general of that day and at six o'clock made an interesting announcement to the house.

If these rumours and reports foretell what we are going to be doing in the next couple of months, I am glad that we have had before parliament in these two days these two important issues, one concerning nuclear weapons and the other the question of unemployment. I urge most strongly on all members of this house in all parties that they should throw away some of their prejudice about words and do some really hard thinking about ways and means of providing full employment.

I listened with a great deal of interest to the speech made a little while ago by the hon. member for Davenport. I felt, as I sat here, that I was watching an idea struggling to be born in the mind of the hon. member. He expressed great concern about unemployment and about the numbers of Canadians without jobs, and insisted that it was not good enough for us to shout across the chamber at each other about it, but that we must do something about unemployment. In particular, he called upon the government to do something about unemployment. He said by way of defending his own party in the matter that some of the members of his party had discussed this question and had made plans to deal with some of the problems which affect our economy. A little later, after he bowed three times in the direction of private enterprise, he got bold enough to say that it might even be necessary to invest large sums of public capital in our economy to provide jobs for our people.

As I say, I enjoyed watching an idea struggling to come to birth in the mind of the hon. member for Davenport, but as he made his speech he carefully avoided facing up to the fact that if we are to do something about full employment we have to go in for democratic economic planning. Members of other parties, though they know that something of this sort has to be done, still regard these words as something to shy away from, because of their loyalty to the kind of system we now have. From the speeches which have been made today on all sides about the importance and urgency of the unemployment problem, a problem which may be talked about a good deal in the next couple of months if today's reports have anything to them, it must be realized that if this problem is the serious one it is in our country it is not good enough to go on arguing about statistics and the amount of money in the unemployment insurance fund. Surely the time has come for that sort of over-all economic planning which will get our economy rolling and provide a situation in which, as one of my colleagues said this morning, there are more jobs than there are people to fill them. Only when we reach that stage will we be in the position of having full employment in this country.

In addition to this problem there are many other items of unfinished business as far as the Minister of Labour and his department are concerned. There is the question of doing something about labour legislation in the field of minimum wages, statutory holidays, and holidays with pay. Then there is the question of improving the vacations with pay act. Improvements need to be made so far as government legislation is concerned in the provisions for collective bargaining. The time has come for the government to pay heed to principles it supported at the international labour conference with regard to consultation among government, employers and labour in the matter of employment. All these are things which affect our people. The time has come to do something about the Unemployment Insurance Act. It is strange that with the Gill committee report in front of us, the Minister of Labour found it possible to make his opening remarks the other day without indicating when the government planned to act on that report by way of legislation.

I promised myself, Mr. Chairman, even if I did not promise the committee, that I would make my remarks brief at this point, and I intend to do so. But I do urge that this whole problem of unemployment be looked at not just as something to talk about or as an area in which we argue over figures, but as a problem which calls for the best thinking and brains which we have in this country, and for sound over-all economic planning.

I am glad to see that the Prime Minister is back in the chamber. This at least puts a stop to any more rumours that he is at point A, B or C. He is now here and can tell us later, if he wishes, whether he has seen the Governor General, whether he has been through the tunnel, and so on. If that is so and if the event of February 1, 1958, is to be repeated on February 1, 1963, the people of Canada will get the chance to hear from all parties in this country where they stand on the important issue we discussed yesterday and on the important issue of full employment which we are discussing now on these labour estimates.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Port Arthur.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman—

(Translation):

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman—

(Text):

Mr. Fisher: I suggest that the hon. member for Villeneuve might be interested in letting me have the floor first, since my remarks will be in relation to him and he might want to come along afterwards and catch up.

Mr. Caouette: How long will you be?

Mr. Fisher: Ten minutes.

The Chairman: I am sorry. I did see the hon. member for Port Arthur first, but it should be a member from the Social Credit party.

Mr. Caouette: If I am going to lose my turn I would prefer to take it now. But if letting the hon. member for Port Arthur go on means it is not possible for me to go after him, then I prefer to go now.

The Chairman: I am advised by the Clerk that there is a member of the Liberal party who will rise after you, so I suggest you take the floor now.

(Translation):

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, it was not my intention to take part in the debate on the estimates of the Department of Labour. But after hearing the rather humorous and strange remarks of the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont (Mr. Deschatelets), a Liberal member as one might expect—who stated that Social Crediters in this house were more concerned about the party's interest than the country's—I feel I should say a few words. The hon. member should know something about the policy of putting the party's interest before that of the country for a great number of years, in fact for over 22 years, he followed it himself within the Liberal party, when he sat in the Canadian parliament.

He added that the hon. member for Villeneuve was seldom in the house and that he was doing organization work for his party.

It is obvious that we want to get rid of incompetents like him in this house. This is very definite and quite in order. Besides, I said it publicly and I repeat it in this chamber: Elections are not won in the house, they are won outside. But I still come to the house often enough to take part in the debates and I have spoken more often than the hon. member himself since he has been sitting here.

Moreover, when he says that we deceive the voters by supporting or voting with the Conservatives when want of confidence motions are presented, I point out to the hon. member that we do not deceive the voters, that we think first of the interest of the country, and that is why we do not play the Liberals' game when they try to set traps for us, here and there, in order to catch off guard the members of the other opposition parties or even some government members.

Mr. Chairman, those considerations will enlighten the public on the attitude we have taken in the house. That does not mean that we support the government as such.

A moment ago, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—

(Text):

The Chairman: Order. I think the hon. member will agree that the Chair has allowed him a lot of latitude up to this moment. I think perhaps he should now get back to item one of the labour estimates.

(Translation):

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, those are remarks which you have allowed the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont to make a moment ago. If the hon. member has the right to attack the member for Villeneuve, I wonder why you would prevent the latter from replying adequately to the former.

(Text):

The Chairman: Order. I should advise the hon. member for Villeneuve that the Chair is being very tolerant. I realize that during the last part of the speech of the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont I allowed him some leeway, but I hope the hon. member for Villeneuve will come back to vote No. 1 of the labour estimates as quickly as possible.

(Translation):

Mr. Caouette: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I come back at once to the subject matter of the debate, the estimates of the Department of Labour. We get more and more complaints from everywhere. I receive complaints from my constituents, of course, but many of them come from all over the province and all over the country. They are directed against the Department of Labour which does not seem to understand its responsibilities with regard to Canadian workers.

For instance, this sad story appeared on page 3 of the Ottawa Citizen of yesterday:

(Text):

An unemployed father of five school-age children, who says he cannot find work, was sentenced to 40 days in county jail this morning for defrauding the unemployment insurance commission.

George David, 55, of 45 Skead rd., was sentenced to five days in jail on each of eight charges to run consecutively. He pleaded guilty to receiving an overpayment of $181 from the commission.

"I can't look on this as anything but eight cases of outright theft," said Magistrate L. A. Sherwood.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to discuss the legality of the sentence imposed on a 55 year old man, a father of five, who was charged with over-collecting an amount of $181, while he claims that he has already paid back $39. But when a man who is unemployed and collects $181 from the unemployment insurance commission is prosecuted and sentenced to 40 days imprisonment, I say to myself that the unemployment insurance commission, which comes under the direct jurisdiction of the Minister of Labour, should change its attitude or its rules so that our Canadian fathers are not treated that way right here in the Ottawa-Hull region, or indeed in any region.

And the article goes on:

(Text):

He said that up until last year he had worked all his life and never drawn unemployment insurance.

David claimed he didn't understand papers he signed which stated he did not have employment while he was collecting the insurance.

"They said to me 'you're good for collecting for one year'," he told the magistrate. "I thought it was money coming to me. I am on relief and unemployed."

He is on relief and unemployed, with five children and his wife at home. The article continues:

The accused said he had gone to two Ottawa controllers for work "and they turned me away."

"When I went to the unemployment insurance office they told me I was too old," he said.

That is at 55 years of age, Mr. Chairman. I would ask you to take note of that. We all know that at 55 years of age you are too old right across Canada today. This is why we think the Minister of Labour should look a little more closely at the social legislation in our country. The article continues:

"My lights were shut off and my children were hungry."

David said his children range in age from five to 12 years.

Hugh Johnstone, an investigator for the UIC, said David had made the statements "and he knew what he was doing".

At one point David and Johnstone were shouting at one another across the courtroom, David claiming he had repaid $39 and Johnstone claiming he had not.

John Murchison, lawyer for the accused, asked the UIC investigator if leniency "or a blind eye" was not sometimes shown by the UIC in some cases.

"I've never known that to happen," was the reply.

David said when he went to the UIC "I gave the lady my book, she stamped it, and that was all there was to it".

However, that man with a family is in jail. He is in jail for 40 days accused of having committed what they call a theft of $181. We have seen many cases like that one, not only here in Ottawa but across the whole country.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the Unemployment Insurance Act should be amended.

We are at present discussing the estimates of the Department of Labour. These amounts have already been spent. In Canada, from coast to coast, winter works are in progress.

Some minutes ago, the hon. member for Maisonneuve-Rosemont told us that we should extend and expand the winter works program. Personally, I feel that all that program can do is help out momentarily a very small portion of the Canadian population; it cannot solve the hard core of our unemployment problem.

I am convinced that there are other ways. By all means, let us pass the estimates, and pay back those provinces which have taken part in the winter works program. But it is imperative to modify the labour legislation if we want to avoid in the future cases like the one about which I was telling the house.

I believe there is enough room in Canada outside jailhouses to allow individuals to select their own kind of work, instead of condemning them to prison under the pretence that they have obtained sums that were not due to them at the time.

Mr. Chairman, Social Crediters have neither a pro-government nor an anti-government attitude. They take solid stands to secure the enactment of a labour legislation which would enable Canadians to find work, live in comfort with adequate means in a country capable of offering each and everyone of its people freedom over and above security.

(Text):

Mr. Davis: We have heard a great deal about unemployment during this session. On innumerable occasions we have been told that this is our No. 1 problem; that it is a terrible thing; that it bears in on the lives of hundreds of thousands of Canadians; that it destroys their personal freedom and their will to live. We have also heard that we should do some hard thinking about this problem. We have heard a great many words in general terms about solutions. Certainly we have had the blame placed by speakers for each party on all the other parties in the house.

I should like to speak briefly this afternoon about a few tangible things that can be done about unemployment in areas in which a great number of people are out of work. We do not want government in all phases of industrial activity but government certainly must participate and is going to have to participate effectively when there is substantial unemployment, and in places where many people are out of work.

There are vast projects which are possible, the timing of which can be advanced by government investment at an early stage, perhaps in research, certainly in construction. One of the largest projects which could appeal to Canadians in the immediate future is the construction of a crude oil pipe line from the west in northern Alberta to the Montreal area. In the west of Canada we have in the Athabasca tar sands an oil reserve which is as large as the proven oil reserves of the conventional type in all the rest of the world, and processes are currently under development which promise to result in the production of that oil at a reasonable price.

There is the problem of disposing of the oil in Alberta. There is too much oil now and if the oil from the tar sands were suddenly to bear in on markets now available to the conventional oil producers it could create chaos. Why not gear a large pipe line development to that oil resource? Support, if necessary, research in the processing of that oil from the tar sands and make the oil available to Montreal in a market which constitutes nearly 40 per cent of the Canadian requirement. This market is largely supplied at present from Venezuela and the Middle East. This would mean not only the saving of hundreds of millions of dollars in foreign exchange and help our balance of payments but would also mean several thousands of continuing jobs in northern Alberta. A vast complex would evolve there financed, principally, I believe, by private capital and of the order of the development in Sarnia, Ontario, today. During the construction phase the vast steel companies at Hamilton and Sault Ste. Marie in the east would be busy producing steel, cement companies would be producing cement and other companies would be producing other construction materials and certainly machinery and equipment would be in great demand.

This type of development can be promoted by public investment if private capital is not immediately willing to carry out the entire project. Certainly it will be supplemented by private investment. This is the type of thing which a government concerned about unemployment would investigate seriously now and have under way in the next few years if we continue to have 5, 6 or 7 per cent of our labour force out of work.

There are other projects. Our uranium mining industry was geared to a sudden requirement of large proportions in the United States. That requirement has largely ceased. United States mines are supplying that which remains. Our uranium mining industry has been laying off people and will continue to lay off people. What can be done? I believe government can do something about this. We do not have within the borders of this country a processing facility for converting uranium into the enriched high grade forms which are necessary for many types of power reactors. Europe will be the first to require nuclear power on a large scale. Certainly we will want to sell to Europe and today we cannot. We cannot sell because we have to sell to the processing plants in the United States owned by the American government. The priority, therefore, obviously is to the American mines.

So I believe that government finances may be necessary in order to build a processing facility such as I have in mind. This would be of the order of an Arvida or a Kitimat. In a period of five to ten years it would provide jobs for 5,000 to 10,000 people. This is the type of thing which government may have to get into, perhaps totally in the early stages because of the element of secrecy involved, but this would provide a real hope for our uranium mining industry. This is the type of tangible project that we should be talking about rather than generalities or general policies with little meaning.

There are other projects. Research and development should be aimed, I believe, at the processing of the ash from some of our western Canadian coals. In these ashes lies an aluminium source of the type that the Germans used to make aluminium during the last war. We do not produce any of the aluminium source materials in this country. We bring in all our bauxite and alumina from the Caribbean and from Africa. Our mines branch could, by investigating processes of this type, make possible a large aluminium industry based firmly on the coal resources of western Canada. Tremendous resources of this type exist and I believe that there we could have substantially self-sufficient industries which did not involve foreign exchange and which did not involve our purchasing materials outside our country and providing employment outside our country, but rather jobs right here in this country. We have these great possibilities.

The Columbia river treaty could result in a series of projects of the dimensions of the entire Ontario hydro installations today. Literally thousands of people would be employed within the next few months, certainly within the next few years, in the construction of these projects and this great international development. I believe that with good will on all sides, not only across the border but between parties in this house and between governments in this country vast projects of that type could get under way and more work could be provided in areas of serious unemployment.

Governments have to get together. Certainly the province of British Columbia has not been working very well with the government in Ottawa and, I suggest, vice versa. I believe it is possible for instance, on the river with which I am familiar, the Fraser river, to have great multipurpose developments not only for power projects but for flood control, irrigation and so on. The northwestern corner of the United States has been favoured because Washington has looked on that part of the United States as an area in which to stimulate this type of multipurpose development by providing low interest loans and by providing engineering, economic and research services free through the United States army corps of engineers. We could do this through some other governmental device in this country.

We could get other major projects going. The North and South Saskatchewan rivers are interprovincial in character. Multipurpose developments are possible there. Certainly developments of a similar character are possible in other provinces, including the maritimes where unemployment is a serious problem. I believe these projects could provide tens of thousands of jobs, but of even greater importance in terms of greater employment are our service industries. Tourism is one of these. In the Vancouver area we have a remarkable situation. Few people who did not live there would believe that most Canadians there go to the United States to ski. They go south of the border for their winter sports. Yet within a few miles of Vancouver we have some of the finest scenery in the world. Federal and provincial co-operation in respect of highways and in the development of park areas could provide not only great immediate employment opportunities but the springboard for great service industries, a great tourist industry, a great convention centre industry in that part of the world. The west coast has a great deal to offer and it can offer many more jobs sooner if vision of that type is shown.

We have heard a great deal recently about the national economic development board. Perhaps it will supersede the national productivity council, but under its terms of reference projects are mentioned. I have mentioned a number of projects of the type which can be carried forward. I hope that the Department of Labour, through an effective minister of labour and an effective staff, will be able to spot these projects, assist other departments to find projects and work as well with industry and labour in order to bring forward the types of schemes which can provide many jobs.

Government initiative is needed. Certainly government planning is needed. I believe we should rely wherever possible on private enterprise and private initiative, but in the private enterprise economy there has been at least periodically serious unemployment and we must deal head on with this problem.

I believe the keynote really is co-operation between government and industry, goverment and labour, between governments in this country and, in view of the incidents of the last few days, between governments across international boundaries. I think that with the will to co-operate we can beat this unemployment problem and I hope this afternoon I have given a few tangible ideas as to how we can get at it soon.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I want to speak in connection with an act that is administered by the Department of Labour, the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. This is a rather fantastic situation in which I am involved personally, and in order to put the situation into focus I have to put on the record a letter from 2167 Barnes street, Montreal, dated October 20, 1962. It is addressed to Mr. John M. Paquet, national president of the Canadian trainmen's union, 344-15th street, Limoilou, Quebec. This letter is signed by J. Earl White, national organizer of the Canadian trainmen's union. It reads:

Dear Mr. Paquet:

Re: Interview with Messrs. Robert Beaule and Mr. Real Caouette.

After our meeting in Quebec city on October 17 I took your letter of introduction to Mr. Beaule and arrived in his office the following morning.

I was promptly received and discussed the C.T.U. platform with Mr. Beaule. He was quite familiar with it and is prepared to support the cause for which we also fight.

Mr. Beaule asked me to wait in his office and he searched around the building until he found Mr. Caouette. They returned to Mr. Beaule's office.

The interview with Mr. Caouette was very brief. I asked him first if he was familiar with section 6 of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. He was quite familiar with it and very much opposed to the compulsory feature of it because the compulsory feature took away from Canadian labouring men the rights supposedly given to them in the Canadian Bill of Rights.

I told Mr. Caouette that I believed that 80 per cent of Canadian labouring men were opposed to compulsory membership and compulsory dues, because it weakens rather than strengthens labour unions in their dealings with management.

I suggested that his party should advertise their support of a change in the industrial relations act to eliminate compulsion. Mr. Caouette stated it was already the policy of his party and that they were doing a great deal about it.

I suggested that his party should arrange to interview 100 labour union members by picking them at random on the street in various Canadian cities. I told him that I was convinced that he could draw large numbers of votes away from all the political parties and in particular the New Democratic party—if he made it clear that he favoured democratic Canadian labour unions.

I then asked him to introduce in the House of Commons an amendment to the industrial relations act at this session of parliament, because Prime Minister Diefenbaker must respect the wishes of the Social Credit party if he wishes to remain in power.

Mr. Caouette thanked me very profusely for the suggestion and he stated that he would recommend it to a caucus of his party and that he was quite sure that positive action would be taken on the suggestion in the near future.

Just as we shook hands and Mr. Caouette was about to depart a man appeared at the office door looking for Mr. Caouette. Mr. Caouette invited him to come over to where we were and then invited us all to be seated. This man was a stranger to me and I was not introduced to him. Mr. Caouette then asked me to repeat what I had just suggested to him. I did so and finished up by saying that as far as the labouring vote was concerned his party could massacre the other three parties and especially the N.D.P. Mr. Caouette thanked me again and left the office with the stranger whom he still did not introduce.

[Mr. Fisher.]

After they were gone Mr. Beaule asked me if I knew who the man was and I admitted that I did not. Mr. Beaule then told me that the stranger was Mr. Douglas Fisher, M.P. for Port Arthur and a top rank leader in the C.C.F. party.

Mr. Beaule assured me that Mr. Caouette is a very smart politician and that he is sure that he has a very good reason for letting Mr. Fisher know immediately on what basis he proposes to put pressure on Prime Minister Diefenbaker.

I cannot imagine what Mr. Caouette's strategy is other than to cause the New Democratic party to vote to support Diefenbaker in a vote of confidence over the question of compulsion in our so-called democratic American labour union. Such a development could prove to be very embarrassing to the N.D.P. and the C.L.C.

I am arranging to send a supply of C.T.U. letters and miscellaneous material to Mr. Beaule. I was very pleased to observe that he already had a file of considerable proportions—thanks to your initiative.

The developments presently occurring in the House of Commons are encouraging in the extreme.

As I said, Mr. Chairman, this letter is signed by J. Earl White, national organizer of the Canadian trainmen's union. There are a couple of things that need to be put into focus here. This letter came to me from a union organizer or representative in the Quebec city area. He informed me that it has been distributed fairly widely amongst railway employees in that part of Quebec, particularly on the Canadian National Railways. It has been distributed with the argument that here, in effect, is a New Democratic party member visiting Mr. Caouette and apparently approving of Mr. Caouette's views that section 6 of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act should be altered so that there is no check-off of dues allowed to any unions which come under federal jurisdiction.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this is a fantastic conclusion to draw from what I am sure the hon. member for Villeneuve will remember and acknowledge was an innocuous visit on my part to his office in order to chat with him about some ideas he wanted to express to me if I was going to write an article in a newspaper about him. I think the hon. member will acknowledge that. To find, as a result of that very brief visit to interview Mr. Caouette about some information for a newspaper that I am identified with the Social Credit party's view on breaking an important part of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act is just going too far.

I am not attempting, Mr. Chairman, to make accusations where the hon. member for Villeneuve is concerned or his colleague referred to in the letter, Mr. Robert Beaule, but it is quite apparent that this Canadian trainmen's union is capable of jumping to some fantastic conclusions. I should like to point out, therefore, that this is a union that does not have a contract with any major railway in Canada. It is what we call an attempt to destroy a union that is already in existence and serving the men. I should like to refer to the proceedings of the committee which examined the Canadian National Railways, but since the final report has not been received, I cannot give evidence from that.

However, I believe I can say that the hon. member for Lapointe at that committee revealed he was in favour of this Canadian trainmen's union and completely ignorant of the relationship of the brotherhood of railway trainmen to the railways of this country and the responsibilities that they carry out. I would like to point out that section 6 of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, which permits a check-off, was challenged in the courts, and it is my understanding it was upheld as being good law by Chief Justice McRuer, and since that particular incident it has stood.

If the members of the Social Credit party wish to make this part of their campaign, and suggest they want this taken out and that they do not want the check-off for labour union men in Canada, then that is fine; but it is not only fantastic, it is dastardly, that as a result of a chance visit to the office of the hon. member for Villeneuve I am identified as being in favour of this. This is coincidence run wild.

I might say, Mr. Chairman, that my reception in the few minutes I was in the office of the hon. member for Villeneuve was adequate and friendly, as one expects in all relationships with members of other political parties; but I must say that this gentleman, in describing the incident, has not been completely factual, because the hon. member for Villeneuve did not ask him to repeat the gist of his argument so that I could hear it at all. That did not take place.

This particular personal issue, and I emphasize it is a personal one, has very serious implications in a general way. Recently in Canada, particularly with the upsurge of the Social Credit party in Quebec, we have had a fantastic kind of approach to labour unions. These gentlemen seem to feel that the rights that have been hard won by labour unions—and many labour unions feel they should secure many more—have gone far too far and must be cut back. One of the means of doing this is to weaken and cripple the unions.

At this particular time the railways are going through a state of flux and change. There has been a steady reduction in the number of jobs available. It is an unstable situation and there is a tremendous need for co-operation and liaison, not only between management and labour but much more so between labour unions. In this connection I would like to argue it would be vital to consider seriously the kind of suggestion that apparently—if we believe this letter—the Social Credit party wants to put forward, which in effect would go a long way to destroy these unions that represent the working men on the railways.

So far as the Canadian trainmen's union is concerned its emphasis is remarkably upon a kind of Canadian nationalism that is extremely narrow. If any members of the house feel it is time for the so-called international unions to end their relationships with international officers in the United States, that is an opinion or point of view to which they are welcome, and they are welcome to argue it; but this is no reason to go in the face of the tremendous contribution that Canadian unionism receives from the United States, a contribution that in many ways still exists and is still coming in so many fields.

I feel, particularly in the railway business where we have the illustration of an all Canadian union, the Canadian brotherhood of railway and general employees, working very strongly with the international brotherhoods on the non-op side, that we have proof we can have a Canadian union on the railways that will do its job and work with brotherhoods that have international relationships, and that both can work together for the workmen on the railways and the trade union movement as a whole.

This being the situation I would ask the Minister of Labour to dismiss in a very cavalier fashion the kind of arguments put forward by organizations such as the Canadian trainmen's union that would somehow suggest, because a member of parliament happens to come into the office of another, that he is all set on ruining one of the most important pieces of legislation that is on the statute books today.

Mr. Walker: Mr. Chairman, there are three definitions I wish to put before the committee in talking in this labour estimates debate, and I hope they will assist in clarifying the objectives which I am sure all of us have for those Canadians whose livelihood and happiness are dependant on the employment policies of the government. These definitions are as follows:

1. Unemployment is the involuntary idleness of a worker seeking work at prevailing wages.

2. Job, a regular remunerative employment.

3. Employment is the degree or extent to which persons needing employment and who are available for employment are provided with employment, or lack of it, because of the prevailing economic conditions. Employment in a particular area, and this is very important in the definition, is likely to increase or decrease according to the economic conditions of the country as a whole.

This may seem very academic, but I feel that unless we constantly attempt to find out what is wrong with the economic conditions in the country that allow us to have a chronic rate of unemployment, then the Minister of Labour will not be able to effect a cure for the country.

I suggest that the minister's greatest concern will be the employment policies and practices of his government, and not just the unemployment problem. I am sure he agrees with this proposition. Yesterday the minister stated that unemployment is still a very grave problem. That is right, and it is an extremely personal one for hundreds of thousands of our people. However, Mr. Chairman, I think the government has an even greater problem on its hands, and until it has answered that problem we can really look for no significant change in the job picture for our people.

Mr. Churchill: I wonder, Mr. Chairman, if the committee would continue just for a few minutes and pass at least the first item of these estimates.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, there does not seem any good reason for deviating from the order of rule. Moreover, the committee has no power, I would remind the hon. gentleman, to extend its sitting. The Speaker would have to go back to the chair and the committee would have to ask leave to sit again. We would be glad to consider that request if it is made at the proper time. I just recall the rule because of certain things which happened in the house not so long ago.

Mr. Churchill: Before Christmas.

Mr. McCleave: There is no necessity for Your Honour to see the clock unless it is drawn to Your Honour's attention.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is five o'clock.

Mr. Walker: Five o'clock.

The Chairman: The hon. member for York Centre reminds the Chair it is five o'clock. So that the house may proceed to private members' business, pursuant to standing order 15, section 3, it is my duty to rise, report progress and request leave to sit later this day or at the next sitting of the house.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

Mr. Speaker: It being now five o'clock, the house will proceed to the consideration of private members' business as it appears on today's order paper, namely, public bills as set out at page 22.

[Mr. Walker.]

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

AMENDMENTS REVISING MEDIATION AND CONCILIATION PROCESSES, ETC.

On the order:

Second reading of Bill C-23, an act to amend the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act.—Mr. Howard.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I do not know whether it is worth while following the normal proprieties of the house at this stage or not, but I should like formally to ask leave to withdraw this particular bill.

Some hon. Members: Granted.

Order discharged and bill withdrawn.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT WITH RESPECT TO WATER POLLUTION

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West) moved the second reading of Bill C-27, to amend the Criminal Code (nuisance).

Mr. Pickersgill: Before you recognize the hon. member for Kootenay West, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might ask the hon. member for York South whose name has been given as seconder, if he will permit me to second this bill in his place.

Mr. Lewis: Since it deals with nuisance, I shall be delighted to.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the correction as agreed, I call on the hon. member for Kootenay West.

Mr. Herridge: I must explain that this measure does not deal with such an angelic nuisance as the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. It has to do with material nuisance in relation to our national resources.

I am introducing this bill once again because I am alarmed at the sight of our industries and people polluting our waters, as it were, with their own hands at an increasing rate. Over many parts of Canada the water table is falling, yet thousands of factories and hundreds of municipal sewer systems are discharging their waste into our rivers with only a fraction of this increasing filth having been given adequate previous treatment. We all know that water is the life blood of any country, yet though we have more than trebled our consumption in recent years we are polluting it and destroying the watersheds whence it comes. We are destroying something without which we cannot survive and for which there is no substitute.

There are substitutes for power and for other materials but there is no substitute for clear water.

The soul of man, shaken and bruised by the ceaseless din of modern cities and the calamitous international sabre rattling, needs treeways rather than freeways; it needs pure waterways rather than sewer ways. We are disfiguring the natural landscape, eroding our soil, destroying our forests and polluting our waters almost with the zeal of a religious mission in the name of so-called progress. The purpose of this bill is to make it an offence for the owners of industrial plants and oil refineries or other persons to discharge noxious matter into an interprovincial water, thus endangering the lives, safety, health or comfort of the public.

It provides as follows:

> Every owner, lessee, or person operating any industrial plant, oil refinery, chemical works, sawmill or other plant or works, or any other person, who discharges or throws or allows to be discharged or thrown any noxious waste product, raw sewage, oil, sawdust, chemical or other matter or thing into a river, stream or other water any part of which is interprovincial or which flows into any interprovincial water, which has the effect of endangering the lives, safety, health or comfort of the public is guilty of——either an indictable offence or an offence punishable on summary conviction.

This measure is identical with one which was introduced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) when he was a distinguished and militant member of the opposition. In this respect it can be said, for once, that by introducing this bill I am following in the footsteps of John. It must be agreed that the scope of the bill is limited. It deals only with the provision of pollution of interprovincial rivers. I think this question arose on that earlier occasion as a result of the Saskatchewan river on the Alberta side of the Saskatchewan boundary. There was a great deal of concern at that time on the part of members representing the province of Saskatchewan in this house. Nevertheless, this is a short step which we can take to indicate where we stand on this matter in this house—to show our concern and willingness to do something within our powers to correct a situation which is becoming increasingly bad.

I have had a lifelong interest in the question of conservation. I have lived very close to the soil, to the waters and to the woods of this country and I have had a close relationship throughout the years with persons who have held opinions similar to my own. But in presenting these views this afternoon I am introducing a bill which members of this group support wholeheartedly because they realize we cannot maintain a satisfactory material standard of living for the generations to come unless it is based on adequate national resources. We aim to preserve our heritage for future generations. As I have said before, water is of prime importance, though many people fail to realize it. I think the government of Canada failed to realize it when they signed the Columbia treaty and made it possible for the United States to use for all time the surplus waters of the Columbia for irrigation and domestic purposes as well as for flood control, rather than preserve those surplus waters for use in the Okanagan and, some day, for the irrigation of the western prairies.

Considerable interest has been taken in this matter throughout the years by small numbers of people. The international joint commission has done some excellent work with respect to agreements with local authorities, and measures for the prevention of pollution in certain international waters. There are numbers of provincial organizations in British Columbia and in the western provinces, in Ontario and the maritimes, which have taken a great interest in this question of the prevention of pollution of rivers and streams. There are other groups, not so well known, perhaps, which carry on their work without much publicity in the municipalities, besides numerous individuals in various occupations in life, particularly in some of our universities and research establishments. These people have pointed the finger at the desperate need for federal, provincial and municipal co-operation to meet this situation. I must say, in fairness, before proceeding further, that I give this government credit for a limited approach in making provision to assist municipalities to obtain sewage disposal plants. That is all to the good, but it is far too timid an approach really to accomplish the objective outlined by the minister when he introduced his legislation.

In dealing with this question I should like to quote from a monthly letter issued by the Royal Bank of Canada. In it is an article entitled "Resources for Living". I will give credit to the Royal Bank of Canada for the interesting articles they have published with respect to the conservation of natural resources. They must have someone at the head of that institution who understands this problem and is interested in it. I quote briefly from page 3:

> The purity of our air and water and the foods produced on our soil and in the sea will determine our number, our health, our efficiency, and our enjoyment of life.
> Although pollution has reached impressive proportions, legislation competent to eliminate it is creeping forward at a snail's pace.

This group wholeheartedly agrees with that statement.

There is delay in initiating measures of cleanliness because of lack of clearly defined responsibilities. The various levels of government are not certain who should do what. As was said in a paper presented at the "Resources for Tomorrow" conference: "Indecision and delay stem in part from differences in interpretation of the B.N.A. Act and a lack of clear federal and provincial policies." Meantime, public health is at stake, recreational values are impaired, industrial uses are limited, and fisheries suffer.

That indicates the interest of prominent persons in one of our large banks in Canada and represents growing opinion in this country.

I should also like to quote briefly from the Gazette of October 5 an editorial entitled: "Why water pollution gets little action". This editorial says:

At the recent conference of the water pollution control federation in Toronto, a good point was made by Mr. K. F. Beaton of the public relations department of Shell Oil Company, New York. He said that the success or failure of efforts to control water pollution will largely depend upon the public's understanding and support of what is done, or might be attempted.

There is much to this. If water pollution control were a comparatively inexpensive thing, governments might be ready to introduce it. But it is immensely costly. It will take up many tax dollars. This expenditure may have to be taken away from some other project, or will have to delay other plans.

There is not the same general pressure for action, the same insistent demand that the huge sums of money be spent, as there might be for something like highways, where the problem seems far more visible and personal and urgent.

Yet the threat of water pollution may be one of the greatest—all the more so because it is a rising danger. But unless the public demands that something be done, or unless the public is brought to realize that something really effective must be done, the control of water pollution will likely remain where it is today—quite low on the list of priorities.

I received a very interesting magazine through the courtesy of the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Sams), who I understand is very interested in this problem. The magazine is "The Civic Administration Handbook of Environmental Pollution Control", and it deals with the subject from the point of view of municipal authorities. The handbook is about the difficulties which are related to the question of overcoming river pollution. I should like to quote from this in view of the fact that I am introducing a bill today similar to one introduced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker). The Prime Minister sent a message to the editor of this magazine for publication, and I do wish he would give effect to his message. He said:

I congratulate the editors and publishers of civic administration on their initiative in publishing a handbook for municipal administrators on the sources, effects and control of environmental pollution, the first such publication to deal with the pollution of soil, water and air as a single problem.

[Mr. Herridge.]

Canada is fortunate to be endowed with abundant renewable resources and it is incumbent on all of us to see that in using these we do not destroy them, but pass them on unimpaired to future generations. In carrying out this trust, the control of pollution is of fundamental importance.

The letter is signed by the Prime Minister and I do hope that the members of his party will on this occasion support this bill so that it will pass this house before the hour is completed.

This matter is of increasing concern and is a danger which is growing apace. We have only to look at the Ottawa river flowing beside our parliament buildings to realize the necessity for some action. We also have this problem with many other rivers of Canada. Fortunately I come from a district where there is very little pollution, an area in which flow two great rivers, the Columbia and the Kootenay. But this problem which is facing the people because of sewage disposal from various cities and industrial developments must be nipped in the bud. We have a little problem at the present time but we must prevent it from becoming a big problem. I suggest that we need research. We need information. The public require to be informed. We need co-operation between governments. We need legislation such as this. This is first-step legislation to deal with this increasing problem. We need the participation of the Canadian people in the defence and protection of our great natural resources. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I urge support for the principle of this bill as a short step, so far as legislation is concerned, in the direction in which we should go.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Wentworth.

Mr. Churchill: Is not the seconder going to support this bill?

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member is going to speak on his behalf.

Mr. Speaker: I call on the hon. member for Wentworth, and then on the hon. member for Jacques Cartier-Lasalle (Mr. Rock).

Mr. J. R. Sams (Wentworth): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In my view, water pollution is fast becoming, as was expressed by the hon. member who has just spoken, one of our most pressing domestic problems as we go on developing the industrial potential of Canada. In my opinion there are two basic steps which are needed to keep pollution from reaching dangerous proportions, proportions which, as was so well described, are dangerous to our national health and well-being. First, efforts must be made to clean up the sources of pollution. Second, legislative action must be taken to ensure that wastes are properly treated before being discharged into our watercourses. The views expressed by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) and his arguments in favour of this measure I think are most surely agreed to by all hon. members of this house. For regardless of the constituency from which we come, this problem has already become, or will shortly become, one of major concern to those we represent.

Mr. Speaker, the Concise Oxford Dictionary defines "water" as "a colourless, transparent, scentless compound of oxygen and hydrogen in liquid state, convertible by heat into steam and by cold into ice". I think that to go beyond the mere definition of the word it should also be stated that water is the most important of our natural resources, because there can be no existence without it and no progress where it is in short supply.

Some excellent reading for anybody interested in this topic may be found in a booklet published by the international joint commission in 1961 entitled: "Safeguarding boundary water quality". One short statement in that booklet indicating the significance of pollution reads as follows:

> Pollution impairs the quality and usefulness of water. It makes it unfit for domestic or industrial use, and recreation, and may cause serious illness. It destroys fish and wildlife. It creates offensive conditions and interferes with navigation. It may create areas of desolation and render the stream useless for constructive purposes. It causes economic losses, and it reduces the capacity of the waters to perform their many beneficial and necessary functions.

I come from a constituency which is fast changing from its traditional agricultural background to one of suburban and industrial character, and while farming still plays an important part in the economy of our area, even the most rural of our municipalities have felt the pressure of growth and in several instances they have also felt the evil of water pollution.

Hamilton harbour, once the site of many fine bathing beaches and beautiful homes, has in just one generation completely degenerated into a massive pool of sewage and offensive chemicals, causing the city council to spend millions of dollars on a sewage treatment system to cope with this unfortunate problem.

Similar steps have been and are being taken by many other communities in southern Ontario. In the metropolitan Hamilton region the amount of money being spent is reaching fantastic proportions; but this must be done in order to combat the very evident hazard to health which pollution brings. These projects will, I hope, restore our waterways, especially our great lakes waterways, to their former purity and beauty. However, before we legislate through the medium of the Criminal Code, as this measure would suggest, I believe we should recognize the steps taken by provincial authorities as well as the voluntary steps taken by industry in this field.

First of all, I should like to mention for a moment the steps taken by industry. A large oil refinery is located along the north shore of lake Ontario about midway between Hamilton and Toronto and, if this proposal became law, it would perhaps qualify as one of the worst possible types of offenders. As hon. members know, a concentration of phenolic waste is one of the worst contaminants in existence.

There is in Ontario legislation which would, and with some substantial effect, prohibit this plant from discharging objectionable wastes into this main interprovincial and international waterway. However, this company has undertaken to provide itself with one of the best possible examples of industrial waste treatment.

The Cities Service Oil Company has developed a $3 million conservation program, including a "green-belt" buffer zone around its plant, an air pollution prevention plan and a waste treatment plant called by its operators the most modern and most efficient anywhere in the world. According to information I have received from the company, the quantity of waste treated averages about 300 gallons a minute and, as an example of the success of the process, called biological oxidation, all traces of phenol waste are removed and the water is returned to lake Ontario in a purer state than that in which it was taken from the lake. To graphically illustrate the success of the operation—and I think this may be of particular interest to the hon. member for Kootenay West—may I say that the company has installed a large aquarium where native fish of the great lakes thrive in water which has gone through the petroleum processing plant. The treatment process incidentally enables the company to recover thousands of barrels of oil which would otherwise be lost and which would under less favourable circumstances flow out into lake Ontario to pollute that great waterway.

The example I have described is but one of a number of similar steps being undertaken in southern Ontario where industries are taking the initiative in waste treatment. I would, however, suggest that this particular company has gone far beyond its responsibilities in demonstrating to others what can be done in this important field.

In Ontario, as indeed in several other provinces described by the hon. member for Kootenay West, provincial authorities have been set up to study and control pollution and related matters, and in the few minutes remaining to me I should like to outline one or two measures which have been taken in Ontario in this regard.

In 1955, recognizing the need for safeguarding Ontario water supplies and adequately dealing with the effects of pollution, especially those from which domestic water supplies were being drawn, the government of Ontario set up a committee to look into these questions, and followed it the next year with the creation of the Ontario water resources commission. In 1957, legislation was passed increasing the scope of the commission's functions. I should like to read briefly from a paragraph contained in a booklet describing its major activities. It does these things:

> Supervises the operation of all water, sewage treatment and waste purification plants in Ontario, and lends technical assistance in this connection.
> Keeps close watch over stream pollution through examination of streams and sources of pollution. The commission has the right of enforcement of any of its requirements to individuals, industries or municipalities in this regard...
>
> Advises municipalities concerning their water requirements and their needs in connection with sewage disposal and treatment.
> Reviews plans and approves or disapproves of all water and sewage projects to be undertaken by municipalities or persons...
> Operates laboratory and research services in connection with problems relative to the fields of water, sewage and industrial wastes.

The remarkable accomplishments of this commission since its formation and the commencement of its program has led to the investment of $363 million in Ontario in an effort to combat what would be included in the Criminal Code under the bill of the hon. member.

I believe that the federal government has a place in this particular question. However, I believe that place should be a co-ordinating one between the individual provinces, each of which has a particular problem in this connection.

I agree wholeheartedly with the principle behind the proposal of the hon. member. There is in Canada today a tremendous need in federal, provincial, municipal and business circles for a complete awareness of the tragic loss to our nation of one of our finest natural resources, namely pure water. As we extend cultivation, disrobe our forests and plow our fields without regard to soil erosion and as we continually overload our waterways with the wastes of our industries and our cities, the banks of our rivers and lakes become garbage dumps for the next generation. Our harbours have been turned into gigantic cesspools, indeed frightful products of modern civilization.

I suggest that we require much additional research, but in addition we require much additional education. We face today in Canada the complete loss of all major waterways as places of recreation. We face an impairment in the use of this water for agricultural purposes. We face an impairment in the use of this water for domestic consumption, except by expensive chemical treatment and filtration. We also face one of the most costly projects which this nation has ever undertaken, if action is not taken quickly to stop individual offenders.

Recent progress has been quite substantial in several areas in spite of serious obstacles. Perhaps the greatest stumbling block is the post-war industrial expansion and population surge in this country. We now have the opportunity of restoring a healthy state to Canadian waterways defiled for the present by a young, aggressive nation. I believe this critical situation could best be summed up by reading from the report of the joint commission on boundary waters. It states in part as follows:

> The satisfactory quality of these waters in the future can be secured and maintained. They can be used and enjoyed by the people of both countries continuing as one of the greater natural resources as long as the rain falls and the rivers flow.

Mr. Raymond Rock (Jacques Cartier-Lasalle): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of Bill No. C-27, an act to amend the Criminal Code, is to make it a criminal offence to pollute interprovincial waters, and this purpose could easily be unanimously accepted by this house. I understand, however, that as the bill is drafted it is word for word the same as a former bill drafted by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) when he was in the opposition. It seems to me that this bill is brought forward again in the same manner as it has been year after year by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) possibly in order to embarrass the Prime Minister and also so that once again it would not be supported and would be talked out. For these reasons I want to be brief so that I will not be accused of making a lengthy speech simply for the purpose of continuing until six o'clock.

I ask the hon. member for Kootenay West to amend his bill so that when an individual is found guilty of polluting interprovincial waters he will not have a $25,000 fine imposed on him, but a lesser fine. I would also ask the hon. member for Kootenay West to agree that a clause be inserted which will provide that the bill will come into force on March 31, 1963 in order that municipalities bordering on interprovincial waters will have time to complete construction of their sewage purification plants by that date. That is the date when financial aid to the municipalities ceases, according to the amendment to the National Housing Act brought forward by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fulton), which extended the expiry date from March 31, 1961, to March 31, 1963. I asked for this extension before the passage of that bill.

The constituency of Jacques Cartier-Lasalle, which I have the honour to represent, is vitally concerned. It is situated at the western end of the island of Montreal where the St. Lawrence river and the Ottawa river, both of which are considered to be interprovincial waters, join. I should like to speak on pollution problems at length and also about the water purification board recently created by the province of Quebec. I have a large file on pollution. I believe that this bill is necessary and having suggested certain changes I would ask that debate on the bill not be prolonged to six o'clock in order that passage in principle may be granted.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, could I reply to the hon. member's question?

Mr. Speaker: There was no question and there was no amendment. There was a suggestion.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, could I ask the hon. member a question? Does he realize that if he or some of his colleagues would introduce the suggested amendments the member for Kootenay West would be very pleased to support them in order to see the bill get through the house? Does he also realize that the only motive of the member for Kootenay West is the welfare of the people of Canada? I have no wish to embarrass the Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker: Those are not questions calling for an answer at this time.

Mr. Bert Leboe (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, first of all I must admit that I have not done as much homework as I possibly should have in connection with this bill. However, I should like to make a few brief remarks with regard to it. I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) for bringing this matter to the attention of the house. We realize, of course, that bills of this nature are always talked out and I believe this is so because the house realizes that it is the responsibility of the government to govern. However, we also realize that this bill in its present form has been a matter of discussion in the house over the years, and since the previous Liberal government and the Conservative government are both agreed in principle on the bill we sometimes wonder why it has never been passed. The reason must be that conditions in the country are such that at the particular moment they do not warrant this suggested amendment to the Criminal Code.

I could refer to Hansard and the discussions that have taken place in years gone by. In 1955, and back as far as 1953 when I was in the house, there were many discussions. I can recall the then member for The Battlefords and the member for Kootenay West making very able presentations for the passage of such legislation. I think we have an opportunity at this time to reflect on what private enterprise has done in respect of living up to its responsibilities in connection with pollution. I believe the reason the bill has never been passed is that the government has been encouraged by the fact that private enterprise has done a lot toward keeping our streams pure, and free of the waste materials and toxic acids that normally come from a good deal of industrial expansion.

I was somewhat amused and wondered a little about the reference to the Columbia river by the hon. member for Kootenay West.

Mr. Herridge: I could not help it.

Mr. Leboe: I believe that. I will take him at his word. I do not think that he on reflection would wish to deprive people of water just because they live south of the Canadian border. They are human beings, just as are the people who live in Canada. I think we must never be guilty of a dog in the manger attitude. I should like to see a full discussion by members in all parts of the house, so I will simply say that I am certainly in agreement with bringing forward a bill of this nature for discussion and keeping before our minds the necessity of seeing that our streams remain pure.

I might say that industrial development in the riding of Cariboo is only in its infancy, but we already have a large industrial plant at Taylor Flats. We are going to have a pulp mill in the Prince George area and those who are building the mill will have to make certain, of course, that the Fraser river is kept unpolluted. I conclude my remarks by saying that I believe the hon. member for Kootenay West has been very sincere in bringing this bill forward and it should receive the consideration of the house.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, since I was given the honour of seconding this bill I feel I should say a word or two in support of it. I will endeavour not to say so much as to make a nuisance of myself.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Impossible.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member for Saint John-Albert, in his usual flattering way, has said it would be impossible for me to be a nuisance, and I thank him for saying that. I feel, knowing the great admiration in which I am held by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), that, notwithstanding party differences, this is one occasion when I can sincerely follow John. It seems to me that this might be the last chance for the Prime Minister to carry out one of the promises he made to the people of Canada. I felt that I could be of assistance along with the honourable and genial member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), in assisting the Prime Minister to carry out that promise to do what he could in every way, by legislation, by administration and other ways, to end so far as possible the pollution of all these streams that come under federal jurisdiction.

I am very sincere about this, sir. For 25 years I have lived on the banks of the Ottawa river. During those 25 years the condition of the Ottawa river, the Rideau river and unfortunately also the Gatineau river, has not improved. It does seem to me that if there is one project about which it would be wonderful to do something before our national centennial, it would be to clean up these open sewers in our capital city and make these rivers once again the kind of thing of which we Canadians can be proud as part of our national heritage.

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Public Works): As I look about this distinguished chamber this afternoon, I have some suspicion that either the trains to Montreal and Toronto have broken down for some mysterious reason or else some other event is upon us. Perhaps that is so, since there has been the dry sound of clicking knitting needles from the gallery above.

I was disappointed that in an otherwise excellent debate, during which much good has been said about fellow citizens and the work they have done in this field, very little was said about one of the most impressive achievements of this government in this fight against water pollution. There has been a reference by the hon. member for Kootenay West to the municipal sewage treatment process, which I suggest to you fits clearly into this field. He described it as a very limited approach. Well, sir, I have had the advantage of obtaining from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation figures which would make the hon. member change the adjectives in that description. I think this has been an imaginative approach and one which has worked out very successfully indeed.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

As of January 18 last loans under this program totalled $138 million. I should have qualified that somewhat by giving a breakdown, and if I am permitted I should like to have this table appear in Hansard for the assistance of hon. members. The breakdown is as follows, actual inquiries where municipalities are eligible for such assistance, $51,768,000; applications on hand, $2,119,000; approvals are of the order of $84,900,000, making up the total of $138,787,000.

In addition to this, there are some 72 applications now being processed for which no definite amount is known. Perhaps before proceeding I could ask if the house would be agreeable to have this table printed in Hansard. The table is headed "Loans for Municipal Sewage Treatment Projects, Summary to January 18, 1963". The breakdown is by provinces, and the total amount for Canada in the three categories I have mentioned. The figures were drawn up by those who should know, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, at my request for this debate.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member seeks leave of the house to put this table, prepared by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, on the record. Has he leave of the house?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that this is most interesting material, and will be of particular interest to have printed at public expense for dissemination by Conservative candidates. I am just wondering what relationship it possibly has to this particular bill which deals with an entirely different subject. I am not objecting to it, but I just wanted to draw attention to the pure motives of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. McCleave: I am afraid the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is forgetting that he promised, when he took part in this debate, he would not be a nuisance. There has been a reference to the subject of the bill. Perhaps the hon. member did not have an opportunity of reading it, and of noting that it deals with the fight against water pollution. This bill of the hon. member for Kootenay West would make it a nuisance, under certain circumstances punishable by criminal action, if people do not take steps to keep our water supply pure. I am saying that one of the massive steps being taken, which appeals to me much more than criminal action, is to provide municipalities with a very generous scheme under which the problems of water pollution can be tackled. This is the purport of my argument.

I thought the members of the committee, not only Conservative but Liberals, Social Credit members and those of the N.D.P. would be interested in such a table.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the hon. gentleman has given a very convincing argument. I would not want to object at all, but I hope I can make an appeal to the hon. gentleman. In return, would he conclude his speech in time for a vote to be taken on this admirable bill which we would all like to see passed.

Mr. Speaker: I take it the house grants leave to the hon. member to have the table printed in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: The table above referred to follows:]

Mr. McCleave: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. To depart for a moment from the table, I might say that municipalities from all provinces have taken advantage of this excellent program which was started, as perhaps hon. members will recall, in December, 1961. In December of last year, these provisions were extended and provided long term loans to municipalities, as well as forgiveness for certain work completed before 1963. This provision has now been extended to March 31, 1965.

I was impressed by the point made by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier-Lasalle (Mr. Rock) to the effect there should be notice given to people so that the act would not suddenly fall upon them, and so they would know when the act would come into effect. This would give them an opportunity to clean up, for example, any part of an industrial operation which polluted our water resources. I am sorry the hon. member did not put his idea in the form of a formal amendment. However, if and when the bill goes into committee, this could be done and the amendment considered. This would be really the basis upon which I should like to give my support to the bill, that is giving notice of the pollution in the first place and then stating a time within which these serious matters of water pollution could be cleared up.

Mr. Eric Stefanson (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to congratulate the hon. member for Kootenay West upon introducing this bill. At the outset of his speech he said he would like to see debate on it concluded by six o'clock. I know there are several other hon. members who would like to speak on it, and I am sure the hon. gentleman knows full well that I have been interested in water pollution and have spoken on bills like this previously. At one time I introduced a resolution dealing with a similar problem.

I am sure he will agree I am not in the habit of making a nuisance of myself in the house and of taking up much of the time of the house, but I want to make a few comments in regard to this bill, Bill C-27. The purpose of the bill is to make it an offence for the owners of industrial plants and oil refineries, or other persons, to discharge noxious matter into an interprovincial water, thus endangering the lives, safety, health or comfort of the public.

I have a particular interest in the bill because lake Winnipeg lies within the boundaries of the constituency of Selkirk and we have several interprovincial rivers running into that lake. We have the North and South Saskatchewan rivers emptying into lake Winnipeg. We also have the Red river, which is an international river, and the Assiniboine river which flows into the Red river and is an interprovincial river, also emptying into the lake. Industrial waste is one of the big factors we have to contend with, and as the law stands today industry is now responsible for taking care of its industrial waste. In many cases industries find the cheapest method is to release waste into the rivers, and that is one of the main reasons why we have had our rivers polluted. However I am sure industry realizes its responsibilities and is willing to share in the cost of cleaning up the rivers.

This matter of water pollution was one of the subjects discussed at the resources for tomorrow conference held in Montreal in October, 1961. It received a lot of attention, papers were presented on the subject and workshops were set up to deal with the matter. On that occasion a paper prepared by Mr. Menzies was submitted to the conference, a paper which I have read and found to be very interesting and helpful in understanding the problem of water pollution.

Basically we are concerned with the effects of pollution. Briefly these are its effects on human life and health, fatal and contagious diseases and infections, its effect on other forms of life, fish losses through poisoning and oxygen depreciation, its effect on waterfowl and the destruction of waterfowl habitats, together with its non-fatal effects on water for domestic purposes. I may say that in Manitoba we have seen much wildlife, many waterfowl, die from the effects of water pollution. We have seen its effects on fish and we know the danger caused by water pollution.

The hon. member for Kootenay West mentioned that the water table was gradually falling and that pollution would become an increasingly difficult problem. I have to agree with that statement. It is becoming a greater problem; but as the hon. member for Halifax mentioned, this government took the initiative in passing legislation in 1961.

Under the provisions of that legislation loans were offered to municipalities, and as the hon. member for Halifax pointed out, the total of loans made to date is $84,900,000. When additional applications now being processed are approved, the total will be brought up to $138 million. Hon. members must remember that 25 per cent of this is non-repayable.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder if we could get a moderation of some of the conversation. The Chair is having some considerable difficulty in hearing the speaker.

Mr. Churchill: There is considerable excitement.

Mr. Stefanson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I particularly wanted to make reference to the loans that have been made in the province of Manitoba. In that province up to January of this year 21 loans have been made totalling $914,000, and of that 25 per cent or $225,500 will be rebated. There are a further five applications in the process of being approved, totalling $1,182,000, and besides that 14 other Manitoba communities are presently preparing anti-pollution plans and have made inquiries in regard to loans under section 6(b) of the National Housing Act. This section of the act certainly has been effective as a start in tackling the great problem of water pollution, but I realize there is a lot yet to be done. Probably the government has to work out further plans with the provincial governments and municipalities.

The resources for tomorrow conference, when dealing with water pollution, discussed several items and I want to comment on the recommendations they made to the government at that time.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The time appointed for consideration of private members' business is now expired.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I inquire from the house leader what business the government proposes submitting to the house for its consideration on Monday?

Mr. Churchill: On Monday I have already announced there would be a supply motion, and the subject for debate on that occasion is generally in the hands of the opposition.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It now being six o'clock this house stands adjourned until 2.30 o'clock on Monday, February 4.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, February 4, 1963

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. HARKNESS—STATEMENT ON RESIGNATION AS MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Yesterday I sent to the Prime Minister my resignation as minister of national defence.

I believe it is the duty of a minister of national defence to ensure the security of Canada to the greatest extent that he believes to be possible, on the basis of the information and advice he receives. I have always believed, in pursuit of this duty as minister, that we should have nuclear weapons.

In all defence negotiations concerning nuclear weapons in which I have had a part, the sovereignty of Canada has been protected fully. We have never lost sight of the dignity or independence of this country.

I believed when I spoke here last Thursday that the position I outlined in a press release issued on Monday, January 28, was the same as that stated by the Prime Minister in his speech of January 25, as found on page 3136 of Hansard. Subsequently it became apparent to me that the Prime Minister's views on nuclear arms and my own are irreconcilable. On reflection, I believe now I made a mistake in agreeing to what would amount to a four month delay in obtaining nuclear warheads for our forces in Europe. I did so agree in the hope of getting the nuclear arms question definitely settled.

I differ from the Prime Minister in this way, that I believe we should have obtained nuclear warheads for our weapons carriers as soon as the latter were ready. I thought throughout that by remaining in the cabinet I could better achieve this purpose than by taking the easier course of resigning.

I resigned on a matter of principle. The point was finally reached when I considered that my honour and integrity required that I take this step. I shall, of course, remain in the Conservative party, and I hope to run in my constituency of Calgary North at the next election. That will be in the hands of my supporters in Calgary North to whom I hope to report shortly.

27507-3—214

I should like to make it clear that I absolutely reject the position on nuclear weapons set forth by the Liberal leader. That anomalous position is that Canada should evade her responsibility by accepting nuclear weapons now and then immediately negotiating out of them.

I bade farewell to my fellow ministers in the cabinet on terms of warm friendship. I thank the house for its kindness in allowing me to make this statement.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with regular custom—

Mr. Speaker: Is the right hon. gentleman rising on motions?

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, Mr. Speaker, I am rising in view of the statement made and simply in order to table the letter of resignation of the hon. gentleman and my reply which I sent to him today. I will say no more than I say in the letter—

An hon. Member: Read it out.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —namely that I regret the resignation and that I find it difficult to understand the decision in view of the statements made by the hon. gentleman on repeated occasions. I table the letters at this time.

An hon. Member: Read them.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister. The right hon. Prime Minister tabled a copy of the letter which he received from the former minister of national defence, and his reply thereto. I wonder if the Prime Minister would be prepared with the consent of the house to make these two letters part of Hansard for today.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have no objections, but I do not think that course has been followed in the past.

PUBLIC SERVICE

RESEARCH COUNCIL—CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION —ANNOUNCEMENT OF APPOINTMENTS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to announce several important appointments to the public service. Dr. B. G. Ballard, who has been scientific vice president of the national research council, has today been appointed president of the council. Dr. Leo Marion, who is senior director of the council and of the division of pure chemistry, has today been appointed scientific vice president of the council. Both Dr. Ballard and Dr. Marion have had long and distinguished careers with the national research council and I am sure the house will welcome their promotions to the highest offices in the council.

There is a further appointment, that of chairman of the civil service commission. The appointee of the government by order in council is Mr. Robert G. MacNeill, assistant deputy minister of national defence. Prior to his appointment by the civil service commission to the Department of National Defence two years ago, Mr. MacNeill was an officer of the Department of Finance, to which he had been transferred from the defence research board in 1949. I hope and expect that the appointment of this able and experienced civil servant to head the civil service commission will be welcomed by all.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE ON BICULTURALISM

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I indicated to the house last week that I would make a statement today concerning the government's plan to convene a conference with the provincial governments to discuss biculturalism and other questions pertaining to the Canadian confederation.

It is well to recall that almost in the last years of Sir John A. Macdonald's life these words were uttered by him:

> I have no accord with the desire expressed in some quarters that, by any mode whatever, there should be an attempt made to oppress the one language or to render it inferior to the other. I believe that would be impossible if it were tried, and it would be foolish and wicked if it were possible.

That has been the stand of successive Conservative governments since. Today we proudly call ourselves Canadian citizens enjoying every attribute of freedom and sovereignty.

Confederation was achieved by a partnership of English speaking and French speaking men who believed that the destiny of the north half of this continent might be achieved in unity but not in uniformity. But for the fundamental agreements expressed in section 133 of the British North America Act, with its assurance of the rights of language in this country, and sections 91 and 92 assuring to the provinces their jurisdiction over education and culture, there never would have been a Canada. The recognition of the two cultures and of the English and French languages was the very base and foundation of confederation.

Canada, under confederation, has prospered and grown. There have, however, arisen from time to time—periodically it takes place—questions as to whether Canada, as she approaches the close of the first century of confederation, has achieved the full measure of the vision of the fathers of confederation. It is with this thought in mind that the government has decided to propose the calling of a federal-provincial conference, and invitations to such a conference will be dispatched to the governments of the ten provinces at once.

The scope of the conference will be of the fullest breadth. It will be asked to study ways and means of repatriating the constitution, the problem of adequate representation in the public service, crown corporations and other government agencies; the recommendations in the Therrien report; the choice of a national flag and other symbols of our national sovereignty. In brief, the conference will be asked to examine biculturalism and bilingualism in a comprehensive manner.

I know it has been suggested in some quarters that a royal commission should be appointed for this purpose. The government believes that the course which it is now announcing is much to be preferred under the circumstances to the appointment of a royal commission. Royal commissions are appointed to find facts. The facts are well known. The responsibilities are shared by two levels of government. Any royal commission must necessarily be appointed by a federal government and any recommendations that such a royal commission might make would necessarily require to be referred to a federal-provincial conference in due course in any event. It is inconceivable, Mr. Speaker, that action would be taken by any federal government in relation to such matters without having consulted the governments of the provinces in the fullest manner. Indeed, it may well be that the recommendations of any such royal commission would almost certainly involve action by provincial legislatures as much as by parliament. For these clear reasons the government proposes the more definite and more prompt opportunity offered by a federal-provincial conference.

The conference will provide the opportunities to examine areas of disagreement and the nature of the courses of action required to resolve them. It will be intended to contribute to unity, harmony and restatement of the goals of the Canadian confederation. It will not be its purpose to seek uniformity in a country which has chosen unity in diversity, no unity through uniformity. In correcting any injustices that might be found we shall destroy prejudice and misunderstanding. We are ready to take action to deal firmly and positively with any danger which confronts the basis of the Canadian confederation.

This is a task to which all Canadians can give their willing allegiance. Indeed, I think it is the goal of every Canadian proud to call himself a Canadian. Our task must be not to separate but to preserve the principles of confederation, and to round out and restate its goals for the second century of our history.

Canadians must continue to offer to the world the example of a nation composed of peoples who, though differing in language, culture and traditions, hold before mankind the beacon lights of mutual understanding and mutual respect. To the original French and English strains in the Canadian population there have now been added many Canadians of other origins. They have come of their own choice to this country and have become members of the Canadian family, bringing with them their traditions and rich heritages of culture. By their contributions they have enriched, deepened and diversified the cultures of this nation.

I see the Canada of tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, stronger, more united in her diversity, drawing her strength from the partnership of the two great original cultures and enriched by the infusion of many other races and cultures. Such a Canada is destined to play an ever greater and beneficent role in the world as an example of cultures and peoples abiding together in unity. If we remain faithful to these principles and the challenges of our time, then indeed it may be said of us in years to come, as it was said of the fathers of confederation 100 years ago, "They builded better than they knew".

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the position of our party on this matter of such vital importance to our national destiny was made clear in the house on December 17 last in a statement which I was privileged to make at that time, and which I had the privilege of repeating, in both English and French speaking parts of Canada, since I gave it in the house.

In that statement I suggested, and I still think it would be the best course notwithstanding what the Prime Minister has just said, that there should be an immediate inquiry launched by the federal government and the provincial governments to find out what is the best way of getting all the facts which bear on this vitally important problem; because I do feel, notwithstanding what has been said, that there is still room for an inquiry into the facts before the governments concerned, federal and provincial, can take the right kind of action.

I went on to say at that time that the fact that responsibility in this matter was divided in that way did not exempt the federal government from responsibility in respect of matters which come under its own immediate jurisdiction and on which it could act at once.

In the relationships between the two founding races in our confederation—and the Prime Minister has emphasized that in his statement this afternoon—partnership was never more important and separation never more disastrous than in this age of interdependence. For better or for worse we are together, and it is up to us to make it for better, inside confederation. This cannot be done by any attempt to return in any way to the earlier ideas of a centralist or legislative union, held by many fathers of confederation including Sir John A. Macdonald, any more than it can be done by insisting on the strict interpretation of the contract theory of confederation as a binding, legal compact between states. The basis must be partnership that was indeed the concept of confederation, and was the solemn understanding of those in French Canada who supported confederation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: Sir John A. Macdonald once wrote in 1868, and his words appeared in an editorial in the Montreal Gazette the other day:

> My own opinion is that the general government or parliament should pay no more regard to the status or position of the local governments than they would to the prospects of the ruling party in the corporation of Quebec or Montreal.

We have come a long way from those days, Mr. Speaker, and now Quebec—indeed all the provinces but Quebec especially—is far more than a local government. It is a constitutional expression of a full and equal partnership of French speaking Canadians as a founding race in confederation. It is the reflection of the duality of our nationalism in language and in culture. In that sense Quebec is more than a province. It is a political expression within the Canadian nation of the pride of millions of Canadians in a culture, a tradition, a language and a race, the recognition of which by all Canadians is essential to the unity of our country.

Mr. Speaker, no country fits less into anything approaching the pattern of having a master or a privileged race than Canada; not only because of the duality of our origin as a nation but because so many cultures, traditions and races have been added to those of the two founding races to the great benefit of Canada as a whole. Our country would be much poorer without these additional contributions.

All this does not mean that we must not try to seek and achieve a real and meaningful unity. It does mean that we must not confuse this unity with uniformity. Nor does it mean that Quebec—though more than a province—should withdraw in any respect from her place as a province in a confederation; or, more important, that we should do anything in other parts of Canada to make her wish to withdraw from that place.

French Canada is part of Canada, as Canada is part of North America, which includes the United States of America. As Quebec is not an island unto itself in Canada so, Mr. Speaker, our country is not and cannot be an island unto itself on this continent. But Canada is and Canada must remain as Quebec is and Quebec will remain, an identity and a fact. Quebec will make its own adjustments to changes industrial, cultural and political that are inevitable in a changing continent in a changing world. But Quebec will do it in her own way. As a gifted and experienced student of French Canada, an American, Professor Mason Wade, put it very recently:

> While French Canada is becoming more North American it is doing so on its own terms, and it is clear that Quebec will remain French and Catholic and devoted to its traditions in the future as in the past.

(Translation):

Mr. Gilles Gregoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I was most happy to hear, a few moments ago, the most eloquent statements of policy made by the two major political leaders of our country and of English Canada.

On behalf not only of the Social Credit group in this house but of all French Canadians throughout Canada, I should now like to express our feelings in that respect.

While we asked for the establishment of a royal commission on biculturalism, we are told that a federal-provincial conference will be called and that the premiers of the provinces and the Prime Minister of Canada will examine the extent of bilingualism in our country and French Canadian representation in the civil service. The Prime Minister's statement leaves us with mixed feelings of joy and sadness. In our opinion, by consulting the provincial premiers regarding French Canadian representation in federal departments or crown companies, the government fails to shoulder its own responsibilities. In that field of federal jurisdiction the government should have acted on its own.

On the other hand, we agree with the Prime Minister that when it comes to choosing a national flag, the government should consult the provincial premiers to obtain a cross-section of Canadian opinion.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest, in view of the statement just made to the effect that we shall have a federal-provincial conference, instead of a royal commission, I would urge all newspapers in the country to ask all associations to submit briefs on bilingualism and biculturalism. Be they English speaking groups from the province of Quebec or elsewhere, or those who may have representations to make on the matter, either French speaking groups from the province of Quebec or French speaking groups from other provinces, I would have them send their briefs direct to the Prime Minister's office, in order to let him know, prior to that federal-provincial conference, what they mean by biculturalism and bilingualism in this country. If all our associations of both great races would submit briefs prior to the federal-provincial conference, when the time comes for us to sit around a table we would have something to help us consider the situation, and that would represent some kind of inquiry since we cannot get the inquiry we had requested.

We would like to know when that federal-provincial conference will be held; we would have liked to know who will take part in it.

The other day we inquired about it, and the reply was given that the provincial premiers would be represented, and in that way the four political parties. We would have liked to see representatives from the four political parties in the house. I have no intention to talk on behalf of the other political parties, but we would have liked to see our own representatives, in addition to both Social Credit premiers from Alberta and British Columbia who perhaps do not understand our problems as well as our own Social Credit members.

Those are a few suggestions, Mr. Speaker, that we wanted to make to the Prime Minister on the occasion of his statement. I hope he will take them under consideration and that he will bring some changes to his statement of today, in order that we may have still more satisfaction.

I was pleased to hear statements of policy from those two political leaders, for those statements make it clear that there is today an awareness of the existence of two great races, two great cultures in Canada.

(Text):

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I do not think any member of the house will oppose the idea of convening a federal-provincial conference to look into the question of biculturalism and the relationships between the two great races which went to make Canada. However, we in this party feel that the government ought not to dismiss completely the value which could be obtained from appointing a royal commission to look into this matter. Federal-provincial relations and the basic matters of biculturalism and bilingualism have long concerned the people of Canada, ever since confederation.

The last royal commission which was set up to look into federal-provincial relations was known as the Rowell-Sirois commission. It was appointed in response to the economic needs and pressures of the depression days in the 1930's. Because of that fact it, of necessity, placed its major emphasis on fiscal and economic matters. But today the problems are of a different character. Growing industrialization and urbanization have created new problems. French Canadians feel with a good deal of justification that modern events are pressing in upon them and threatening the survival of their language, their culture, and those spiritual values which they cherish so dearly.

We English speaking Canadians have not always been sufficiently sensitive to this situation. While we may deplore separatism, we cannot afford to ignore the sense of grievance and injustice of which separatism is a symptom. It matters not whether we agree that there is a sense of grievance. I for one do agree. But whether we agree or not, if there is felt to be a sense of grievance then that of itself is a problem and one to which we must apply ourselves.

That is why on February 20, 1962, I issued a statement as leader of our party in conjunction with the president of the New Democratic party provisional council for the province of Quebec, and I want to read only an excerpt or two from that statement, if I may, Mr. Speaker. I said:

> Canadians must face the fact that, almost a hundred years after confederation, our federal-provincial and French-English relations continue to be seriously unsettled and unsatisfactory. The New Democratic party believes that we must not permit this situation to drift until it gets out of hand. We believe that there is urgent need for a thorough study of our experience of Canadian federalism and for a careful rethinking of the relations between the two nations which together make up the basic partnership in confederation.
> To this end, the federal and Quebec executives of the New Democratic party propose that a federal-provincial commission on Canadian federalism and biculturalism be immediately constituted. Such a commission should bring together and draw upon the experience and knowledge of outstanding Canadians from all parts of the country. It should hold public hearings throughout the country and invite representatives of every section of the Canadian community to present their point of view and make recommendations for appropriate action.

Then later on I said:

> The New Democratic party believes that a new approach is necessary on the important problem of Canada's unity. We believe that the program adopted at our founding convention, with its pioneering conception of co-operative federalism, presents such a new approach. True Canadian unity depends on equal recognition and respect for both the main cultures of our country and this is the basis on which the New Democratic proposals are formulated.
> However, the task we face as a country must be understood by all our people and this requires much more intensive thought and study.

Then I proceeded to suggest the kind of outstanding people who should be appointed —university figures, men in responsible positions in the press, business, industry, labour, agriculture. I wound up by saying:

> Canadians of this stature—and one could name many others—would make a lasting contribution to the constitutional and cultural future of Canada. The New Democratic party urges that the commission should be appointed now, without delay, so that Canada may celebrate the hundredth anniversary of confederation as a united country, with clear guide lines for the future.

Mr. Speaker, I submit that there is much to be said in favour of having a royal commission to enable persons who have devoted a lifetime to a study of this problem to give us the benefit of their advice and experience. The personnel on such a commission would be important. But most important of all is that it would provide an opportunity for various points of view right across Canada to be heard so that any recommendations to this parliament and to the legislatures of Canada would be made only after having studied the representations of all those interested in presenting their views. That would cover not only the representatives of the two basic races who made up confederation, but also of the ethnic groups who have now brought to Canada the richness of their culture and their heritage.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister's proposal of today to convene a federal-provincial conference is not really an alternative proposal. It seems to me that such a conference would have more merit if it had before it the carefully thought out recommendations of a group of outstanding French speaking and English speaking Canadians as well as representatives of other ethnic groups.

Like the Prime Minister and some other members of this house, I have had the privilege of attending a number of federal-provincial conferences. I do not think anyone could expect that a group of men, who are as busy as the heads of ten provincial governments and the government of Canada, can possibly give the kind of time which is necessary to really find a solution to this very complicated problem. I think all experience in the past has shown that a federal-provincial conference has limited value unless it has been preceded by careful preparation and has before it specific recommendations and proposals upon which it may base its discussion.

I think there are various recommendations we could get from many parts of the country. One of the things to which I think the government of Canada ought to give consideration is the idea of setting up two bilingual colleges for senior civil servants, so that senior civil servants might go to either one of two colleges, where they would have an intensive course in the language other than their mother language and a better understanding and appreciation of the culture other than the one in which they were raised. Colleges of this nature would help to develop a properly constituted bicultural and bilingual civil service. That is the kind of thing which cannot be done merely by having regulations under the civil service commission.

In conclusion may I say that in Canada we have reached an important milestone in the history of relationships between English speaking and French speaking groups in this country. A lack of understanding at this stage could have serious consequences for the future. I believe it is possible to work out a modus vivendi. I am equally convinced that with patience, understanding and good will it is possible to chart a course of action which will strengthen and extend the point of unity in this country. I suggest to the government that, in conjunction with a federal-provincial conference, they again give some thought to the proposal that we have a royal commission on biculturalism so that the various groups in Canada can make their suggestions, and so that the Prime Minister and the premiers of the provinces would have before them concrete recommendations based on study and on representation from all parts of the country.

[Mr. Douglas.]

CIVIL LIBERTIES

PROVISION FOR REVIEW OF ADMINISTRATIVE POWERS AND DECISIONS

Mr. John R. Matheson (Leeds) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-111, to provide for review of administrative powers and to relieve from their misapplication (administrative review).

RESEARCH PROGRAMS ON CHILDREN'S HEARING HANDICAPS

Question No. 1,336—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

What research programs connected with determining the causes of hearing handicaps among children are supported under federal health grants?

Mrs. Casselman: Few purely research projects dealing with hearing handicaps in children have been submitted by the provinces for assistance under the health grants.

The health centre for children in Vancouver annually receives grants assistance amounting to $9,000 for a study of auditory disorders in children of pre-school age in British Columbia. St. Michael's hospital in Toronto annually receives grants assistance amounting to about $35,900 for a study of perceptive and conductive deafness.

In addition, information on the causes of hearing handicaps in children does emerge as a byproduct of the work of diagnostic and treatment centres for auditory disorders in almost all provinces, which receive substantial support under the health grants.

EXCISE TAXES ON AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENTS

Question No. 1,345—Mr. Ethier:

What excise taxes, if any, are now applied to agricultural implements?

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): Excise taxes do not apply to agricultural implements; however, any agricultural implement not exempted under the provisions of schedule III of the Excise Tax Act, would be subject to sales tax.

FLOOD CONTROL STUDIES, FRASER RIVER, B.C.

Question No. 1,351—Mr. Laing:

1. Is the government supplied with precipitation and water content reports on the region of the Fraser river basin by the water rights branch of the province of British Columbia and, if so, what is the latest comparative figure in 1963 with each of the preceding three years?

2. Since January 1, 1962, have any submissions been made by the province of British Columbia for a comprehensive flood control program for the Fraser river?

3. Does the federal government continue to make contributions to the work of the Fraser river basin board in its studies on flood control?

Mr. Dinsdale: 1. Yes. However, the first measurements of snow depth and equivalent water content are taken about February 1 of each year and the first data for 1963 will accordingly not be available until mid-February.

2. No.

3. Yes. The federal government and the British Columbia government share equally in the cost of surveys, studies and reports.

EDMUNDSTON, N.B.—DEMOLITION OF BUILDING

Question No. 1,354—Mr. Dube:

Did the Department of Public Works call for tenders for the demolition of a building situated on land recently acquired by the department for the purpose of constructing a federal building in Edmundston, N.B. and, if so (a) what are the names of the bidders (b) what are the amounts of the tenders and (c) to whom has the contract been awarded?

Mr. O'Hurley: Crown Assets Disposal Corporation advertised and sold for removal from the site three (3) houses bearing civic numbers 20-22 Emerson avenue, No. 39 Court street and No. 6 Costegan street located on the new public building site in Edmundston, N.B. Offers received were as follows:—

1. Prime Rossignol, R.R. No. 1, Edmundston, N.B., $100.

2. Guay Construction Co., Ltd., 14 St. George st., Edmundston, N.B., $3. The structures were sold to the high bidder, Mr. Prime Rossignol for $100.

CONSTRUCTION OF AIR STRIP, CATALINA, NFLD.

Question No. 1,355—Mr. Tucker:

Has the government given consideration to the construction of an air strip in the area of Catalina, Newfoundland, and, if so, what has been the result?

Mr. McBain: Yes. As a result of a request from the authorities in Catalina, a preliminary survey of a possible site was carried out by the department last year and general information regarding the cost sharing policy of the department in regard to projects of this sort conveyed to the area. The preliminary survey indicated that the project would probably be a costly one. No word has been received from the area concerned, but if local or provincial authorities should wish to proceed on a cost sharing basis, the department would undertake a more detailed study.

TESTING OF ACCREDITED AND LISTED HERDS

Question No. 1,390—Mr. Lamoureux:

Does the government intend to resume, through the health of animals division of the Department of Agriculture, the conducting of tests under the tuberculosis-free accredited herd and brucellosis-free listed herd programs and, if not, are any alternative arrangements being made by the Department of Agriculture to ensure the continuance of accredited and listed herds?

Mr. Pigeon: It is not intended that testing under the tuberculosis accredited and brucellosis-free listed herd programs, will be resumed except in the case of brucellosis-free listed herds in areas where the brucellosis area test has not yet commenced. In these areas, the annual brucellosis herd test will be conducted by the Department of Agriculture.

Where livestock owners in tested areas wish to maintain their herds under these policies, they may continue to do so by engaging private veterinarians, accredited by the Department of Agriculture to do these tests. The department will provide all administrative services including the maintenance of records, publication of official registries, and the issuance of certificates. In cases where infection is uncovered, the department will continue to provide compensation to owners where animals are ordered slaughtered.

The area testing programs sponsored by the Department of Agriculture for the eradication of tuberculosis and brucellosis will be continued as in the past at no cost to livestock owners.

Before introducing this change, officials in the department closely examined the effect this would have on the Canadian cattle industry. It is considered that the health standards of Canadian herds will not be reduced, nor will the change jeopardize export markets.

The tuberculosis accredited herd plan and the brucellosis-free listed herd plan were initially designed to provide a source of disease free animals for the livestock industry. They are individual herd plans and have been largely supplemented by area eradication programs covering all herds of cattle, which is a much more efficient method of eradicating disease, rather than dealing with individual herds spotted throughout the country.

DEATH SENTENCES FOR MURDER

Question No. 1,392—Mr. Scott:

1. In each province in Canada, how many persons at the present time are under sentence to be hanged for the commission of the crime of murder?
2. In each case, what is the date which has been set for their execution?

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): 1 and 2.

Province	No. of persons sentenced to be executed	Dates set for execution
Quebec	6	Feb. 22, 1963
		April 19, 1963
		April 19, 1963
		May 10, 1963
		May 31, 1963
		June 21, 1963
Ontario	1	Feb. 26, 1963
Alberta	2	June 1, 1963
		June 1, 1963
British Columbia	1	March 5, 1963

No person is under sentence of death in the provinces of Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Manitoba, and Saskatchewan.

CUSTOMS DUTIES ON AMATEUR RADIO APPARATUS

Question No. 1,394—Mr. Marcoux:

Is there any competition between Canadian and American manufacturers engaged in production of amateur radio apparatus and, if not, is the government considering the reduction of customs duties on such apparatus?

Mr. Grafftey: The term "amateur radio apparatus" includes many parts and components, some of which are manufactured in Canada. The tariff item covering such apparatus is included in a reference to the tariff board, reference No. 123. The tariff board investigation will make available complete information on the nature and degree of competition between Canadian and foreign manufacturers. When the tariff board makes its report to the government on this reference, the government will, of course, give consideration to the recommendations of the board, if any, concerning the rate of customs duty on such apparatus.

ACQUISITION OF MANOR HOUSE, WILLIAMSTOWN, ONT.

Question No. 1,398—Mr. Ethier:

Has the government given consideration to the acquisition, as an historic site, of the Sir John Johnson manor house in Williamstown, Ontario?

Mr. Dinsdale: The closest and most sympathetic consideration has been given to the preservation of this fine building, which is one of the oldest in Ontario. The historic sites and monuments board of Canada have studied it, and on their recommendation the Sir John Johnson house has been declared to be of national historic importance. It was the board's view also that ways should be found to ensure its preservation, and to this end there have been discussions with Ontario provincial authorities about sharing capital costs between the two governments. An announcement will be made when a decision is reached.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S OFFICE—ADMINISTRATION AND UPKEEP

Question No. 1,401—Mr. Mather:

What amount, in dollars, was provided for each of the fiscal years 1957, 1958, 1959, 1960, 1961, and 1962 for (a) the administrative expenses in respect to the office of the Governor General and (b) the expenses in regard to the upkeep of the Governor General's residence and properties?

Mr. Halpenny: This information is contained in the public accounts of the years in question.

FEDERAL AID TO HIGH SCHOOL STUDENTS

Question No. 1,402—Mr. Mather:

Is the government giving consideration to working out a program, in partnership with the provinces, to financially assist high school students whose academic standing merits advancement but whose family circumstances are inadequate to send such students to university?

Mr. Grafftey: Matters relating to government policy are announced at the appropriate time.

*WEST GERMANY—CANADIAN CLAIMS FOR NAZI PERSECUTION

Question No. 1,404—Mr. Herridge:

Has the Canadian government received notice from the West German government that it has set a final date for the disposition of all claims that the victims of Nazi persecution might have against it and, if so, have Canadian citizens with unsatisfied claims for Nazi persecution been notified of this decision?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, we are not aware of any final date having been set by the West German government along the lines suggested by the hon. member for Kootenay West. I understand that legislation on this subject may be introduced in the German parliament later this year. My officials, of course, do not know the scope or provisions of the legislation which is contemplated by the German authorities or whether any Canadians may be affected, but we will certainly do our best to assist Canadian citizens who might have a claim under such legislation.

PROFITS AND TAXES OF CHARTERED BANKS

Question No. 1,406—Mr. Mather:

1. What was the net profit of each of the chartered banks after published provision for dominion and provincial taxes in each of the years 1960, 1961, and 1962?

2. What was the amount of dominion and provincial taxes of each of the banks for these years?

3. What was the total of transfers made to contingent reserve fund from the earnings of each of the chartered banks in these years?

Mr. Grafftey: 1. The published net profit of each of the chartered banks after transfers to inner reserves and provision for income taxes for fiscal years was as follows, in thousands of dollars:

Questions

	1960	1961	1962
Bank of Montreal	$14,227	$14,579	$16,013
The Bank of Nova Scotia	6,925	7,873	8,466
The Toronto-Dominion Bank	6,652	7,561	8,245
La Banque Provinciale du Canada	1,450	1,540	1,951
Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce	16,734(a)	17,700	19,190
The Royal Bank of Canada	19,504	20,760	21,492
Banque Canadienne Nationale	3,069	3,242	3,484
The Mercantile Bank of Canada	1	1	1

(a) Combined figures of the Canadian Bank of Commerce and Imperial Bank of Canada before amalgamation.

2. Provisions for income taxes reported by the banks include those on taxable portion of additions to and amounts retransferred from inner reserves and foreign income taxes and are as follows, in thousands of dollars:

	1960	1961	1962
Bank of Montreal	$17,352	$18,044	$18,353
The Bank of Nova Scotia	7,825	8,975	9,500
The Toronto-Dominion Bank	7,070	8,300	9,110
La Banque Provinciale du Canada	1,605	2,050	2,091
Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce	25,280(a)	29,211	20,172
The Royal Bank of Canada	28,560	30,750	20,875
Banque Canadienne Nationale	3,035	4,355	4,575
The Mercantile Bank of Canada	nil	nil	nil

(a) Combined figures of the Canadian Bank of Commerce and Imperial Bank of Canada before amalgamation.

3. The transfers by each of the chartered banks to inner reserves from taxable income are limited in amount by rules of the Minister of Finance issued under subsection (1) of section 68 of the Bank Act. The maximum reserve that a bank may so create in any fiscal year is calculated as a percentage of certain risk assets. For the past three years these were: 1960—4.752 per cent, 1961—4.008 per cent, 1962—3.624 per cent. The amounts of the transfers and of the reserves are available to the minister for income tax purposes but are not public information.

BANK RESERVES TO MEET BAD DEBTS, DEPRECIATION, ETC.

Question No. 1,407—Mr. Berger:

1. During each of the years from 1955 to 1962 inclusive, what was the amount set aside or reserved by each of the chartered banks of Canada out of income, either by way of write down of the value of assets or appropriation to any contingency reserve or contingent account for the purposes of meeting losses on loans, bad or doubtful debts, depreciation in the value of assets other than bank premises or other contingencies?

2. Were the amounts set aside or reserved out of income for the aforementioned purposes subject to income tax?

3. Did the Minister of Finance in any of the years in question, decide that the amounts set aside or reserved out of income by any bank or banks for the aforementioned purposes were in excess of the reasonable requirements of the bank, having regard to all the circumstances, and notify the Minister of National Revenue accordingly, pursuant to section 68, subsection 1, of the Bank Act?

Mr. Grafftey: 1. (a) The amount set aside by a bank and transferred to inner reserves out of taxable income are limited by rules of the Minister of Finance issued under subsection (1) of section 68 of the Bank Act. The amounts of the transfers and of the reserves are available to the minister for income tax purposes but are not public information. (b) The amounts set aside and transferred to inner reserves after payment of income taxes thereon are available to and assessed by the taxation division of the Department of National Revenue and are not public information.

2. See answer to 1.

3. No.

*SHIPMENTS OF FLOUR TO RED CHINA

Question No. 1,415—Mr. Benidickson:

To date, having regard to ministerial announcements during the 1960-61 parliamentary session, that its trade agreement with the communist China government included sale of flour, how much flour has been shipped to China from Canada in accord with the announcements?

Mr. Jorgenson: At the time of the first sales contract concluded with mainland China provision was made for a limited quantity of Canadian flour (1.5 million bushels wheat equivalent) subject to the negotiation of mutually satisfactory prices between Canadian flour mills and the Chinese purchasing agency. Negotiations were entered into but, as a result of the availability from other sources of lower grade flour, no satisfactory agreement on prices could be reached. No Canadian flour has been shipped to date.

*ARDA PILOT PROJECT, NEW BRUNSWICK

Question No. 1,416—Mr. Robichaud:

Has the Minister of Agriculture received representations from the government of the province of New Brunswick requesting that a certain section of northeastern New Brunswick be regarded as a pilot project for rural development purposes under the ARDA program and, if so, (a) what specific area is covered in the application (b) is the minister prepared to give favourable consideration to such representations and (c) is the minister in a position to give assurance that the studies and investigations required for this development will be undertaken during the spring and summer of this year?

Mr. Jorgenson: Yes, representations have been received from the government of New Brunswick requesting certain sections of northeastern New Brunswick be regarded as a pilot project for rural development under the agricultural rehabilitation and development administration.

(a) The area covered by the application is all of Gloucester county, the largest part of Restigouche county and part of Northumberland county.

(b) Full consideration will be given to the representations.

(c) If approved jointly by the governments of Canada and New Brunswick as a rural development area, studies and investigations will proceed as rapidly as the necessary joint arrangements can be made.

EXPORT PERMIT, DE HAVILLAND COMPANY

Question No. 1,435—Mr. Caron:

Did the de Havilland Company apply for an export permit during 1962 in connection with a $10,000,000 contract for the government of Indonesia and, if so, was the permit granted and, if not, for what reason was it refused?

Mr. Nesbitt: As stated in the permit application form, all details of export permit applications are confidential and disclosure of such information with respect to applications is not in the public interest.

HORNE LAKE, VANCOUVER ISLAND—ACQUISITION OF PROPERTY

Question No. 1,442—Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands):

Has the Department of Fisheries acquired any property around the shores of Horne lake on Vancouver island in connection with the installation now under construction there and, if not, have any agreements been concluded with the riparian land owners?

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Yes, the department has acquired property from a number of land owners and has concluded agreements with the others.

Supplementary information: Property has been purchased from one private owner, Mr. Phillips, and two companies, Northern Development and Olympic Logging Company.

*REMUNERATION OF VICE PRESIDENT OF WORLD EXHIBITION CORPORATION

Question No. 1,444—Mr. Lessard (St. Henry):

1. What is the salary or remuneration of the president and vice president of the Montreal world exhibition corporation?

2. What will be the salary or remuneration of the twelve commissioners?

3. What is the term of office of the president, vice president, and commissioners of that exhibition?

Mr. Sevigny: 1. The commissioner general and the deputy commissioner general of the world exhibition will receive no salary.

2. The same applies to the directors.

3. The president, the vice president and the directors of the exhibition are appointed by the government for a term left to the discretion of the federal authorities.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

*LEGISLATION RESPECTING PORTABLE PENSIONS

Question No. 1,292—Mr. Roxburgh:

1. Has the government been informed of any progress made since November 26 by the provinces toward adopting legislation enabling the portability of pensions?

2. Is the government of the opinion that provincial progress has been sufficient to warrant the bringing forward of complementary legislation to deal with industries under federal jurisdiction?

3. Has the government considered making parliamentary pensions portable?

EXPENDITURES BY GOVERNMENT PERSONNEL ON OVERSEAS AIR TRANSPORTATION

Question No. 1,358—Mr. Davis:

What amount of money was spent during the latest year of record on overseas air transportation by government personnel (a) travelling on Canadian based carriers and (b) travelling on foreign air lines?

WHEAT AND FLOUR EXPORTS—TRADE WITH JAPAN

Question No. 1,360—Mr. Matheson:

1. What percentage of the total world exports in wheat and flour was supplied by Canada each year commencing 1950?

2. What volume of wheat and flour was purchased by Japan in each of these years, and what proportion of Canada's total sales to all countries did these purchases represent?
3. By what value did Canada's sales to Japan exceed her imports from Japan in each of these years?
4. By years, how many items imported by Canadians were subjected to voluntary export control by the Japanese in an attempt to co-operate with this government?
5. What steps has this government taken, with dates, the effect of which has been to curtail or limit or restrict Japanese sales to Canada?

Mr. Halpenny: Return tabled.

*UNEMPLOYMENT ASSISTANCE PAYMENTS TO QUEBEC

Question No. 1,361—Mr. Deschatelets:

From January 1962 to date, what have been the various amounts which the federal government has paid per month to the province of Quebec under the federal-provincial agreement on unemployment assistance?

Mrs. Casselman: Return tabled.

*SALE OF CL-44 PLANES TO PAKISTAN AND GERMANY

Question No. 1,370—Mr. Howard:

1. What plans, in detail, exist or are contemplated, to give assistance for the sale of CL-44's to (a) Pakistan and (b) Lufthansa?
2. What steps is the government taking to obtain work for Canadair and thus halt the trend toward workers being laid off?

Mr. O'Hurley: Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question covers a full page. Do you want me to read it or shall I table it?

Mr. Speaker: In view of the length and complexity of the answer the minister might ask that it be made an order for return tabled herewith.

Mr. O'Hurley: Order for return tabled herewith.

CANADA-U.K. IMPORTS AND EXPORTS

Question No. 1,376—Mr. Matheson:

1. In each of the fiscal years since April 1, 1958, have exports from Canada to the United Kingdom exceeded imports and, if so, by what amounts in each year?
2. Have any legislative, administrative or fiscal measures been adopted by Canada since June 21, 1957, which have the effect of limiting, restricting or taxing imports from the United Kingdom and, if so, what are these measures, what is their scope, and on what date was each put into effect?

DR. A. R. MOLOZZI

Question No. 1,381—Mr. Fisher:

1. Has Dr. A. R. Molozzi a position with defence research board and, if so, what are his duties and salary?
2. Was Dr. Molozzi speaking as a scientist of defence research board or as an ordinary citizen at Kitchener last week when he was quoted as saying, "I never have been able to understand a politician."?
3. If the former, what was the context of his remarks?

Mr. Sevigny: Return tabled.

AUTOMOBILES MANUFACTURED AND IMPORTED

Question No. 1,388—Mr. Mather:

1. How many automobiles were manufactured in Canada in 1962, and what was the value of same?
2. How many automobiles were imported into Canada in 1962?
3. From what countries were they imported, and what was the value of the cars imported from each such country?
4. How much was collected in customs duties on the cars so imported?
5. How much in taxes was collected on the cars manufactured in Canada in 1962?

YVON GUIMOND, R.C.A.F. STATION, ST. JEAN, QUE.

Question No. 1,399—Mr. Dupuis:

1. Does Mr. Yvon Guimond, stationary engineer first class, at the R.C.A.F. station, St. Jean, Quebec, hold a third class engineer's certificate for the province of Quebec and, if so, when did he acquire such certificate?
2. Is Mr. Guimond employed by the federal civil service?
3. Did he obtain the post he now occupies through civil service examination and, if so, when did the test take place, and what was his ranking?
4. If Mr. Guimond did not qualify by examination, how did he obtain his present position?

Mr. Sevigny: Return tabled.

REDUCTIONS IN CIVIL DEFENCE ESTIMATES

Question No. 1,409—Mr. Haidasz:

Were any reductions made in the estimates relating to civil defence for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1963 and, if so, what projects were eliminated by these reductions?

*COMPLAINTS RESPECTING PESTICIDES

Question No. 1,411—Mr. Haidasz:

1. Has the government received any complaints from the Canadian consumer association concerning the abuse of pesticides?
2. Is the government intending to prosecute offenders in the field of pesticides and, if so, against whom will these prosecutions be made?

THE MINISTRY

INQUIRY AS TO ACTING MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister who is Acting Minister of National Defence?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The associate minister.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask a question of the Acting Minister of National Defence. In view of the statement he made on Thursday last to the effect that there was no difference of opinion between himself, as associate minister, and the Minister of National Defence, may I ask the hon. gentleman when we may expect his resignation?

Mr. Speaker: That is a rhetorical question.

(Translation):

[Later:]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is intended for the Prime Minister. Could he tell us whether the resignation of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Harkness) can be interpreted as an anti-nuclear policy on the part of the government?

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO MEETING OF JOINT U.S.-CANADA COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence. Could he tell the house whether the joint standing council on defence will hold a meeting this week in San Francisco? If so, could the minister indicate what matters will be discussed there?

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the question put by the hon. member for Laurier, I must say that the announcement concerning that meeting will be made in due course and I think that his curiosity will be satisfied.

(Text):

BOMARC BASES—INQUIRY AS TO DISMANTLING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas Berger (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Acting Minister of National Defence. May I ask the minister whether in view of the fact that the United States defence secretary, Mr. McNamara, has told a congressional committee the Bomarc B has only limited usefulness, even against manned bombers, can the minister assure us that under any new dispensation of national defence the government will dismantle the Bomarc bases?

Mr. Speaker: Order. First of all the hon. member is in actual fact inviting comment or a controversial answer from a minister about something said by someone outside the house.

Mr. Berger: On a point of order and with great respect, Mr. Speaker, I submit that the question was a proper question and was in order. The house has a new minister in charge of this department. The new minister, and in fact the former minister, have at no time commented upon the revelations that came from defence secretary McNamara. They commented on the revelations that emanated from the state department, but in view of these later vitally important revelations I suggest with great respect—

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is still the same thing.

NATO—ARMING OF CANADIAN TROOPS WITH NUCLEAR WEAPONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Acting Minister of National Defence whether Canadian troops stationed with NATO will be armed with nuclear weapons.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is a matter of policy.

(Translation):

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REPORTED RANSACKING OF FILES OF PRESS GALLERY MEMBERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilles Gregoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Justice. Can the minister tell us whether the R.C.M.P. will make an investigation on the ransacking and pilfering of documents and files of French language parliamentary correspondents when their quarters were broken into during the night from Saturday to Sunday last?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member will admit that his question should be placed on the order paper.

Mr. Gregoire: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Since the beginning of the session, similiar questions have been put concerning investigations, and they were always allowed. Now, a vandalistic act is committed in a parliament building and I am told this question should be placed on the order paper. I simply ask—

Mr. Speaker: I know that the house is familiar with certain events, but I am nevertheless of the opinion that the question should be placed on the order paper.

[Later:]

Mr. Gregoire: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put differently the question I asked a short while ago. Has the Minister of Justice authorized an investigation with regard to the destruction of documents belonging to French Canadian newspapermen in the house?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have not received any information on that matter, but I will be very happy to make an investigation.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Gregoire: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. Am I to understand that the newspapermen's office was ransacked and that the Minister of Justice is not aware of it?

Mr. Speaker: I do not want to speak for the minister, but it seems to me that this is a matter for the Sergeant-at-Arms or the Chair.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF ESTIMATES FOR 1963-64

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Walter L. Gordon (Davenport): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Will the minister inform the house when the estimates for the fiscal year beginning next April 1 will be tabled?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of Finance): In the very near future, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Gordon: May I ask a supplementary question. In view of the fact that the estimates for the fiscal year beginning April 1 have not yet been tabled, does the minister still believe it will be possible for him to introduce an early budget?

Mr. Nowlan: It will be possible to bring in an early budget.

REQUEST FOR SETTING UP OF DEFENCE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Horace A. Olson (Medicine Hat): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the division in the cabinet in respect to matters of national defence, is he now prepared to give consideration to setting up a parliamentary defence committee to consist of representatives of all parties in this house so we can clear up this confusion?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in so far as the first portion of the question is concerned, there is no confusion. As to the latter part, when the government wishes to make an announcement in this regard, and is in a position to do so, that will be done.

REQUEST FOR ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John R. Matheson (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Secretary of State. In view of the fact that questions No. 1,265 relating to the Bomarc and No. 1,266 relating to the Honest John have three times been stood over, would the Secretary of State be kind enough to arrange that there might be early replies to these two questions?

Hon. G. E. Halpenny (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, these are matters for the department to consider. As soon as we get the answers in our department we will have the questions answered.

TRANSPORT

RAILWAY BRANCH LINES—MEETING WITH PROVINCIAL PREMIERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Will the minister say whether, as a result of the meeting with the prairie premiers, it has now been agreed to have an independent inquiry, separate from the board of transport commissioners, into the whole question of rail branch line abandonment?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): I met last week with the three premiers to the prairie provinces and three or four of my colleagues. These premiers made representations concerning legislation arising from the MacPherson report. It was a very constructive meeting, and they made all their representations. The officials of the provinces and our officials met informally to discuss various matters that needed clarification, and I think the whole meeting was extremely constructive and will produce great results.

Mr. Argue: I wonder if the minister would care to comment on that part of my question wherein I asked whether or not there would be an independent inquiry, outside of the board of transport commissioners, as was requested.

Mr. Balcer: This legislation arising from the MacPherson report will be presented to the house in due course and the curiosity of my hon. friend will be satisfied then.

Mr. Argue: I am sure I will not agree with your policy.

FISHERIES

REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF REPORT OF NORTH PACIFIC COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries, and ask whether in the quiet moments over the week end he came to a decision about referring the recommendations of the international north Pacific commission regarding halibut and herring stocks to the marine and fisheries committee.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): No, Mr. Speaker.

REPORTED STATEMENT BY MINISTER RESPECTING NORTH PACIFIC TREATY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. According to a report appearing in a Toronto Japanese language newspaper the minister is reported as having promised the Japanese minister of agriculture in Tokyo, Mr. Shigemasa, that he will do his utmost in seeking a review of the Japanese-Canadian-U.S. north Pacific fishery treaty with Mr. Stewart Udall, U. S. secretary of the interior. Could I ask the minister if this includes the recommendation to amend the annex to the treaty proposed by the north Pacific fisheries commission?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the report if correctly quoted is garbled and does not reflect at all correctly any discussions between myself and Mr. Shigemasa.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): May I ask a supplementary question. Could the minister tell us what he did say in Tokyo?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is not a subject for this time of the day.

(Translation):

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY AS TO PROBABLE DATE OF PRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jean-Paul Cook (Montmagny-L'Islet): My question is addressed to the Minister of Finance and has to do with a matter about which Canadians everywhere are wondering. Could the minister tell us if he has set a date for the tabling of his new budget?

Mr. Speaker: That question was asked this afternoon, a few minutes ago.

TRADE

WORLD FAIR—INQUIRY AS TO CHOICE OF SITE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Georges C. Lachance (Lafontaine): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Acting and Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Sevigny)? Could he possibly tell us whether the site of the world exhibition will be selected by the board of directors of the exhibition corporation or by the federal, provincial and municipal committee?

Hon. Pierre Sevigny (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the site of the exhibition will be selected eventually after consultation between the board of directors of the world exhibition corporation and members appointed to the committee until now.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister could give us the names of the directors of the Canadian World Exhibition Corporation?

Mr. Sevigny: In a few days.

(Text):

WHEAT—ALLEGED DROP IN EXPORT SALES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Horace A. Olson (Medicine Hat): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the recent release by the dominion bureau of statistics indicating a drastic drop in export sales of wheat, has the minister any plans or negotiations under way that will make up for this drop during the balance of the current crop year?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member will recognize that he expressed certain opinions in the first part of his question. If hon. members would trim their questions of such remarks they would be much more acceptable. Subject to that, if the minister wishes to reply—

Mr. Olson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, these are official documents from the dominion bureau of statistics, which show there is no question about a drop.

Mr. Speaker: There may be a drop, but it is a point that some hon. members might consider it a drastic drop and others might not.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, is it not in order to ask the Minister of Agriculture to explain this tremendous drop in export sales of wheat, and whether anything is being done about it.

Mr. Speaker: There is no difficulty about the question, but I caution hon. members about using terms which are indicative of opinion on their part. In so far as the rest of the question is concerned, if the minister wishes to answer it that is quite all right.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): I think, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member who originally asked the question is unaware of the fact that the D.B.S. figures are usually considerably behind the actual facts. This is the way it should be. I would point out to the hon. member, strictly on a statistical basis, that the same type of question has been asked before figures were released for the end of the year, and I can assure the house that the figures at the end of this year will be figures amounting to a near record.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Argue: As a supplementary question, I wonder whether the Minister of Agriculture is telling us he thinks the sales can be increased above the 300 million bushel figure he used in Regina on November 8.

Mr. Speaker: Order. We are getting into a little debate on this.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO PROGRESS OF NEGOTIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister, reminding him of the fact that we have another international treaty that should be given consideration. Could the Prime Minister inform the house of the progress of the negotiations that may be taking place that will result in the draft Columbia river treaty being ratified?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this has become a regular daily question by the hon. gentleman. I do not want to deprive him of the pleasure of asking this type of question, but as has been said before the answer has been given over and over again.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. Would the Prime Minister consider setting up a royal commission to investigate the baffling questions that seem to be facing the government on this question?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member will recognize his question is not in order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. gentleman's questions are very baffling.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I have a supplementary question which I would like to address to the Minister of Public Works. In view of his statement to the inland empire waterways association meeting in Spokane in October, 1961 that the Columbia river treaty would be signed not later than March, 1962, does he think in view of the lapse of time he should give us another date when we can expect the signing of the treaty?

[Mr. Hamilton.]

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to find that my statement of a year and a half ago is still regarded as urgent.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADIAN REPRESENTATION BEFORE U.S. SENATE SUBCOMMTTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Horace A. Olson (Medicine Hat): I would like to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that the United States Senate has set up a committee to study Canadian-American relations, has he been asked for or volunteered representation or witnesses to present the Canadian point of view?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is quite wrong in his understanding of what this Senate committee of the United States is doing. It is merely investigating one question over which there was controversy last week, and of course Canada is not represented before such committees.

CONDUCT OF NUCLEAR ARMS NEGOTIATIONS WITH U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if he can say whether it is a fact, as reported, that the negotiations between Canada and the United States on the matter of nuclear arms are being conducted by officials of the Department of External Affairs?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this question was asked the other day and one of the hon. members was told then that these are secret negotiations. They are still under way.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question. It is appreciated these negotiations are secret, but we are not asking the nature of the negotiations. My question was, are the negotiations being carried on by officials of the Department of External Affairs?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, the Department of External Affairs is always involved in negotiations of this kind.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

REQUEST FOR INCREASE DURING PRESENT SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. In case anything should happen to this parliament, will the government consider bringing in legislation at an early date to raise the old age pension to $75 a month?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know the meaning of those words "in case anything happens to this parliament". We will have a debate today, I presume, on the question of confidence; and as to whether anything happens, the hon. gentleman will make his own contribution.

SUPPLY

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

ALLEGED LACK OF LEADERSHIP, CONFUSION AND INDECISION

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): This motion, Mr. Speaker, once again gives the house an opportunity to move any motion that it desires to move to express its views on the government of the day. In this regard we are once again discharging our historic and traditional duty in the opposition of refusing to grant supply before there is redress. This is the second supply motion to be moved since this parliament met on September 27 last, and in accordance with our rules four more supply motions must be moved.

A few moments ago one hon. member asked a question on the assumption that something may happen to this parliament. Well, we will have a chance to decide tomorrow evening, unless something else happens before then, Mr. Speaker, what should happen to this parliament at this time. But whatever may happen to this parliament, there is no doubt what has happened to this government. It has lost the confidence of this house, and it has lost the confidence of this country. There is no doubt, from statements made by representatives of all opposition parties—no doubt in the world—that this government no longer has the confidence of the majority of the members of this house. All that is now required is for those members and those parties which have expressed their lack of confidence in this government to show that lack of confidence in the decision we will be taking on this motion.

The motion that I propose to move, Mr. Speaker, at the end of my remarks will certainly be a motion of non-confidence, and of non-confidence not merely in respect of any one particular issue but of the way in which this government has conducted the affairs of the country and the affairs of this parliament since we met last September.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Running away.

Mr. Pearson: If ever a government has lost the confidence of the people, Mr. Speaker, it is this one—and I am glad to see the Prime Minister taking that down.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No; I was simply pointing out that you are running away from the issue.

Mr. Pearson: No amount of manoeuvring, no sleight of hand, no tricks can obscure this obvious loss of confidence of the house and of the country. No amount of this kind of thing can save the government or divert public opinion, indeed, from the weaknesses of this government. Perhaps the high point—or, if you like, the low point—in this regard was reached last Friday in the somewhat juvenile performances that went on, the theatrical appearances and disappearances, the collection of crowds which then gradually disappeared and re-collected on the basis of contrived and circulated rumours, all to give the impression that this parliament was on the very verge of dissolution.

Mr. Churchill: Your nervousness was very marked.

Mr. Pearson: Certainly whatever may have then been the position of this parliament, whatever brink we may have been on last Friday, there is no doubt that over the weekend the government has been over the brink in so far as dissolution is concerned. I suggest that the situation which faces us in this country, nationally and internationally, is too serious for the kind of party posturing such as we had last Friday. But I suppose we must continue to expect it from the government as a substitute for the kind of action we should be getting. Indeed, it all conforms to the practice of this government, its ingrained and now inevitable tendency to avoid a decision on anything at almost any price, to keep throwing up smokescreens in order to obscure reality, the reality and seriousness of our problems; smokescreens, Mr. Speaker, that will help the government to avoid doing anything today that can be put off for postponement tomorrow. In looking around for particular matters to illustrate and support this charge of indecision, delay and ineffectiveness as a government, one has no trouble finding an abundance of ammunition. I propose to deal, though briefly with some of these matters as I go along.

There is the lack of any long range economic proposals, which I will come to later.

There is the refusal to allow parliament to even discuss $200 million of taxation imposed by order in council of doubtful legality. There is the incredible confusion and delay over the Columbia treaty. But there is one subject, Mr. Speaker, that remains at the moment uppermost in our minds as an illustration of what I have been saying in respect of government policy, or lack of policy. That subject is defence, which is the best example at the moment of government bungling and indecision, of contradictions and confusions made all the more obvious by the resignation of the minister of national defence who only a very short time ago made a gallant effort to clarify inside and outside this house the ambiguous statements of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Hellyer: To clarify the unclarifiable.

Mr. Pearson: Now that minister who was engaged in clarification—and I think he should be given all the credit that we on this side would like to give him for his efforts to help his Prime Minister at that time—says in his letter of resignation:

> For over two years you have been aware that I believed nuclear warheads should be supplied to the four weapons system we have acquired which are adapted to their use. Throughout this period, the minister went on,

> I believed that they would be authorized at the appropriate time.

As long as that time had not arrived, and perhaps it would not arrive until they were actually delivered into the hands of those who would be asked to use them if the awful emergency occurred which required their use, then it was possible for the minister of defence to argue that the decision could be postponed. But the appropriate time in the minister's mind had come; yet the government refused to take the action to which it had committed this country when the appropriate time came, and which action we claim they should take. Therefore the minister had no alternative as an honourable man but to take the action which he did, resignation. This underlines what we have been saying all along on this side of the house, namely that there was conflict, confusion and division inside the government on a matter of such vital importance and which surely, Mr. Speaker, made it all the more necessary to bring this question of national defence before parliament so that these confusions and indecisions could be cleared up if possible. There has never been a time in the history of our parliament, Mr. Speaker, when the record of discussion of matters of such vital importance as national defence has been so sterile and so negative. It is a long time since we have had anything approaching a statement by the government, oral or written, about the problems of national defence which face this country. All we have been told is that there is no disagreement in the cabinet; that the responsibilities undertaken by the cabinet will be carried out. The Minister of National Defence said last week that whatever our commitments were we would discharge them; that the Prime Minister and he were agreed on that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to interrupt the hon. member but he cannot go on a scattergun journey. He can only speak on a vote of non-confidence on a matter in respect of which he intends to move such a vote.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have observed that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) started out on two or three angles and then he came back to defence. Whatever it is, I have no objection to his having all the time he wants to; but he cannot go on one of these expeditions where he just draws a general shot at everything.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps I could give the house the citation I was looking for while I was listening. It is to be found on page 201 of Beauchesne's fourth edition, citation 238(2). I know that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) is familiar with that citation. It goes on to say at one point:

> The debate in such a case must be strictly relevant to the item, and when it has been disposed of, no reference can again be made to it——and so on. Mr. Speaker Beaudoin is reported in the first column of page 3790, volume 4 of the debates of 1955 as follows:

> What I am concerned about is that we should not deviate from what has been the practice with respect to the raising of grievances. It must be a specific grievance.

I am sure that the Leader of the Opposition is going to come to one specific point. I recall his opening words, that he had considered a number of subjects, and I was hoping he would eventually launch on to one in due course.

Mr. Berger: He has not made up his mind.

Mr. Pearson: The Prime Minister has graciously indicated that if I will move my motion I will be given all the time I want. That happens to be in the rules so I do not need his assistance on that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I simply want the hon. gentleman to stay within the rules and let us have none of the old scattergun.

Mr. Pearson: I appreciate these interruptions from the Prime Minister; I wish they would all get on Hansard, that is all.

Mr. Diefenbaker: So there will be no doubt about it, I want it to be on Hansard that this kind of scattergun nonsense cannot go on. The hon. gentleman must specifically restrict himself to the subject on which he intends to move non-confidence.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak to the point of order which has been raised by the Prime Minister. In so doing I wish to draw to Your Honour's attention the citation which you used in support of the tentative ruling you were about to make. The citation you referred to has to do with a discussion in committee of supply on an item of the estimates. It seems to me the matter is very well established. As a matter of fact there is a citation in Beauchesne that establishes such a wide limit of debate on this kind of motion that it is possible for an hon. member to make a speech for 30 minutes or 35 minutes on one subject and to move a motion on an entirely different subject. That is established within the limits of Beauchesne and there is a citation to that effect.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): What citation is that?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): What citation is that?

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. MacEachen: I want to make this point to Your Honour. It was obvious to any hon. member who was listening to the Leader of the Opposition and was not nervously apprehensive about the next day or so that he was making a charge against the government of indecision and lack of leadership. That was his main charge and that is likely to be the charge mentioned in the motion. Surely it is open to the Leader of the Opposition in supporting that charge to refer to any subject matter within the confines of the federal government which will establish lack of decision and lack of leadership.

Mr. Churchill: If I may speak to the point of order, Mr. Speaker, the reference which I think should be drawn to the attention of the house in Beauchesne's fourth edition is on page 199, citation 234(2). It reads as follows:

> (2) It often happens, on the motion that the Speaker leave the chair for committee of supply, that members air grievances without moving amendments. A member may speak on railway rates, another on naturalization, and so on. Five or six different matters may then be brought to the government's attention. Once debate is concluded on one matter and another matter intervenes, members cannot again discuss the former. No member is allowed to speak more than once on the motion. He cannot discuss all the matters which may then come up, and when he has spoken on one of them he has exhausted his right to speak to the motion before the house, namely, "That the Speaker do now leave the chair".

The point of that citation is that the person speaking on this motion must be specific; either he deals with a subject without moving an amendment or he moves an amendment which discloses his subject and then speaks to the subject. However, he cannot range over the whole field of the business of the country.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps I should continue with the citation to which I referred earlier. Then I shall be glad to hear the hon. member for Ottawa West. This is a ruling of Mr. Speaker Beaudoin. I will quote a little more fully from page 3790 of the debates of 1955, volume IV:

> What I am concerned about is that we should not deviate from what has been the practice with respect to the raising of grievances. It must be a specific grievance. According to the remarks the hon. member for Prince Albert has just made in explanation of what he intends to bring forward, he wants to deal with markets generally and the loss of markets for farm products and then, although he has already dealt with wheat, he wants to deal with the South Saskatchewan dam. He has just indicated he wants to deal with that point because that is the point to which the editorial in the Regina Leader-Post has reference. Furthermore, he wants to deal with the low incomes with which the farmers are now being faced. Maybe the hon. member is going to conclude his remarks with an amendment to the motion to go into supply. That would certainly specify the grievance he has in mind.
> If he is not going to terminate his remarks with such an amendment, then I am afraid I must say he can always deal with these various other subjects when other motions to go into supply are presented. At this moment, however, it would not be proper to initiate another budget debate, and it is certainly contrary to our practice not to have a specific grievance raised at this point.

The reason I use the citation is that it refers to a ruling with respect to the then hon. member for Prince Albert, now the Prime Minister. I think that ruling is amply supported by the reference made by the house leader. If there are any other contributions hon. members wish to make, I shall be glad to hear them.

Mr. Chevrier: Speaking on the point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say this. The citation which has just been referred to by the house leader is one which applies to grievances and which normally follows the vote on the amendment to the motion to go into supply. If one looks at the citation, which is 234 (2), one can come to no other conclusion but that.

The Prime Minister raised a point of order and in doing so referred to the "nonsense" which has been brought forward by the Leader of the Opposition. With respect, I submit to you that the Leader of the Opposition was not dealing with nonsense but rather with the confusion, indecision and lack of leadership on the part of the government. That was only one subject and one subject alone which up until this time he had dealt with. I submit that up until now he is perfectly in order in the manner in which he has proceeded.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I wish to say just one word. What we want the opposition to do is to show their decision and not to engage in indecision—

Mr. McIlraith: Observe the rules.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —on that which they intend to ask non-confidence.

Mr. Pearson: I think the Prime Minister and the government have made a gallant attempt to limit me in the evidence that I wish to bring forward in order to show that this government is indecisive, confused, bungling and lacking in leadership.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You are proving it by your own testimony.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I wish the Prime Minister would try to contain himself.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am rising again to a point of order. The hon. gentleman must let us know upon what particular specific matter he is going to ask for a vote of non-confidence. I have mentioned this matter more than once and I want a ruling on it, Your Honour. I wish to find out which minister is supposed to be here and is going to answer it. A great deal has been said about what is going to be done. A great deal has been said outside the house about what is going to be done, and what kind of motion is going to be moved. Let us know what it is and let us get down to something specific.

Mr. Chevrier: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say this, and I do so with great respect. I think Your Honour should ask the Prime Minister to observe the rules of this house. Ever since the Leader of the Opposition rose to make his amendment, the Prime Minister has consistently interrupted—

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

Mr. Chevrier: —first by cross fire from his side of the house and from his seat—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chevrier: —and next by raising points of order which are not points of order at all. He has called on Your Honour to make a ruling, notwithstanding the fact that Your Honour had made quite clear what the position was and had allowed the Leader of the Opposition to go on with his remarks. None the less, the Prime Minister is allowed to make these statements and interruptions although on an earlier occasion he complained very bitterly in this house that he was not given an opportunity to speak. Now he wants to give the same treatment to the Leader of the Opposition. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that in the light of the decisions that have been submitted by the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond, Your Honour should rule so that we may have the debate and may learn all about the hesitations, indecisions and contradictions of the government.

Mr. Aiken: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say this. On March 20, 1961, at page 4137 of Hansard, a definite ruling was given to the effect that the opposition, in a motion of this type, cannot cover the whole field; that on a supply motion the opposition is limited to one particular point not previously decided or considered. I sent for the references and they have just arrived. The decision is clear on this particular point.

An hon. Member: Take your time; there is no hurry.

Mr. Aiken: While I am looking up the reference, may I say that this particular decision was made with regard to a completely similar scattergun introduction that was made, and at that time the objection was taken that one subject must be covered and the ruling was made. If I could take the time to find the reference, I could give it, because it was made on that date.

Mr. Knowles: I should like to say a brief word on the point of order. It seems to me that we have had a good deal of confusion in the past few minutes. We have also had something which I think is quite uncalled for, namely a statement by the Prime Minister as to what the Leader of the Opposition must do in his speech.

An hon. Member: If he is going to follow the rules.

Mr. Knowles: Before hon. members make interjections about the rules they might read the rules. At this point, Mr. Speaker, we are dealing with something which is referred to as a motion that keeps alive the ancient doctrine that the redress of grievances can be considered. The Leader of the Opposition was given and has the floor. He is under no compulsion to move any amendment at all if he does not want to. He has said he is going to and I confess I should like it if he would point out fairly soon what it is he is going to tell us. But that is his decision. He has the floor by the rules, not by the grace of the Prime Minister. His time is unlimited and, as I say, if he wishes to use all of his time and move no amendment he is at liberty to refrain from making any such amendment.

Mr. Churchill: But not to speak on six or seven different subjects.

Mr. Knowles: He certainly may. There is nothing in the rules that says he cannot be scattergunned any more than there is anything in the rules that says that in this house people cannot be scatterbrained. Citation 234, to which partial references have already been made, says in subparagraph 1:

Whenever an order of the day has been read for the house to resolve itself into committee of supply—

And so on.

—it shall be permissible to discuss any public matter within the powers of the federal parliament or to ask for the redress of any grievance.

I suggest that the Leader of the Opposition is perfectly in order in dealing with any grievance he likes if he wishes to do so. When Mr. Speaker Beaudoin was giving his lecture to the then member for Prince Albert, to which Your Honour has referred, he was not telling him he could not introduce all of these various subjects in his speech, but he was telling him that if he did he would not be able to come back to them afterwards.

Paragraph 2, to which I believe the Minister of Veterans Affairs has referred, says that once a subject has been brought up the member must stay on that subject and must not try to go back to it after another subject has been introduced. This paragraph describes the situation either now or after 8.15 tomorrow night when the subject has been identified. Once the Leader of the Opposition has finished and has pinpointed a subject or has moved an amendment, we have then got to stick with that, just the same as will be the case tomorrow night after the vote at 8.15. If a member gets the floor then and opens up a subject, that must be the subject until it is disposed of.

But at this point I submit that the Leader of the Opposition is exercising his right as the first speaker in this debate to raise any grievance he wishes to raise, to make his own decision whether or not he moves an amendment and to make his own decision as to what that amendment is. As far as I can ascertain from his speech thus far, it strikes me that he plans to make a motion suggesting that the government is indecisive, incapable, and that sort of thing. If so, surely it is plain, ordinary logic that he has the right to illustrate either in advance or after he has made the motion, the point he is trying to make.

I submit that there has been a fair amount of confusion about this rule in the comments that have been made and that there has been too much of an attempt to dictate to a member of this house, who happens to be the Leader of the Opposition, what he shall put in his speech.

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, may I now refer to the citation I mentioned—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka.

Mr. Aiken: I wish to refer to page 3134 of Hansard for March 20, 1961. In that instance we had reached approximately the same position that we now have in that there were broad, introductory remarks by the Leader of the Opposition and objection was taken. At that time the then Speaker said:

I cannot very well instruct the Leader of the Opposition how to make his speech but I can and I think I should say this. The hon. member's speech thus far has been, I think, too broadly discursive having regard to the previous discussions. If he is laying a foundation for a specific subject I feel he ought to come to it.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, in my earlier remarks I attempted to support my statement that such great latitude was permitted on an amendment of this kind that it was possible for an hon. member to make a speech on transportation, let us say, and then move an amendment on national defence.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. MacEachen: In support of this statement I wish to refer Your Honour to page 202 of Beauchesne, citation 241, paragraph 2.

On the motion that the Speaker leave the chair for committee of supply—

That is the motion we are dealing with today.

—a member, before any amendment has been moved, may speak on a certain subject and spend the last minutes or seconds of his time limit in moving an amendment dealing with another subject, but then he cannot take part in the debate on his own amendment.

What I am saying is simply this, that this citation supports the view that when the amendment is moved it then becomes the subject matter before the house and the rule of relevancy is established at that point, but up until the amendment is moved the debate is wide ranging, so wide, indeed, and the limits so broad that one may make a speech on one subject and move an amendment on another.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to repeat all of the citations that have been referred to, but certainly in my opinion citation 234, both the first and second paragraphs and, as the hon. member has just mentioned, citation 241, convince me that the Leader of the Opposition has complete freedom to range over as wide an area as he likes until he reaches the point where he moves an amendment. Following that he should confine his remarks to what is contained in the amendment.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, these are most extraordinary propositions which are now being advanced to you from the other side of the house, and in my respectful submission they are entirely against the course of decisions from the Chair in this house. This is not the first time this point has been raised in just such circumstances, when the Leader of the Opposition has started out in the opening speech in a debate on a supply motion and has approached the matter by a discussion of many subjects. This is not a repetition of a debate in reply to the speech from the throne. This is not a budget debate. This is a debate under strict rules.

I wish to come directly to the point raised by the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond, for I think he has quite misled himself in his reading of citation of 241 in Beauschesne. The principle is well established, Mr. Speaker, and in my submission it is a principle that is designed to accord fair play and equal treatment to all members of the house. Broadly it is that on such a motion the house deals with and debates one grievance at a time.

You can find many citations on this point in the old days before debate on such motions was limited to two days. We had many cases then where the Chair firmly enforced the rule that no member could introduce a new subject until the debate on the subject immediately under discussion had been concluded. The basis of that rule is that the house deals with one grievance at a time, and the Chair affords to all members of the house the right to speak on that grievance before any hon. member may introduce a different or new grievance.

This point has been raised before, Mr. Speaker. I had occasion to raise it in the last parliament on several occasions with the Leader of the Opposition because he was developing the habit in leading off on supply motions—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —of making these shotgun approaches where he talks about a number of subjects and then finally comes to rest on a particular amendment dealing with some subject. Then everybody else from that point on is limited to a discussion of that particular subject until that amendment is disposed of or until the amendment to the amendment is disposed of.

Now, Mr. Speaker, far from justifying the interpretation put upon it by the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond, citation 241 reads in the diametrically opposite way. The second clause of that citation reads:

> On the motion that the Speaker leave the chair for committee of supply, a member, before any amendment has been moved, may speak on a certain subject—

Not a whole lot of subjects, not cover the waterfront, but he may speak on a certain subject. It is not just any subject: it is a certain subject.

Mr. McIlraith: Read the rest of it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is one that is clearly defined, and it is not a situation in which he can rake up all the grievances of which he can think.

Then, the balance of the citation reads, that he may introduce an amendment in the last moments accorded to him dealing with another subject. But, Mr. Speaker, there is nothing there that says he can depart, until he reaches the introduction of the amendment, one iota from that certain subject upon which he commenced to speak. The rule, Mr. Speaker, is crystal clear.

I was the one who took objection in the last parliament on March 31, 1961, when the Speaker made a ruling to which reference was made by the hon. member for Muskoka-Parry Sound. It was on this very point and Mr. Speaker Michener found it necessary on that occasion to tell the Leader of the Opposition that it was not proper to go on discussing a lot of grievances and then come down in the end on some particular one in the amendment. He must speak about a particular grievance. Surely after half an hour of speaking the Leader of the Opposition should have completed his introduction, even affording him most generous latitude in so far as introductory matters are concerned. Surely, the point has been reached where he must now be confined to a certain subject in accordance with the rules.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have recognized that there are many opportunities given to this house for unlimited scope in terms of the subject matter of debate. There is the throne speech debate and the budget debate, as well as other occasions. The citations given in Beauchesne are dicta that I might follow, in certain circumstances. I think my case for ruling that the subject matter must be fairly narrowly defined is based on Mr. Speaker Beaudoin's precedent which I cited to the house earlier. This is the ground upon which

I feel that the Leader of the Opposition, particularly in the light of the fact he declared early in his remarks he intended to move an amendment, is almost binding himself to a fairly narrow subject. This is the basis of my ruling, and I so rule.

Mr. Pearson: This is I think, notwithstanding what my hon. friend the Minister of Justice has said, the eleventh or twelfth amendment I have moved to motions to go into supply. This is the first time, Mr. Speaker, that a ruling such as you have made has been applied.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No.

Mr. Pearson: I know the kind of statements I made; I know what I said and I said what I intended to say. The Speaker permitted me to do so. This is also the first time when the government has held me up for 35 minutes in this procedure, which is no doubt the purpose of the operation.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am rising on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Leader of the Opposition has offended the rules of the house by imputing motives. He is suggesting, in effect, that a point of order has been taken for some other reason than the legitimate reason of asking for a ruling of the Chair. He is suggesting that many of those who have spoken from this side of the house have done so because they wished to delay him. I say that under the rules of the house, he has no right to impute motives of that kind.

In the light of what he has just now said, Mr. Speaker, may I refer you to Hansard for April 24, 1961, page 3935, where Mr. Speaker Michener, when just such a point was raised, concluded some very pertinent remarks with this observation:

> Therefore, the proper course to follow in raising a grievance in going into supply is for the hon. member, when he starts, to state the grievance at least in terms sufficient to delimit the area of discussion.

Mr. Pearson: Well, Mr. Speaker, whatever may have been the purpose, I did not mention my hon. friend by name. I do not know why he should have felt so guilty that he had to jump to his feet. I did not mention anybody by name. I said, "The purpose of the operation". Surely, it is possible to impute motives to a government if it is not to an individual member of this house. The Minister of Justice might have saved himself that five minute intervention. But whatever the purpose, there is no doubt about the effect.

If I were moving a motion on a specific subject, such as setting up a specific committee, and if that were made clear at the beginning of my statement, then of course I would be expected to speak to that and to produce evidence that bore on the point. There is no doubt about that. The Minister of Justice and others seemed to have confused the moving of an amendment on the motion to go into supply with a grievance which can be raised after that amendment is voted upon. Then the speaker has to base his remarks on a particular point, and that is the only point that can be debated while grievances are being debated. However, I am moving an amendment to the motion, a motion of no confidence in the government.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this motion will be based on the lack of leadership, confusion and indecision of the government in dealing with our problems. Am I to be told by the government that I can only produce one piece of evidence to support that? I propose to stick very strictly to the motion that this government should be condemned because it is indecisive, because it has not shown leadership, because it is confused and undecided. This is my motion, and with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I propose to produce the kind of evidence which will support that kind of motion.

One can do this in two ways, if one likes. The Prime Minister talked about scattergun tactics. I cannot understand why he is worried about a scattergun. It can be done by a bullet, one bullet that goes to the target, I hope. It can be done by a shell which has a lot of pellets, and my shell has more than one pellet. They are all aimed at the target, and it is a big target and easy to hit.

One bit of evidence, Mr. Speaker, to support this general motion of no confidence in the leadership and direction of the government, is the way the government has been handling national defence policy. I bring that forward to support the motion which will be made at the end of my statement, a motion which will condemn the government because it has not shown leadership; it is confused and undecided, not only in respect of national defence but in respect of a lot of other matters. I begin with national defence because it is very much in our minds and because it provides the most graphic and dramatic evidence of confusion, bumbling and indecision we have had in a long time.

There is one way in the field of national defence in which this leadership might have been shown, in which some of this confusion may have been removed, when a decision might have been taken on the basis of the consensus of the House of Commons; that is by setting up a committee of this house on national defence policy. That is one way which a government that was concerned with giving leadership, which was concerned with getting the House of Commons behind it on this vital matter of life, death and survival, could have given leadership, but what happened?

Over the years when we on this side of the house, supported by the other opposition groups, tried to persuade the government to set up that kind of committee and give that kind of leadership, we were repeatedly turned down. We tried and we have failed. We had hoped that if the government had accepted our proposal on this matter it might have produced, and I think would have produced, non-partisan consideration of such a vital matter. But since February 20, 1959, when I made the first proposal to the house for such a committee, until the other day when the Prime Minister finally turned down my proposal for a national defence committee, we have been balked in our efforts to bring this matter before the House of Commons through a committee.

Mr. Green: May I ask the Leader of the Opposition a question?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, of course.

Mr. Green: Why was it when your party formed the government of the country it declined, year after year, to set up a committee on national defence?

Mr. Pearson: That is a perfectly proper question and I expected it. The answer to that is twofold. In the first place it is quite true that the opposition of that time, including my hon. friend and including the Prime Minister, did their very best to get a defence policy committee set up, and they produced various impressive arguments for such a committee, even at that time when we were not in the confused mess we are now in about national defence. The government of that day, of which I was a member, although it produced a great deal more information before the house than this government has ever produced on national defence, although it encouraged the widest and deepest discussion on the estimates for the Department of National Defence, and although it produced blue books explaining what our national defence policy was, decided that was enough and that a defence committee should not be set up. The hon. gentleman thought that was wrong then. I ask him now, why will he not agree to the very proposition he put forward in those days?

Mr. Green: Now perhaps the Leader of the Opposition will answer the question.

Mr. Pearson: But perhaps my hon. friend will also remember that defence committees have been set up in the past.

Mr. Green: No.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Mr. Pearson: They have indeed been set up on defence.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Not on policy.

Mr. Pearson: Perhaps my hon. friend will remember a few commissions on defence policy set up by Liberal governments. Perhaps my hon. friend will remember that when there was a controversy going on concerning Petawawa the government of the day allowed a commission to investigate that—a royal commission and a committee of the house. Both of these were set up; but now, Mr. Speaker, these hon. gentlemen opposite, who fought so hard for that kind of inquiry in those days, have for five years resisted any attempt to find out anything about national defence policy, through a small committee before which witnesses could be heard and experts called, at a time and in a situation when there is much more confusion and much more difficulty in understanding the policy of the government than there ever was in the days and years before 1957. However there it is; we have not been permitted to investigate this matter in any effective way.

Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, it is the duty of the opposition to do what it can to find out the facts, to find out the truth about national defence policy, and we shall continue to do our best to do that. Indeed it is all the more necessary now because we have another example of lack of leadership and of confusion and indecision. There have been contradictions, and they are now in the open, between the minister of national defence, the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs. There have been contradictions as to what the facts are between the government of Canada and the government of the United States.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, it would have been possible, with a government that had any idea or sense of leadership and decision, to have avoided a situation where we have this open dispute, or had, between the United States government and the Canadian government on what were the facts of national defence and joint continental defence policy? This is perhaps the most deplorable and most dangerous illustration we have had of lack of leadership and confusion in the five years in which the government has been in office, a confusion and indecision which has led to this situation, where however, wrong it may have been—and it was wrong—it led to the state department of our ally in continental defence issue a statement taking exception to the facts put forward in this house by the Prime Minister of this country.

A government that was conducting our relations with our neighbour in the right way would never have got us into that position. And now the Prime Minister says the facts are as he stated they were. There is no confusion so far as he is concerned. Everything is fine; the facts were as stated by him. If the facts were as stated by the Prime Minister on this matter in the house, why was it exception was taken to those facts not only by the state department of the United States but by the minister of national defence in the government, up to the point where the minister felt he had to resign? Could there be a more dramatic example of confusion inside the cabinet, which leads to confusion inside parliament, and which leads to confusion inside the country?

Our concern on this side is to get the facts, to find out the truth in these matters before the efforts of the government to conceal all the facts or obscure all the truth will poison the relations between ourselves and our closest neighbour. The most dangerous and damaging result of the indecision, delay and confusion of the government in this field of defence policy is in the deterioration that it has brought about in our relations with our allies in NATO.

When the Prime Minister talks about the desirability of consultation before action is taken by one member of a coalition which affects the others, especially by the United States, we on this side agree with him. We have been talking like that for years. There is no doubt about that; but if the Prime Minister is so sensitive in these matters he should have been more careful than to get up in this house and disclose confidential negotiations, confidential negotiations which are apparently so secret and so important that we cannot find out from this government, as we tried even today, which department of the Canadian government is carrying them on.

This is just another indication of the kind of leadership we have been getting in this parliament and in this country. But now the Prime Minister says, "Well, we don't have to do anything now, notwithstanding the minister of national defence, notwithstanding this controversy regarding the carrying out of the obligations we have undertaken, because the NATO council is going to meet in May and we will leave it to the NATO council to advise us what should be done and what changes should be made in our defence policy."

This is just another excuse for delay. As the minister of national defence said, the time has now come to make a decision. The Prime Minister says, "No; no, we won't make a decision because the NATO council is going to meet here in May, and there was a conference in Nassau in December and they talked about these things; so let us wait for a while until we see what the other members of NATO are going to do."

Mr. Diefenbaker: Isn't that what the other countries in NATO are saying?

Mr. Pearson: It certainly is not. Every country in NATO, except Canada, have accepted commitments which they are in a position to try to carry out. They have either accepted commitments which require nuclear warheads on their territory and have made political agreements with the United States for that purpose, even though the nuclear warheads may not have arrived, or they let the NATO council know at the beginning that they were not going to have nuclear warheads. That is not the position the Canadian government—

Mr. Diefenbaker: What about the changes that are taking place in defence, in Turkey and in Italy—

Mr. Pearson: I know all about these changes and I know how the Prime Minister is seizing on these changes as an escape hatch for his own lack of policy. I know perfectly well that in Turkey and in Italy NATO nuclear, intermediate missile bases are now to be abandoned in favour of another form of nuclear tactical deterrent. I know also—and this was made clear by the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom in the House of Commons the other day—that nothing that happened at Nassau, notwithstanding what the Prime Minister said, affects the obligations of Canada inside the coalition at this time; indeed that is what the secretary of state has himself said and repeated in his apologetic statement the other evening.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) a question? Could he explain to the house why he changed his nuclear policy so suddenly?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): At least he had the courage to state a policy.

Mr. Pearson: I make my statement along the lines of the minister of national defence in the statement put out by him this afternoon. The time had come when somebody had to make a decision—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: —and, Mr. Speaker, if only the government of this country would make some decisions on these matters, if only the government would accept its responsibility in these matters, then we in this house would be able to decide whether we would support or oppose the government in those decisions. The trouble is that we do not know what to support, because they make no decisions. That is the burden of the letter which the minister of national defence sent to the Prime Minister when he resigned. He said, "The time has come. The 'planes are with the squadrons; the missiles are on the stations. Now is the time to decide whether or not you are going to carry out your obligations". Therefore we have said that the time has come when Canada, committed to these obligations, should honour her word until those obligations are changed—and that is not going to be such an easy job now.

Mr. Speaker, one result of indecision and contradiction in this field of national defence has been to baffle not only our own people but our friends, especially our friends in the United States, with whom this government made these arrangements for the integration of our continental defence; not the previous government.

Mr. Green: Oh, yes, you did.

Mr. Pearson: That is not true. I heard the hon. gentleman say that.

Mr. Green: Oh, yes, you did.

Mr. Pearson: That is not true. It was this government which made the NORAD arrangement. Let this government either follow through on that arrangement or change it.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, could I ask the Leader of the Opposition a question? Does he deny that his government had all the arrangements made for NORAD before it went out of office?

Mr. Pearson: I absolutely and categorically deny it, and I defy the hon. gentleman to prove otherwise.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

An hon. Member: Is there any other question?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, it perhaps has no immediate relevance to my argument, but I should like to point out to the hon. gentleman, who has interrupted me twice, that this matter of an integrated continental air defence arose before the election of 1957. The records will show this. It was submitted to the defence committee of the previous cabinet before the election, and the prime minister of that day, who was a man of both responsibility and decision, said, "This is far too important a matter, even if we wished to accept these recommendations, to discuss before an election. We will not even consider them until after the election".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Mr. Pearson: The minister of national defence made the recommendations. The government did not even consider them. Then after the election—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pearson: There was no consideration given to this matter. Let not the record be falsified by this kind of intervention. Then, Mr. Speaker, after the election there was a cabinet meeting in July, 1957, when this very important joint arrangement was accepted with a minimum of discussion by the present government and it has been in effect ever since. That is the fact and that is the record. If the government wishes to improve its relations with the United States in these matters, let the government tell our friends across the border what they are going to do and what they are not going to do.

Of course, everybody knows—and this has been repeated by hon. members from all parts of the house—it is the first responsibility of a Canadian government to protect the interests of Canada. That is what they are chosen for. Governments used to be able to protect the interests of Canada without continuously quarrelling with our friends. The present government seems to have a genius for getting into trouble with our friends, our best friends.

Now, Mr. Speaker, perhaps we could ask the government whether they intend to manufacture an issue for an election out of the unfortunate and most regrettable faux pas made in Washington, a move for which the secretary of state of the United States apologized, while he claimed that the facts he stated were right. He has invited the government of Canada, if any of the facts were wrong, to correct the facts. Perhaps we will be told in this debate whether any of the facts have been corrected. The indecision of this government, its refusal to make the decisions required for defence, and then seeking spurious excuses to justify its bungling, are responsible for a lot of the trouble the government gets itself into in its relations with other countries. I beg the government on this occasion not to make a political football out of this particular, unhappy incident, and I beg the Prime Minister to remember his own words of September 7, 1957, at Dartmouth college, Hanover, when he said:

> The whole measure of warm friendship which has long existed between the United States and Canada, and the parallel interest of the two countries, enables us to speak to each other with a measure of forthrightness which is permitted to very few countries in the world.

This is the Prime Minister:

> The candour with which we can communicate with each other strengthens our understanding of each other, and helps us to avoid the pitfalls of misunderstanding which have bedevilled relations of so many other countries in the world.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Not by press notices.

Mr. Pearson: Let us do nothing in this parliament to bedevil our relations with our friends or to create pitfalls or misunderstandings. Let us do our best here to fill up pitfalls of misunderstanding. But, Mr. Speaker, defence is only one illustration of the validity of the motion of no confidence in the government that we are moving. There are others. I think I should mention one or two before I resume my seat. They also illustrate the delay, indecision and confusion of government policies in fields where there should be leadership and decision. I think of unemployment, which is still the most important human problem for the people of Canada. Job security—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

An hon. Member: Again?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Again, yes, because there has been another breach of the rules. Do you understand?

An hon. Member: Read your rule book.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, after a very lengthy introduction to his remarks the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) has for some time now been dealing with a subject, namely defence policy. It is quite evident now that he is turning to an entirely different subject, namely unemployment, and I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that in doing so he is violating the rules of this house. He has sought to excuse what he is about to do this afternoon by indicating that at the conclusion of his remarks he is going to introduce an amendment of a quite extraordinary nature. It is the kind of amendment that is obviously designed to permit the Leader of the Opposition, if he succeeds, to reverse the rules of the house and to discuss a number of subjects. It was said by him earlier in his remarks, perhaps when you yourself were not in the chair, Mr. Speaker, that he was seeking to make a grievance of what he said was indecision on the part of the government. So he is proposing, as he says, in dealing with that subject to range over a number of subjects looking, as he says, for examples.

Mr. Speaker, in my submission, if this is the type of amendment he is going to introduce it is not a proper amendment on such a motion, and it cannot be made a cover under any circumstances for a plain violation of the rules of this house, which require that an hon. member—and this applies also to the hon. member who leads off first on the motion—must speak on a certain subject. That is the language of citation 241(2) of Beauchesne's fourth edition; it says "a certain subject". It is plain to be seen that if it is possible to introduce motions of this kind, and then under cover of such motion to talk about any subject, then the Leader of the Opposition does not need to confine himself to two, or three, or four, or five; there is literally no limit to the number of subjects which he can discuss. He will be able to say: "Well, they are additional evidence of a general charge which I am undertaking to prove".

Mr. Speaker, this is a palpable attempt to destroy the rules and to ride rough shod over the rules. I would remind you of the language used by the former speaker in this house on April 24, 1961, at page 3935 of Hansard, where the speaker laid down this rule in dealing with just such a situation. He said:

> Therefore, the proper course to follow in raising a grievance in going into supply is for the hon. member, when he starts, to state the grievance at least in terms sufficient to delimit the area of discussion.

This is not the only relevant citation; there is another one which will be found on March 31, 1961. There a similar point was raised; the Leader of the Opposition started out to talk about a number of subjects, and then, having claimed a privilege which is accorded no other member of the house, introduced an amendment which then confined debate.

Mr. Speaker, I close with this observation, that if it is competent to the Leader of the Opposition in leading off on such a motion to introduce a number of subjects, it will in my respectful submission be equally competent to any member of this house who follows him in debate to discuss any or all of those subjects. I am prepared to prophesy, Mr. Speaker, that if the Leader of the Opposition brings in his amendment we would afterwards be told that we must confine ourselves specifically to the amendment. But there will then be on the record statements by the Leader of the Opposition in regard to a variety of subjects.

Now, it seems to me in the light of decisions of the past in such situations and the clearly established practice of the house, that that is not the way a supply debate should be conducted. The whole basis of the supply debate is to deal with one subject at a time, and we exhaust that subject before we proceed to another. In my respectful submission, if the Leader of the Opposition has chosen to discuss defence, and he has been at it now, I think, for about three quarters of an hour, then that is the subject he has chosen. He should bring in his amendment and it is not then open to him to turn to another subject and open up an entirely new book of debate in the house.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, this is the third time the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fleming) rises on a point of order which is similar to this, and unfortunately for the Minister of Justice he has not stated to the house the facts. I would challenge the Minister of Justice to state that the Leader of the Opposition has dealt with a number of subjects. He has not dealt with a number of subjects; he has dealt with one subject and one subject alone, and that is the indecision and the hesitation of this government. Basing the argument on that assumption, which I submit is the only assumption that is before Your Honour at this time, then no matter how you view either citation 241 or citation 234 it is quite clear that the Leader of the Opposition is in order. Because citation 241(2) refers to the amendment which may be moved or has been moved, and says in effect that the speaker may refer to a certain subject. Citation 234(1) says:

> When such motion is proposed, it shall be permissible to discuss any public matter within the powers of the federal parliament or to ask for the redress of any grievance—

So with respect I say to you that the Leader of the Opposition all along, from the beginning of his introduction of the amendment with which he proposed to deal, indicated quite clearly that he was going to deal with the indecision of the government; and the Minister of Justice has no right in the remarks which he has made to anticipate what the Leader of the Opposition is going to say later on in his speech or in the remarks that he will make before he moves his amendment. Therefore I submit to you with deference, although you, sir, were not in the chair at the time, that thus far the only subject which the Leader of the Opposition has dealt with is the hesitation, the contradiction and the lack of leadership of the government.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, we are discussing a point of order which I think is similar to one raised a few minutes ago by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker). Unfortunately you were not in the chair to hear the arguments on that particular point of order. I hope that I can help you in reaching a decision. Citation 234 of Beauchesne says:

> The ancient doctrine that the redress of grievances should be considered before the grant of supplies is maintained in the House of Commons of Canada—

This is the only premise for this supply motion. There are other citations. Paragraph (2) of citation 234 does in a broad general way indicate that many different subjects can be brought up. Citation 241(2) says:

> On the motion that the Speaker leave the chair for committee of supply, a member, before any amendment has been moved, may speak on a certain subject and spend the last minutes or seconds of his time in moving an amendment dealing with another subject—and then it goes on to say that debate would be confined to that subject after the amendment has been moved. Mr. Speaker, up to this time the amendment has not been moved, but by and large I think we can take it from what the Leader of the Opposition has said that he is going to move a motion based on confusion, delay and postponement. Up to this time I think it is fair to say that he has only been giving evidence to support his contention that there is confusion, delay, and so forth.

From my limited experience of these supply motions, I believe it has not been the practice to limit the debate to one specific subject and to have that specific subject named at the outset of the speech prior to the moving of the amendment. If there is a subamendment moved then after that subamendment has been moved it is the obligation of the members who wish to speak on it to stick to the subject matter of both amendments; but not prior to their having been moved.

Mr. Speaker: Order. In this question I have examined the various citations which have been given by hon. members. Some have some strength, others have somewhat less strength. But I would say this, that the choice of the subject for an amendment is that of the mover. However, there must be some reason, and there must be some order to debate in this house. If an hon. member, before proposing his amendment, ranges over the whole spectrum and then at the last moment brings in his amendment he thereby, if we are to follow the reasoning suggested, prevents anyone else from discussing all those matters which he may have raised. In deciding as to the rights and obligations of various members this procedure seems to me to be somewhat unfair. In addition to that consideration, it strikes me that the suggested reasoning is contrary to the general practices of this house because he is to be followed by some other hon. member from some other group who may wish to put forward a subamendment and he does not even get a chance to see the amendment until he is almost on his feet. This procedure puts the member following at a serious disadvantage. One must consider the fairness of debate.

Perhaps the Leader of the Opposition has not yet worded his amendment. However, if he has indicated that the burden of his amendment is going to be a certain field such as that which I think has been indicated, and he gives brief illustrations of it, then I believe we may have an idea of where he is going. But we must not then expect that after he has moved his amendment, anyone will stand up then and say, "Oh, you cannot discuss anything the Leader of the Opposition said, but what is in the amendment." If he said something in debate in leading up to his amendment, then it is as much a subject of discussion afterwards as it was previously. We know that in orderly debate there must be some reasonable control in this regard. With those words from me I think the Leader of the Opposition will govern himself accordingly. This is not the subject for any applause or anything of that kind. I am looking for orderly debate in this house, so let us proceed on that basis and get on with our business.

Mr. Pearson: We all hope there will be orderly debate in this house, Mr. Speaker. However, if the position taken by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fleming)—and I thank him for his intervention, as it gave me a breathing space—were to be considered a valid one, it would mean that in moving a vote of no confidence against the government because we think it is a bad, indecisive and bungling government, we would be able to produce only one illustration in order to support that charge and nobody following us from the other opposition groups would be able to deal with any other illustration than the one I produced. The Minister of Justice said this will prevent the opposition from answering. But they can deal, as you have just said, with every point I bring forward in an attempt to prove that this government is indecisive, confused and not giving leadership. Surely no limitation will be put on their contribution to this debate. Certainly we on this side of the house would not raise the points of order which have been raised on the other side if they do that.

Mr. Speaker: I think we may leave the point of order and get on with the business.

Mr. Pearson: When I discussed defence, I did not discuss it as an analysis of defence policy. I discussed defence as an illustration of our thesis that this government is confused, fumbling and indecisive. I brought in the subject of defence as an example to show that, as it is one which is very close to us at this time. However, there are others which could be mentioned. I mentioned one other one, namely unemployment.

In 1962 during the election campaign the Prime Minister told us that the unemployment problem would be licked by the middle of 1962. He said it was all over. He said, "Keep the government in office and it will be found that this summer we would have full employment." But we all know what happened; and this bears on the policy and the actions of the government, although it is not, of course, entirely responsible for these matters and we have never made that assertion. But since that statement made by the Prime Minister that unemployment would be licked by the middle of the summer, unemployment has stood at a level of 6 per cent on an annual basis. It is unfortunately rising now. The current issue of the Financial Times predicts that unemployment at the winter peak this February or March may total 600,000 or about 9 per cent of the labour force. We on this side of the house assert that the government has not taken quick and effective action that would really do something about this matter.

It was the Prime Minister himself and the government that said, "We are going to put into effect long range economic programs which will put this country on the way to growth and progress again". That is another illustration, and perhaps in some ways it is the most important one we have, to support the charge we make against this government for the way in which it has conducted the affairs of this country since the last election. Where is this long range economic program? Where is the new budget? Why have we not even managed to pass the estimates of the old budget? Why have we not been permitted to discuss the $200 million of taxation which was imposed by order in council? All these things bear on my main thesis that this government has lost the capacity to govern. Surely I am entitled to speak about them.

In order to obscure their own defects and their own defaults, they are now throwing up a smokescreen about obstruction on this side. We are told that this is the reason we cannot have the estimates. Let us just look at the situation with regard to the estimates which we are now discussing on this motion to go into supply. Only two days were allocated to the estimates prior to the election last spring.

Mr. Diefenbaker: How many days were spent on supplementary estimates?

Mr. Pearson: The Prime Minister intervenes again in order to remind me that we were obliged to spend a good deal of time on supplementary estimates because there was no other opportunity of discussing the expenditure of the people's money. Indeed, not one dollar of the main estimates has been discussed and decided in this house, I believe, since September, 1961. That is an example, if you like, of how not to conduct the nation's business. However, only two days were allocated to the main estimates prior to the election. With that situation facing the government it must have known, if it knew anything, the kind of financial box it was going to get into. With that situation facing it, it decided to let the new members cool off and to call parliament on September 27. That was done. Those weeks were lost.

Mr. Chevrier: More than three months.

Mr. Pearson: Last autumn when we met, we had only one supply day. Only one department was called and that department was withdrawn after two or three days debate during which the Minister of Agriculture took up a good deal of time, and nobody complained about that matter.

Mr. Hamilton: I never spoke once.

Mr. Pearson: With the estimates in that situation and with interim supply developing to the point where the government was not going to be able to carry on for lack of money, the government then decided they would not come back until January 21. And since we have come back, this is the first supply day we have had. What a record that is, Mr. Speaker, of what I might call auto-obstruction.

There are, of course, other indications of inaction and lack of efficient conduct of the nation's business. We were told that certain things were going to be done. Legislation was forecast, some of it even introduced but not acted on, all of it important. I was going to mention that the Columbia river treaty is a shining example, though that is not the right expression, for indecision and confusion. Then there are redistribution, senate reform, contributory old age pensions, the unemployment insurance fund, abolition of closure and the O'Leary report. None of these things have been brought before us.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What about the national development board? Why don't you mention that?

Mr. Pearson: There have been some very useful pieces of legislation passed—the national development board, the Atlantic development board—

Mr. Diefenbaker: You held it up.

Mr. Pearson: Of course when we debate these matters like the national development board we are then told by the Prime Minister that we are holding them up.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You are.

Mr. Pearson: Now, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Just killing time.

Mr. Pearson: —all this means—

An hon. Member: A guilty conscience.

Mr. Pearson: —that the present government has broken down. It has lost the capacity to manage not only the nation's business but parliamentary business, and in order to get itself out of the difficulty in which it finds itself financially, and it will certainly be in difficulty—

Mr. Starr: You are going to make sure.

Mr. Pearson: Well, interim supply ran out on the first or second of February and we have not been approached by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Nowlan) for the eleventh twelfth which will now be required for the next month. This government has so badly managed the affairs of this house, apart from the affairs of the country, that it has broken down, and it conceals its default by shouting "obstruction". There is one way of getting out of this situation and that is to bring this parliament to an end.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Would the Leader of the Opposition permit a question?

Mr. Pearson: Yes.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): He has just been speaking about supply—

Mr. McIlraith: He is speaking about indecision.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —and he is now proposing that parliament should be dissolved. How would be propose to meet the problem of interim supply for the next six months if there were an election?

Mr. Pearson: My hon. friend is now Minister of Justice and he used to be minister of finance. He should know something about these matters. Surely he knows that if this parliament is brought to an end by dissolution the government can pay its bills by Governor General's warrants, and the minister is an expert in doing that because he has done it before.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I take it, then, that that is the proposal of the Leader of the Opposition?

Mr. Pearson: The minister is a very patient person and if he will wait for a very few moments he will hear the motion I am going to move. I say the record is such—

Mr. Churchill: You are very evasive.

An hon. Member: Indecisive.

Mr. Speaker: Order. While an hon. member may seek to interrupt the Leader of the Opposition in order to ask a question, I think that beyond that we will get along better with fewer interruptions. This applies to both sides of the house.

Mr. Pearson: I am sure it does apply to both sides, but the application has only been noticeable on one side this afternoon. Especially after the events of last week, Mr. Speaker, it is surely our duty on this side to do what we can to bring to an end the most inefficient, confused and indecisive government in our history. I am glad the Prime Minister is taking that down too.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As a matter of fact, I have heard that story for a long time. The hon. gentleman flatters himself.

Mr. Pearson: This is a government which has had no idea of where it was going; and if it had it would have had no idea how to get there; and if it had it would never have been able to make a decision to start moving there. It is a government which has been unable to deal with problems because it has not been able to understand most of them, and where it did understand a problem it was not able to make up its mind what to do about it. It has so mismanaged its affairs that it is now even running out of money. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, this government is ending. It is ending unwept, unhonoured and unsung.

Mr. Diefenbaker: But returned whenever it goes to the country.

Mr. Pearson: The Prime Minister says it will be returned whenever it goes to the country. There is a new definition of an optimist. This government is ending both with a bang and a whimper. The country now has a chance to choose a better government and we hope soon. It should be given a chance to choose a better government. So, Mr. Speaker, surely it is the duty of all members of the opposition in this house to give the people a chance to return what they would consider to be a better government. We can only do that by getting rid of this one, and that can only be done by taking a united stand.

No government has any right to go on sitting on the benches opposite and failing so lamentably, so miserably, to govern. I say to the opposition parties that all of us, I think, have had enough of this manoeuvring, this talk, this dramatic trickery of last Friday while the country's business is in disarray—

Mr. Starr: Listen to who is talking.

Mr. Pearson: —while the nation cries out for action and all we get is confusion and evasion.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): And obstruction.

Mr. Pearson: I remember—

Mr. Starr: Mostly obstruction.

Mr. Pearson: —in the House of Commons at Westminster a very dramatic occasion—

Mr. Diefenbaker: We used that against you.

Mr. Pearson: —in 1940—

Mr. Diefenbaker: We used that against you in 1955.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Pearson: I have said this before, Mr. Speaker, but it is more apposite to this house and government than ever before, and I do not mind repeating it. In 1940 there was a government in office in Great Britain during the darkest days of the war which did not have those qualities of action and decision necessary to face the emergency at that time. We face emergencies and problems in this country at this time. We need a government that will make decisions, face up to these problems and do something about them. I refer to a supporter of the government at Westminster in 1940 who remained a friend of the members of that government and who gave them credit for good will and good intentions. He must have felt very sad in making the kind of speech he had to make, but at that time he said, quoting the immortal words of Cromwell when he went into the Long Parliament:

> You have sat here too long for the little good that you have been doing.

An hon. Member: That is why the people kicked you out in 1957.

Mr. Pearson: That is a very apposite observation, but I can assure hon. members that the hon. gentlemen opposite will never be faced with 22 years of decision.

Then, Mr. Amory went on to quote Cromwell:

> Depart, I say, and let's have done with you. In God's name, go.

In going, Mr. Speaker, they will at least perform one decisive service to the Canadian people. They will give the people a chance to choose a better parliament and a better government. So, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier):

> That all the words after "that" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:
>
> "this government, because of lack of leadership, the breakdown of unity in the cabinet, and confusion and indecision in dealing with national and international problems, does not have the confidence of the Canadian people."

Alleged Lack of Government Leadership

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, we of the Social Credit party have taken the position since the June 18 election that parliament must serve the best interests of Canada and the Canadian people. We announced at the beginning of this session that it was the duty of all members of this parliament from all parties to proceed with this responsibility. This is the reason we were elected to this house. I reject the proposition that the only and prime duty of opposition parties in this house is simply to overthrow the government. To assume this attitude is nothing more or less than irresponsibility.

I am convinced that it is the responsibility of all of us in this house, collectively, and this applies in a particular way in this house of minorities, to give to the government the authority and the money to carry on the necessary administration of the nation's public affairs. We gave it to the government in this parliament, even though they are a minority and this is simply because they are the largest minority. It must, however, be recognized that this policy is, has and was based on the premise that the government would provide clearcut policies and appropriate follow-up of legislation which had been previously passed or would be passed by this parliament. The result has been, in the intervening months, that this parliament, this twenty fifth parliament, has failed in its responsibilities to the people of Canada. You will note that I said "this parliament" because it applies collectively to all of us.

At this point, we are particularly concerned by the events of the past few days, and with the reasons these events have come to pass in the way that they have. The statement of the United States state department, and now the resignation of the minister of national defence are two striking examples, and they result not from the determination of the opposition to overthrow the government but from the confusion, indecision and postponement of policy on the part of the government. They must face up to this responsibility to the Canadian people and to us in this house.

While I am not too experienced in the operations of government, one thing that has been impressed upon me has been the fact that there has been nothing but confusion in the arrangements and in the procedures for carrying out the policies which this government has, if any, and also the indecision and postponement of legislative action.

An election in Canada precipitated at this time by the events of the last three days and carrying an anti-American overtone would be a tragedy to Canada. The United States is our closest neighbour, yes and our closest friend. Only damage could result from an election campaign on this basis. I think that the issue of today's Toronto Globe and Mail expresses this situation extremely well in its front page editorial. I quote:

> Events in Ottawa make it apparent that Prime Minister John Diefenbaker is giving serious consideration to dissolving parliament and going to the country in a new election. In the opinion of this newspaper an election at this time would be a disaster. This parliament would leave behind it such a record as would disgrace Canada in the history of parliaments, a record blank of any achievement:

You can read this, and you can hear the same sentiments expressed in every corner of the country. We see that this is not just the idea of a few men and women who sit on the opposition side of this house. I continue:

> An entire year for which none of the estimates covering the nation's business has been approved.
>
> Two sessions without a budget.
>
> Worst of all, no program arising out of that budget to stimulate and stabilize the nation's economic growth, to give us the productivity and competitiveness we must have to survive in changing world markets.
>
> Canada could only suffer serious damage from an immediate election. We have other urgent needs that must take precedence.
> The first of these is a clear, comprehensible statement by the government on defence policy, including nuclear arms.

It seems to me that a depressing cloud hangs over this chamber this afternoon as a result of the resignation of the Minister of National Defence. I speak in regard to this with a certain amount of feeling because this hon. member who represents the constituency of Calgary North is practically a hometown boy in my community. In earlier days his farm was only an hour's walk from my family's homestead, and I know he is held in much respect on the basis of the conviction with which he has carried out his responsibilities, except perhaps for his rather infamous talk last Thursday night. Actually I did not expect him so quickly to take the advice I gave him last Thursday evening, but he has found it necessary to resign. Such a decision is not an easy one to take. Certainly it must have been made only in the face of very deep differences of opinion.

As has been stated already this afternoon, our nation needs and expects from us who are members of the house a greater degree of unity and a greater spirit of unitedness in our diversities. I doubt that neither a royal commission nor a federal provincial conference would be much good in trying to work out the problem we have here. It might help if we had a parliamentary committee to study this thing, and it may be that the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness) would make a good chairman for it. The thing I am concerned with is simply that we are not facing, in an intelligent and responsible way, the responsibilities we have to the people who elected us here.

Coming back to the editorial in the Globe and Mail I read a little further down:

Canada's second need—

That is second to a clear statement on what is the defence policy of the government—

—equally urgent, if not more so—is for a budget that will give some definition to economic policy for at least the next three to five years. Within that time reports from the royal commission on banking and finance and the royal commission on taxation should be available as a basis for more far reaching reforms and long term planning.

These are Canada's needs, and that they be satisfied is essential to the health, possibly the survival of the nation.

Then in conclusion this editorial states:

The government should make an honest statement on defence policy, from which we could move into reasonable negotiations with the United States. The government should press onward with all haste to a budget that will make it possible for us to begin restoring our economic health. To such honesty a loyal opposition might be expected to respond with co-operation.

We ask the Prime Minister to forget politics and an election, and give us leadership.

This is where we stand in the House of Commons at the present time.

Dealing with the confusion and indecision—the rationalizing indecision which I believe it is—it is not good enough that we try to explain something by reason of something that happened in the past. This is a crisis government. We go from crisis to crisis. What we ought to be doing is anticipating what the problem will be ahead and then, before we reach that problem, make a decision as to whether we will go through it, around it or over it, or decide how it is going to be solved.

The former minister of national defence says he favours nuclear arms for Canada's defensive forces both in NATO and NORAD. Does he mean by this that the Prime Minister is against nuclear arms for these Canadian forces? One would assume so, otherwise he would not have quit; but then I would ask the Prime Minister, does the minister of national defence make these commitments, which we are just now finding out, all by himself, or does he make them in agreement with his Prime Minister?

Let us face the facts in this situation. If the government did not know these commitments were being made, then the minister of national defence was away out of order. But he could not have made them without the government knowing them and being in agreement with these decisions. Therefore it is not wrong to assume today, although we have yet to be told by the government, that we are committed to the acquisition of nuclear arms for Canada. It is this kind of bumbling and indecisiveness that produces the confusion that has overtaken the nation.

Alleged Lack of Government Leadership

I think I have a fairly good idea what the people of Canada, at the grassroots level, are talking about and I am convinced that all of the confusion, uneasiness and unrest that has been developing in regard to this particular problem is not just the result of a press that is supposed to be prejudiced against the government, or opposition parties that are trying to undermine the very foundations of confidence of our Canadian people in government.

Our people want to know, and have a right to know, what the policies of the government are. Actually we have a pretty good assumption what these defence policies are because any reasonable persons would not be installing carriers for nuclear warheads if they did not agree, intend and plan to put nuclear warheads on top of them.

This comes to the crux of the difficulty facing us at the present time. The Prime Minister has said there is no confusion; yet we have been told by the government of a foreign power that our defence policies are not clear, and by the very words used in that statement they prove to us we have not been informed of what is actually going on. That is why I say to the government this afternoon that it has failed in its responsibilities to the country and to this house, a house of minorities, which is a peculiar situation. It is a situation with which we are not familiar in Canada, but one which we are perhaps going to have to live with for quite a long time.

We all become confused if we follow what we are told is government policy. The other day a friend of mine said there is not any confusion about the government's policy. He said that if you turn back to a certain page of Hansard and find the statement on the Nassau meeting, if you turn over then to the speech of the Prime Minister and put them together, with the speech of the minister of national defence, you will find out what the policy is. Another man said "That is not my responsibility. That is the responsibility of the government or the Prime Minister or the minister concerned, to put it in terms so that we all can understand it." That is why I believe the people of Canada want action at this time, positive action, action based upon clearcut policies with which we do not necessarily have to agree, but at least we should know about. We have appealed—and I think we have been very reasonable in our appeal—to the government to tell us what are their policies. When they tell us they have a program of positive legislation, we want them to lay it out in orderly fashion so that we can get on with it. It is not good enough to bring in a certain piece of legislation which in principle may be right and with which in principle all parties will agree, and for us then to find in the first debate, shall we say in the resolution stage, that there is some disagreement and then suddenly it is pulled back from out of our grasp, to come back a week, ten days or two weeks later when we have to go over the whole thing again. This is just wasted time and confuses the issue.

It is not good enough, either, to say that the opposition parties have refused to co-operate and have insisted on blocking these procedures, because perhaps the procedure of harmonious and aggressive programming in such a house of minorities is a little different than it was when there were 208 members on the government side of the house. It is in this situation that I think the government have failed completely to recognize their responsibility and opportunity. Again I come back to the question of the minority situation in this house. The position of Canada today, as far as our party structure is concerned, is not that of a two-party system. It is a multi-party system and we are going to have to face it and understand it for quite a long time to come, simply because the two old line parties, no matter on what side of the house they sit, have played politics too long with the operations of our government. It is not enough for the Prime Minister to rise and speak on defence or any other topic and spend 95 per cent of his time tirading against the Leader of the Opposition. We need something positive and aggressive. Likewise, it is not the responsibility of the leader of the official opposition to rise and think he is accomplishing and fulfilling his purpose by simply returning that tirade to the Prime Minister. This is the very thing that is destroying the confidence of the Canadian people in a traditional two-party system. Let us just remember that the basis upon which we have operated for so long and so smugly does not necessarily reflect the over-all opinion of Canadians. It is here where we in this house, again, have failed to meet our responsibilities.

Now let us look objectively for a few moments at the situation in which we are placed. The easiest way out of this problem would be to have an election. As I see day after day what is happening here I almost reach the conclusion inside myself that this is the only way in which we can get out of the present situation. But then I study the situation, look at it and ask myself, would an election solve anything?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Thompson: I do not believe the people of Canada are today ready to make up their minds with sufficient unanimity to give us a majority government. I believe we would find ourselves just prolonging the dilemma we are in and, while doing so, would again threaten the very foundations of our present economy and its orderly functioning. If we could only know what foreigners outside Canada are today saying about Canada as a result of the bungling over our defence problem, as a result of the lack of progress we have made in this house, perhaps some of us would be a little more determined to get on with the job that is before us instead of just thinking we can change things by having an election. My mother used to say to me when I was a boy, "You cannot get away from the devil just by running away from him".

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The Leader of the Opposition tries.

Mr. Thompson: Therefore I think we must face up to the situation we are in and try to come up with a decision.

Mr. Byrne: Safe, again, for a week.

Mr. Thompson: We must try to come up with a decision that will prove to the people that we do have some sense of responsibility left.

Mr. Hellyer: You cannot get rid of the devil by holding on to his hand either.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, it is one thing to make remarks in this house and think we are pretty smart in making them; it is another thing to convince the people that we have any smartness left in us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Thompson: Therefore as we consider the position we are in, in light of what an election at this time might bring about, we find we have two alternatives. We can either say to the government, "You have a chance to go ahead and do something. You have not taken that chance before", or else we can say to the government, "You have had sufficient opportunity, and because you have failed to fulfil your responsibility in that opportunity the only result can be an election at this time". In considering all that has happened during these last few tense days, we in this party continue to stand on our previous policy, which we stated clearly last Wednesday. That is, to go along with a reasonable discussion and debate on the supply motions that are yet to come and on the estimates which are yet to be brought forward, for the simple reason that this money has been spent, for the simple reason that we had nothing to do with the budget in the first place. Yes, and for the basic reason that we can get on with something that is definite, something that concerns the future of the country instead of the past.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, before we adjourned at six o'clock I had stated why we believe that an election at this time is not really a good thing. I will not repeat the reasons for that belief, but I would say this. We have waited for a long time for the government really to get moving in providing the necessary legislative action to meet the needs of our country at this time. We have had a number of resolutions which have not been acted upon. We have much legislation from previous parliaments that we have heard talked about in the speech from the throne, and on different occasions, but we see no program that is actually going to bring this in at the present time. We have all realized, I think, that our parliament is completely out of tune with the fiscal year of the government's administration. Again, this is why we find ourselves in a position without even an interim supply to meet the needs of the government, and we find ourselves crowding in with much haste the estimates from last year and with supply motions for money which has practically all been spent.

For these and other reasons we have reached the point, that we almost reluctantly, shall we say, believe it would be worse for the country in not going to the people to ascertain their will than it would be to prolong the life of this government which is not fulfilling its responsibilities as it should.

We in our party have done all we can towards assisting the bringing in of this legislation. In fact, we have gone the second and the third mile. Last week we made it very clear both in the press and in private discussion that if we could have assurance that the estimates for the new year could be brought down in two weeks and that the budget could be brought down within a reasonable time, we would support the estimates for last year and also the supply motions. To prove this point, when we heard this morning of the resignation of the defence minister we met in caucus, and at one o'clock or a few minutes prior to one o'clock we issued another statement, and if the government had wanted, they could certainly have met the simple things for which we asked. We believe our request was a reasonable request. I believe that we were elected to parliament to see that Canada gets good government. We are trying to carry out our responsibilities, and this was simply a request along that line. At this moment I should like to read what this statement said:

> Social Credit has taken the position since the June 18 election that parliament must serve the interests of Canada.
> The Social Credit party announced at the beginning of this session that it was the duty of all members of parliament from all parties to proceed with their responsibilities.
> Those responsibilities are to provide the government with authority and money to carry on the public affairs of the nation, giving the largest minority the opportunity to govern. We have continuously followed this policy until this time. It must, however, be recognized that this policy is, and was, based on the premise that the government would provide clearcut statement of policy and an appropriate follow up on legislation which has been passed by this parliament and past parliaments.
> We are deeply concerned about the events of the past few days and the reasons that give rise to these events. The statement of the United States state department and the resignation of the minister of national defence are two striking examples resulting from the confusion, indecision and postponement of government policy. This confusion, indecision and postponement are not confined to matters of national defence alone. An election in Canada precipitated by the events of the last three days, with an anti-American overtone, would be a tragedy. The United States is our nearest neighbour and closest friend and only damage could result from an election campaign on this basis.
>
> In considering all that has happened during these last tense days, we would continue to stand on our previous policy which would permit the passage of the necessary supply motions and last year's estimates in order that the new estimates and the current budget could be brought down, if the government would:
> 1. Provide a clearcut statement of defence policy.

This afternoon we heard the resignation of the minister of national defence, but no explanation whatsoever from the Prime Minister of what the policy of the government was, now that the minister of defence had resigned for the reasons he so clearly stated. We also asked that the government agree to bring in the new estimates within two weeks. That is a reasonable request. Third, we also asked that the new budget be brought down within four weeks and that there would be an opportunity for a full budget debate assured. We asked, in the fourth instance, that the government outline a positive program of follow-up action respecting many things for which parliament has already given authority.

We did not intend to issue an ultimatum. We merely stated these points believing that they were reasonable, and were things that the government was expected to deal with not only by this house but also by the people of Canada. In spite of that last minute appeal asking, begging, pleading that the government fulfil the vacuum that has been created because they have not done these things previously, we had no action. We have therefore come to the conclusion that if this is the best the government can give us at this time, then it is time that we go to the people about the matter.

I have no confidence whatsoever that the Liberal party has any alternative that would deal with anything in any better way. Taking into consideration the post-war years alone, they had 12 years when there should have been the greatest prosperity in Canada in all our history.

An hon. Member: There was.

Mr. Thompson: In spite of the fact that this was the environment in which they were administering the affairs of this country, they bungled the affairs of the administration of the country so much that the people of Canada were compelled to turn them out.

The reason why we have come to this conclusion at the present time is simply that I believe the people of Canada expect and deserve something better than what we are giving to them in this house at the present time. Therefore, in amendment to the amendment which has been moved by the leader of the official opposition, seconded by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Marcoux) I move as follows:

That all the words after "government" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"has failed up to this time to give a clear statement of policy respecting Canada's national defence, and has failed to organize the business of the house so that the 1963-64 estimates and budget could be introduced, and has failed to outline a positive program of follow-up action respecting many things for which this parliament and previous parliaments have already given authority, and does not have the confidence of the Canadian people.

The amendment would then read as follows:

This government has failed up to this time to give a clear statement of policy respecting Canada's national defence, and has failed to organize the business of the house so that the 1963-64 estimates and budget could be introduced, and has failed to outline a positive program of follow-up action respecting many things for which this parliament and previous parliaments have already given authority, and does not have the confidence of the Canadian people.

It is not my intention, Mr. Speaker, to prolong this debate on our part except to say that we sincerely regret that we have not been able to give leadership to the administration of the public affairs of this country in a better way. It is not sufficient that we just try to build each other up by knocking each other down. What we must have is a positive, constructive approach to our problems. Let us remember that a wrong decision is probably not as bad as no decision at all.

[Mr. Thompson.]

What we shall be accused of in this house of minorities in this twenty fifth parliament, as I believe history will record it, is that we were unable to come to decisions that would transform policies into action. Therefore we have failed the electorate who put us here.

I believe that the only way in which we can possibly correct this situation is to go back to the people and ask them for a new mandate, trusting that they will have seen the folly in both of the old parties. The awakening realization that Canada in these changing times needs to reaffirm her stand on the basic elements of democracy, needs to come to grips with the application of those principles on which I believe we in this house all agree. It means to adapt our methods so that they will fit the conditions so that that which we are able to produce, whether it be goods or services, in whatever realm or whatever kind we think of, is available to the Canadian people according to their willingness to work, their enterprise and their pioneering spirit.

While I say I am disappointed with this house of minorities in this twenty fifth parliament, I have much conviction, hope, and assurance with regard to the Canadian people. I believe that Canada is a great nation and that, without exception, Canada has one of the greatest peoples in the world. We have heard words this afternoon about the great heritages that have been carried into confederation and passed on to us today through the mother races which came together in confederation. On top of that there has been added the cultural heritage and the pioneering spirit and the determination of millions of new Canadians to live as free men. I think we can set an example to the world if only we had a government that gave leadership that would lead us forward during the next four years and prove to the world that people can live together and move forward in the development not only of its human but its material resources. It was this confidence and this assurance that gave me the spirit and the will to go forward to try to make some contribution to the public affairs of our nation and of this world. If the experiment which is Canada should fail, what hope is there for peace and the peaceful development of the world? I maintain that there is none. Therefore as we stand at this critical threshold in the history of our nation and in our responsibilities to this parliament, I believe that each one of us must look upon these things mighty carefully and realize our responsibility as leaders. We are leaders in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I regret interrupting the hon. member but I must inform him that the clock has imposed sanctions.

Mr. Thompson: If I may, I will just finish this sentence.

An hon. Member: Carry on.

Mr. Thompson: The very fact that thousands of people elected us, sent each one of us here, indicates to me that we are leaders. Therefore we must go out and prove to Canada that we are leaders worthy of the confidence they have placed in us, that we might carry out our part in the ever increasing and important role of public administration as it relates to the over-all picture. We have therefore come to this decision which I have now made clear, namely that our only alternative is to go back to the people for an expression of their will.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I felt that the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) said some things with which I cannot help but agree. He said that Canada is a great nation and that we are one of the greatest peoples on earth. Since that, I assume, includes me, I feel flattered by his words and agree with him. It is the kind of peroration which is bound to get unanimous agreement. I might also say, Mr. Speaker, before becoming more serious, that the hon. member does not cease to astound me. When he read almost the whole of the editorial on the front page of the Globe and Mail before dinner it was obvious that he was going to be against an election taking place now. He then went to dinner and whether he ate something that agreed with him or ate something that disagreed with him—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Lewis: —I am not sure which, Mr. Speaker—he changed his mind, as he has a right to do. I merely mention it as a matter of amusement on this day of debate, which may be one of the last days of debate in this parliament.

An hon. Member: Be serious.

Mr. Lewis: I will be serious in a moment—not only serious, may I inform my hon. friend, but relevant to the issues that face Canada and the world, instead of the nonsense that we hear from across the way.

On a number of occasions we of the New Democratic party have indicated to the house and to the people that we have no confidence in the government. I do not think there is anyone here or elsewhere in any doubt about that. But I ask you, sir, to look at the omnibus amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) and, indeed, at the omnibus subamendment moved by the leader of the Social Credit party. I suggest to you that this is further evidence that the Liberals are so hungry for power they are not concerned with dealing with any specific matter that this house ought to be considering and on which this house ought to be asked to declare its mind. I will come to that specific matter in particular a little later. It also proves, I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the leader of the Social Credit party is so concerned with portraying an image to this house and to the country that he was not able, either, to place before the house some specific and concrete issue on which our votes should be cast.

An hon. Member: Oh, come off it.

Mr. Lewis: Why not a specific point? Why not have some specific policy? Unfortunately it is not possible for me on behalf of the New Democratic party to move an amendment embodying such a specific policy. Why not some specific policy on which we can declare our stand? As the Leader of the Opposition was speaking I could not help but notice with what glee, as well as a broad smile, he stated that his objective is to get this parliament home and this government out, and with what tremendous joy his followers behind him banged their desks, as if to get rid of this or any other particular government is the be-all and end-all of the exercises in this parliament and of the duties of members of parliament.

I have voted against this government and no doubt I shall have the opportunity to do so again. My party will greet any chance to go to the people and present our policies with the same satisfaction that we have always had in the past.

An hon. Member: Self-satisfaction.

Mr. Lewis: If we have the chance we will put before them what in our conscience we believe Canada and the Canadian people require, and if my hon. friend will wait he will see exactly what we will do with the chance when the time comes.

I suggest it is not enough for the benches opposite the treasury benches to talk in generalities about leadership and to talk in generalities about the indecision of the government. The party that is now the official opposition to the government was in power for 22 years and particularly from 1948 and 1949 to 1957, when the Leader of the Opposition was one of the most prominent members of the government then in power, we had the most do-nothing government in the history of Canada. This was the government which when faced with the needs of the elderly people of Canada, when faced with the duty to do something for those who had offered their lives for this country, felt itself satisfied, in a day of such prosperity that they still boast about it, to give them $6 a month. These people, Mr. Speaker, talk to this parliament and to the country about leadership, decisiveness, imagination and boldness; people who have shown throughout the years such adherence to the shibboleths and the blindness of the establishment in the present society; as to have condemned themselves as incapable of leadership before or now or in the future.

What is that leadership about which the Leader of the Opposition talks? Everyone in this house knows that an election is bound to come. It is bound to come within days or within weeks. Everybody in this country knows that, and now that the leader of the Social Credit party has had dinner it may come within days rather than within weeks. Everybody in Canada knows that; everybody in Canada understands that; but what in my experience the people of Canada do not understand is the timid manoeuvring of the government in the last while to avoid defeat at any cost instead of presenting to parliament and to the people a program on which they would be prepared to go down, if go down they must, having made some real attempt to serve this country.

What the people also do not understand is the Liberals' indecent haste to scramble over to the treasury benches, not on any positive program which they present but on the growing disgust of the Canadian people with the inaction and indecision of the government.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. gentleman would permit me to ask a question?

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Pickersgill: Why is the hon. gentleman so sure that the Liberal party will win the election?

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted a personal remark about a gentleman for whose friendship I have great regard—and I hope it continues—I have learned since being a member of this house that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) would rather make some kind of political remark, relevant or irrelevant, than discuss anything of value or of substance, and the temptation to make political remarks is typical of his questions. Not only am I not sure that the Liberals will win the next election, I am confident the Liberals will not win the next election. The sad fact of the present Canadian political situation is that the people of Canada from coast to coast—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Will the hon. member yield the floor to an hon. lady?

Mr. Lewis: What else can I do in view of your question, Mr. Speaker?

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Speaker, I wish to inquire of the hon. member if he is sufficiently confident the Liberals will not win the next election to put it to the test tomorrow night by voting against the government and for the amendment.

Mr. Lewis: There is another remark, Mr. Speaker, that so completely proves one of the points I am trying to make, that the hunger of that bench to become this bench overrides every other consideration. It reminds me, Mr. Speaker, of nothing more than what I read in 1958 about the way the Leader of the Opposition simply said to the Prime Minister, "Please move over; I want to take your place."

I suggest to this house that there is one issue which has emerged in the last few days which has become the most important one in Canada, indeed the most important one which Canadians will ever face. I suggest to you that above all people the Leader of the Opposition, who made a definite statement on the policy of nuclear weapons the other day —I am referring to the first one, before he retraced and retracted—as a man of great experience and great accomplishment in the field of international relations, should have placed before this house clearly the question of nuclear weapons so that we would tell the government what the majority of us believes in connection with this matter of life and death. He should have placed that before this house, instead of the general gaff about the breakdown of unity in the cabinet and lack of leadership, or the general gaff of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) about a clear policy—

Mr. Thompson: Defence policy, say it.

Mr. Lewis: —defence policy being required. I am going to show the hon. gentleman in five minutes, if he will give me a chance, that there is no doubt about the government's policy on nuclear weapons. If he followed the speeches in this house, if he bothered to read the letter of the minister who resigned this morning and the reply of the Prime Minister, he would know that, too.

Mr. Thompson: Somebody else interpreting policy.

Mr. Lewis: I am not interpreting policy, I am just reading the policy given out and I commend to the hon. member for Red Deer to do the same. It would help him, to read some of these things.

We, of the New Democratic party, do not for one moment hide our anxiety, our concern, our deep-seated worry about the question of nuclear weapons in the world. We believe that is the most important issue facing Canada today.

Mr. Gregoire: After unemployment.

Mr. Lewis: Not after unemployment, I say to the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Gregoire), because there will be no chance for employment or unemployment if some people in this world get the opportunity to let loose some nuclear missiles. The question for mankind, whether or not questions on international affairs are such as to get votes, is the problem of nuclear weapons. I would have preferred and my colleagues would have preferred if this house had before it a clear-cut amendment which said, "In our view, we reject the idea of nuclear weapons".

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, one need not be an expert in military affairs to know that nuclear war is not the kind of war about which histories have been written in the past. Nuclear war is annihilation. We are talking about total destruction when we talk about nuclear war. I suggest—and you may call it an emotional issue if you like—this fact about nuclear war meaning total destruction, total annihilation, must be seared into our minds and into our hearts when we discuss international questions today.

I suggest to you also that one need not be an expert in military affairs to know that there is no defence in nuclear war; that there is no defence against nuclear missiles; that there is only the possibility of massive retaliation. There is only the possibility of saying to the other side, to put it in simple, every-day language, "If I go, I will take you with me." This is all the defence there is in the threat of nuclear war.

President Kennedy has said this. Premier Khrushchev has stated it. Our Prime Minister has repeated it. The Leader of the Opposition has said it. I urge this parliament, it is time we based our policies on that fact, that there is no defence against nuclear war. The fearful nightmare of a nuclear deterrent gives us some time—I do not know how long, no one knows—to find a policy that will lead an anxious world to peace. What can Canada's contribution be in that respect? It should be, in our view, a non-nuclear role in the western alliance, staying in NATO and giving our best to those with whom we are allied in this world. It will not do for any member in this house, as the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) did the other night, to shout across, "You do not believe in NATO", and think that thereby he has switched the issue from nuclear weapons to NATO. His statement was not true. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas), my leader, made that clear the other day in answer to a question from, I think, the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Wahn). He said, and I repeat for our party, that we want Canada to remain a part of NATO, to remain a part of the western alliance and to make its best contribution in that alliance, a contribution with conventional forces.

Our reasons for that, Mr. Speaker, were stated by the Prime Minister the other day when he said, as reported on page 3129 of Hansard:

> More and more the nuclear deterrent is becoming of such a nature that more nuclear arms will add nothing material to our defences.

The Prime Minister quoted the Leader of the Opposition as having said precisely the same thing on many occasions. I quote from the bottom of page 3133 of Hansard and the top of 3134 where the Prime Minister is referring to the Leader of the Opposition as having been reported in the Ottawa Journal of January 10, 1961 as follows:

> Any extension of the possession of nuclear weapons under individual national control will greatly increase the danger of accidental outbreak of nuclear war and also the difficulty of achieving disarmament.

The Leader of the Opposition was reported as having said this and the report continued:

> Membership in the nuclear club, therefore, should not be extended beyond the four countries which now possess such weapons ... Canada cannot deny nuclear weapons to other nations and at the same time arm her own forces with them.

Then the report went on to say, according to the Prime Minister as reported on page 3134 of Hansard:

> A new Liberal government, therefore, should not acquire, manufacture or use such weapons under separate Canadian control or under joint United States-Canadian control.

I am not quoting that for the same purpose as the Prime Minister; I am not throwing it back at the Leader of the Opposition to show he changed his mind. He had as much right to change his mind as the hon. member for Red Deer had to change his. I am quoting that to ask, Mr. Speaker, what has happened since January, 1961? The only thing that I know has happened since January, 1961, is that every military expert in the United States, including the secretary of state, the secretary of defence and the assistant secretaries of those departments have come to the conclusion that nuclear tactical weapons in NATO, in Europe, are now much more useless and dangerous. Those are the words used by Henry Kissinger. They can serve no useful purpose.

That is all that has happened. What has happened since January 1961, is that the Soviet union has shown a little bit of flexibility with regard to inspection of nuclear disarmament and that the major powers are a step nearer to the possibility of a test ban, and perhaps even disarmament of nuclear weapons.

That is what has happened since January 1961, and it should have led the Liberal party and its leader to continue in the policy that he espoused in 1961. Instead of this he has turned that policy upside down.

What reasons does he give? Does he argue that nuclear weapons in Canada would strengthen the western alliance? Does he suggest they would strengthen our deterrent force? Does he say that their acquisition would make Khrushchev and the Soviet union tremble more? No, all he says is that in his view Canada made a commitment, it should therefore now honour its commitment, and as soon as he becomes prime minister he will negotiate Canada out of the commitment it should now honour.

I respectfully submit, Mr. Speaker, that in all my life of political discussion and debate, and in all my life of reading the thoughts of other men I have seldom come across anything so irresponsible, indeed if I might use the term, so puerile—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lewis: —as to suggest to take the serious step of increasing the membership of the nuclear club, in order that the day after you have done so, you can reverse the policy and get out. What nonsense on the part of a man who aspires to become the prime minister of Canada, and who was once secretary of state for external affairs.

The reason for our position, Mr. Speaker, was also stated the other day by the secretary of defence in the United States, Mr. McNamara, as reported in the Globe and Mail of January 31. He is reported as having said that tactical nuclear weapons in the hands of NATO allies increase the possibility of a nuclear escalation, once these weapons are used.

These are the reasons why we oppose nuclear weapons in the hands of Canadian forces: it makes no material improvement in our defence position; it makes no material improvement in the defence position of the west. It does not, in effect, strengthen the western deterrent, but it does increase the nuclear club, increases the danger of nuclear war and increases the danger of escalation to total nuclear war if tactical nuclear weapons were used in Europe.

I say that when the state department's statement, which caused such a furore last week, said Canada's acquisition of nuclear weapons would not increase the nuclear club, it was simply talking nonsense, unless the state department of the United States intends to have complete and exclusive control of the nuclear weapons which we place in the hands of our forces. If that were so, then we would not join the nuclear club, nor would we have any independence left. But if the Leader of the Opposition is right when he said that our finger will be on the safety catch while the United States' finger is on the trigger, then the nuclear club is increased because we would have some control over the nuclear weapons. For that reason, and other reasons, it will make our role in disarmament more difficult and this is another ground on which we oppose the acquisition of nuclear weapons for Canada.

It has been suggested in the subamendment before us, and again and again by spokesmen for the Liberals, that the government's policy is not clear. I suggest to the house, with sadness and with sorrow, that the government's policy is only too clear and that it is a policy exactly the same as the policy of the Liberal party, namely, in favour of Canada acquiring nuclear weapons. In that connection I want to put on record most of the letter which was filed this morning by the Prime Minister, the letter of resignation of the former minister of national defence. He says in the second paragraph of that letter:

> During the past two weeks particularly, I have made absolutely clear what I considered the minimum position I could accept, and several times have offered to resign unless it was agreed to.

I ask hon. members to follow the next sentence carefully.

> It has become quite obvious during the last few days that your views and mine as to the course we should pursue for the acquisition of nuclear weapons for our armed forces are not capable of reconciliation, thus it is with a great deal of regret that I now find I must tender my resignation as Minister of National Defence.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member did not say that he and the Prime Minister disagreed on the question of acquisition of nuclear weapons. What he said was that he and the Prime Minister could not agree on the course which is to be pursued for the acquisition of nuclear weapons. The Prime Minister, in answering this letter of resignation, very significantly does not correct the statement by the former minister, but simply says in the final paragraph of his letter:

> When I concluded my speech, you shook my hand and expressed your approval. From the position I took in the House of Commons on that day, I have not deviated. Since you approved it then, and since you later made it clear in your speech of January 31st, as reported in Hansard at page 3322 and following pages, that you supported my stand, I am at a loss to understand your suggestion now that your views and mine are not in agreement. We were on January 25th and January 31st. My views have not changed. Between then and Sunday you must have changed yours.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that if you read the two letters together, as I have put these two paragraphs on record, what you clearly have is a decision by this government to acquire nuclear weapons for Canadian forces. The only difference between the former minister of national defence and the Prime Minister is that the Prime Minister wants to take a little time before he makes that specific and clear statement, as the former minister apparently wanted him to do. It is of no consequence whatsoever whether nuclear weapons are accepted now or three months from now because everyone in the house, including the Prime Minister, well knows that the NATO council meeting next May is not going to decide on NATO nuclear forces. Everyone knows that President de Gaulle of France and several other obstacles have to be removed before the policy President Kennedy has talked about can become at all practical, and that is not likely to happen for a good long time.

I submit that on this issue of nuclear weapons, as on every other issue we have had any experience with, the government—the Conservatives—and the Liberals hold exactly the same policy and make exactly the same proposals to Canada.

I repeat again that this issue of nuclear weapons for Canada, the role Canada will play in international affairs; the role we are playing in NATO as a leading smaller country trying to get some sense into the international cauldron; the role which we can play in drawing around us the uncommitted nations of the world and thereby bring some real pressure to bear on the United States and the Soviet union for a sane policy towards peace; the role which we, as a country that does not have an imperialist background and history, the role which we can play in holding the confidence of all the new nations and developing nations of Africa, Asia and South America; all these constitute the major issue before this parliament and this country.

My sadness, which I have expressed on previous occasions in the house derives from the fact that this question of nuclear weapons, like other pressing issues, gets such cavalier treatment from men of responsibility from one side of the house as well as from the other, from the fact that we are satisfied with making debating points against each other instead of seriously considering a question involving life and death for mankind the world over.

I submit that if this parliament this evening, in its last hours or days, can serve the purpose of declaring itself determined to follow an independent foreign policy for this country, of declaring itself determined to speak its mind no matter whether our friends agree with us or not, of declaring itself determined to lead a crusade, and nothing less, across this world against the threat of a nuclear holocaust; if this parliament in the last few hours or few days of its existence had the courage and vision to do that, it would accomplish more than it could possibly have accomplished trying to deal in the generalities the amendment and the sub-amendment have suggested.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), who has just preceded me, in an eloquent speech has dealt very boldly with the subject which was uppermost in the minds of the people today. It is rather surprising that this subject was avoided by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) when he had his great opportunity in this session to deal with a subject of major interest.

An hon. Member: He was chicken.

Mr. Churchill: Last week when we were dealing with the business of the house I suggested that the topic he wished to discuss on that occasion might be better dealt with on Monday and Tuesday of this week, when it would be possible to move a motion and reach a conclusion with regard to a very important subject. The Leader of the Opposition on that occasion dodged, as he so frequently does, that issue and although the opportunity came again today, he avoided the issue.

An hon. Member: He hasn't had his orders yet.

Mr. Churchill: The motion that is put before us on this supply motion is one of those omnibus motions which run contrary to the rules which should be applied—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: —on a supply motion, but it has been allowed and consequently we have several subjects before us for discussion. I intend to deal with that portion of the speech of the Leader of the Opposition and the leader of the Social Credit party which dealt with the allegation of confusion and indecision; the allegation of the failure to organize the business of the house, the failure to outline a positive program of follow-up action, and things of that nature.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What about defence policy?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, what about defence policy? It is in the motion.

An hon. Member: Be quiet. He will give you defence policy in a moment.

Mr. Churchill: Defence policy is a subject on which I would welcome debate with the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin).

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That would be a pleasure.

Mr. Churchill: He will perhaps recall that in the days when we were in opposition he did not participate in the defence debates of this house—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We had a good government in those days.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: —and I doubt very much if he will participate effectively in any debate on defence policy.

Mr. Woolliams: I would think the scandal of Hong Kong would still be around his neck.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You don't know what is going to be around your neck.

Mr. Churchill: The Leader of the Opposition has accused the government of lack of decision. There is no man in Canada so decisive in indecision as the Leader of the Opposition. I know of no subject which he has debated—and I have listened to him here for 12 years—with regard to which he has not been on both sides of the subject. He tries to give the appearance of boldness. He talks about boldness. It is the boldness of a rabbit. He talks about action, "Let us have action". The action that he shows is action in retreat. That is what happened today; he dodged the issue; he retreated and evaded the topic that he was so keen to discuss the other day. He has suggested that there is confusion and indecision in dealing with the business of the house, and I have been waiting for several sessions to deal with this subject—

Mr. Teillet: That is normal for you.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: This is the first opportunity I have had to deal with the organization of the business of the house, despite the criticisms session after session about the business of the house, and I would suggest to some hon. members opposite that I will publicly expose them if they are not very careful—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: —because if they talk to me—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Churchill: —because if they talk to me about changing the order of business of the house I will indicate to the house the people from the various parties who have come to me and asked me to set aside certain pieces of business because they were going to be away the next day.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Churchill: I have accommodated them on almost every occasion, because that is one of the amenities of parliamentary life.

Mr. Crestohl: How very gallant.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, it has been suggested to us by the leader of the Social Credit party that there has been a failure in organizing the business of the house. The words of his amendment are:

> —and has failed to organize the business of the house so that the 1963-64 estimates and budget could be introduced.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Nowlan) has indicated that the estimates for 1963-64 will be introduced very, very soon. He has indicated time and again that the budget for 1963-64 will be brought down earlier than is usual.

Mr. Matheson: What about the estimates for last year?

Mr. Churchill: Surely that would satisfy any hon. member in this house.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Churchill: In the course of his remarks he said that we need really to get moving to provide the necessary legislation. Well, Mr. Speaker, the question of the legislation of the House of Commons is a matter of considerable importance, and in this cover which I hold in my hand is the legislative program of the house for this session, with two or three more bills to come.

Mr. Pearson: Does that include the divorce bills?

Mr. Churchill: The legislative program was outlined in the speech from the throne. The bills following up that program have been introduced in this house, and here they are. They have been waiting for weeks for the house to get on with them.

An hon. Member: Why don't you get on with them?

Mr. Churchill: The opposition has not given us the chance that we would like to have.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: You may laugh now, but you will not laugh by the time I have finished, because I will demonstrate how you have consumed and wasted the time of the house. I will demonstrate that you have used obstruction to prevent the business of the house being conducted as it should have been conducted. On the order paper right now, if people would look at it, are 30 items which have already been introduced and are waiting there for debate. The bills accompanying them are already in this cover. They have been printed and distributed, with the exception of those which are introduced by way of resolution; that is to say, the money bills that are preceded by a resolution. The suggestion has been made, with regard to the estimates, that we should be further ahead with them. Well, let me point out this. Each year the estimates for the ensuing fiscal year are tabled, supply motions are moved and passed, the estimates are called forward and the house deals with them as the opportunity arises. Last spring the opposition spent 27 days, which is a record in the history in parliament in Canada, dealing with supplementary estimates for the preceding fiscal year.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Churchill: They refused to let us get on with the main estimates for the year 1962-63.

Mr. Pickersgill: They were all new programs.

An hon. Member: Irresponsibility.

Mr. Churchill: Complete irresponsibility. In the session which started in September, up to the present time we have had available for discussion in the committee six departments; we have had three of those departments up for consideration—agriculture, external affairs and labour—and not one single estimate of any one of those three departments has been passed by this house.

Mr. Ricard: Not one single item.

Mr. Churchill: No, not one single item. The other day at five o'clock after discussing labour estimates for two full days I asked the committee please to continue and pass item number one.

Mr. Pearson: On unemployment.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The most important question facing Canada.

Mr. Churchill: I was refused. That is the way the estimates have been handled by the opposition: six departments waiting for consideration for over two months and not one single item passed. Just before Christmas, when I wanted to bring the main estimates in front of the house during the last six days before the Christmas vacation, the opposition saw fit to spend those six days discussing interim supply, when they should have been on the main estimates.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. gentleman permit me to ask him a question? Would the hon. gentleman tell us how many estimates were called between July 25 and September 27 when this parliament should have been meeting?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) on occasion makes an effective contribution to debate. Tonight he is certainly not at his best.

Mr. Speaker, it has been customary during recent years to have six supply motions. On the first supply motion, six departments are called, on the next five supply motions three departments are called, and so on. Prior to just a few years ago there was no limitation on the number of supply motions; but the rule has been altered and that is the way it stands at the moment. The house is master of its own rules and those rules can be temporarily altered in order to expedite the business of the house. The house can move very quickly if it wants to. Just prior to the Christmas recess I suggested to the house that if it would give unanimous consent we might deal with five small bills which were in front of us.

Mr. Pickersgill: That was suggested by the opposition.

Mr. Churchill: At my prompting.

Mr. Pearson: Look at the record.

Mr. Churchill: The house dealt with these five bills in about an hour and a half's time. The house can move very quickly if it desires. If it does not desire it will drag its feet and obstruct.

An hon. Member: Like the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson).

Mr. Olson: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Churchill: Surely.

Mr. Olson: Might I ask him why he did not come to the meeting they asked for to organize the business of the house prior to Christmas, when all the leaders of the opposition parties agreed to come, and it was not called for over a week?

Mr. Churchill: I am glad you reminded me of the meeting which was held among the leaders before Christmas, because the Leader of the Opposition asked today, why did we not reassemble the house earlier in January?

Mr. Pickersgill: Why didn't you?

Alleged Lack of Government Leadership

Mr. Churchill: For the simple reason that the Leader of the Opposition and the leaders of the other parties sitting together agreed that the Christmas recess would run until January 21.

Mr. Pearson: It was your responsibility. Who is running the house?

Mr. Churchill: I should like to consider now the question of interim supply. Interim supply has loomed very largely in the mind of the house recently, and I think the Leader of the Opposition threatened us today—did he not?—with regard to the next interim supply.

Mr. Pearson: Oh, no.

Mr. Churchill: "Wait till Wednesday", he said, "when interim supply is likely to be called, and then you're for it".

Mr. Pearson: Who said that?

An hon. Member: The Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Churchill: The history of interim supply is simply this. In every session which starts, say, in January or February, interim supply is granted for the month of April, for the month of May, for the month of June, and sometimes running into July. It is granted month by month until the main estimates are past the house. There is nothing unusual about that. That is done and has been done year after year since parliament first met. Normally, 99 per cent of the time, interim supply is passed in about 30 minutes because it is just a grant of money to pay wages and salaries to keep things going until the main estimates can be considered. In an election year, it is a little different. In an election year when the house stands adjourned for two months it has been customary to grant interim supply for a much longer period.

If you want to look at the record and understand the operation of interim supply in the course of an election year, it is a very easy thing to do. I can give you the record of interim supply for four years in which elections were held. In the year 1945 the house assembled in the spring. An election was held in June and the house reassembled in the fall. The same was done in 1949 with an election in June. In 1957 there was an election in June and in 1962 there was an election in June. If you look at the way in which the estimates were handled in those four calendar years you will find that parliament passed interim supply for a nine month period in 1945 before the main estimates were dealt with. In 1945 the opposition was a responsible opposition; it was the Conservative party. In December of that year they dealt with the estimates in co-operation with the government very quickly and passed them in a very short time. In fact, in the last six days of December that year they passed most of the estimates, but they sat long hours late at night past midnight and early in the morning. In 1949 interim supply was granted for eight months. Again there was a responsible opposition, the Conservative party, and that responsible opposition, co-operating with the government of the day, passed the main estimates in the last few days of the session in the fall of that year. They took 15 days to pass the estimates.

I suggest to you that that situation should have prevailed in the year 1962. There was a spring session, then an election in June, and then a fall session. A responsible opposition would have co-operated with the government and passed the main estimates in the fall of 1962.

Mr. Pearson: There was only one supply motion.

Mr. Churchill: But they would not do it. They obstructed and they refused.

Mr. Pearson: Why did you not bring them in?

Mr. Churchill: I have just told you that we brought in six departments in the fall, and not one single item of those departments has yet passed this house. Had there been a responsible opposition—

Mr. Douglas: May I ask the minister how often the departments were called?

An hon. Member: Once.

Mr. Churchill: I am glad the hon. member is interested in this subject. Those six departments were called after the first supply motion.

Mr. Pearson: Once.

Mr. Churchill: The Department of Agriculture was before us for three days. That discussion took place. I mentioned earlier that the estimates would have been up for consideration again except for the fact that the opposition devoted six whole days to interim supply just prior to Christmas, something which could have been passed in 30 minutes.

There is a responsibility resting on all parties in this house. The leader of the Social Credit party mentioned that matter in his address prior to the supper hour. He said there was a responsibility to get the business done. He said there was a responsibility to the people of Canada not to indulge in political by-play but to deal with the business. That responsibility lies largely with the opposition. All the government can do is this. It indicates its legislative program in the speech from the throne when that speech is presented. Then it brings forward its bills for discussion by the house and I have indicated the number that are on the order paper. It introduces the estimates. However, the time that is spent on legislation and on the estimates is something that is solely within the hands of the opposition.

Mr. Matheson: May I ask the minister if he would not agree that what Canada needs is a better opposition?

Mr. Churchill: May I say this to the hon. member: You will learn if you stay there, and you will be there for a long time. Perhaps the hon. member and his friends will become a responsible opposition with several more years of training, and we are prepared to give it to them.

I have heard from members of this house and I have read in the newspapers that the government should bring down its legislation and that the government should get on with its business. However, the government cannot do more than put the business before this house. The opposition controls the time spent on it.

An hon. Member: Obstruction.

Mr. Hellyer: You should read the rest of that editorial.

Mr. Churchill: If just prior to Christmas the opposition could pass five bills in one and a half hours, why can they not pass the main estimates for this year in, say, 15 days as was done in 1949?

Mr. McIlraith: The government has never submitted them.

Mr. Pearson: You have not brought them in.

Mr. McIlraith: You refused to call the house when you should have called it.

Mr. Crestohl: Six billion dollars.

Mr. Churchill: I want to make one point very clear and I hope the public of Canada will realize it and correct some of the erroneous editorials that appear.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Like today's?

Mr. Churchill: The government does not control the length of a session of the House of Commons; it is controlled by the opposition. In the session of 1960-61 the opposition spent 60 days in discussing the main estimates.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Churchill: In the session of 1953-54 when we were the official opposition, 30 days sufficed for a discussion of the estimates. That is the difference between a responsible opposition and an irresponsible opposition.

Mr. Robichaud: In those days there were more responsible estimates.

Mr. Crestohl: You will become a responsible opposition.

Mr. Churchill: The responsibility of the House of Commons may be divided into three main sections. The first is the business that is set by the rules. I refer to the fixed debates, including the debate on the speech from the throne, the budget debate, the debate on supply motions and things of that nature set by the rules. We have no control at all over that business. If ten days are allowed by the rules for the speech from the throne, the opposition will use the ten days, unless it is very responsible and cuts the time short. The same thing is true with respect to the budget debate.

Mr. Pearson: We did that.

Mr. Churchill: The second main division is legislation. We bring forward the bills. They are discussed in the house. The third main division is the passing of the estimates or the voting of supply to Her Majesty. These are the three main divisions. Time is allotted among those three divisions. I suggest that there is no control whatsoever in the hands of the government with regard to the time spent on that business of the House of Commons unless, as was done by the Liberal government in 1956, freedom of speech was denied to the House of Commons by the imposition of closure. No one of the three parties in opposition is free from the need for some self-examination with regard to obstructing the business of this house. I would suggest to the New Democratic party that they should look a second time at the 500 divorce bills which are sitting on the order paper. Because of obstruction not one single divorce measure was passed in the year 1962. That is not the government's fault. We bring the business before the house; the opposition determines whether or not it shall be passed.

I suggest that the business of the house has been properly organized. Let me say to the leader of the Social Credit party that when a bill is introduced into the house in the resolution stage, the resolution is passed, first reading is given and the bill is then distributed. You cannot immediately go ahead to a second reading unless there is unanimous consent. Then you have second reading stage, followed by consideration in committee of the whole house, and you cannot immediately have third reading of the bill unless the house gives unanimous consent. Consequently you cannot start with a bill and keep going with it until you end it, because of these changes that must take place and the postponement of the measure from one day to another. This is done for a definite and good reason, namely so that everybody has an opportunity to study the legislation and so that it will not be rushed through the house with a lack of careful attention. Hence when the question is asked, "Why don't you start with a bill and keep going with it until it is finished?", my answer is that it just cannot be done. The situation is the same with regard to other matters. You cannot have estimates on Monday and Tuesday without a motion to go into supply, unless there is unanimous consent to dispense with it. The rules set these things out. They impose a certain restriction on freedom of action in arranging the order of business. That is why the procedure is sometimes a little bit confusing to people who are new to this institution.

I suggest that the leader of the Social Credit party, in introducing his amendment, has failed to recognize the things that have been done in arranging the order of business of this house. When he suggests there has not been a positive program of follow-up action respecting many things passed in this parliament and earlier parliaments, I suggest that he is overlooking the five and a half year record of the best and most comprehensive legislation ever passed by any government in the history of the country. He is brushing to one side the whole agricultural program that has been put on the statute books and made effective over the years, cash advances for farm stored grain and the stabilization of prices of farm products. He is overlooking the Export Credits Insurance Act under which the amount of money available has been doubled and redoubled in size over the years, all done by legislation to stimulate our export trade. He is overlooking the program of winter works which has done more to afford employment in the wintertime than any program ever devised by any government.

He talks about not following up legislation. What about the vocational training program? Technical schools are being built right across the country to provide training facilities for our young people. He talks about not following up our program. What about the National Housing Act, the tremendous amendments made to that act and the enormous number of houses built year after year in this country? The list of valuable legislation placed on the statute books in the last five and a half years would take me a whole hour to recite and it would be so easy to point out how effective has been the positive action followed as a result of these statutes.

Give us a chance with the legislation this year. The Atlantic development board bill was passed just before Christmas after some debate. The board has been set up. We are waiting to get the national economic development board in operation, but the house has seen fit to spend four days on that bill within the last two weeks. The national economic development board is one of the long range projects for the future. We are prepared to move ahead with it if we are given the opportunity.

So it goes down the line. The legislation that set up the national energy board is another example, and together with the declaration of a national oil policy has brought millions of dollars into this country. The shipping subsidy has stimulated shipyards throughout the country. All of these things are based on legislation. When the leader of the Social Credit party says "why do you not follow up your legislation with positive action" he has forgotten completely the change in the status of living of our old age pensioners, the change for the better with regard to our disability pensioners and those receiving war veterans allowances and the change for the better in our hospitals across the country.

All of these things are founded upon legislation passed by parliament. If parliament will get down to business and pass the legislation we have ready for it there will be further positive action. Last year the War Veterans Allowance Act was amended. There are 50,000 war veterans on farms across this country who are helped by this legislation. The Farm Credit Corporation was set up by legislation just a year or two ago and thousands of farmers are benefiting from it.

I suggest to the hon. member, who takes a very keen interest in the work of parliament, that he examine the legislation that was passed in those other years and the legislation before us now and he will find that positive action has resulted. This government has not been inactive. This government has been active. This government under great leadership has done more for Canada in five and a half years than any preceding government.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, for the last 40 minutes the leader of the house has been giving the house the business.

An hon. Member: Let us get it done.

Mr. Hellyer: If he was as good at giving us the business in advance as he is in giving it in arrears we could have our whole year's work done by now and be on our way home. I should like to make two points very clear. First of all, Mr. Speaker, it is the government, not the opposition, which has the responsibility of introducing the work of this House of Commons.

Mr. Starr: It is all introduced.

Mr. Hellyer: It is the government that decides what business has priority.

Mr. Hees: There is the book; look at it.

An hon. Member: Divorce bills.

Mr. Hellyer: The second point I should like to make clear is that the government can introduce a budget in the house any time it wants to do so and I hope it will do so before dissolution. It is not necessary to have completed the estimates for the previous year, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) has tried to mislead the people of the country into believing.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Hellyer: There will be no excuse for not having introduced a budget if there are things in that proposed budget which would be beneficial to the growth and development of this country.

Mr. Hamilton: The greatest growth rate in the world last year.

Mr. Hellyer: So far as the business of the house is concerned, if the government had brought in the supply motions in the fall months and had had the house consider estimates, then the time could have been spent in dealing with estimates instead of being spent on interim supply. The minister would now have no complaint whatsoever if he had been master of his own job and had introduced business into this house in a logical way, the way it should have been. If that had been done the government would now be well on with the estimates, would possibly have them passed and would not find itself hoist on its own petard.

An hon. Member: Who wrote your speech?

Another hon. Member: Twenty seven days on interim supply.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, this is in many respects an historic day. A minister of the crown has resigned due to the bungling and indecision of the government of which he was a member until today.

Mr. McPhillips: Why did Ralston resign?

Mr. Hellyer: The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness) is an honourable man. I have no doubt that he exerted all the patience and perseverance he possibly could, but then he was tested to the breaking point and put into an intolerable position by his leader, the Prime Minister of this country. Finally, in desperation and knowing that the government is incapable of decision on the most important issues facing the country at this time, he took the time honoured and honourable course and tendered his resignation. It is really not surprising if one looks back over the history of the bungling in respect of his own department. We were surprised that after the meeting of the NATO council of ministers in December the then minister of national defence made no report to this house. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green) made his report and gave us part of the truth so we would have part of the picture—

Mr. Green: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Hellyer: —but the then minister of national defence did not report.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paul): Order.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member does not want to be unfair. He must know that the former minister of national defence went on tour to visit the troops in the Gaza strip.

Mr. Chevrier: That is not a point of order at all.

Mr. Hellyer: That is exactly the next point I was going to make. Since his tour of the bases in Europe he has given us no report on what he found when he was there. I, personally, thought that this was a very strange affair, and particularly last week when we had a defence debate and there was the best possible opportunity for him to report on Canada's commitments to NATO and the way we are fulfilling them at the present time. The minister and the government defaulted in not reporting to the house on the whole situation as they found it in Paris in December. Well, Mr. Speaker, I should like very briefly to help fill the gap by doing some of the reporting. I am sorry that it is left to the opposition to do what the government should have done, to report on the state of Canada's commitments to NATO and how they are, in fact, at the moment not being carried out.

An hon. Member: What about the Place Pigalle?

Mr. Hellyer: While one parliamentary press reporter was sleeping cozily in his feather bed, some of us spent our time actively engaged in finding out all we possibly could about the military situation. As hon. members know, we had the privilege of visiting our brigade headquarters at Soest, and also one of the wings of our air division. The air officer commanding came to discuss with us the problems of the air division, and we had a very frank and interesting discussion. Following that, we went on to Paris and spent a week there. We were interviewed by the supreme allied commander of allied forces in Europe. We were briefed by Admiral Smeeton, deputy commander of the Atlantic fleet, by General Calmel deputy chief of staff of supreme allied headquarters. We were given more useful and up to date information on the military situation in NATO, including the Canadian commitment in one week than the Canadian government has given to the people of this country in the last five years. A number of questions have been asked as to what our commitments to NATO are. I realize that this information is presumably classified, but I could never understand why it was, so I am going to take the responsibility tonight of saying what they are.

First of all, Mr. Speaker, we are committed to supplying one division of the army, with one third of it in Europe. The definition of "division" has never been completely agreed upon between Canada and NATO. The NATO definition is two mechanized infantry brigades and one armoured brigade. Our definition is two brigade groups. This is not really a very great difference of opinion in so far as total men and firepower are concerned, and is not very important.

We have agreed, and have maintained for some time in Europe, one brigade group. We have committed one air division which until recently consisted of 12 squadrons representing four wings, two in France and two in Germany. This is now being reduced to eight squadrons in agreement with the NATO council. We have also committed to NATO a number of naval units in the north Atlantic, an aircraft carrier and destroyer escorts. These are made available to the supreme allied commander in the Atlantic when required.

Each of these units, each of these commitments, is assigned a role, a specific job to do. Our brigade group is part of the British army of the Rhine, right in the front line of the defence of the free world, right up next to the line of demarcation between the communist world and our own. This is a section of the front that is not as well reinforced as it should be. One of the most recent suggestions we heard when we were there I should like to repeat for the benefit of the house. It is this: that in respect of the remainder of our commitment in the army, the remainder of our division which is on reserve in Canada, in order to make it effective the heavy equipment and supplies should be stockpiled in Europe where they are readily available. The supreme allied commander said that in his opinion we could not get our reinforcements there in sufficient time in case of an emergency to be of any real use, particularly in those first few critical days when there might be a conventional intervention and when reinforcements would definitely be required.

He has proposed, therefore, and his proposal was adopted at the NATO parliamentary conference, that equipment and supplies for the reserve forces be stockpiled in Europe. I am told by a senior official of the Department of National Defence here that we have been requested to do that. The former minister of national defence said in the house in reply to a question that he had not heard of it. Perhaps this was when the suggestion was coming through official channels. The United States has already undertaken this in respect of its reserves, that is in respect of one division and it proposes to do it for a second.

As an experiment, Mr. Speaker, the United States tried taking one reserve division over to Europe during an exercise last year. They seconded transport aircraft and flew soldiers from the state of Washington and had them on the ground in Frankfurt, Germany in ten and a half hours. This is really a remarkable achievement. It is this type of capacity that the supreme allied commander, now retired, feels is absolutely essential if we are going to have in Europe the strength of forces we really need. This is particularly true in view of the change in strategy in NATO, now referred to as a forward strategy. This means, in effect, that NATO no longer will retire to a prescribed line of defence at the outset of hostilities but will make its best effort to defend every square inch of territory in the free world, including the northern part of Germany, Hamburg and that area.

Well, Mr. Speaker, we are not really doing all we can to make our non-nuclear commitment to NATO effective. Here is a suggestion which would not cost very much. It is urgently recommended by the supreme allied commander, and has not, in fact, been acted upon by the Canadian government. As a matter of fact, it has never been mentioned by the Canadian government and I am sure that most Canadian people have not even heard of it.

The equipment of our brigade group overseas, by and large, was very good. Some of it is getting old, however, and will soon have to be replaced. This is going to involve the expenditure of a considerable amount of money. There were, however, two serious deficiencies. One is an anti-tank missile, which is now on order and the other, which is a very critical deficiency, is an armoured personnel carrier. This is desperately needed because in the exercises last fall the Canadian brigade group found it was unable to go through the fields to operate efficiently against attacking forces which had a tracked capacity, but was confined in fact to the roads because of its limitation to wheeled vehicles. These are things which should be receiving the attention of this government, which should be discussed in this House of Commons, and upon which we should have recommendations. We should know whether the government supports these suggestions or whether it does not, and whether it intends to put up the money to make the necessary policy effective.

In so far as our air division is concerned, Mr. Speaker, the situation is much more urgent and more dangerous. The government of this country agreed on behalf of Canada in the summer of 1959 to adopt for Canada, for its air division overseas, a strike reconnaissance role. Those of us who were in the house at the time remember the debate. The Liberal party opposed the idea of adopting that role. We thought there were other things which Canada could do which were more suited to our capacity. Notwithstanding that, the government continued with its commitment. Four years have now passed and when we were over there in November we found that the first squadron of planes in Zweibrucken was about to be airborne in the following month, December of last year. We were told all eight squadrons of the planes would be there and in place during the calendar year 1963. We were also told that the first squadron was intended to go on target on May 1, 1963 and that in order to go on target a bilateral agreement would have to be signed with the United States by November 1 last because of the length of time, approximately six months, required for the technical details to be worked out for the equipment to be put in place and for the airmen to be trained.

Well, Mr. Speaker, NATO headquarters in Europe puts a very high priority on that particular project. The infrastructure, as it is called, the runway extensions and the ammunition depots to contain these weapons were being built under top NATO priority. It was being considered by the supreme commander and his associates to be an urgent matter because it was recognized that Canada, at the time we were there in November, was in default. Well, if we were in default then we are that much more in default at the present time.

Let me say something about the question of building up conventional forces in NATO as against the necessity for more tactical capacity. A considerable amount has been said about that, particularly by hon. members of the New Democratic party. When the strategy of massive retaliation began to come into question it became obvious to a number of people, including some military men, that the NATO forces in Europe should have a wider variety of choice, a greater non-nuclear capacity, and so it was espoused in this house and other places that the conventional capacity of those forces should be increased.

General Maxwell Taylor of the United States put this forward in a book called "The Uncertain Trumpet." He is now chairman of the chiefs of staff committee in that country and is one of the closest military advisors to the President in the United States. However, Mr. Speaker, there is no immediate prospect of an adequate non-nuclear force and the necessity for a combined or mixed force remains. This point was made very clear.

Let me review very briefly what the problem is. When NATO was first organized and the Lisbon force goals were set, it was considered we would require something of the order of 90 divisions in Europe equipped with conventional weapons. These goals were never met, for political and economic reasons, and the United States supplemented the existing force by the development of a whole family of nuclear tactical weapons, and during the intervening years these have been the reserve force which has prevented aggression on the continent of Europe. Now a desperate attempt is being made to build up conventional forces to provide a greater choice of response, what they call the doctrine of measured response; but what is important to remember is this, that the 1966 force goals, if they are achieved, will bring into being in Europe a force of something like 30 to 33 divisions, and this is from one third to one half the force necessary to resist all out attack should the enemy decide to move in force across the continent of Europe.

In the meantime it is considered absolutely essential to supplement the conventional forces with tactical nuclear weapons. In this respect the strike reconnaissance role is considered a very important, indeed essential role. It is to seek out fixed and moving targets in enemy territory and to destroy them in the event of hostilities.

The total tactical capacity on the continent of Europe at the present time is less than was planned, and the reason for this is because the people there hoped by now to put into place a number of intermediate range ballistic missiles, but because of lack of agreement among the members of the NATO alliance those are not yet in place. Consequently the demands on the remaining tactical forces are greater than they were ever anticipated to be. Consequently the supreme allied commander is convinced that the contribution that Canada has agreed to make, which is a considerable percentage of the total tactical capacity of the tactical air forces in Europe, must be armed in accordance with the agreement this government made in 1959, advice of which was given by our ambassador to the NATO council in December of that year.

Mr. Speaker, it was interesting to many of us to note that the first time any mention was ever made in this house of the fact that Canada had had its ambassador advise the NATO council of this commitment was when the Prime Minister spoke in the house on Friday last. I think we are entitled to much greater forthrightness and to a much greater body of intelligent and honest fact on the subject of national defence so that we can come to some intelligent conclusion on it. The government has been less than candid with the house and I for one seriously regret that lack of candor. There are many more things I would like to say about our NATO commitment but time is running out.

Mr. Clancy: Would the hon. member accept a question?

Mr. Hellyer: Yes.

Mr. Clancy: Would you tell me the year and the month the NATO agreement was signed?

Mr. Hellyer: I would ask the hon. member to read the Prime Minister's speech of last Friday when he advised the house that we had accepted the commitment in the summer of 1959 and that our ambassador to NATO had advised the NATO council of that decision. That was during the year 1959.

Last week, Mr. Speaker, we were all surprised and I think disappointed when the United States state department felt it was necessary for them to make a statement correcting some of the information which had been put forward in the House of Commons on Friday last. It was indeed an unprecedented act but one which must be put into perspective; one which was caused by the indecision of the Canadian government and by no one else. Relations between our two countries had sunk to an all time low and the United States must have despaired of the present government ever coming to any decision, one way or the other, in respect to these urgent defence matters. I am sure that this is the same opinion which the Minister of National Defence must have reached in order to take the step which he did this morning.

In his statement the following day, apologizing for the tone of the press release, Mr. Rusk said that the United States would accept any clear decision on the part of the Canadian government. He did not underline the word "clear" when he was speaking, but the message was very clear without his doing that.

An hon. Member: You know.

Mr. Hellyer: I can very well understand the exasperation of the United States government. The Canadian government pressured the United States government into continuing with the Bomarc weapons system at a time when it was under severe attack in this house and in the congress of the United States. It did this in order to save face after the incredibly incompetent manner in which it had handled the cancellation of the Avro Arrow. Much of the confusion and indecision dates from that time.

The Prime Minister in his statement to the house in February, 1959 told us that the Bomarc had to do the same job for which the Avro Arrow had been designed. Well, as most of us know, that press release was written in the Prime Minister's office and not by the chiefs of staff. So was started a continuous problem from which the government has never completely escaped. It started from the date he gave to this house information which was incomprehensible, incomplete and incorrect. The Bomarc was never intended to replace interceptors. It was part of a theory at that time of interception in depth: first the interception fought out over the tundra, then the area defence of the Bomarc line, at that time planned to go right across the continent, and then the spot defence with the Nike-Hercules near the United States missile installations and their greatest urban centres. This was the theory. It was known to every person associated with national defence in this country and in the United States. Yet the Prime Minister in his statement took no cognizance of the military facts and advised the house that the Bomarc was in fact an alternative. Little wonder that the Canadian government had to pressure the United States into carrying on with the program when it was under such heavy fire.

Not only did the United States agree to carry on with the program but they agreed to pay the largest part of the cost. Then when the first missile site is completed, when the installation is all set and ready to go, the missiles are installed and in place, what does the Canadian government do? It does not fulfil its end of the bargain. It gives the United States government the gratuitous back of its hand. That was not a very friendly way to repay kindliness on the part of a nation which was doing its best to co-operate in those very difficult years.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Hellyer: Yes.

Mr. Aiken: I should like to ask the hon. member, in view of what he has just said, if he has changed his mind since he made the statement on April 4, 1962 that there is no need for us to get into the atomic business at all?

Mr. Pearson: You got us into it.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, as of this date I have changed my mind.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: What mind?

Mr. Hellyer: I have very good reasons for so doing, the chief one being the incomparable mess this government has got us into with respect to defence matters.

An hon. Member: How?

Mr. Hellyer: I do not know how they could get us into it, but they have; and now there is no honourable way to get out of it other than to live up to our commitments to our allies. The United States government must have wondered at the Prime Minister dragging in the red herring of the Nassau agreement. Any person who knows anything whatsoever about military matters knows that the matters under discussion at Nassau had no immediate effect whatsoever on Canada's commitments. They were just not relevant at all to those things we had undertaken to do. It is most unfortunate that the little bit of defence information we get from the government is not accurate. Is it any wonder that the Canadian people are so confused and bewildered on perhaps this most important of all subjects facing us at the present time? It is incredible indeed, and where the Prime Minister would get that suggestion other than out of his imagination, no one knows; but it must have been a terrible shock to Mr. Macmillan and Mr. Kennedy when they saw it interpreted in that most unorthodox and unrealistic way.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, will the hon. member accept a question?

Mr. Hellyer: There is no connection whatsoever between the Nassau agreement and Canada's commitments in respect of tactical weapons in Europe or to our agreement under NORAD to fulfil our end of the bargain and arm the Bomarc.

Mr. Churchill: Will the hon. member accept a question?

Mr. Hellyer: I have just three minutes left and there is something I have to say.

Mr. Churchill: It will only take a minute and a half.

Mr. Hellyer: I will accept it at ten o'clock. There is one thing I should like to correct at this time. That is the suggestion put forward by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness) and the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) intends to fulfil our commitments and then renegotiate the agreement the next day.

Some hon. Members: That is what he said.

Mr. Hellyer: This is absolute nonsense.

Mr. Lewis: That is what he said.

Mr. Pearson: That has never been said.

Mr. Hellyer: Anyone with any common sense whatsoever, and apparently there are a lot of people over there who have not very much—

Mr. Lewis: That is what he said.

Mr. Hellyer: —knows that it is physically impossible to do anything of the sort whatsoever.

Mr. Sevigny: That is exactly what you have said.

Mr. Hellyer: Any new policy which would be agreed on by a new minister in June, for example, and adopted by cabinet in September or October, which could be concurred in by the NATO council in December, would take three or four years to implement in full, and during that time the hundreds of millions of dollars worth of equipment which the government has bought would be worn out in the normal course of events. The effective life of the F-104 is five years. That is what is counted on overseas. The effective life of the Bomarc no one knows. Mr. McNamara has not much more faith in it than I have.

Mr. Sevigny: Mr. Speaker, will the hon. member permit a question?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I want to finish this statement.

Mr. Sevigny: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Hellyer: In my opinion the Bomarc will not be kept in operation for more than a few years.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The minister may request leave to ask a question, but if the hon. member chooses to disregard the request, he is at liberty to do so.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I wish to finish this most important point. The Leader of the Opposition—

Mr. Sevigny: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Hellyer: The Leader of the Opposition is very clear about what he means, and it is this. The commitments which this government has entered into on behalf of the Canadian people will be lived up to and fulfilled. There is no question about that. A new Liberal government will examine the whole—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Hellyer: —area of defence policy and will adopt a policy becoming—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Hellyer: —to this country, and then we will put it into effect in a normal, orderly way over three or four years.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It being ten o'clock, this house stands adjourned until 2.30 o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, February 5, 1963

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

Second report of standing committee on public accounts—Mr. Macnaughton.

THE MINISTRY

INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER CHANGES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether in view of current reports he contemplates any further changes in the ministry.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the current reports are that have been turned out by the Liberal propaganda factory.

Mr. Pearson: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the Prime Minister whether he considers the press, radio and television a Liberal propaganda factory?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I consider the inspiration to be Liberal propaganda.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order. In view of the fact that there seems to be an overload on the power system, perhaps we could have more light than heat this afternoon.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister advise the house if he has named a Minister of National Defence?

Mr. Diefenbaker: When a minister is named, the house will be advised.

[Later:]

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, because of the public interest may I ask the Prime Minister if it was not communicated to the right hon. gentleman today that a number of his colleagues wished him to vacate the office of Prime Minister—and be replaced by one of his colleagues?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, such a communication came to me by radio and, as I said earlier, was part of the Liberal propaganda.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question of the Prime Minister. Was that information as the result of a meeting which the Prime Minister knows to have taken place this morning in the office of one of his colleague ministers?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think we are getting into an area of debate on this matter. Also we are coming to a debate in which all these points can be raised.

FINANCE

PAYMENT OF GOVERNMENT BILLS AND SALARIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Walter L. Gordon (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, in view of the precarious financial position of the government—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Shame on you.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member will reflect upon his opening words and try to direct his mind to standing order 39 I think he will see where he is heading.

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Finance if he is planning to pay salaries and bills after today under the authority of governor general's warrants?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of Finance:) Mr. Speaker, if there were any precarious financial position it would have been largely contributed to by the hon. member for Davenport and his party.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I know there is a particular zest for debate in the house today, but perhaps we could reserve that sort of energy and desire for the resumption of the debate on the supply motion. Perhaps we could now have questions and answers more suitable to orders of the day.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege affecting all hon. members—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Pickersgill: —what more important function has parliament than the voting of supply?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not doubt the importance of the function. I am simply querying some of the expressions that have been used.

Mr. Nowlan: We have been telling you that for months.

THE SENATE

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he has made or is considering making today any series of appointments to the other place, or to the judiciary.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, every day is a day for such appointments.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I ask a supplementary question. Can the Prime Minister say whether any appointments have been approved by His Excellency the Governor General which have not been announced to the public?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I cannot say at the moment if they have not been announced. All the appointments that have been made have received the attention of the Governor General either yesterday or today. I know the hon. gentleman has been in touch with the privy council office regularly—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: I rise on a question of privilege arising out of the Prime Minister's observation.

Mr. Fulton: Anything wrong with that?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, there is, and that is precisely why I am raising a question of privilege. It arises out of the Prime Minister's observation. It is well known to hon. members that two appointments were made to the other place before the last election and kept secret by this government, thus dragging the crown into politics.

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is not a question of privilege which the hon. member is putting forward.

TRANSPORT

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—SUGGESTED COMPULSORY PILOTAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has he received a request for compulsory pilotage on all ships passing through the St. Lawrence seaway?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): I have not seen such a request. However, I will investigate and I will be pleased to answer my hon. friend.

Mr. Badanai: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the government intend to take any action about this request?

Mr. Balcer: The government has appointed a royal commission on pilotage which will investigate the whole matter from coast to coast in Canada.

(Translation):

SOULANGES CANAL—TRANSFER TO QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P.-A. Boutin (Dorchester): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour—

Mr. Speaker: I recognized the hon. member for Vaudreuil-Soulanges. He will ask his question and then the hon. member for Dorchester will state his.

Mr. Marcel Bourbonnais (Vaudreuil-Soulanges): Could the Minister of Transport tell the house whether the federal government received an answer from the Quebec provincial government following the order in council passed last year to transfer the Soulanges canal to the Quebec provincial government?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we did not hear from the provincial government on that matter.

Mr. Speaker: I am very sorry I did not have time to hear that question but surely it should have been placed on the order paper.

(Text):

SECRETARY OF STATE

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REQUEST FOR APPOINTMENT OF RETURNING OFFICERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I should like to direct to the Prime Minister a question which is of some urgency. Can he advise the house when he is going to fill the four vacancies for returning officers in British Columbia?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is a question which I think should go on the order paper. It is a matter of detail.

Mr. Winch: Will there be time for the returning officers to be appointed?

Mr. Speaker: The Chair is not aware of any particular urgency.

(Translation):

REQUEST THAT POLITICAL PARTIES BE SHOWN ON ELECTION BALLOTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Cote (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State.

Has the minister made arrangements so that the name of the party be printed next to the candidate's name on the ballots for the next federal election?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I trust the hon. member can look up the section of the Elections Act which governs that point.

(Text):

AGRICULTURE

SUGAR BEETS—REQUEST FOR ANNOUNCEMENT OF 1963 SUPPORT PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. A. Thomas (Middlesex West): I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. Can the minister advise the house how soon an announcement concerning the support program for the 1963 crop of sugar beets may be expected?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member should put that question on the order paper.

(Translation):

BUTTER—REPORTED INTENTION TO DISCONTINUE SUBSIDY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture, and I hope he will not have to wait three days to give me an answer.

Is there any truth to the press reports which claim that the government plans to abolish the 12-cent a pound consumer subsidy it now pays on butter?

(Text):

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman is falling prey to the custom prevailing today of believing everything appearing in the newspapers.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO JURISDICTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. This question deals with our natural resources and not our political resources. A member of the provincial legislature of British Columbia has stated that if the—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Byrne: —question of the Columbia river were in the hands of the provincial government—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Chair would like to hear the question. The hon. member may preface his question by some identifying remark without going into great length and without quoting someone else.

Mr. Byrne: I should like to ask the Minister of Public Works whether jurisdiction in respect of the Columbia river development comes under the provincial or the federal government.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Public Works): I think, Mr. Speaker, you will agree I am being asked to give a legal opinion, and I do not believe it is my function to give a legal opinion any more than it is the function of the Minister of Justice under our rules to give a legal opinion to the house. However, I think it should be clear by now that we have proceeded on the basis that it is a question of divided jurisdiction and that is why we have been working so hard to get a satisfactory agreement with the government of British Columbia which has so far proven impossible to do.

COLUMBIA RIVER—MEETING TO DISCUSS DOWNSTREAM BENEFITS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack Davis (Coast-Capilano): I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Will the minister please tell the house whether any negotiations are going on at the present time, or pending, concerning the sale of Columbia river downstream benefit power in the United States?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): As the hon. member knows, there have been informal discussions on two or three occasions. I do not think any date is set at the moment for the next meeting, but I presume one will be set in due course. Those discussions were at the technical level.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

INVITATIONS TO DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE ON BICULTURALISM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister if he could inform the house whether he has already dispatched invitations to the provincial governments for the federal-provincial conference on biculturalism which he announced the other day?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

Mr. Lewis: In view of the reply given earlier by the Prime Minister, would the right hon. gentleman be good enough, with the consent of the house, to file a copy of the letter of invitation which he has dispatched to the provinces regarding the conference my earlier question dealt with?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I will do so. I have not the letter with me now.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

CHARLOTTETOWN—CONTRACT FOR CONSTRUCTION OF CONFEDERATION BUILDING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Vincent Drouin (Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister. Could he tell the house whether he has received a brief from Mr. Fernand Bibeau, of St. Eustache, in which the latter complains that the contract for the construction of the confederation building was not awarded to the lowest bidder?

Mr. Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but he must realize that his question should be put on the order paper.

Mr. Drouin: Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a point of order. At the beginning of the session, you set forth the rules governing questions put on the orders of the day, and you said at that time that in order to be acceptable, questions should deal with matters of urgent public importance.

Now then, the question I wish to ask was raised in the newspapers recently, and especially in Le Devoir where it was said that tenders had been received.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member will recognize that the same kind of question could be asked about such and such a call for tenders in any part of the country. I feel he will understand that it is not essential to get that information at this stage of our proceedings and that he can readily put that important question on the order paper.

Mr. Drouin: Mr. Speaker, I respectfully submit that my question has nothing to do with the tenders themselves.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

SONS OF FREEDOM, B.C.—INQUIRY AS TO REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a serious and non-partisan question to the Minister of Justice. Has the minister received any recent communications from the attorney general of British Columbia seeking this government's co-operation or assistance with respect to a settlement of the difficult Sons of Freedom question?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Justice): No sir.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

EXTENSION OF BENEFITS TO WORKERS IN U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Pierre-Andre Boutin (Dorchester): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour.

Could the minister tell us whether discussions between the Canadian government and the state of Maine concerning the problem of unemployment insurance for lumbermen have taken place, as he announced before Christmas?

(Text):

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Yes, sir. The state of Maine held a meeting of their own, and now they have set up a special committee to investigate the aspect of the problem particularly affecting the state of Maine. We hope that as a result of that meeting we may be able to get together with them and bring about a reciprocal agreement.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

QUEBEC CITY—ESTABLISHMENT OF FRENCH TELEVISION STATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jean Charles Cantin (Quebec South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State.

Could the minister tell the house whether the government intends to comply in the near future with the B.B.G. recommendation for the establishment in Quebec city of a French television station by the C.B.C.?

(Text):

Hon. G. E. Halpenny (Secretary of State): That will be announced in due course, Mr. Speaker.

(Translation):

Mr. Cantin: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Very well.

Mr. Cantin: Would the minister give the house the reasons for this further delay?

Mr. Speaker: That is not a supplementary question.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MEXICO—INVESTIGATION OF CANADIAN CITIZENS BY U.S. BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Have the minister's officials given him any information regarding the reported subjection of Canadian citizens in Mexico to investigation by the United States federal bureau of investigation?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the department is still investigating complaints which were received from the west coast a few days ago.

TRADE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON U.S. INQUIRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John R. Nicholson (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Forestry. Is the minister in a position to give us an up to date report on the state of affairs and developments in Washington with regard to a move to exclude or put a quota on Canadian forest products being shipped to the United States?

Hon. H. J. Flemming (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I cannot give any up to the minute information. This hearing took place some months ago. However, I would be very glad to obtain the latest information on the situation and give it to my hon. friend.

WHEAT—ALLEGED DROP IN EXPORT SALES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture. I hope Your Honour and the minister will recognize the essential difference between this question and the one I asked yesterday, because my question now is specific. I should like to ask the minister whether he could advise the house what specific negotiations are now under way to make up for the decline in wheat sales to date and to sell all the rest of our wheat for this crop year.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is the policy of the Canadian wheat board or of the government to divulge what is going on in any type of business negotiations until there is something pretty tangible to announce. I think the point I made yesterday is sufficient, that what we measure our success or failure by are the number of bushels exported. There was a record export in the last two years, and it will be very close to that this year.

WHEAT—INQUIRY AS TO PAYMENT BY CHINA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Agriculture): I have been trying for two or three days to answer a question submitted to me by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. The question was whether the Chinese are still honouring their obligations. The information I have today is as follows: Up to and including December 31, 1962, all payments due on the contract—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the minister can do that as well on motions rather than on questions, or in some other way.

(Translation):

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

Could the minister tell the house what method of payment is used with regard to the wheat sold to communist China?

Mr. Speaker: An attempt was made to answer that question a short while ago, and I rather think that the hon. member's question should be put on the order paper.

PUBLIC SERVICE

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF DEFEATED CANDIDATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Since the date of the last return, which was before Christmas, concerning the appointment by the government of defeated candidates, have there been any further such appointments?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that question can very definitely go on the order paper.

Inquiries of the Ministry

AIRPORTS

DORVAL—ACCESS TO TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raymond Rock (Jacques Cartier-Lasalle): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Following the news item published in the Montreal Star yesterday headed "No provision made for airport exit off new boulevard", has the minister's department any plans to provide an exit from the Montreal international airport to the trans-Canada highway?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member will recognize that this question belongs on the order paper, because we have a number of major airports with regard to which the same problem may exist.

FISHERIES

NORTH PACIFIC FISHERIES COMMISSION—INQUIRY AS TO RECOMMENDATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arthur Laing (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In respect of the international north Pacific fisheries commission, is it true that this question is now lodged with his department, and if so, would he be prepared soon to give the house a statement of policy?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this question will have to be dealt with by the cabinet.

BRITISH COLUMBIA—PROTECTION OF SALMON RUNS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): In view of the remarks made earlier by the Minister of Public Works about reaching an accord with the government of British Columbia, I should like to ask the Minister of Fisheries whether he has been able to reach an accord with the government of British Columbia on the matter of protecting salmon runs from the effects of hydro installations on certain rivers.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Clarifications by correspondence are proceeding I consider satisfactorily.

REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF REPORT OF NORTH PACIFIC COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I wish to pose a question for the Minister of Fisheries with respect to the recommendations of the north Pacific fisheries commission about herring and halibut, and ask whether he has yet made up his mind to refer this question to the marine and fisheries committee before the cabinet or parliament makes any determination about it.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add further to the answers I have already given to similar questions.

Mr. Howard: I have a supplementary question. Can the minister explain what the result is when he adds nothing to nothing?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member might well reflect upon the answer.

VOCATIONAL TRAINING

QUEBEC—ASSISTANCE IN CONSTRUCTION OF SCHOOLS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Rinfret (St. James): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour concerning federal assistance to the construction of technical schools. Following the talks the minister had recently with representatives of the provinces, will the government take immediate steps so that some provinces, and Quebec in particular, may derive more advantages than in the past?

(Text):

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): We have received representations from the ministers of education of the provinces asking for one thing, and recently there have been representations from the school trustees, who are as much interested in this matter, asking for another thing, and we have to decide what is best for this country. A decision will be arrived at and made known to the house and to the provinces.

LOTTERIES

FEDERAL ACTION TO LEGALIZE PROVINCIAL LOTTERIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to ask the Minister of Justice whether the government has given any recent indication to the government of Quebec regarding its views on the legality of a provincial lottery for charitable purposes, or on the government's position concerning making such lotteries legal.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Justice): I have had some correspondence with Premier Lesage. In it, of course, I made no attempt to comment on the legality of such operations. Premier Lesage asked if the federal government was prepared to sponsor legislation to legalize lotteries conducted by provinces for revenue purposes. The reply I conveyed to him was that the government does not contemplate the introduction of any bill at the present session to amend the Criminal Code.

INQUIRIES OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Murdo Martin (Timmins): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the report in this morning's Le Devoir that the C.N.R. in paid advertisements refers to French as Montreal's second language, would the minister assure the house that he will inform Mr. Gordon that Montreal is the second largest French speaking city in the world?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has given the information already.

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether it is true that he intends to appoint to the Senate the former mayor of Toronto, Mr. Nathan Phillips.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think it is competent to ask for confirmation or denial of any rumors.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

COMMEMORATIVE STAMP—NATIONALITY OF SIR CASIMIR GZOWSKI

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Postmaster General to assure the house that Sir Casimir Gzowski, the great Polish patriot who is to be honoured by a commemorative stamp, was of Polish origin and not a citizen of Russia.

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Postmaster General): If my memory serves me correctly, I think no such assertion was made. Having regard for the changes in geography since the date of his birth, I think there might be some confusion as to the actual territory concerned, but no statement was made to that effect as far as I can recall.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Did the hon. lady hear the announcement on the C.B.C. this morning, which stated quite clearly that he was born in Russia?

Mr. Speaker: Order. We are now getting into some little bit of argument here. I think the persons concerned can settle it.

PUBLIC SERVICE

INQUIRY AS TO PAY REVIEW FOR CERTAIN CLASSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Is the question of pay increases for messengers and cleaning staff in the House of Commons and for the civil servants not provided for on December 10 still under review, or has a decision been reached?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the matter is under review.

SUPPLY

The house resumed, from Monday, February 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. Nowlan for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Pearson, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Thompson.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, we in the Liberal opposition are prepared to support the subamendment moved by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson), which expresses in somewhat different words the same lack of confidence expressed in the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition. We particularly welcome the opportunity to express the view that the government has failed to give a clear statement of policy respecting Canada's national defence.

Last evening I put on the record some of the factual material relating to our present defence dilemma, which should have been put on the record by the government. The facts demonstrate that the government undertook, without any coercion, certain commitments in the common defence which it now refuses to honour. Furthermore, it attempts to confuse an already complicated subject by introducing irrelevant and misleading information designed to camouflage its bungling and indecision.

The Prime Minister, for example, in referring to the adequacy of the United States strategic deterrent, attempts to give the impression that the Canadian contribution would be an unnecessary supplement. The hon. member for York South even more skilful in his confusion, quotes the Leader of the Opposition as saying that Canada should not contribute to the strategic nuclear deterrent.

Mr. Speaker, no one is suggesting that we should do so. There are three classes of atomic weapons, and these are well known to most people. They are the strategic, the tactical, and the purely defensive. It is true that in the strategic field there is more than adequate under the control of the United States. But it is equally true that in the opinion of military people in charge of these matters, tactical and strictly defensive nuclear weapons are required both in NATO and in NORAD.

One point that is worth mentioning is this. In fulfilling our commitments to NATO and NORAD—

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I should like to inquire of the hon. member whether he is reading from a speech or a text. If he is doing so I should like to draw Your Honour's attention to the point of order.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Benidickson: Every time you speak you are literary and read from a text.

Mr. Speaker: This matter of reading is a difficult one. Sometimes there are rather extensive notes and sometimes it is difficult to say whether what is being said has any relation to the notes. However, we will go along, as long as we are not getting into difficulty.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to send my notes to the hon. member later so that he can use them for the Toronto Telegram. In the meantime let me say to him that last night in this house I made a 30 minute speech without any notes whatsoever, and that is something that is very seldom done.

In being asked to fulfil our commitments to NATO we are doing what others of our allies have already done. Nine countries in NATO have signed bilateral agreements with the United States. Not all of them have nuclear weapons, but most of them in fact do have them. They are not considered to be members of the atomic club in the same sense that Britain, Russia, the United States and now France are considered to be. We are just asked to do what the Prime Minister committed himself to do in principle in December, 1957 when he adopted a NATO strategy which involved signing bilateral agreements between the United States and the respective countries in order to provide from time to time the tactical nuclear weapons required in NATO.

In our negotiations when we should have been demonstrating good faith we must have made some outrageous proposals to the United States to store nuclear weapons south of the border. Such a patently impractical suggestion must have driven the United States state department and the former minister of national defence to distraction. Is it any wonder that they both took the rather unusual courses they felt they must take?

The Liberal policy in this matter is clear. We are convinced that the only honourable way to resolve the present dilemma is to live up to our commitments in full. The leader of the Liberal party stated this clearly when he said:

> The government should re-examine at once the whole basis of Canadian defence policy.

Later in the same speech he said:

> However, until the present role is changed, a new Liberal government would put Canada's armed services in the position to discharge fully commitments undertaken for Canada by its predecessor.

In office, Mr. Speaker, we would re-examine our defence policy, but any new policy would be designed to give Canada the maximum contribution to peace and security and on no other basis. The Liberal party is proud to have at its head a leader—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Jones: Which one is it this week?

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is one member who has the floor.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, our leader is a man who is not afraid to take a stand on the great issues of the day even at the cost of losing votes. He is a man who can make decisions and who will make the decisions necessary to restore Canada to its position of influence and responsibility amongst the nations of the world.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is not for me today to get into the argument as between the hon. member for Trinity and the hon. member for York South, but as I listened to the hon. gentleman a moment ago I recalled an occasion in 1960 when he performed a feat which was never before performed in this house. A speech appeared in the Ottawa Citizen in detail purporting to be what the hon. member for Trinity had said in the House of Commons, when he had not spoken at all. That was indeed an example that none of us, including the hon. member for York South, would ever want to emulate.

May I say that this afternoon I am going to review something of the situation as I see it based upon the amendment of the Leader of the Opposition, an amendment so general, so widespread, so obviously diffuse that one can only conclude that it was placed in such general terminology so that he would sidle away from the question of nuclear arms. He was afraid to face that question. He spoke strongly, he spoke shrilly. He used the same expressions that he used back in 1957 and 1958, the same decayed platitudes, the same single concern, the same cry for office. Mr. Speaker, the closer that Bob Winters looms, the louder speaks the Leader of the Opposition.

At the end of all these generalities the mountain brought forth a mouse. The amendment simply states that for various reasons the government does not have the confidence of the Canadian people. There is not a single definite challenge. He did not dare challenge on the question of nuclear arms. He was afraid. The hon. member for Trinity says "We have a leader who speaks with such directness; we have a leader who speaks with authority and definiteness". A few weeks ago his leader was saying "No nuclear arms under any circumstances".

He cried out against the government's defence policy and generalities. He referred to some of the general problems facing our country. He turned, he contradicted, he did violence to logic, and when he concluded he produced an amendment which he believed would have the effect of securing the support of other members of this house.

I am going to refer to one or two matters today. I am going to deal first with the general situation in so far as defence is concerned, and in order that there will be no misunderstanding I will simplify what I said previously, underlining in every particular what I said on that occasion. Before I do so I think I should read in part an editorial in the Winnipeg Tribune which deals with this matter. It refers to the campaign that has been going on which has so many forms, the campaign which brings known nuclear advocates to Canada to brainwash the public, that encourages various people to become captive audiences. There was the farewell visit of General Norstad, and then there were other statements that were made by other generals. I think it was Clemenceau who once said that "the business of defence is too serious for generals. It requires civilian control."

The editorial in the Tribune goes on to say with respect to what happened following the declaration that I made in 1959:

> In the intervening period the whole military strategic and tactical situation has changed. But the military men and their spokesmen, just because they have the carriers they asked for four years ago, are now trying to pressure the dominion government into the ultimate decision in military planning. They think they must go the last mile—

Then there are some words in between, and we find this:

> —regardless of public or political opinion on this fateful question.

Then I should like to refer to what I said on January 25 when I outlined the policy agreed upon by this cabinet. I am going to read this and then I am going to summarize it. I quote from page 3136 of Hansard for January 25, 1963:

> Following SACEUR's recommendation, as we saw the situation in 1959 and as I said earlier in my remarks, we undertook to equip our squadrons assigned to NATO for a strike reconnaissance role, which role would include the mission of delivering nuclear weapons.

This was the basis, and every man and woman in this parliament knew that course was undertaken and understood. A program was approved and appropriated by parliament. The second point was, and I quote:

> Delivery of the F-104G has commenced, but the strike reconnaissance role has been placed under doubt by the recent Nassau declaration concerning nuclear arms, as well as other developments both technical and political in the defence field.

Well, I could pick up almost any newspaper in either the United States or Canada and indicate that that was the interpretation given, those were the views of the conclusions arrived at there when the two leaders got together. I have before me the Christian Science Monitor. This represents a completely changed viewpoint. I quote:

> The United States wants its principal allies to submerge their own national defence in a collective defence, where for example, General de Gaulle would merely be one among many and lose direct control of French defence. In present circumstances this unified defence quite simply means final control by the United States.

These are not the views of any Canadian newspaper; this is a statement made by a reputable newspaper whose editorials are quoted everywhere.

> The allies do not like it. This is partly because they do not want to yield up control of their own nuclear destiny—a sacrifice they know the United States is not prepared to make. And partly because they have strong ban the bomb minorities who fear that American control in a crisis means control by the Pentagon, by men trained to think in terms of war, not peace.

Mr. Hellyer: Will the Prime Minister permit a question?

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Hellyer: Will the Prime Minister permit a question?

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Then again, in the same issue this appears under "Allied defence", and it sets out the change in United States strategy in this regard.

Mr. Hellyer: You are referring to strategic weapons, not tactical.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I come back to my statement which appeared in Hansard of January 25, and I quote:

It will be necessary, therefore, at this meeting in May, for Canada to give consideration to this matter and we will, in co-operation with the nations of NATO, undertake a clarification of our role in NATO defence plans and disposition.

We are united in NATO. We have never and will never consent to Canada breaking any of her pledged words or undertakings.

I underline that.

It is at that meeting where there will be reviewed the entire collective defence policy, that we shall secure from the other member nations their views, and on the basis of that we will be in a position to make a decision, a consistent decision, first to maintain our undertakings and second to execute, if that be the view, the maintenance of our collective defence. In the meantime the training of Canadian forces in the use of these weapon systems can continue.

Now, I say to the House of Commons this. After that meeting we shall bring this matter before parliament clearly, definitely and finally. I want to make that clear. There is no suggestion of any underhand agreements being entered into.

I summarize now the views that I placed before the house on this question. First, with regard to bringing nuclear warheads on Canadian soil, we will continue to negotiate with the United States so that they will be readily available in case of need. This means that our security will be assured while at the same time we will be doing nothing to increase the nuclear family. Second, in that reference I made to negotiation, there was no prejudice in that. I referred to the fact that negotiations were being conducted. There was no secrecy about that. I did not go into the facts in any way because those negotiations, in so far as agreements are concerned in connection therewith, naturally could not be revealed and are confidential. I point out that Secretary of State Rusk in his conference said this in connection with the negotiations, and I quote:

These are matters which have been discussed with the Canadian government in private talks and I would suppose that these private talks would be resumed.

It is the intention of the government to carry on these talks. It should be pointed out that some proposals already have come from the United States government. With regard to the question of nuclear warheads for Canadian forces in Europe, the Nassau declaration stated in paragraph 6, dealing with action which may be taken to bring about multilateral nuclear forces within NATO:

This could include allocations from United States strategic forces, from United Kingdom bomber command and from tactical nuclear forces now held in Europe.

This proposal for multilateral nuclear forces in NATO went much further than any previous proposal and is one upon which discussions are already under way in the NATO council as to whether tactical forces such as Canada's would be included. This whole new development will be under intensive study and preparation for the NATO ministerial meeting. I have already pointed out that in the meantime the training will take place.

Now, sir, I am not going to go again into the question of the United States having issued the document which it did. However, there are one or two references I intend to make to it, and then pass on to some other questions. I repeat that the issue of that statement on January 30 was an intrusion into Canada in a political subject, and a controversial one, that cannot be excused by mere words. In the course of that statement challenges were made of several statements I made, all of them matters of opinion. We have not yet come to the place in the fellowship and freedom of nations when the views of any one of them in matters of opinion must be the views of any other one belonging to that group.

I just want to refer to one, and that was with regard to the Bomarc. I have stated that the Bomarc was simply a part of the plan for North American defence and was not to defend Canada. That is not its purpose, but in its statement the state department said two Bomarc B squadrons would protect Montreal and Toronto as well as the United States deterrent force. Well, we installed these Bomarcs and the decision to do so, as part of a ring to protect the nuclear strike force, was announced in September, 1958.

What about the changes in between? What is the position of these things today? On the one hand the department of state says they will defend Montreal and Toronto, that they are effective today; but on the other hand, on January 31 it was reported that defence secretary McNamara suggested that Bomarc missile squadrons have only limited usefulness even against manned bomber attacks. Are they going to continue with them? Yes, they are going to continue them, and the reason given was because the United States government has already paid for them. That does not sound as if their defensive properties are very high today, simply because they have been paid for already.

Earlier the defence secretary told the United States committee that a general review of United States military strength shows that the continental interceptor force is vulnerable because it has no modern protection against missile attacks. Intercontinental missile attack is the great danger today, and this is what I say.

While on the one hand the department of state issued its statement, on the other hand, on the day after, the secretary of defence said the very opposite. He said:

> Our principle concern in the years ahead must be the dangers of an intercontinental ballistic missile and submarine-launched missile attack and the main thrust of our efforts should be redirected to meet these rising threats.

Mr. Speaker, there is the story. I do not often quote from the Toronto Star but this is what the Toronto Star said on that occasion:

> Washington contradicts itself. Whatever else may be said about them, the arguments the American state department marshalled yesterday in its statement on nuclear arms for Canada are, at best, dubious.
>
> In fact, they often run head-on into the views defence secretary Robert McNamara presented earlier yesterday to a congressional committee. It would almost seem as if the left hand in the state department did not really know what the right hand in the Pentagon was doing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: That sounds like the government of Canada.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There are three or four other points which can be analysed in the same way. On this occasion I am going to restrain myself from again referring to the document in question, but I do say this, without any reservation; that the subsequent statement made by the United States secretary of state added to the seriousness resulting from the earlier statement. He said in effect that what I said was incorrect. Then he wound up and said that Canada of course has the right to decide. Certainly it has the right to decide, but in that subsequent statement over and over again there is reiterated a viewpoint that is inconsistent with the relationship between allies.

There has been no criticism on our part of the United States on occasions when we might have done so. I can think of events which have taken place within the last year, but self-control is necessary and must be exercised as between nations. We might have spoken out. Mr. Speaker, I say no more about that statement issued by the state department.

What I said on the opening day I repeat, and to that I add that the further restatement by the secretary of state constituted a further intrusion into Canadian public debate and public consideration of this matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: So far as the Leader of the Opposition is concerned, he has a way of finding himself in a hole and then coming through the same hole he created for himself. He said this thing is wrong, but then he proceeded to use all the arguments that were wrong in that statement to devastate us if he could.

Mr. Pickersgill: So did Mr. Harkness last night.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I realize the joy that has been given to the heart of the hon. gentleman by making that statement, but I am saying that the arguments that were used in the statement that should not have been issued, should not have been used. That is not the way for diplomatic relations between countries. It has become the cornerstone of the argument of the opposition, indeed even before the statement was issued. I refer of course to the Liberal opposition.

Mr. Benidickson: You cannot explain that to the Conservatives in Calgary North.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am glad to see the hon. gentleman back. Now, there are some who say to me that if you take a stand like this it is anti-American. Mr. Speaker, it is nothing of the kind. I do not think it is other than pro-Canadian, or Canadian, to point out when something is wrong. That is unjust.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Somebody said to me that if I take this stand then we are going to suffer danger in Canada, damage to Canada, and that we are going to do harm to Canada's economic strength. I do not accept that argument. It is an unworthy one. Does anyone tell me that the United States, which has spread its beneficence all over the world, would retaliate because we failed to adopt a suggestion that they offered? Such an argument, and I hear it spoken today in various parts of our country, if carried to its logical conclusion means this, that our country has ceased to be a country wherein we have the right to make our own policies. I do not accept that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I believe in co-operation because I believe in good relations. Franklin said we hang together or we will hang separately, and I believe in co-operation. Without it there is no survival. But I cannot accept the fears of those who believe we must be subservient in order to be a good ally of any country in the world. Macdonald fought this battle. The great merchants in the city of Montreal in those days—not the French Canadians—had their views on this subject, that after all Canada would be that much stronger if it were joined with the United States. That was not Macdonald's view. That idea comes in with almost every generation.

I say this, Mr. Speaker. We are influenced in this way every day in our country on radio, television and in the press. When the leader of the United States speaks, we get it in detail over our television. I should like to see more of an interchange in this regard so they would learn something about our country. When I hear some saying that the fact that one dares to speak out will endanger Canada's economy, I wonder what the future of this country would be if those who have such fears and those who are of little faith held office in our country. I believe in co-operation, in the closest co-operation, but not in the absorption of our viewpoint by any other nation. I believe in the maintenance in spirit and in fact of Canada's identity, with the right to determine her own policy without extramural assistance in determining that policy.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We all agree with that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I now pass on to the next phase in connection with this amendment, Mr. Speaker. As we listened to the Leader of the Opposition he repeated the same old statements. I was reading some of the speeches he made in 1958. He has a mighty good memory, because he used the same words then, right from the beginning. He speaks of the degree to which parliament has failed to act. He would lead the country to believe that we are responsible for this. Well, Mr. Speaker, I take up the order paper and look over the amount of legislation we have on it. Can we get anything through? I am not speaking of the other parties now.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am speaking of those who openly boasted that they would hold up this house until finally we would not have supply and would have to go to the country. This is legislation necessary for Canada. With regard to the national development act they said that, subject to the proper criticism and examination, it is good legislation. Do they let it go through? They talk and talk; then they end up denying its passage. It has been the same story, Mr. Speaker, all down the line, and I am going to refer to that in some little detail. They say we should organize the business of the house.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I hear one solitary voice, Mr. Speaker. We could organize the business of the house. We have placed the business before the house. Let us look at the legislation on the order paper. How many measures are before the house? The number is 31. There is the measure respecting the national economic development board, which is something that should have gone through; there is the measure with respect to the Freight Rates Reduction Act. We cannot even get that before the house. There are other measures here which are not of the same importance. There is the motion of the Minister of Labour for the second reading of Bill No. C-70, to provide for the safety of persons employed in federal works; there is the measure respecting industrial change and manpower adjustment; the measure to amend the Export and Import Permits Act; the measure to amend the Industrial Development Bank Act; the resolution in connection with Canadian National Railways, and so I could go on. There is measure after measure which waits. There is the measure to set up an Indian claims commission; to amend the National Productivity Council Act by providing for the appointment of additional members, and so on. These are matters that we want to get through. In addition we have several others to come, to which there will be reference before I conclude.

What happens? They come in and spend almost an hour a day on questions. One of the most spectacular contributions to wit, humour and waste of the time of parliament was that made by the Leader of the Opposition the other day when he rose and gave his condolences to the Minister of Trade and Commerce for the burning down of some building in Toronto.

Mr. Pearson: The George H. Hees building.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Leader of the Opposition, holding a responsible position, talks facetiously like that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): A fire is not a facetious thing.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Wasting the time of parliament; that is what has been going on. How can we organize these things if they hold up everything?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I could go down the whole list and indicate exactly what has happened in this regard. On January 21 I put before the house, not by way of dictation in any way but simply the suggestion, that we get on with the business; that we endeavour to extend the hours of sitting; that we arrive at a plan whereby we will be able to deal with such matters as the bill to amend the provisions of the Railway Act, based on the recommendations of the MacPherson royal commission—

Mr. Pickersgill: It has not yet appeared.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —a resolution arising out of the recommendations of the O'Leary royal commission on publications, the amendment of the Unemployment Insurance Act following the report of the Gill committee.

Mr. Pickersgill: That has not appeared.

Mr. Starr: Well, get the others through and these will appear too.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): When were the reports made?

Mr. Pearson: They are not on the order paper.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I sometimes wonder how that man is able to stand up with the guilty conscience he has. I am referring to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill).

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Prime Minister has suggested that I have a guilty conscience. I would certainly have a guilty conscience—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Pickersgill: Of course if hon. gentlemen opposite do not want to listen to me—I would certainly have a guilty conscience if after 17 government bills had been passed with opposition assistance in the first 60 days of this session, compared with an average of eight when the hon. gentleman had a majority of 200, I was complaining violently of obstruction.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I will not answer that, because it is just time wasted as well. All through the piece the hon. gentleman is not guilty. He is not doing any time wasting and I am going to accept his denial. We feel he is. He does not.

What about this question: when are we going to get this legislative program before the house? It all depends. The hon. gentleman says they do not hold it up. That leads me to deal with the course which has been followed by the official opposition. They say "Why don't you get these things before the house?" Hon. members heard the speech made yesterday by the Leader of the Opposition. It was part and parcel of that unrelenting search for power. I cannot explain the attitude. Last June, last May, by their guerrilla tactics they endangered the confidence of people in Canada. They continued to do that throughout the campaign. They sabotaged public confidence. They sniped at national achievement. Why have they been pushing for an election since the opening day last fall? They have been pushing for it because they know that every day we are in office, with the rising impetus of our economy, the falsity of their arguments in the election is being proven.

I look down this chamber to my friends in the Social Credit party. I am dealing with them now; in a moment I shall be speaking about the N.D.P. I wonder what they must think of a leader who voted for an amendment proposed by the Social Credit party in accordance with their beliefs, an amendment proposing debt free money. When they were asked whether they believed in debt free money they said "No, no, we do not believe in it." As far as the New Democratic party are concerned the Liberals say "We are ready to merge with them, or at least to take them in". There is only one down there they do not want, according to the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Gordon), and that is the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis). He is a marxist, according to the hon. member for Davenport. The rest of them are all right.

Mr. Gordon: I would ask the Prime Minister to prove I ever said that. If he means by it the implication which sometimes goes with it, he is not telling the truth and it is high time he did.

Mr. Lewis: I think, Mr. Speaker, I have the only legitimate question of privilege, and I want to inform the house, in the words of Karl Marx, that I deplore the word "marxist".

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. member for Davenport did not deplore it, according to the Canadian Press. He asked me to read the statement. I will give the exact words. This is the report which appeared in the press. I read from the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix of January 14:

> The New Democratic members of parliament range all the way from those who would easily assimilate Liberal theory ... except David Lewis who is an out and out marxist and who would never fit into our party.

Mr. Lewis: On a question of privilege may I say that the last part of the report, namely that I would not fit into the ranks of the Liberal party, is accurate. The first part is utterly false.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thank the hon. gentleman for answering the other hon. gentleman.

I am going back over the arguments they used, the same arguments with which they undermined the confidence in this country. They said that as a result of our action in pegging the dollar, the dollar of the Canadian housewife would be worth 7½ cents less. They said the cost of every item of food, every article of clothing, every household requirement, would be increased. They said the cost of services would be increased. If they want proof, I have it. They said—and they did this for political purposes—that we were ruined as a nation. They predicted soaring inflation which would wipe out the savings of widows and pensioners. How did they support this? They offered counterfeit dollars to support a counterfeit charge in a counterfeit campaign. That is the hoax they almost succeeded in perpetrating on June 18.

When we said our trade was increasing they said "Nothing of the kind". They painted a dreadful picture of ruin within this land. They do not speak about that any more. They speak about other things. I ask this question. What of their prophecies? Have living costs increased as they said they would? Mr. Speaker, the increase in the cost of living in Canada in 1962 was the lowest in any of the free world countries. We told them what would happen when we pegged the dollar. We told them it would increase our export opportunities, substantially increase the revenue of the tourist industry and provide more opportunities for Canadian manufacturers to produce for the domestic market. They ridiculed, they ranted and they prevaricated. That is why they were so anxious to get an election in the fall, so that their campaign of falsehood would not be answered by the facts.

The increase in our gross national product? They said there was nothing to that. They reviewed the situation. We know today what the situation is, and in order that the record may be clear before this vote takes place I intend to put a few of the answers on the record. Who told the truth about the Canadian dollar?

Mr. Pickersgill: The Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. gentleman is so right. He does not say he did, or that anyone associated with him did. Who told the truth about the Canadian economy? As I went across this country after the election two people said to me, "You told us that the economy was on the uprise, a great upsurge, and it was not true because you had this foreign exchange difficulty". They had it in 1948.

Mr. Pickersgill: In 1947.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All right, 1947. They had the pegged dollar then at 10 per cent.

Mr. Pickersgill: You might as well have the facts right.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was half way between. I said 1948. It started in 1947 and went through to 1949. Now, being face to face with them in the House of Commons, on the basis of what has taken place since then, I charge them with an offence and say they were guilty of one of the greatest election frauds in our history. I refer to all of them. They went across Canada. They put their greed for office before the needs of Canadian citizens. Now we are able to offer the facts. Do they quote the London Economist any more?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Pearson: We should be glad to do so.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Even the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) has not referred to it for some time. What does the London Economist say? In this year end edition of December, 1962, it says that Canada in 1962 outstripped every nation in the world in the rate of economic growth.

The hon. member for Davenport is not here at the moment.

An hon. Member: He is coming in now.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am glad he is now here. May I say that we reached the present level three years ahead of the target date indicated by the royal commission headed by that hon. gentleman. I am placing the record before the house and the country, and answering that campaign about which I shall say no more than I have already said. Newsweek states as follows:

> World wide industrial expansion is 7 per cent over last year with the United States (coming out of a recession) and Canada registered the top gain.

What of these purveyors of doom and gloom? What of the statements they made before the Canadian people? What does Business Week say?

Mr. Pickersgill: The Minister of Justice in Tokyo said—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, I know you ridicule anything with regard to Canada's economic growth and expansion. That is part and parcel of the Liberal attitude.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Prime Minister has once more chosen to make a personal reference to me, suggesting that I was ridiculing something. All I was pointing out was that the Minister of Justice in Tokyo said we had the highest level of unemployment in the western world.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. This assertion has been made twice in the house. It was raised first of all by the Leader of the Opposition. I said then that I never made any such statement and that a report to that effect appearing in one of the Tokyo papers was not true. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, notwithstanding that denial, came back and made the same statement in this house later. It was again denied. He is repeating it again now. This is the plainest breach of the privileges of the house in repeated assertions of something that is not true. I say that what he is saying and what he is trying to do is dastardly and false.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member cannot understand that language, he cannot understand English. I mentioned Business Week which states as follows:

Canada chalked up the highest growth rate of any Atlantic community country—

Where are these people who went about in sepulchral tones and talked about the awfulness of the Canadian economy? No wonder they want an election. Their sins are now finding them out.

The Mercantile Bank of Canada has this to say:

Devaluation has provided a powerful force contributing to a better external balance, increased production and more employment.

I have only to look at the records as to Canada's foreign exchange position. It is one of the best, if not the best, in all our history, according to the record in today's Globe and Mail. The Financial Post states:

Canadian steel makers—

And may I say that steel is always indicative of an economy going up or down.

—are being hard pressed to cope with the record flood of orders for cold rolled steel sheets.

The Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, states:

One of the main sources of strength as this year progressed has been the substantial rise in the volume of exports . . . Personal incomes have continued to expand in the wake of increased employment opportunities, higher rates of pay, and record levels of farm income.

Then, Canadian business had this to say. I do not like to put these things on the record, Mr. Speaker, because I know how hon. members opposite feel. They, who predicted that the country was going into bankruptcy today, are compelled to sit and to realize that their statements have no basis; and they knew they were false when they made them.

I mentioned the reserve. In today's paper the Canadian Press carries this report:

Canada's reserves gained $123,100,000 during January to a record $2,662,500,000 due to the receipt of $125,000,000 in U.S. dollars from a government bond issue in New York last fall.

Then it goes on to say this:

Still to be repaid from the reserves is $300,000,000 borrowed from the international monetary fund by the government at the time of the foreign exchange crisis last June when the reserves reached their low point of about $1.1 billion on June 24.

That has been the picture all the way along. Have they learned their lesson?

An hon. Member: They will never learn.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, they are at it again. The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Gordon) was out west. He said, "Oh, things are gloomy ahead, as I see them". May I say that he did not see ahead very well. He said that our national production would not attain the present level until three years from now. They are all starting at that same old dirge again. I think Mr. Winters joined in it the other day as well. I say this, Mr. Speaker. The same authors and the same spokesmen are abroad in the land again. The propaganda trumpets are being tuned for another doleful dirge on this nation's economy. Mr. Speaker, may I say that the people today know who told them the truth.

I could go into the questions of trade and agriculture. As far as trade is concerned, all of us know the tremendous expansion that is taking place. Every effort is being made to ensure that for the first time in the Department of Trade and Commerce we go out after trade in every part of the world.

Agriculture? All you have to do is ask the farmers: "What about your incomes"? What did the pegging of the dollar do? You remember what hon. members opposite said. They said to the farmers: "You are going to lose your markets. This is a very serious situation. Prices are going to go down." That was repeated over and over again. Let me say this. We have extensive measures in mind under the Agricultural Rehabilitation and Development Act, ARDA, which in the years ahead I believe will stand as a monument to the greatness of the contribution of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton), a charter for the development of rural communities and maximum utilization of the nation's land and resources.

I am not going into the question of social security, except to say this. We cannot get anything through in this house because all the official opposition does is watch the clock to be sure nothing will pass within a reasonable length of time. That has been their attitude. Let none of them say they have not been boasting about it, because during Christmas week the old propagandist for that party started to say to the press: "We will hold them up so they will not be able to get their estimates through. We will hold them up so they will not get any money and then they will have to go to the country." Then the individual in question, whom that shrug of the shoulders along with other movements identifies, went on to say: "They will not get anything through; they will not get their estimates through." That has been the attitude throughout.

Social security? We want to bring about an opportunity to have portable pensions under way in co-operation with the provinces. We want an opportunity in this house to bring in a program for a contributory old age security plan on the basis of survivor benefits. It cannot be done without an amendment to the constitution. In view of the opposition of one of the provinces I feel that we should now give consideration to bringing about the adoption of such a plan without survivor benefits in order that we may carry out that which we have tried to, namely an improved and beneficent social security program under which you and I will contribute during our earning years up to a date when we become pensionable.

In addition, the hon. member for Red Deer asked: "What are your further plans?" I think one problem that has to be met is the question of urban redevelopment by means of a program in that connection. That is something that affects almost every member of this house. The constituency of the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. McGee) covers an area that was farm land when I was a boy and today it is settled with 250,000 people. There must be co-operation with the provinces. A plan must be worked out. We want the opportunity to present this kind of thing. We want to get the legislation on the order paper passed—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): And a lot more.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —and, as the Minister of Justice says, a lot more. You say: "What would you do?" I ask you, what can we do but invoke closure, and I shall never adopt closure because I remember the way the official opposition crucified parliament. If our hands are tied they are not tied by the other two parties but by the official opposition. They bear the responsibility. Oh, they can smile. The Leader of the Opposition smirks—

Mr. Pearson: No, smiles.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —but at the same time he knows who it is that is holding up legislation. We put it before parliament. They hold it up. We place before you our views on defence.

An hon. Member: Which ones?

Mr. Diefenbaker: We will bring in the new estimates—they are available—within a period of two weeks.

Mr. Nowlan: One week.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Within a period of one week.

Mr. Nowlan: They are available today but only in one language.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We will bring down a budget within four weeks or so—I think within four weeks.

Mr. Nowlan: By the last day of February or before.

Mr. Diefenbaker: By the end of February. I thought the opposition wanted a budget. They do not want a budget, Mr. Speaker. They are afraid of what it will contain.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They do not want it. Oh, they will go to the people. Do you know what they thought I would do? They thought I would recommend dissolution and then they would say: They denied us a budget, they denied us the opportunity to pass legislation, they denied all these things. I have put it on their doorstep now.

I can understand their feeling. You know, they are conscience stricken over what happened to the Canadian economy. They are fearful of what will be in the budget, so they come along and challenge on the same old grounds and in the same old words, the same vocabulary, that they used before we were in office a matter of a few weeks. They do not want a budget. They came up with the idea that we should use Governor General's warrants instead of supply. We are giving them the chance to permit us placing the rest of our legislative program before the house, in addition to what we already have on the order paper—a program which is needed in every part of this country.

The Leader of the Opposition quoted Cromwell or rather misquoted him. I say, using Cromwell's words: Do something to assure Canada legislation that we will pass with your assistance, and which we cannot pass unless you co-operate.

Mr. Pearson: Who said that?

An hon. Member: Cromwell never heard of Canada.

Mr. Pearson: Jimmy Cromwell.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Do you want to frustrate our program? Certainly you do. Do you want to prevent a budget? They want to prevent us, Mr. Speaker, from completing the national development act, and they have done so. We have been five years in office and development in all parts of the country has been greater than under any government in the same period. We want to complete the national economic development board act. What good is it in its present form? What are we supposed to do? They say, why don't you organize? How can you organize to secure the consideration of something that the opposition is doing everything in its power to prevent being enacted? They have followed that course.

I want to see an examination of legislation. I want to see all the bills looked into carefully. I do not want to take from parliament the right to discuss any particular matter, but when you get the same repetitious nonsense during the discussion of all the bills that have been introduced you can only conclude that what is being done is being done for a purpose. They are going to vote nonconfidence to prevent us bringing in this legislation, they say, to prevent our bringing into effect something that has been requested over and over again, a feed policy for the eastern farmers; that is on the order paper today.

The following resolution will appear on the order paper, to introduce a measure to provide for the adequate supply of feed grain for livestock in eastern Canada, for the establishment of an eastern livestock feed board; to provide for the making of assistance payments by the board in respect of the transportation, carrying and storage of feed grains. My hon. friends over in the Social Credit group have been asking for something like this. It is being placed on the order paper now, following a full examination that has taken place. Now you are asked to vote it down; to say you do not want it. Well, that is what the Liberals want to achieve.

What about the western farmer? What about the two-price system and the distribution we have made over the years? Are you going to turn that down? This is what it amounts to if you vote non-confidence. You say to the western farmer and the western people that such a system should not be adopted.

We have other matters of legislation in the field of trade and commerce, and so on, to accelerate the economy. I do not come before you to ask for your support. I simply say this. If you vote against us in the house you are actually playing into the hands of the official opposition. What about the other two parties? What about Social Credit? Well, no part of our policy is determined elsewhere than by ourselves. Yesterday, you were cajoled and pampered by the Leader of the Opposition. I never saw anybody smile with such a benign look in your direction. He loves thee, but he loved you not until yesterday.

An hon. Member: We know that.

Alleged Lack of Government Leadership

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, do you remember the stories they told of the Social Credit member immediately after the election? I am not going to put them on the record, but they had you as people who were going to government house in order to get your car and chauffeur and some of you supposedly went to Quebec city in order to find your office in the legislative building. When I heard that stuff I said that was the same old song as they sang in 1922 regarding the Progressives. They told the same stories, then, but at that time they did not have a chauffeur included. That was the attitude of the Liberal party and that has been their attitude throughout.

Do you remember the night of November 9 in this house when you were held up to contempt? Now they say, join with us. What for? For your benefit? I say to my friends of the N.D.P., greater love hath no man than the Leader of the Opposition for you today. When you line up to prevent this legislative program, you deny the budget for which you have been asking. I say to each and every one of you—I cannot speak to the unregenerate opposite because there is no hope of salvation for them—remember this group. I see them here often. This is the same bunch who trampled on the rights of parliament day after day, who destroy any vestige of argument and refuse us even the opportunity to speak. Have they reformed? Well, Mr. Speaker, we saw the nature of their reform a few days before Christmas when, by organized disorder, they prevented me from speaking in this house.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the old question comes back, can the leopard change its spots? These are the facts. I place them before you as fairly as I can under the circumstances. They talk in the amendment about lack of leadership. I ask the Leader of the Opposition, is it leadership that he is showing in preventing parliament from dealing with these matters?

"Confusion"—who used that word?

First he said "I don't believe in nuclear weapons." Then he went to New York and came back and said, yes. Then he went to his constituency and said "I did not say 'yes, I was in favour of nuclear weapons'. I would only have them until I am able to get an agreement not to have them."

Mr. Speaker, I ask this house for a vote of confidence, for the opportunity to do the things we want to do and have been denied the opportunity of doing. I have no appeals to make but I feel that the people of Canada want us to complete our legislative program, get our estimates through, and then all of us will be able to say to the people of Canada, "We received a mandate. It was an uncertain one. As the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) said, we are a house of minorities, but we carried out the mandate given to us."

We can only give the people a chance, but before we do that do not let us risk an election campaign now. The other day I saw the benefits of calling an election, thinking only of the political consequences in our favour. But I asked "What will its effect be on a rising economy in the years ahead and the months ahead, unless we get those things on the statute books that would continue the upsurge of the economy of Canada?" I now ask a vote of confidence from all hon. members in the house.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would not intervene again in this debate but for the remarks of the Prime Minister, so many of which were directed to me, and the remarks of the house leader last night, so many of which were directed to me personally, challenging me to do this and challenging me to say that. I feel I must accept the invitation given to me again this afternoon in such courteous tones by the Prime Minister, to state my views on certain matters which apparently he had not satisfied himself about in my previous intervention.

Mr. Speaker, we have heard a passionate plea on the part of the Prime Minister for support from the opposition parties so that he may remain in power, so that he may remain in power not to complete the work but to begin the work that he promised to do.

The Prime Minister and his friends accuse us of being arrogant for power when we do our duty as an opposition, taking advantage of every legitimate opportunity to get rid of this government which has done so little for the Canadian people. How are we to describe the plea of the Prime Minister speaking for a government which has failed for five years and demanding that we give them another chance to bring their legislation before parliament? It reminds me of the story of the teen-age boy who killed his mother and father with an axe and then pleaded for clemency from the judge on the ground that he was an orphan.

It was a plea for power and a plea for support from those sources which are necessary to the Prime Minister, if he is not to be defeated this evening; and that is why he made his direct and definite appeal to the parties to my left. Indeed he went so far as to murmur something, trying to challenge our right to address our remarks to all parts of the house, about greater love has no man. This apparently was an attempt to undermine any appeal I might have made.

I do not recall making any great appeal. The members in the other parties will do what they think is right and best for the country, and we shall leave it at that. But I would like to adapt the Prime Minister's quotation of greater love, in view of the events of the last few days, to put it this way, that perhaps greater love hath no man than this, that he lay down his friend for his life. I think, however, that the Prime Minister, who got a great deal of assistance from prompters around him—and I am sure he appreciated it as I do on this side when I am privileged to receive it—should be given that kind of admiration and sympathy that is afforded to a surgeon who is conducting an operation for appendicitis on a table in the cook's galley of a plunging ship in the midst of a North Atlantic storm. He is certainly doing his best with the weapons at his disposal and in the circumstances in which he finds himself.

This afternoon he made a great play of the fact that all the rumours that have been spreading are put out by the propaganda machine of the Liberal party. Mr. Speaker, since when has the propaganda machine of the Liberal party found its headquarters in this building in the office of a Conservative cabinet minister?

The Prime Minister went over the legislative proposals of the government which he says only the Liberal opposition are preventing from being put into effect. He exempted the other two opposition parties from any charge or any criticism of this kind. He says "Only give us a chance and we will get all these things through." One of the things he mentioned—and I will pick only one because I have not time to expose the falsity of the other arguments and illustrations that he brought forward—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You have unlimited time.

Mr. Pearson: —as one illustration of what they had been trying to do was the matter of portable pensions. There is something. He said, "If we had only had a chance we could have got that measure through". Well, Mr. Speaker, that proposal was in the speech from the throne. A national scheme of portable pensions, to which this party is committed, of course requires co-operation, consultation and agreement with the provinces. When we asked the question the other day as to whether any steps had been taken to get in touch with the provinces in connection with this very important matter, when we asked for a return on this matter, we found that at the time the question was asked not a single communication had gone to a single provincial government. This is what we mean when we say this government does not know how to conduct the business of parliament and the business of the country.

Then he goes on to say, "Over on the opposition side they filibuster. They stand in the way. They obstruct. Everything would be through if it were not for them". He ignores the fact that, as I said yesterday, the government rejected every opportunity but one to bring supply forward last autumn and they kept parliament from meeting until September 27. They have allowed only one supply day this session and we have had no request for interim supply even though the last interim supply was exhausted on February 1. Can they blame it on us if they managed their business that way?

So far as taking up time is concerned, the Prime Minister has made some very general accusations, in his normal way of making very general accusations, without supporting them with detailed evidence which will stand up under examination. Not the kind of evidence he brought forward the other day when he was quoting from a report of a statement which I made and from which he left out the word "not". I do not mean that kind of evidence; I mean evidence that will stand up under examination. Let us see, Mr. Speaker, what is the record of this parliament. It has already been stated this afternoon in a question addressed to the Prime Minister by my hon. friend to my left that a good deal of legislation has been passed. More legislation has been passed this session than was passed in the last session, when the government had 205 members. So that in itself does not bear out the accusation of complete obstruction. But who is doing the talking? Who are holding things up, if things are being held up? Who is responsible for exercising the time honoured right of members of parliament to discuss legislation and proposals before they go through? According to the Prime Minister the situation is, "Let us bring them in. Let us get them through. That is all that matters". He is so anxious to get things through this house that he will not even let us discuss $200 million of taxation imposed by order in council. He will not even bring that matter before the house. That is really carrying efficiency to the maximum.

But in so far as those matters which have been brought before the house are concerned, what has happened? With regard to the national economic development board, a very important piece of legislation, on November 27, 28 and 29 five Liberals spoke, three Progressive Conservatives, four Social Crediters —four out of a party of 30—and three New Democratic party members out of 19. On the Atlantic development board, a government measure which had the support of the government, which they now claim they wanted to get through at once and that we were holding it up, 17 Progressive Conservatives felt it necessary—and I do not criticize them —to talk in favour of a measure which they already supported and which they were not going to change. Twenty one Liberals spoke on that measure and put forward amendments to make it a better measure, and there were seven Social Crediters and 12 New Democratic party spokesmen. When that bill went into committee there were 49 Progressive Conservative members who spoke on it without proposing any changes whatever, but who rose to their feet to say, "This is a wonderful bill. Let us get it through, so 49 of us will make speeches on it". On second reading, Mr. Speaker, there were four Liberal, five Progressive Conservative, two Social Credit and three New Democratic party spokesmen; and on the last day, November 20, the Conservatives had to filibuster their own bill in committee for an hour and a half because there was no other business ready for the house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is not true.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: My hon. friend, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fleming) was, I think, in Japan and was not aware of what was going on here.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I was in Japan when the house was in recess.

Mr. Pearson: He may have been telling the Japanese people there was no unemployment in Canada. Then we had a supply motion, the only supply motion brought forward last autumn. This government complains that they cannot get their estimates through, and they brought in one supply motion last autumn and introduced the estimates of one department of government—

Mr. Churchill: Six.

Mr. Pearson: They introduced the estimates of one department of government, the Department of Agriculture, for consideration. Most of the time in considering item No. 1 of those estimates was taken up by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hamilton) filibustering his own estimates in order to explain what he really meant by something he said out west. It took him an hour or so to do it. Speaking on the supply motion on November 5 and November 6 the Conservatives spent two hours and three minutes, the Liberals two hours and 49 minutes, the Social Crediters one hour and 43 minutes—which is a pretty good percentage of the time—and the New Democratic party one hour and 10 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, I have to go through this evidence because the Prime Minister made these vague and general statements and the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Churchill) made equally vague and general statements last evening. In view of this we will just look into the facts and try to get the truth, which is a very important thing to do in these situations. The budget resolutions last autumn took up eight days, including four short days, in committee of ways and means. On those discussions—and they were very important discussions on the economic state of the nation—in the budget debate without a budget, as we called it, the Liberals spent six hours and 44 minutes analysing the economy and the government's proposals, if they had any, to deal with the state of the economy, the Social Credit party spent six hours and 19 minutes, the Progressive Conservatives three hours and 36 minutes, and the New Democratic party three hours and 49 minutes. With regard to the debate on the address, the Conservatives spent 14 hours and 16 minutes, and we spent 14 hours and 31 minutes. On the resolution in connection with the farm loan bill, a bill which was so important and so perfect that no change could be made to it, all we had to do was get it through the house at once, the Progressive Conservatives—this was a bill they were supporting and which they did not want to change; all they wanted to do was praise it—spent two hours and 48 minutes, while it took the Liberals two hours and 26 minutes to try to make it a better bill.

Mr. Speaker, that is the evidence to support the record. If, in the face of that record, the Prime Minister and his government want to go to the country on the charge of obstruction, as they tried to do last June, that is perfectly all right with us.

The Prime Minister made great play this afternoon on the improvements in the economy and he produced evidence to support his statement that there has been an encouraging improvement in the economy in recent months. The Prime Minister is, of course, following his usual practice of manufacturing straw men of enormous size so that they will be much more impressive when he knocks them down. He accused us last year of prophesying doom and gloom in the budget debate—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Throughout the campaign.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Mr. Pearson: If the Prime Minister would bother to look at the speech I was able to make in the few minutes which remained after the budget, before dissolution, he will find that my criticism at that time of the minister of finance, now the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fleming) was that he had been a little too pessimistic in his calculations with respect to the economy during the current year. We thought it would be rather better than the prediction the minister of finance had made.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You cannot support that.

Mr. Pearson: The Prime Minister has talked about greed for office. I would remind the right hon. gentleman that his government, in its determination to go to the polls at a time they thought it would be best for them in order to hold on to office—and I am not complaining about that—called an election a year ago, one year before they needed to do so. They called that election without the budget having been discussed. They called that election knowing a financial crisis was approaching, and the evidence which has been submitted to parliament this session proves this to have been so beyond a shadow of a doubt.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That statement is false.

Mr. Pearson: They called an election in these circumstances hoping they could get through it before the financial crisis occurred in a way which would require devaluation of the dollar during the election period. Unfortunately, the government's calculations were wrong. The financial crisis developed more quickly than they had expected and they had to devalue the dollar under pressure, in crisis conditions, in the middle of an election. In spite of devaluation the financial crisis got worse and worse until we reached the situation which confronted the government the day after the election. What did they do then to get Canada out of that really critical difficulty? They went down to Washington and saw "those people" in Washington and New York. They sent their experts across the border to say: We are in trouble. Will you help us out to the extent of one billion United States dollars?

The Prime Minister had a good deal to say about defence. He was somewhat harsh with me because I had not said anything on defence in my statement yesterday—although I did, I believe, spend some 25 or 30 minutes on the subject of defence, using it as an illustration in support of the amendment we were moving that the government, as a result of its indecisive, weak and contradictory policies is incapable of handling the nation's business. Defence was a good illustration of that contention. But the Prime Minister wants some more categorical statements from this side as to our defence policy even though he, as the head of a government, refuses to tell us what his defence policy is. There seems to be no way at all by which we can force this government to undertake its primary responsibility of telling this house and the people what exactly its policy is in national defence at the present time. They just will not do it. They are drifting along hoping for the best and hoping they can continue to drift until after the day of the election—and that is not going to be far ahead now.

This afternoon the Prime Minister did not have anybody else to clarify or interpret his remarks, so he attempted to do that himself. He attempted to clarify—I think the word he used was "simplify"—his earlier stand. His earlier stand certainly needs both simplification and clarification. I defy anyone to get either simplification or clarification or, indeed, intelligence from the Prime Minister's statement today as to what the defence policy of this government is. He rambled around a good deal. He attempted to throw some light into dark corners. But he did not succeed in any way, shape or form in reconciling the differences, which are now out in the open, and obvious, between himself and the former minister of national defence. Those differences were made very clear last night by the minister when he appeared before a television press conference. And I may add that the stand taken by the former minister last night can hardly be attributed to the Liberal propaganda machine.

Then, apparently in an attempt to justify his own position in this matter, whatever that may be, the Prime Minister struck a blow for civilian control of defence policy. It should not be necessary to repeat in this house or in any democratic assembly in a sovereign state that civilian control of military and defence policy is essential. It has been so in our country. It will continue to be so, as well as, I hope, in all free countries.

As the Prime Minister said this afternoon—I think I am quoting him correctly—"The business of defence is too serious to be left to the generals". Presumably it requires civilians. But the former minister of national defence had something to say about that, too, last night in his television broadcast. He indicated that the business of defence is also too serious to be left to people who do not know anything about it and who are not experts in it.

Then the Prime Minister, in order to justify this government's policy of drift and delay, which has been going on for so long in defence, this afternoon repeats what he tried to convince us was the situation a week or so ago, namely that there have been two recent developments which require further delay. He referred this afternoon, once again, to the NATO council meeting in Ottawa in May—and we shall be very glad indeed to welcome that NATO council to Ottawa in May—and the Nassau declaration, the declaration by the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom. Our Prime Minister said once again that this declaration places our role in NATO and in continental and collective defence in some doubt—that it may be changed. It is strange indeed that one of the parties to that declaration, the United States itself, denies that any such result will flow from that declaration. I should not need to say anything more about this, because the minister of national defence took that view last night, and he ought to know. So far as the NATO meeting is concerned, are we now in a position in this country when the re-examination, reconsideration and renegotiation, if you like, of our defence policy is to be made in May of 1963 at a NATO council meeting in Ottawa without this parliament knowing anything at all about the proposals the government is placing before that council?

Of course this is just a smokescreen. We all know that. Some of us know something about how the NATO council operates. This is the spring meeting of the NATO council. It will last for a couple of days at the most. Here in fact this NATO council meeting in Ottawa is going to re-examine and revise Canadian policy. We are in February now, Mr. Speaker. Believe me, the government of this country should have some indication of what that renegotiation and revision is. Of course they have not any indication of it. They have no proposals for that purpose. However, they are using this council meeting as an excuse for further delay. They hope they can get beyond the election period without having to say anything about this matter. They blame it on Nassau. They blame it on NATO.

Mr. Green: Of course that is not true.

Mr. Hellyer: It is true; it is the truth and the whole truth.

Mr. Pearson: There are, of course, some negotiations going on. We do not know about any negotiations going on with NATO. But we do not know about negotiations going on as a result of Nassau with Canada. We know, of course, that the whole question of a NATO nuclear deterrent is under review now. It did not take a Nassau communique to tell us that. In December, 1957, the NATO council committed itself to the use of nuclear tactical defensive weapons for deterrent and protection purposes. They have discussed how to do that ever since. At Nassau the United Kingdom and the United States leaders brought forward a positive plan by which one aspect of this nuclear deterrent could be transferred from intermediate ballistic missiles to submarines with Polaris missiles. That was the extent of their contribution to this discussion of a NATO nuclear deterrent, and this has nothing whatever to do with any Canadian contribution to NATO. The Prime Minister himself must know that if he knows anything about these matters.

Mr. Green: May I ask the Leader of the Opposition a question?

Mr. Pearson: Yes.

Mr. Green: Does he place no importance at all on this question of a multilateral nuclear force which, as he knows, is practically a brand new subject for discussion in NATO?

Mr. Pearson: Indeed, I place the greatest possible importance on it and I shall be glad to discuss that matter in a moment. However, I also know that this question of a multilateral nuclear deterrent force in NATO, as the minister knows, has been under discussion for quite a long time.

Mr. Green: No; this is a brand new scheme.

Mr. Pearson: As the minister should know, the alteration in some of the earlier plans takes the form of building up a NATO nuclear deterrent on the sea with Polaris missiles in submarines under NATO control.

Mr. Green: Plus tactical weapons.

Mr. Pearson: Yes, plus nuclear tactical weapons. But what has this to do with the Bomarc in Canada, the CF-101 in Canada or the CF-104 in our NATO air division which has the role of strike reconnaissance which will not be effected at all by this change?

Mr. Green: The Leader of the Opposition would not wish to misinform the house. The question of the CF-104 comes primarily under that multilateral nuclear control and is under discussion in the NATO council.

Mr. Pearson: Of course that is so. There is no doubt about that. Every part of the NATO force in Europe is under NATO control in that sense. Every contribution from every NATO member which is part of SACEUR comes under the NATO command. However, the minister knows that no proposal has been made to remove the function of strike reconnaissance from NATO and that no proposal has been made to take that function away from the Canadian air division. That is the point at issue. These changes which are taking place now are not changes which are going to affect the role which the government has accepted for the Canadian forces overseas.

Mr. Green: They may do so.

Mr. Pearson: I think the Secretary of State for External Affairs will agree with me in this regard, if that change were recommended by the NATO authorities, and they may in time be recommended. In view of the fact that it took us four years from the time we agreed to take on this role until the planes were being delivered, does the Secretary of State for External Affairs think these changes could be made overnight? If it takes a long time to make these changes—and I am thinking of a year or two years—is the Secretary of State for External Affairs satisfied to leave this air division in Europe without any effective weapons at all during that time?

The Prime Minister said the other day "We are continuing to negotiate with the United States". This was the first mention of negotiations. This mention of negotiations was criticized, and quite rightly, by the United States secretary of state as making public the fact of such confidential negotiations without letting them know in advance. It is something we had no right to do, any more than they had a right to issue that note of theirs. However, I have not heard any indication of regret on the part of the Prime Minister that he let this information out in his speech, about these negotiations. We were not told in this House of Commons even what department of government was taking part in them. We have not yet been told that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You were told that yesterday.

Mr. Green: Yes, you were told that yesterday.

Mr. Pearson: Read your Hansard.

Mr. McIlraith: You refused to answer.

Mr. Pearson: In these negotiations the Prime Minister said we will continue to hope to make arrangements so that nuclear warheads will be readily available. What a farcical position to take in the light of the experience of last October over Cuba: we will continue to negotiate so that these nuclear warheads will be readily available after the emergency develops. It would be of great comfort to the air defence command of this continent to know this if there should be—and I pray God there never will be—a bomber attack on this continent. These things are no good against missiles; we all agree on that matter. If there should be, supplementary to a missile attack, a bomber attack on this continent it would be a great comfort to them to know they would have two bases in Canada which would play their part in defence after we get the missiles from the United States when the attack has begun.

Nothing could be more ridiculous than that policy. As long as there was any opportunity of changing that policy before the missiles were in place and before the stations had been acquired, we thought it should be changed. But the missiles are there now. The CF-101's are in the squadrons. The CF-104's are being delivered to the squadrons. If we have got so far, as the former minister of national defence is now pointing out, where these weapons are in place and where our men are expected to use them, we must now take that final step without which the other steps do not mean anything at all. We have just thrown away three quarters of a billion dollars. What we on this side say is this, and—I hope this will answer the Prime Minister, when he says that we have no policy. What we on this side say is this. The time having come for a decision—a decision which could have been avoided perhaps up until a year ago, as the minister of national defence admitted in his statement—we on this side think the government should make the decision; and if they do so, if they take the final step, we will support them in that step. If they refuse to do that, and if they leave our squadrons without the weapons, and if we have the responsibility, we will see that our men are armed with the weapons with which to carry out the role which this government gave them for Canada and which the Prime Minister admits now was given to them for Canada. However, that is not the whole story.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): He said so a week ago last Friday.

Mr. Pearson: Yes, he said so a week ago last Friday. Something which makes it all the worse, he said so in February, 1959. He makes that statement, "We will carry out our obligations", but he makes it impossible for the men who are in the field to do that. What we say is this, Mr. Speaker, and I repeat this. We say that we should honour our pledges, keep our promises, and put our forces in a position to do the job we have asked them to do for our country. We are not a country which welshes on its commitments. We are not a country which welshes on the means necessary to carry out our commitments.

It is perfectly true that in the literal sense we have discharged our commitment. We have got an air division in Europe and that is what we promised to do. But we promised more than that. We promised to give this air division the means to discharge a certain role and we have not done that. That goes also for the Bomarc bases and the interceptor squadron. But having done that, and this is where the New Democratic party and, indeed the former minister of national defence misinterpret our policy completely, we reserve the right—this is one of the very first things we would do if we had the responsibility—to re-examine the whole basis of Canadian defence policy.

We said at the beginning that these were not the right things for Canadian forces to be doing, that we thought there was a better contribution that Canada could make inside the alliance, because we believe in the alliance. We differ from the New Democratic party in that respect, because on the evidence of the resolutions at the founding convention of their party they are dedicated to the proposition of getting rid of NATO and getting rid of the Warsaw pact at the same time. We on this side are not dedicated to any proposition of that kind.

They are also dedicated to the proposition that NATO itself should not become a nuclear power. I say, Mr. Speaker, and I think the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Green) will perhaps agree with me on this, that, even if the nuclear weapons may be under the custody of one country, if control can be shared in some effective way through a NATO coalition, if we can do that, if all NATO members agree on a NATO nuclear deterrent, then Canada should not contract out from contributing to that collective deterrent. If I felt that way I would advocate withdrawal from NATO. That is not extending the nuclear club but limiting the nuclear club. That is taking nuclear weapons out of national control and putting them under collective international control.

I should like to think that that is possible. I do not know whether it will be. It is going to be a very difficult thing indeed to do, but surely that is the line along which we should be moving, toward the isolation of the nuclear deterrent under NATO—we do not want to get this all mixed up with strategic nuclear bombs—as a kind of reserve force under NATO control, whoever may have custody of the weapons, so that if there is an attack of any kind on the NATO front line that attack can be met by conventional forces and held at least for the length of time required for the political decision to be taken on which the whole fate of the world may depend.

That seems to me to be a very intelligible position to take, and this does not mean that we on this side are in favour of nuclear weapons as such.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: Certainly not.

Alleged Lack of Government Leadership

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: Hon. gentlemen opposite may laugh. Perhaps they are in favour of nuclear weapons. We are in favour of doing away with nuclear weapons, of doing away with testing, of doing away with all weapons, of doing away with war which is the ultimate immorality. But we are not going to take steps now that will dishonour the pledges we have made until we have a chance to re-examine the basis of defence policy and find a better defence policy for Canada than that which has been in effect in the last five years. That does not mean—of course it does not mean although it is being misinterpreted to mean—that the day after we accepted these weapons we would, if we were in power, repudiate that acceptance and renegotiate ourselves out of that pledge at once. Of course that could not be done. It will take time, it will take effort, and during the time that is required and the effort that is required, because we do these things in co-operation with our friends, we will continue to ensure that the men we have over there will have the weapons to do the job which they are there to do.

There are a great many things that we think can be more effectively done by Canada than some of the things we have been asked to do in the last few years or in the last 10 or 15 years, if you like, because these things go back prior to 1957. But the point is that we have now at this time accepted a certain pledge and we will carry out that pledge until we get a better defence policy for Canada which will make this kind of weapon, I would hope, unnecessary. I am not even going to say now that our renegotiation will be on the basis that we will never be able to use nuclear weapons because by that time we may have a genuine NATO nuclear deterrent under NATO control. So I will not in advance, so far as I have any responsibility and so far as my own views are concerned, contract out of participation in that kind of NATO defence activity.

There is the situation so far as our defence policy is concerned. I am satisfied that we can work this out in collaboration with our friends—our friends in Washington in so far as continental defence is concerned, our friends in NATO in so far as NATO defence is concerned. It does not add anything to the dignity of debate on these matters for the Prime Minister of this country to suggest that any time anybody on this side goes across the border he goes across to get his instructions and come back and make a speech here. That is the kind of cheap insinuation in which the Prime Minister is so expert.

The Prime Minister made great play with the fact that we make our own policies in Canada. Who is doubting that? Who made policy in Canada from 1935 to 1957? If you think that Canada was a satellite of the United States during those years, go down to Washington and ask the people who were in charge then. Go to the United Nations and find out what Canadian policy was at the United Nations and whether we were a satellite of any country.

An hon. Member: Tell us about Suez.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Who made the policy in 1938 when you kept Britain out?

Mr. Pearson: We want to get back to those days when Canada was so respected, because she did make her own policy; when Canada was so respected because she made her own policy in co-operation and friendship with her allies.

(Translation):

Mr. Gilles Gregoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, about a month ago, while the members of this house were at home in their riding during the holiday season recess, an American general, General Norstad, visited Ottawa. He made some statements and the Liberal party got so excited that they find themselves in confusion today.

During the last week or so, we heard very long speeches, four in all by the Liberal party leader and several also by the government head, but in all those speeches, no mention was ever made of the programs required to solve this country's problems. Efforts were made particularly to spread confusion and to cast blame on the other party. I suggest that everything the Liberals said about the Conservative party is true and everything the Conservatives said about the Liberal party is also true. Both parties are right when they criticize each other. It is remarkable that when a party is in the opposition, it always seems better than when in power. But when they are in power, both of them, whether it be the Liberal party during 22 years or the Conservative party today, we find that they are irresolute and confused. The opposition party can always pretend it can do everything. Those gentlemen are so efficient when they sit on this side, they make fine speeches and from what they say one would think they can do anything.

If the Canadian people could only attend the debates of the house, they would realize that the old line parties are better in the opposition than in power. They would then take the two old line parties and place them both in the opposition. Then, with a new party, we should be—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gregoire: That is the comedy which has been repeated for 97 years, with those two old line parties always contradicting themselves, depending on which side of the house they sit.

I hope this situation has enlightened the people of Canada and that they will resolve to cast aside these two old political parties that for years have been encrusted in routine and have done absolutely nothing for the people, except to rant at each other. I hope that before long they will elect a party which will not merely hunger for power but will legislate for the people, so as to enact legislations which will give satisfaction to the people and enable them to live contentedly in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I must say that I have been amazed at the attitude taken by the leader of the Liberal party in this house in the last week. In four long speeches, each lasting about an hour and a half, he repeated himself, of course, but brought forward no policy. He quoted statistics; so many hours, minutes, and seconds for the speeches of each party. Much good that did us. That is what he does all the time. He contradicted himself. Ever since General Norstad made his statement, the Leader of the Opposition seized upon it to make political capital out of it, and changed his stand and his line of argument as often as he changes shirts.

Mr. Speaker, what is exactly the position of the Liberal party at this moment? That position was stated yesterday by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), who made a good job of it indeed, but I find the position taken by the leader of the Liberal party so ridiculous that he cannot expect to run the affairs of a country like Canada, and this is something that we should do well to point out today to the people of Canada.

The leader of the Liberal party says: We are against atomic weapons, but we have given our word. Let us honour our commitments, let us accept atomic weapons and, afterwards, we shall do everything we can to get rid of them. That is the situation.

Mr. Legare: He never said that.

Mr. Gregoire: Did you ever hear a more ridiculous argument, coming from a statesman. And that proves one thing. When he was second in command, when he was working behind the scene, in other words, when he was only a civil servant and relied on his superiors for orders, the present leader of the Liberal party could afford to work for peace. But the leadership of his party went to his head and since he cannot do without orders, he sought them from foreigners. Since then he has been putting forward arguments like the ones he is setting forth now.

Mr. Caouette: Silly arguments.

Mr. Gregoire: Yes, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) is quite right; those are silly arguments.

While listening to the speech the Leader of the Opposition delivered a few minutes ago, I noticed two striking contradictions.

He called for the arming of our NATO forces with nuclear weapons and, then, a few minutes later, he stated that NATO should not be allowed to become a nuclear power.

Mr. Legare: He did not say that.

Mr. Gregoire: That is what he said this afternoon. If your ears are blocked, wash them.

I should like to refer to certain remarks made by the Leader of the Opposition on January 25, 1963. Page 3125 of Hansard bears witness to another contradiction on the part of the hon. member. Here is what he said:

> —as I stated earlier today, I accept the necessity, as does our party, of the nuclear deterrent.

A little further, on the same page and in the same column, he continued as follows:

> I therefore repeat that, while keeping our pledges—

And by that he meant the acquisition of nuclear weapons.

> —we would seek a better and more effective defence role for Canada in the alliance—

Mr. Speaker, if the leader of the Liberal opposition wishes our country to play a better role, why is he satisfied with mediocrity, with playing second fiddle? He has been contradicting himself without end on that point. The statement he made this afternoon was yet another contradiction.

The saddest part of all this is that only a few months ago hon. members, especially those from the province of Quebec, were strongly and uncompromisingly against the acquisition of nuclear armaments for Canada. And now, like sheep and followers, like slaves before their master, they crawl before him. Even if it is not their opinion, they agree. Yes chief, all right chief, we want nuclear weapons now.

Mr. Speaker, as I said already, voters of this country were betrayed in the past by members of the old line parties because they were crawling on all fours before the contributors to the electoral funds. In fact, instead of following ideas expressed by their constituents, those members were willing to bend backwards in order to please their leader, to remain within their party and to keep the electoral fund well filled. What we see today is another striking example.

Mr. Speaker, when we think of all the travelling done by the Liberal leader to New York or Washington, when we see all the support he can obtain from the Americans, we are wondering whether the electoral fund of the Liberal party will not be replenished by our neighbours to the south, for the next election.

The June 18 election has established one fact. Today, the people understand, the people have seen through the makeup of the two old parties. They have realized that they have been too long betrayed and deceived by the old parties. People know that there is something stronger than electoral funds, something stronger than the financial backers behind the electoral funds. That is the will of the people expressed on voting day which can make or break political parties, financiers and electoral funds. Now gentlemen of the two old parties, you will see in the next election that the people have understood that you were betraying them and selling them down the river to financial interests.

Mr. Speaker, when we are told: "Let us accept nuclear arms, let us arm the Bomarc missiles with nuclear warheads", and at the same time we hear that, "of course, the Bomarc missiles are now obsolete, they are of no use by now, they are just like pea-shooters", we may wonder why there is so much propaganda today in this country for having Canada buy obsolete armament, which is not going to be used anyway.

Those gentlemen on the back benches while blindly following their leader, who is serving other interests, might well wonder, if such attitude is not simply helping those financially interested who, as they always did in the past, want to get rich producing arms, for which we have to pay taxes and levies.

Mr. Speaker, the Liberal party has won a good name in the past. Our Canadian citizens, and more particularly those of the province of Quebec, were hired for our armament plants. In that way, the Liberals created work, paid salaries, and, once their munitions were manufactured, these were thrown into the St. Lawrence river, under the bridge to the island of Orleans, which gave the Liberal party an excellent reputation.

Mr. Caouette: And what about Sorel?

Mr. Gregoire: At Sorel, it was the same thing.

But today, they don't even want our Canadians to work in arms factories. No, they want to get arms from the United States, to enrich American money-men, forgetting, at the same time, that they failed to give jobs to our Canadian citizens. I would rather that those arms were made in Canada to be thrown into the river later. At least, our Canadian citizens would be able to get some work. Today, they would rather go and buy nuclear bombs, which only the Americans are able to manufacture and which are controlled by them, when and if they sell us some. Afterwards, we are told: "We shall never use them."

And, as far as we are concerned, we must pay for them. Should we let them do this without telling the Canadian people that it is their own money, paid in taxes and imposts, which will buy arms that will not only increase the danger of war and tension in the world, but will never be used and will remain under complete American control? Should we accept that? Never.

Mr. Cardin: Would the hon. member allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. Gregoire: Ask any question you want.

Mr. Cardin: Does the hon. member not think that it is up to the Canadian government to take all possible action and to acquire every possible armament to protect Canada against communism?

Mr. Gregoire: Certainly. But the hon. member does not know which arms can really fight communism. In fact, communism has never been successfully fought by warfare. On the contrary, it has developed during wars. And those who are responsible for the resurgence of capitalism throughout the world are politicians like those who are sitting on my right and on the opposite benches, who have never tried to help people find lodging and food, and who have done nothing to alleviate their hardships. It is then that communism is born. Russia is the most striking example I can find of a country where communism crept in under cover of a war. The Polish people did not want communism. It was forced upon them in the course of a war, and the same thing happened in Czechoslovakia and in Hungary. The citizens of those two countries did not want war, but they were compelled with guns—

Mr. Cardin: Could I put a question to the hon. member?

Mr. Gregoire: Yes.

Mr. Cardin: Does the hon. member not admit that, had it not been for NATO, Russia would have invaded the whole of western Europe?

Mr. Caouette: It has in fact invaded it.

Mr. Cardin: Not western Europe, eastern Europe.

Mr. Gregoire: Listen carefully—yesterday, some hon. members opposite said that you do not always ask intelligent questions, and you just did again. Do I believe that had it not been for NATO, and so on—come now. How should I know? NATO was there. Would Russia have invaded Europe had it not been for NATO? I do not know, no more than you do. If you have other questions, go ahead, but no hypothetical questions like that one.

Communism has never developed nor expanded over the world through wars—

Mr. Cardin: NATO was not in existence during the war.

Mr. Gregoire: —but always as a result of hardship. And from the day you get that into your little heads, you will really begin to fight communism.

Go through Canada, through this country of ours, go out in your constituencies and see how many people are unemployed, how many farmers are not even able to live on their land, how many people are living on unemployment insurance benefits, on unemployment assistance or on social assistance. You will find cases of extreme poverty. If you are near the people, you will notice that in the minds of each and every individual who is undergoing hardship in a rich country like Canada, there are germs of revolution against government, against parliament, against our institutions. Why? Because those people see that they cannot prosper in spite of the wealth of their country.

I can remember when, in the 1957 election what a walloping you took, you Liberals, and you are not through getting it on the nose unless you change your attitude. I remember when the Prime Minister and his ministers were making the round of constituencies in a "baby kissing" campaign. Indeed there was no end of pictures showing the Prime Minister kissing a small baby he was holding in his arms, while you yourselves went about the country repeating "Canada is rich, Canada is prosperous."

You were saying about the same thing I have been hearing since yesterday, when the Conservatives claimed they have been doing everything, that everything is going fine, that production is growing, and so on. If that is so, why did they bring in the austerity program? But then you Liberals had done the same thing.

In 1957, all over the country, you were saying: "Everything is fine; we are rich; we are prosperous." Where was this country's prosperity, this country's wealth? The people took it upon themselves to tell you Liberals, that you had wandered away from them, that you no longer understood them, that you were remote from the real problems of the people, and the people took it upon themselves to send back home the group of ministers who were then cabinet members. Just remember that time, gentlemen.

But five years in the opposition have not been enough to open your eyes. Five years in the opposition have not made you any wiser. You have not changed, you Liberals, and your stay in the opposition has not been long enough. But, if it is any comfort to you, we will send a second old party to sit alongside of you next time.

The Liberal party today is thinking only in terms of petty politics. It is not concerned with the administration. What is the Liberal party, exactly? It is the party of taxation. Remember the financial situation of this country when you took office in 1935, and what it had become in 1957 when you went out.

Mr. Caouette: The party of taxation, the party of war.

Mr. Gregoire: The party of taxation, the party of debts that now weigh upon us. The other day, you voted for debt-free money, and you did not even know what it was. In fact, you have never even understood the first thing about it. You will never understand anything, because you grovel before big interests. When man is dazzled by the golden calf, he does not see anything on either side of him: he is blind. That is just about where you stand today. You did not understand anything.

The Liberal party, especially between 1935 and 1957—and the people now know it—has always sold our natural resources and our industries to foreigners.

An hon. Member: It was Duplessis, your leader, who sold them.

Mr. Gregoire: It was Mr. Duplessis, and it was also the doing of you Liberals. So it is that now, each year this country is being bled of our money to the benefit of the United States in order to pay out $770 million in interest or dividends on foreign investments in Canada.

You, Liberals, are responsible for that situation.

You want a general election? Well, you will have one. But you will be judged according to your past. You will be judged by electors who know that you have always been the party subservient to finance, a party which did everything to enrich the rich, and was satisfied with the crumbs.

The leader of your party denounces indecision. But what did he ever decide? He does not make his decisions himself. He changes his mind according to the wish of his adviser, who helps him write his speeches, whether it be Maurice Lamontagne or Maurice Sauve. When the Maurices change, so does his opinion. Most fortunately, one of them has lost some of his influence, because someone saw to it to defeat Lamontagne.

Mr. Speaker, the political situation has been discussed in the last two days. The Conservatives tried to explain the position of the Liberals, and vice versa.

I ask the Canadian people to judge according to what they have obtained from the old line parties. In the next election, how can the people declare themselves satisfied with what they have obtained in the last 96 years? How can they pretend to be satisfied when confusion has been prevailing in the country for the past several years, through the fault of our two old line parties, when labour is set against management, and management against labour, when there is still, after 96 years, a struggle for bilingualism and biculturalism, when there is only wrangling everywhere, when our resources are being developed by foreigners, when our taxes are higher than anywhere else in the world?

With all the information media at their disposal today, how can the people fail to understand that it is time to do something in Canada?

It is time for a change; that has been said before—

Mr. Caouette: We have nothing to lose.

Mr. Gregoire: We have nothing to lose. We must try something new, that is obvious.

Besides, there are several incompetent people we could lose and it would not matter much.

Mr. Speaker, for a few months already, the people who elected our candidates have been saying: We have not lost anything, let us keep them. To those in the other ridings, we say: You have nothing to lose either.

Tonight, we will be called upon to cast our vote. We will vote neither for one old party nor for the other. We are not interested in supporting them. We will not vote against something, but for something. In any case, we will vote according to our conscience.

A while ago, I heard the Prime Minister say: "But after the way the Liberal party has treated you, after the abuse they have thrown at you, surely you are not going to vote with them?"

No, because we believe that voting with them would be prostituting ourselves from a political standpoint.

On the other hand, we have put forth a reasonable and quite sensible motion, and they will be the ones who, for once, will have the opportunity of supporting common sense and logic.

Mr. Speaker, after the events which have taken place these last few days, I cannot help saying that, if the Canadian people had been able to follow, on television—as was once suggested by the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau)—what goes on in the House of Commons, they would now be in a position not only to pass judgment but to realize that the two old line parties waste their time playing politics and do not worry enough about the people's interest.

I hope that at the next election the two old line parties will be sent back home in order to make room for those who are more competent than they are.

(Text):

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, this is a momentous debate in what may be the dying hours of this parliament. We have listened this afternoon to statements both by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Pearson) and I have no intention of getting into this controversy of the pot calling the kettle black. I have always felt that to be led down the garden path by either a Liberal or a Conservative would add nothing to one's pristine purity. In a no confidence motion a party with a small representation in this house naturally faces certain difficulties, because while we may not approve of the government, on the other hand a vote against the government would be interpreted in some quarters as being in support of the official opposition.

An hon. Member: Heaven forbid.

Mr. Douglas: A group like ours has considerable difficulty, of course, in getting its views before the public. If there is one thing the Prime Minister said this afternoon with which I agree, it is the fact that in recent weeks the press, radio and television of this country have certainly been playing a song closely akin to the desires and wishes of the Liberal party in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Douglas: The points of view expressed by other groups have, in many cases, been very successfully silenced. We in this group ever since June 18 last have refused to take a destructive attitude with reference to public affairs. Even before this parliament was convened the Leader of the Opposition was calling upon all groups to pledge themselves to voting no confidence in the government.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Douglas: Even before parliament met—

Mr. McCleave: Irresponsible.

Mr. Douglas: —every newspaper, every radio and television station was telephoning members elect and asking them what they were going to do about turning the government out. The members of this group made it abundantly clear before parliament met and after it assembled that we were not here just to turn the government out; that we were here to support any legislation which in our opinion would grapple successfully with the national and international problems confronting Canada. We recognized then, as we do now, that Canada faces a serious situation. As to the international monetary exchange crisis of last June, let me say that in spite of the Prime Minister's optimistic statement this afternoon I am not convinced it has entirely disappeared. There is the subject of economic growth and unemployment. There are the difficulties facing agriculture; the fact that we lag far behind other western countries in health and welfare programs. There is the need for new trade policies in the light of changing trade patterns throughout the world. We said that all these things demanded aggressive action and dynamic leadership. We said we were prepared to support the government if they produced this leadership and that we would vote against them if they failed to do so. Our votes have not been motivated either by a desire to get the government out or, God forbid, by a desire to get the Liberals in.

But I submit, Mr. Speaker, that having sat since September 27, because of the indecisiveness of the government and also, I think, as a result of a good deal of obstruction by the official opposition, this parliament has been reduced to a state of such impotence that the only answer now is to give the people of Canada an opportunity to go to the polls.

Let me just mention a few things we had hoped might be done during this session. We had hoped the government would grapple with the need to plan this nation's economy. I do not need to elaborate on that subject because, fortunately, in the last 12 months everyone has apparently become converted to the idea of economic planning. But all we have had to date from the government is the prospect of four boards composed mainly of part time members meeting periodically in Ottawa; four boards reporting to four separate ministers without machinery for coordinating their efforts or their plans. In many cases their terms of reference overlap and, above all, no provision has been made for a national economic development fund without which these four boards are simply groups of men holding little meetings in a corner.

We are still faced with serious unemployment. The Prime Minister talked this afternoon about the growth in the gross national product, but the fact remains that this growth has not been accompanied by a corresponding increase in employment. Unemployment continues to be a source of serious anxiety. The speech from the throne talks about providing one million jobs over five years. I have not seen anything in legislation which indicates how these million jobs are to be created, and if we do create them this would only take care of the young people leaving our universities, schools and technical colleges to enter the labour market during that five year period. We would still have to make provision for the half million or so who are presently unemployed in addition to those who may be displaced as a result of modern technology and automation.

The matter of trade is to the fore. I am convinced that Britain's application to join the European common market having been rejected, this country will find itself facing circumstances whose difficulty we have not yet begun fully to appreciate. I would have expected that during the past four or five months the government would have put forward some ideas about the future development of our trading program in the light of such events as the emergence of the European common market and the United States trade expansion legislation in order that Canada, one of the great exporting nations, might have some part in this trade revival and this changing trade pattern all over the world. But we have had no statement other than that there is to be a ministerial meeting of GATT.

The subject of medicare is to the fore in every province in Canada. The government announced the appointment of a royal commission in December, 1960, and we are told the commission is to report some time in June or July of this year. That is a long period of inaction. As a matter of fact, since the provision of health services lies within provincial jurisdiction the federal government already had all the information it needed in order to bring forward the kind of enabling legislation which would permit parliament to pay sums of money to any province which wanted to set up a medical care insurance plan, and leave it to the individual province concerned to determine the conditions and the type of plan it was ready to offer. I submit that the appointment of the commission has been merely a stall to avoid the necessity of facing this issue.

Action is needed with regard to agriculture. We were told this afternoon that the eastern farmers are to have feed grain. We were told there is to be a two-price system for wheat. These proposals are certainly not before us at the present time and nothing has been suggested as a remedy for one of the main complaints of farmers of every kind in this country, namely that all across Canada they find costs increasing while, on the average, the prices they receive are going down.

I see Your Honour getting a little restless and I would therefore suggest we call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, when we adjourned for the dinner recess I was in the process of giving some of the reasons why we in the New Democratic party feel that the government and the official opposition have failed to give the kind of decisive leadership that will enable this country to cope with the major problems confronting Canada. I was just going to discuss the question of the acquisition of nuclear arms and the government's failure to give us any clear and decisive statement on this matter.

The government's constant delay in making a final decision ought not to obscure the fact that they have been moving steadily, step by step, toward the acquisition of nuclear arms. We have the Prime Minister's statement this afternoon that negotiations would continue with the United States so that nuclear arms would be available for the Bomarcs and the Voodoos. They may not physically be accepted into Canada until they are needed, but they will be available. From the statements which have been made in the last week or ten days there is no doubt that nuclear arms will be acquired by our NATO forces.

Mention has been made of the ministerial meeting of NATO in May. However, I would remind the house of the statement of the former minister of national defence, one which has never been repudiated by the Prime Minister, to the effect that at the May ministerial meeting of NATO, should NATO reaffirm a nuclear role for Canada, then Canada will equip her NATO forces to discharge her obligations.

Reference has been made to the Nassau agreement. It seems to me that this is sheer window dressing. There is no likelihood of France's agreeing to making NATO a multilateral nuclear power. I would further add that making NATO a multilateral nuclear power is certainly one of the most serious ways of increasing the membership of the nuclear club.

I say that the government has not given us a clear statement. If the Prime Minister or any member of the government had come into this house this afternoon and told us that the government was prepared to negotiate Canada out of that nuclear role in NORAD and in NATO I think we would have been able to take a different position with reference to this whole question of confidence in the government. However, they have not done so. We feel that the only difference between the Conservative government and the Liberal opposition is that the Liberal opposition are prepared to accept nuclear weapons now, whereas the government is delaying the final acceptance of them but is undoubtedly committed in that direction. As was said by the former minister of national defence, it probably means a delay of only some four months.

In supporting a motion of no confidence in the government we in this party wish to make one thing perfectly clear. This does not involve a vote of confidence in the official opposition. They speak of decisiveness. One has only to look at the amendment which they moved. They have refused to take a definite stand of any sort on any question of policy. They have refused to put forth any constructive proposal. Instead, they have contented themselves with negative criticism. The fact is, of course, that the Liberal party have never taken a stand. They always believe that a moving object is harder to hit. They are in favour of medicare in Ontario; and in Saskatchewan, where the government are trying to put medicare into operation, they fought it tooth and nail almost to the point of civil insurrection. In the province of Ontario they are in favour of progressive labour legislation and in Newfoundland, under a Liberal government, they have the most repressive labour legislation that has been passed in this country in half a century. The same thing is true of their stand in reference to nuclear arms.

An hon. Member: But you are going to vote with them.

Mr. Howard: We are voting against you.

Mr. Douglas: The hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) this afternoon said they had a leader who is not afraid to take a stand. The obvious answer, Mr. Speaker, is "for how long?"

A bulletin put out by the Canadian committee for nuclear disarmament quotes a statement by the Leader of the Opposition in January of 1961, when speaking to the Liberal men's club of Vancouver, as follows:

> Canada must remain a non-nuclear power. By doing so, Canada can lead the middle powers in the struggle to abolish nuclear weapons and eventually all armaments. I don't believe we need the Bomarc, which is not an effective defence in any sense, and will probably be scrapped by the U.S. one of these days.

There is no suggestion in this statement that we have commitments which we must honour. There is no statement there that, since the government has committed us to nuclear weapons, we must accept them. When the Leader of the Opposition made that statement and other statements we were just as much committed as we are at the present time.

The Leader of the Opposition this afternoon tried to drag a red herring across the trail. He said that we do not want to leave our forces without effective weapons. But, Mr. Speaker, anyone who listened to "Viewpoint" last night and the talk by Paul Simon of Toronto knows that he quoted from the military journals of the United States and the textbooks of the Pentagon to show that in the case of the Bomarc, the Voodoo plane, the Honest John rocket and the F-104 all of them can use conventional weapons, as well as nuclear weapons, with deadly effect, and that it is simply beside the point to argue that we are leaving our forces without effective weapons. This is merely swallowing the propaganda of the military-industrial complex which has terrific propaganda power on this continent.

Since under the rules of the house we must take a vote in a few minutes, I want to say that as far as this party is concerned we feel that the time has come when the people of Canada should have the chance to elect a new government and a new parliament. We in this party hope to give them the chance to elect a government that will so plan the economy of this nation that the major economic decisions affecting the people of Canada will be made by the people of Canada themselves, to so plan the economy of this country that we will have economic growth and that the increased production will be used to raise the living standards of the people of this country, to elect a government that will bring this country into line with the high standards of welfare, health and federal assistance to education which have already been undertaken by some of the other countries in the western world. Above all, Mr. Speaker, we need a government which is prepared to pledge itself to a non-nuclear role for Canada so that this country can make its contribution to world peace by strengthening the United Nations, by giving of our personnel and our resources to raise living standards throughout the world. Mr. Speaker, we suggest that the hour of decision has come. Let the people decide.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It being 8.15 o'clock in the evening it is my duty, pursuant to section 4 (d) of standing order 56, to interrupt these proceedings and put forthwith the question on any amendment before the house.

The house divided on the amendment to the amendment (Mr. Thompson) which was agreed to on the following division:

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment to the amendment carried. The question is now on the amendment as amended. All those in favour of the amendment as amended will please say aye.

Some hon. Members: Aye.

Mr. Speaker: All those contrary will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members. Is it agreed that the members are in?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: The question is on the amendment as amended, which reads as follows:

This government has failed up to this time to give a clear statement of policy respecting Canada's national defence, and has failed to organize the business of the house so that the 1963-1964 estimates and budget could be introduced, and has failed to outline a positive program of follow-up action respecting many things for which this parliament and previous parliaments have already given authority, and does not have the confidence of the Canadian people.

All those in favour of the amendment as amended will please rise.

During the taking of the vote:

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is of some help to hear the Second Clerk Assistant and also the Clerk of the House, so if hon. members will maintain the proprieties of this house during the roll call vote we will proceed.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment as amended carried.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I shall advise His Excellency the Governor General tomorrow.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill), the adjournment of the house.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 9.05 p.m.

The twenty fifth parliament was dissolved on Wednesday, February 6, 1963, by proclamation of His Excellency the Governor General.
