CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. John Bosley (Don Valley West) moved that Bill C-286, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act (addition to the official list of electors), be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee G.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in my mail on Friday and over the weekend here in Ottawa and in Toronto, the flood of municipal literature began.

One of the crucial pieces of information that every sensible municipal candidate includes in his or her literature—as those who have been through this know—is the notation that if somehow you have not made it to the enumeration lists, that is not the end of the world. You can go to the polling station on election day and you may swear that you are a proper and bona fide elector and you may vote. That is an expression of something we, at least at that level, hold dear in democratic systems. Under no circumstances should you be deprived of the essence of democracy, which is your right to cast your vote for who shall lead your community or your province or your country.

Ironically, the level at which we do not do that is this one. Political scientists tell us that our elections will always be about people and images. The last election became, in a gratifying way, an election about a major, major policy issue. No member is going to forget the experience of debating the free trade agreement in the last election.

I cannot forget the anger that was expressed by those who came to see me as a candidate who had been missed on the enumeration lists. These people felt this was a crucial vote for them, whatever side they were on, and certainly could not believe that because they had been away or had been missed by the enumerators, they could not go, swear the oath on election day and vote. They felt—whatever side they were on—that it was probably the most critical election they were going to be involved in for some time.

I suggest that since the next election will presumably involve some form of approval or disapproval of parties that are running either on constitutional or trade package agreements, it is going to be just as crucial in the minds of all Canadians, whatever side of the issues they are on.

I do not intend to take the full 20 minutes that is available today to a mover of a private members' motion. I simply wanted to put that view on the record. There is now a royal commission or a political commission examining all of our electoral procedures. I know this bill has already been received by their staffs and lawyers and they are looking at this proposal.

Perhaps the proposal that is codified in this document, Bill C-286, may not be the one that is finally deemed to be the best. What this bill says, however, is that if an elector has been missed by an enumerator he or she may go to the polling station on election day provided he or she goes with one other person in order to establish identity. That person must be willing to swear an oath that this person is indeed a resident of that electoral district. The person who is then trying to vote produces some sort of personal identification satisfactory to the returning officer, is then registered to vote and votes.

If there is a better way to do it I will be more than happy to see it. I only want to try to improve the situation in some little way on behalf of those who felt so frustrated the last time when they were left off the list. It seems long overdue to me. I have no doubt that the commission is going to make lots of recommendations about various ways to make the system more open, fair and democratic for all Canadians. They may suggest various ways to hold elections or to keep a permanent list.

It does seem to me that the best system in the world is bound to make at least one or two mistakes. If we seriously mean that people should get involved in politics and the process because it is their country, then we ought to write rules that allow a bona fide elector to vote even if it is at the last minute, at one minute to eight, before the polls close.

It ought to be self-evident that we must respond to the sense that people all through this country have a need to be empowered and take control of their systems. One place to start is to say that if we have not managed to develop a system that is perfect, there is a way for every Canadian to get his or her vote in before the end of election day.

We look around the world and see all the other countries that are finally getting a chance after years of oppression to have a democratic system. Remembrance Day is a time to remember what people fought for which is our right to vote for who will govern us. We then ought to make sure that everybody who is entitled to a vote really is entitled to get at the power of that vote, even if it is at the last minute of the last day.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I would like to support very strongly this private member's idea. The hon. member has stated there should never be the situation where a duly qualified elector is barred from exercising his or her franchise because of some foul-up, mistake or difficulty in the process of enumeration. I can only say that I have spent many election days in provincial elections as the duty officer for my party in the returning office. In the province of Nova Scotia under our election act you may be sworn in on election day but you must do it at the returning office. Even that is a problem.

I recall very strongly in the 1988 provincial election, which was some six weeks before the federal, huge line-ups outside the returning office in my provincial riding. It was one of the best examples of non-partisan co-operation I have ever seen among the three parties as we tried to make this line go faster, get the people registered, and then send them back to their polls to vote.

That was a ridiculous waste of time. They have since changed that in the provincial act so that if you have to travel to the returning office to be sworn in you can at least then vote in the returning office.

On the federal level we have not had even that possibility. Our ridings are large. The hon. member and I both have urban ridings, although his is probably more populous than mine, and it is still a very similar problem. We have people who work shifts and are never home when enumerators come to call. I know that allegedly, and I am sure they tried to do this, cards and telephone numbers are left to get people before the revising officer or to have the revising agents come back, but time and again it does not work. People wake up on election day to discover that they are effectively disenfranchised.

Specifically I think it is a small thing. It would cause so little difficulty that there is no reason for it not to be done.

• (1120)

In the recent civic election in Halifax, several weeks before the election, I started to wonder if I was on the voters' list. I had seen nothing in the way of a card or anything like that in my door because like all of us in this House, I spend at least four days a week away from my own residence in Halifax.

When I went to vote on election day, it turned out I was indeed on the list. Of course in the civic election in Halifax you can be sworn in right at the poll. It is the same sort of thing. The same number of electors, the same people are enfranchised in that election as are in a federal election.

The swearing in at the individual poll did not create any kind of chaos or hold up matters to any degree that was even noticeable. It made people a lot happier about the electoral process. When people came in and were told they were not on the list at all: "Gosh, do I have to go here? Do I have to go there?" "No, just go to that table right there. You are set. You can be sworn in."

I think possibly—I do not know whether the hon. member had this in mind—it might be one small step in making the electorate slightly more sanguine toward politicians. I merely wish to say that I give this my strongest support and hope that this amendment will pass with the greatest possible speed. It is something that is to the benefit of all Canadians and it should be done.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I will not take much time but I would also like to strongly support this motion from the other side of Canada.

We have just been through a provincial election where there was no possibility for people to vote if they had not been on the voters' list and had not gone to pre-election registration places. I can tell you that in the east end of Vancouver, there were whole blocks of people—I am thinking particularly of people in native housing, for example—who were left off the list.

It was a real abrogation of what we call a democratic process. I know most of my party would strongly support this.

Hon. Bob Layton (Lachine—Lac-Saint-Louis): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to comment on the proposal tabled by the hon. member for Don Valley West to amend the Canada Elections Act.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's purpose in proposing this amendment to the Canada Elections Act is to allow urban voters to have their names added to the list of electors on a polling day, as is presently the case in rural areas. I myself represent the riding of Lachine—Lac-Saint-Louis, a riding that is both urban and suburban.

[English]

At the moment, under the Elections Act, a rural voter whose name has been left off the official list can have his name added and can vote on election day.

All of this has been expressed in this House. There has been the experience of the electors who were not on the list and could not vote in the urban ridings. The rural voter simply has to take an oath and have someone whose name appears on the official list vouch for him or her. This is not possible for urban voters under our current electoral system.

In the urban areas, an enumeration team of two people calls on each household to fill out the record of enumeration. After these visits each qualified voter should receive a notice.

Too often people are not available at the time of the call, and a notice of enumeration card is to sent in the mail. The purpose of the notice is to confirm the that voter's name is on the official list to explain where and when to vote.

After the enumeration, the official list can be revised. It is still possible for an urban voter to have his name added to the list, but he must make a special effort to contact the Elections Canada office for his riding to find out where the revision office is and when the revisions will take place. He must then make personal or sworn application to have his name added to the list.

The urban revision offices close on the seventeenth day before the election. If at this time an urban voter's name is not on the list, he loses his right to vote.

Contrast this, Mr. Speaker, with the situation of a rural voter who may have his name added to the list even on election day.

I believe that the bill before us raises two principles which are central to the values we hold as Canadians: the principle of democracy and the principle of equality. In Canada our democratic rights are guaranteed by the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Section 3 of the charter says that every citizen of Canada has the right to vote in an election of members of the House of Commons or a legislative assembly and to be qualified for membership therein. This is a constitutional right.

The Canada Elections Act then sets out the rules for the exercise of the constitutional right to vote and as with all entrenched rights, the right to vote is guaranteed, subject only to such preamble and reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstratably justified in a free and democratic society.

Canada has virtual universal suffrage. There are limitations; exceptions for federal judges, prison inmates, patients in mental institutions, and those who are disqualified for corrupt or illegal electoral practices. All citizens who are 18 years of age or older are entitled to vote. But if you are a qualified voter who wants to vote, your name must also appear on the official voters' list which is compiled for each election.

The bill which is the subject of debate today brings to our attention the distinction in the treatment of rural and urban voters who wish to exercise their right to vote and although urban and rural voters both have the undeniable right to vote, the conditions under which that right may be exercised differ. Is this the kind of distinction which violates the charter guarantees of democratic and equality rights? If it does violate the charter, is it justifiable in a free and democratic society? These are questions raised by the hon. member's bill. I do not profess to have the answers, Mr. Speaker.

The same questions raised by the bill are now being considered by the Royal Commission on Electoral Reform and Party Financing. On November 15, 1989 the government appointed five commissioners under the Inquiries Act to inquire into and to report on the appropriate principles and process which should govern the election of members of the House of Commons and of the financing of political parties in candidates' campaigns.

Over the past two years the commission has held hearings across the country and has received hundreds of submissions, some of which dealt with the differences in treatment between urban and rural voters. The commission was given a very broad mandate by the government and was asked to do a comprehensive review of electoral legislation. The commission is expected to make its report in November this year. I fully expect that the report will address this issue and will make appropriate recommendations for this House to consider. The implications of this bill have not yet been fully explored. It is not, in my view, a good idea to start making particular amendments to certain sections of the Elections Act when we anticipate a major study and recommendations for comprehensive amendments to be released within a month.

[Translation]

Briefly, Mr. Speaker, I think we should wait for the results of the technical study being prepared by the Royal Commission, in connection with this question of adding the names of urban voters on a polling day. We should give the commission a chance to fulfil its mandate and to make the recommendations it deems appropriate after an exhaustive study of the entire dossier.

Mr. Speaker, the findings of the Royal Commission will be released very shortly, and I suggest that subsequently we decide in Parliament what measures should be taken.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I would like to comment briefly in support of this proposal and congratulate the hon. member for Don Valley West on this initiative.

Actually, it is quite straightforward, and not only that, it is entirely appropriate. The proposed amendment says, if we look at the explanatory note, that it would have the effect of allowing any person entitled to vote in a polling division to have his name added to the official list of electors even on a polling day. At the present time, you cannot have your name added to the list after the official deadline has expired.

Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member who spoke for the government just now pointed out, there is a Royal Commission, the Lortie Commission on Electoral Reform and Party Financing. It is true that the commission is considering the matter and is expected to submit its report very shortly, but it is also true that we as members have had a number of experiences, as the hon. member said, in 1988, and even in 1984, 1980 and 1979, and I could even go back as far as 1972. Mr. Speaker, I say that in a democratic country it is totally unacceptable that some people cannot vote because of their lifestyle, and I am thinking of people who are constantly on the road, people who live in hostels and lodgings, loggers who work in the bush, Canadians who happen to be working outside the country when the lists are drawn up, and who may be working on contract as lawyers, engineers or teachers. These people cannot vote because they missed the period said aside for having their name added to the list of electors.

I have seen a number of situations like this, Mr. Speaker. I even took a similar initiative in 1974–75, because people working outside the country were generally at a disadvantage, due to the fact that they could not cast their votes in their place of residence, either in Ottawa or elsewhere in the country, people who for personal reasons—some of which I mentioned earlier, including professional reasons—happened to be outside the country. In Kuwait, for instance, we had groups of experts specializing in firefighting. If there had been an election during their absence, they would have been unable to vote in Canada, and they would not have been able to have their say about the kind of government they want in this country. I could give you some examples.

And I am sure many of us could rise in this House and say: Sure, I know a lot of people who couldn't vote because they could not get their names on the list.

So I think allowing someone to report to a polling station and having their names added to the list, subject to the conditions suggested by the hon. member, including a witness who can testify to the fact that you are really the person living at that address, and second, the requisite identification—I believe this would be entirely normal and fair.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I know it is a right for all Canadians. The member said that section 3 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms says we have right to vote. Yes, we do have a right to vote and we should exercise it. We must take away those impediments that prevent Canadians from voting. Who else can do that better than the House of Commons here today by adopting the bill, getting out of the way and then letting things fall as they should.

I know there are other problems. I know there is a great discussion about a permanent list. Some people are for and others are against. I do not know what the Lortie commission will report on that. Some of us feel that that list could be used for other purposes than election purposes, for example. It could be a great lobbying tool. It could be a great list to use when sending out this third class mail that all of us do not like to get.

We have to think seriously of a permanent list. Possibly that is one of the options. However, today all we are talking about is allowing Canadians to register themselves on that list on election day if for any reason, justifiably, they could not register at the appropriate time, giving them the right to vote.

I think this is a great initiative. I want to end my comments by saying thank you very much to the member for Don Valley West.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I have a brief intervention to make on Bill C-286. I thank the member for Don Valley West for sponsoring this private member's bill.

There are a lot of things about our electoral system that I think need modernizing, upgrading and improving. I do not want to repeat what everyone has said so far this morning, but there is no question in all our minds that the present system has to be reformed and improved upon.

There is nothing more depressing than banging wildly on doors on election day only to find out that a whole row of houses has been left off the voters' list, or a whole apartment building for that matter.

I do have one or two reservations about this bill and they concern the ID that is necessary in rural areas as proposed by the member's bill. When we talk about rural constituencies, we often think of the old kind of rural constituency, such as mine where you have concessions and where you have mainly farmers and farm families living in that rural area. We have a lot of other rural constituencies today where there is not one farmer, where you have woodsmen, where you have people working in mines, where you have people running small business operations on remote roads, not even highways, and where you have people who have chosen a very, very remote way of life in order to get away from civilization. It is very difficult in some parts of Canada for people living in those geographic locations to find someone to come and vouch for him or her in terms of identity. It is also very difficult to find people living that kind of lifestyle who have an ID with a picture on it or a combination of a picture on one ID with a second ID that actually gives a legal or a quasi legal description of where they live.

I think that kind of provision might need some fine tuning. For example, looking at the bill technically, it proposes changed by removing in section 147.(1) and (2)(a) the word "rural". Subsection (1) grants permission to someone to be vouched for if their name is not on the list providing they meet certain new criteria. Subsection (2) spells out the criterion they have to meet in order to vote. Subsection (2)(b) is new. It requires that in addition to being vouched for either: 1. a single proof of ID with a photo and address; or, 2. two pieces of ID bearing name and address must be shown.

While this amendment does take into account our party's recommendation to the royal commission on electoral reform and party financing, that urban voters be allowed to swear in on election day, we are concerned about where people could be sworn in. This is another problem that I find with this bill, good as the bill is as far as it goes.

In my party's presentation, we recommended that various locations within each electoral district be established similar to courts of revision where urban voters left off the list could vote rather than complicate the often confusing E-day at a polling station, particularly in the dying hours of the day. We all know what it is like at a polling station. In some polling stations there is absolute chaos. People are dashing in at the last minute. It has been raining for four hours and they are on their way home from work and there is a tremendous backlog of people waiting to vote. This could add to the confusion.

If this does not happen, specific and widely known advertising of this change would have to be a must.

That is one problem we see with it. It is not an insurmountable problem and it is not one that would cause me to vote against this specific piece of legislation.

Also, as the bill proposes, having just a photo and an address seems a little odd as well. I do not know how far that goes to identifying a person in a reasonable way as being a voter in that particular polling subdivision or, indeed, in that electoral district.

Bill C-286 does ameliorate a major fault in the Canada Elections Act that left thousands of eligible voters without a vote on election day. By lumping in urban voters with rural voters it creates more problems though for rural voters than exists now in some of those rural areas that I mentioned a few minutes ago.

First, before the royal commission, my party recommended that the section requiring rural voters to be vouched for be deleted. For example, in a riding as remote and as huge as the riding of Churchill in Manitoba, it is sometimes not easy to find someone whose name is on the voter's list to accompany you to the polls. It is just impossible. As I say, you may be living in that typical Canadian cabin out there in the wilderness.

Similarly, the requirement for ID creates a problem for those living in remote areas that is even more difficult to overcome than finding someone whose name is on the list to go with you to the polls. Many residents in a riding such as Churchill for example have yet to see a photo ID. Often a birth certificate or a social insurance number is the only identification they have. As neither have their address on them, this would disenfranchise many rural voters in that kind of riding.

It is my party's feeling that there ought to be a distinction in the act that takes into consideration the inherent differences between urban and rural areas as I have just described above. Rural voters should be allowed to go to the polls alone, take an oath or affirm and vote. They should not have to be vouched for. Second, urban voters because of the higher probability of fraud and misrepresentation must be covered under a different set of rules. This bill is directed strictly at allowing disenfranchised voters to vote but with enough precautions to prevent people who do not live in that poll or riding to cast an illegal ballot.

I will not take up any more time of the House. This bill, I think, is reasonable as far as it goes. I have made a couple of suggestions here where I think it may be improved upon.

I would hope that this bill, along with the commission on elections, will do away with the anomalies that presently exists, the unfairness that exists, and make it possible so that every one who really wants to vote on election day has an opportunity to vote.

As far as a permanent list is concerned, often we in a chamber such as the House of Commons or the provincial legislatures seem to think that everybody is as dedicated to the electoral system as we are, that everybody is as concerned about politics on a 24-hour a day basis as we are. Not all Canadians are political junkies as we are. Often, during an election campaign, they see the ads, they listen to the radio, they may even follow the local campaign, but often they do not really get interested or excited about it until the dying innings, like last night. It was one of the most fantastic baseball games I have ever had the pleasure of watching. I was fascinated from the first inning on.

In an electoral contest, often people do not start to get excited until the dying days of the campaign, indeed the dying hours in some instances. Any kind of electoral voting law has to be flexible enough to take that fact into consideration that often people do not get turned on or tuned in or excited in an election campaign until the very last remaining days. I would hope then, even at the last moment, if they choose at the last moment to go and vote, that is their right. They do not have to choose a week or ten days ahead. It is their right to change their mind at the last moment in a free society and go and vote. They should be able to vote at that last hour.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to make a brief intervention and compliment the member for Don Valley West in bringing forth this bill.

The hon. member for Brant raised some interesting technical points. The whole motion here before us, as I read it, is to refer the bill to a legislative committee so that some of these matters could be discussed further. I was really quite surprised and very interested initially in the remarks of my hon. friend from Lachine—Lac-Saint-Louis. I really thought he was going to be wholeheartedly in support of the bill. He, as I understand it, has some of the same problems I have. His riding is obviously more urban than rural. Mine is more rural than urban.

However, the reason I am most interested in the bill of the hon. member for Don Valley West is that all the problems of election that were mentioned by other members about election day are there. I am not going to repeat them. The thing that cannot really be explained to voters is that just because of a division on the street and one happens to be on the urban poll and one is in the rural poll, that under the present Elections Act that urban voter, as everyone has said, just cannot get to vote.

His neighbour across the street, depending on the boundary between the urban and the rural poll, as it is in many areas of my riding, that person under the law can go and be sworn in. I really think it is a step in the right direction.

With all respect to my hon. friend from Lachine—Lac-Saint-Louis, who used to be an eminent chairman of the Conservative caucus, I would think he would be totally behind this bill. Pierre Lortie, the chairman of the Electoral Commission, is someone for whom I have the highest respect. I appeared before that committee on several matters of concern to me. I was also pleased to be a member invited on a seminar he held and he held different seminars on different parts of the country on phases of his mandate. I know it is the intent to bring forward that commission report in late November. We all know the realities of reports and royal commissions.

As I understand it, he is not only intending to bring forward a royal commission report, he is intending to bring forward a draft bill to help expedite the discussion. My fear is, in terms of reality and all the changes in the world and/or changes that may be in the progress of bills through this House as we move closer to an electoral date, that with the best intentions in the world, the Electoral Commission report of Mr. Lortie and his commissioners will perhaps not get through the House in time for another election.

I think it would be a really unfortunate situation if we could not first help the Lortie commission by having this sent to a committee so they could see some of the concerns of members that might help them in their report.

In any event, having it come out of committee and make that small change in terms of the total ambit of the Elections Act, but certainly a very fundamental change affecting so many voters in Canada, I do not think the Lortie commission would feel compromised at all. I think that might be one thing they might be very pleased about, along with all the other questions about permanent lists and everything else.

I think we should give it support, get it in to committee, have further discussion as hon. members have already raised, and then get this changed so that all voters in Canada are treated equally on election day.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, just after the November 21, 1988 election, I quickly wrote to the Chief Electoral Officer because I had some very angry constituents who were left off the voters' lists and could not vote. One constituent had a sandwich board and was walking along the main street, protesting because of the loophole and the weakness in our law. As she pointed out, if she had lived on a farm in a rural area she would have had the right to vote but, because she happened to live in the city of Toronto, she was denied the right to vote.

In the 1984 election we had enumerators miss out a whole sixplex. If you have three or four voters in a sixplex, that is the difference between winning and losing an election.

Mr. Speaker, when you win an election by 74 votes like I did in 1979, you know the importance of each vote, especially the ones who are left off the lists through no fault of their own. Many of these people with their jobs are out of the country when the enumerators come around. Many are on vacation. Many in my riding, and I am sure this applies to other urban centres, are afraid to open their door when the enumerator knocks on the door. You can hear the television going, you can hear people talking, but because there is so much crime infiltrating our streets and our apartment buildings, they are afraid to open the door.

I recommend to this House that we look seriously at a permanent voter's list. The city of Toronto has now enumerated its voters for municipal elections via mail, and it is working quite well. I think through mail and through a permanent voters' list, we will avoid this nonsense.

I am looking at this bill to determine how serious this government is about parliamentary reform. I congratulate the member for Don Valley West for bringing this bill forward, a bill with which all individual members can agree. If we all in this Chamber right here agree that it is a good bill, let us pass it. Let us get on with it and let us do it.

If the government is going to block this bill, then the government is not serious about parliamentary reform. Regardless of what the Electoral Commission is doing and what it reports, fine, this does not take away from it. Here is a piece of legislation that a private member is bringing into help the electoral process. Let us support it. Let us not talk it out or whatever.

I again ask the people on the government side: how serious are they with parliamentary reform? If they are serious, they will support this bill, the way I heard from my colleagues in the New Democratic Party, the way I heard from the Official Opposition, the Liberal Party, and the way I have heard from some individual Conservative members.

SITTING SUSPENDED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Since no more members wish to speak, the time for consideration of private members' business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the item is dropped from the Order Paper. The House suspends its proceedings until noon.

Sitting suspended at 11.49 a.m.

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 12 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being 12 o'clock p.m. pursuant to order made Friday, October 25, 1991, the House will now proceed to the daily routine of business under the heading Introduction of Government Bills.

[Translation]

Mr. Danis, seconded by—

Mr. Gauthier: It would take another minister.

[English]

POINT OF ORDER

BILL C-40

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that there is no minister here to second the bill, perhaps what we could do is suspend the sitting of the House for 20 minutes to a half hour in order to get a seconder for this particular bill and give us an opportunity to peruse the contents of the bill, which we have just seen by the way, for the very first time.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I think under the circumstances, considering that this bill is very important to the Canadian people and to members of the House of Commons, you will find there is ample precedence for me to second the bill and that you should be able to proceed with it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On the same point of order, the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry, but I cannot agree if there is no other minister in the House to support a resolution which the government considers important. I find it absolutely unacceptable!

[English]

We will not accept that. We want to see this bill properly supported by the government in power, not by a parliamentary secretary. As far as I am concerned it is only fair to the opposition members if you want good, reasonable and intelligent debate to give us the appropriate time to look at the bill before it is introduced.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I find it ironic that when there is no postal dispute at this time in the country, we have an act to provide for the continuation of postal services. I think it is only reasonable that the House of Commons ask that a member of the cabinet return to the House and do his or her work.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I thank the various members who have spoken for giving their opinion, but the Chair would point out that nowhere do the Standing Orders say that a minister must be present to second the tabling of a bill. Therefore, I—

Mr. Gauthier: Point of order, Mr. Speaker!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Yes, the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier on a point of order.

Mr. Gauthier: Before you so rule, Mr. Speaker, I think that nothing in the Standing Orders says that a parliamentary secretary or another member of this House can second a bill either.

The customs and traditions of this House have always required two ministers, one to move and the other to second, and that is how it has always been. That is how it should be too, Mr. Speaker.

I see where you are coming from and you will probably rule that the Parliamentary Secretary to the House Leader can second the minister's motion. But, Mr. Speaker, I challenge you to show me before you give your ruling exactly what Standing Order you base it on.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons has the floor on the same point of order.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I want to make a couple of points.

The first is that we are operating under House order which all parties agreed to last week. The reason we agreed to that is we wanted to see the negotiations continue over the weekend in the hopes that what we would see happen is an agreement without the House having to act as we are prepared today.

The second point is that there is no doubt in my mind that we try by tradition to have a second minister here. I have seconded bills.

I see we have a minister now, so we can continue.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I ask the Opposition House Leader not to prolong it unduly since there seems to be a solution to our problem. The Hon. House Leader of the Opposition.

[English]

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to underline, now that a second minister has entered the House, we will be able to proceed with second reading.

I cannot allow the parliamentary secretary to suggest that this matter is of such great importance that the government cannot provide in this Chamber two members of the cabinet to be in the Chamber at the appointed hour, twelve o'clock, in order to introduce this bill.

I find it totally unacceptable. I find it exceptionally sloppy on the part of the government and it underlines the sloppiness of the government in its desire to try to solicit co-operation from the opposition parties which have co-operated at every stage of this particular operation.

I wish to put the parliamentary secretary on notice through you, Mr. Speaker, that this kind of conduct, this kind of behaviour certainly does not lead us well in terms of co-operating in the future on future bills, on future motions and anything that the government wishes to bring in in terms of parliamentary legislation.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I cannot let that very strong language rest on the record without some sort of comment.

I want to indicate to the opposition members and particularly to the House leader of the opposition that certainly we appreciate the co-operation he has given us. I want to look forward to it in the future, and he knows full well that we on every occasion try to do our best co-operate and to work with him.

He should understand as I am sure everybody else in the House does that we have an important cabinet meeting going on at this moment. As a result of that, a couple of ministers were delayed in getting here. We have them. Let us proceed.

POSTAL SERVICES CONTINUATION ACT, 1991

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–40, an act to provide for the continuation of postal services.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Danis: Mr. Speaker, when I rose in this place to address hon. members on the introduction of legislation bringing about and end to a damaging labour dispute, it was my hope I would not find it necessary to do so again for a long time to come.

Regrettably, this wish has not been fulfilled and I rise today to introduce legislation, the Postal Service Continuation Act, 1991.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Mr. Danis, seconded by Mr. Blais, moves that this bill be now read the first time and, pursuant to the order adopted on Friday, October 25, 1991, be deemed printed.

Bill read first time and deemed printed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): When shall this bill be read the second time? Pursuant to the order adopted on Friday, October 25, 1991, now.

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour) moved that Bill C–40, an act to provide for the continuation of postal services, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee H.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the legislation is designed to ensure the continuation of postal operations and provide a mechanism for the settlement of the current and long–standing labour dispute between Canada Post Corporation and the Canadian Union of Postal Workers.

It is never a pleasant task for a Minister of Labour to resort to legislation to bring about an end to an industrial relations dispute. However, in this particular case the parties to this dispute have been afforded every possible opportunity to resolve their differences through the provision of extensive conciliation and mediation assistance over the past two years.

Despite the efforts of a conciliation officer, a conciliation board and one of the most highly respected labour mediators in this country, the parties have failed in their attempts to find an acceptable compromise to their differences.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I remind hon. members that these negotiations impact on all Canadians who depend on the postal service for reliable and efficient delivery of the mail. One has only to recall the sight, earlier this year, of senior citizens lining up in the sweltering heat to collect income security cheques, to realize the potential for disruption to the income flow of the elderly, the unemployed and those requiring social assistance.

Numerous businesses which rely on the mail for their economic existence are also severely impacted by any significant interruption to postal service through a work stoppage. The government, as the protector of the public interest, cannot subject the citizens of this country to further disruptions which have the ability to impact on their health and well–being.

[English]

It may be worth while for me to briefly review the current dispute before commenting on the legislation which I have introduced today. The present negotiations between Canada Post and CUPW constitute the first round of bargaining between these parties since a 1988 decision of the Canada Labour Relations Board to reorganize the structure of bargaining units at Canada Post.

Negotiations between the parties are focusing on an attempt to arrive at a new single collective agreement for some 45,000 operational employees to replace seven previous collective agreements which expired in 1989.

The Canadian Union of Postal Workers filed a notice of dispute on September 12, 1989, and a conciliation officer was subsequently appointed to assist the parties in their efforts to reach a new agreement. The conciliation officer held a total of 78 meetings with the parties over the course of a one-year period extending through October 1990.

Needless to say, progress was slow due to the extensive number of union and employer demands placed on the bargaining table—some 250 by CUPW and more than 60 by Canada Post. In addition, the process of merging terms and conditions from seven agreements into one comprehensive contract has proven to be a formidable task.

[English]

Initial discussions during the conciliation officer stage centred on the grievance arbitration backlog and with the assistance of the officer the parties signed a memorandum of agreement in February 1990 designed to expedite this resolution. Unfortunately, this stage of the conciliation process did not result in the resolution of any other major issues and in October 1990 the conciliation officer reported to the minister that he had been unable to assist the parties in reaching an agreement.

Given the complexity of the dispute with seven collective agreements being merged into one and the large number of issues in dispute, the parties were notified on October 31, 1990 of my predecessor's decision to establish a conciliation board to deal with the dispute.

[Translation]

The Conciliation Board, chaired by Mr. Marc Lapointe, a former Chairperson of the Canada Labour Relations Board, began meetings in January of this year and after some 60 sessions over the course of a seven-month period, filed its report with me on August 12, 1991. It is important to note here, Mr. Speaker, that the parties to the dispute each chose their own respective nominees to the Conciliation Board—Mr. Arnold Masters for the employer and Mr. Jacques Desmarais for the union. The two nominees were then able to agree on the appointment of Mr. Lapointe as a chairperson acceptable to both parties.

[English]

In its report, which was released to the parties on August 16 of this year, the conciliation board noted that while it had been unable to assist the parties in reaching a settlement it had succeeded in reducing the items in dispute.

More importantly it managed to bring in excess of 300 unresolved union and management demands into sharper focus by identifying the nine major and twenty minor issues separating the parties. The conciliation board report addressed these issues and in most instances made recommendations or suggestions for settlement.

The board also commented on the obvious lack of improvement in the labour relations environment at Canada Post and the degree to which this frustrated the members of the board in its effort to find a settlement.

The report stated: "The present conciliation board has found no improvement in these relations. On the contrary the extent of the exacerbation has further increased in some instances to the point of contempt, if not palpable hatred, and the distrust has reached new heights".

As I indicated, the report of the conciliation board signed by the chairman and the employer nominee along with the minority report of the union nominee were released to the parties on August 16, 1991. The parties began direct negotiations on the same day as the release of the report using it as a basis for further discussion. With no settlement in the dispute CUPW initiated rotating strikes at various locations across the country on August 24.

On August 30, 1991, I contacted both Canada Post president, Donald Lander, and CUPW president, Jean-Claude Parrot, to impress upon them the need for the two sides to make significant progress and direct negotiations over the course of Labour Day weekend.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, officials of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service of Labour Canada met with representatives of the parties on September 2, 1991, to evaluate the progress which had been made in talks since the release of the report of the conciliation board.

Following the report from my officials, I concluded that an agreement was not close at hand for the parties and that the public interest warranted government intervention to end the disruption in postal service. I met with the two sides and discussed various options open to me at that point.

Given what I perceived as a sincere desire on the part of the two sides to reach a negotiated settlement, I agreed to appoint a mediator to assist the parties in resolving their differences.

[English]

On September 5, 1991, I appointed Chief Justice Alan B. Gold of the Quebec Superior Court as mediator in the postal dispute. With his appointment the parties agreed top return to work, restore the collective bargaining agreement, resume normal operations of the post office, and participate in mediation with their best efforts to find a settlement.

I am sure that hon. members will be familiar with Judge Gold's reputation as a respected and knowledgeable practitioner in the field of labour relations. He has been instrumental in resolving major disputes in several federal industries, railways, longshoring and postal operations, to name a few. Judge Gold is viewed by both labour and management as an individual who embodies all of the personal traits required by a mediator and has earned the trust and confidence of the parties.

Through his many years of mediation experience he has demonstrated the credibility required to be fully acceptable to both employers and unions in numerous major bargaining disputes. In this particular dispute Judge Gold spent six weeks in mediation efforts with Canada Post and CUPW and gave the process his fullest possible attention. On several occasions Judge Gold made personal sacrifices and alterations to his own agenda to accommodate the mediation process, and for this display of dedication to duty on his part I extend my sincere personal appreciation.

On October 23, 1991, I met with Judge Gold who advised me that he was ending his mediation because despite their very best efforts there were difficulties they could not resolve. Judge Gold indicated that the parties had bargained honestly and in good faith.

[English]

As hon. members will know I had intended to introduce legislation last Friday, but after meeting with the parties I concluded that they wanted one last opportunity to pursue a negotiated settlement of the issues remaining in dispute. Despite their continuous attempt over this past weekend, the two sides have been unable to reach a final accord of their differences.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, as you can see, the two parties involved in this labour dispute have been provided with every opportunity to bring their differences to a satisfactory resolution. They have been afforded the full range of options available under the dispute resolution process contained in Part I of the Canada Labour Code.

Direct negotiations, 78 meetings with a conciliation officer, 60 meetings with a conciliation board and six weeks of intensive mediation with one of Canada's best mediators—the process has been stretched to the limit to afford the parties an opportunity to reach a fair and equitable settlement through the collective bargaining process.

[English]

When an individual of Judge Gold's stature announces his withdrawal from the dispute resolution process, the message becomes loud and clear. That message is that these two parties, Canada Post Corporation and the Canadian Union of Postal Workers, despite their genuine efforts are simply not able to negotiate a settlement to this dispute at the bargaining table.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, given these circumstances and the possibility of further disruption to postal services across this country, I am introducing the legislation before you today—the Postal Services Continuation Act, 1991. In addition to ensuring the continuation of postal services, the Act provides for a mechanism to resolve the issues in dispute between the two sides.

Under the proposed legislation, the term of each of the seven collective agreements is extended to July 31, 1993. The bill provides that an arbitrator will be appointed and given the task of amalgamating these seven previous collective agreements into a single collective agreement.

The legislation then provides that the arbitrator will try to build upon the significant progress made by the parties, particularly Judge Gold's mediation, as well as items settled by the parties themselves in direct negotiations and recommendations by the Conciliation Board.

I might point out to hon. members that nothing contained in the legislation prevents the parties from agreeing to amend any provision of the collective agreement binding upon them, with the exception of the term of the agreement, and any efforts which they are so inclined to undertake have of course my full support.

While both of the parties have expressed a preference for a negotiated settlement of major issues in dispute, there remains the cold, harsh reality that they have been unable to do so for over two years.

Furthermore, this dispute has caused the parties, their employees, Canadian business and the public considerable uncertainty. It is time to bring the dispute to a fair and equitable conclusion.

Furthermore, this dispute has caused the parties, their employees, the Canadian business community and the public considerable uncertainty. It is time to bring the dispute to a fair and equitable conclusion.

Mr. Speaker, I know other hon. members will wish to speak to this bill so I will be brief in my concluding remarks. Some 25 months have passed since the expiration of the previous collective agreements covering these employees. Extensive conciliation and mediation assistance has been extended to the parties throughout the bargaining process.

All efforts to find a solution to the dispute were exhausted by Judge Gold. The parties have proven incapable of resolving their differences at the bargaining table. Once again, the Canadian public is faced with the prospect of a protracted and damaging test of economic strength between the Corporation and CUPW and the resulting disruption to postal services.

While I am disappointed that the parties have failed to achieve a new collective agreement, I do not question the sincerity of their efforts at the bargaining table. Nor do I question the process itself—I remain a firm believer in the collective bargaining system despite its occasional imperfections. Having said that, the government has an overriding responsibility to the Canadian public to bring this lengthy dispute to a fair and equitable resolution without further delay.

The legislation ought to be seen as a mechanism which will not only ensure the continuation of postal services but will also allow the parties to conclude this chapter and build on the progress which they have made towards an improved relationship. I would therefore urge all hon. members to support the proposed legislation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before I recognize the Official Opposition critic, I would like to recall, in response to the question about seconding motions, the following citation from Beauchesne's Sixth Edition, paragraph 465(2), and I quote:

> (2) While a Government Order must be moved by a Minister, it may be seconded by any Member of the House.

That being said, debate is resumed. The hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River.

[English]

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, before I get into the substance of the bill and the discussion at hand, I want first of all to say to the minister and the government opposite something about this situation of giving the opposition the bill ten minutes before we are to stand up in the House to speak. If we look at this particular piece of legislation clause by clause, it is not exactly something that is standard in the sense of what we have seen in previous back-to-work legislation. We should have been given a chance to look at this piece of legislation last Friday or in fact first thing this morning.

• (1230)

As a matter of fact I did call the minister's office on a couple of occasions and suggested that they send this legislation over embargoed so that we could, as opposition members, take a look at it and speak to it clearly.

It is a very dangerous precedent, Mr. Speaker, that this place, and indeed yourself would allow this kind of situation to take place. In essence we have not even had time to read this bill line by line and clause by clause because of the shortness of time given to us to reflect on just what the words say and mean as far as the back-to-work legislation is concerned.

I thought it would be important to mention that because again I have not had an opportunity to look at this proposed legislation in its entirety. I am assuming from what the minister has said that this is to a certain extent an ordinary kind of back-to-work legislation and that there is no clause in the bill that may hit me across the forehead somewhere down the line when I realize it is not of a standard nature.

I must admit that I have spent in this particular seat here in this place a great amount of time speaking on back-to-work legislation. I believe this is the third time in the last two months that I have had the opportunity to talk to ministers' back-to-work legislation. It kind of makes you wonder how the minister can stand in his place and suggest that the collective bargaining process is working very efficiently and effectively if I have to stand here and debate with him whether back-to-work legislation is a necessity, is a good idea, and in essence maintains the credibility of the collective bargaining process.

I for one am very worried about the precedent we are continuing to set in this place. The moment a particular labour group or management group feels the necessity to either strike or in the case of management lock someone out, we in this place have to get involved in the collective bargaining process and bring in back-to-work legislation.

The process of back-to-work legislation is obviously there when and if necessary in extreme situations. Here we have a piece of legislation called Bill C-40 which is presented today without a strike or a lock-out taking place as we speak. It is very unique in the Canadian labour movement to see a government bring in legislation before we see whether the two sides can continue to look towards a resolution, before both sides officially come out and say to the country and to the world: we cannot come to an agreement; we are going to lock out or go on strike. Therefore, the government obviously has the option of suggesting that we cannot afford to have that kind of scenario in this country and therefore we will bring in back-to-work legislation.

This is not back-to-work legislation. This is essential service legislation brought in through the back door. That is basically what this says, that we consider Canada Post an essential service and therefore we will put in place legislation of this nature to make sure that there is no strike in case the union decides to go on strike, or in case the postal corporation decides to lock them out.

I want to set the record straight in that regard, Mr. Speaker, because it is essential for people to realize that it is something that is not normally done in this government. It is not normal in this country for the government to bring in legislation before the situation has even occurred.

Mr. Speaker, just for your information, the clocks do not work at all here, so you might have to tell us how much time we have. I cannot go by looking at the clock in this place because at the moment, for example, it says 6.30 and it is closer to the noon hour.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): You have 40 minutes to speak and you have 35 minutes left.

Mr. Nault: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I know the minister across the way is very pleased that I have 35 more minutes to go.

I want to talk about a couple of issues in the time that I have left. I also want to inform the minister opposite and the government side and all members in this place that I will be presenting a motion at the end of my allocated time. Mr. Speaker, I am going to read my motion so that everyone can reflect on it while I complete my comments.

My motion will be a little bit about this particular issue that we have in front of us today. I just want to read it and I will read the end:

> —and that this Act shall come into force at the time the Governor in Council appoints a commission of inquiry under the Inquiries Act for the purpose of inquiring into labour relations between Canada Post Corporation and its employees.

That amendment to this particular bill has a lot of significance to myself and to many Canadians who are listening and to the members in this place. The reason is that on the one hand the government says that the collective bargaining process is working very well, but on the other hand the government is suggesting that after two years of collective bargaining and negotiation this whole process is still not resolved. As a matter of fact, in 1987 the same situation existed with the same government. It brought in back-to-work legislation. This back-to-work legislation in 1987 was also brought in because both sides could not resolve their differences.

Here we are again in 1991 bringing forward back-to-work legislation even though we are not sure anybody is going on strike or lock each other out because both sides cannot come to an agreement. Both sides are very up front when it comes to informing the public and doing a lot of their negotiating in the media. Both sides are suggesting that there is a lot of unfair bargaining going on, that there is no bargaining in good faith and that the other side does not want to look at the issue as it relates to its importance to the union, to the membership, to security, contracting out and to the grievance procedure. All these issues are not resolved.

On the corporation's side, the corporation is suggesting that the union is archaic and is not willing to be flexible and adjust to the realities of modern society and the needs of a modern corporation.

When you hear both sides talking like that, on the one hand the union side and on the other hand the corporation's side, it makes you wonder as a Canadian just what is going on at Canada Post. It is high time that we find out what is going on at Canada Post. It seems to me that we should have a commission of inquiry to look into the over 130,000 grievances. Anyone who has been involved in collective bargaining in this country can tell you that if there are that many grievances, regardless if some of them are fabricated as some members opposite have suggested, the fact remains that things are not well over at Canada Post. The situation between workers and management simply has to be looked at by an independent third party.

If we are going to look at legislation every time Canada Post and CUPW go to the negotiating table, in essence every two or three years, we will have back-to-work legislation. It is a fact that following back-to-work legislation, arbitrator's rulings never rectify the differences of either side. They simply delay the process, the inevitability of some sort of sense of compromise by both sides and the good labour relations necessary to make those compromises.

When I look at the hundreds and hundreds of articles, and I have them in front of me, and the communiqués of the two sides in their positions, they seem to be so polarized and of such different philosophies that no one in their right mind could stand up in this place and say that the collective bargaining process between CUPW and Canada Post is functioning properly. There is absolutely no one in this place who could say that in all good conscience.

I want to emphasize that this commission of inquiry would give us as Canadians a sense of security that three years down the road we will not be going through the same process that we are going through now, that there will not be disruptions of service, there will not be allegations from both sides that the whole process of collective bargaining is not working and that we as Canadians can feel comfortable that our postal service is a reliable service.

That is the issue at heart here, but not so much for the workers in a sense because they have a process to follow and they are looking for a good collective agreement, a good working environment, a good wage and good job security for the future. Those are all issues that are paramount in collective bargaining and there is no disputing that. The argument that we are faced with here today concerns what will be resolved when Bill C-40 is implemented and the arbitrator is put in his place and makes a ruling on particular issues.

It is a well known fact that most arbitrators will only go a certain distance and not all the way to support one side or the other. In essence, we have again delayed the inevitable.

I look to the government to ask itself two questions. One, does it really believe that this back-door essential service legislation will rectify the problem in the long term and if not, why not and what is it proposing to do with it? Second, if it is true that both sides cannot seem to come to an agreement, why not put in this kind of inquiry which has been done in certain cases?

When we hear the kinds of comments that come from both parties in the press and on our television screens, we must as MPs wonder just what is happening at Canada Post. We have people coming before us in the informal inquiries the opposition parties have put through saying that they are getting harassed at the work place, that they are getting spied upon, that in essence it is bugging its own employees through the telephone system. These are accusations that in some instances are unfounded but in other instances make us as members of Parliament ask that particular question that we always ask: "What is going on at Canada Post".

I would ask the government and the Minister of Labour to strongly look at my suggestion of this particular commission of inquiry simply because without it we will be at it again. Perhaps the minister is not too worried about it because it may be another party's problem by that time and we will have to deal with it over here on this side, but he will be over on that side and so he is not overly worried about it. I think it is important for the workers of Canada Post and for all Canadians to know exactly what is going on at Canada Post.

I want to talk about some of the issues that are outstanding. I want to talk a bit about the mandate of Canada Post. This government has suggested to Canada Post that the first thing Canada Post has to do is become more efficient. Through that whole process the government is suggesting that Canada Post has to make a profit.

Mr. Danis: What is wrong with that?

Mr. Nault: There is nothing wrong with that. The minister asks me that question. I can assure you there is absolutely nothing wrong with that. There is something wrong when the rest of the mandate, which is what Canada Post is also all about, service, seems to be lost in the whole shuffle. There is nothing wrong with being efficient. There is nothing wrong with making a profit. The question is: What do you do with the profit?

That is a good question to ask in this place. The government says: "We are going to reduce the deficit". In essence the government is saying to people out there who get service from Canada Post: "You're going to get a reduced service because we're going to reduce the service in order for us to make a profit". In a country as large as ours, in areas like mine in northern Ontario, you cannot make a profit. It is impossible.

What did it do with the service in northern Ontario? Let me tell the House what it has done. It has cut post offices out completely. It has also reduced service in the sense that we no longer have door-to-door delivery. Now we have what are called supermailboxes.

The minister has to quickly understand that is a reduction in service. In the rural areas, if I am not getting my mail at the door I have to drive 10 miles to pick it up. This is what people are doing. At the end of their road they are picking it up with their own car or in some circumstances having other people pick it up for them because they do not have a car, because they are poor, because they are seniors and cannot move around and are stranded.

They get family members to do it. It is fine for these ministers. One is from Toronto and one is from Montreal. They probably have never been in rural Canada long enough to realize that there is a difference in the way we live. We have to understand that they have now cut service. We used to have postal service four or five days a week; five days a week in most cases and six days a week when we had post offices. We are now getting postal service twice a week, that is if it shows up at all. Service has been cut and that is what the issue is all about.

Let me just use one particular suggestion made by the union during this whole negotiation. The union suggested that they should take some of the profit that Canada Post is now making by getting rid of all these post offices—and the dollars they are talking about are $42 million a year—to expand door-to-door delivery. Does it sound unreasonable to you as the Speaker and to people out there who are listening that now that Canada Post is making money it should put it back into service so that we get better service? That is really what Canada Post is supposed to be.

The reason we put Canada Post into this kind of monopoly system that we have was because we as Canadians realized that Canada Post was not just a business, that it was an essential service needed by Canadians because of the large geography we are dealing with in this country. There are only four or five locations in this country where Canada Post can make money. In the rest of the places that it deals with there is no money involved. It is all subsidized, and it is subsidized to a certain extent by the taxpayers of Canada which we accept as taxpayers and have always accepted.

We said to Canada Post: "You can be more like a business, be more efficient and look at ways of cutting down the amount of subsidy we are paying you. That is perfectly acceptable". We did not say through that whole process that it was to cut service to the point where there is a difference between a Canadian living in a riding like Kenora—Rainy River and a Canadian living in Montreal who gets better service because they live in a city than I get in rural northwestern Ontario because I happen to be a rural Canadian.

That was not the intent of giving Canada Post the mandate to become more efficient. We just thought it was a good idea to be more efficient.

There seems to be a significant difference between what the President of Canada Post, Mr. Lander, is doing and what the President of CUPW, Mr. Parrot, is doing. Mr. Parrot is suggesting that they will be more efficient, that they will get into technological change and improvements. They also want to make sure that we understand that they still believe this is an essential service. They still believe that they can improve the services and that as a postal union they can make suggestions to the corporate board of Canada Post on how that will work simply because they believe—and I firmly believe it as a member—that the union has a role to play in making sure the service that they supply to Canadians as far as letter carrier service and delivery of packages is the best in the world. They will maintain that.

The government is quick to say that it is the best in the world, but it is quickly becoming the worst in the world the way they are going at it. If it continues to suggest that the supermailboxes are the way to go, it will not be long before most Canadians look to some other form of getting their letters delivered because of the unreliability of the postal service.

I want the minister opposite to know that in my area I have so many grievances about the post office that I write the minister and the president of Canada Post regularly. We have created our own internal system, as a member of Parliament's office, just to deal with Canada Post because of the grievances and the people complaining on a regular basis about letters that do not show up for months on end and delivery that is unreliable. It is not because the employee is not trying. It is the fact that this particular service has been cut so thin that there is no possible way these people can do their job. I think the government should reflect on the mandate it has given Canada Post and why we are into the debate we are in today.

I want to talk a bit about contracting out, the ideology and the philosophy of this government. Contracting out sounds pretty good in theory. Simply put, what contracting out means is that one does not have to pay somebody benefits. That is very simply put but that is what it means. There is a big saving to the particular company that contracts out certain work.

Contracting out, if continued, will erode the service further because there is not the same commitment by people who are now the contractors working for Canada Post in a particular service, simply because the cheaper that they can get it done for the more that individual can put in his pocket. What happens is that we get the scenarios like the one in Mexico where one is told: "Don't put a letter in that system. You will be lucky if you ever see it again because the people there are not exactly reliable. They are not people you can trust". Canadians have always felt very secure that they can trust their letter carriers and that they can trust the people behind the wicket at the post office in their home towns.

Now we are being asked to trust someone making minimum wage who really does not want to be there, someone wishing for a much better job with benefits included. Why should they give a darn if a letter goes missing or not? It is not big deal for them. That situation is something that is quickly going to come to fruition as far as Canada Post is concerned once it realizes this whole process of change that is going through.

Another issue in this country—and we talk about this very fondly—is that we have set up a social net to look after Canadians. We have set up a system called benefits and the paying into of programs called pension plans. However, the government seems to forget is that if people are not given benefits and they do not pay into their pension plans, eventually down the line somebody is going to have to look after these Canadians. If the benefits of 42,000 or 45,000 people at the post office are reduced, there may seem to be some sort of benefit as a corporation today by making a profit, but who is going to pay for those people down the line when they retire? They were making so little they never had an opportunity to save any money and they never paid any benefits into any plan. What do they do? Obviously they will have to be looked after by the state.

We talk in this place very often about what goes on in the United States versus what goes on in Canada. When we look at those people living on the streets in big cities in the United States who have nowhere to go, no benefits, no nothing, it makes us wonder whether that is the kind of system we are talking about when we talk about these kinds of processes of contracting out and not having any benefits for our workers.

If we have job security and benefits for workers, it is going to save us something down the road. It is not something that we should look at as being something we cannot afford because in essence we will have to pay it anyway.

I want to talk a bit again about bargaining in good faith. I for one am appalled at the game that the government continues to play. On the one hand it says to CUPW and Canada Post that it expects them to bargain in good faith, but at the same time it continues putting out the message, as it did in the grain handlers' strike when it said to grain handlers: "We are going to bring in back-to-work legislation". The minister responsible for grains and oilseeds went to Winnipeg and said: "We are going to put them back to work through back-to-work legislation", even as they were in the process of trying to negotiate with a mediator, a person from the Minister of Labour's office who was down in Thunder Bay in the mediation office trying to get the negotiation kick-started again.

Anyone who has ever been in a negotiating room knows that once you get those kinds of mixed messages and signals the negotiation is finished, it is off, because one side or another feels very comfortable that they will do better with the arbitrator than what is being proposed at the bargaining table. My sense of what has happened is that Canada Post management has a lot more respect and they hope that the arbitrator will be more on its side than the union does in this case. I think it is feeling that it will get something beneficial, more so than what CUPW will get.

This process of bringing in legislation before there is a strike or a lockout is a complete farce. Anybody who has ever been in a collective bargaining process or a negotiating room long enough knows that it stops everything.

The minister opposite who used to be the Minister of Labour should know that they keep sending mixed signals to the labour movement: "Either do it my way or we will bring in back-to-work legislation. If you don't like it we will put in an arbitrator who will rule in the company's favour. So you have to give concessions".

Either there is no bargaining in good faith at that bargaining table or the process that Canada Post is entering into is so bad that the workers of Canada Post fear for their jobs and therefore have no choice but to fight this every step of the way. They are quite prepared to do something that may be a little radical in nature.

My sense of it is that even if this back-to-work legislation or this essential service legislation as I mentioned before is put in place, some of the locals of CUPW will not be very pleased with the process and we will still get disruptions.

It will happen the same way it happened for PSAC. The Minister of Labour and the President of Treasury Board legislated PSAC back to work. Did that help the whole process? No, simply because they are now working to rule. They are telling us as Canadians that they are not going to put that little extra into it. They are not going to go that extra mile. In essence, the government opposite has only delayed the inevitable again, that somewhere down the line some other government is going to have to deal with the issue.

If there is one message this government should have learned by now, it seems to me it is that this country and the people in it are looking for some kind of leadership. They do not want the government or politicians to continue to delay making decisions. Making a decision of this nature is a non-decision because it has not rectified the problems of Canada Post. The arbitrator is not going to go in there and clean up the collective bargaining process that started with over 360 issues. It is not going to happen. The arbitrator is going to go in there and give them a piecemeal settlement: they are going to get some wages; they are going to get some sort of process, hopefully, for the grievance procedure which is a large stumbling block, as the minister is aware. He may deal with two or three of those issues and then he will say: "That will do until you get back to the table in 1993 to deal with this issue again". They will be back at the same process they are in right now, that is that there is a complete disagreement in philosophy and ideology of what Canada Post is meant to be and do.

The question has to be put to the government: "What do you want Canada Post to be?" If it is suggesting that it should be privatized, it should come out and say that it is going to privatize Canada Post. Everyone watching this process knows darned well that the whole process is looking toward privatization more and more every day. It wants to make this a money making proposition in order to sell it off to its friends. Nobody is going to buy Canada Post if it does not make any money. What it will do is get rid of the weak links. It will get rid of the northwestern Ontario problem. They do not make any money for Canada Post there. It will leave that for the government.

Therefore, if Canada Post is privatized, what will be left will be the non-profitable areas and we as taxpayers will then have to pay for them. The government's friends will take the profitable side, run with it and make all kinds of money as they did with some of the other privatization schemes this government has come up with.

I am suggesting that is the whole issue at hand here. I have said to Canada Post and CUPW and I say to CUPW now: "Hang in there as long as you can until we can get rid of this government so we can put the mandate back to where it was supposed to be". That mandate was to give the kind of service Canadians have always expected.

I simply want to say that wages are not the major issue in this whole dispute. It seems to me we always hear the media or a particular individual on television say that the issue of wages is the stumbling block. Well, it is not. The real issue is whether we are going to allow Canada Post to change the whole structure of our postal service in this country.

I am wondering really what the hidden mandate is that this government has given Mr. Lander and friends when we hear Mr. Dunstan say the kind of things he said on television in the last few months. It is shameful to have people come out and say the things they have said when we know, as Canadians, that this particular service has always been one we have been proud of.

I want to say to the mediator, Mr. Gold, that as a labour unionist and a person who has been involved in the negotiating process, I thank him very much. I would really like Mr. Gold to do us all a favour and tell us exactly what is going on at the negotiating table. I think it is high time that people realized this whole process has been nothing but a charade. Once Mr, Gold realized it, he had no choice but to step down. The gentleman we are talking about has a lot of credibility in the labour movement. For him to continue to say on the one hand he thought both sides were close and on the other hand turn around unexpectedly and resign saying he had done everything he possibly could is quite shocking for someone like myself who is familiar with the process.

I would really like Mr. Gold to tell us in a report to the minister just where it is that these two sides are coming from and whether indeed it is as bad at Canada Post as we are hearing.

I have a bit of a bias in this whole process and I will tell the minister why. My brother works for Canada Post as a letter carrier in Winnipeg and I know the minister is aware of that. I have told him. My brother is a letter carrier and he tells me about the internal workings of his day to day job at Canada Post, his day to day activities with the management of Canada Post in Winnipeg. I obviously have a lot of respect for my brother.

One of the things he has said to me is that the relationship between management and the worker is so bad that on most days he wonders why he would even want to continue to work there. He cannot seem to see the end of the tunnel and the improvements that are going to take place that he would like to see between the two sides as far as labour relations are concerned.

I put that on the record because I want people to know that I have talked to people I trust who work for Canada Post to get a sense of whether it is really as bad as they say it is. My sense in discussing this issue with those who are in the know is that it is really bad. If it is that bad then we have an obligation as parliamentarians and the government has an obligation to investigate. During committee I asked the minister if he had undertaken a study to take a look at all the innuendo coming out of Canada Post about the harassment and whether he had indeed instructed his officials to take a good look at that. The answer was that nobody had asked him.

Leadership is simply that. You do not have to be asked. If something is wrong you go and take a look at it and see if you can fix it. I say to the minister again that through the process of this amendment which I am putting forward maybe he could formulate this kind of investigation that would clear the air once and for all of what is going on at Canada Post.

In wrapping up I want to say to the government opposite that this essential service legislation, this back-door process, is not going to resolve the issue. The ability of Canada Post and its employees to function will only be improved through good labour relations. I hope that the minister or the next government that comes into office realizes that Canada Post has to have some improvements.

I want to thank the Speaker for allowing me to go on. I hope that the minister will understand the fundamental issues that are at hand here.

I want to present the motion. I move:

> That clause 15 on page 6 be amended by deleting lines 30 to 32 and substitute the following therefor:
> "This Act shall come into force at the time the Governor in Council appoints a commission of inquiry under the Inquiries Act for the purpose of inquiring into labour relations between Canada Post Corporation and its employees."

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Pronovost): The Chair will take the motion moved by the hon. member for the Official Opposition under advisement. Resuming debate. The hon. member for Churchill.

[English]

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on Bill C-40. I think one of the interesting things that should be pointed out is that this is the fortieth piece of legislation that this government has brought forward since the last Throne Speech. It is the fourth time that the government has brought in legislation to order workers back to work. In other words, 10 per cent of the government's legislation to date has been back-to-work legislation.

I think that gives people an idea about the status of labour relations in this country. Even though the vast majority of disputes in this country are settled without strikes there are a certain number of areas where the federal government does have to look at the problems that are faced in the Public Service. Quite often these problems are related to this government's political agenda. In other words, the agenda of privatization, contracting out and the reduction of services has created negative labour relations within this country.

I look at this legislation and have only had it for an hour but I think there are some problems with it. There is an imbalance in the legislation. It says that employees have to go back to work. At the same time it allows the employer to discipline approximately 71 people who were disciplined during the strike, and not let them come back to work. In other words when this legislation passes, they are not guaranteed that they will be allowed back to work.

There is a presumption in the legislation that those employees are guilty of whatever management said when they made the decision to discipline them. Those employees are not given the benefit of any hearing. They are not given the benefit of any protection under a collective agreement. It is assumed that whatever management thinks is correct. Those people will not be expected to return to work as a result of this legislation.

To be fair to the minister, he does allow a clause, clause 5 (b) which states that these people can go to an arbitrator. If they win the arbitration, then they will be allowed to go back to work some time in the future. I do not think that is fair. Basically what this legislation is saying is that those people are guilty because that is what management thinks. As a result, they are not expected to go back to work. It is only later that they will be given a hearing to find out whether they were fairly or unfairly disciplined. I think that is putting the cart before the horse. It is completely unfair in this legislation.

One of the things that the government always asks us in regard to back-to-work legislation is will we pass it quickly. Will we move quickly through all stages. Will we agree to Committee of the Whole in order to pass this legislation because we do not want a postal strike. I note with interest that in the minister's speech he referred to the senior citizens who were lining up in the sweltering heat to collect income security cheques.

That is an example of where there was no need for our senior citizens to have a problem. The union had offered to deliver those seniors' cheques. Just in the last couple of weeks I wrote to Canada Post a couple of times trying to get it to agree that if there was a postal strike in the future it would allow those cheques to go through. It would allow the inside workers and the outside workers in this case to process and deliver those cheques. No senior would have to line up in the sweltering heat or the cold to get that cheque. They would not have to go and find some alternate post office and pick up their cheque there. We know that those cheques were often not there. Quite often seniors would line up, go to one of these centres and find out their cheque was not even there.

Here is the situation where the workers are willing to try and resolve one of the main problems of the postal dispute, and that is the delivery of cheques to pensioners, but the company for its own reasons will not agree to that.

When I hear the government saying it wants want legislation passed quickly because it affects senior citizens, we know that there was a way of resolving that dispute but Canada Post would not accept that route. For some reason, it wanted the scenes of seniors and handicapped waiting in long lines this summer. It wanted that. It knew they could have had those cheques delivered and it refused. It still refuse to accept the offer of the workers to deliver those pension cheques.

I do not always believe the government when it says in the House "you must pass this legislation quickly; you must do it—with one speaker at second reading you must immediately go into committee of the whole; you must sit up all night and pass the legislation".

I feel that process has almost become ingrained in this House of Commons.

I note with interest that in the last two pieces of back-to-work legislation, the president of the union and the employer appeared before the bar of the Senate and gave their presentations, expounding on their positions to the senators. One of the problems we have with the process of committee of the whole is that it never allows the members of Parliament who are going to vote on legislation and on clauses within that legislation to be heard from. It never allows us to hear from the people who are directly affected.

We have a process within the House of Commons which will allow people to be called before the bar of the House. That is something that the government has rejected in the past. We believe that there is a way of making sure that as we pass legislation, and indeed that is what the purpose of this bill is, to pass legislation, that we have an understanding of these clauses, that we have an understanding of what has taken place in negotiations. We should indeed know what we are dealing with as opposed to government members voting with the government and opposition members voting against the legislation.

I would think that the minister and the government may want to consider a different process. It is a process that we follow with other legislation. I offer as a recommendation for all parties' consideration that some time later today we give this legislation second reading, we send it to a legislative committee and invite representatives of the union, Canada Post representatives, the minister and perhaps one or two other groups like Rural Dignity to look at the legislation and make sure that as we go through this clause by clause we are aware of the effects of that legislation.

We are not saying that we would unduly stall the legislation. We are not saying that we would speed it through. What we are saying is that there are methods of making sure that we deal with this legislation in such a way that we, as people who were elected to the House of Commons, know what we are doing.

There are some new clauses in this legislation that we are not familiar with and have not been in other back-to-work legislation.

I think it is only fair that we understand those clauses before we vote on them, that we make amendments that are reasonable and will improve the legislation.

Someone later in the day, I am sure from the government side, will get up and say: "Well we must pass this legislation or there will be a postal strike". That is a possibility, we may have a strike for one, two or three days and it is true it would inconvenience many Canadians but on the other hand we have an obligation to make sure that we are not just a rubber stamp for whatever the government proposes but that we in our role as a court actually look at what is before us and make a reasonable judgment on the merits of legislation.

My understanding is that there are other ways of preventing this strike. Even as we go through the passage of this legislation there are items out there that could be dealt with that would actually prevent a strike as we go through the various steps in order to pass this legislation. I know that the company and CUPW have basically agreed to the wage package, that there is an agreement on the salaries and on the COLA clause. Perhaps one of the things that could be done is that we amend this legislation so that those wage increases come into effect immediately instead of waiting for 90 or 180 days when the arbitrator finally gets around to making a ruling. That is one way of showing good faith, that is one of resolving some of the issues in dispute, and it is one way of making sure there is more harmony and more peace in the post office.

Another suggestion is that we treat those people who have been disciplined in a fair manner in the same way that our court system would, in the same way that they would be treated if there were actually a collective agreement in place, and that is that they are presumed innocent and that they, too, would be expected and entitled to go to work. That is a suggestion which would help to prevent a postal strike. Another is to deal with the wage issues which have already been agreed to by both parties, make sure that those wage increases are implemented immediately and that the workers are not forced to wait because it might turn out to be three or six months prior to them receiving any pay increase. I remind people that this collection agreement is three years out of date, so those people have been waiting a long time for this pay increase.

We should make sure that those workers whom the company has decided to discipline are given a fair trial, that they are allowed to go back to work with their other employees. If the company decides at that stage that it wants to take disciplinary action then at least there is a process put into place that provides for fairness.

Those are two suggestions and we may have other suggestions as we go through the legislation. At this point, we are not willing to give immediate passage to this legislation. What we are saying is let us look at the alternatives, let us look at a referral to a legislative committee which could meet tomorrow morning, which could come back to the House later tomorrow. Let us look at those things that might prevent a postal dispute to see if we can get the company and the union to agree not to have a strike if certain clauses or certain changes are made to this legislation. Let us look at those items and let us see what can be resolved.

Later on today, if we come back to this debate, I would like to talk about some of the changes that have evolved in Canada Post. We have seen communities like Brandon, Manitoba losing its only post office and being told: "Well you can go off to these six commercial centres and pick up your mail".

When I was in Brandon, I think it was about a month and a half ago, I talked to some of the people of that community.

They did not know where these new commercial outlets were. They all knew where their federal government building was. They all knew where their post office was. They did not know where all these little commercial outlets were. Why should they?

They had a government post office. They knew where it was, and they had been using that for many, many years. They were completely happy with that situation. We had Canada Post in front of the House of Commons committee and we asked why it did not give very much warning to the people of Brandon, or to the workers in Brandon.

It said: "The protocol we signed only dealt with small, rural post offices. When we close a post office, the only government post office in a large centre, we do not have to give much notice".

It can go to a city council meeting as it did in Brandon and say: "In six weeks, your post office is closing". It can go to those employees and say: "In six weeks you are no longer working where you used to, you are now with some sorting outfit somewhere on the outskirts of town. I am sorry this means that you are no longer working the day shift. You are going to have to work night shift. We do not have to give warning. We do not have to be considerate of the years that you worked for us. We do not have to be considerate about what this means for your personal life".

There are many, many problems in Canada Post. There is an attitude problem in management. There is a situation there which does not respect the wants of the community. There is a situation there in which there is pretence by Canada Post that the public is after something when we know that the exact opposite is the case, that the public does not want what Canada Post is forcing on it.

There is a real attitude problem by Canada Post management. We cannot resolve that in this legislation, so I am not going to spend the time I would normally on that particular aspect, but I think that there are things that we can do as we deal with the legislation in front of us. We can make the legislation fairer.

We can talk to both parties and be sure that we do all we can to prevent a postal strike. We should not be forced into quick passage of this legislation until we have had an actual chance to hear from those people who will be affected and to make sure we put in whatever amendments are necessary to make the legislation fairer and more just, not only for the public but also for the employees who work for our Crown corporation.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before resuming debate, I would like to announce the Chair's decision on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River. The amendment is not in order, for three reasons: On second reading, the House is asked to vote on the principle of the legislation, and I may refer you to Beauchesne's Sixth Edition, paragraph 659, and I quote:

> The second reading is the most important stage through which the bill is required to pass; for its whole principle is then at issue and is affirmed or denied by a vote of the House.
> It is not regular on this occasion, however, to discuss in detail the clauses of the bill.

Second, at this stage, the amendments cannot deal with the provisions of the bill nor anticipate amendments which may be moved in committee. I may refer you again to the same edition of Beauchesne's, paragraph 662:

> Nor may such an amendment deal with the provisions of the bill upon which it is moved, nor anticipate amendments thereto which may be moved in committee, nor attach conditions to the second reading of the bill.

And for the information of hon. members, I may recall paragraph 666, in the same edition of Beauchesne's:

> 666. There are three types of amendments that may be proposed at the second reading of a bill. These are:
> 1. the hoist (eg. three months, six months).
> 2. the reasoned amendment.
> 3. the referral of the subject-matter to a committee.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I do want to add my comments to this debate on the Postal Services Continuation Act.

That will be the act which will allow the continuation of postal services and which will set out a mechanism whereby the terms and conditions of the collective agreement in dispute will be resolved.

If there is one element of this legislation I would like to emphasize, and I think it is the most important element, it is the benefit that will accrue to all Canadians through the assurance of the return of postal services.

When we are in this House and we are debating, I think one of the things we have to remember is who we are actually serving in this House. We are serving the Canadian people, the Canadian public. The Canadian public has come to expect a level of service from Canada Post, whether it is receiving an old age pension cheque or a family allowance cheque, or the shipment of merchandise in the mail or the receipt of payments that businesses so badly need. We do need the services of Canada Post. Any disruption in that service hurts us all. It hurts this country, particularly at the stage we are at now in terms of the Canadian economy. As many of us on both sides of this House know and appreciate, we are coming through a very, very difficult period. Hopefully we are coming through that difficult period, that recessionary period. I do not think at this point in that recovery we can afford to have any kind of disruption in the level of postal services because, as I have mentioned, those businesses out there that do create and generate the wealth and prosperity in this country cannot survive without postal service.

I think it is incumbent upon all of us to recognize that early in this debate because surely one of the most important ingredients or elements within any business is the ability to receive mail, transmit mail and, obviously, send out those bills and have payment for the services delivered.

We want a reliable mail service. We want it at a reasonable cost. That is exactly what was promised in 1981 by the Canada Post Corporation Act when it was introduced and passed in this House of Commons in 1981. It was to operate a postal service which would provide Canadians with reliable and efficient service at a reasonable cost.

I do not think we are asking too much at all in that regard. I do not think it is an unusual demand to make on Canada Post to deliver that at a reasonable cost.

Most of us realize the size of this country, how big it is, and maybe we should emphasize the task that Canada Post has by reminding everyone how big Canada really is and how important that service is to Canada.

Canada Post has approximately 700,000 points of entry across the country. That includes post offices, letter boxes, supermailboxes, and points where mail is deposited into the system. Canada Post does provide delivery to more than 11 million addresses in all parts of Canada. It has a network of 25 major mechanized mail processing plants and a fleet of something in the order of 5,300 vehicles. In a country the size of Canada, it is not an easy task to deliver mail. We have a very widespread population and when you compare Canada to some of the European countries and to our neighbour to the south, it is a little bit harder to deliver mail in Canada and we recognize that.

About 20 per cent of all mail delivered is personal mail. It is mail between individuals and some of it is going to corporations. The business side of it accounts for about 80 per cent of all mail delivered in this country. That includes things such as the distribution of correspondence, invoices, advertisements, publications and products. The postal service is very much a part of the Canadian economy. It is a part we cannot ignore and it is a part we must have working well if the country is to work.

Coast to coast we have approximately 57,000 full time and part time employees.

Looking at it objectively, I think most of us would have to admit they do a pretty good job, although we have all experienced difficulties in our neighbourhoods, our own constituencies. Any objective measurement would indicate that they do a pretty fair job.

We are at a stalemate here. I want to emphasize what is going on and step through some of the process as we know it and what we have observed as Canadians over the last number of weeks. This becomes somewhat technical, Mr. Speaker, so bear with me as I step through some of the conciliatory process we have used up to this point.

The Minister of Labour provided first stage conciliation assistance and with no settlement at this stage, decided to establish a conciliation board. The parties to the dispute nominated their respective representatives who, in turn, were able to agree on the selection of a mutual, acceptable chairperson, being, Mr. Marc Lapointe, Q.C. Following the release of the report of the conciliation board to the parties in mid August, direct bargaining resumed.

CUPW initiated rotating strike action on August 24. Following an assessment of the dispute by senior Labour Canada officials, the Minister of Labour consulted with the parties and discussed options which were available to them.

Sensing a desire for settlement on the part of the parties, he advised them of his decision to appoint a mediator to facilitate their efforts in reaching an accord. The appointment of Chief Justice Alan B. Gold of the Quebec Superior Court as mediator in the dispute on September 5, 1991 occurred. This had immediate implications for the dispute. Judge Gold obtained agreement from the employer to restore the collective agreement provisions during the mediation process and the union agreed to terminate its rotating strikes.

While Judge Gold's mediation of the dispute did not produce a final resolution of the differences between the parties, there was significant progress in narrowing the remaining items in dispute.

Clearly, at each stage of the process, first through the appointment of a conciliation officer, second, the establishment of a conciliation board and third, the appointment of a mediator, the government underscored its commitment to the collective bargaining process and support to the parties' efforts in the negotiations of a new collective agreement.

This bill provides for the continuation of postal services and the dispute resolution mechanism to arrive at the terms and conditions of a new collective agreement. By introducing this bill, the Minister of Labour has taken the action necessary to protect the economic well-being of the Canadian population.

The government has had to weigh the rights of the parties against the general economic welfare of Canadians. Nothing in the legislation precludes the right of the parties to negotiate and amend any specific conditions of the agreement binding upon them, with the exception of the term of the agreement.

Let me return to how the government treats Canada Post. It is a Crown corporation and we have had some difficulties with Canada Post and CUPW in the past number of years. I just want to emphasize a couple of points. I am going to quote from a book written by Douglas K. Adie from the Fraser Institute.

I simply want to emphasize the cost of doing business and what it costs Canada Post to keep its operation going in terms of labour and in terms of costs.

"Canada Post's labour costs are 72 per cent of total costs which is high when compared to other service industries. Cost cutting at Canada Post needs to begin with a consideration of labour enumeration. In 1986-87 average annual salary and benefits of workers at Canada Post was more than $36,000".

He goes on to say: "Although Canadian postal wages have not been studied as closely as those in the U.S., they appear to be excessive by about one-third compared to what Canada Post needs to pay to attract and hold a competent work force or what postal workers of similar experience and education would get if employed elsewhere".

He asks the question of how this happened, why this disparity between what we pay our postal employees and what other countries pay theirs. He answers it by simply stating that Canada Post has failed to control supervisory and non-supervisory wages from 1967 to 1987 when technology changed rapidly: "When technology changed rapidly labour costs still increased from 56 to 72.4 per cent of total costs. In one-sided labour negotiations Canada Post gave the unions almost everything they wanted. Since reorganization Canada Post has not redressed the inequity of excessive wages".

Part of this he concludes is simply because Canada Post does not have the competition that it needs to be competitive. There is no compelling reason for it to be competitive. He says: "Canada Post's exclusive privilege encourages overstaffing and high labour costs. Lack of competition prevents managers from controlling labour costs by shielding them from the necessity of pressing for economical wage settlements".

Despite what we say and think in this House, I think the average Canadian believes the employees are paid rather well for the work that they do, although they are not the highest paid people in the country. They are paid rather well for what they do. In this morning's Globe and Mail it is mentioned that 46,000 postal carriers and inside workers represented by CUPW earn an average of $14.24 an hour, with a cost of living clause which generally adds something in the vicinity of 17 cents an hour to what they are paid.

In some parts of the country I guess people would argue and could argue maybe successfully that is not enough. Believe me, from the part of the country that I come from and the part that I represent, that is certainly way above the average. It would be close to double what the average employee would make in the maritime provinces.

That is not the whole story. Wages cannot do it all. I think there has got to be a way that Canada Post can sit down and talk through this thing and maybe create a new sense of co-operation between Canada Post and its employees. Dollars will not do the whole thing. There has got to be a need to resolve this thing and a need to try to bring an end to the sort of discontent that has been so evident in this corporation for so many years.

Again, going back to the people in this country who depend on Canada Post for service, I want to read a letter that was forwarded to me this morning. The letter was addressed to the hon. Harvie Andre, government House leader and minister responsible for Canada Post. I want to read this letter because it goes back to my opening remarks of how important it is to resolve this dispute and how important it is that Canadians have a postal service that they can depend on. The letter begins:

> Dear Mr. Andre:
> On behalf of the New Brunswick Lung Association and the thousands of New Brunswickers who suffer from lung disease I am writing to convey our association's grave concern about the possibility again of disruption of the postal service.
> This association is a constituent of Canada's most senior health charity, making a substantial contribution to the respiratory health of Canadians since early in this century.
> Because of Christmas seals, our major source of funds, our organization led the way in the near eradication of tuberculosis. We are leaders in health promotion through smoking prevention, reduction initiatives and have been since the late 1960s and have helped Canada achieve a fine reputation in this area.
> In New Brunswick, Christmas seals account for 85 per cent of our funds, allowing us to support national research and carry on effective community services. Our family asthma clinics, camp, peer group, support groups, workshops, asthma smoking help line, equipment loan programs, smoking cessation programs, and school health programs are hostage to this threatened labour disruption.
> In many areas we relieve government of the need to provide service.

That is a very, very important point.

> Our small organization's biggest expense item is what we pay for postal service to reach our donors and clients. We comply with many regulations, sign contracts of commitment with this Crown corporation, and have no guarantees of it delivering its part of these agreements.
> Already our organization has made a major financial investment in materials for this time-sensitive campaign. We cannot postpone Christmas or save our 1992 health calendars for 1993. Hundreds of hours have been spent by volunteers to prepare mail and we have no other delivery option. We are looking at not only lost donations which are devastating but also lost investment that cannot be recouped.
> Donors tell us that their confidence in donations being returned is affected by the confusion in your system.
> The lung association and its volunteers are making a substantial contribution to the lives of Canadians. We believe it is incumbent on your government to restore order to this system and to provide Canadians with a dependable service.
> For your information the concept of the Christmas seal as a weapon against lung disease world-wide was initiated by a postman in Copenhagen in 1903.

Mr. John B. Barry concludes by saying:

> He certainly did his part. Please settle with your unions and let us do ours.

That pretty well sums up the feeling of most Canadians. We feel we are being held hostage to a degree by Canada Post and its unions. It is not like we are out to destroy the unions, but clearly something has broken down and this has been a recurring theme. We have gone through these things since 1967. I do not know how many strikes we have had.

Clearly the Canadian public has had it up to its eyebrows with Canada Post. Let us support this legislation. I believe it has to be supported. I believe we have to get the post office back to work, the union back to work, and this country back to work.

In conclusion, I therefore intend to support the legislation before this House and urge hon. members all to do the same. We must get them back to work. We must. We have had enough strikes in this country.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I think it is interesting that the hon. member who was just speaking said that we must get them back to work, that we have had enough strikes in this country. The hon. member might be interested to know that they have not left work. This legislation is being introduced pre-emptorily before CUPW members leave the job. So to say we must get them back to work is a little bit of an overstatement.

I would also like to comment on the hon. member's comments about the fact that these workers on average earn $14 an hour. I find it very, very fascinating that the hon. members across the floor want back-to-work legislation after back-to-work legislation and suggest that these people who work for the federal government in the service area are overpaid. There is this whole mentality of being totally offended by Canadians making decent wages. I just find that is quite systematic of the whole attitude of this government to a whole lot of things.

The hon. member made reference to the Fraser Institute and Michael Walker, the guru of right-headed thinking in this country, so right-headed that it is almost off the spectrum. But Michael Walker is not the appropriate authority to be quoted with reference to how to run Canada Post. I would suggest the hon. member look at some very simple things and out of that reference to simple things, I am going to have a question for him.

The Canadian Union of Postal Workers spends a full 25 per cent, and I will repeat that, 25 per cent of the union's budget on grievance handling. Canada Post obviously spends a pretty healthy sum as well. There is a backlog of 100,000 grievances.

Instead of going to the right wing guru, Mr. Michael Walker and the Fraser Institute, perhaps the hon. member can tell us if he does not think it is pretty evident that management and industrial relations at Canada Post are in pretty tough straits. The problem is not with what the workers are earning, the problem is not lack of competition, the problem is bad management and the inability to have decent and respectful industrial relations. That is my question to the hon. member.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, I do not think we have to apologize for supporting the private sector on this side of the House because obviously it is the private sector that we are so concerned about. One thing that we realize on this side of the House, but I am not sure the NDP have figured out, is that the private sector creates the jobs, the opportunities and the wealth in this country. We have a high standard of living because we have a Canadian economy that works. We do not have to apologize for that.

I do not think the hon. member was listening when I mentioned the statistics: that 80 per cent of the mail that is going to be held up in this country is business mail. If that mail is not delivered it threatens some of those businesses. It threatens jobs and it threatens development. It threatens the kind of opportunity that we want to see happening in this country, particularly at a time when the Canadian economy has gone through a crisis, and there is no question about it. Just at this point, coming out of a recession, I do not think we can afford to have a disruption in mail because it is the lifeblood, the lifeline of business in this country. This thing is all about carrying on with Canada and carrying on with building a better Canada. We cannot do it with a disruption in the delivery of mail.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to ask a quick question of the member opposite.

One of the things that he has suggested, which is not completely correct, is that this is back-to-work legislation and necessary because we cannot afford to have someone go on strike at this time. What he did not say in his speech is that there is no strike right now and this legislation is there in case something happens down the line.

I think the hon. member should take a good look at the legislation he is debating today. One of the clauses suggests that this is in case of a work stoppage or a lockout. I want to ask the member if he would answer two questions for me. One is if he as a member believes in the right to strike, and second, does he feel that this back-to-work legislation is going to improve the situation at Canada Post between labour and management.

The reason why I ask that of the member is that there seems to be a sense across the floor over there that every time there are some difficulties with the collective bargaining process—and the collective bargaining process, as you know, in other industries and in other sectors works fairly efficiently— we have been putting in back-to-work legislation faster than I have time to read the bills. I am quite surprised that the government is proposing to do this on a regular basis because of its ramifications in the long term, the collective bargaining.

I ask the member those two questions: Does he believe in strikes and the process of collective bargaining, or that Canada Post should be an essential service; and second, does he feel that this whole process of back-to-work legislation is going to improve the situation at Canada Post?

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, I guess to answer that question I can simply say no, I am not in favour of strikes in the Public Service and for very good reasons. As I mentioned before, we were attempting to put this country to work, get it working, and I do not think that anything that disrupts that process is healthy.

I think it does come down to a question of semantics in this whole scenario in regard to Canada Post and the disruption in service. Is it a disruption in service, is it a strike or is it a slowdown? Again, it comes down to a question of semantics. When does it become a strike? At what point does it paralyzed the ability of Canadians to do business?

I think we have obviously gone through many of these. I am not about to attempt to define a strike and when a disruption in service requires legislation. I guess that is up to the Canadian public to determine whether we are doing the right thing or not. But I believe we are doing the right thing because again it goes back to doing business in this country. When 80 per cent of the mail delivered in this country is for business purposes, I think it is incumbent on all members in this House to sit down and review that and at the end of the day make the right choice. On this side of the House the choice is that we prefer Canadians to have mail delivery and that businesses have mail delivery that they can depend on and trust.

I believe that we are doing the correct thing and that Canadians cannot afford a slowdown, a work stoppage or an out and out strike in the public sector, that being the post office.

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, today we are facing a very serious problem that does not have easy answers. As a matter of fact as we stop and consider the process that has gone on, our postal workers at this point, CUPW, have been without contract for two years. There have been many processes in that time. They have gone through discussions, mediation and negotiations to try to come up with some type of conciliation with a conciliation officer. Many tactics have been used in order to come to some type of agreement.

There is not one person in this House, nor one person in this country who wants to see a strike occur. We all know that. We know that, however, we are in a situation where if appropriate strong actions had been taken several years ago, we would not be in a situation today looking at back-to-work legislation. It is a little bit odd to stand here and talk about back-to-work legislation when, as several of my colleagues have pointed out, there is no one out on strike at this point.

However, this process is being put in place to make certain there is no disruption in mail delivery.

It is a piece of legislation that may be affecting the ability of the two parties to get together. One would question the wisdom of introducing the legislation while both parties are still sitting at the bargaining table, attempting to negotiate an issue and, from my understanding, working very hard at trying to iron out the last few issues that are there.

In many ways in this last week or two we have seen some progress occur. The progress with the mediator Alan Gold had come forward over the last month and had been very positive.

Mr. Gold left because he could not aid and abet the situation further, but the two parties did sit down and attempt at that point to try to resolve what was left of the outstanding issues. Over the weekend, we heard that they were seriously trying to resolve any final differences.

That has not been finalized at this point and here in Parliament today we look at back-to-work legislation. I will reiterate again that none of my colleagues wishes to see a strike. We know that service to Canadians is the primary goal of Canada Post.

In reality, Canadians must be our first consideration, and when we realize that Canadians are our first consideration, we know that somehow labour and management must resolve this very, very vast ocean of differences that is there.

We know that Canada Post is responsible for the corporate plan it has put in place which in many, many regards has really caused much of this stress. We know that the government has supported Canada Post in its endeavours in this corporate plan. As a result, I would very strongly hold the government responsible for the strife that is now occurring with the workers and the corporation.

The government has said many, many times that it is not responsible for the ins and outs of Canada Post, but when something positive came out at Canada Post it said: "They have raised a profit. They have done extremely well in the last three years".

As a matter of fact, the government has claimed that Canada Post had profits in 1988-89 of $96 million; in 1989-90, they were $149 million and in $1990-91, they were $14 million. Yet during the same time, subsidies for various postal services such as northern air services, publication mail, government free mail and literature for the blind, totalled some $692 million during that same time period.

We all well know that during that same two year time period workers were not paid by contract because those contracts were not resolved. Therefore one must surmise on one hand that Canada Post and the government have been saying one thing and on the other hand they know what the reality is, which is something much different.

One then starts to question what is happening with the good faith between the government and the Canadian public. It is very important that credibility be maintained in government. I think we have come down the line with Canada Post and its emphasis on profits is something that is very negative toward the service we are trying to give Canadians.

The Canada Post corporate plan in 1986 placed a very great emphasis on profits. The plan called for the conversion or closure of 5,200 small rural community post offices. To date, over 1,000 have been closed. The plan called for a 40 per cent dividend to be paid to the government. However, at the same time the plan also called for improvements in employee-employer relationships. The improvements have not occurred. We know grievances have sky-rocketed to somewhere between 100,000 and 130,000. The Canadian Union of Postal Workers' contract which expired in July 1989 has not given any move to date.

The conciliation report of August 12, 1991 commented that the conciliation board has found no improvement in labour-management relationships. The extent of exacerbation has further increased in some instances to a point of contempt, if not palatable hatred and the distrust has reached new heights. The parties are not speaking. They are hurling abuse at each other. The comments go on to call on the conciliation process. Somehow we have to come up with a better process than we have seen occur at this point. Somehow management in Canada Post has to find a way to set up a better relationship between itself and the employees in CUPW. It is the responsibility of this government to carry on and make certain that there is some positive move in this area.

How did we come to this point? The government has basically taken a hands off approach to the negotiations between Canada Post and its workers. Every time problems have come up the government has said: "Canada Post is a Crown corporation. It has its corporate plan. We are not responsible for the actions of that corporate plan".

I and many of my colleagues tend to totally disagree with that. We believe the government is responsible and because of the Crown corporation status the government should watch and monitor very carefully what is happening. The government inevitably is responsible for the service to Canadians. It cannot allow the problems and the hatred to escalate as it has over the last seven years.

Mr. Speaker, I believe I just began a short time ago and I have approximately 10 minutes left if that is accurate.

Mr. Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, but we will have to proceed to Question Period. I am sure that the Table will keep track of the time.

S. O. 31

It being two o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to Statements by Members, pursuant to Standing Order 31. The hon. member for Fundy—Royal.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

CHILD ABUSE PREVENTION MONTH

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy—Royal): Mr. Speaker, once again this government would like to thank the Independent Order of Foresters for proclaiming October as Child Abuse Prevention Month. The IOF's continued commitment to the prevention of child abuse and the dedication of professionals and volunteers are fine examples of the work being done in co-operation with the government to bring awareness of this crucial societal problem because child abuse is a problem that concerns all Canadians.

Child abuse, whether physical, sexual or emotional is the problem of society as a whole and of each person as an individual and only by working in collaboration with all levels of government and non-government organizations will we begin to stop these tragedies.

In this spirit the government renewed our commitment toward the prevention of child abuse by announcing a new four-year family violence initiative in February 1991. It involves seven federal departments and agencies and will encourage the development of programs which increase public awareness, effective prevention and treatment measures, enhanced training of professionals and volunteers and exchange of information.

This government is committed to working toward the elimination of child abuse.

SPORT

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, sport in Canada is potentially facing a very serious crisis as a result of events of the last week or so as well as events leading up to it. It is necessary for the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport to act quickly to restore confidence and morale in the sport community.

Last week Abby Hoffman was removed as director general of Sport Canada. This weekend in Victoria at the national coaching seminar organized by the Coaching Association of Canada a petition signed by 151 of Canada's leading coaches condemned the removal of Abby Hoffman particularly as it occurred four months before the winter Olympics and nine months before the summer Olympics. The petition says that the action demonstrated complete lack of respect and concern for the athletes and coaches preparing to represent Canada.

I call on the government to move quickly and decisively to restore confidence and morale in the sporting community in Canada.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Harry Chadwick (Bramalea—Gore—Malton): Mr. Speaker, airport officials at Lester B. Pearson International Airport are full of promises.

Noise will be brought under control, they said. Imagine our frustration when recent reports showed that aircraft continue to stray from designated flight paths.

Noise complaints will decrease, they said. Imagine our disappointment when we learned that the recent report of a 12 per cent decrease in noise complaints can be attributed to a 9.5 per cent decrease in over-all aviation activity.

We will install a sophisticated noise monitoring system designed to catch violators, they said. Imagine our frustration when we learned that the same sophisticated system remains virtually unusable while it awaits a final connection to radar.

Airport officials might as well forget about making any more promises because we cannot hear them any more. Maybe it is a lack of faith and we are just not listening or maybe our hearing is becoming impaired from all that noise. We are not sure. In Bramalea—Gore—Malton the truth is a little hazy these days.

WOMEN

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, a so-called humorous postcard depicting male hunters discussing killing women and children has outraged women both within the province where it has been sold, Manitoba, and across Canada. It shows that the sickness abroad in society has not yet been cured, and indeed, when people who are selling this card say: "It is only a joke. I understand it is kind of a touchy subject, but it is something that is intended as a joke and should be taken as a joke," then, Mr. Speaker, we know we have a long way to go.

The card in question shows two male hunters toting shotguns. One says: "Yesterday I shot my wife, both kids, my mother-in-law and the Avon lady." And his friend replies: "That is terrific, but didn't you know that mother-in-law season does not open until next month."

Mr. Speaker, this was particularly difficult for the women of Manitoba to take, when there were three murders of women in this past month and the women's current or former spouses have been charged.

Mr. Speaker, I know that all of us in this House join in hoping that this kind of postcard will not be available any more in Canadian stores.

NATIONAL SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY WEEK

Mr. Guy Ricard (Laval-Ouest): Mr. Speaker, yesterday saw the wind-up of a very successful second annual Science and Technology Week. Approximately 1,000 events across the country exposed Canadians to the wonders of science and technology during the 10-day extravaganza.

We had so many events planned this year that we had to extend National Science and Technology Week to 10 days, from October 17 to October 27, 1991. Science and Technology Week is a national celebration, co-ordinated by Industry, Science and Technology Canada in full partnership with all the provinces and territories, science, technology and engineering associations, educational institutions and the private sector.

At the national launch at the Museum of Science and Technology, our Minister of Science announced $1.8 million in funding by science and culture in Canada for activities that increase public awareness of science and technology.

As part of the federal government's ongoing efforts to alert young Canadians for the exciting dimension of science and technology in our everyday lives, the science minister unveiled a new public awareness campaign video that will reach millions of kids across Canada.

The growing popularity of this national event proves that Canadians are becoming increasingly aware of the link between science and technology and Canada's prosperity. The Canadian government has made a long-term commitment to using education to upgrade our skills in science and technology —

SENIOR CITIZENS

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow morning the Princess of Wales will declare 1992 as the year of Help the Aged in Canada. The princess will address a group of people asking them to support efforts to alleviate poverty for seniors around the world. The project is sponsored by Help the Aged Canada and its fellow groups around the world.

• (1410)

Far too often we forget how good we have things and we need events such as this to remind ourselves that there are people who desperately need our help.

Seniors around the world face a daily struggle with poverty, including seniors here in Canada. As members of Parliament we should work together to eliminate poverty among our older generation.

Seniors built our country and bore the burden of development around the world. It is time for us to do what we can to help those who have helped us. Let us make 1992 a year of progress for our seniors.

CANADA POST

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the negotiations to reach a negotiated settlement for a new collective agreement between Canada Post and the Canadian Union of Postal Workers have entered the critical phase.

After 29 months of negotiations, several major points are still in dispute. If the bargaining process fails, the message from the members of the CUPW local in Val-d'Or on October 25 can be summed up like this: "The biggest problem facing postal employees is the employer's failure to comply with the terms of the collective agreement. That is why they call upon the Minister of Labour to include in this ad hoc legislation the obligation for Canada Post to comply to every term and condition of the collective agreement."

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, according to Employment and Immigration Canada, the vast majority of jobs by the end of this decade will require at least 12 to 15 years of education.

This year almost 4,000 eligible native students will be denied funding for post-secondary education by this government despite promises to the contrary. By 1995, in Ontario alone, only one out of every two qualified native students will be able to receive funding. Our native peoples have less education, one-half the national income and twice the unemployment rate of other Canadians.

The government's response to this has been to cut funding and tell us that it has been generous in the area of native education programs.

The money for these programs comes from the royalties off native lands. They are not asking for a free ride, just what they are entitled to.

We have just gone through the most severe native crisis in the history of our federation yet this government has learned nothing from it. If it was serious in dealing with native concerns, it would begin with a very simple premise; deliver on what was promised throughout the years.

I believe that education is a right and not a privilege, particularly for our natives. If we do not spend on education now, we will be funding welfare later.

SMALL BUSINESS

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, small business is the backbone of our economy. It represents 97 per cent of Canadian businesses, almost one-third of the private sector workforce, four out of five new jobs and annual sales of $316 billion.

If we are to encourage small business to grow and prosper we must recognize the ever-increasing paper burden and financial hardships placed on this sector.

Employees have governments and unions to protect their interests but who protects the employer? Small businesses are required to deal effectively with employee and employer deductions, to collect taxes and statistical information and to submit same within a strict time-frame.

Small businesses want to continue to be successful in the marketplace, but they cannot and will not remain competitive if this drain on their resources continues to increase.

NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are calling on New Democrats to clean up legislative and budgetary disasters created by Liberals, Socred and Conservative governments.

The Ontario Liberal deficit of $3 billion, the B.C. Socred deficit of $2.5 billion and the Conservative deficit in Saskatchewan of over $5 billion leaves New Democratic governments in these provinces with work to do in bringing in progress of people, not friends and insiders of Conservative administrations.

Canadians in Ontario, British Columbia, Saskatchewan and the Yukon will benefit from a era of open and honest government, the style of government they will soon have at the federal level.

TRIBUTE TO PAINTER ANDRÉ ROGER

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, today I would like to point out the merit of a Quebec artist who was recently in the news for holding five records in the famous Guinness Book of Records. An artist known and renowned around the world, André Roger, the world's fastest painter, has become the first man to achieve such a feat. This modest, earnest and determined fellow had indeed become a first class ambassador for our area as well as for all of Canada. I wanted to call attention to this impressive performance.

The talent and skill of André Roger are a never-ending source of fascination for crowds around the world and we are all very proud of him. For his contribution to the Mills area and the riding of Terrebonne, André Roger deserves respect and recognition from the people of Canada as well as from all the members of this House. Again, well done, Mr. Roger!

UNITED NATIONS

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, this past weekend in Vancouver the Liberal Party of Canada sponsored a most successful symposium on the role of Canada and the United Nations system in the 21st century.

This symposium, a non-partisan event, brought together national and international experts with Canadians from all walks of life to discuss the current status and future possibilities for the United Nations. Expressing commitment to a stronger UN role in an ever-increasing interdependent world, participants also spoke to the essential need for UN institutional reform.

Despite the availability for many years of expert opinion on issues such as UN leadership and the selection of the Secretary-General, it was noted that what we lack is the political will and commitment to UN reform by member countries in pursuit of global peace and security and the promotion of the necessary reform and strengthening of the United Nations.

The director of the United Nations Association in Canada has called upon other major political parties in Canada to duplicate the important initiative of the Liberal Party of Canada in sparking public and political debate on UN issues.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I would like to attack two economic myths today. The first is the argument that corporations, especially foreign corporations, are staying away from Ontario since the election of the New Democrats last year.

Investment Canada has just issued its 1991 report showing where foreign firms put their money. Over 55 per cent went into Ontario.

This report also shoots down another economic myth. The Conservatives say that for Canada as a whole there has been more foreign investment since the free trade deal, but this year foreign investment fell by $3.6 billion from the year before and investment in new businesses where extra jobs come from was less than a quarter of what it was in the year before.

Mr. Speaker: I want to bring to the attention of the House that the clock we are going by is the clock which I have here and it is 2.15 p.m. The other clocks can be ignored.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Welcome back.

In January the external affairs committee of the House passed a motion with the support of every Conservative member on that committee and I quote: "We recommend that the government and its negotiators keep Parliament and this committee regularly and fully informed about the current consultations and future negotiations of the North American free trade agreement".

This weekend the government completed phase one of the negotiations and Parliament has been told absolutely nothing of substance.

When will Parliament be fully informed about the substance of the negotiations as was agreed by an all-party committee?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, it is quite clear that Parliament has already been informed on many aspects of what is going on. Parliament knows for example that culture is not on the table. Parliament knows for example that the objectives of the Canadian government remain absolutely unchanged from what they were when we went into this.

I think Parliament knows exactly what we have to know at the moment.

• (1420)

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Prime Minister.

Last week, the Minister for International Trade gave Canadians the assurance that all three governments felt the talks should last as long as was necessary to achieve results that would benefit all parties. That is what the minister said before the parliamentary committee.

In Mexico, however, he told reporters that he wanted an agreement before April 1992, to avoid making it an election issue in Canada. What is the correct version: what he told reporters in Mexico or what he told Canadians before the parliamentary committee?

[English]

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, what the minister said in Mexico was that we expected to be able to make some significant progress between now and March. We might even have a kind of draft arrangement by that time.

Obviously you do not want to drag negotiations on any longer than necessary. That is exactly our position and will remain so.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, what the minister said in Mexico was that he wanted to avoid a political debate. Canadians have a right to know what is going on with respect to the auto pact, environment, Maquiladora zones, energy, rules of origin, national treatments, subsidies, health standards, dumping, human rights, intellectual property, textiles and dispute settlement.

What is going on and why are you keeping Canadians in the dark on this important issue?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member knows that she should not be referring personally to a minister.

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, no one wants to avoid a major political discussion of any North American free trade agreement.

What you want to ensure, however, is that you can get the discussion going properly so that when you have the upcoming American election in 1992 you can have this discussion without being clouded by an American election, not a Canadian election.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I want to follow up this issue with the Prime Minister.

I attended the external affairs committee hearings last Wednesday when the minister said: "Negotiations should take as long as required". There was no deadline at that time. Now the minister is singing a different tune in Mexico.

Why is the minister saying one thing at the negotiating table and telling another thing to Parliament?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, the minister is not saying one thing in Mexico and another thing here. He has been absolutely consistent throughout this whole thing.

Clearly you would like to have negotiations completed as soon as possible, but if it takes a longer time then that is exactly what has to happen.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, again my question is for the Prime Minister.

The standing committee report said that this Parliament and the Canadian people should be consulted. Why is the minister not consulting Canadians? Where are the studies? Where are the cost benefit studies? Don't the workers in Canada have a right to know how this deal will affect their lives?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, I think the member forgets that in this negotiation, as in other negotiations, the government has a wide variety of advisory committees on this issue. When there is something that we have agreed upon then that comes to Parliament. Of course it comes to Parliament.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

The Minister for International Trade said a North American free trade agreement could be concluded in March. All discussions have taken place behind closed doors. Canadians do not know what is going on. We do not know whether the government intends to consult the public or how it intends to ratify the agreement.

What do the Prime Minister and his government intend to do about consulting the public on this agreement and about ratifying the agreement?

[English]

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, what the minister said was that there was some hope you might have a draft agreement by some time in March. He has always said: "The sooner we can get some kind of a draft agreement the better off we will be". There is no intention whatsoever of attempting to have an agreement that is not ratified by Parliament.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, for the Prime Minister.

Millions of Canadians who have experienced the first-hand devastating effects of the Canada-U.S. trade deal want to know what this government's intentions are with the Mexican trade deal. Is it to take this bad deal and make it worse? They have a right to know as taxpayers, as Canadians, what this government's intentions are.

My question to the Prime Minister is this: Will he commit today that before any deal goes any further there will be a full consultation process with the public, with a committee that travels to all provinces and territories, so that this time Canadians will have a chance to comment on a deal before they are locked into it?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is quite wrong when she says: "so that this time Canadians will have a chance to comment on a deal before they are locked into it". The last time, Canadians had an opportunity in a democratic election to comment on the free trade agreement and they spoke in favour of the agreement.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The last time the House of Commons committee on the trade deal went to 10 cities in 10 days and Canadians did not have a full opportunity to comment. I want to say to the Prime Minister that this time he has a responsibility and the House has a responsibility to Canadians to let them know about this deal.

This weekend while trade ministers were meeting behind closed doors, with the doors wide open there was another group meeting in Mexico with representatives from the U.S., Mexico and Canada, talking about the need to have trade deals that are not just about the economy but that include issues around the environment, health and safety standards, and social rights for workers.

This government has that opportunity now. Will the Prime Minister who last week said he was concerned about human rights ensure in these international trade talks that there is an agreement around social rights, environmental rights and human rights in this trade deal?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, let me take the preamble of that question, because once again the hon. member is wrong.

There were in fact two committees of this House that went right across the country and heard arguments on the free trade agreement. There was a special committee and there was also the external affairs committee of the House.

The Canadian people had many opportunities to discuss this and of course as the Prime Minister said they also had an election. What more do you want?

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

In a recent speech in Chicago his Minister for International Trade speaking about Canada said: "No man, no woman, no child goes without—decent shelter or proper food".

Given the thousands and thousands of people who rely on food banks and shelters for the homeless on a daily basis in this country, will the Prime Minister withdraw this statement, or is he admitting that when it comes to knowing what is really going on all across this country he and his government are blind to the dismal reality caused by this government's policies?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend knows that the statement he has just quoted is out of context and was explained to be out of context by the Minister for International Trade to the hon. member on the floor of this House of Commons last week. This exchange took place last week, and the Minister for International Trade gave a full and complete explanation.

In part of his explanation the minister referred to tax reform which took some 850,000 low income Canadians including 250,000 seniors off the rolls completely; the GST tax credit, that in 1991 $2.4 billion will be paid out to 8.6 million low and middle income tax filers; that the child tax credit was increased by almost 50 per cent since 1986; and so on. This indicates the context in which the statement was made by the hon. minister.

I think when my friend examines the statement objectively he will come to the conclusion that as usual the Minister for International Trade spoke frankly and well on behalf of Canada.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister must have been so busy lobbying at the UN he did not notice that I did not ask the Minister for International Trade a question on this subject or any other subject last week. The Prime Minister seems to forget that there are still more than three million Canadians living below the poverty line in this country. Can he explain that?

I want to ask the Minister of Finance: today the Department of Finance reported that the deficit for the period from April to August is nearly double what it was in the same period last year, and the department said this was a result of "costs associated with the implementation of the GST and the impact of the recession on tax bases".

Will the Minister of Finance admit today that his projections on the deficit and the economy were wrong, and that this recession is turning out to be much worse than has already been expected? Will he admit that it is his government's policies that are causing these problems?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think one of the most important things that has developed today is that the Bank of Montreal announced its prime rate would be 8.5 per cent, the lowest in 14 years.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mazankowski: We said last February that if we followed the plan that we embarked upon in the budget of February 1991 it would lead to lower inflation and lower interest rates, and so it has begun.

In response to the other part of his question, I simply want to remind the hon. member that the number of low income Canadians declined by over a million since we have come into office.

The real average family income grew at a rate of over 2 per cent per year since we have come into office. Yes, the first half of this fiscal year has seen the deficit higher than normal. We expected that. We indicated that in the budget as a result of the transitional costs and the slowdown in the economy, but the transitional costs are behind us and the economy is starting to boom.

LABOUR

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Last week the Canadian Labour Congress declined participation in the government's prosperity plans process. Given that the Porter report commented that labour should be treated as a partner, not an adversary, why does the government not recognize the importance of labour's participation in the prosperity plan?

Will the Prime Minister outline an approach that he intends to follow to show that labour will be guaranteed a partner in this process?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, as you know, labour was invited to be part of the umbrella group and co-chair. Labour has said that it did not wish to take up one of those co-chair positions, but it will be involved in the process through the community consultations and through the sectoral consultations.

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. The minister is well aware of the need for co-operation. However, the labour movement is equally aware of the government's actions toward Canadian labour.

Given the government's treatment of workers in Canada with its own employees, the Public Service Alliance and now Canada Post, is there any wonder why labour is cautious of the government's initiatives? Will the minister show leadership, follow the advice of his own report and not proceed until labour is a full partner?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, there is no question that it is the government's responsibility to try to show leadership in this whole business of making Canada prosperous. That is exactly what we are trying to do.

Labour will be on side on this issue. After all, nobody in this House wants his or her standard of living diminished, nor does anyone in labour.

There is one way to do that, and that is to make the country competitive. That is exactly the kind of leadership role the Government of Canada is taking.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Communications.

Rumours continue to abound regarding further cuts to both programming and staff at the CBC, including the possible closure of TV stations in Ottawa and Winnipeg and the loss of up to 500 jobs.

The CBC president has projected a $50 million shortfall and the chairman has warned that by mid-October the CBC will have to begin implementing lay-off and closure strategies. I want to point out that it is now late October and I fear the other shoe is about to drop.

I ask the minister whether he will recognize that the time is up for further delays, that the CBC needs a firm commitment and it needs it now. Will he assure us that the government will not force the CBC to toss people out on the street like it did last year?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member refers to rumours. It would be helpful I think to all involved if he would not spread rumours himself by raising such questions on the floor of the House of Commons.

As I indicated previously in the House, the government is looking at the whole question of next year's budget for the CBC. Obviously it is an area of interest to us, as it is an area of interest not only to the employees and viewers of the CBC but to the private sector as well. When we have something to announce with regard to that we will be pleased to inform the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, the government has forced the CBC to rely more and more on commercial revenues, competing with the private broadcasters for what is an ever increasing piece of a shrinking pie.

I would like to ask the minister whether he is prepared to correct the mistakes of his predecessor. Will he commit himself to a mechanism of long-term and stable funding for the CBC so that it will be able in future years to fulfil the mandate that it has been given.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, we are looking at all aspects of the CBC's budget to try to ensure that it is well and properly financed and that it is able to discharge the mandate that was given to it by Parliament. In addition to that, in early December I will be convening a summit of broadcasters in Canada, the whole of the industry, to try to discuss how we ensure the survival as well of the private sector in Canada.

I expect as a result of the government's internal reviews and as a result of the summit we will be able to make substantial progress in both areas.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance and is about his high dollar policy. Our exporting resource sectors, oil and gas, farm products, forestry, coal, fish and so on are seeing their competitive position eroded around the world because of a high dollar policy, the higher the better dollar policy.

The minister has received representations from exporting sectors across the country including western Canada. Is he prepared to do something to bring the dollar down? Why does the minister in Japan, for example, sound like he wants an ever higher dollar?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we said in the budget that the key to economic recovery was to bring down interest rates and the key to bringing down interest rates was to reduce inflation, inflationary expectations and inflationary pressures. That is what we have addressed.

The result of it is that we now have a prime rate today of 8.5 per cent. Ten years ago under his party's administration we had a prime rate of 22.75 per cent. I know that businesses would rather have an 8.5 per cent prime rate than a 22.75 per cent prime rate.

I simply want to remind my hon. friend that the merchandise trade balance has risen by $8.1 billion at an annual rate to $13.5 billion in August. It means that Canadian companies are competitive. The merchandise trade balance is improving.

It is thanks as well to the free trade agreement where exports to the United States grew by $5.4 billion between 1989 and 1990. Those exports are still increasing, thanks to the free trade agreement.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, we are not talking about 10 years ago. The very companies that were supporting the government on free trade are saying that its high dollar policy is killing them and putting their employees out of work. In fact if we take the non-government regulated prices, inflation is now about .5 per cent this year.

My question is: Our interest rates are now about 1 per cent higher than the United States. Will the minister—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Kilgour: Is that funny?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will put his question.

Mr. Kilgour: Will the minister, if it isn't John Crow who is really the Minister of Finance, bring interest rates down faster, bring them lower so that the dollar can go down and we can get people back to work?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. member would like to forget about the bad old days when interest rates were 22.75 per cent. As I said, 8.5 per cent is a heck of a lot better than 22.75 per cent.

I will just go back one year. For ordinary Canadians who may have $50,000 mortgages, they are paying $150 per month less on their $50,000 mortgages this year than they did last year. That puts money in the pockets of ordinary Canadians. That will transform into more buying and a resurgence of the retail sector. It is all dependent upon the reduction of interest rates. That is our policy. That is our goal and it is producing results.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture.

Last Thursday over 7,500 farmers rallied in Regina to protest the cutbacks in the government support programs last year and the shortfall in income of $1.3 billion this year.

The minister knows that the announcement he made a couple of weeks ago is little more than 50 per cent of the identified shortfall for grain and oilseeds producers.

When is the government going to make the payments to farmers who have already waited a year for this support and assistance which should have been provided in 1990?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I noticed the hon. member is suggesting that the $800 million which was provided by the Government of Canada to an industry that is having a great deal of difficulty is not enough. He apparently does not appreciate it as much as the people who have been phoning and writing my office saying they understand how difficult it is for a government to come forward with assistance of that magnitude during difficult times. But we have done that. We will continue to support agriculture as we have in the past.

As the hon. member is fully aware, there will be over $3 billion in support payments going to agriculture, grains and oilseeds in Canada before the end of June 1992.

The hon. member has to recognize that $40 an acre is being given by the government to a very important industry because we recognize the hurt it is undergoing at this time.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Over 7,500 farmers in Regina last Thursday did not understand because they are going broke. Rallies have continued just the same since the minister's announcement as before, because they are not getting the cash. The amount provided a little over half of that required.

Will the minister bring in the legislation today so that these cheques can be sent out immediately and not wait until next spring. The cash is needed now. When will this minister and this government act?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, one of the hallmarks of this government and this Prime Minister has been to consult with farm leaders when asked to come to their assistance. We have done that.

The hon. member must recognize that I will receive a report from the third line of defence committee as to how they propose the assistance should be paid out, and how they propose it should be proportioned.

An hon. member: That was yesterday.

Mr. McKnight: No, I say to the hon. member for Regina, it was not yesterday. I look forward to receiving that report in the next two or three days. When we have received the report we will attempt to act upon it.

HEALTH

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, on May 21 I rose in this House and asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare if he would give an undertaking that research like that of Dr. Chan of Calgary on the safety of breast implants would be funded as soon as possible.

The minister responded that the department had received Dr. Chan's study in March but had not received a request for funding.

Dr. Chan has now asked for $130,000 to measure urine and blood levels of TDA in 1,000 Canadian women with Meme breast implants and has been told unofficially that he is being turned down.

Will the minister tell women now that he will fund that study?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will tell the member the answer. I do not see why I have to answer to women of Canada in terms of Dr. Chan.

I was not informed before Question Period that this request was turned down by the department. The member did not ask me that question before, but I will check with the department to see if a decision has been made. So far I have not been informed if it is official or unofficial. I will check and get back to the member soon.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I refer to a news clipping I saw in The Vancouver Sun two days ago. It was on the news this morning.

I would have thought that the minister would be aware that it is out in the news that there has been an unofficial turn down, as I mentioned.

Mr. Speaker, the media has reported that plastic surgeons of North America are spending $3.9 million to lobby because of the downturn in the implant business. They say they are the victims of bad press. Well, I would ask the minister if he would at least commit $130,000 to the victims of Même breast implants.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, there is no relationship between a campaign launched by the plastic surgeons and the fact that we accept or not giving the grant. I cannot ask any organization in the country not to launch a campaign of this kind if they believe it can help their cause. On the other hand, we will make a decision, or maybe a decision has already been made, on the merit of what is requested by Dr. Chan. It has nothing to do with a campaign by the plastic surgeons in Canada.

CANADA POST

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister responsible for Canada Post Corporation.

The collective agreements have been extended from the expiry date mentioned for each agreement in the Schedule until July 31, 1993, according to the bill to provide for the continuation of postal services tabled today by the Minister of Labour.

Could the minister give us the assurance today that the Canada Post Corporation will abide by every single clause of the collective agreement, since for several months, a number of managers with Canada Post in Ottawa and Quebec City have showen no respect for employees in the Abitibi region?

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, Canada Post, as does the union, must always respect the collective agreement. It is a legally binding contract and both sides are expected to enforce and respect it. I am sure that will continue to happen.

YUGOSLAVIA

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

As the minister knows, the situation in Croatia is deteriorating and hundreds of lives are being lost every day. This morning the Secretary-General of the United Nations issued a very alarming report that the UN arms embargo is now being largely violated or ignored by member states.

Will the minister take steps to have our UN ambassador, now that he is free of other duties, to ask for an immediate meeting of the Security Council to consider this report by the Secretary-General and to begin looking at what immediate actions can be taken by the United Nations to stop the bloodshed of innocent people in that region.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this country has really been very active in the United Nations and with other organizations through the European Community in trying to bring peace and stability to this extraordinarily troubled country with the tragic situation that is going on right now.

Ours was the first request to the Security Council. That is why the Security Council dealt with the issue in the first place.

Our ambassador to the United Nations has been active ever since, and will continue to be active in trying to move international action on this forward. Let me say that for Canada's part, we have done everything we can, including offering extra monitors to the peace process. We have been in touch with the European Community which is taking the lead on this. We are doing everything that we possibly can to try and bring some stability to this terrible problem.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): About three weeks ago the minister indicated that Canada was going to consult with its UN and European partners to determine further action, including a strict economic embargo.

Considering the continued bloodshed, I would suggest that three weeks is more than enough time to have urgent consultations. Will the minister indicate today if Canada is now prepared to publicly support the call for an economic embargo against Yugoslavia to stop the fighting, to stop the bloodshed, to stop the conflict.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have never ceased to be active on the Yugoslavian problem. We have never stopped. Since the last question was asked we have continued to be in touch with Europe. We have continued to be in touch with the United Nations.

There is some real concern in some quarters that an economic embargo will hurt the people it is intended to help. When you look at what is going on right now in Dubrovnik and in other areas of Croatia, an economic embargo is not going to stop that. What is going to stop it is when the Yugoslavian army stops attacking and surrounding and putting an embargo on places like Dubrovnik.

AIRPORTS

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

This weekend I met again with the Association of Limousine and Taxi Drivers servicing Pearson airport. Their livelihood during this economic recession particularly has reached the breaking point since this government not only issued more taxi and limousine permits but also increased the fee of their licences by over 500 per cent.

I ask the Minister of Transport why the government cannot be more sensitive to the industry by rolling back the increases to a more moderate level and eliminating the over 150 new licence permits since Terminal 3 is not generating new passengers and that the over-all traffic at Pearson from the government's own account will be down 5 per cent this year.

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to inform the member that he is about a month and a half late in his request. We did exactly that a month and a half ago.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, the minister is wrong—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Marchi: They did it on April 1 and I have been asking about it repeatedly. I will not apologize for continuing to stand up on behalf of Canadian workers who feel that these policies are doing them in.

I return to the minister and say to him that when government privately dealt with privatizing Terminal 3 it also erroneously gave away the cab and limo service concession to the private developers.

I ask the Minister of Transport, now that the government has had to buy back that clause for an estimated $5 million, why is this government forcing the limo and cab drivers to pay ridiculous increases to make up for this government's costly mistake?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to repeat for the benefit of the hon. member for York West that we had a meeting with representatives of limousine and taxi owners in August. We reached an agreement, and we even based further increases in licence fees on the rates in effect in Mississauga, which was agreeable to taxi owners, taxi drivers, the mayor of Mississauga and everyone in the Toronto area. It seems only the member from that area is not aware of the response we got.

FORESTRY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, on March 26 of this year the minister of forests stated to the standing committee on forestry that funds for a new Nova Scotia forest agreement had been identified and that he did not anticipate a delay in its signing. That was seven months ago.

Will the minister announce today that he will sign a new agreement with the province of Nova Scotia?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the minister's answer. We would like to know the day from the minister and, further, given that the province of Nova Scotia has had to carry on with funding to this date for the seven months that an agreement has not been signed, can the minister assure the House that the funds for the new agreement will incorporate those funds that the province has had to spend?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I can given this assurance but I would also like to point out to the member that in the case of Nova Scotia the agreement was negotiated in two phases. An interim agreement has been operational for the last two years and I will be able to sign the new agreement as soon as a date can be arranged.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs. Last week, there was a demonstration in front of the Terrasses de la Chaudière building in Hull, when Algonquins from Lac Barrière demanded $1 million to pay lawyers to sue the Government of Quebec and pursue their land claims in Quebec. The Government of Canada doesn't want to give more than $130,000. Could the Minister confirm that his department agreed to pay the Algonquins of Lac Barrière $130,000 to take the Government of Quebec to court on land claims?

[English]

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is ill informed on some of the aspects of this matter.

The Algonquin bands of western Quebec of which there are some nine have been seeking to have a land claim recognized for negotiation by the federal Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. We have committed to a small number of those bands close to $500,000 in the preparation of research on which the department would base a decision as to whether or not to negotiate the claim.

We believe that work is all but complete and, with the expenditure of another $130,000 to look into matters relating to current use of those lands, we believe we will be in a position to accept the land claim for negotiation soon.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, doesn't the minister realize that by contributing such large sums of money he becomes part of the current conspiracy against Quebec, and that the province certainly does not deserve to get this kind of treatment from the federal government?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the suggestion is incredible.

[English]

In fact the Government of Canada is committed to the negotiation and settlement of land claims in all parts of Canada where we can be persuaded that there is a legitimate claim.

AGRICULTURE

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, some farmers are very concerned about the results of the current GATT negotiations.

Yesterday I met with representatives of several supply management organizations, all of whom expressed their support for Canada's proposals for strengthening and clarifying article XI of GATT. They are concerned that Canada will be forced to abandon its firm stand on article XI in order to reach a compromise between all parties.

My question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Can the minister assure this House of his commitment to a strengthened and clarified article XI?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's question is appropriate because at this time there are unjustified fears.

The Government of Canada developed its position at GATT with the stakeholders, with the farmers and with the producers. That position is to maintain, to strengthen and to clarify article XI. That means that Canada, the government along with the producers, will maintain that position on supply management throughout the negotiations. We have stated that before.

I have stated that not only has Canada said we would maintain it. I have actively been promoting the position of clarification and strengthening of article XI wherever I have had the opportunity to meet members of GATT.

TEXTILE INDUSTRY

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, a week ago Dominion Textiles announced that it was shutting down its Hawkesbury Fiberworld plant laying off permanently another 86 workers, stating that it could no longer compete with U.S. plants because of the high dollar policy of this government.

Given that this is the second plant closure in two weeks for the same reason in my riding, how many more plants have to be closed and how many more people have to lose their jobs before this government understands the disaster that its high dollar policy is causing to my constituents and others?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member blames the ills of the textile industry in his riding on the value of the dollar. I would like to see that rationale.

Perhaps the hon. member may want to share some of the information with me because quite frankly, as has been pointed out on many occasions, you cannot devalue your way to prosperity in this country. One has to compete in the international marketplace, the global marketplace. Many industries in fact are doing just that.

I think the merchandise trade balance surplus which is growing is a clear indication that Canadian companies are indeed competing.

The hon. member should know that the value of the Canadian dollar over the last 40 years was 92.6 cents. Today the dollar is in the 88-cent range, considerably below the 92.6-cent average which was the prevailing average over the 40-year period.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, we are not talking about 40 years ago. We are talking about people who are losing their jobs today.

I would like to direct my supplementary to the Minister of State (Small Businesses). Eastern Ontario is being hard hit as a result of unemployment rates of up to 15 per cent in Hawkesbury, 16 per cent in Cornwall and similar rates in Pembroke and other parts of the region.

• (1500)

When will the minister announce a recovery program for Eastern Ontario which is suffering as a result of the policies of his government and his Minister of Finance, who refuse to listen?

[English]

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member and I have discussed this at length over the past few months. He knows that we are preparing a program which will address eastern Ontario in particular.

One thing that he should notice is that he has agreed with me in the past that what is needed is a more competitive environment in eastern Ontario. A lot of this has to do with training. A lot of this has to do with a more productive labour force, and that is part of the prosperity discussions and consultations that we are going to be beginning with shortly. I hope the hon. member will join in those discussions.

SPORT

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport.

This weekend in Victoria there was the national coaching seminar at which 151 coaches signed a petition expressing their deep concern with the removal of Abby Hoffman from her position and in particular the timing, which was four months before the winter Olympics and nine months before the summer Olympics. They are very concerned about the morale in the sports field leading up to these important international competitions.

Could the minister take this opportunity to assure them, athletes, trainers and the public in Canada that this government remains committed to high performance at the international level as a role model for Canadians, and as a bond for Canadian unity?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. colleague knows, I was in Victoria also over the weekend and unfortunately I was not given a copy of the petition.

On the other hand, I was informed about the concerns with respect to high performance sports, which I addressed very specifically in a speech I gave to Sports Forum II the night before I left for Victoria and at which my hon. friend was present. The Government of Canada is still committed to high performance sport.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, in terms of the question raised by the member for Mission—Coquitlam on Dr. Chan's funding, I just got the information that the department actually turned down the request by Dr. Chan. The reason was that study he would make would take about a year and a half to two years before having some conclusive answers. Already the American United States FDA has asked the company that makes the Meme implant to undertake immediately a very comprehensive and extensive study similar to that proposed by Dr. Chan and conclusions will be available long before the proposed one.

In light of what she asked me concerning women and their health, I think it will be better to wait for the answer from the Americans instead of having something which will come later in Canada. That is the reason why the proposal has been turned down by the department.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might respond to the minister's comments. I thank him for seeking the information and coming back to me on it.

While I appreciate that we are very reliant on the American Food and Drug Administration, it would seem to me that for a long time we have known that the Meme was a problem and we did not act until we waited for the FDA. I would ask that the minister reconsider and do something now for Canadian women.

REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions and I am sure you will find the necessary consent for the following motion:

> That the Order to refer Bill C-35 to legislative committee G be rescinded and that the same bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General.

[Translation]

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, unfortunately, I did not consult with my colleague, the House Leader of the Official Opposition. We would therefore like to wait a little, until we have consulted, to give our agreement.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I would not expect the Whip of the Official Opposition to take my word on it, but may I ask that we could agree conditionally to him just advising the Table or the Chair that those consultations have taken place, because they have.

[Translation]

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, the debate can continue and I will be back later after consulting my colleague.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): So I see that there is no unanimous consent for now. I therefore ask hon. members on both sides of the House to get together to move the situation forward.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by a large number of Canadians who are dissatisfied with this government's policies toward assisting farmers. My colleague, the very distinguished member for Algoma, brought to our attention today the fact that the government has only provided a little bit more than half of the assistance that was required for Canadian agriculture. My colleague is quite correct in what he is saying as he always is.

These Canadians agree with my colleague, the member for Algoma, that the revenue provided to farmers is most inadequate and they call upon this House to convince the government to provide more funding for agriculture.

JASPER PARK AIRSTRIP

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to table on behalf of the right hon. member for Yellowhead a petition concerning the Jasper airstrip. It has hundreds of signatures of people who are very concerned with the possible closing of the Jasper Park airstrip.

I would like to also add my personal support for keeping that particular airstrip open.

UNITEL

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and privilege to present a petition from residents mostly of Kamloops and Campbell River who urge Parliament to oppose Unitel's application to get into the telephone business primarily because of the severe impact it will have on areas outside of our major cities. It will negatively impact on the rural areas tremendously.

The petitioners are also asking that hearings be held in the communities concerning Unitel's application.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have a petition to present from a number of people in British Columbia who are concerned about the potential devastation of the phone system if Unitel's application is granted. They call upon the government and the minister to oppose the application, and to hold local hearings in areas that will be affected, particularly outside the urban core.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition from Ottawa, Gatineau and Gloucester concerning firearms. The petitioners declare that the accessibility of firearms is a key factor in homicides, accidents and suicides and that many types of weapons which are easily available in Canada are not needed for legitimate purposes like hunting and competitive shooting.

The petitioners ask Parliament to legislate now so that no one with a criminal record can own a firearm.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition today to present on behalf of a group of farmers from southwestern Ontario calling for the government to provide the same assistance that would have been provided this year if the GRIP and NISA programs had been in place.

• (1510)

The announcement by the government two weeks ago was only half of the amount that is needed, so they are petitioning and calling on the government and on Parliament to provide that assistance which is urgently needed by Canadian grain, oilseeds and horticulture producers.

UNITEL

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I have a number of petitions from people throughout British Columbia: Campbell River, Comox, Nanaimo, Cranbrook, Kimberley, Courtenay, Rossland, Trail, Castlegar and Kaleden, in total about 500 signatures.

These petitioners call upon the government, the Minister of Communications in particular, to oppose the bid placed before the CRTC regarding Unitel's application to carve off a piece of the long distance telecommunications market.

The people are very concerned about the effect that will have on telephone rates, particularly for those individuals in communities outside major metropolitan areas.

I would like to submit on their behalf these petitions today.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to table in the House today under Standing Order 36 a petition signed by a number of residents of primarily the interior of British Columbia who are expressing their concerns about changes in telecommunications policy in Canada.

The petitioners call for full consultation among all parties affected by any changes in the long distance and local service relationship, in particular rural areas.

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF BIRTH OF MARIE SKLODOWSKA CURIE

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present a petition on a commemorative stamp for the 125th anniversary of the birth of Marie Sklodowska Curie, for her scientific contribution to humanity.

The petitioners, residents of Canada, think that her discovery of radium, which is used throughout the world for therapeutic purposes, should be pointed out by Canada. They believe that Marie Sklodowska Curie, who twice won the Nobel Prize for her discovery of radium and was the first woman to earn a place in the history of science, should be recognized by Canada.

They ask Parliament to call upon Canada Post to pay tribute to Marie Sklodowska Curie by issuing a commemorative stamp for the 125th anniversary of her birth on November 7, 1992, which is also Canada's 125th anniversary.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall all questions stand?

POSTAL SERVICES CONTINUATION ACT, 1991

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Danis that Bill C-40, an act to provide for the continuation of postal services, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee H.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): At the suspension of the debate the hon. member for Essex-Kent had the floor. You have ten minutes left.

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, I was really trying to point out some of the inadequacies that have come along with regard to the government and Canada Post in dealing with a potential powder keg that they have had over a very long period of time.

Through the seven years this government has been in power we have seen a decline in the relationship of the employee and the employer situation at Canada Post and a decline in most of labour's problems as far as the government is concerned.

Where have these energies been placed? Obviously there has been some concern over the last while with regard to Canada Post and its approach to public relations. It seems to me that the greatest public relations goal that Canada Post could have carried out would have been to set something in place which would give its employees some confidence, some esteem, some good feelings about the corporation. It has not chosen to go in that direction. It clearly has chosen to take other action.

One of the actions that many people in my riding have been very upset about is removing the word "Canada" from Canada Post. We no longer have the word "Canada" there. I guess that is the course of privatization, but it also is the course of disassociation of this government from Canada Post. That is very unfortunate because this government is still responsible for that service.

As my colleagues have stated many, many times, the removal of the word "Canada" from Canada Post is a removal of a symbol that all Canadians did cherish and it is something that should not have happened.

We have seen it pursuing sponsorships like a SkyDome box. We have seen it sending out advertising in areas of the arts and car racing, rather than getting down to the nitty-gritty and dealing with its employees in some positive fashion.

While it is advertising and renting boxes at the SkyDome, it is receiving over 100,000 complaints about what is happening within the corporation.

I received several copies of video promotions which were sent to the employees about how great the Canada Post Corporation was. Those video reports came back to me, telling me what negative action Canada Post and this government were taking with regard to dealing with the employees.

As a matter of fact the promotions were causing exactly the opposite, negative reactions from its employees. The result is that many of the things it is doing, bragging about the profits, its advertising, renting boxes at the SkyDome, are causing the employees to ask: "Why does it not treat us relatively fairly. Why does it not sit down and negotiate a contract that would be reasonable for us?" Canada Post has stepped aside. Over the last two years while the employees have been working without a contract, the government has totally avoided pursuing this issue and getting things straightened out.

What has happened as far as the service area is concerned? If we really believe that service to Canadians is the priority of Canada Post, why have we seen 1,000 post office closures in the last couple of years? Why have we seen door to door delivery stopped and supermail-boxes put in their place? Why are seniors, who at one time received mail at their homes, now travelling somewhere else to pick up their daily deliveries? Certainly, that creates a tremendous hardship and at the same time it created a great deal of tension between management and the employees.

Two levels of service to Canadians is a hallmark of this government's approach to Canada Post.

If the bottom line really were service, then it would not have taken the approach it has over the last seven years. It certainly would have looked at the situation of its workers and handled it much differently.

Watching seniors line up this summer highlighted in my mind the attitudes of Canada Post and this government toward the workers they employ.

I was questioned about the long lines seniors experienced and the difficulties they had in collecting cheques. In the 100 degree temperatures, many people were unable to stand in line over long periods of time and it was very distressing to these individuals.

• (1520)

I phoned Canada Post and talked to the executives there and suggested that CUPW had recommended that they would take those cheques, deliver them to seniors and make sure the system operated properly. The answer that I got back from Canada Post showed the difficulty that exists. Management in Canada Post suggested that the workers could not be trusted to deliver the cheques and therefore they were not taking action at that time.

The next day, Liberals in our caucus got together and discussed the issue and demanded that the government accept the suggestion of Canada Post and that the minister pursue what CUPW had suggested.

We then sent a letter to the minister and had a press conference in order to bring this item out to the public. The result was that the minister did act and accepted CUPW's request. I will commend him for that, but the minister should have been involved with that much sooner rather than sitting back.

At the same time, we made a recommendation to the minister that, instead of allowing this process to deteriorate as it had, he to appoint a mediator and make certain that the hearings on both sides were handled reasonably well.

The minister at that point again responded to Liberal recommendations. He came out that evening suggesting that he would appoint a mediator. It was two days later that he appointed Alan Gold as the mediator in the dispute. But I want you to realize that the Liberal Party is not just sitting back criticizing. We have made very positive recommendations as to how this minister and this government can move along with the process rather than totally sitting back, ignoring the situation and allowing it to deteriorate.

I believe that the mediation that has gone forward with Mr. Gold, CUPW and Canada Post is very positive. I understand that a little earlier today, CUPW gave Canada Post notice that it may possibly go out on strike as early as tomorrow. That creates another disastrous situation.

But the government seems to move step after step after step to add to the turmoil, the tension and the real causes rather than try to resolve issues and create a better climate for all to work under.

It is the government's responsibility to look at the causes of tension, to look at the difficulties and not just bluntly say: "Take it or leave it, this is the way it is". I believe that is why this government over seven years has developed such difficulties with all of its workers and not just CUPW workers. If we look at all of the workers who serve this government and labour across this country, it is very, very downtrodden. Jobs have been lost, anger raised and there has been almost a rebellion in the land. What is causing it? I believe it is this government's inaction to deal properly and fairly with the work force of this country.

It is important that this government take that on.

I will reiterate again that no one in this country, in the Liberal Party, in the Conservative Party or the NDP Party wants to see a strike or the disruption of the vital service Canada Post offers. It is the responsibility of this government to make certain that the tensions and problems that have generated over the last seven years are dealt with and dealt with adequately and properly.

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and to Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to take part in this debate, but I will not have time to make a speech and give my opinion on the subject. I listened carefully to my hon. colleague, who only talked about the SkyDome suite, which seems to bother him a lot.

He also talked about labour-management relations. He mentioned as well that the company did a lot of advertising. Mr. Speaker, it is good for a company to have a sense of social responsibility, and I think that Canada Post, in my riding and in several others, has even financed advertising on figure skating for a few hundred dollars. It was not much, but I think it is all right.

When the hon. member talks about—

[English]

—labour relations and the turmoil.

I have been following this issue since my business people did not receive their cheques the last time. They were all calling me and they saying: "What is going on with Canada Post? For 20 years there has always been a problem".

At Canada Post in the past 20 years the president has changed many, many times. The problem we have with the union president is that I do not think it has changed in the last 20 years. At the end of every contract we have a strike or violence. I remember that. In 1984 when we took office the corporation was losing $400 million. Today it has a profit of $200 million. It is normal it invests in publicity or whatever it wants. I do not think it is bad.

I must ask my hon. colleague to answer these questions if he can and to take some notes. Does he really believe, if there is a strike tomorrow at noon, that all the cheques will be delivered to enterprises which create jobs in this country and try to make a buck? It has become a crime to make a profit in this country. Does he really believe that these people will get mail service because he defends so well the poor people and the poor union? What about enterprises that are suffering and old people who need their cheques? Does he really believe that the cheques will be delivered if there is a strike tomorrow at noon, as the union has requested?

Mr. Pickard: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for the question. It certainly opens up several issues that I believed I addressed. However, I will bring it back to that point.

As far as union leadership and leadership of Canada Post are concerned, I must point out that the president of Canada Post has been there for 10 years, and I thought the hon member would know that. There has not been a change. Don Lander has been there. He was there leading Canada Post. The hon. member can check the date he was hired. It is very clear what the situation was.

The hon. member pointed out that Canada Post is a profit making corporation. What a total joke. They said they made $196 million two years go. They made $96 million last year and $14 million this year. Those were their statements of profit.

Let me point out that they received $690 million worth of grants. They did not pay their employees. They have not been paid increases because a contract was not negotiated. They are two years behind on which they have to pay retroactive salaries. When the hon. member talks about a profit making corporation he is not talking about all the facts. He is only talking about a ton of propaganda, not truths.

When it comes to the delivery of cheques to businesses, when it comes to the delivery of cheques to seniors, this party intervened with his government, intervened with Canada Post and demanded that those cheques be delivered. CUPW made an offer to deliver them. Canada Post said: "No, we don't trust them".

I then requested the minister to make sure they were delivered and they were delivered two days later. It is the intervention of the Liberal Party that made that difference and I think the hon. member should clearly know that. The hon. member can ask his own minister if he does not believe that.

As far as the mediation goes to come to a solution, it was again the recommendation of the Liberal Party that came about with the suggestion of mediation and the process that was put in place.

When you stand up and say you are representing business, Canada Post has no right to buy a SkyDome box. Canada Post has no right to spend that kind of money. It is not in the best interests of Canadians. It is in the best interests of a few corporate owners. I would say to you that we have received strong criticisms of those policies and you should listen to what we are saying because it is important to Canadians.

[Translation]

Mr. Della Noce: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has got it wrong. I would just like to set the record straight. He was talking about profits of $196,000.

An hon. member: Million!

Mr. Della Noce: But I think he meant $196 million. That is not quite the same thing, but the Liberals have trouble distinguishing thousands and millions of dollars. I think he meant $196 million.

[English]

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend my colleague from Essex—Kent on his intervention as the postal critic for the Liberal Party. He has had a lot to do with the whole issue and the evolving process that we have been going through in the last two months.

I wonder if my hon. friend would tell us what his sense of the back-to-work legislation is, what issues it may solve and what issues it may not solve. There is a sense out there, and in many cases it is the spin that members of Parliament and the government side put on a particular issue, that once we have dealt with this as back-to-work legislation or, as I would like to call it the essential services legislation, somewhere down the line this whole process is going to have to be revisited.

I wonder if the hon. member would like to comment on that particular scenario which seems to be on peoples' minds.

Mr. Pickard: I would like to thank my colleague from Kenora—Rainy River for his question.

I was first going to answer my colleague across the way, but I note that he did not stay to hear an answer. His question could not have been so pertinent or important. I find that quite Tory-minded.

My colleague from Kenora—Rainy River has pointed out that when we come to legislating people back to work, there are ramifications of that process. Certainly when we stop and think about ramifications, we are taking a movement upon a group of people and I guess you have to weigh these things: do they feel in the end that they were treated fairly? Do they feel in the end that they were winners? Do they feel in the end that they can live with what comes down? I cannot make that judgment.

It would seem to me that when going through a process for two years, attempting to resolve problems to which they did not get a proper resolution, when they walk away and are legislated back to work, they feel animosity toward that legislation. They feel anger that they have not been heard and dealt with in a fair, open, free way.

That is why we have the collective bargaining process in place and that is why we use the collective bargaining process. I am not in any way saying that anyone wants to see a strike. However, what we do wish to see and what I recommended to the minister as late as Thursday of last week was that as long as the parties are sitting at the table negotiating, let them work out their differences. Let them work out the problem, let us not interfere and cause added problems to it. Let us not interfere so that some groups feel they are losers.

I think interference is not the best at this time. It could have been much more appropriate when negotiations stopped.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity this afternoon to speak to Bill C-40, whose purpose is to force Canadian postal workers back to work.

[English]

How did we get into this mess? The government across the way of course will say it is the fault of Jean-Claude Parrot or of anybody else who happens to disagree with the government. That is the standard Tory line.

It is not that simple. First of all let us remember that in 1986 the government across the way approved the corporate plan of Canada Post. So Canada Post's approach to management, the broad concept that it is aiming at right now has been approved by this government. No one forced the minister to approve that corporate plan. I did not see Jean-Claude Parrot successfully twisting the arm of the minister in order to have the corporate plan changed, nor was the opposition able to convince the government to do otherwise.

As far as I remember the only person who managed to get a small element of the corporate plan changed was a lone backbencher on the government side. In 1986 he started a caucus revolt on the issue of the threat by Canada Post whereby rural mail would be eliminated except for main county roads. All the boxes would have to be repatriated along those main roads and there would be no delivery in rural areas.

That was changed by the late member, Dan McKenzie, who led a group of Tory backbenchers to raise a kerfuffle in the Tory caucus.

Apart from that the corporate plan that Canada Post presented to the government was approved lock, stock, and barrel. That includes the shut-down of post offices in urban areas. That includes the closure of all 5,221 rural post offices in Canada. That is all part of that plan. We on this side of the House did not invent that.

The postmasters and the assistants' association did not invent that.

[Translation]

And neither did Jean-Claude Parrot, nor his union, nor the Letter Carriers Union which already existed at the time. Mr. Speaker, the government must admit it was responsible for this plan. It was the government that gave Canada Post these guidelines. And of course, lest we forget, there is a minister responsible for the Canada Post Corporation. I repeat: responsible.

[English]

The government says: "Look how smart we are. Canada Post generates profit". All right. Let us say there is the odd Canadian who still believes that this government is smart. An unlikely proposition given the popularity of the government across the way. Nevertheless, there could be the odd Canadian—there is the odd Canadian who believes that Elvis Presley is still alive, so nothing is impossible— who still believes that the Tories are smart.

Let me tell those misguided few, whatever number there may be, that this is how it works. The 1989-90 annual report of Canada Post is a good example. The member who is heckling across the way, the member for Laval East, said a while ago: "Isn't it Canada Post which gave us $149 million in corporate profits, therefore aren't we great?"

Mr. Della Noce: I didn't say that.

Mr. Boudria: All right, okay. Let us look at it this way. Of that $149 million profit, $118 million was generated by the sale of assets. This is about the same as if we sold the Speaker's chair and declared that the House of Commons had made a profit. Could you imagine that, Mr. Speaker? How preposterous that proposition is. That is not profit in the sense that most of us know it.

Of course it shows up in the books as having generated extra revenue for Canada Post but you would have a hard time replicating that. That is why, of course, profits have gone down in subsequent years as you are disposing of the assets, selling off the furniture to pay the rent.

Mr. Della Noce: We don't need assets, we need service.

Mr. Boudria: Let us look at what they have done to labour relations. My distinguished colleague from Essex—Kent has pointed out very astutely—he is always very astute, of course—that Canada Post has profit, any profit, simply because it is two years behind in paying increases to its employees. Small wonder. If I owed you or anyone else money, and I did not pay it, that is money that I would have more than had I paid my debts. That is the situation that they are in as well and it is something that people forget to say. Of course, it is Tories who usually forget to say that.

• (1540)

Let's talk about labour relations at Canada Post. We have heard all the horror stories in that regard. You will remember the Liberal task force on labour relations at Canada Post.

My colleagues from Essex—Kent, Kenora—Rainy River, Mississauga, a number of others and I went to various regions of this country. We talked to ordinary Canadians and postal workers as well about the labour relations of Canada Post.

We heard of everything from threats to sexual harassment to everything else going on inside that corporation against employees of the corporation by people in authority. It was just terrible. It was a horror story, the kind of which the United Nations deals with.

Let me give you a fine example of how Canada Post treats people. I brought this letter to the attention of the public before. It is dated December 1986 and it is a letter sent to an employee of Canada Post in the Vancouver mail processing plant.

I will say the name of the employee simply because the postal union has made this name public in the past. The letter is addressed to one L. Chu. Listen to this, Mr. Speaker.

The letter talks about this employee who is a real bad person according to management because he has a terrible attendance record. Listen to the facts. It says as follows: "For your information, in December of 1985, you booked off sick on one occasion for a total of one day. One reason that you missed this much work may be that you have overworked yourself.

In December of 1985, you worked 11 hours of overtime. Perhaps this year you should limit the amount of overtime that you work so that your health is not adversely affected".

The letter goes on like that with this kind of nonsense as if an employee who misses one day a month should be reprimanded. An employee who does 11 hours of overtime in a month is about the same as Parliament sitting an extra five minutes.

It is normal but this is the way they treat people. This is the way they treat people inside that corporation. I have cases and cases of such instances in a binder that I have here. I have literally three inches thick of horror stories and that does not even count the backlog of 110,000 grievances that we have right now before the corporation.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I realize that some members across the way will say not all the complaints and grievances of the postal workers are well founded. That may be true. But 110,000 can't be all wrong! A substantial number of those cases are certainly true, are certainly genuine, and Mr. Speaker, they certainly have complaints and grievances that deserve to get a hearing.

[English]

Let me give a few instances. Last Friday I raised the case in this House of one Huguette Perrier of Dalkeith, Ontario, in my riding.

Mrs. Perrier was delivering the mail under a rural contract. She picks up the mail at the post office, sorts it out and delivers it on the concession. This person is 65 years old and a widow. She had been doing the job nine years, since her husband died. Her husband was doing it before that for 15 years.

Between the husband and wife, they had been delivering the mail on that rural route for 24 years. Do you know what they did this year? They put out the job for tender and she lost it because of $1,500.

Meanwhile, the government opposite gave the president of the Canada Post Corporation a salary increase of $131,250! That is not his salary, just a salary increase, Mr. Speaker, adding up to a grand total of $370,000, if I remember correctly.

[English]

I have another case. Unfortunately, I cannot name this next individual because I don't have her permission. But I have a person who works in a post office in my riding, a woman again, who phoned me. Most of them are women by the way, 83 per cent of the people who work in rural post offices in Canada are women and the government should remember that. It seldom does. This woman works in a post office and has worked there for some time. She was sick and needed surgery. She had an operation and obtained a medical certificate prior to leaving. When she came back she received a letter from her superior cancelling her sick leave retroactively from the date it was awarded and deducting from her pay cheque a reimbursement of the sick leave that she took.

I intervened on her behalf and had the nonsense cancelled. Of course they ceased to collect money from her and they gave her back that which they had already collected.

That is the way people are treated in that corporation. When these cases were happening in my constituency, I got wind of a manager at Canada Post who had seemingly nothing to do. This person was phoning post offices in my riding and asking postmasters to remove the picture of the Queen from the post office. That happened in Hawkesbury, L'Orignal and Vankleek Hill. Who asked for this? No one that we could ever determine. It was simply someone in management at the post office who had nothing better to do than to concoct a scheme for himself or herself to have the Queen's picture removed from post offices. Now what on earth is that supposed to accomplish?

When I protested about this to the officials of Canada Post, I told them that the day we decide to change the head of state of our country, it sure won't be a flunkey inside the postal system who will make that decision. It won't be a post office manager, it will be the Parliament of Canada after consultation with the people of Canada and no one else. But why did that particular manager make that decision? I never got an answer from Canada Post. The Queen's picture is back in the post offices finally. In one case it took about four months to put back the frame that took 30 seconds to take off, but they finally did it.

Why don't they just deliver the mail? Does that sound so hard?

In rural Canada, Canada Post got into this binge of shutting down rural post offices. Now here is how it went about doing it: It decided to shut down rural post offices if and when the postmaster died or retired. Now, in Canada Post jargon that is referred to as the "natural opportunity criteria". Here is how it works:

If a postmaster dies, that is natural and therefore there is a natural opportunity created, so you shut down the post office. That is how the natural opportunity criteria works. If the postmaster retires, he or she has aged and reached the age of retirement, ageing is also natural therefore the natural opportunity criteria has been met again. So that is how that works too.

So you shut down the post office and you franchise it out. There is no more post office and the mail is sorted 15, 20, 30 miles away. It is brought in weather permitting, and then of course people go and get it outside in supermailboxes that freeze in winter. That is known as improved service.

The way the criteria for this improved service works is the following:

[Translation]

Whether the post office in question made a profit or a loss was not a factor. There probably are examples where a rural post office makes a substantial profit, but Canada Post is not interested in such mundane matters. It is interested in closing a post office if it feels like it or if it seems like a good time to do it, without always considering there may be some very good reasons for keeping the post office open. No, it closes them regardless, to the extent that we have lost about 2,000 post offices in rural areas in Canada, if I am not mistaken.

• (1550)

Some time ago we appointed in this country a Postal Services Review Committee. This Postal Services Review Committee was appointed by the government and led by Mr. Alan Marchment. This committee was to make recommendations on future postal increases, the quality of management and all kinds of things at Canada Post.

Guess what happened to this postal review committee? The committee was supposed to have been transformed into a board. There was legislation presented in this House. It died on the Order Paper. The government never proceeded with the legislation and never reintroduced it. This postal review committee and the future postal review board was to be the watchdog of the post office, a form of CRTC of the post office, if I can call it that. It died on the Order Paper.

Not only that but when the Postal Service Review Committee brought forward its report, the government read the report, did not like the contents and fired the committee because it did not like what it heard.

[Translation]

This is what the Review Committee on Canada Post recommended in its first and last report, after which it was disbanded by the government opposite. Some of its recommendations were:

That Canada Post examine the possibility of extending home mail delivery in urban areas.

Second, that Canada Post review its program for closing rural post offices.

Third, prevent deregulation of the majority of services offered by Canada Post.

These recommendations were made by the Review Committee on Canada Post. I myself appeared before the committee to discuss these three points and a number of other points, and I did so on behalf of my colleagues in the Liberal party who told me those were the kind of recommendations we needed. The Marchment Committee obviously agreed, since the committee adopted them. However, the committee was then disbanded thanks to the Minister responsible for the Canada Post Corporation, who is sitting right across from me, Mr. Speaker. I can see him quite plainly, the Minister responsible for the Canada Post Corporation!

[English]

The question today is not whether we support the government. The question is: Do we need a postal service in this country? Any support for this bill should not by anyone be mistaken as supporting the Tories, the government or even the Prime Minister, most of all the minister responsible for Canada Post.

In conclusion, I say to the government across the way that when there are problems at Canada Post a mea culpa is needed on its part. It has created the mess we are in now.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great care to my hon. friend. I concede his depth of knowledge in postal matters. I learned a fair amount just by listening to him, as I can do from time to time.

I want to ask him a series of fairly straightforward questions. He began by speculating on fault as to the current dispute and the legislation the dispute has led us to. I understood him to say that Mr. Parrot was not at fault. I surmised from his subsequent remarks that he felt that the 1986 corporate plan was at fault. If it was, I would like to know specifically in what respect.

Second, I would appreciate knowing from the hon. member whether he embraces a particular position in the dispute. Does he embrace without reservation the position of the postal union?

Third, what would the Canada Post deficit be today if the corporate plan had not been invoked and if we had proceeded along the merry path the previous administration had set us upon?

Fourth, does the hon. member regard the Canada Post Corporation as an essential service? Does he think its employees ought to have the right to strike?

I do not want to be misunderstood on this because I do not believe there have been many cases of law breaking or even suggestions that there has been law breaking on the picket lines, but there were suggestions during the previous strike, the strike by Public Service Alliance of Canada members, and so I ask it in the broadest sense, when strikers are seen or are believed to have broken the law is it the role of the police to keep the peace or to apprehend or arrest suspected law breakers?

Finally, I heard a very tantalizing observation by the hon. member at the conclusion of his speech when he seemed to suggest that he might be going to vote for this bill, and I would like to ask him whether that is what he meant.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, if I can start with the last remark, I never meant to tantalize my colleague across the way.

If I can get back to the first point that was raised, the member said I speculated on the fault. I do not have to speculate. The corporate plan of Canada Post has leaked from the day it got into the cabinet room. It leaked so much it was as bad as the Minister of Finance's budget. It was all over the place and we all knew what it contained. So there was no necessity to speculate.

I was asked that if the corporate plan was a mess, to give an example of that mess. I will be glad to do so. Let me repeat something that is very tangible with the people of Canada. Before I even do that, let me remind the member that it was his own colleague from Winnipeg, the late Dan McKenzie, who organized the party of Conservative backbenchers to do, shall I say, a raising of the feathers in the caucus room—I cannot use other words in this illustrious Chamber—in order to get that policy changed. That particular one was changed because it was so bad. They could not get the others changed such as the closure of all 5,221 rural post offices that were there in 1986. That is a disastrous example.

I have illustrated the plan to remove rural mail delivery save on county and regional roads. That is another example. That one was changed. There was the plan for the supermailboxes that do not open but freeze up in winter. Ask anyone who owns a supermailbox that will not open and freezes up in winter how great those contraptions are.

Many Canadians will say that was not such a hot idea.

I was also asked by the member across the way what the profit would be if that corporate plan had not been adopted. I do not know what other corporate plans were submitted to the government but if that is the best corporate plan it could come up with, it should have sent the officials back to the drawing board and made new drafts in order to make one that was more acceptable.

On the issue of the right to strike and should it remain and so on, Tories are always poking away at that one, that is their right-wing agenda coming back.

Let me tell the member across the way that if that right is ever removed, it should be negotiated. When they enter into negotiations with the union as well, they can negotiate with it and see if they can find something better. Meanwhile, those threats of removing the right to strike in the middle of the labour dispute by Conservatives do not do any good.

Finally, I was asked how policemen should do their work. Perhaps the member knows that this is not the provincial legislature.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Further questions or comments? The hon. member for Laval-Est.

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and to Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, before addressing what was said by the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, I would like to set the record straight, because the Liberals have a terrible habit of getting figures all mixed up. First of all, the president has not been with Canada Post for 11 years. Mr. Speaker, these remarks are not directed to the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell but to the hon. member who spoke before. There were two presidents: Michael Warren, from 1981 to 1985, and Donald Lander, from 1985 until now. The hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell says he knows that. Too bad he did not say so before. I had to go and look it up.

• (1600)

Before, in 1981, Canada Post was administered by ministers and public servants—by bureaucrats. There were plenty of those! However there was also an annual deficit that varied from $400 to $600 million. Taxpayers are aware of this, and they don't want any part of it. I would prefer a profit of $200 million and getting my mail.

The hon. member said earlier:

[English]

"We sold the assets, that is why you made money." The important thing in this world is to get the mail delivered before two or three weeks, to get the mail like it is today, in two or three days. We have the best service in the world now. Canada Post is one of the best services in the world. That is what the business people want in my area.

If my friend is looking for more names, the hon. member from the Montreal area was a postmaster general in the days when the mail was not delivered very much. We did not do a lot when it was freezing in the winter time, I admit that, but we had a $600 million deficit because it was administered by the bureaucrats and the minister.

What I would like to know from my hon. colleague is what is important, the colour of the trucks or delivery of the mail? It is to get the mail through in a few days, as soon as possible, so businesses can get their mail, the senior people can get their cheques and all this.

[Translation]

I also wanted to tell the hon. member that if things are that bad, if this government is as bad as all that, how come Canada Post is one the best postal services in the world today? How come our businesses are satisfied? In 1984, when I was elected—and I am about to conclude my remarks—we saw trucks run by all kinds of companies, like Purolator, but not by Canada Post. Today, we hardly see any. At the time, Canada Post was losing contracts to private businesses, but today, it is a private business.

I have nothing but praise for Mr. Lander, the new president.

[English]

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, this was real good. It depends on what you think real good is.

I was glad that the member mentioned the colour of the trucks because I had almost forgotten about the millions that were spent by Canada Post to make a new logo. Instead of delivering the mail it had to design a logo that is shaped like a wing.

Some people were too busy flying off the handle with this new logo. Do you know what it did? It removed from the logo the flag of Canada and any identification of Canada and replaced it with a wing. Where it said Canada Post La Societé canadienne des postes it now says Mail Post. It has removed the word Canada and removed the Canadian flag from a national institution. That was the best it could do at that time and I am glad the member reminded me of that. I had almost forgotten about yet another obscenity on the part of Canada Post.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before resuming debate, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Halifax—Port of Halifax; the hon. member for Timmins—Chapleau—Mining; the hon. member for Comox—Alberni–Land Claims; the hon. member for Winnipeg North—Health; the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception—Fisheries.

Resuming debate.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I would like to first comment on the last comment of the member from Laval East because he made reference in his questions to the previous speaker about delivery of the mail being the most important thing with Canada Post.

I would just like to refer him to an article in the Globe and Mail recently that said "Canada Post, Canada's largest Crown corporation, should be a dream operation. It has no competitors on its most lucrative product, first–class mail, renamed letter mail a couple of years ago when it was decided first class could no longer accurately describe the service. The price of a stamp is raised through an Order in Council, a cabinet decree that by–passes public scrutiny, and the government requires that private couriers charge three times as much as Canada Post to deliver a letter within the country".

Is this the same government that is now standing in this House and speaking in great glowing terms of how it believes that Canada Post is operating as a private corporation? Let us at least stay close to the truth when we are discussing Canada Post in terms of what Canada Post is.

I rise feeling again saddened in this House. This is the ninth piece of back–to–work legislation that we have seen from the government since the Conservatives have been in power. It is the fourth piece in the past year. It is the fourth while the current Minister of Labour has been in his position.

Parliament is becoming a labour court. Collective bargaining in the public sector has been reduced to being dependent on back–to–work legislation, not on collective bargaining. It is symptomatic that there are problems with how government and Crown corporations operate when dealing with their workers.

It is the policies of this government with regard to Canada Post that have precipitated this dispute. The zeal for privatization has meant a reduced level of service, a worsening of labour–management relations and closures of both rural and urban post offices.

We have heard hon. members from the other side of the House standing up and saying: "We must order these workers back to work". Let there me no mistake, CUPW did not issue its 24–hour notice until after the Minister of Labour rose in this House and introduced legislation for continuation of service in Canada Post.

We are not talking here at this moment of back–to–work legislation, we are talking about pre–emptive legislation that puts into place before a labour dispute, before a walk–out, legislation that requires those workers to stay on the job. It seems more to me to be about the removal of the right to strike than back–to–work legislation.

Closures of rural post offices and of urban post offices have meant a loss of 14,000 full time jobs. Those were well paying jobs and only a fraction of those closures from which private postal outlets were created have gone to unionized workers making a decent salary. Most of them have gone to corner groceries and convenience stores, drug stores and those workers are low–paid and often have very few if any fringe benefits.

We have had hon. members get up on the other side of the House and talk about overpaid postal workers. I would reiterate there is nothing in this country that should make one worker ashamed of drawing a decent salary for a decent day's pay. Of the people I have been in contact with at Canada Post, I do not know anyone who does not deliver a good day's work for a good day's pay.

Canada Post is firing workers at three times the rate of the federal Public Service and of most private sector work places. Privatization is firmly rooted in this government's strategy of fulfilling the wish of corporate Canada. In fact the BCNI and the Fraser Institute have been referred to by the other side of the House in setting the agenda for Canada Post with little if any consideration for the needs of Canadian people, and certainly for the needs of those who work for Canada Post.

Privatization there is no doubt, because of where Canada postal stations are being opened, is hurting women workers the most. In fact the trend that is being accelerated of last hired first fired is leaving women unemployed from Canada Post in ever increasing numbers. In rural post offices 82 per cent of the workers who worked for Canada Post are or were women. I want to talk a bit about Canada Post as it is reflected in my area of Canada. My riding of Mission—Coquitlam is what one would call a suburban-urban-rural riding. Some people commute regularly. Some people work in the soft fruit industry and farming. Other people in fact work in communities in my riding and actually work in the area in the forest industry and fishing.

For the commuter the closure of post offices has become a nightmare. For the elderly and disabled in my riding the supermailboxes—and I use that term with a somewhat puzzled look on my face—are a horror and a nightmare. To ask elderly people in communities like mine in Canada where there is limited transportation and where there are limits in terms of streetlighting to go to supermailboxes and pick up their mail is just beyond comprehension. Then they are told they are getting improved service and it is a supermailbox.

The hon. member who spoke just before me talked about freezing locks. We do not get quite as much cold weather on the west coast of British Columbia as some parts of Canada, but we too have problems with freezing mailboxes. We also have problems because of the amount of precipitation and rain we have with rusted mailboxes, where the locks cannot be opened because they have rusted shut. I do not think that that could be called super service.

Another thing we are faced with is terrible messes on the ground of soggy flyers, et cetera, that people leave behind which have to be waded through, not to mention people who walk their dogs to get their mail and whose dogs do one thing while they are getting their mail and others are left to walk through it.

Supermailboxes are not a lot of fun, and for Canada Post to continually tell us that through this we are getting improved service is rather insulting.

In addition, you get a card to pick up a parcel in my riding. On a number of occasions I have received a card myself and have gone to the location where it says I should go to pick up my parcel, only to discover that those people got fed up and do not have the franchise for Canada Post any more and I have to go somewhere else but they are not sure where. I have to go to the post office to find out where I have to go to pick up my parcel. That is a regular routine happening in Mission—Coquitlam and I am sure it is not unique to that particular riding.

Last winter we had an unusual amount of snow in my riding and there are a number of rural delivery routes. I had all over the Christmas and January season endless complaints from rural route people who for weeks on end, not days, and in one case well over a month, did not get mail delivery because in fact the new people who had the new contracts could not keep up and could not cope with the weather on the roads. Yet for years when we previously had inclement weather before Canada Post had implemented its new super service we had no difficulty in those same areas where people had been receiving their mail for 25 years.

Last August when the rotating strikes began in my riding the workers said they would not deliver flyers on the last day or the day the cheques were supposed to go out, unless they were given the opportunity to deliver old age pension cheques as well. Canada Post refused to give the old age pension cheques to the carriers.

When I called Canada Post and inquired as to why this was so, the response was: "We are fulfilling our commitment to our customer". When asked who "our customer" is, the Government of Canada was the customer. When asked why, when they had a memo of which I had a copy that said the mail should be delivered on or before Wednesday and it was after Wednesday, the cheques were not being delivered, I got the answer: "We are fulfilling our commitment to our customer".

When we have said that they want to deliver the mail, they want to ensure that people are not left high and dry without their cheques, and Canada Post is refusing to deliver those cheques even though there is not a strike in place, that begs the question of attitude. It begs the question of the attitude of Canada Post to its workers. That, I would suggest, is very much at the root of the reason why we are even discussing this legislation today in this House.

There is a backlog of over 100,000 union grievances filed by postal workers against their employers—100,000 grievances. The hon. member for Saint-Jean says withdraw them and we would not have a problem. My goodness, I am finding it really hard to keep my language parliamentary here. We are talking about 100,000 grievances. Even if half of them were bum grievances, that means there is still 50,000 legitimate grievances and it is high time that we started addressing the problem here.

CUPW spends a quarter of its annual budget fighting on behalf of its members with regard to grievances. God knows, if CUPW is spending a quarter of its budget, how many bucks is Canada Post spending to fight those workers through the hiring of expensive lawyers, taking these grievances to arbitration, or even end-running these grievances. It is a waste. If in fact labour relations were on a decent, even keel and there was respect for the workers in the work place, we would not be facing 100,000 grievances.

Workers in my riding and in other ridings I have been told of are being harassed constantly with spot checks of personal belongings, phone calls at home while they are off sick to determine if they will be returning to work or if they could assume other duties, including sick calls for night shift workers in the wee hours of the morning.

I have a large number of CUPW members in my riding who have told me of the harassment and intimidation that goes on daily in their work places. They told me of colleagues who have had to take time off because of the stress of constant surveillance and constant harassment. This is not cost effective. This is not good private sector behaviour. This is not the kind of behaviour that is going to produce a grand corporate profit, but in fact the kind of behaviour that leads us into the kind of discussion we are having today.

If Canada Post were really concerned about it being efficient and effective, it would spend more time and more resources improving its labour relations in the work place instead of trying to convince the rest of us that it really does provide a decent service when everyone knows that it is simply not the case.

There is another factor. I cannot tell you, Mr. Speaker, how many times Canada Post workers have said to me: "I have always wanted to do a good job. I take pride in my ability and my skill, but I have been deprived by Canada Post of the ability to work with dignity because people are so angry at the corporation and I am the first line that people see and I get it from the customer who is dissatisfied".

One of the things that most members of this House could agree with is that they probably have file drawers full of complaints from constituents regarding Canada Post. They are complaints about changes that have a lot more to do with the Tory corporate agenda than with the priorities of Canadians who want and need a good postal service, a lot more to do with a corporate agenda than anything to do with the needs of people who serve their employer and sell their employer their working hours every working day of the week.

Some of the statistics regarding Canada Post are truly frightening. Since January 1986 Canada Post has closed over 1,160 federally owned and operated post offices. Canada Post's stated plan is to close all public post offices by 1996. This will cost 14,000 decent paying unionized jobs, and then the government wonders why workers who work at Canada Post are just a bit upset.

As I said earlier, there are 100,000 outstanding grievances with Canada Post. From 1981 to 1984, five workers a month were fired. In 1991 the average was 59 workers a month who were fired by Canada Post. According to The Ottawa Citizen, Canada Post is firing staff two to four times more frequently than the federal Public Service and most private sector employers in Ontario. A wonderful, wonderful labour relations record for Canada Post.

There used to be a guarantee that there would be door-to-door delivery to communities with more than 2,000 points of call. Not any more. In fact in my community whole communities have fought the changes to Canada Post. They have fought the closures of their post offices. The whole community fought to be rid of supermailboxes and get the same kind of service on this side of the street as their neighbours got on that side of the street.

What has the response from Canada Post been? No matter what you say to somebody, when you call Canada Post at the top levels to try to get some answers you get the corporate line: "We are committed to providing more service to Canadians". No matter who you speak to, no matter what the issue is and no matter what kind of information you are trying to get, you get the corporate answer of: "We are committed to better serving Canadians".

This is the outcome. Canada Post has purchased a corporate box in Toronto's SkyDome for $250,000. Canada Post's health and safety record is so bad that it had 10,036 debilitating work place injuries. In fact it was only exceeded by Devco. The Cape Breton Development Corporation had more injuries on a per capita basis. This is the Canada Post that is now unable to conclude a collective agreement with the union. Now the Minister of Labour comes to this House and introduces legislation that is not back-to-work legislation but the removal of the right to strike legislation because it pre-empts in fact a strike even taking place.

In conclusion, I would say that this government has a responsibility, albeit it is a Crown corporation it is dealing with, to make it very clear to Canada Post that corporate industrial relations have to improve so that we are not faced with this every time we go to the bargaining table.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee H.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Accordingly, the bill stands referred to Legislative Committee H.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions among the parties and there is a predisposition for that committee to convene at 4.45 p.m. this day, approximately 15 minutes from now in room 209, West Block. It will convene for organizational purposes and my understanding is that we will probably be starting with the first witness at 5.30, provided the organizational meeting goes well.

I wanted to inform the House and all those watching of that pattern: 20 minutes from now, room 209, West Block.

[Translation]

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, I would like to confirm what my colleague, the government whip, just said. Yes, after consultation and discussion, the committee can meet at 4.45 p.m. for an organization meeting. If the witnesses are ready, after the organization meeting, the committee can meet at 5.30 p.m. to hear them.

[English]

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, it is also my understanding that this is the arrangement. The steering committee will meet at 5.45 p.m. and agree on what I think will be a fairly short list of witnesses and hear those witnesses after 5.30 and then go into clause by clause study of the legislation at that time. At that time we expect that the minister will be quite reasonable and start listening to reason.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Chair notes all this agreement. So be it.

The Hon. Parliamentary Secretary.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I have a couple of motions that I need to put before the House at this time. The first motion is:

> That the order to refer Bill C-35 to Legislative Committee G be rescinded and that the said bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Cooper: The next motion is the following. I move:

> That notwithstanding any Standing Orders and usual practices of this House, on Tuesday, October 29, when the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology rises from his seat pursuant to Standing Order 33 to do a short factual statement on the prosperity agenda, that the next member to speak shall be the Minister of Employment and Immigration and that subsequently two members back to back from each of the parties in opposition to the government make comment briefly thereon.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Does the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, may I suggest, and I think you will find consent, that we call it six o'clock. May I say further that what we should do is actually call it six o'clock to the call of the Chair and so that once we can be organized for the late show we can proceed with that even if it is prior to six o'clock.

SITTING SUSPENDED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Just a word to avoid misunderstanding. There was no unanimous consent for the last motion and the House adjourns to the call of the Chair for debate on the adjournment motion.

Sitting suspended at 4.29 p.m.

SITTING RESUMED 4.50 P.M.

The House resumed at 4.50 p.m.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

PORT OF HALIFAX

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak on a matter which this House has heard over, and over, and over again, both from me and from other members on this side. I refer to the future of Canada's world class port, the port of Halifax.

In the last six months I have put seven questions to the government during Question Period and seven times I have either been told "don't call us, we will call you", or I have been told that the container lines are leaving because of some mythical overcapacity problem. In one reply the Prime Minister told the House that he had some discussions with the Nova Scotia government, but what those discussions were remain a mystery.

• (1650)

Six times I have risen to speak in debate concerning the port and six times the phalanx of government backbenchers replied that there was no problem, that the seven container lines that left in 1991 would come back when circumstances permitted.

As the member for Halifax, I brought a private members' motion, M-540 before the committee and then this House. The government responded by voting against a modest proposal to change the way CN rail does business between Halifax and central Canada.

Two Standing Orders later and still no action from this government.

I rise again today to ask the government that preaches competitiveness to us on a daily basis to please, for once, let us compete. I demand on behalf of the out of work dockworkers and the silent piers of Halifax that this government wake up. Bring the ships back.

This government, by Order in Council, can make CN rail re-establish our lifeline to central Canada. No more studies. No more discussions over cocktails. Implement the proposals of the secret report, the report the government will not show us. As long as it goes on, as it goes on today, I will rise in this House again and again and again until the government realizes that it is throwing away the key to trade in the 21st century and the key to prosperity in the port of Halifax.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate again the hon. member's tenacity in this question. I am pleased again to respond to her. I think we are making progress.

Let us first address some facts. There have been some problems in the port this year and some business has been lost. The hon. member should also mention that the port has previously set new records for the number of 20 foot equivalent unit containers. We on this side of the House would like to see a new record set every year but that cannot always happen.

When there is a downturn in traffic everyone is rightly concerned and all the parties work together to make sure every action is taken to restore the traffic. That is why Canada Ports Corporation as a federal agency is trying to facilitate a longer term co-operation between the container ports and the railways to enhance the attractiveness of Canadian container routings in general and has worked with the port of Halifax in particular.

That is why Canadian National Railway and the province developed an agreement for the funding of lease and purchase of double stack rail cars. That is why the city of Halifax has come to the assistance of the port by significantly trimming the taxes on the container terminals. That is why the port has made several concessions that are directly aimed at improving the port's attractiveness to foreign ocean liners.

I will give some examples: Capping of berthage charges; wharfage discount inventive on all traffic originating in or destined for the United States; establishing a maximum limit to the number of times a liner must pay harbour dues; and as well, certain other port tariffs have been frozen for two years.

The hon. member has been asking for a copy of the Ports Canada Container Study. I am informed that the corporation will be releasing a report to interested parties very shortly, perhaps as early as this week.

More important than the physical release of the report, though, is that the report will be the basis of important discussions at meetings with the container ports, and their marine communities. These regional meetings will provide an opportunity for discussion and feedback not only on the competitive issues facing the ports but on the potential strategies to maintain our competitive position in the world transportation system.

If the member can share with the world the way to solve the problem of over-capacity on the high seas, she will have joined the rest of us who are working to promote this great port.

MINING

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, on October 9 I asked the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources what he was going to do to help the mining industry.

I pointed out to him that the mining industry in northern Ontario is in dire need. I informed him of the approximately 1,000 jobs that were lost last year in the Timmins area alone. The minister spoke of current negotiations for mineral development agreements between the federal government and its provincial counterparts.

The mining industry and those who depend on its livelihood would welcome just about any good news at this point. They need a firm commitment from this government that it will do all that is possible to ensure this industry's future.

I would just like to quote from a Canadian minerals yearbook, published and authored by Energy, Mines and Resources, Canada. This document refers to the year 1990 and I quote:

> Lower commodity prices in 1990, combined with higher interest rates and a strong Canadian dollar, resulted in poorer financial performance for most producers.
> The financial results for the first three quarters of the year gave indications that earnings for the full year could end up being as low as half the earnings of 1989.

I think that is an area that still exists today. It is an area that this government could be looking into. We have mentioned before that the Canadian dollar is too high. We have mentioned that Canadian interest rates are too high and I think that is one of the solutions that could be looked at by the minister.

Another area that the minister could look at was put forward by my colleague from Churchill and is the establishment of a national mining reserve fund. In his proposal he outlined the fact that Statistics Canada figures indicate that the federal government benefits from the mining industry. It received $1.5 billion in federal revenue from it.

He only asked that some of that money be set aside for the future to provide more security for those living in the mining communities. I think it is a fair and reasonable approach and should be very seriously considered by this government.

In conclusion, I would like to ask the minister once again if he would look into the future and think about protecting this country from further losses of revenue by letting this industry die.

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, to my hon. colleague from Timmins—Chapleau I would say that the industry in northern Ontario has been worth over $6 billion over the past few years.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and our department have worked closely with the province, labour, and the industry. We have announced in the last few months a national mining training program to ensure that the industry will be competitive down the road.

We have also worked with the industry, labour, and the province to come up with a mapping system called MILAC which will indicate exactly the land use that is available for the mining community across Canada.

At the mines ministers' conference just a few weeks ago there was a joint communique between the industry, the province, labour, and the federal government. We are going to be looking at the over-all issues which the mining community will be faced with over the next number of years in regard to competitiveness and external pressure from around the world.

I would also like to announce today that very shortly a mineral development agreement will be signed with the province of Ontario and northern Ontario worth $30 million. In that program there will be information exchange programs, productivity and technology programs and economic development programs for northern Ontario.

The minister and our department continue to work closely with the industry because we know it is the heart of not only northern Ontario but other regions of the country and we will continue to do our utmost to ensure that the stability will be there.

LAND CLAIMS

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I rise to express my dissatisfaction with the minister of Indian Affairs' response to my question of September 18 concerning the failure of the Dene land claims negotiations in the Northwest Territories.

The failure resulted from the government's refusal to proceed with the land claims settlement unless the Dene agreed to the extinguishment of their aboriginal title. With the collapse of a comprehensive agreement the government then proceeded to negotiate with those tribes which were willing to abandon aboriginal rights and title in exchange for a land claims settlement.

The minister responsible for Canada's race laws and his staff at Indian Affairs are treating aboriginal people with the same colonialist Machiavellian divide and conquer approach that has been the hallmark of Canada's relations with its aboriginal people over the last 200 years.

In fact the minister was asked a question in the House today about the Algonquin land claims proposal. The minister led the questioner to believe that his department had funded land claims research for the Algonquin people to the tune of over $.5 million. In fact that funding went to a single band and the research was rejected by all but two of the Algonquin bands. In spite of that the government refuses to fund a joint research proposal that is supported by the majority of the Algonquin people. It is another example of the ministry's divide and conquer tactics.

The final example is the Lubicon nation which has attempted to bargain in good faith with the government for many years, in each case to be met with stonewalling and subversion of the talks. In fact the government even established a new band, the Woodland Cree and has settled its claims on the government's terms over part of the Lubicon lands. Now we hear that the government is intriguing among the Lubicon Lake people to establish another band which will claim another part of Lubicon lands, and again settle on the government's terms.

I do not blame the aboriginal people for their willingness to abandon some of their rights and title in order to achieve a land claim settlement. Many of these people are desperate and feel forced to sacrifice their rights in order to obtain the land and resource base they need to provide the basic necessities for their people. I blame the minister responsible for Canada's race laws and his department, who continue to use the most cynical, deceitful, divide and conquer tactics to deprive our aboriginal people of rights which are supposedly protected in the Canadian Constitution.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to respond to the hon. member for Comox—Alberni.

The recent approval by the Gwitch'in of their comprehensive land claim agreement is proof of progress, and progress in the right direction. The Gwitch'in claim was under negotiation as part of the Dene-Metis claim for over 10 years before it became a regional claim in November of last year.

With the decision of the Dene and Chief Bill Erasmus not to proceed with ratification, the Government of Canada agreed to proceed on a regional basis with those groups which were pressing us to finalize their claim settlements. In the Gwitch'in ratification vote, 91 per cent of eligible voters voted; 94 per cent of those voting approved the agreement. This is truly a remarkable show of determination by this particular group and we prefer to negotiate an agreement and then abide by the decision the Indian people themselves make.

Under the agreement, the Gwitch'in will own 8,658 square miles of land, including surface rights for 27 per cent. They will receive a non-taxable payment of $75 million. Other benefits will include guaranteed wildlife harvesting rights and guaranteed representation of public-government boards to manage the wildlife, land and water and the environmental reviews.

This agreement, embraced almost unanimously by the Gwitch'in, is based upon the Dene-Metis agreement initialled in April of 1990. The Dene-Metis could also have voted on the agreement, but instead in July 1990 their joint assembly decided not to allow a vote on it. The Gwitch'in walked out of the assembly before the vote and the Sahtu region abstained.

This agreement is a clear indication of the government's commitment to accelerate the settlement on aboriginal claims and to adopt new and innovative approaches to their resolution.

In conclusion, the Gwitch'in agreed to exchange their unwritten aboriginal rights for written treaty rights. The president of the Gwitch'in tribal council himself said; "We don't feel we are extinguishing anything."

HEALTH

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, on October 4, I requested the Minister of National Health and Welfare to underline his department's policy on the sleeping drug Triazolan, better known by the brand name Halcion. This drug is the most popular sedative in Canada and has been prescribed to some 34 million people in this country since 1978.

My question to the minister was simple: Since the minister has indicated his department has agreed to move very quickly, within hours, if just cause were found to ban it in Canada, can the minister tell the House today—that was on October 4—what decision has he made?

The reason behind the question was a growing suspicion of the capability of the Health Protection Branch because I am afraid it is not equipped to anticipate dangers to the public health. This question was of a vein that had been pursued by me on other occasions, on other matters including the Meme breast implant, the heart drug Betaloc and with Sudafed and now with Triazolan.

I want to be reassured and I want Canadians to be reassured that the Health Protection Branch has the fortitude and power to act quickly, concisely and always in the best interests of Canadians when threats arise. I want Canadians to be reassured that the government is giving the Health Protection Branch enough financial and human resources to do its job.

I believe the threat from Halcion or triazolan does not come purely from the drug itself which is apparently under extensive clinical trials in order to have its use approved. I think the problem rises from societal and administrative problems which when coupled result in the over-prescription of this drug to thousands.

The monograph on the drug states that the dosage should be discontinued after 21 consecutive days despite the fact that many patients have been on the drug for months and sometimes even years.

I can understand how side effects which typically affect about 5 per cent of the triazolan users can cause more adverse responses if the drug is not used properly. It is just such an abuse that should be regulated and monitored by the Health Protection Branch. Within the HPD there is a separate area called the Adverse Drug Reaction Reporting Program. This body should been given adequate resources to do its job.

Britain and the United States have shown concern about this drug and I would believe that the minister should not take weeks to make a decision on the safety of a drug affecting millions in our country.

If agencies like the Health Protection Branch and the Adverse Drug Reaction Reporting Program were given a new mandate for protection and better funding, it follows they could better protect and serve Canadians.

I believe that Canadians should closely watch and monitor Canadians. Is there abuse of this sleeping drug in our society? Is it being commonly over-prescribed to patients who are female, aged and in long-term care facilities? If so, why? Why has the Health Protection Branch not reacted sooner? I hope today the minister can respond to my concerns with more than the usual: "We have struck a committee of venerable experts to study the issue".

I hope the minister will have a reply today, right now, on whether the decision on triazolan's safety has been decided and whether a directive to this effect has been sent to consumers, to pharmacies and to other health care providers.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond to my colleague's question.

On October 2, 1991, the Medicines Control Agency, which is the drug regulatory authority in the United Kingdom, suspended the product licence for Halcion or triazolan for a three month period.

This action was based upon a new analysis of safety data which the U.K. authorities interpreted as suggesting that risks associated with triazolan outweighed its benefits. Some countries, namely Finland, Norway, Jamaica, Bermuda and Argentina followed suit.

Officials of Health and Welfare Canada immediately contacted both the U.K. officials to request the data upon which they had based their decision and Upjohn Canada to request all the information that the company had provided to the U.K. department.

The department officials also met with senior officials from Upjohn on October 7, 1991. The conclusion drawn by Health and Welfare Canada was that, based on a preliminary assessment, there was no evidence of new risks at the recommended doses.

A more detailed assessment is being done based on documentation obtained from the U.K. regulatory authorities as well as from the Upjohn people. We hope to have that information within the next short period of time.

I would like to say that a similar position was taken by the U.S., by Sweden and by the committee for proprietary medicinal products at a meeting in Brussels on October 14 to October 16.

The CPMP made recommendations and its recommendations with regard to information are already in place in Canada. These include labelling information, informing physicians and consumers that triazolan should not be used longer than the 21 day period consecutively and that the lowest effective dose should be used, particularly with our elderly people.

I just have to say once more that with a panel of experts we will be reviewing this and we will come forward within a short period of time.

FISHERIES

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, once again I am a bit like my colleague from Halifax. I have been on my feet 14 times since this House resumed in September and mostly on the subject of control of the cod stocks in Newfoundland, the subject that is making fishermen angry. It is making them demoralized and it is causing a lot of anger in our caucus.

When you stand up and talk about it, it sounds reasonably simple, but somehow we cannot seem to be able to get the message across to the government or to anybody else that despite all the rules and regulations, we are the only country in the world that I am aware of that gives away to foreigners and allows them to take, through whatever means, the very resources upon which people depend for their livelihood.

Just a quick background on this so that we are all talking from the same text if you like. In 1978, a year after we established a 200-mile zone, the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization which was established as a result of this, agreed that Canada would manage the cod stocks that I am speaking about essentially in 2J,3K–L, which are NAFO designated areas essentially off the north and east cost of of Newfoundland and Labrador, even though it was recognized as a trans-boundary stock, on the grounds that only a very small part of the stock was normally present outside the 200-mile limit and that for only a very small part of the year and also because of the vital importance of the stock to the coastal state.

That existed in 1978, but somehow in the last few years things have changed. Right now, NAFO does the scientific assessment of the 2J,3K–L stocks and, furthermore, it continues to establish quotas to be fished outside the 200-mile limit.

NAFO is toothless as it is devoid of teeth. Its moral authority counts for less than nothing in this world of dog eat dog and nations of the European community, for example, may through the simple expedient of filing a protest against the total allowable catch, which I will call TAC, set by NAFO free themselves from any obligation to be bound by it.

In practice in particular such nations as Spain and Portugal habitually ignore scientific advice. They flaunt their defiance of controversial strategies and they limit their catches only by the capacity of their fishing fleets.

Mr. Speaker, some examples: in 1986 Canada established a northern cod TAC of 266,000 tonnes. NAFO proposed the TAC for the European community countries of 36,000 tonnes to be taken from the nose and the tail of the bank in which these countries reported landings were approximately 100,000 tonnes. Can you imagine?

Let me take you up to last year. In 1990 the TAC was 190,000 tonnes. The NAFO quota was set at 15,377. They allocated themselves unilaterally 59,400 and they took 97,750. In other words, they took the same last year when the total allowable catch was 190,000 tonnes as they took back in 1986 when the TAC was 20 per cent or 30 per cent larger.

In the context of international irresponsibility this amounts, in the eyes of Newfoundlanders and I hope Canadians, to outright piracy. The mandate of the Canadian Minister of Fisheries and Oceans cannot be properly executed. There is only one way it can be done, and this recommendation was made by the Independent Review of the State of the Northern Cod Stocks back in February last year. It is not just the member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception. I am quoting what is considered to be a very authoritative document. Its recommendation reads, and I will quote it: "Ideally we believe that control should be exercised by a single authority and that authority should be Canada".

In conclusion, turning to the example of Iceland back in 1975, when other countries including Great Britain decided to take them on Icelanders declared that this was a resource that was essential to their livelihood. They brought out their gunboats to substantiate their belief in this and the fact that they would take control of their own resources. I wish to heaven's name we would consider doing the same thing.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has alleged that foreign vessels overfishing in the northwest Atlantic take almost as much fish as Canadians receive in allocations. He has also implied that the government is not serious about proper conservation of fish and the viability of the Atlantic fishing industry.

While I appreciate the member's sincerity, both of these are far from correct. Groundfishing quotas allocated to Canadian fishermen in 1991 totalled 816 tonnes, including some 49,000 tonnes of groundfish stocks managed by NAFO. This total of Canadian quotas which are fished by Canadians mainly inside the Canadian 200-mile zone is about four times greater than even the highest estimate of what foreign vessels are catching outside 200 miles. The problem of foreign overfishing outside 200 miles is real and serious but should not be blown into fantasy proportions.

The other members of NAFO, including the European Community, received groundfish allocations from NAFO totalling some 81,000 tonnes in 1991. The foreign vessels fish their NAFO quotas mostly outside the Canadian fishing zone, on the Grand Banks and on the Flemish Cap. These are NAFO-managed stocks.

The problem of foreign overfishing does not occur inside Canada's 200-mile zone. It does not occur because of the quotas set by NAFO outside 200 miles. The overfishing problems occurs only when vessels from several countries choose to fish outside 200 miles in excess of the quotas that are established by NAFO.

I am advised that two members of the European Community, Spain and Portugal, as the hon. member has mentioned, are the main overfishing nations and two countries that are not members of NAFO, Panama and Korea, are also major causes of the overfishing problem.

The Government of Canada is very concerned about the overfishing that is taking place in the northwest Atlantic outside the Canadian 200-mile limit and the consequences of this for Atlantic fishing communities, especially in Newfoundland. We have conducted a comprehensive international campaign to eliminate foreign overfishing and are making progress.

The government is making sure people know what is happening in the northwest Atlantic and the consequences of overfishing. Federal and provincial parliamentarians of all parties, technical experts and fishing industry representatives have participated in making this information available.

Canada has also undertaken a legal initiative, including work within the United Nations, to seek a legal basis for international control of high seas fisheries and for recognition of the special rights and interests of coastal states such as Canada in management and conservation of straddling stocks. Agreement on measures needed to control high seas fisheries is a priority objective for Canada at the United Nations Conference on the Environment and Development.

We have not yet achieved our goals, as the member points out. We know that foreign vessels are still overfishing outside Canada's fishing zone. We will continue our efforts. The government does not intend to jeopardize future success by permitting Canadian fishermen to overfish, whether inside or outside our zone. The remedy for the fishery failure that occurred this year—

PROSPERITY THROUGH COMPETITIVENESS

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, Canadians today are perplexed and confused.

On the one hand, they read in the papers that a recent United Nations study has ranked Canada as having the second highest quality of life in the world. They also know that we have the second highest per capita income. They also hear on the news that the World Economic Forum in Geneva has placed Canada fifth among the countries of the world in global competitiveness. This all sounds like good news and it is.

But in too many cases those same Canadians are discovering from their own personal experience that all is not so well.

The parent whose child dropped out of high school last week may be disappointed and knowing that 30 per cent of Canadian children drop out before completing high school—one of the highest rates in the world—is no consolation. Knowing that 62 per cent of new jobs to be created in the next 10 years will require at least a high school education would really upset them.

Which of these views is right? Are we doing well or are we in trouble?

The answer, Mr. Speaker, is that both views are right.

There is no question that over the last 124 years, Canadians together have built a strong, dynamic and prosperous country. It shows in our standard of living, our health systems, our export performance and in many other ways.

That is only one part of the story, a snapshot assessment in an evolving world.

The global environment is changing before our very eyes and our productivity, our ability to produce efficiently as a nation is just not keeping pace. It is not growing as fast as it used to and is not gaining as fast as our competitors. This is the other side of the story which shows up in its own more negative way.

This is the other side of the story, the negative side.

The young scientist just out of university is angry and frustrated that he cannot find a job. Like thousands of our young people, he is talented and has worked hard. But with only four Canadian manufacturing firms out of 100 doing any research and development, his talent and hard work may not find the outlet they deserve.

[English]

The young factory worker is worried as she sees her friends laid off and her own shifts shortened. She does not want to go on unemployment insurance but she is probably working for one of those 50 per cent-plus of Canadian manufacturers using not one of the 22 leading manufacturing technologies essential to success in the 1990s. As their productivity falls behind, they lose orders and she and her friends lose their jobs.

The young couple about to have their first child are not quite sure why they are having trouble making ends meet on two incomes when their parents lived comfortably on one. The reason is quite simply that their companies cannot afford to pay them more because the companies' productivity will not allow them to do so.

• (1010)

Productivity is the heart of the issue and is essential to our prosperity. It supports our way of life, it puts food on our tables, schools and hospitals in our communities, roads across our great country and pay cheques in our pockets.

But in order to be more productive, we first have to upgrade every component of our economy. And in order to do that, we have to learn to innovate, to work smarter and faster, instead of harder and longer.

[English]

That is why we are here today. We must find a way as a nation to improve our productivity. The old ways which served us so well are no longer working. We must change the way we think, the way we work and the way we work together as a country and as a people.

To be sure, some companies are doing what needs to be done. They are ploughing back their profits into productive new investment. They are spending on research and development and introducing sophisticated new equipment. Many individuals are not only seeking but actually making new opportunities for themselves by upgrading their skills and exploring new challenges. In a word they are adapting to the changing world around them.

But too many of us are simply not changing far enough or fast enough to keep up with the global pace-setters for much longer. The underlying cause of this state of affairs is far beyond the capacity of government, any government, to turn around on its own.

The Speech from the Throne in May put on record the government's intention to invite all Canadians "to participate in fashioning a new agenda for prosperity", to tell us what we must change in order to compete and win in the world. Over the summer, the initial response of Canadians has been clear: Take action but consult us first.

For these reasons I am pleased to inform the House that the government is today instituting a comprehensive consultation process. It will be managed by a national steering committee and designed to elicit from all sectors of Canadian society the solutions to the challenges now confronting us.

I am particularly delighted to announce that two very distinguished Canadians, Mr. David Robert McCamus and Mme Marie-Josée Drouin, have agreed to act as co-chairpersons of the Steering Committee in its tasks of managing the public consultations and developing a plan of action.

The Steering Group will be made up of representatives from the business, academic, labour and scientific communities, as well as leading economic and social organizations.

[English]

The group will consult communities across the country as well as provincial governments and other national organizations. In addition, it will benefit from specific industry discussions conducted by cabinet ministers.

Mr. Speaker, I am also pleased to table a discussion paper entitled Prosperity Through Competitiveness. This, together with a companion paper that my colleague the Minister of Employment and Immigration will be tabling in a few minutes, will serve as a focus for these consultations.

Together, the papers identify areas in which we must improve so that we can compete effectively, efficiently and profitably. Each area—learning, science and technology, investment, domestic markets and trade—is important. None of the components of the prosperity initiative is revolutionary. But they are the nuts and bolts of the country's economy.

Because time is of the essence, we have asked the steering group to complete its consultations by mid next year and to produce its final action plan by the end of next summer.

The change that is needed must not be a quick fix. The competitive challenge can only be met by systemic changes and not piecemeal changes; by sustained, not sporadic commitment to compete with the best in the world.

Canadians may have to change the way we think—all of us, from cabinet maker to cabinet minister—if we can ever hope to change the way we act. Because how we act is the real test of how productive we are going to be. We cannot sustain our standard of living unless we strengthen our ability to compete.

Whatever plan of action results from this process we are launching today, it will be important that as a country we strike while the iron is hot. We must act on our plan quickly and collectively while we are still able to do so from a position of relative strength and prosperity, with the capacity to generate wealth to support the changes that are needed.

It is time for us to maximize our use of something we have in abundance, our ingenuity. Millions of Canadians can still remember when Canadians had the best hockey teams in the world. Year in and year out, Canadians took for granted that their teams would come home with lopsided victories. Then, in the 1960s, someone from 11,000 kilometres away figured out how to beat us. They changed the way our game was played. They outskated, outshot and outchecked us. We were still playing good hockey, but they were playing better. They beat us and kept beating us until we learned how to innovate, how to adapt, how to upgrade and how to outsmart them. Now we are winning again because we have changed. We are winning again, but not all the time because competition is tougher today than it was in the 1960s.

We have built our team back to being among the best and can remain among the best if we continue to innovate and improve.

[Translation]

As a country, we are like our hockey team. We spent our first one hundred years living off our resources, and we beat the competition easily. For the next twenty years, we lived off our credit and found we were slipping. Now we have to demonstrate that we can recover our position off the ice as well as on it.

[English]

Our history tells us that we can come back. Individuals and companies are showing every day that we can do it by innovating and upgrading. Now we have to do the same as a country. Whenever we put our minds to a problem, we have licked it. I said this morning that we have something to be concerned about, and we have. However, I am reassured by the knowledge that when Canadians roll up their sleeves, the job gets done. I know we can do it.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with attention to the minister's introduction of his long-delayed consultation paper Prosperity through Competitiveness. That paper was promised to the people of Canada last May in the Speech from the Throne. Here we are more than six months later finally getting a paper.

The problem with the paper is not merely that it has been so long delayed and has not fulfilled the promise made by the government so many months ago, but rather that the paper is lacking in substance. The problem is that this paper offers Canadians no solutions, no directions and no proposals about how we resolve our serious problems of international competitiveness in Canada.

The minister knows perfectly well that after all these months of preparation, to bring forward such a paper is really an admission on the part of the government of its own failure to devise, develop and identify solutions to the problems which have confronted Canadians throughout this government's mandate. I do not speak only of the last three years or two years. I am speaking of the time since 1984 when this government first came to office.

This government at that time inherited a burgeoning economy left by the previous government. Look at the statistics. Anyone will be able to identify for themselves quite readily that in 1984 growth was well in place and benefiting all Canadians. What have we today after its seven or eight years in office? We have a paper from this government that says: "We don't know what to do. We are now going to go out on the road for a year's consultation with Canadians about what they think should be done". The government offers a paper which under various headings such as learning, innovation, financing, and domestic market regulation asks merely vague questions. Vague is a kind word. The questions are barely formulated, and the answers are certainly not offered. There are no options provided. There is not even any indication that after seven years this government has any idea of what to do about Canada's international competitiveness.

Let me say to you, Mr. Speaker, that the real failure of this government in its economic policies over the past seven years is not what it has done, it is what it has failed to do.

You know, Mr. Speaker, as well as I do that the macroeconomic or what the economists would call a macroeconomic environment is essential if Canada is going to compete effectively abroad. But what have we got in Canada? We have not had the government providing the leadership or offering the macroeconomic circumstances which can enable Canadians to compete effectively abroad.

We have high interest rates and a continuing high debt. The debt is at least as high as it was last year and with every indication it will continue at a very high level next year. We have a high Canadian dollar resulting from this government's failure to address its spending priorities and its failure to achieve lower interest rates so as to enable Canadians to compete effectively abroad.

This government has failed on the macro level and now it turns to what we might call the micro level which deals with specific instances of where Canadians know perfectly well we must take action. We must take action on training and retraining. We must take action on how we direct our savings toward productive investment. We must take action on innovation within our economy and the vital role to be played by science, technology, research and development. What do we get instead? We get a series of questions. We know the questions. All Canadians know the questions. We have known these questions for six and seven years.

What about the creation within Canada of a true economic union within our own country? This is an essential basis for our further progress in international competition.

But only now in its constitutional proposals has the government come forward with a few vague ideas. It may be vague on the one side, and highly convoluted in some detail on the other, about what it is going to do to create true economic union within our country.

The foundations are lacking in this paper to give Canadians any indication of how we might best proceed. The leadership is lacking. Let me turn for a moment to international trade. The paper ends with a couple of vague questions. Should we trade more? That is the sort of question posed.

I think most Canadians would probably agree, yes, we should trade more. So the government then asks the question: "How do we do it?"

Clearly the government has no clear idea itself of how to do it. The government is right when it says: "Maybe we spent a little too much time on continentalism. Maybe we spent a little too much time on the free trade agreement and now on an agreement with Mexico". This, by any stretch of the imagination, can hardly be given Canadian priority. It said "Maybe we spent too much time on these issues and maybe we should be looking at Asia and the new Europe of 1992".

It has taken seven years for the government to think that one through. It does not even offer that as a nostrum. It simply says: "What do you think, Canada? Should we do this? Should we look at this?"

The real failure of this government, as I said, is what it has not done over the past seven years. It has failed to create an economic environment of spending restraint, taxation restraint and of creating lower interest rates and a stable dollar so that Canadian exporters can progress and expand at home and abroad in a way that creates the jobs that Canadians so obviously need. We do not have any comprehensive system of adjustment programs. The government now, at this late date, is saying that maybe we should have some comprehensive adjustment programs.

The decision on the free trade agreement was taken three or four years ago.

We are only now saying to ourselves: "Maybe we should have a little more training and retraining". What has this government really done about removing the trade barriers within our own country?

Canadians have known. They are not stupid people. They have known that those barriers should come down. They were in the constitutional proposals of the previous government, and it was due to the failure of the provinces to recognize their importance that we did not make any progress at that time. Now seven and eight years later we are saying: "Oh well, maybe we should make a little progress there".

"Let us look beyond the continent of North America", it says. We have been telling the government for years that it should be looking beyond the continent of North America. Its obsession with continentalism has led it to a blindness to the opportunities outside North America for Canadian exporters and Canadian investors.

Finally, it is the failure of this government to link its social policies and economic policies in an effective manner so as to ensure that the undeniable costs of the emerging global economy are spread equitably among our people, as are the benefits, when we come to achieve the real gains from the emerging global economy of which I have spoken.

This paper fails in that it offers Canadians only a series of vague questions and one more year of discussion before we can possibly hope to see any solutions emerging. My colleague from Newfoundland has a word or two to add. I would suggest that I now turn this over to him.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, last week I met with groups of workers in Windsor who have lost their jobs in the last 18 months.

There were three different groups totalling perhaps 225 people all out of work from plant shutdowns, all taking retraining of various sorts to try to get back into the work force. I want to quote from one of those workers.

"I came to this country 28 years ago. I worked 11 years at Bendix company. It closed down in 1981. I lost those eleven years of my life. I got a job at Windsor Bumper and it closed too. I came here for a better future, but now I am in the same position I was 28 years ago, with no job".

"What kind of future can I give my kids if this government does not change and give them a better future?" That is what this debate is about. It concerns people: men and women who have lost their jobs and their children who share that cost.

The government has brought forth more paper, all sorts of paper, more fancy phrases and more plans for consultation. Of course, we are glad to see the government taking seriously some of the things that it has so long neglected, like better training and more research and development.

Let us not permit the pretence to pass. This government is responsible for those workers whose plants have been closed; extreme interest rates, 6 per cent above the U.S. level, a value of the dollar up 25 per cent since 1987, a trade deal with the United States that was so unfair it has cost at least 250,000 permanent jobs. It is responsible for tax breaks to the rich and the GST for the rest of Canadians. All this has devastated our economy.

• (1030)

Yes, Canadians are perplexed and confused.

Unemployment is increasing. More and more people have to swallow their pride and survive the best they can on meagre welfare payments, and we have the GST.

In Quebec, for instance, medicare is on the way to being privatized because the government is cutting transfer payments to the provinces, and so on.

Until now, the Tory government blamed the deficit for the additional tax burden. I am referring to the tax burden on Canadians who pay their taxes, not the corporations that get off scot-free with their expense accounts for restaurants and all kinds of tax deductions.

Now that people are increasingly perplexed, because they are beginning to understand that all their problems are due to the government's incompetence, the Tories turn around and serve up a new slogan: Competitiveness. They want to cover up their failures with nice speeches.

[English]

Remember, I ask people across this country, even the business oriented Conference Board of Canada has labelled this the made-in-Canada recession, made by the ministers and the government sitting across from us in this House of Commons.

What we have here are not the prosperity papers. These are the propaganda papers. They are meant to divert Canadians from the real issues. They are meant to say that the basic Tory thrust is just fine; here are the restricted issue areas where we all have to concentrate and work together.

I have to ask how this minister can get up and call for Canadians to co-operate when this same minister has kicked those Canadians in the teeth for the last seven years with his policies.

New Democrats believe in business—labour co-operation but aimed at full employment which these papers never mentioned. New Democrats believe the tax system needs reviewing to make it fairer, like cutting out loopholes for the rich, cutting out benefits for the powerful and doing away with the job destroying GST.

New Democrats want better training in this country but not at the expense of a much harsher UIC system. Just throwing workers on to welfare, that is what the Conservatives have given us. New Democrats want more consultation but on the real questions of the GST; the trade deal, whether it should extend to Mexico; the value of the dollar; interest rate policies; whether inflation should be our ultimate concern when 1.4 million Canadians are unemployed.

I am pleased to announce the first five New Democrat consultations which will take place in Hamilton, Guelph, London, Kingston and Sarnia between November 21 and December 17 of this year.

We can build the economy that we want and need for our people, but first we have to get rid of this government which we do not want. That means recognizing these propaganda papers as the first shot in the Conservative re-election campaign. As the $20 million is spent on this propaganda push, this diversion from the real issues, let every taxpayer recognize that their money is paying for this Tory pre-election campaign.

PROSPERITY

TABLING OF DOCUMENT ENTITLED "LEARNING WELL-LIVING WELL"

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table today, in both official languages, a discussion paper supporting the government's Prosperity initiative and entitled "Learning Well—Living Well".

Parliament's most important function in a democratic society like ours, even before resolving conflicting views or seeking consensus, is first to inform. To inform ourselves, yes, and also to inform Canadians. When the objective is to inform Canadians of a threat to the continued prosperity, and ultimately the unity, of the nation—even if the message is unsettling and unwelcome at first to most—then this has to be Parliament's most important calling, Mr. Speaker, and its finest hour. This, Mr. Speaker, is what we are doing today—informing the Canadian people of an intolerable situation.

The government is putting forward to this House and to all Canadians a well-reasoned and thoughtful statement on a major international challenge that cannot be ignored. This is the competitive threat to the long-term security and prosperity of all Canadians.

The only way for Canadians to meet this threat is to develop our most valuable national asset: people. It is not Canada's natural resources but our human resources—our brain power—that count. It is ideas, knowledge, and skills that will be our winning ticket.

Our major international competitors are doing a better job than we are on this score, Mr. Speaker. The gap between our performance and theirs is widening. It will widen even further, unless we are determined to stop it and to take effective action now. We have one of the highest high-school dropout rates in the world: 30 per cent to Japan's 2 per cent. We face a critical shortage of scientists and engineers: Japan graduates nearly nine times as many as we do. People will say, "Japan again!"

Even Mexico, a developing country, graduates four times as many. Of course, these countries have a much bigger poopulation than Canada, Mr. Speaker, but I am talking on a per capita basis. More statistics? We are ranked 11th in the responsiveness of our school system to meet the demands of global competition. We rank 20th out of 24 OECD member countries in the effectiveness of our training programs.

Canadian companies spend proportionately only half of what American companies spend on training, one fifth of what the Japanese spend and only one eighth of what the Germans spend. Less than 50 per cent of adult Canadians have completed high school—that is, 12 years of schooling. Yet we know that 63 per cent of all jobs in the coming decade will require at least a high school certificate and 40 per cent will require at least 16 years of schooling.

Tragically, three out of ten adult Canadians cannot read properly and four out of ten cannot do simple arithmetic. Canada has one of the worst levels of literacy and numeracy among our competitors.

[English]

The solution to this widening gap lies in the minds and actions of individual Canadians. Canadians must want to value far more learning through life, that is develop a learning and training culture. This means that Canadian firms, especially small and medium sized ones, would quadruple and more the time and resources devoted to training and create a training culture within their firms. Life-long learning can become as important to us as it is to our international competitors: a life passion for gaining new knowledge and skills to compete, yes, but also to grow.

Right now as a people we do not have this commitment. This is the unfortunate reality. This is the central challenge every Canadian should see and confront.

If we do not, Mr. Speaker, in the coming years, we will lose high-skill, high-wage jobs, the security of all our jobs, and face an inevitable decline in our living standard. The threat will not diminish, but only grow!

This is a call to Canadians first and foremost to perceive fully the nature of the challenge—to dialogue and learn anew, and then in partnership, devise a response to this crisis. Let us be crystal-clear about it: the federal government has a responsibility to stimulate a national dialogue on Canada's economic future. For those who are concerned that the federal government will use this as a pretext to intrude on provincial jurisdiction, I want to say emphatically that this is not the case, Mr. Speaker. It would not be permitted by the Constitution, and in any case, it would make no sense. No one should fear that the people of Canada, in every province and every region, become better informed and talk seriously among themselves.

That is what we propose and that is what Canadians should expect of their federal government. If the federal government, knowing the facts, failed to inform Canadians, it would be a terrible abdication of ledership. Surely we are not so insecure and lacking in self-assurance to be concerned with the national government informing Canadians and encouraging them to talk seriously among themselves.

The Japanese or Germans or Italians are not going to put out press releases or prepare serious discussion papers for Canadians to alert us to our lower levels of performance.

An hon. member: Of course not!

Mr. Valcourt: They and other nations will send their message by cancelling contracts.

[English]

Canadian firms will get the pink slip when they submit their bids or lose the opportunity to bid at all. The door to the international marketplace will be slammed in our face. Then the message to Canadians will have arrived a bit too late. We are putting learning at the front of the national agenda and to fail to do so knowing what we know would be totally irresponsible.

We should all celebrate that the results of this dialogue that we are starting today will be that Canadians will become more empowered. Individuals and all institutions in Canada, in partnership with each other and government, will find the answers. We want and welcome a public debate on Canada's economic future. Only then can we pave the way for a consensus to be forged on how to compete and to win against the best in the world.

Today in Canada until the throne speech put forward the challenge on learning and made learning part of the national agenda and consciousness, few Canadians placed the priority where it belongs. Now Canadians have a basis to consider launching themselves on a new journey. The rewards for each will be great if we put ourselves and our children firmly and for all time on this new path. Prosperity and personal growth will be the outcome as we confidently take on the world.

Business as usual is not an option. To fail to respond to this challenge ensures our economic decline. We would be left behind as other nations redouble their efforts to outperform and outcompete us.

We will rob our lives and our nation of the enormous potential that is ours.

[Translation]

The Prime Minister, the Right Hon. Brian Mulroney, stated forcefully at the First Ministers' Conference in 1989 that we must launch a collective study of our education system, its relationship to Canadian competitiveness and its relevance to the international challenges of the year 2000.

His expression of leadership was positively received by all provincial premiers not as an attempt by the federal government to intrude into provincial jurisdiction but as a recognition that this truly was an issue of interest and importance to all Canadians.

I trust, Mr. Speaker, that we can all have the self–assurance and confidence to consider this paper and input from any other source objectively and start a national dialogue.

All hon. members and all Canadians should consider this challenge very carefully.

[English]

In doing so every member of this House has the opportunity, if not the duty, to do the right and responsible thing, to boldly assert leadership and help Canadians realize their full potential and secure their prosperity into the 21st century.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, I suspect that the emotion I feel right now is not different from that of other Canadians who have tuned into this speech and presentation by two ministers, one on prosperity, one on the need for training, with a sense of hope.

I got up this morning at 7 a.m. and came down to Parliament Hill for an eight o'clock briefing behind closed doors to be given some background information as the opposition employment critic with a sense of hope. I come from a riding that suffers tragically high unemployment, among the highest in the country. I come from a constituency where every family has some members, and in many cases a majority of members, who have left not only home but their province in desperate search for work. I come from a part of the country where we need more training. We need to give people the skills that are required to be competitive in the national economy and in the increasing global economy.

All I feel having heard the speech of the Minister for International Trade and the Minister of Employment is that I have been the victim of a cruel hoax.

The Government of Canada has not laid before the people of Canada today propositions, proposals, dealing with plans to enhance our prosperity or plans to give Canadians the skills they need, the tools they need to contribute. No, there is nothing specific. It has given us a report that tells us there is a crisis. After seven years of government, almost eight years, these ministers stand up today and with a sense of pride and with great alarm, as if they discovered it just yesterday, they ask us, did we know after nearly eight years of government, do we Canadians know.

They want us to know. They want us to be alarmed because they just found out their alarm. At what? That we have one of the highest high school drop–out rates in the world after nearly eight years of this government, that we face a critical shortage of scientists and engineers after nearly eights years of this government, that we are ranked eleventh in responsiveness of our school system, that we are ranked twentieth out of twenty–four in the effectiveness of our training programs world–wide, that Canadians companies spend only one–half, 50 per cent as much as American companies on training, and that less than 50 per cent of current adults have completed high school, that only three out of ten adults in Canada read properly.

This is the report card of the government on itself after eight years. It is a report card of failure. It is an admission of failure after eight years.

What are the facts? It takes tremendous nerve and a small degree of backbone. It takes, as we say in Newfoundland, a lot of guff. As we say in Newfoundland, you bought the face of a robber's horse as it departs the scene of the crime to stand in the House and say, as this minister has just said, and I wrote it down: "We are going to put education at the front of the national agenda". We, this government, this Mulroney administration that has been in power nearly eight years, is telling us today, October 29, 1991: "We are going to put education at the front of the national agenda".

What has this government done in the area of education? It has been in power now going on eight years, what has it done? It has reduced contributions to post-secondary education funding since 1986. Between 1986 and 1994, the formula calls for a $9.5 billion cut for education.

Today it wants us to believe that it is going to put education at the front of the national agenda. That takes nerve. There is a better word than that.

This is the government that has frozen Canada student loans at the same level they were at when it came into power in 1984. Most recently, it has introduced a 3 per cent tax applicable for the first time this year on student loans. Imagine, Mr. Speaker, the student who is wealthy, no tax; the student who is among the poorest in Canada who is required to get a loan now pays a tax on his loan. The bigger the loan, the bigger the tax.

This is the government that has the nerve to tell us today that it is putting education at the forefront of the national agenda, taxing education, taxing student loans. This is the government that applied the GST to books and to other student aids, brought in the GST and did not exempt education, but applied it. Yes, tuition fees are exempt, but books and other learning aids are not exempt.

The government has announced its large campaign to deal with functional illiteracy. What did it announce? It announced that roughly 5 million Canadians are functionally illiterate in this country. It has announced a $20 million program for five years to combat illiteracy. It just told us, in its statement, that 3 out of 10 people are functionally illiterate. The government is going to spend $4.40 per illiterate Canadian annually. It is slightly more than one penny per day per functionally illiterate Canadian.

The government has just moved education to the front of the national agenda and 1.3 pennies per day per functionally illiterate Canadian will be spent in the great campaign that this government has launched to deal with illiteracy.

This government says it is going to consult. It says that this is a real effort to consult. It wants business and labour and government working together in harmony. If we did not know better we would think today's announcement was the latest script for the Smurfs television program, it has such childlike delight in its simplicity and, might I add, phoniness.

The minister who just spoke, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, announced on January 14, 1991 the creation of the Canadian Labour Force Development Board. Here is the minister's press release and I want to quote him: "The Canadian Labour Force Development Board will play a key role in developing a training culture and a commitment to training excellence. It will advise on national training and labour-market adjustment priorities." It goes on for several more paragraphs to talk about this board and its position at the key, at the nerve centre of training and development in Canada. Its role is to bring together all the players in the community and to advise government.

Yesterday, I spoke to one of the co-chairs of that board. He told me something I find absolutely incredible and astonishing. The co-chairman told me that they had not been consulted on the minister's discussion paper on training released today. That is what he told me. He told me further that the board would not be participating in the consultations once the paper was released. That is what the co-chairman, Gerard, told me yesterday. He told me that the board will not play any role in this consultation process.

What is the reality? I want Canadians to know the reality. The government has announced in an initiative today—mark it down, October 29, 1991—that is at least a $20 million initiative. We got that in the briefing this morning that I came to. There is $2.5 million so far estimated to be spent on community-based town hall consultations, $7.5 million so far for a secretariat for this new prosperity training committee, $5 million estimated so far—listen members opposite—for advertising, for communications for this secretariat, and an undetermined amount of money to be used for giving contracts to consulting agencies to write papers for the secretariat.

Now we are up to $20 million and that is the day it was launched. It will be $25 million or $30 million or $35 million or $40 million to be spent on this so-called effort to put education at the front of the national agenda.

Let us be honest. There is not one single piece of data, there is not one fact spoken today by the minister of employment or by the minister for trade that we were not already aware of. You can find any one of 25 reports by Commons committees, by various departments of the government, by the Conference Board of Canada. I participated in a report in 1981 that looked at a lot of these problems emerging which have since been grandly exacerbated by this government. There is nothing new.

Is the government today in the business of trying to address the problems of prosperity or the need for prosperity? Is it really in the business of trying to address a government that has cut arbitrarily transfer funds, given no money for illiteracy, piled taxes on poor students? Is it really in the business of promoting education? Or is this government using $20 million and a third party to resurrect a dying government, led by a leader who no longer wants to be leader? Imagine, a government led by a Prime Minister who is actively flinging his résumé around looking for a new job, trying to convince us now after eight years that it is serious about the mess of the economy and that it is serious about training in this country.

We on this side believe in calling it exactly what it is: this is a cruel hoax, this is a farce, this is a government at 10, 11, 12, 13 per cent in the polls—depending on which poll you believe—using taxpayers' money and a third party to try and sell a policy that has been consistently rejected by the people of Canada over the last year or two or three.

If this government had one ounce of shame, it would go out in the slightly frozen turf, dig a hole and bury its head.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I heard the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and International Trade compare Canada's competitive situation with a hockey game. It is quite evident that in so far as government leadership is concerned, our leadership consists of a number of hockey pucks.

The trifle of the discussion paper on education submitted by the Minister of Employment and Immigration is called Learning Well and Living Well. What we have heard today demonstrates that the first part of the title should have been, in respect of this government, "Learning Slow and for Canadians a Living Hell", if one pays attention to what my colleague had to say about the terrible toll of unemployment and misery that has been imposed upon Canadians by this government through its policies. To the extent that it has any policies having to do with the economy, these have consisted of such things as the GST, a high dollar, high interest rates, and so on, which perhaps I will say something about a little later.

Only a government that did not know its way would pay a million dollars to an American Harvard professor to tell Canadians that this country is too resource dependent, that it should have more manufacturing, that it does not have enough scientists, that it does not have enough technicians, that education needs to be enhanced and reformed so that Canadians can compete.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): What was their first clue?

Mr. McCurdy: That was evidently the clue that did it. However, what one has to realize is that what we are hearing today is nothing new. It took all this time for it to penetrate into the minds of this government that we have a serious problem with respect to education and training, research and development, and science and technology.

I can recall the government convening an economic conference in 1985 and subsequent to that it has had all kinds of forums, in Halifax, Toronto, Saskatoon, Winnipeg, and Vancouver in respect to education, in respect to science and technology. It has had the National Advisory Board on Science and Technology. It has any number of specialist organizations speaking on behalf of the technology industry in this country. Every one has said the same thing. Yet for seven years this government has absolutely ignored the fact that we have fewer scientists and engineers than Japan, Germany, France and Great Britain and practically every one of the industrialized nations. Almost everyone who has looked at our situation has realized that Germany, Japan and even the United States—my God, in some respects even Mexico—outstrips us in producing trained workers.

I cannot understand how it is possible for a government to come before the Canadian people today and shock Canadians into understanding what has taken this government so long to understand and it is that it has been on the wrong track.

In fact, back when the free trade debate was going on, a great many of us pointed out that to enter into a free trade agreement such as this country did with the United States was going to confront our nation with a considerable challenge that the free trade agreement by its specifics did not allow us to meet.

In negotiating the deal, the government looked at the Canadian economy in the traditional sense that resources would somehow carry us through and we could give away all of the tools for improving Canada's manufacturing sector and improving Canada's performance. It had already become clear that we had to improve our performance in respect to value added. In fact, if we were going to enter into an agreement with the United States, we said as a party, then we should not open up the economy completely to competition from the United States unless we took the steps to correct the structural deficiencies in our economy.

I notice that as usual our Minister of Employment and Immigration talks about people in terms of national assets. He talks about human resources. I think this demonstrates the difference between the attitude of this government and my party. This is a government that speaks exclusively on behalf of those that would use what is in this country to make a profit. Everything out there, our resources and so on, are tools for making money without paying any attention to the human values and the human concerns that we think are most important.

We said that before we enter into such a free trade agreement with the United States, among other things, we should look at the capacity of our people to exercise their creativity and their capacity to innovate, to develop their skills so that they could reap the rewards of their efforts and not have someone else reap their rewards on their behalf using those people on whose behalf we speak as their resources for making profit.

If this country is going to grow and prosper it is perfectly clear that we are going to have to look upon this as an effort in which we are engaged together. I heard the Liberals talk about the failure of this government with respect to economic policy, its failure with respect to research and development policy, its failure with respect to educational leadership and so on. Just as this government cut back on transfer payments for post-secondary education, just as this government cut back on investment in research and development, just as this government has failed to provide the support for increasing our capacity to innovate, just as this government has in fact attacked post-secondary education, attacked research and development in so many ways, the previous government is just as much guilty as this government is in its failure because of Canada's position economically, in competition with other nations in this world, has deteriorated over the last seven years. It started deteriorating 20 years ago under a Liberal government that was just as much a failure as this government is.

We have the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and International Trade, a minister who as Minister of Finance completely ignored the pleas from this side of the House to do something about increasing investment in R and D. When this minister was Minister of Finance, he was the one that caused the Prime Minister's promise, that there would be a doubling of expenditures in research and development in this country, to be broken.

It is this Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and International Trade, whose high valued dollar has caused almost a collapse in research and development and technology transfers in the automotive industry as testified to by reports from his own department which demonstrate that to be true, and there has been no compensation for that.

Mr. Speaker, our party is for consultation. Our party is for the participation of the people in doing something to improve the lives of Canadians, to ensure that Canada will prosper and that its citizens will have the benefit of a good livelihood based upon knowledge, training and skills.

We are outraged that this government should be suddenly shocked or pretend to be shocked by the fact that Canada faces an educational crisis and an economic crisis. This party was warned that this was happening for seven years, and before that.

We have made specific suggestions, some of which I find discussed in the government document on education, such as a grant levy system on industry to improve industry's performance and training, and a training and educational pool for youth. We have made suggestions for increasing the allotted money provided for universities and have asked for six years for a negotiated approach by the federal and provincial governments to university financing.

We have talked for seven years about increasing the amount of money provided to the granting councils. We can stand here and list, one by one, the propositions we have advanced for improving training, improving education and for providing national leadership with respect to educational goals, all of which have been ignored.

Now the minister stands before us and says: "My God, it is the proudest moment in my life". He stood up and said what we have been saying for seven years.

I am glad that this slow learning government has caught up with the rest of the country. It has caught up with those of us who have tried to speak on behalf of this country, but it pretends that it is acting while the iron is hot.

The iron has already cooled. I hope the Canadian people, however, will put a fire under it so that this government will begin to act, not talk, not delay, not pretend to be an advocate and a participant in increasing our capacity as a country to prosper.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Guy Saint–Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from residents of Ottawa and Nepean concerning the gun control bill. Your petitioners declare that access to firearms is a critical factor in cases of homicide, accidents and suicide; that many types of weapons easily available in Canada are not required for legitimate purposes such as hunting and competitive shooting.

Your petitioners therefore pray and call upon Parliament to pass legislation prohibiting the possession of firearms by any person with a criminal record.

Is there unanimous consent for introducing amendments, without notice, at the report stage of Bill C-40?

[English]

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, I rise on that point. There were discussions in committee last night and there was an understanding that we would allow the minister and any other member of the House to make amendments to this legislation in order to see if we can find some agreement on an issue which is outstanding and on which we believe there has been some progress.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent of the House?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Churchill said just now, the committee met last night, and we discussed Bill C–40. I believe that the three parties represented on the committee agreed in principle on the substance of the bill. However, it was clear after some lengthy debates in this committee that hon. members, and especially the hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River and the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam, had some reservations about clause 7(b). At that point, Mr. Speaker, I said that after the committee adjourned, which was around 11 p.m, I would consider the matter of clause 7 (b) and try to work out an amendment satisfactory to all parties concerned, including my colleagues from Kenora—Rainy River and Mission—Coquitlam, Canada Post and the president of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers, Mr. Parrot.

This morning I talked to Canada Post, and I had a meeting with Mr. Parrot. Without wishing to assume that both parties agree with the amendment, I do believe this amendment could be helpful and perhaps enable the House to expedite this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, as you know we are in a rather difficult position. We have received notice that there will be a general postal strike across the country as of 12.10 p.m. today.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I would like to introduce the following motion:

> That Bill C–40 be amended by striking out lines 4 to 7 on page 4 and substituting the following: "employer and the union are in substantial agreement on the coming into force of this Act and the matters, including salaries, on which they subsequently agree and incorporate into the collective agreement the contractual language on which they are substantilally agreed or, if there is no such"

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Chair will take the motion in amendement moved by the Minister of Labour under advisement, but that being said, and in order to expedite matters, the Chair would like to give the benefit of the doubt, for the time being. I will recognize the Minister of Labour if he wishes to take the floor. The Minister of Labour.

Mr. Danis: Mr. Speaker, in my conversations with the president of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers, it was clear that one of the items on which Mr. Parrot has taken a firm stand is salaries, because the question arose during our discussion before the committee and also during my many meetings with Mr. Parrot. This morning, after talking to Canada Post, I can inform hon. members that — Canada Post has shown another sign of good faith. I have been saying from the beginning that both sides have been showing good faith, even though I know now of course that it is not possible for the parties to reach an agreement. I believed and I still do that they are both sincere and both bargaining in good faith. To that effect Canada Post has indicated to me that there was in fact substantial progress and agreement on wages during the Gold mediation. They agree that a decision from the arbitrator should come quickly on that matter. Canada Post, again as a sign of good faith, is prepared to give an advance on increased wages pending a settlement.

[English]

As a result of that offer of good faith by Canada Post I would now ask my colleagues to show the same amount of good faith and try to adopt this legislation quickly. I would hope that as a result of the statement which I have just made on behalf of Canada Post, on behalf of the minister responsible for Canada Post, Mr. Parrot would hold off on his threat of strike action and that we could get this dispute resolved in a responsible way without a work stoppage. That would certainly be in the best interest of everyone in this House and in the best interest of all Canadians, including the best interest of the workers of the Canadian Union of Postal Employees.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Chair can now rule that the motion in amendment moved by the Minister of Labour is in order.

[English]

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to make a few comments on behalf of the opposition and the Liberal Party as they relate to the negotiations and discussions of all members involved in this particular back–to–work legislation, Bill C–40.

One of the areas of major concern last night in committee was clause 7. If we look at clause 7 very carefully it suggests to the arbitrator that the conciliation report and the recommendations in it would be used as the final arbitrator's decision if they could not come to some consensus as among Canada Post, the union and the arbitrator on what was decided during the mediation with Mr. Gold.

It was our belief as the opposition and my belief personally that this particular clause would tie the hands of the arbitrator so severely that in essence he or she could not get the job done in an effective way. Yesterday we as a party presented an amendment which we thought would rectify the issue of tying one of the arbitrator's hands behind his back. It was discussed very thoroughly for quite a length of time. As a matter of fact, we did not finish until late last night around 11.30. The clause that we referred to was to allow the arbitrator, as I said, to just take cognizance of the conclusions and recommendations set out in the report of the conciliation board submitted to the parties on August 16, 1991 and not to have to accept the recommendations forthwith.

Having said that, the minister today has submitted an amendment to us in this place. Looking at it first hand, I would say that it meets the requirements that we were looking for. The employer, the union and the arbitrator are to look at the substantial agreement and the issues that were in the substantial agreement through the mediation process, even further than that, not just through the mediation process, but the last weekend that the union and the company negotiated on their own.

It is very important for people to understand that without this amendment the arbitrator would have to look specifically at the conciliation recommendations and not at discussions that took place at the mediation process because there is no information and no report was made by the mediators. It was basically all a verbal discussion. As we learned last night, after Mr. Gold's process, all the information that was dealt with during that time was shredded. It would then become what the union believes was said versus what the company believes what was said and then the arbitrator would have difficulty coming to some sort of consensus. He would therefore have to revert back to the recommendation of the conciliator's report.

That conciliation report was never intended to be an arbitrator's recommendation or report. It was there as a part of the process to help people work toward a final resolution to this dispute.

I commend the minister for having the wisdom to see the difficulties that he was placing the arbitrator in. Arbitrators, as you well know, have gained a large respect in the labour movement and in our collective bargaining process because of their ability to be independent and deal with issues based on the give and take at the moment of the presentations that are made by both sides.

I want to reiterate again the opposition's sense of frustration with this whole process that we are undertaking today. We will tell you very firmly that we will not try and hold up this legislation because it is the will of the government to put it in. But we would also like to state very clearly that the legislation was unnecessary at this time. Before the minister introduced the legislation and the discussions that ensued on Friday, both parties were quite willing to continue the negotiating process. The government was frustrated with how slow things were working relative to this process and wanted to speed it up by introducing legislation that would, in its belief, force the parties to come to some sort of conclusion.

Anyone who is involved in the labour movement more than two days will tell you that the exact opposite happens when you threaten them with legislation. In most cases the company and management feel more comfortable with an arbitrator. They are quite willing to sit back and let the arbitrator rule simply because nine out of ten times, if you take a look back at the arbitrators' reports and the recommendations and the agreements that have come out of arbitration, you usually get a slant to the management side. Statistics will bear that out. It is proof that this kind of situation forces the labour movement and the unions involved to try to work out a settlement without going to arbitration. They feel that the compromises made will always be a step backward for the men and women who are involved in that particular dispute.

Once the government and the minister opposite made that decision to enter into back-to-work legislation and put it in this House, the collective bargaining that we are so familiar with ceased. It was completely done at that time.

I want to say to the government that if that situation continues, it is going to create some significant difficulties not only for this particular dispute, but for the relationship between management and labour in the long run.

It is my view and the view of this party that is not the way things should be done. When we get our opportunity to govern this great country of ours again, we will look at things much differently than this government has as it approaches the discussion of labour/management relations.

I want to verify that by reading into the record a letter I just received this morning from an individual in Scarborough, Ontario, who wrote to me and said:

> Dear Mr. Nault:
> Today on the noon news I heard that talks between post office and CUPW have broken off. As a postal worker this grieves me deeply. On the same news report the minister in charge of postal affairs said if we go back out on strike, he would introduce back-to-work legislation. We, the postal workers are in a legal strike situation. Going out on strike is our only means of getting our employer, the post office, to negotiate. To remove the right to strike by legislation destroys the very essence of our Canadian collective bargaining system. If the employer never has to bargain with us in good faith, what chance have ordinary Canadian workers to maintain a decent standard of living? We have been without a contract for over two years and no end is in sight. Why cannot the parties involved reach a fair and equitable settlement?

That letter was from a postal worker by the name of Stephen Miosich.

Mr. Speaker, I want to suggest to you that it is also my personal feeling that if we take away the right to strike, we are simply suggesting that there is another mechanism in place that is more effective. If the government firmly believes that, then why does it not bring legislation forward which will suggest the true agenda of that particular party. It continues in a roundabout way to change the rules of the game and the process that all Canadian workers are familiar with. It creates uncertainty in the land between management and labour when it comes to the art of collective bargaining.

Mr. Speaker, I realize that time is short today and I do not want to tie this up. I want you to know that when all is said and done, this is not good legislation. I suppose it is the best we can put forward when you consider the ideology of the government. I hope that the arbitrator chosen will have a tremendous sensitivity to the difficulties in Canada Post.

I want to make this very clear to all people who are listening out there today. The arbitration that was put in place in 1987 did not rectify the problems at Canada Post. The arbitration process that we are putting into effect here today through this back-to-work legislation will not rectify the problems at Canada Post. Only good faith bargaining can do that for Canada Post and its employees. I hope that people realize that the sooner we put that mechanism to work and allow them to improve their differences, the sooner we will get good postal service in Canada.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I would first like to say that this caucus is pleased that the minister took us seriously last night and understood the kind of concerns we were expressing. When the minister introduced his amendment today, he talked about good faith being shown by Canada Post. Based on what the letter that we tabled in a committee meeting last night said, there was a serious question about good faith. That letter really highlighted why we, the New Democratic Party caucus, were terribly concerned about what was in clause 7.

We appreciated the minister's arguments that what we were seeking in clause 7 was indeed already there. That was an assurance that clause 7, which talks about what would be taken into account by the arbitrator, would include the Gold mediation and the matters that were agreed to while the mediation took place. It would include the Lapointe conciliation report recommendations, at least in terms of looking at where they belong and not having them superimpose anything that was subsequently negotiated between the two parties with Mr. Gold, or subsequent to Mr. Gold reporting out, and any other discussions or substantive agreements that were made between the time Mr. Gold reported out and the time that this legislation becomes law. As you know the two parties continued to negotiate over the weekend. There were matters on which there was substantive agreement throughout the whole process and although they had been agreed to in principle, they had been sent away for drafting. In collective bargaining when there is an agreement in principle, material is sent away for drafting. When it comes back to the parties they review it and at that point if they agree that the wording is appropriate, they sign it off.

In this instance because things moved rather quickly, there were a number of items that had been agreed to in principle and had been sent for drafting or were awaiting signing off. Matters overtook those items on the agenda and bargaining broke off.

We were concerned about those items that had not been signed off—although we were absolutely sure that the minister was correct when he said Canada Post was bargaining in good faith—because of the letter Mr. Parrot received at one o'clock yesterday afternoon, after the Postal Services Continuation Act was tabled in the House. The letter said, and I would like to read it:

> During the course of these negotiations, in an effort to reach a negotiated collective agreement, and later in an effort to avoid a strike, with its costs and hardships caused by continued work disruptions, the corporation made several proposals and offers and agreed to various texts and positions. It now seems apparent at this late hour that this effort, including all the most recent concessions the corporation has made, has not helped us to attain our goal of a negotiated collective agreement.
> This is to advise you that any and all of the corporation's positions, offers and proposals made through the mediator or otherwise, after midnight of August 23, 1991, are withdrawn. This includes any language, propositions, offers and proposals that were accepted by the union with the exception of clauses signed by the parties during the mediation process.
> The corporation's position now reverts to the recommendations of the conciliation board, chaired by Mr. Lapointe.
> Mr. Courville, Chief Negotiator, Canada Post.

We were somewhat alarmed when we saw a letter from Canada Post saying "everything that has been agreed to after the date of August 23 is now no longer in agreement", unless it has been signed off. Many, many items were substantially agreed to, both with the mediator, Mr. Gold, and in bargaining that took place with the two parties after Mr. Gold signed off.

So we are very, very pleased that the minister has taken account of our concerns and introduced this amendment to clause 7.

One of the important factors is that often those who have not participated in the collective bargaining process lose sight of the fluidity of bargaining. We understand and surely the minister and both parties understand that when you are bargaining, things change. Something is offered in return for something being taken off the table, or something is agreed to in return for something else being put on the table.

In a definitive way to say that unless it is signed off it is not going to be covered by this bill would have been a disaster in terms of hours and hours and days and days and weeks and weeks of very tough bargaining on everyone's part. It is very important that the minister has introduced this amendment and is in fact allowing all of that hard and good work that was done to be taken into account by the arbitrator.

I think it is also very important at this report stage to know that there was another substantive clause that we expressed considerable concern about. That clause was clause 5, paragraphs (3)(a) and (3)(b). This clause in essence covers the time period that began August 24, 1991 and ended at 3 p.m. Eastern Daylight Time on September 5, 1991. At that period of time there was no collective agreement in effect. Rather than extending the collective agreement, the New Democratic members on the committee requested that the provisions in the collective agreement be used to deal with people who had been disciplined or discharged in that time period. The government has set those dates aside and provided a clause that does in fact provide for arbitration. However, it also provides that those people will not be returning to work or will not be at work while they are waiting for an arbitrated settlement.

We in Canada have always prided ourselves in an attitude of innocent until proven guilty. We have, the minister tells us, 71 people who will not be working at Canada Post until the arbitrated period is finalized for those people who were fired during that winter. What we have therefore is a situation whereby a number of workers who in some instances have been disciplined or discharged for very minor things will in fact be away from work for a long period of time. It has already been two months that those workers have been unable to attend work, have not received pay, are not eligible for unemployment insurance because they have been discharged or are not eligible for welfare in many provinces because they have been discharged. In fact they must now wait for an arbitrated process.

The minister tells us he will facilitate a fairly quick review of those arbitrations. He will ask the arbitrator to facilitate a quick review and try to deal with those whose transgressions are of a more minor nature.

The fact remains that by leaving this clause as it is in section 5, we are taking the position that all those people who have been discharged had been discharged for good cause, are guilty of whatever they have been accused of and should therefore pay a further penalty.

We had asked that this section be amended by adding at clause (c) that the employee should be reinstated during implementation of the process under sections 3(a) and (b). We felt that it was a fairly simple but humane way to go. Last night the committee chose not to agree with us. I think it is very important that we remember the basic principle of innocent until proven guilty.

In conclusion, I would like to say that we would very much like to see this matter settled. We feel very strongly. We are opposed to this legislation. We are opposed to legislating people back to work before they have even gone on strike. In essence this legislation almost says: "We are taking away your right to strike".

It is very important once this legislation is completed and the arbitration process begins that the House of Commons and the committees that are responsible take a very serious look at collective bargaining in the federal sector. Under this government we have had back-to-work legislation nine times. Every time we get back-to-work legislation it is a further indictment of the failure of the collective bargaining process under the federal laws and under the federal government.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I would like to engage in a few minutes of debate on this matter.

As I see it this has been a very interesting process, one in which I have maintained a considerable amount of interest. For the first couple of years of this Parliament I served as the New Democrats post office critic and have been very pleased with the results of the work of my colleagues the member for Churchill, our new post office critic, and the member for Mission—Coquitlam, our party's labour spokesperson. I believe that a lot of the work they have been doing in the last few weeks has helped to build an understanding by members in this House and people across Canada of the collective bargaining process and its value in our society.

What we were seeing on our television news screens and in the pages of Canadian newspapers over the last little while has been the process of collective bargaining.

The Canada Post Corporation and the Canadian Union of Postal Workers have been sitting down daily for six weeks and going through word by word, clause by clause, and paragraph by paragraph parts of a very difficult matter, trying to negotiate a collective agreement, something that had failed on numerous occasions.

That collective bargaining process ended just a very few short days ago with all parties acknowledging that in fact they were very close to a settlement. The collective bargaining process had almost achieved a success in what has been a very difficult and long discussed process.

I felt very confident that in fact this matter would be settled through the collective bargaining process. Despite the fact that I have a great deal of concern about the direction that Canada Post has been taking in recent years, the move toward privatizing postal outlets and the privatizing of the whole retail network has been of great concern to me.

The use of contract and part-time employees was of great concern to me, as was the whole sense that management was expressing that in fact the workers were to blame for much of the problems at Canada Post and management direction was not the cause of any of the problem. Despite the fact that I have great concern in those areas, I was relieved to hear that among the many clauses in a potential collective agreement there was considerable agreement between parties.

I was most disturbed to see the letter—and my hon. colleague from Mission—Coquitlam raised it just a few moments ago—from Canada Post indicating that as far as it was concerned because of this legislation all agreements it had reached with members of the union after August 23 would be withdrawn. In fact, those hours of dedicated collective bargaining were virtually thrown out the window.

I cannot express strongly enough how disappointed I was that Canada Post, the management, the corporation, would say that in fact those negotiations were for nothing.

Therefore I thought the reasonableness of the process, the potential success of the process, just lost all credibility because the corporation was going to step backward and give up these matters which had been agreed to through the collective bargaining process and, had a final agreement been reached, would have been accepted happily by signing the collective agreement. With the bringing in of the stay-at-work legislation, this government has essentially allowed the corporation to maintain its position. I am quite happy to know that amendments are before us that will in fact clarify this matter further and perhaps will settle it.

I very much appreciate the work of all parties in this regard because there is nothing more difficult than reaching agreements in difficult situations, situations where emotions run high. There is no question that there are philosophical differences relating to this collective agreement as well as simply practical administrative matters. I have been listening carefully to the remarks that have been made in the House. I just want to put one thing on record that I think is most important before we go on in this process relating to this legislation. When the minister introduced this legislation he used in his justification words to the effect that seniors needed to get their cheques. I could not agree more.

The phone calls to my office indicated that a disruption in service at Canada Post would be most detrimental to the quality of life and the ability of those people on fixed incomes who rely on Canada Post to deliver that income to them to maintain their lives.

It was not necessary, I thought, to justify the stay-at-work legislation, given that Canada Post Corporation was presented with a suggestion by the Canadian Union of Postal Workers to ensure that the delivery of these cheques would be carried out. In fact my colleague, the member for Churchill and now the NDP's postal critic, was quite angered by Canada Post's refusal to ensure the cheques for senior citizens would be delivered by postal workers on their own time in the event of a disruption. Since September 19 my colleague from Churchill has been seeking Canada Post's participation in a protocol that CUPW had already agreed to. Such an agreement would permit the delivery of cheques to those who rely on mail delivery for those cheques.

In summary, Mr. Speaker, because you have signalled me that my time is about to expire, I want to commend the process that has taken us to this point already, a process that seemed to indicate the successfulness of the collective bargaining process in this country and assure the seniors and others in my constituency that it is not the members of the union who are trying to prevent the delivery of their income to their doors. It is in fact a deliberate attempt by Canada Post to ensure that the blame again falls on the workers when perhaps the opposite is the case.

I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to say a few words here today. I am looking forward to seeing this matter settled in the interest of all Canadians and of ensuring that Canada Post Corporation and this government understand that indeed service to Canadians is the mandate of Canada Post and that Canadians deserve a strong service oriented post office to serve them.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate having the opportunity to make a few short remarks on this very important piece of legislation.

I just want to say that when a corporation basically goes from losing almost $1 billion a year, as this corporation was prone to do in the early eighties, to generating I understand this year close to $300 million to $400 million there is a lot of excellent work obviously being done by both parties.

Management obviously is using its ingenuity in terms of technological change and making sure that there are efficiencies and productivity systems being put in place. At the same time we should not forget what productivity is. The capacity of machines is ultimately the exercise of the will, the co-operation and the support of the work force. We cannot forget that the work force within the postal system of Canada obviously has also done a fabulous job.

I speak as a small businessman who on more than one occasion has borne the brunt of having a negative experience as a result of not getting the mail delivered. I understand the frustration of small businesses in this country when postal service is disrupted. The problems that you have when you are trying to meet your payroll and your payables and your mail does not come in are tough.

Often the letter carriers bear the brunt of abuse when we have a strike with the post office. I experienced a situation last summer in my riding of Broadview—Greenwood where the letter carriers were being publicly maligned because the pension cheques, welfare cheques and disability pension cheques were not being delivered. In our particular area, the stewards of postal stations J and G expressed in writing a willingness to say: "Listen, we do not want to see seniors standing out here in 110 degree heat. We want to deliver those cheques and we are willing to deliver them to those people who are in need, seniors who are having difficult times finding money to buy their groceries". It was a horrific scene on Danforth and on Carlisle last summer. There were single moms waiting for unemployment cheques.

There was a misunderstanding that crept into the community. Those people that were out there suffering tended to blame the letter carriers when in fact they were willing to try and ameliorate the situation.

I can remember communicating with the executives of the post office who said: "Well, no, we are not going to co-operate on this unless all cheques or all mail right across the country is delivered". In other words, it was an almost all or nothing approach. I remember a specific situation where I was out there chatting with some of my seniors. On one particular day a senior citizen nearly passed out almost right in front of me. I called Mr. Lander and tried to express my concern to him: "Listen, I am absolutely convinced that you and your management team are not supporting this kind of action". This is what happens. Sometimes we become remote from the real suffering that is out there. Sometimes we are too quick to blame those who seemingly are on the front lines. In this particular case, I felt that there was a lot of unnecessary abuse being handed out toward our letter carriers.

It seems that there has been a good spirit developed here in this process of negotiation, but I hope that both sides will park their tactical resources and their little jousting resources that they have and get into the spirit that seems to exist in this House today. The minister has expressed so clearly today that both sides seem to be sincere in solving this issue. I think if we can continue that spirit then the people of Canada will ultimately be the beneficiaries.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I have just a few words to say on Bill C-40.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, the legislative committee met last night, late into the night, to work through this bill and to seek the consensus that we felt was necessary to produce passage of this bill today in the House.

We did have some disagreement last night, but at the end of the evening I think we were close to unanimous. We agreed that we had a willing minister who was willing to listen to both sides of the argument and who was willing to take some of our considerations to his people very early this morning in an attempt to come up with a bill that we could all support in this House today. He did that. One of the concerns expressed last night, and articulated this morning by the member for Mission—Coquitlam, was simply that we did not want to lose much of what has been accomplished up to this point through the conciliation process.

Although the members of the committee from the government side, including the minister, felt that the bill as presented yesterday would do the job, there was concern by the NDP and the Liberal committee members that Bill C-40 would not accomplish that.

In the best sense of compromise, the minister did go back to his people and his legal counsel. He told us last evening that he would attempt to bring in an amendment to Bill C-40, particularly clause 7, in the hopes of relieving some of the anxiety postal workers experienced, and felt they would experience, if we did not change that part of the legislation.

The minister did that. From the expressions from the various sides of the House this morning, we would have to agree that he kept his word and did a good job in coming up with a bill that we on both sides of this House should be able to support.

We do not want to lose sight of what Bill C-40 does. It is the legislation that will put the postal workers back to work in the event of a strike. It appears that strike is coming very, very soon. The point of the legislation is to put the postal workers back to work, to do what all Canadians want them to do, deliver the mail.

As I mentioned yesterday in the House, 80 per cent of the mail in this country is business mail. We can think of all kinds of things that can destroy a business. We can talk about inflation, high interest rates and a high Canadian dollar. But the fact is, if we do not have mail delivery, that in itself can destroy a Canadian business. It has done so in many cases.

I have had some dialogue with some business people in my constituency. They are, of course, of the same opinion that mail delivery to their business is very, very critical. We cannot afford another strike, short or lengthy.

I want to congratulate the minister. I think he has conducted himself on a very, very high level in a very, very difficult situation to ensure that the passage of this bill does take place. Again, the objective is to make sure that Canadians have good, continuous postal service. The country at this particular time, coming through a recession, cannot afford a postal strike, whether it is short term or long term.

I believe we have accomplished that in the legislation and in the amendment the minister brought before this House this morning. I am sure that the majority of members in this House can support the back-to-work legislation.

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, looking at this legislation and considering the ramifications it will have for the Canadian public, we can accept the fact that service to Canadians is the paramount issue with regard to Canada Post.

Last evening all three parties had an opportunity to sit and listen to the presentations from Canada Post, CUPW and the minister, and to discuss the issues that are forthcoming today.

We also felt very concerned about some of the issues that came up yesterday afternoon.

• (1210)

I refer in particular to the letter from Canada Post which basically withdrew its total position through the mediation process and its position ever since August 16, where the conciliation had occurred.

I have to commend very much the minister for the position that he took in making certain that we are not going to overlook Mr. Gold's work. He did a tremendous amount of work in bringing together many of the unresolved issues. The mediation process, as the minister pointed out, was very successful. We are very pleased that that did occur.

I guess today we look at the amendment that the minister brought in to make certain that that mediation process is at least taken into account by the arbitrator. The arbitrator will not be going back to square one as CUPW was very concerned about, with very good reason I might point out.

We are very happy that when we spoke with Mr. Parrot he told us that if we could make certain that the conciliation process and the mediation process were guaranteed to come in line, and those areas that had been agreed to by both parties were in place, then arbitration could settle the few outstanding issues that remain.

I really see no other way to settle them at this point. I would support what the minister has said. We had come to a point in the mediation where maybe each party was at the very bottom line whereby no further movement, or not much further movement, would occur. As a result, in his wisdom he left the process to move to a further finalization through an arbitrator.

The minister in following that up did that quite appropriately for avoiding a strike and making sure that proper protection for each party was paramount.

At the same time, I have to congratulate the member for Kenora—Rainy River who worked so diligently at bringing forth an amendment to meet that need. It made certain we did not go back to the beginning of mediation, go back to the point they were at in the middle of the summer. He worked very diligently at drafting an amendment to make certain that the minister and everyone understood that we should be using all of the work of mediation and bringing it through. I think it was through the diligent work of my colleague from Kenora—Rainy River that that came about. So I would commend him very much.

I commend the minister for taking several hours to sit down last night and go through the bill clause by clause, explain the implications of the bill, try to listen very carefully to the arguments and come up with a resolution that all parties could accept.

I did, and I still do, have a couple of concerns with the bill. The first concern that I would voice is the fact that we have some 70 workers who basically over the strike period of time, the 10 days, have been suspended or put out of work. They are not being given an opportunity to be reinstated immediately. I think there are some of these individuals who, through one means or another, were dismissed improperly. They should not be found guilty before the hearing is actually held in their favour. However, the bill does address some of that and possibly will not lead them to the point of coming to the end of all the arbitration. There are 130,000 arbitration cases or grievances that have to come forward, so that process will be speeded up somewhat.

The other area I did have some concern about, and I voice this directly to the minister as well, is the fact that you are referring the arbitrator to Canada Post's corporate plan. I personally do not see any reason to prejudice the arbitrator by suggesting the corporate plan should be part of the arbitration process. I certainly believe that in putting parties up equally, the CUPW group and Canada Post should be able to present their concerns and their arguments on an equal footing. To make it a direction of this bill that the arbitrator consider the Canada Post corporate plan seems to me to bias a neutral position this bill should take in the resolution of this problem that is there.

I do think that we have stilted the arbitrator's opinions somewhat by mentioning the Canada Post corporate plan. However, again I would suggest very strongly that all parties, all individuals, worked together very well last evening and I would give congratulations to everyone involved, particularly my colleague from Kenora—Rainy River and the minister and I would say the NDP for its efforts with that as well.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, I probably will be congratulating the minister at the end of my speech as well, but I would like to congratulate him at the beginning along with my colleagues, the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam and the hon. member for Churchill, and yes indeed the Liberals too for the work which they did, particularly last night in getting some changes to the bill which certainly are going to go a long way toward ameliorating the problem which we find ourselves in today as far as the labour dispute and the contractual problems with Canada Post and the Canadian Union of Postal Workers are concerned.

Nonetheless, Mr. Speaker, I sat in on the committee last night. It is the first time I had been in one of those committees since the back-to-work legislation for the ships' crews and the hospital workers and the Public Service Alliance strike of a while ago. It is amazing how little things change with time.

What we see in the whole labour relations with adjuncts of the government such as the post office is a willingness on behalf of these branches of the government to try to be absolved of the major responsibility for really good faith bargaining when they come to negotiating with their employees.

I think the best way to sum that up is that they depend in all instances, it seems to me, during negotiations for the government to get them off the hook if something fails and they really do not care whether they fail or not. I think the situation we find ourselves in now is ample evidence of that.

I would suggest however that with the bill before us, particularly the amendment which we are discussing right now, in actual fact the government has put the responsibility particularly back on Canada Post. I would only have wished that this kind of philosophy, this kind of attitude, this kind of mind-set, had been part of the negotiations which started at the beginning. I do not think that what is happening here is that the government has for the most part got Canada Post off the hook on this issue.

There certainly was an indication that that might be what was happening in the original legislation. It is to the credit of the minister and his sensitivity for particularly the people involved as workers at Canada Post that we have this amendment.

Clause 7 would have for all intents and purposes negated everything which had occurred up until the implementation of this legislation. It gave a whole new meaning and a whole new weight to that expression where it says we have to go back to square one, although it would not have been quite square one because we did have the conciliator's report in between which did make a few recommendations but in no way was definitive or addressed the major problems of the postal workers. Hence, we of course had the strike. Clause 7 was the reference to where if the parties were not able to agree they would go back to the conciliator's report, ignoring the excellent amount of work which was accomplished under the leadership of Judge Gold. Those of us who watch our news reports almost on a daily basis were able to sense that after Judge Gold became involved in the negotiations, a tremendous amount of progress was made. It certainly is to his credit as well that that occurred. I suspect also, with the respect in which he is held by both parties, he is to be tremendously credited for having accomplished that much.

• (1220)

The fact of the matter is that without the intervention of the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam and the hon. member for Churchill and, yes, to some extent as well the member for Kenora—Rainy River, progress was made last night. The minister was able to be apprised of some of the sensitivities which were involved and I think for the most part the absolute stupidity of ignoring everything which had been accomplished up to that point, including what had occurred between Canada Post and the Canadian Union of Postal Workers subsequent to Judge Gold's leaving the scene in what I suspect was a certain degree of frustration. Nonetheless, as has been indicated in more than one instance, they were very close to coming to a settlement. There were not all that many outstanding issues.

I am not privy necessarily to what those instances were, but I suspect that the legislation which we have before us this morning will go a long way toward solving those issues as well.

There is at least one other part of the legislation to which I would like to refer. It is unfortunate that were was not more progress made in so far as clause 5 was concerned. Clause 5 refers to the action which will be taken regarding those who in the opinion of Canada Post have violated Canada Post's sensitivities in so far as people should conduct themselves on the picket line.

I would suggest that it is tremendously unfortunate that some other form of amelioration of that problem was not brought forward, other than just simply the assurance of the minister, which I do not doubt, where he says those cases will be followed expeditiously. Even so, these people have been without any sort of income for two months. It is difficult to say how long the process will take for the arbitrator to arrive at a decision in their instance. I would suspect that some of them are suffering tremendously and their families are suffering tremendous hardships as result of Canada Post acting as judge and jury and for all intents and purposes sentencing these people to what may very well be a very heavy fine, albeit imposed by it through the withdrawal of their wages.

I would like to emphasize in relation to this whole matter of those who have been disciplined by any company in a situation such as this, for the most part when the dust settles, however far it is into the future after a settlement, often when a settlement is arrived at the union says: "All these people come back or none of us come back", and of course that is a stance which very quickly solves the matter. I think it is to Canada Post's everlasting shame that they did not agree to that.

In 1987 in a similar situation, 42 people had been similarly disciplined, summarily discharged by Canada Post, only to have 38 of those 42 people—or close to those numbers—reinstated which means for all intents and purposes the charges against them were withdrawn. That is tremendously common.

In this 1991 instance, we have 71 people. I can predict right now that probably at least 65 of those will be found to be completely innocent of the charges which Canada Post has brought against them and for which it has acted as judge, jury and hangman.

I really hope that in the case of these people the minister uses his influence to expedite these tremendously sensitive problems these people have as quickly as possible. I even hope that without his interference, Canada Post will take a second look and read the report of last night's committee, read what was said, what was pleaded in relation to those people and reinstate them.

As a matter of fact, there was the case of a part-time worker employed during the strike—we could use more impolite terms—who was charged by Canada Post but continued to work. If substitute employees can continue to work, I would suggest that full-time employees can too.

[Translation]

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, we are in the House today to discuss the Postal Services Continuation Act. This morning, I had a chance to talk to several constituents from my riding of Saint-Maurice, who were under the impression that the government not only wanted to maintain postal services and avoid a strike at all costs, but also wanted to impose all the working conditions for Canada Post employees. That is what people are saying, and it seems this rumour is widespread. However, if we take a closer look at the legislation proposed by the Minister of Labour, it is in fact quite moderate. It is a very acceptable piece of legislation that, of course, is intended to maintain postal services—I don't think there is any doubt about that among most Canadians—but this legislation will also enable the parties to agree on a certain number of items that are still in dispute and could not be dealt with in the past. So first of all, I think we should make it clear to Canadians that the government has no intention of forcing measures down anyone's throat. It just wants our Canadian postal system to function properly.

Listeners may wonder why we are again stuck in this country with a deadlock in negotiations between the Canada Post Corporation and the Canadian Union of Postal Workers. It is a serious problem, and unfortunately, no one in this House has a solution. We could consider the history of the founding of the Canada Post Corporation and also relations prior to that event, to try and understand. However, this is probably one of society's greatest mysteries, and I certainly do not have the answer.

There were people, especially among the opposition, who tried to argue that it was not appropriate to pass legislation at this time, and that perhaps we should wait a little longer. I beg to differ. I think that Canadians, the people we are supposed to represent, have been extremely patient. Mr. Speaker, these negotiations have been going on for nearly two years. They have been talking for 23 months. The process included 78 conciliation meetings, 60 meetings arranged by the Conciliation Board, and 40 mediation meetings with Judge Alan B. Gold. Mr. Speaker, that is a lot of talking. Furthermore, all these discussions cost Canadian taxpayers a lot of money, since they have to pay the bills for negotiations which have been going on for two years.

I find it very difficult to understand why some opposition members say the government should wait a little longer. They say the government should allow another strike and let the Canadian postal system be disrupted again. I do not agree, Mr. Speaker. There are many people in my riding who think this legislation may not be drastic enough and may not be the kind of legislation we need in the circumstances. I am not saying I share this position, but Canadians are becoming exasperated. Many people would appreciate a firmer approach.

However, it is a nice surprise, I must say, to see the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party both commend the Minister of Labour for the way he acted in introducing this special legislation, and especially for his efforts since last August to reason with both parties and facilitate a settlement. This is quite a positive attitude on their part.

It must be made clear that the personal involvement of the Minister of Labour was most helpful. He managed to convince the parties to bargain on good faith a whole slew of items regarding this collective agreement. Unfortunately, we find ourselves today, Mr. Speaker, in a situation where the negotiations between the Canadian Postal Workers Union and Canada Post have stalled again.

Parliament could pass back-to-work legislation to at least maintain postal services, since, technically, there is no strike. We could even impose new work agreements for the next few years on the workers, without consulting them, as the Quebec government did a while back.

I think that this would not be a good idea, however favourably some view this solution. We are giving the CUPW and Canada Post enough leeway, Mr. Speaker, to pass special legislation quickly with the unanimous consent of this House while allowing Canada Post employees to get relatively interesting working conditions.

It is not to ridicule the postal workers or to be envious of them than to say that their working conditions are very good, with a great pension plan and fringe benefits like few Canadians get in their collective agreements.

Mentioning this is arrogant and saying that postal workers have always been well treated is the truth, Mr. Speaker, and I think that we should repeat it to Canadians today.

The other point on which I would like to speak briefly is that a few weeks ago, we had a postal strike that disrupted services nationwide, in spite of the efforts made by management to maintain those services. But there is a more fundamental problem, namely the increasing competition faced by Canada Post. Courier companies, electronic mail systems, telephone companies in general as well as oral communications have been expanding in Canada and throughout the world in the last ten years. This makes it much more difficult for Canada Post. The Corporation must face the competition.

Mr. Speaker, every time there is a strike at Canada Post, contracts which were obtained with difficulty by the officials of the Corporation are in jeopardy. Indeed, these contracts could be lost by Canada Post which would have the effect of jeopardizing the employees part-time or full-time jobs.

Since we live in an increasingly competitive and interdependent world, the Canada Post Corporation and its employees can no longer behave, Mr. Speaker, as though they had a total monopoly and control over the handling of postal services across the country. This is an aspect to which the Government of Canada must pay the greatest attention, since the two parties were unable to reach an agreement.

That being said, Mr. Speaker, I must tell the union members in my riding that I believe very firmly and clearly in the collective bargaining process and the right to strike. In my opinion, those are two essential rights in our society. However, when exercising those rights threatens the very future of Canada Post and of a number of jobs in that corporation and affects our companies' competitiveness, the government must intervene.

Small businesses in Canada account for 80 per cent of the new jobs created in 1991. Everything points to this trend continuing in years to come, Mr. Speaker. Considering the problems caused by the recession, as well as the economic problems in Canada, in the United States and all over the world, adding a new problem for small businesses, a strike by the postal workers, would make it much harder for them to compete. These difficulties must be overcome and that is why the government has brought in this Act to provide for the continuation of postal services, with all that entails, but also with advantages for postal workers who should seriously consider the open-mindedness of the Minister of Labour. The minister should be congratulated for his efforts in recent weeks. Since my time is nearly up, Mr. Speaker, I will conclude by wishing very sincerely that the Parliament of Canada, the House of Commons and the Senate, unanimously and very quickly pass the 1991 Act to provide for the continuation of postal services, and that we can again receive normal postal services for a very long time.

[English]

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to stand today and speak on this bill before the House.

It appears that this is a situation where we have to review exactly where we are going in the Public Service sector. We have to review where we are going in the area of labour relations. It seems to me that what we have seen lately in legislating people back to work, I believe it is four times since the last throne speech, is a labour relations situation from the dark ages.

We have to face up to the fact that we are going into the 21st century. We as legislators and particularly the government must realize and recognize that there are other ways of doing things than the old confrontational methods that we have seen used by Mr. Lander of Canada Post and by the Minister of Finance with his zero rate increase in the Public Service sector. There is a way of approaching a collective agreement and collective bargaining in good faith and looking at all aspects of the people, the job and the industry in which they are in, in the service sector, the Public Service sector and again in the postal service.

We have a situation where the postal union has been without a contract for some period of time. It has been looking and trying to bargain in good faith on the part of the employees, but there is that frustration factor present.

If we look at what has happened over the last few years, the so-called privatization of Canada Post, the closing of rural post offices, the gutting of the rural system of postal delivery, this was done without asking for any input from the members of the postal union or the employees of that union or of the corporation.

It seems to me that if we are going to go into the future in a way that does away with strikes, as so many people in this country wish for, we have to look at the situation and take input from all sectors. We must not only listen to management, or the union and employees or the government. We must look at the situation from all sides and take input from all sides to come to a conclusion.

It is not good enough any more, as we have done in Canada Post, to ignore the employees' side and take the management side and say: "We are going to streamline the system."

I have spoken to letter carriers, postal workers and managers of small post offices within my riding and other ridings. It is clear that these people who work every day delivering, sorting our mail and getting it to us in a timely manner, know how the system works and know how it can be improved, but are they asked for their input? Are they asked how the system can be made better so that service can improve, so that we as taxpayers can save some of the tax dollars with the improvements? No, they are not asked.

The input they could give is ignored. In today's climate, that is simply not good enough. We have to start asking those workers for their input. We have to start taking into consideration all aspects of what management, employees and those who are being served want and need. This is the way of the future. This is what we have to start looking at.

In the minister's comments yesterday he spoke, and probably rightfully so, about some of the difficulties the citizens of Canada and certainly the people in my area are concerned about. I have a very high percentage of seniors in the Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt and the boundary country of my riding of well over 30 per cent. They depend on regular delivery of mail to keep in touch with their neighbours, their friends and relatives and to get their old age security, Canada Pension and various other pension cheques.

The solution has been put forward more than once by the member for Churchill. The members of the postal union offered to make an agreement between the union and management to ensure that the uncertainty of the delivery of these cheques be taken into consideration ahead of time. Then everyone would know what was going to happen and that these cheques would be delivered to the people who so badly need them.

What did management do? They turned their back on it. They turned their back on the senior citizens and said: "We will wait until we see what happens". Well, the precedent was set in the past. Management agreed in the past to a regular transitional period where service would be continued. Why will Canada Post not agree to it this time around? Why have we got this confrontational edge once again?

If we think back on confrontation we can look at the last postal strike where the postal service trained people as scabs to take over jobs of legitimate employees and union members ahead of any strike notification. It seems that the 19th century method of dealing with employees was once again at the forefront: negotiation by confrontation. For those people in my constituency, that is not satisfactory. I am sure that for most people sitting in the House of Commons that is not satisfactory. For senior citizens, the small business person and those in large industries, that is no longer satisfactory.

We have to look at what must be done. We must get away from confrontation within the labour relations area. We must negotiate in good faith from the beginning and before the collective agreement expires. It is not good enough to wait until two weeks, two months or two years after the fact to begin negotiating seriously. We must look at negotiating from the beginning and go through it.

I do wish to look briefly at some of the legislation to make it known exactly what has happened here. As I understand it, the minister is to appoint an arbitrator through interventions by the member for Churchill and the member for Mission—Coquitlam. The minister has brought in a recent amendment to clause 7(2)(b) of the bill wherein he allows any substantial agreement that has already been reached on other matters, including salaries, to be incorporated in the collective agreement under the arbitration. Then we do not have to go back to square one as it were in trying to reach an agreement under arbitration. That is a major step.

It seems to me that much has been gained over the last six weeks through Mr. Justice Gold as mediator and the union and management. It would be a pity to lose that under the present legislation. I am very pleased that the minister has recognized that and has brought in this reasoned amendment.

I hope for the sake of all Canadians that reason will prevail, that Canada Post and the union will get down to negotiating in good faith, that the employer, Canada Post, will not continue its confrontational methods and will make every attempt to reach a satisfactory agreement. Seniors and small business people across the country will then be served in the manner that they are deserving of.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Danis moved that the bill, as amended, be concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: On division.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): When shall the bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Hon. Gerald S. Merrithew (for the Minister of Labour) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, speaking on third reading of this particular legislation, Bill C-40, there has been a great deal of co-operation since this bill was first talked about by the various political parties in terms of this particular piece of legislation, particularly when it went on notice as of last week.

We had suggested all through this particular dispute that it could be resolved by having a third independent party come in to assess the various concerns with regard to postal services as well as monetary issues between the employees and management.

It was not until the eleventh hour that the Government of Canada came to its senses and appointed a mediator who worked very hard. I understand from the information that has come to my attention that representatives of the Canadian Union of Postal Employees as well as representatives of management attempted in a very sincere way to resolve many of their outstanding differences.

I think it should be clearly understood that labour and to a similar extent management attempted in good faith to resolve their outstanding differences.

I want to say on the record on behalf of my party that we believe wholeheartedly in the collective bargaining process. We want to compliment the participants in the process for coming together with Justice Gold and agreeing on many—I want to underline—many of the outstanding matters that were previously between the two parties.

I think it is important that we recognize that, and applaud the parties and also Justice Gold who tried to consummate an agreement.

Events prior to the appointment of Justice Gold made it in our view very difficult for the parties to consummate a collective agreement. There are many reasons why.

We have the example of management saying to workers with regard to monetary issues and job security that certain things could not go their way. On the other hand, we find that the monetary increases for the president of Canada Post, for the job security of the president of Canada Post were very rich and very rich indeed.

I do not know the exact amounts. I do not have the Order in Council before me, but I am led to believe that it is in the magnitude of $100,000 in terms of salary increase.

Mr Speaker, I want to say to you as the arbitrator, as the individual who is impartial in this Chamber and has the respect of all members, that as much as I respect and admire the Chair, I could not understand or see myself voting in favour of a $100,000 raise for the Chair.

Now, we have the president of Canada Post who is going to get a sizeable increase. There is a colleague in my caucus who phrased it quite well. It is pay-off for lay-off. We also have the situation with regard to the proliferation of closures of rural post offices across this country.

I know members opposite do not really care about rural Canada. They do not really care about those communities, whether they be in Ontario, Quebec or western Canada or in Atlantic Canada. This was another example of the government's economic agenda through the agency of Canada Post which made it very difficult for the parties to consummate an agreement.

The government has had direct involvement in this process because it has been pulling the strings. It has been pulling the strings all along. It was not the Canadian Union of Public Employees which moved an Order in Council to increase the salary of the president of Canada Post.

It was not the union nor its representatives who moved a motion or an Order in Council to give a substantial bonus to the president of Canada Post, was it? It was the members opposite.

The government House leader is the minister responsible. The Minister of Labour must bear part of the responsibility, and of course other things have come into play. They are indirect but in another way it could be argued they affect directly the negotiation in terms of the proliferation of taxes and inflation in the high dollar. What do working men and women do in those kinds of situations?

They have to seek monetary increases. They have to seek some degree of job security for their memberships and the families of those memberships. I know all members, notwithstanding their political partisan stripe, would have to concur that that is a very, very important aspect of the collective bargaining process. It became very difficult, if not impossible. We realized shortly thereafter that it would eventually break down.

There are serious discussions of individuals who have brought to my attention that perhaps the government while negotiations were proceeding wanted to have this particular strike. I do not know how authentic that is, but it is certainly an aspect that we must give serious consideration to.

My colleagues in debate, both in this particular debate as well as in previous debates, have mentioned on the floor of this House that perhaps a commission of inquiry ought to take place with regard to the outstanding grievances at Canada Post that go back for some time and that are disturbing, not only to union representatives and their employees, but I would suspect to middle management of Canada Post, and certainly to the Canadian public.

We need to have an airing of those concerns. We have to breathe fresh air into a process which seems to have broken down. If that is not followed through with, I suggest that we are going to have continual difficulties with that Crown corporation. We are going to have individuals feeling unfairly aggrieved in the process.

I would hope that the minister would give due consideration to the recommendation and the plea that we have made repeatedly on the floor of the House of Commons in terms of a commission of inquiry in order to resolve, once and for all, the problems at that particular corporation.

I cannot allow this opportunity to pass without making reference to some of the words which were echoed in this Chamber by the minister responsible for Canada Post. He said earlier this week, and I believe late last week, that Canada Post was the most efficient postal facility in the world.

What he has failed to tell the Canadian people is of the large number of Canadian businesses which have opted out of Canada Post and which are using private couriers in this country. He has failed to say on the floor of this House of Commons how certain institutions are being affected. I am going to give one example which has come to my attention within the last 24 hours. Medical schools in the province of Ontario have had to place the following words in their application form for the purposes of applicants: "Due to the slow delivery of mail, candidates are advised to submit their application several weeks in advance of this date. Registered mail or courier service is advised if a receipt is required. Collect courier deliveries will not be accepted."

So much for the minister's puffery about efficiency. We have an example here in Canada of medical schools in the province of Ontario saying to applicants: "If you are going to mail in your application, make sure you do it umpteen weeks in advance".

I find the comments of the minister opposite to be ludicrous. I also suggest a very impolite term, not one that I would subscribe to but it has been subscribed to me by others. This is very misleading for members of Parliament to be told this puffball story by the minister responsible.

My colleague, the critic, and his colleagues who have worked diligently with regard to this particular situation were co-operative throughout the piece. We made a recommendation last night in committee with regard to strengthening clause 7 to enable the arbitrator, whoever she or he may be, to enter the deliberations without having a hand tied behind their back. Unfortunately the minister did not see fit last night to accept clause by clause word by word our amendment. But I think he has gone a long way today to accept the intent, the pith and substance of our amendment last night. That is why we on this side have concurred whole-heartedly with the amendment and that it should be passed as it relates to clause 7.

There is no question about the difficulties between the two sides. That has been given in evidence by many speakers. We also have to talk about the public interest. Is the public being served? Will the public be served by a strike across this land? Will it facilitate business? I am not talking about the business cronies of the Minister of Labour who happen to live in the plush regions of the country. I am talking about the small business person who happens to be in northern Ontario. I am talking about the small business which happens to be in Regina, in Gander, Newfoundland, in Nova Scotia or Kenora—Rainy River. Will they be served if there is a strike? The answer is no. I do not think they will be served.

I would hope that this serves a lesson to the government and the political masters of Canada Post Corporation. This could all have been avoided if the government had seen the way it has provoked labour over the last number of years. It is not just through the collective bargaining process. You cannot look at that in isolation.

As I said earlier, there are a number of factors that compound the collective bargaining process whether it be the proliferation of taxes, the elimination of job security for employees which is involved in the collective bargaining process, the monetary elements or the non-monetary elements. This government, in my view, has done a terrible job. I am sure the Minister of Labour in a quiet moment in his study would want to reflect on what I am going to say and perhaps even agree that his government up to the present has been extremely incompetent in managing labour and management issues in Canada.

The Minister of Labour will stand in his place and say: "Oh, yes, but there have been in excess of 80 to 90 collective agreements signed in this country". That is true, but I make reference to the Public Service Alliance of Canada over which he has direct control. They have a great measure of control with regard to the Canada Post union employees. What has happened in those incidents is that we have seen time and time again that the collective bargaining process has broken down.

We believe that this could have been avoided. Notwithstanding that case, I have to say that we will be supporting this legislation on third reading because we believe it to be in the public interest. The minister should not think for one moment that we concur, we consent, we applaud in any way whatsoever the way in which this government has conducted the whole of labour-management relations in this country, and particularly as it relates to Canada Post. I want to make that perfectly clear.

There is clearly a public interest here, as I am sure the minister will want to attest to, and that must be met. We in this party will not be irresponsible. We believe that the parties must come together with the arbitrator and resolve these the outstanding matters expeditiously and fairly. We must keep in mind the undertakings that have been given by the Minister of Labour to the representatives of the Canadian Union of Public Employees as well as senior members of management to do that fairly.

I want to say in conclusion that we will be supporting this bill on third reading because of the public interest.

In no way do we accept, in no way do we acknowledge, in no way would we applaud the behaviour of the government in its efforts to bring labour and management to the table in an environment which is conducive to having collective bargaining in this country. It is very important across the land to bring them together in order that they may consummate their agreements without the involvement of the national government.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, on third reading of Bill C–40, I would like to start by thanking the Leader of the Official Opposition for his party's support for this legislation. Mr. Speaker, as you know it is never a pleasant task when a Minister of Labour has to table special legislation to end a labour dispute. However, I believe this is an exceptional case. As you know, the collective agreement expired on July 31, 1989. At the time, the Department of Labour appointed an experienced conciliator, Mr. Courchesne of Montreal, in an attempt to bring the parties closer together. Unfortunately, after more than 60 meetings involving Mr. Courchesne and the parties in question, no agreement was reached.

Subsequently, the Department of Labour appointed a conciliation board, with Mr. Desmarais as the Postal Union's representative and Mr. Arnold Masters for Canada Post, the employer. Both parties agreed to appoint Mr. Marc Lapointe, a distinguished Canadian and former president of the Canada Labour Relations Board, as chairman of the conciliation board. The board met and sat for nearly 23 months. It held over 70 meetings and made considerable progress, but was unable to persuade the parties to reach an agreement. At this point, the government could either introduce special legislation or make further efforts to try and get the parties together, and that is what we did. I got in touch with the person I consider to be the best mediator in the country, the Chief Justice of the Quebec Superior Court, Judge Alan B. Gold. Judge Gold's experience in a number of areas, including labour relations, is extraordinary, and he has settled a number of major labour disputes in Canada in the past. Judge Gold met the parties for nearly seven weeks. When the judge finally withdrew from the mediation process, he argued that even if he decided to stay on, he did not think the parties would be able to reach an agreement.

[English]

Therefore, the government has gone the extra mile in this dispute by first appointing the conciliation commissioner, the conciliation board and the best mediator in Canada, Judge Gold.

At the beginning of this dispute I understand that there were 310 issues that separated the parties; 260 of them at the request of CUPW and Mr. Parrot, and 50 of them at the request of Canada Post.

I am told that in the three stages the conciliation commissioner, the conciliation board and the mediator settled and agreed upon over 90 per cent of the items in dispute. This bill covers the items on which they could not reach an agreement. I have been told by both sides which ones cannot be agreed upon.

In all fairness, I have heard both sides of the issue separately from the parties. I feel that maybe with a little more effort some of these issues could be settled. I also understand that on one issue they are far apart and it appears to be extremely difficult, if not impossible, to settle.

• (1310)

Having considered all that, I have come to the conclusion on behalf of the government that the way to settle the issue would be through Bill C–40 which would provide for the appointment of an arbitrator to impose the things they cannot agree on. They cannot agree on a number of issues, not because they do not negotiate in good faith, not because they are not sincere, I believe they are sincere. I do believe they negotiated in good faith and I was told by Judge Gold that they did negotiate in good faith.

If you consider that, I feel the bill that we have here, including the amendment that this House agreed to this morning, is a fair and reasonable bill and once it becomes law it will put an end to the dispute.

I do appeal at this time to Mr. Parrot, the president of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers, to have his people back at work. This has been going on for 23 months. I do understand and he kept his word. We did get the 24–hour notice for a strike. I understand now that some people are on strike across the country, but it is not the case in all places. With the co–operation of this House and with the co–operation of the other place, we will have this bill as law hopefully by the end of the day. I do appeal to him on behalf of the people of Canada to have his people back to work later tonight.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of our caucus and especially our labour critic, the member for Mission—Coquitlam, I think it is very important to understand the process that has been going on for the last couple of days outside of this House and inside of this House.

When the mediation broke down late last week, we recognized that there still was an opportunity for the parties to get together and try and resolve the dispute. Both parties to the collective agreement had press conferences indicating that they had come very close to an agreement. I, for one, think that the efforts undertaken by the minister and others to have the two sides get together on the weekend, even though they did not come to an agreement, were useful because it did give them a chance to air some of the issues that were still in dispute.

I think that process has helped with what happened yesterday and earlier today in this House. We have an indication, as a result of the amendment that the minister agreed to and introduced into this House earlier today, that there can be a quick settlement to this dispute. It is my understanding that even prior to the legislation passing the Senate that Jean-Claude Parrot is going to ask his members to return as soon as they can.

That does not mean that it will happen instantaneously. We have a number of different time zones and we have a number of different shifts for postal workers right across this country, but I think it is an indication of good faith that the union is not waiting for the legislation to pass the Senate but is taking all the possible steps to try and have its members go back to work. I applaud them for that move.

We will not support this legislation because we have some fundamental disagreements with items that are in the legislation. We also have a concern with the government's corporate agenda. Even though that is not in the legislation, that is cause for a lot of the disputes that have occurred in the Public Service this year. The agenda of privatization, the agenda of contracting out, the agenda of reducing the level of services to Canadians right across this land has meant that we have had more Public Service strikes in this last year than we have had in the last five years. It has meant that four of the last 40 pieces of legislation that have been introduced into this House of Commons have been back to work legislation, 10 per cent of the government's entire legislative package over the last few months. The two parties did come very close to an agreement. It was very important that in the legislation that will pass this House in a few minutes that the amendment the minister brought forward was introduced.

There was a danger, and I do not think it was a danger purposely put there by the government, but there was a danger that we would have had a clause that would have really tied the hands of the arbitrator. We would have been in a situation under the previous wording where the arbitrator, if he could not find agreement on the items dealt with through mediation, would be forced to go to the conciliation board report and recommendation.

As proof of that, almost immediately Canada Post wrote a letter saying that it withdrew all the offers it had made since August 23, 1991. In other words, it was basically trying to force the arbitrator's hand to go back to the conciliation board report. That meant that we would have lost all the progress that had been made on major issues in the last two months; progress on child care, pensions for part-time employees, agreement on a wage package. In addition to those items, the two parties had worked and had come to an agreement in principle on a number of items dealing with issues and job security to the number of casual workers. Those were very important for the future peace in Canada Post.

It is important that that work not be lost. It was very important that in committee last night and in the House today the minister made it clear that whoever is chosen as an arbitrator must look at the work that was done in mediation and post mediation. That work is too important to be lost. It is very clear as a result of the amendment we have now and the speech by the minister that that is the primary goal of the arbitrator.

Yes, look at the conciliation board, but do not stop at the report of the conciliation board. Take advantage of all the agreements that have occurred since the conciliation board made its report on August 16. It is not only good news in terms of the fact that we will have a very short strike, but it is good news in terms of the long term peace and security and service within Canada Post.

I applaud the minister for being flexible. I applaud both parties for the work they have done to make this possible. I regret that we did have to introduce back-to-work legislation, but that is a result as I said earlier of the government's political agenda.

At the same time, what has happened in this House and what has happened over the last two days outside this House in committee meetings and meetings my colleague from Mission—Coquitlam had with the minister that we have achieved the best deal possible. I would hope the two parties can work to resolve the outstanding issues in very short order.

Also, it is important, as the minister indicated in his speech today, that Canada Post and the Canadian Union of Postal Workers meet early to make sure that the wage settlement that had been agreed to over the weekend be put into place quickly. These employees have already waited two years, since their collective agreement expired. We know that the arbitration process could take, three, four, five or six months. I do not think it would be fair to the employees to have to wait that long to get the pay increase that had been agreed to in committee.

We look forward to the end of this debate.

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Pronovost): The hon. member for Hull—Aylmer, on a point of order.

Mr. Rocheleau: Mr. Speaker, before the question is put to the members of this House, I have a few comments. I agree that the government should act as quickly as possible to settle this dispute and allow the arbitration process to proceed. However, Mr. Speaker, there is an important point I would like to make. In the Outaouais region, there was an attempt recently to close three sortation centres in Hull, Gatineau and Aylmer.

• (1320)

Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out —

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Pronovost): Order please.

The question has been put, and if the hon. member wishes to speak during the period for questions and comments, he is free to do so, but when I put the question, I did not recognize the hon. member for Hull—Aylmer. Now if the hon. member wishes to speak during the period for questions and comments or during debate, he is free to do so.

I would therefore ask the hon. member for Hull—Aylmer to let me know now if he wishes to speak in this debate.

Mr. Rocheleau: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I do, but I will not take up all the time of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Pronovost): All right. Questions and Comments? Resuming debate. The hon. member for Hull—Aylmer.

Mr. Rocheleau: Mr. Speaker, I heard government members criticizing the opposition, although the opposition parties have more or less agreed to let the legislation go through as soon as possible. I have no intention of delaying the process, Mr. Speaker.

However, we could start asking some serious questions about the way the government acts, especially last week, or should I say a few weeks ago, when we had to pass legislation to force public servants back to work. Today, it's the postal workers' turn, and we have to proceed with a bill to impose compulsory arbitration.

Mr. Speaker, one wonders about the irresponsible way this government handles government administration. In this respect, I would like to point out that only a few months ago, people in the Outaouais were being told that a number of sortation centres would be closed, including the centres in Aylmer, Hull and Gatineau. Thanks to the power of persuasion and the support we gave the union and the postal workers, those sortation centres remained open, Mr. Speaker, and we have every reason to be proud of the fact.

However, when the president of Canada Post receives bonuses totalling $130,000— I think it is outrageous, Mr. Speaker, to give someone who already gets a large salary a bonus for doing the government's dirty work.

Mr. Speaker, once again, I do not intend to hold up the process. I am aware that the opposition parties have agreed to shorten their speaking times so the government can get its legislation through the House. I can agree with that because after all, we cannot let a postal strike go on forever, especially when we know that Canadians and Quebecers need Canada Post.

Mr. Speaker, I repeat that the way the government proceeded was totally irresponsible.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Pronovost): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

[Translation]

And the bells having stopped ringing:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a), the acting chief whip of the opposition asked me to defer the vote until later.

Therefore, pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a), the recorded vote on the question now before the House is deferred until 3 p.m. today, when the bells will be rung for at most 15 minutes.

[English]

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I am not sure what the real time is on the clocks. They have been playing with them all day, but I think you might find a disposition for the House to call it 1.59 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent?

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I think perhaps it might be more appropriate to suspend the House until two o'clock as opposed to calling it 1.59 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

ESTABLISHED PROGRAMS FINANCING

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, the Conservative government has struck yet another severe blow to the Atlantic provinces by slashing equalization payments.

In New Brunswick alone this Conservative policy translates into a loss of over $100 million.

[Translation]

Need I remind the government that equalization is a right guaranteed by the Constitution so that provincial governments can provide nearly identical public services?

[English]

The Conservative government has argued that equalization payments had not been slashed but that they were being allocated according to its funding formula. If that is the case, then I suggest that the government go back to the drawing-board and redesign this formula.

The truth is that regional disparities have risen under this government and that the economic stability of the Atlantic provinces has been undermined consistently as a result of Conservative policies.

[Translation]

Therefore, I urge the federal government to rethink its policies so that all Canadians can continue to have access to programs that meet national standards.

UKRAINIAN CANADIANS

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, this year is the 100th anniversary of Ukrainian immigration to Canada.

This is why they came: a country full of oppression, a village full of poverty, a household of despair.

This what they left with: a passport of desire, two arms full of farewells, many eyes full of tears, a trunk full of possessions, a heart full of faith.

This is what they experienced: a wagon full of courage, a trail of determination, two arms full of strength, many hands full of pain, many a fork full of toil, a barrel full of sweat, a rack full of patience, a truck full of sacrifice, a tub full of disappointments, a pail full of tears, an axe full of anger, a bushel of grief, a lifetime of dreams, a heart full of love, a soul full of faith.

Their contribution is colossal. Western Canada has developed and prospered due in large part to these great Canadians.

On behalf of the House of Commons may I say thank you.

TRUCKING INDUSTRY

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, this week it has become known that Canadians will be denied the environmental and economic benefits of new clean running diesel engines which will be introduced in the United States in 1994 because Canadian refiners cannot guarantee an adequate supply of the cleaner fuel for these engines and because Canada cannot decide whether to go ahead with production of low sulphur fuel.

Instead, Canadian trucks and buses will continue to use outmoded engines which produce five times more harmful sulphur pollution. This means that Canada will be stuck with older engine technology which will not be transferable in the used vehicle market.

It means that Canadian truckers once again will find it even more difficult to compete with business south of the border. Their vehicles will in fact be unusable in the United States. Canada does not manufacture its own diesel engines. Most diesel engines are imported from the U.S., and we will not be able to use the new engines because we cannot guarantee the fuel supply. This will cause tremendous problems to the Canadian trucking industry.

It is therefore vital that the government act immediately to ensure that Canadian truckers can survive.

PUBLIC SERVICE ALLIANCE

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Laval–Est): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I heard Pierre Pascau interview Johane Hurens, vice–president of the Public Service Alliance of Canada, on CKVL in Montreal. During the nine–minute interview, she repeated publicly that the union would crack down and cut services to its 5,000 members who worked during the strike. Like many people, I could not believe my ears. Johane Hurens said:

—we have fines to convince people—it is a way to get back at them.

Mr. Speaker, that is reminiscent of the Dark Ages and the methods often used by organized crime, of arm twisting and the Inquisition. Nevertheless, the union will continue to collect dues which will become, I suppose, the ransom paid by these public servants who were loyal to the state and thus become the Alliance's hostages.

I therefore call upon these public servants not to be intimidated by this shameful blackmail, for serving the Canadian people is no crime. I hope that the government will not let them down; I personally promise to defend their rights here in this House and I am at their disposal.

CHILDREN'S SYMPOSIUM

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the symposium "Canada's Children: The Priority for the '90s" began yesterday, continues today and will end tomorrow.

Over 500 of this country's child experts are in Ottawa this week pooling their knowledge to better the lives of our children.

I salute the participants and the sponsors of this important national initiative. It addresses six areas of concern: health, welfare, poverty, families and child care, education and law.

World leaders including Canada's made a great promise a year ago to address those same concerns and thereby end child deaths and promote the well-being of children.

Today children need action to realize that great promise. I urge all colleagues to visit the child symposium, speak to the people there and learn from them.

Afterward I hope we can all come back to Parliament and work together for our children. Let us muster the political will and adopt the principle that children should be the first to benefit from our nation's success and the last to suffer from our nation's failure.

Canada's humanity and future should be tested and shaped by how Canada's Parliament protects and cares for our children: les enfants du Canada.

CYPRUS

Mr. Gus Mitges (Bruce—Grey): Mr. Speaker, addressing the 46th UN General Assembly, Cypriot President George Vasiliou stressed his government's commitment to keep striving for a just and viable solution to bring peace and security to Cyprus.

Recent UN efforts to reunite the divided island of Cyprus and settle the 17-year dispute have failed because of demands unacceptable to the UN posed by Turkey and Turkish Cypriots.

The continuing presence of Turkish troops in Cyprus has served to further exacerbate the problem.

President Vasiliou also stressed that differences must be settled by peaceful means and that democracy and strict adherence to the respect of human rights could be the basis of a solution providing for a united federal Cyprus which would demonstrate that differences could be bridged and trust repaired.

I believe the time has come for Turkey to abide by UN resolutions and get out of Cyprus. I believe as well that the world family of nations needs to create a system of making acts of aggression no longer possible and to reverse similar situations that unfortunately still exist in the world today.

CANADIAN DIABETES WEEK

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, Friday, October 25, marked the kick-off of Canadian Diabetes Week.

Currently over one million Canadians have diabetes. Every year 60,000 new cases of diabetes are diagnosed in Canada and about one in twenty Canadians can expect to develop diabetes some time in their life.

Although more people suffer from diabetes than any of the other currently non-curable diseases, the amount of money given by the federal government for research into the disease is falling behind.

We can only respond effectively to the challenges of diabetes if we understand the issues, risks and options. I believe that we as parliamentarians have a responsibility to participate in this learning process and to encourage this government to put more money into research for diabetes.

Hopefully with awareness and information the risks associated with diabetes can be reduced. Continued basic research will one day lead to a cure, but it will require a commitment from all Canadians to participate in whatever way we can to assist the Canadian Diabetes Association and the people suffering from diabetes.

MEMBER FOR EDMONTON EAST

Mr. Gaby Larrivée (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, most people in my riding of Joliette, as well as in the rest of Quebec, still hope that we will find a constitutional agreement that will be beneficial and honourable for all regions of Canada. Lately, we have noted among Canadians a willingness to dialogue, perhaps for the last time.

Yet, Mr. Speaker, I learned yesterday that the New Democratic member for Edmonton East stirs up passions with disturbing or ill-considered decisions, such as not inviting the French Canadian Association of Alberta to participate in his activities on the Constitution. Mr. Speaker, I want to denounce this hypocritical attitude of the NDP, which claims to promote the building of a united and prosperous country, while at the same time not hesitating to reject outright the legitimate aspirations of Francophones in Canada. There is nothing constructive in this attitude when we are trying to build a country.

PEEWEE HOCKEY

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, members of this House may have heard a news story that ran this past weekend well entitled Indian Players are not Welcome in Quebec City.

A peewee hockey team from Thompson in my riding was told it could not be billeted with white families during the Quebec International Peewee Hockey Tournament because there were six native players on the team. The native players were told they must stay at a native village near Quebec City, while white players could stay with white families.

The comments made by the president of the Quebec International Peewee Hockey Tournament are alarming and insulting. He has demonstrated an abysmal lack of respect for our aboriginal peoples. He has reflected a complete misunderstanding of a modern Canada that is proud of all its peoples. His remarks are totally out of place at a time when national unity is needed now more than ever.

• (1410)

The Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport must step in. He should investigate whether this tournament received any indirect support from the Government of Canada and he should seek an apology to native peoples from each of the team members and their families.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Murphy: I really object, Mr. Speaker, to the attitude of certain Bloc members in this House on this very serious issue.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the recent $800 million federal farm aid package was welcomed by Saskatchewan farmers. Unfortunately leaks by some members of the third line of defence committee suggest that the committee will recommend distribution of these funds on the basis of seeded acres only.

Such a method of payment is grossly unfair to tens of thousands of producers in Saskatchewan for whom summer fallow is a very necessary and sound cropping practice. The land across much of southern Saskatchewan is suitable only for cereal production and does not lend itself to diversification.

These producers are hardest hit by the ravages of the international grains trade war. I therefore urge the Minister of Agriculture to recognize the plight of farmers in southern Saskatchewan by providing a partial payment on summer fallow acreage.

THE MONARCHY

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte Marie): Mr. Speaker, these days, Prince Charles, Princess Diana and their sons are in Canada.

I find it unacceptable that Quebecers have to foot the bill for this visit, especially after the statement made by the Prince of Wales on the Quebec question. He would be better advised to look after the problems in Ireland, Scotland and Wales.

The monarchy is an outdated, undemocratic system that we could easily do without. At a time when thousands are unemployed, on welfare and homeless in Quebec, our taxes are used to receive the royal family.

"THE NEXT STEP"

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, women and children facing domestic violence need somewhere safe to go. In 1988 the government introduced Project Haven to fund the capital costs for emergency shelters. It is important for women to have somewhere to go upon leaving these short-term shelters.

I am happy to say that this government has responded to this need with a program called "The Next Step". This program focuses on the development of interim accommodation for abused women and their children. Here they are encouraged to live independently in a secure and comfortable environment, supported by the community.

Secure housing is a critical step in protecting women and children who have left abusive relationships. Congratulations on this initiative.

SMALL CRAFT HARBOURS

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, within the last 24 hours the people of Tiverton, Nova Scotia have seen a storm that caused one lobster boat to sink at its moorings. The storm has driven two others ashore and pushed a fourth out into the harbour dragging its mooring.

Because of the demand for spaces fishermen have been asking for an extension to the Tiverton wharf for many years. At one time the Tiverton extension had a high priority. However, this government has no policy to extend or repair existing structures.

Mr. Speaker, this is a very serious matter, as I am sure you are aware. Replacing or repairing their boats will be expensive for these fishermen. Their lobster season could be over before it even begins, all because small craft harbours has no money to provide for adequate structures along the coast of South West Nova.

I call on the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to look into the wharf extension at Tiverton immediately and provide small craft harbours with money.

FRASER RIVER DEBRIS CONTROL PROGRAM

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, again it is important to bring to the attention of the House that the question of funding for the Fraser River Debris Control Program has not yet been resolved and that this very valuable program is in danger of collapsing.

It is ironic that we are able to find $100 million for new projects on the Fraser but cannot find the $180,000 to maintain an existing, cost effective, valuable program that is already functioning well. Everyone using the Fraser River, such as tow boat operators, fishermen, hunters, pleasure boat operators, and all of the Fraser Valley municipalities support the continuation of this important program.

I call on the ministers of transport, fisheries, forestry and the environment to get together and resolve this problem as soon as possible.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, VIA Rail is currently advertising a 33 per cent off seat sale for its service between Vancouver, Kamloops and Toronto.

I applaud this measure by VIA to promote its service, but regretfully VIA has not decided to offer the same package on the Skeena route, a service between Prince Rupert, Prince George and Jasper. In fact the government has yet to decide on the future of this remote service.

VIA should promote the Skeena and offer the same seat sale on that run. The government should make up its mind and tell northern B.C. that the Skeena will be saved and promoted.

This government should take a look at the train today.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. This morning, a presentation was made by two ministers, who told us things that Canadians have known very well for a long time, namely that Canada has trouble competing internationally and that we are going through a crisis.

Could the Prime Minister tell us if the government has other techniques to get us out of this crisis than to set up yet another study group that will spend money to find solutions for the government, solutions that should have been found in the last seven years?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend is very well aware of the success that we have had in getting interest rates down close to 6 percentage points since the peak of last year. That is generating support for the housing industry and for automotive industry.

We are seeing now in the broader economic numbers that the strength in those industries is encouraging growth in other industries. We are making progress.

I think what is important for us as Canadians to do here—and it is the primary objective of this initiative that my colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, and I announced this morning—is to draw people's attention to the important challenges that we have in continuing the growth and the prosperity that we have had in the country over the last number of years.

That will be found in a greater focus and a greater understanding of the opportunities in research and development, in learning and education, in investment and in improving the performance of our domestic economy, as well as putting all that together and doing better internationally.

That is the objective of the exercise and that is what we announced this morning.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. minister would be well advised to look back to 1984 when he produced a document that was called A New Direction for Canada wherein he talked about all the same things they talked about this morning.

This morning the minister said these very enlightening phrases to the Canadian public: "We have one of the highest high school dropout rates in the world: 30 per cent compared to 2 per cent in Japan". The minister said: "We face a critical shortage of scientists and engineers". The minister said: "We rank 20 out 24 in the efficacy of our training programs". The minister said: "Canadian companies spend only one-half of what the American companies are spending on training".

This is a condemnation coming from the benches of the government.

I would like to know from the minister or the Prime Minister when we will see action after seven years of failures as admitted by the two ministers this morning.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the hon. Leader of the Opposition has referred to the agenda for economic renewal and in that we talk about the same things there as we are talking about today.

Let us look at what has happened in investment. Time and time again we hear from the hon. member about the investment encouragement that we have provided through the reduction in the change of taxation for small business, the capital gains exemption for small business, the change in FIRA to Investment Canada to encourage investment by foreigners in Canada and the research and development challenge, what we have done to lighten the load of research and development expenditures for small business through the research and development tax credit.

Under our leadership Canada has the best regime for research and development taxation privileges as any other country in the world. The productivity challenge, what we have done to—

• (1420)

Mr. Speaker: I think we will have to move on.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like the minister to talk to the 1,500,000 Canadians who are looking for jobs today. I would like him to talk to the scientific community in Canada today about research and development and he will hear something very different.

These people will be asking the minister why the government will spend another $20 million on consultants and on advertising when we need money to solve the economic problems of the nation.

When will we have that priority first and foremost?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, what my hon. friend ignores totally is the fact that since 1984 Canada has had the best job creation rate of the industrialized countries.

Let us look at the bottom line and understand what is going on here. The primary objective of this exercise is to draw together a wide ranging number of points of view on how we can do better on research and development, how we can do better on learning, how we can do better on investment, how we can do better on reducing the barriers between the provinces and how we can do better internationally.

I have not heard the views of the hon. member opposite, but we are trying to get the steering group to draw together all of these views into a national consensus.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, this minister ignores reality and the reality is that this government has slashed education transfers totalling $9.5 billion over eight years. It has frozen student loans and taxed those loans for the first time in history.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member could put his question.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, this government has taxed books and other educational materials with the GST and is spending only $4.40 per year on each illiterate person in the country.

My question is for the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister give me and any member of this House even one reason why Canadians should now believe this government when it says it is moving education to the front of the national agenda.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to. In the documents tabled today by the two ministers there is a very clear indication that in Canada our total educational expenditures as a percentage of GDP rank the third highest in the industrialized world.

A few years ago we were spending more money per capita than any industrialized country except Sweden, yet we were not getting the results in the areas my hon. friend raises.

High school dropouts pose a serious problem. Illiteracy is a very serious problem. Productivity growth is a very serious problem in Canada, which is why the minister is seeking to bring together labour, management, the private sector, voluntary organizations and the federal and provincial governments into one national commitment to try and get rid of illiteracy, to try and improve our productivity, thereby strengthening the national wealth of Canada.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, this government has launched a $20 million trick or treat on Canadians. It is a trick on Canadians and a treat for the government's advertising and consulting friends.

Why should Canadians believe the government is seriously interested in training when the same government has cut transfers over eight years by nearly $10 billion and has penalized students with a tax on student loans.

If the government wants to spend money wisely, stop this regressive tax on student loans and do it today.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, first of all let me say to the hon. member that the numbers he is using are not correct. We have been increasing the transfers to the provinces for education.

When the hon. member uses expressions like trick or treat, let me say to him that Canadians are fed up to here with that sort of cute political phrase.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Today his government tabled two papers on competitiveness and prosperity and the need for more education, more research and development. I think most Canadians would agree that if there was a report card on this government, it would get a clear "F" on both competitiveness and prosperity.

I want to ask the Prime Minister this question. In these papers it assumes that the GST and the Canada–U.S. trade deal are the cornerstones of this government's policies. Since the introduction of the Canada–U.S. trade deal we have not had an objective assessment tabled in this House on the trade deal or the GST. Will he do that and show us objectively the results of the programs that he has put forward?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, concerning the free trade agreement with the United States, since 1988, the last year before the free trade agreement came into play, our surplus with the United States—that is the excess of our exports to the United States less our imports— has gone up by $3.5 billion. We have seen our exports to the United States go up by $8 billion, or close to 8 per cent.

We have also seen in August the level of exports to the United States at an all-time high.

Surely my hon. friend cannot deny the impact of those figures. Those figures say that the bottom line performance of the Canadian economy has been positive in the area of trade since the start of the free trade agreement.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

The million and a half unemployed and those others in society who are suffering, the over one million people on social assistance, do not see those results.

Consultation is part of the presentation by the government today. There have been many very recent reports, including those by the National Advisory Board on Science and Technology, the Canadian Federation of Students Strategy for Change Royal Society of Canada on the need for more research and development, Action Canada Network centre for policy alternatives, on the kind of economic and research and development policies that are needed.

I note that in the consultation process the Prime Minister and the minister are suggesting that the head of the steering committee will represent organizations funded by mostly multinational corporations.

Will the minister replace one of those co-chairs by a representative, for example, from the National Poverty Organization to show Canadians that he is really prepared to listen to all Canadians on the future agenda for Canada?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend is well aware of the fact that we had some other proposals in mind some weeks ago as to how we would proceed with the steering group. We offered one of the co-chairs to the Canadian Labour Congress. I am sorry that it did not see fit to participate in the steering group but I hope that we will hear the voice of labour through a number of other ways during the course of these negotiations.

My hon. friend talks about Mr. McCamus, one of the co-chairs. Mr. McCamus was born in Ontario. He is the president and chief executive officer of Xerox Canada. She is right there. But he was there when the first ever gold award for quality was won by that company from the Canadian government. He is the founding chairman of the Information Technology Association and is currently the chairman of the Corporate Higher Education Forum. We believe that the qualifications of Mr. McCamus, a passionate Canadian, are well suited to be the co-chair of this steering committee.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question.

What I was asking the minister was simply to make sure that the message sent to Canadians was that this government is prepared to listen to all Canadians. It would be done by putting a co-chair of that committee representing other aspects of society.

• (1430)

Mr. Speaker, my question deals with another topic. The Prosperity Secretariat will cost $7.5 million. For the unemployed, the homeless and the poor, this government's answer is more bureaucracy. Why should these people have confidence in this government's prosperity agenda?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, this is not a bureaucratic exercise. This is an exercise that is designed to allow Canadians in 150 to 175 communities across Canada to feed directly into a process which will give them a say in how this country is run in the indefinite future. It will give Canadians an opportunity at the community base level to feed into a steering group which is not a government steering group, but a private sector-led steering group. It will involve people from social groups as well, so that the voices that she wants to have heard in this exercise will be heard.

I think this is a tremendous response to the concerns that Canadians have been expressing in recent years.

EMPLOYMENT

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I guess that is the difference between the minister's party and our party. He wants to feed into steering groups. We would like to feed Canadians.

Given that there have literally been thousands of Hamiltonians laid off in the last two years as a result of his government's economic policies, can the Prime Minister tell me what I should say to the worker at Newman Steel who received his lay-off notice last week when there is not a penny for retraining programs for him, and yet this government has $20 million to pay for a Tory boondoggle. What should I tell the laid-off worker in my riding?

An hon. member: Don't vote Tory.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): The hon. member should first confess to this gentleman to having fought a measure which this government tried to introduce to provide training money for laid-off workers in Canada. She should do that first.

Then she could point to the agreement that was reached between CIC, the union and the employers in the steel industry which put in place mechanisms to retrain those people and help them to find jobs so that they can earn a living. This is what the hon. member should do for a start.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, while thousands are unemployed in Montreal, Matane and the Ottawa Valley, it is unfortunate that the government can find $20 million to set up a screen to hide its own incompetence when they don't have a cent for the unemployed. Mr. Speaker, how can the government find $20 million for its Tory friends but can't find a penny for the unemployed people in Montreal? Why is that?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it is incredible what some people will say for partisan reasons! The hon. member should recognize that this government will spend some $3,154 billion under the Canadian Jobs Strategy precisely to help the unemployed, and workers who must adjust to the globalization of the economy.

Surely the hon. member can find something in the numerous programs mentioned by Jean de Grandpré; there are 400 of them across the country. And let me tell you that the people in Matane, Montreal and Quebec know how to benefit from those programs.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister of industry and trade. The government's document tabled today says that the focus of the consultations the government wants to have with Canadians will not be on economic issues, like the level of the Canadian dollar, but instead will be on other issues. It says, and I quote, "by the nuts and bolts of the real economy". Why does the government not think that the level of the Canadian dollar is part of the real economy and why does the government not want to listen to Canadians for example exporters that want to tell the minister what the level of the Canadian dollar has been doing to them.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, we are not ignoring the level of the Canadian dollar. We are not ignoring some of the other policies like deficits or levels of interest rates, or anything like that.

What we have been hearing from the experts on competitiveness is that the true competitiveness of an economy is based on the way individual industries and individual people use research and development, use training, use investment, to compete in international markets.

That is what generates the competitive position of an economy. That is the focus of the consultations we are having, but that does not exclude other matters which Canadians want to bring in. We expect they will do that and we are certainly willing to listen and respond to any suggestions that are made.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister and I invite him to read the preface to his own document which sends a different message.

I ask the minister if, in what he has just said, he is not admitting, the government is not admitting, that for the past seven years they have been ignoring what they now say only now are the nuts and bolts of the real economy. What excuse does the government have to offer Canadians for this astounding failure to recognize what is important along with the dollar and interest rates in terms of jobs and well-being for Canadians.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, we have not been ignoring the matters of learning. My colleague has talked about the substantial increase in the amount of spending that we have done since 1984 on retraining people who are losing jobs. We have not ignored the elements of research and development. We have introduced a number of policies to increase the amount of spending and increase the support for research and development.

The same can be said in trying to improve the performance of our domestic economy and also to expand our horizons to other markets, particularly through broadening our trading arrangements both with the United States and now with the multinational trade negotiations going on in Geneva.

All of these, if you look back—

Mr. Speaker: I think we should move on.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, the minister has suggested that he is prepared to take seriously the messages which come from this consultation process.

Across this country 71 per cent of Canadians have indicated that they oppose the goods and services tax. I want to ask the minister if the government will follow what people tell them to do with the goods and services tax in these consultations.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I listened to my hon. friend this morning. I think we agree that we should be doing things to improve the competitive position of the Canadian economy.

I would presume that my hon. friend still agrees with that. He is not nodding because he knows that he does agree with that. The point is that the goods and services tax is designed to improve the competitive position of Canadian companies in the economy, both exporting and competing against imports. That is precisely the reason we brought it in, because the old tax was inhibiting exports and favouring imports against Canadian production.

Surely my hon. friend must realize the impact of that and the importance of bringing the GST in to improve our competitive position.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, there is no question that the goods and services tax has hurt small business in every part of this country because of the competition with the United States.

If the minister does not realize that he is blind. He says that he is going to take these consultations seriously.

• (1440)

I ask him to answer the question and to be clear. Will this minister and this government respect what people say to this government when they speak out against the GST in these consultations?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, let me be very clear with my hon. friend. The objective of this exercise is to find ways that we can compete more effectively as a country.

If people say that they would like something done because it is nice to do but it does not improve the competitive position of the Canadian economy then, no, we are not going to accept that.

As to suggestions and recommendations on how we improve the performance of the economy, improve our competitive position, yes, we will listen very closely to those recommendations.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, in its 1984 agenda for economic renewal the government said: "We have a clear sense of economic direction. However we do not intend to act without seeking the opinion of all Canadians".

Today, seven lost years later, this government is still in the starting blocks. Will the government admit this prosperity document is proof of seven years of failed direction, failed commitment and failed leadership?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, during the seven years since we have been in office this country has led the industrialized world in job creation.

We have been second only to Japan for a large part of that period in economic growth so how can my hon. friend say that these have been lost years? They have been years of great prosperity, but we want to ensure that we continue that prosperity.

I would suggest that my hon. friend, rather than look back and make these political points about the past, look forward to the future, look forward to how we can improve our performance in science and technology, in investment, and in research and development.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, the minister wants Canadians to forget the last seven years. His own document is testimony to his failure during that period of time.

Let me go back to the process. The minister said this morning that Canadians want to be consulted. This is the minister who would not listen to Canadian exporters and manufacturers about the level of the dollar. This is the minister who would not listen to Canadians about the GST and labour. His own document says they are one the key players in our economic future. He cannot even get labour to the table.

How can Canadians have any faith in this government or in this process?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my friend, the Leader of the Opposition, will recognize this quote because it is from him. He said: "We believe that market forces should continue to determine the appropriate exchange value for our currency. What we are doing as we have done consistently for the past eight years is to smooth out erratic fluctuations and the value of the dollar as they occur in the marketplace".

This is precisely the policy that this government has been following. Why does he rail away about the Canadian dollar when his leader has stated what the policy is and continues to be.

I just say to my hon. friend one more time: what we are looking for here is a productive debate on how we can put a firm underpinning under our standard of living. We are starting from a position of strength. We have the second highest standard of living in the world. We are number five in competitive position, but there are those danger signs on the horizon that are clearly set out in these documents.

What we want to achieve is a consensus, drawing on the ideas of the hon. member as well as all Canadians, on how we can improve our performance.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I have in my possession a stack of reports that have been issued over the last five years by people like the Science Council, the Economic Council of Canada, Senate committees, House committees, task forces and working groups.

My question to the government is this. The reports all deal with the same questions that are in the documents issued this morning.

Has the government not read any of these reports, or does it dismiss all the answers contained in all these reports already prepared at taxpayers' expense? What is going on here? Why is there $20 million for yet another investigation of the same questions?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, there have been reports, a wide range of reports. My hon. friend has referred to some; the Leader of the New Democratic Party has referred to others. But there are differences in points of view. Might I suggest that there are even differences in points of view among my hon. friend and the member for Windsor West and the member for Winnipeg South West. There are differences within his own party.

We are trying on a national basis to reconcile those differences through this broad consultation process, drawing on experts in the field, in the steering group that will be bringing forward a national action plan with recommendations for the federal government, provincial governments, territorial governments, municipal governments and the private sector in all its capacities.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, what we are looking for from this government maybe is a point of view. There is nothing in this document that expresses any opinions about what direction the country should be going to solve its underlying problems.

Now that $20 million is on the table, what has happened to all these old reports? Is there nothing in them? Was that money wasted or is the new money wasted?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think the member will see in some of those reports that they recommended the goods and services tax. They recommended the free trade agreement with the United States. The Macdonald commission on the economy—

Some hon. members: More, more.

An hon. member: Why didn't you agree with that?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): For the hon. member to say that we are not listening to these reports or for my friend over here from Willowdale to say "act", we have acted but we also feel it is a good time to reflect on this range of reports, draw out a national consensus for a national action plan that we can all get behind as a country and in that way move on to greater heights across the country.

ENERGY EFFICIENCY

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, although the energy efficiency bill given first reading this morning allows the Governor in Council to prescribe fuel efficiency standards for internal combustion engine vehicles—the greatest source of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases in Canada—the government apparently intends for the time being to set standards only for household electric appliances. In other words, they will regulate toasters but not trucks, tea kettles but not Cadillacs.

My question is for the minister of energy. When will the government prescribe internal combustion engine vehicles and set efficiency standards for them?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, on the latter point, as the Minister of the Environment also pointed out, we have already done that. We are going to look at further CAFE standards in terms of the auto industry.

I also refer, for example, to reports even today that the government apparently has made a decision on high sulphur diesel which is also not the case.

I say to the hon. member: thank you for supporting the energy efficiency bill as it goes. I want to discuss with him even further what other action we should take together.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, given this government's record since I got here in 1988, I would be happy to discuss any action.

Will the government at least take the simple action of proclaiming the Motor Vehicle Fuel Consumptions Standards Act passed by this House in 1982 and use it to set standards at least as stringent as those slated for introduction in the United States for motor vehicles?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I accept to some degree what the hon. member said in the question he just asked, that there has to be some co-ordination, some synergy, because of an integrated auto and truck market and production in the United States and Canada. We should be very close, if not lock-step, to those regulations in Canada.

Those who heard the question should take note that what he talked today about was the U.S. standards relating, for example, to the APA studies, and I accept that, whereas before he always raised California standards or even the new California standards. I would like to ask him: Which standards is he referring to?

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture who recently announced an $800 million farm aid package.

Comments by some members of the third line of defence committee indicate that a recommendation may be forthcoming from the committee for distribution of these funds based on seeded acres only. The minister will know that such a method of payment would be extremely unfair to thousands of producers across southern Saskatchewan for whom summer fallow is a very necessary practice.

Will the minister consider including some form of summer fallow acreage under the method of distribution of this farm aid package?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I recognize the concern the hon. member has expressed. I have not received the report from the third line of defence committee. I look forward to receiving it.

I am sure the representatives of farmers who sit on that committee will also understand the importance of summer fallow as an agricultural practice. As an aside, the environmental practice of summer fallowing has been debated but there is no doubt that paying for fallow takes land out of production on a voluntary basis, which is also beneficial to the whole of the agricultural industry.

QUEBEC'S JURISDICTION OVER EDUCATION

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. One thing Quebecers are most united on is, that the government of that province must have exclusive jurisdiction over training. Business people and unions agree on that in Quebec. Today, the government released a discussion paper which clearly states its intention to defy the unanimous opinion of Quebecers on that issue.

My question is: How can the government reject so blatantly a fundamental consensus in Quebec at a time when it claims to create national consensus?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, obviously, the hon. member is absolutely wrong because under this document, the federal government has no intention of intervening directly or indirectly in any way in an exclusively provincial jurisdiction. We said it many times and I will say it again, in spite of the distortions that the hon. member will make: The Canadian government fully respects provincial jurisdiction in that field.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, if there is one field of exclusive provincial jurisdiction from the beginning, it is education; in fact, this was even a condition for Quebec joining Confederation. Yet this document clearly indicates that the government now intends to invade a field of jurisdiction that Quebec has always fiercely protected. When will the government finally respect the Constitution? When will it mind its own business?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will simply invite my hon. friend to read the document carefully. He will realize what all Canadians realize: that the document fully respects the provinces' exclusive jurisdiction in that field. The Canadian government has said it time and again and there can be no misunderstanding on this issue.

As for my hon. friend's concern, he was on this side of the House when we promoted a program for school dropouts, which involved education, and he was in favour; he was not opposed to that program.

INTEREST RATES

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. This week the bank rate at Canada's chartered banks dropped to 8.5 per cent, which is a good deal.

While the bank's best corporate customers can borrow money at 8.5 per cent, Canadian consumers are being gouged as credit card interest rates remain at 19.75 per cent.

Given that, will the minister reconsider a recommendation made by the Commons consumer and corporate affairs committee to impose a floating cap on credit card interest rates?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, it is an interesting question because consumers should know that everybody could go to their bankers today to renegotiate the loans they have now. Most of the time the consumers are not really aware of the power they have in their hands. I do not think we should put a cap on it. I think this proposal has been rejected over the years. It would be very interesting to tell the people, perhaps in the gallery, the power they have and the capacity they have to renegotiate their loans.

An hon. member: Are you working for the banks now?

An hon. member: Answer the question.

[Translation]

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, in a field where the competition is fierce, The signal that we should give to the banks is precisely to be competitive and urge consumers to renegotiate their loans. That is the best signal that we could send.

RESEARCH

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, I have a specific question for the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology.

More than two years ago, the Prime Minister's advisory board on science and technology recommended that the government double its funding for university research in Canada. Why did the government reject this recommendation? Will the minister promise today to follow up that recommendation?

[English]

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, I think everyone in this House would like to see a doubling of the amount of science and technology in this country. The fundamental question is on that side of the House. They believe government should provide all the money. On this side of the House we believe that is also an industrial responsibility.

[Translation]

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, in the last eight years, the value of contributions from the Industrial Research Assistance Program of the National Research Council has dropped 45 per cent. Now, the government is wondering how to improve the performance of businesses in research and development.

Will the minister commit himself today to increase the funding of industrial research through IRAP?

[English]

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, we recognize that IRAP is a very important program for industry in Canada. Yes, we will make a commitment to look very seriously at that program.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture.

On a recent trip to Japan the minister is quoted as saying: "Japan and all other parties to the GATT talks must be willing to make hard political decisions. Canada will be doing that in several areas where Canadian farmers are protected because an open global market is more important to global economic health than protection of individuals in any one country". Yet he continues to stand in this House and tell Canadians he supports supply management. The minister either supports it or he does not. Which is it?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, first of all the hon. member started out, and I know he did not mean to mislead this House deliberately, saying I was quoted. If the hon. member is fair and straightforward he would say to the members of this House that that is not a quote from the Minister of Agriculture.

In all cases the Government of Canada has developed its support and its policy on supply management with the stake holders, with the producers and we will continue to do that. We have continued to express that position in GATT. I have expressed it in Japan, I have expressed it in the United States and I have expressed it in Brussels. We will continue to express it because it is important to the producers.

If the producers are changing their minds, then he as a member should inform the government. Neither the government nor the producers have changed their position concerning supply management.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I will send a copy of the article over for the minister to read. The minister is also reported as saying that he did not think that there were very many countries that are able to have security of supply within their own domestic borders.

Does the minister believe that Canada is one of these countries that is able to have security of supply for our food production and will he guarantee to this House today that he will not sign any GATT agreement that undermines Article XI of GATT, that is supply management?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the hon. member if he forgot my first response to his question where he said that I was quoted. I ask the hon. member if he would like to table that quote, Mr. Speaker.

• (1500)

In reply to his second question, Mr. Speaker, I believe there is an opportunity for expansion of agriculture and the ability of the world to feed itself. I replied to a question regarding rice in Japan. I said there are two ways of having security of supply for food, either domestically or seeking it from a world that is able to supply it. I believe Canada is able to supply its own food needs and will continue to do that. Canada is a blessed country in this world.

Mr. MacWilliam: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. My apologies for not being in my seat at the time of the vote. I was inadvertently detained.

Had I been in my seat at the time and able to vote I would have voted against this legislation and would like the record to read so.

WAGE CLAIM PAYMENT ACT

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)) moved that Bill C-22, an act to enact the Wage Claim Payment Act, to amend the Bankruptcy Act and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee G.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Before the minister proceeds on second reading of Bill C-22, I just want the House to be advised that our critic, the hon. member for Dartmouth, was here to proceed with the bill as originally agreed to on Monday and Tuesday of this week.

We were subsequently informed late last week, on Thursday, that we would not be proceeding with this particular bill and that there had to be some meetings on the other side with regard to the contents of Bill C-22. We were subsequently informed that we would be dealing with another piece of legislation today and not Bill C-22. It is my understanding that the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader was to have apprised us of this particular phenomenon yesterday, which was now a second change, and we would go to C-22 today.

Notwithstanding that I want members of this House to know that we on this side are prepared to move today with regard to Bill C-22. Our critic, the hon. member for Dartmouth, has rearranged his schedule in order to participate in this debate, which we believe to be very important. I want the Chair to understand that there was co-operation between all parties with regard to the legislation of the House, however it was changed at the very last moment, thereby adding some confusion in terms of what would be coming forward.

We are prepared to proceed with Bill C-22 today.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Opposition House Leader for his cooperation.

[English]

Forty years of drought are about to end. Since 1949 Canada's Bankruptcy Act has remained virtually unchanged as this country's increasingly obsolete foundation insolvency law. That is about to change. It is my distinct pleasure to rise in this House today to speak in support of Bill C-22, the reform of the Bankruptcy Act.

The reform package that constitutes Bill C-22 is a tribute to years of intensive consultations with stakeholders in business and labour, the legal community and the insolvency community.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. minister, but I call on members on both sides of the House to cooperate so that conversations or other exchanges take place in private or outside the Chamber and so the public listening to us and all hon. members can understand what the hon. minister is saying.

[English]

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, the reform package of Bill C-22 is also a tribute to the unprecedented co-operation among members of all three major parties in this House and to the clear and constructive contribution that they have made.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Shefford on a point of order.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank you for calling us back to order, but I would like some clarification from you as to whether the Standing Orders do not require members to speak extemporaneously instead of reading notes, especially those written by others.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member, who has long experience in this House, knows very well that is not a point of order. The hon. minister has the floor.

[English]

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, on this note I would like to take a moment to extend my thanks to the two House leaders opposite and to the chairman of the standing committee, the hon. member for Portage—Interlake, for agreeing to refer this bill for pre-study. I would also like to thank the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations for its excellent work.

I would like especially to express my personal thanks, as I said, to the hon. member for Dartmouth and the hon. member for Nickel Belt. From the day that Bill C-22 was first introduced it was clear that their participation would be well informed and constructive. The contributions they have made demonstrate that they recognize the urgency of the passage of this bill so as to better protect the interests of Canadians within a competitive marketplace.

• (1530)

Mr. Speaker, I know that the wonderful unanimity of members on both sides of the House concerning the need to proceed with the reform will sound even sweeter. We not only can but must amend this archaic law to better protect our workers, to help those who unfortunately go bankrupt recover as soon as possible and to ensure that our businesses have the modern tools they need to meet the challenge of international competition.

Mr. Speaker, the real reason for our reform is to preserve jobs and promote economic growth. In the latest Speech from the Throne, our government promised to devote much of its energy during this session of Parliament to preparing the necessary ingredients for our future prosperity. We said that we would proceed in several areas: establishing clear, realistic deficit-reduction objectives; implementing the GST; exercising strict spending control; making continuing education the rule rather than the exception; and consulting our fellow citizens on ways to reduce obstacles to sustained growth and international competitiveness.

A crucial step in reaching this ambitious objective is to review our main pieces of framework legislation to ensure that their provisions help rather than hinder natural market forces, for the greater good of our fellow Canadians, Mr. Speaker.

That is the context within which our reform project is to be seen—as an essential part of the economic support structure and a major step to sustained economic growth.

[English]

I will not focus on the specifics of the legislation as I know members from all sides of the House are already familiar with them. I would like to speak about the principles that underlie them and I would like to begin by quoting the member for Dartmouth who earlier this year referred to the reform package provisions regarding stay of proceedings as especially timely. He said:

> It is absolutely essential that this type of protection, which they have had in the United States for a number of years, is introduced to a modern bankruptcy act in Canada.
> As we all know, because we have constituents who are in business, all too often secured creditors walk in quickly, seize assets, cut off credit lines, and put receivers in place. Many times healthy companies that, for whatever reason—they may be having some temporary difficulty—find themselves in a position where they cannot go on with their business and bankruptcy ensues.

This from June 19 Hansard at page 2108. This is precisely the reason we are proposing that the current rules be changed to provide potentially viable businesses in financial trouble with the option of filing a notice of stay with the official receiver for protection from all creditors. It is also why we are adding a new Part XI to the act, to impose duties of disclosure and good faith on secured creditors and receivers and to require that a secured creditor give a debtor notice before enforcing its security.

In short we are seeking to put in dealing with the Bankruptcy Act emphasis on rehabilitation, not on liquidation. The reasons for this I think are obvious.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, bankruptcies always involve heavy costs—social and human costs that can be highly destructive. Workers lose their livelihood and too often hard-won skills. Creditors and suppliers lose money; our communities lose businesses; our entrepreneurs lose their investments and often their dreams. Mr. Speaker, these costs undermine our country's efforts to remain competitive internationally.

It is therefore absolutely crucial to have this proposed reform adopted as soon as possible. As parliamentarians, we have a responsibility to do everything we can to protect our viable businesses and especially the jobs they provide, Mr. Speaker. We can no longer afford to waste our precious resources through bankruptcies that could have been avoided.

This desire to end the shameful waste of precious resources is also behind our decision to improve protection for unpaid suppliers. For many small businesses, the loss of a single delivery might be enough to put their viability at risk, causing a chain reaction or a domino effect, if you like. Since the primary objective of the proposed reform is to reduce business bankruptcies and safeguard jobs, clearly we must provide better protection for unpaid suppliers.

Mr. Speaker, the kind of protection we propose exists, and it is effective. In fact, similar protection has been provided in Quebec for several years, to the apparent satisfaction of businesses in that province. This probably explains why associations representing small businesses in this country strongly support this proposal.

[English]

Our desire to make the Bankruptcy Act fairer also led us to amend the provisions pertaining to Crown priority, the system whereby governments are automatically assigned preferred creditor status for all moneys owed to them.

With the exception of income tax deducted at source, contributions to the Canada Pension Plan and unemployment insurance premiums, Crown priority is being reduced under the new legislation. This is because we believe rules that are perceived to be unfair or arbitrary damage the entrepreneurial spirit. It was unfair to have one set of rules in place for one category of creditors, the Crown, and not others. We have acted to remove this inequity.

In much the same way as we aimed to make the existing regime fairer and more accessible to business, we aimed to make it fairer and more accessible to consumers. The consumer provisions we are proposing, that provide individuals in financial difficulty with more breathing space in which to reorganize their affairs, are long awaited ones. So too are the provisions that will allow a debtor to negotiate with creditors to pay less than the total amount of the debt owing and to reschedule their debt payment plans over a longer period of time.

Faced with the alternative of forcing the debtor into personal bankruptcy and likely not seeing any compensation at all, most creditors will prefer to receive some amount on the dollar. Should personal bankruptcy become the only option for the unfortunate debtor, our proposals will provide for easier access to affordable and expedient administrative procedures. Both measures will make it easier for bankrupt individuals to get back on their feet and start participating fully in the economy once more.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I could go on at length about the merits of each of the more technical amendments we are proposing, but I would like to take a few minutes to explain why we are proposing a wage claim benefits program and why I am particularly proud of being the initiator of this proposal.

Mr. Speaker, all members of this House who are more or less aware of that aspect of our reform know there were at least six attempts during the past fifteen years to update our Bankruptcy Act, and that all these attempts experienced the same fate. They died on the Order Paper. This poor record is partly due to a failure to strike the necessary balance between the legitimate rights of creditors and debtors, but also and especially to an inability to deal with the question of employee protection. That is why, when I took over, I promised myself I would put an end to this string of failures. Reforms in this crucial area were too long to come about for lack of consensus on the type of protection and the means of financing that protection.

• (1540)

Mr. Speaker, it is a real pity and, quite frankly, I find unacceptable the fact that while we have been discussing principles and possible solutions for years, our workers are left out in the cold with little or no protection.

Great hardship was suffered by innocent bystanders to wait any longer for an illusive consensus to emerge. In fact, it is absolutely unthinkable that, in developing our proposals for change, we would take the easy way out and turn our backs on our poor wage-earners.

Not only was I firmly determined to put in place a protection plan for employees, but also to make it work efficiently.

One of the reasons why I personally carried such extensive consultations over the past few months was to see for myself how far we could and should go with our program. The program we are putting forward fully meets the real concerns of the people and the organizations we approached.

What we are proposing is accessible and easy to use. It is intended to provide a safety net to ensure that workers get the wages owed to them should their employer goes bankrupt and that they get it as quickly as possible.

By collecting the employers' contribution at the same time as their unemployment insurance premiums, we minimize administrative costs as well as their amount of paperwork.

Mr. Speaker, concerns were expressed recently about our wage claim payment plan. I wish to respond to a number of these concerns, because I think it is important that our fellow citizens have a clear picture of what our program is and what it is not.

First, judging by the nature and tone of some speeches, it is obvious that there is confusion, misunderstanding, about the raison d'être of our program. This program is, first and foremost, one in a series of steps aimed at updating our antiquated Bankruptcy Act and the basic idea is to keep viable businesses afloat, protect jobs and realign the rights of both creditors and debtors.

[English]

The program is not intended as a mechanism for income substitution or as a means of providing general compensation to workers for job losses resulting from a bankruptcy. Rather, it is a safety net that has been designed to ensure that individuals owed moneys by their bankrupt employers for wages or expenses receive an acceptable level of protection.

Second, some groups have argued that a simpler way of dealing with the issue of moneys owed to employees of a bankrupt firm would be to give them super priority over other creditors.

This approach to wage earner protection was proposed in earlier attempts to amend the Bankruptcy Act and was rejected every time by all even here in the House and by other stakeholders outside in the Landry committee and the Colter committee.

Why? For one thing it is neither sure nor prompt. It takes time to liquidate the assets of a bankrupt firm when and if there are any assets to liquidate. Super priority wage earners would be forced to wait several months before finding out whether they would be receiving wages owed to them.

Third, it is important to note that the wage claim protection program will be funded through an employer contribution of roughly 10 cents per week per employee. Money thus collected will be earmarked specifically for this program. For this reason the program cannot be used as a so-called cash cow to raise revenues for other purposes. I believe the following examples help to put this tax in its proper perspective.

For the average sized Canadian business employing 15 people it would mean $1.50 per week, the equivalent of the price of a large bag of potato chips. For the average small and medium sized business employing an average of seven people, 10 cents per employee per week means 70 cents a week, which is less than the price of a cup of coffee.

Mr. Speaker, some have suggested that such an additional burden could jeopardize the competitiveness of our companies on world markets.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, nothing could be further from the truth. Moreover, whereas the level of the tax or contribution is minimal, the benefits of the program for workers and for businesses as well will be very significant.

Some say that the maximum authorized payment is too low. Mr. Speaker, it would have been easy to be generous with other people's money. However, the objective of this program is to provide workers with an acceptable level of protection for the money owed them. The $2,000 maximum payment provided by the program is equivalent to about twice the amount owed to employees caught in bankruptcies and should be more than enough to cover the vast majority of salary claims, according to studies that we have on hand.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, nothing will prevent an individual owed more than $2,000 from claiming the excess as an ordinary debt. Some have suggested that we should finance the program through the general revenues of the government. This suggestion simply cannot be implemented, given our huge deficit at the present time.

I would now like to take a few moments to discuss the report of the Standing Committee on the preliminary study of Bill C–22. This report is indeed eloquent testimony to the usefulness of a pre–study. In my opinion, it demonstrates clearly that the process is valid and constructive.

As I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, I must thank all the members of the Committee. The spirit of cooperation that prevailed enabled us to make great progress. In fact, the most remarkable thing about the hearings held during the pre–study is that, while each group that appeared before the Committee endeavoured, as one would expect, to protect its own interests in the context of the reform, a strong and genuine consensus emerged from those hearings regarding the reform proposals as a whole, and a very clear message was sent to the lawmakers: What are you waiting for to support this reform?

Following this detailed study, the Committee released a report in which it recommends several amendments to the bill. After carefully examining the Committee's report, and consulting with experts from my department and outside, I am pleased to announce in this House that we will accept most of the recommendations made by the Committee. These excellent recommendations which deal, among other things, with commercial reorganization and winding–up arrangements, will significantly improve the reform of the Bankruptcy Act.

Unfortunately, some recommendations are unacceptable to us. The government and the opposition critics have agreed—and I want to thank my two colleagues, whom I met last week—that it was impossible to reach an agreement on two issues, namely the absolute priority of salary claims and the rights of unpaid suppliers. However, our accepting most of the Committee's recommendations demonstrates the good faith shown by both sides of the House.

In any case, the three parties agreed that Bill C–22 is reasonable and balanced, and a most adequate answer to the pressing needs of a modern and dynamic economy.

• (1550)

[English]

Over the past months I have made a point of consulting closely with my provincial counterparts to ensure our regime meshes smoothly with existing or planned provincial ones.

I am pleased to report that we are proceeding satisfactorily. The new proposed bankruptcy and insolvency act offers flexible, modern rules that recognize natural market forces. It is an important element of the framework that will allow this government to foster a competitive productive national economy.

This bill provides clear and vital benefits for Canadian businesses, workers and consumers. The passage of Bill C–22 will create a smoother operating and fairer bankruptcy and insolvency system in this country.

On the other hand, I do not even want to think about the consequences of delaying or halting the progress of this legislation. We in this House have the power to pass laws that make our legal system better, laws that encourage prosperity and growth, laws that help Canadians.

We have such an opportunity before us. It is my fervent hope that this important piece of legislation will be passed without delay by Parliament so that we may replace the existing law and end the 40 years of drought.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I was heckled earlier, at the beginning of my speech, by members who criticized me. I am sorry to see that they are gone now as for the most part of my speech. It is easy for the Bloc Québécois to criticize, but when the time comes to listen and find out how a bill can serve the interests of all Canadians, including the people of Quebec, they disappear from the surface of the earth. That is what happens, Mr. Speaker. They only want to impress the media.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to move the following:

That Bill C-22, An Act to enact the Wage Claim Payment Act, to amend the Bankruptcy Act and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof, not be referred to Legislative Committee G but rather to the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Will those members who object to the motion please rise in their places.

And fewer than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The motion is deemed adopted, pursuant to Standing Order 73(b).

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate on the main motion.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to join my colleague, the minister, in debate on this very important piece of infrastructural legislation concerning the marketplace of our country: Bill C-22, an act to amend the Bankruptcy Act, an act to enact the Wage Claim Payment Act and other particular technical amendments.

We have just gone through a fairly new procedure from all sides of this House. After this bill was initially put to the House for first reading back about June 12 all sides of the House agreed, in the interests of trying to provide for better legislative process, to have it referred to the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

The reason that we did that is that there was a recognition on all sides of this House that the area of bankruptcy and bankruptcy reform had to be a priority with the government and with members of all sides of this House.

Rather than wait until second reading debate when we all get up and have our say about the principles that are enshrined in this particular piece of legislation, in order not to unduly hold up the process, all sides agreed to do basically a pre-study after first reading.

Before I get into the substantive part of my remarks on the various aspects of this legislation I want to state clearly up front that the process which we have just gone through, my colleagues in the New Democratic Party, my colleagues in the Liberal Party and in the Conservative Party, of allowing members prior to approval of the bill in principle at second reading to sit down and debate a piece of legislation as if it were draft legislation has been an extremely productive and positive experience for all of us.

What we saw was a departure from the normal cut and thrust of partisanship which normally happens after second reading when a bill goes to committee. We did not see in most cases, and I underline most because it was not in all cases, government members digging their heels in and indicating that no matter what was raised by other members of the committee, it certainly could not be correct because it was contrary to what the minister or what the department had put forward in the bill.

All of the members who were interested came back two weeks early and heard witnesses from various interest groups across the country. Interestingly enough, at the end of the process we came up with a near consensus. I think there was one member of the committee who did not agree in the report that was placed after the pre-study.

We came up with a consensus about the types of things we wanted to see reformed this bill and to bring in better legislation. I am going to refer to some of those recommendations as I go along in my presentation today.

I want to say at the outset that this is exactly the type of process that should be looked at by all sides of this House because it truly is a way to involve members on the government backbenches and members of the opposition, be they Liberals, New Democrats, or independents, in a very positive way in the legislative process.

I understand the government is not going to accept all of the 22 or so amendments that were put forward. The government has indicated that it is prepared to accept a majority of the recommendations before this bill receives final approval in the House of Commons.

That has to be something that is very positive and must be underlined for all Canadians who all too often, but for good reason, see most of what we do here as pretty much irrelevant and see the role of the private member as less than irrelevant at the best of times.

I want to commend the minister and the two House leaders for embarking us on this trek into the unknown when we did pre-study after first reading. It truly is one of the ways that this place can reform the way it does its business and to put some respect back into the parliamentary process and put respect back into the job of being a parliamentarian.

It has been a long time since bankruptcy legislation has come before this House. The current bill was enacted in 1949. It was slightly amended in 1966, but not substantially amended. Since then the minister has indicated in his speech that there were were six attempts before the Parliament of Canada to try and reform that particular piece of legislation.

In actual fact there have been at least nine attempts, or perhaps 10, six of which were through legislation, either legislation introduced in the Senate or legislation that eventually died on the Order Paper in this place.

In each and every case there were certain objectives put forward when we were looking at reform of bankruptcy legislation. I want to paraphrase Coulter because it seems to be one of the recent authorities on what we should be looking for in bankruptcy reform legislation.

Coulter said that first, bankruptcy legislation reform should be fair and equitable. Second, it should establish a proper equilibrium in the balance of power between the debtor, the secured creditor, and the unsecured creditor. Third, bankruptcy legislation should allow for effective reorganization and support the maintenance of viable business enterprise. Fifth, it should be flexible. Sixth, the legislation should recognize the special circumstances of different categories of debtors.

He used as an example farmers and fishermen.

We have had a long time between drinks at the well. It has been a long time since this bankruptcy legislation has been put forward for much-needed reform.

• (1600)

I should say at this particular juncture that the bill before us, Bill C-22, sets out in a fairly categorized way to address eight concerns that have been raised through countless consultations and countless studies and countless bills that have been put before us. There are some which we are not approaching today which Coulter had mentioned and they are farmers, fishermen and international insolvencies and perhaps one or two other things. This bill is broken down basically into eight sections: wage earner protection, and I am going to spend most of my time on that today, commercial reorganizations, consumer proposals, consumer bankruptcy, secured creditors and receivers, Crown claims and priorities, protection of unpaid suppliers, and a whole host of technical amendments.

This is not an appropriate time for us to be dealing with bankruptcy reform legislation. I would like to have seen it a little earlier. I am sure the minister would like to have as well. I cannot help but wonder why the bankruptcy legislation that is before us comes after a very deep and very severe recession.

One of the key points in the bill is the wage earner protection fund which seeks to try to re-establish some balance, as Coulter said, between the rights of various creditors. It is interesting to note that as we talk about bankruptcies we find our economy continuing in a state of decline.

Since 1984 there have been in excess of 273,000 bankruptcies. The assets of those 273,000 bankruptcies are in excess of $20 billion. During that period nearly 3,000 farmers have gone bankrupt. That is a lot of farms out of production. That is a lot of farm families getting a lot of farm stress and it is a heck of a lot of pain for those individuals.

Anyone who knows anything about farming will tell you for every farmer who goes bankrupt there is probably another 10 who are insolvent but there is no sense in the bank foreclosing because it cannot do anything with the assets. Truly it is the tip of the iceberg.

Regarding fishermen, 3,102 fishermen have had to declare bankruptcy between 1984 and the September statistics that were put out just Friday by Statistics Canada. People ask: "You're dealing with bankruptcy reform, Ron, what do you think is the cause of this accelerated rate of bankruptcies?"

It is clear, the accelerated rate of bankruptcies is caused by the three pillars of this government's economic policies, one of which is the high dollar policy. I looked in the paper today and I think the dollar is at 88 cents. Anyone who knows anything about our export based industries knows that for every cent that the dollar goes up, there is about $1.4 billion lost in Canadian exports. Over the last year when we have seen the Canadian dollar go to those almost all-time highs, at least in the last dozen years, some analyses said that we have lost as much as $143 billion in Canadian exports.

We have had a high tax policy. Thirty-two times since 1984 taxes have been raised. The GST has taken a tremendous bite out of the wallets of consumers. It has caused the collapse of consumer confidence which in turn has caused consumers to stop buying. When consumers stop buying, businesses file for bankruptcy, people lose their jobs and the economy goes into a nosedive. Thirty-two times taxes have gone up.

There was a report out just last week which said that if you took out the effect on inflation of government policies, and that is its tax policy and its high interest rate policy, when you put your equation together regarding the inflation rate you would find out that over the last 12 months Canadian businesses have done their part. There have been no increases in consumer prices other than those increases that have been the direct result of the high dollar, high interest rate policy by this government.

We see that the inflation which has caused high interest rates, the third pillar of the government's economic policy, as the Governor of the Bank of Canada will tell you, have to be imposed because we have to get inflation down.

If the Conference Board of Canada's figures which I just quoted about price increases are correct then the government's own policies have caused the dollar to rise. The government's own policies of high tax have caused inflation to rise. As a result of those first two things, the government's first two policies have caused an incredibly high interest rate policy. This has led tens of thousands of Canadians and Canadian businesses over the brink into bankruptcy. Those are the facts. I raise them because in the last 12 months this economy has been beaten to death by this government's policies. There have been tens of thousands, perhaps hundreds of thousands of Canadian workers who have lost their jobs in this recession.

Since we have had so many years between drinks at the well, why is it that it is only after 100,000 Canadians have lost their jobs and after 56,000 Canadian individuals and businesses have gone bankrupt that we actually get bankruptcy reform legislation before us?

One of the pillars of the bankruptcy reform legislation is the wage earner protection fund. It has been used as the carrot on the stick. Everyone in this House I would suspect who is a caring and thinking individual recognizes that there is a great imbalance in the bankruptcy legislation. The imbalance is this. In 1949, the bill provided for up to $500 for payment of outstanding wage claims on bankrupt firms. It was not as a super priority, it was as an ordinary creditor. Status was applied to those wages. In actual fact what it meant, all through that period of time, was that by the time the assets had been disposed of, there was really nothing left for the poor worker.

Surely if we seek to fundamentally rebalance an unbalanced bill then we should sit down and look at whose interest we are serving. The government proposes in this legislation to create a new fund called the wage earner protection fund because it recognizes that there is an interest in the assets of a bankrupt or insolvent firm. There is an interest there by the employees who have not had their wages paid. It recognizes that and I applaud it for it and I recognize and support that as well.

Rather than go in and put that balance that I referred to earlier that Coulter had spoken about, in the bill, it has chosen the easier route. The easier route is: No, do not go in and try to rebalance the bill because there are a lot of very special interests out there who squeak like crazy every time you even talk about offering their position under current bankruptcy legislation. I refer to a lot of the financial institutions.

Rather than go in and bear the wrath of the heavy lobby from the financial institutions because we are going in to try to put fairness and equity back into our bankruptcy legislation, the thing to do perhaps is to go forward and say we recognize it, but we are going to pay it out in a different way. That is what the government has proposed.

The government has come in and said: "We are going to have a wage earner protection fund". What does that mean? The proposal in Bill C-22 is that employees who are owed wages in bankrupt or insolvent firms will be able to claim for 90 per cent of the wages owed, up to a maximum of $2,000. The government is doing that because it believes in order to put a fund together it has to make sure that it is not so costly that it cannot be financed easily. So how will it finance it? Well, in the minister's own words, and he recognizes what it is, it will implement a new tax. I just said that there were 32 tax increases since 1984. Strike for 33 plus the paper burden.

Now what we have is a new tax proposed to fund an inequity that everybody believes is there in the wage earner protection fund and it truly is there. Rather than go against the banks, rather than go against the other big special interests who have been protected year after year after year by no offering of the current bankruptcy legislation, let us create a fund, a social program in effect. It will do what we really cannot find the wherewithal to do and that is truly rebalance the bill. There will be another tax and the tax is going to go in. I know it is not a lot of money. I asked the witnesses who came and they all said: "We hate this tax", and we know that it is only a few pennies. The minister mentioned it is not very much money, but Canadian businesses have been smothered with new taxes. They have been absolutely smothered by the paperwork burden imposed upon them by federal, provincial and municipal governments, all trying to take a share of that diminished profit that they have worked so hard in their businesses to create. They have had enough.

Every single witness who came forward said: "We agree that there has to be a rebalancing. We agree somebody has to pay for it. We know that. But please do not put in a new tax. We do not trust the current provincial governments and we certainly do not trust our federal government. A tax that is $5 or $10 per employee this year will be $15, $50 or $75 in future years".

No matter how much the government protests that will not happen, we constantly get examples, such as unemployment insurance premiums.

An hon. member: Up 24 per cent.

Mr. MacDonald: They went up 24 per cent last year. It is not good. They are taking money out of small business. They are crippling small business with additional taxes.

We in the Liberal party agree there has to be something done. The wage earner protection fund, by the government's own admission, is going to tax every employer in the country. It is going to tax hospitals which find that the money made available to them from the EPF is diminishing every year because of a freeze on EPF. Hospitals do not go bankrupt in Canada, but they are going to be taxed. Their diminishing health care dollar is going to be siphoned back up from a new tax that their employees will never get to benefit from as long as they are employees of a hospital because hospitals do not go bankrupt.

It is the same with school boards and municipalities. In a very difficult economic time the government proposes to fix what we all agree is something that has to be fixed but it is doing it the wrong way, in the opinion of the Liberal Party.

We have proposed through a pre-study of this bill that we do it a different way. We dare to go in and challenge some of what has been told to us by some of those very special interest groups in the country, primarily the banks.

We said to the banks: "We have to fix this. It is not right". There are three inputs into a business. There is the entrepreneurial spirit and whatever moneys the entrepreneur has, plus all of the hard work and ingenuity needed to get a business going. That is an input.

Then there is the investor, usually a bank. It is usually a bank that comes in and makes its assessment on all of the various factors, the market, the product and the skills that are brought forward by the owner and the operator. It makes an investment of money because it thinks it will make money on the entrepreneurial spirit of the owner.

Then there is a third input as well. That third input is the labour of the employees who put their time and effort for pay into producing a product or a service.

If we really want to rebalance the bankruptcy legislation, let us do more than recognize that they have an interest. Let us put the interest in the bill.

The Liberal Party said there was no need to create a $60 million fund. That is what the government said this was going to cost. There is no need to create another tax. There is no need to create more paperwork burden.

What we can do is go in and fix the act. When we said that to the bankers, they said: "I will tell you what. If you go in and touch our interest or our secured interest", because Canadian banks are not risk takers. They tell you that up front. The most protected banking institutions in the world are Canadian banks. They told us right to our face that they are not risk takers.

An hon. member: Including FBDB.

Mr. MacDonald: Including FBDB. They are not risk takers.

What the bank said is: "If you touch our secured interest, if you put a super priority to fund those wages, it takes away from our interest and we promise you there will be a credit crunch like you never saw in this country. And in some businesses that are labour intensive, we will not be able to lend them money any more. If you touch our interest, we can go elsewhere and make our money". And I say: "Sure, we certainly believe that, Mr. Banker".

I asked the minister's staff and the departmental staff about the new Crown priority that was established about a dozen years ago, a deemed trust situation with source deductions. I know it is a much smaller amount of money. The banks argued the same case at that point. If a super priority was given to the government's claims for source deductions, it would give them a credit crunch and they would not be able to lend money. Do you know what, Mr. Speaker? The day after that particular provision was enacted in law, and there was a super priority on Crown claims, life went on. The banks continued to lend their money and businesses continued to expand and flourish, and there was no credit crunch.

So I don't believe it for a minute. You look at the system in the United States where the banks do not have such a security interest in business and that is a flourishing free market economy. So don't come and tell me, protected conservative Canadian banks, that it we alter anything as far as your security interests in the assets of a company that you are not going to give them money. I say to the banks that you will adjust to whatever the regulations and the legislation is, and you will adjust like you have done in every other circumstance. You will continue to lend and you will continue to make record profits in Canada because of the other regulations and the other laws that protect Canadian banks and financial institutions.

You know, it is interesting, we are dealing with about $62 million, that is all, $62 million. There are hundreds of billions of dollars in investments made by Canadian banks. We are talking about wage claims of about $62 million. How in the name of goodness can $62 million put that very solid Canadian banking institution on its ears? It is not going to happen.

We in the Liberal party are absolutely opposed to a wage earner protection fund which is financed by a new tax on businesses and on average Canadians. We are opposed to it 100 per cent.

Through the committee process we were able to convince, between my NDP colleague from Nickel Belt and myself, all but one committee member. We were able to convince Conservative members on the other side that a new tax was the wrong way to go. We said to listen to the CFIB. There are other ways to do this. We can dare to be bold and to be innovative and we can achieve those goals that the minister set out, which is to give wage protection to employees, but we can do it in a different way. We all agreed on the goals, we just disagree on how we get there.

The Liberal party has been clear. The committee pre-studying it has been extremely clear. We don't buy the arguments from the big banks and the vested interests in this country that if we touch their security interest the entire economy is going to collapse in this country. We simply do not buy it and we will not support another tax on small business. We will not support amending a bankruptcy act, leaving almost undisturbed the unfair interest and the unbalanced interest of most of Canada's financial institutions in the assets of a bankrupt's estate.

I have to tell you this, Mr. Speaker. This is a little interesting. It is not just Liberals and New Democrats who seek fairness. I think there are a lot of Conservatives who do as well. I have a list here of some Conservative members who filled out a questionnaire concerning whether or not they were in favour of an employer-financed wage earner protection fund, as proposed in Bill C-22. There were about 50 members of Parliament who responded, and out of that there were a number of Conservative members. The member for Athabasca said he was opposed; the member for Calgary Southeast said he was opposed; the member for Bramalea—Gore—Malton said he was opposed; the member for Red Deer said he was opposed; the member for Lethbridge said he was opposed; the member for Bruce—Grey said he was opposed; the member for Halton—Peel said he was opposed; and the member for Edmonton Southwest, who happens to be the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs who is sponsoring this bill which will impose a new tax, said at that time in the summer, that he as well was opposed to the bill.

An hon. member: Shame on Edmonton Southwest.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): The Conservative members on the pre-study committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs as well said that they were opposed to the establishment of a new tax in order to achieve these goals. The committee report went into some length about a system that we thought would work, that would still give immediacy of payment and certainty of payment to those wage earners. We also thought that the dollar value should go from $2,000 to $3,000. We thought that the Superintendent of Bankruptcies should guarantee any loans made by a trustee to fulfill that wage earner super priority. We even said, so that it doesn't cost taxpayers a lot more money, let the trustee at the superintendent's office adjust the fees to create a fund. If a trustee has to borrow against the assets of the firm to pay out the claims of those wage earners so there is immediacy of payment, if there is any shortfall, the superintendent's office could guarantee it.

• (1620)

We gave them a way to do it and we hear that the government has said no.

An hon. member: More taxes.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): More taxes, more taxes, more taxes.

There are other aspects of the bill such as commercial reorganization. This bill has a very good provision in it for commercial reorganization. We all agree that it is absolutely necessary to put some order in a very cannibalistic process at this point in dealing with commercial reorganization.

Currently under the Bankruptcy Act there really is no provision for a debtor or a company that is in debt to stop a creditor from basically jumping the queue and immediately appointing a receiver with 10 or 15 days' notice, in effect putting the company out of business. This bill seeks to rebalance that and we support this particular section of the bill wholeheartedly.

There were a number of amendments we were seeking through committee and I have discussed the matter with the minister. Some of them are technical and some are not that technical. We want to make sure, if we are going to go in and try to rescue businesses by allowing provisions for commercial reorganization, that at the same time we are not passing a piece of legislation which may be technically flawed or perhaps has not gone far enough so that the goals as outlined by the government in the proposals on reorganization can truly be obtained.

In brief, the commercial reorganization allows for a debtor to file a notice of intent. Once a notice of intent is signed, secured and unsecured creditors are stayed. They cannot do anything. They cannot jump in if they have a lien on a particular aspect of the business. They cannot jump in and stop the company from doing business. That means the business or the individual has a period of time to sit down without a gun at his or her head to try and work out a proposal with all of the creditors.

If the business has loans of a million dollars and it is only worth $700,000 and it can carry that debt, then the owner/operator along with the trustee or the receiver can sit down and work out with the creditors a more equitable arrangement so that instead of just going in and cannibalizing the assets of a firm in some financial difficulty and putting people out of work and destroying the lives of those owner/operators who would otherwise be forced into bankruptcy, it gives them some hope that there is another and better way to do it. Maybe through restructuring, through a 30-day, a 45-day or up to a six-month provision, we are giving them time to make businesses work instead of allowing the old legislation to go on which simply put businesses out of business, many of which were very viable.

The current bill says that you can go as long as six months. This is one of the things we were looking for, but we do not think it is long enough. We have heard from a lot of our colleagues about cases like Algoma Steel in which it is going to take a long time if you are going to restructure its debt in order to save the company and thousands of jobs. We have put some recommendations forward through the committee. It is my hope that the government will be looking at those recommendations.

There is also some very good news dealing with revindication. We finally recognize that there is an interest in the assets of a bankrupt firm that has to take a super priority and that is the interest of those suppliers that have supplied goods to a company that suddenly goes bankrupt. We live on credit. Nobody pays cash these days. All too often we have heard, and the government has heard in the past, that suppliers of goods supply goods to a company and if the company knows it is in financial difficulty oftentimes it will stock up on stock, get rid of the stock at ridiculously low prices to try to stave off secured creditors like banks, or if they know the company is going to be going under they will stock up on the stock. The company is petitioned into bankruptcy and those individuals have no preferred claim on their own goods in the store or retail outlet that are unaltered, that are still identifiable, because the receiver will come in and liquidate the assets of the company.

This bill seeks to remedy that situation by giving revindication rights for those goods and services that are unaltered, are identifiable and in the same form. That is a very positive step. There are some problems with it and the problems have been addressed in the committee report. I met with the minister last week to look at trying to fix it a little bit.

I mentioned earlier that we can get stays of proceedings of 10 days, 21 days and extended each time after that by 45 days, in which case nobody can take any actions against a firm that is under protection. There is a problem here because as I have indicated you have just given a 30-day provision to a supplier of goods to revindicate. We have indicated in a report what should be done. I might sell goods to a company and then 10 days after I sell the goods to the company it might apply for protection under the proposed act. My clock continues to tick. Maybe 21 days later when I am one day over my 30 days that I could revindicate, the company is unable to come to an agreement with its creditors, goes bankrupt and as for my interest in the stock it has on hand, which is unpaid for, I have lost my ability to revindicate.

We have made provisions and we have made recommendations to the minister that in cases such as that the 30-day clock should cease. It should be held so that when a company goes in and applies for 10 days' protection or it goes up to 31 days' protection, the revindication clock for the supplier also has a stay during that period of time so that at the end of the period, if there is no reorganization and its goods are still there in an unaltered form, it can still go in and revindicate.

We have also found some technical problems with the particular piece of legislation dealing with timeframes. We have made recommendations to the minister in that regard.

One of the problems that I have with this bill is what I quoted back from Coulter earlier. Coulter indicated that there were special circumstances that had to be looked at, and those special circumstances were for farmers and fishermen.

Under the revindication requirement as outlined in the legislation before us in Bill C-22, one of the problems that we have is that it says the goods, in order to revindicate, must be in the same form that they were sold.

Everybody knows that when you catch a fish and you sell it to a processing plant, it has to do something with it because it will start to rot. As soon as you get it in the processing plant, you have to do something to enhance its quality or to stabilize its quality.

The bill is very clear. In order to revindicate, under the proposals, it has to have no value-add. In the case of farmers and fishermen, in perishable goods, as soon as the product arrives at the processing plant something has to be done to preserve the quality, and that is value-add.

A farmer or fishermen might sell their goods at three o'clock today. The company goes into bankruptcy or receivership at four o'clock and they will never be able to avail themselves in almost every single case, particularly fish products and fungible and perishable agricultural goods.

They will never be able to use these very good revindication provisions because there would have been value-add or there would have been some altering.

One of the things that I would suggest to the minister who is listening attentively over there is that the department go ahead with the consultative process as quickly as possible to find ways to ensure that in those two special circumstances for our farmers and our fishermen we give them similar protection that we seem to be giving to producers and sellers of other products and that we recognize the unique hardship caused if the farmer sells all his grain to a grain elevator and it is dumped in with the grain of two other farmers.

If they go bankrupt he cannot get his grain back because he does not know which 20 tonnes of grain are his and which 20 tonnes are his neighbours.

I talked to the minister about this, and I hope that we can work with him to try to come up with a workable solution so that farmers and fishermen as suppliers of goods receive similar and at least as much protection as this bill would give to the producers of other types of goods.

I have got some recommendations for him and I think he has already got them on his desk.

Some of the other things that we have looked at in the bill deal with consumer bankruptcies. The bill goes a long way to addressing a very outdated process for dealing with consumer bankrupts.

It has provisions in it for reorganization. The consumers who finds themselves in a debt situation are not left for their bones to be picked by their creditors. They have an opportunity to sit down and work with their creditors in a protected environment where nobody can really take any action while they are filing a proposal or putting it together, and so they may be able to discharge the debt in a reasonable period of time.

If those individuals who have $5,000 or less in assets, the consumers, have to go bankrupt, the act provides for a less onerous process whereby they can file an application for bankruptcy. If it is their first bankruptcy, nine months later, unless there is a major objection agreed to by the courts or by the superintendent, automatically they get discharged. They are very positive and important amendments to the bill.

There are just two other things I want to talk about.

• (1630)

I think the minister would have to agree with me that it is simply not the case that a lot of the rhetoric is coming out from the department and from promoters of this particular bill about all of the Crown priorities that have been given up. The Crown priorities as they relate to source deductions are still firmly in place. For most medium and small sized businesses it is a fairly large chunk and it is a very heavy top priority to be given.

We have recommended in our committee report, and the Liberal party recommends it, a re-examination of that. We also recommend that the Crown be treated as any other creditor in so far as the putting together of a proposal.

The last thing that I want to say is there are a lot of regulations. We cannot keep passing laws—this is one of those pieces of legislation—and leaving the actual mechanism to enact the legislation to regulators. There are over 130 pieces of regulation that have to be written.

The Liberal Party wants to look at those in committee before we agree to anything further with the bill because we believe that passing bills has to be put back on the shoulders of parliamentarians. We should not pass shells of bills and then at that point leave it to regulators actually to put the mechanisms together that will make or break the legislation.

In conclusion, I would like to say that the Liberal Party has been supportive of any effort to reform the legislation. I have tried in the short period I have had to outline what we think is good about the legislation and what we support. I have given our support for the process under which we have embarked. I also have major difficulties and cannot reconcile my difficulties, no matter how often I have talked to the minister and his officials, with the wage earner protection fund as put forward.

The Liberal Party simply cannot accept another tax on Canadian businesses. As much as we want to support this legislation and as much as we know that there have been major reforms made, at this point I would have to move:

> That the motion be amended by deleting all of the words after the word "that" and by substituting the following therefor:
> "That this House declines to proceed with Bill C-22, an act to enact the Wage Claim Payment Act, to amend the Bankruptcy Act and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, the principle of which is to impose yet another tax on Canadian business".

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Chair will take under advisement the motion in amendment proposed by the hon. member for Dartmouth.

[English]

Before recognizing the next speaker, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Surrey North—Health; the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur—Canada Post; the hon. member for Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville—Pornography; the hon. member for Mount Royal—The Economy; the hon. member for Saint—Léonard—Paper Industry.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words about Bill C-22, an act to enact the Wage Claim Payment Act and to amend the Bankruptcy Act.

When we had the little 10-minute debates before we sent Bill C-22 to a pre-study committee I remember saying it was appropriate that we should amend the Bankruptcy Act. This is the first time since 1949 when the act was passed that there has been a bill to amend the act.

Colleagues of my caucus and I over several Parliaments have called for amendments to the 1949 Bankruptcy Act because it has become outdated. It does not reflect the realities of today.

In fact from 1975 to 1984 there were six bills introduced by my colleagues to the right, the Liberals. Some of them included super priority. The last Consumer and Corporate Affairs minister in the Liberal government, the Trudeau government, brought in an amendment to the act and what happened? She included super priority.

Well, something happened on the way to the House of Commons after the act was introduced. Some group or somebody got to the minister and that act just died.

We have had a new government since 1984. Seven years later and four ministers later, we have C-22. Every minister who occupied the position of Consumer and Corporate Affairs minister since 1984 always said: "Oh, this is a priority for me. We have got to do something about it".

When this minister introduced his bill for first reading, I stood up here and said: "This bill that the minister introduced reminds me of a fireman going to the blazing inferno with a step ladder and a garden hose" because there were criticisms I had made of things in the bill.

Well, we introduced a brand new process. The minister got very wise. He decided to try out a new strategy so he said: "Maybe I could suck these guys in". He came up with what is called pre-study. A nice concept. I had no problem with it. Anybody who wants to talk, why not get together. He sent the bill to pre-study and what we did in the pre-study, I am proud to say, is we gave him a fire hose and an extension ladder. I think that is what our recommendations did.

I want to point out that it is very seldom in this House that we get the kind of unanimity of thinking on major important issues as we did. There is only one recommendation in the 22 that I could not agree with. It is a minor one and not very crucial to the bill. I want to say to the minister that in fact we had Conservatives on the committee, colleagues from the Liberal Party and myself, and we came out of that process with 22 recommendations. We were unanimous in agreeing on the vast majority of them including the important ones, the wage payment protection provisions.

We were concerned about the walk-aways. We agreed on the revindication of goods. We were agreed on the breathing space for re-organization. We were in agreement on the provisions for consumer bankruptcies. We had no problem. It was marvellous. It was a real love-in because we were cheek to cheek, eyeball to eyeball, jowl to jowl on the important issues.

I support the process and I have no problem with it. The whole concept of the pre-study, the whole raison d'être behind the pre-study is so that members can aerate and explore the provisions of a bill that had second reading. They can come to an agreement on very important issues, not the minor dotting of the i's and crossing of the t's and putting in the commas, but on the crucial issues, the real principle issues in the bill. If we can reach agreement on that, what is the point if the minister simply says: "Well, I don't think you have any relevancy" or "I do not agree with you on that" or "my way or the highway"?

What is the point of that? What is the point of that exercise? I want to come to the major disagreements that we had. I want the minister to know that in this examination of pre-study of this bill, we did not exactly go to the highways and by-ways and say: "You come to the committee. We want to hear your views on bankruptcy". We did not advertise in newspapers all across the country. We did not invite every Tom, Dick, Harry, Jane, Elizabeth to come and say what they want. We did not have these sorts of town hall meetings that we see now with different committees that go around the country. We did not do that.

I want to put this in context. We did not do that. I want to deal with what the minister said, that of all these witnesses who came, only one supported super priority. We decided we would call only these people who have an interest in the bill: the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and I want to ask you who they represent; the Canadian Bar Association; the Canadian Insolvency Association; the Canadian Institute of Public Real Estate Companies; Insolvency Institute of Canada; the Canadian Bankers' Association; the Board of Trade of Metropolitan Toronto; Pfeiffer & Pfeiffer, trustees and liquidators; C. Roy Henning, Barrister and Solicitor; Weir Bowen, Edmonton, Alberta and so on and so on.

The point I want to make, Mr. Speaker, is that we had all the people who had a vested interest in making sure that their clients did not lose their super priority in the Senate when an occupation or an operation goes bankrupt.

We are going to get to that, brother. Just cool your buns.

The overwhelming number of the witnesses who came were agents for bankers back then and bandits. That is how it is. These are the ones we heard from. They are the ones who would come and say: "Oh, you can't give workers a super priority. You can't interfere with the secured creditors. You can't do that. You are going to have credit crunch".

You cannot deal with walk-aways they said. You cannot touch them. We listened to all of that. We listened to the concern of the Canadian Labour Congress which had always in the past supported super priority, but which were concerned that if you give workers a super priority and the operation goes bankrupt there may not be any assets. There may not be any assets from which the workers may get some money. That was the concern they had.

We listened to all of that. Then we said to them: "Be gone". We closed the doors. We had our discussions. We had long discussions and fruitful discussions, and on the major questions we chose to make recommendations to the minister. I want to pick the most important recommendation in my view. Others are important, but this I think was the most important one. It is the one that has occupied my attention since I came into the House of Commons. That was to make sure that when a company goes bankrupt the workers' wages are paid. That was my commitment.

My friend from Broadview—Greenwood knows that. I used to make these speeches. I have private members' bills. The way I see it there is a moral responsibility that goes beyond bankers and financial institutions. If there are assets then the moral responsibility is that their wages get paid first before anything else. That is imperative. From evidence that we received, in 90 per cent of the cases there are assets. When a bank makes a loan to a business you can be darned sure that it protects its bunnies by making sure that there is greater value in the assets than the amount it is lending. And so there are.

When you think about it, the evidence was that this amounts to about $61 million in the government's proposed wage protection plan. Think of all of the loan portfolios out there. Think of what the money is in all of that. Surely $61 million has got to be, in my quick calculation, about less than half of one per cent of the total amount out there in loan portfolios. That for me was the most important question.

The minister had proposed in his bill a wage protection plan which would be contributed to by employers only. Can you imagine a Conservative government in this climate? It has brought on the recession we are in, it has created most of the economic problems this country faces today, and in this climate it is saying to the employers after bringing in the GST: "We are going to put another tax on you".

Here we are faced with the potential of an increase in unemployment insurance premiums come January because the government opted out of that in C-21. It put all of that on to the employers and employees. To make this fund solvent, because it is $5 billion in the hole, you would have to raise premiums 14 per cent in January. Here is a government that is now coming to small and medium-sized businesses and saying to them: "You are going to pay 10 cents an employee a week". The minister says that 10 cents is buying one little peanut, it is not a lot of money. I think he made a comparison to peanuts, or something like that. He said it is not a lot of money. Mr. Speaker, that is where it all starts. It all starts very small.

Think back to what UI premiums were and look where they are today. Look at where income tax started and look at where it is today.

The small and medium-sized business community represented by the Federation of Independent Business clearly came out against that. Look at this prospect. Think about this: There are approximately 500,000 employees in the finance sector of the country. That means the financial institutions will pay approximately $3 million a year.

Mr. Speaker, look at it. Isn't that a wonderful thing? It's like paying for protection to keep your secured creditor position. They have a deal. In fact I would suggest we put in super priority and somebody with a bright idea could invite Lloyds to come in with a suitcase and a computer and offer bankruptcy insurance and make money at it.

I see my friend from Broadview-Greenwood nodding. There is an idea.

This is what we are doing. I have been getting letters from school boards and hospital associations, concerned because they are going to be covered by this. School boards in Saskatchewan have written to me and I am sure other members of Parliament will start getting letters.

• (1650)

In the long run where do school boards and hospitals get the money to pay their employees? They get it from the homeowner.

What this government is doing is putting another tax right on top of a heavily taxed small and medium-sized sector at the moment. I cannot imagine anything more cruel.

There is another question the committee looked at when we discussed the wage protection plan. That is the walk-aways, companies that are not technically bankrupt. They have closed the door. The owners have gone fishing in the Gulf of Mexico. The workers turn up and there is nobody there and no work. We said under the government's plan: "That is not fair". It is not fair at all. Those employers would have paid on behalf of the employees into a wage protection fund, but they are not protected. It seems to me that is not ethical. The money they were led to believe was in the fund on their behalf and the plant is closed but they cannot collect their wages from the fund. We call those the walk-aways.

I want to tell the minister, we are not prepared on this side of the House to give any final approval to this bill unless the question of the walk-aways is dealt with. We in the committee looked at the question of the walk-aways and made some suggestions. We felt they could be handled out of general revenues. After all, the minister has brought in the GST. It is doing very well in the very tough time of recession. He says it is holding its own.

If it is holding its own in tough recessionary times, can you imagine when things get better how much they will be rolling in the dough?

The responsibility is to look after the victims of walk-aways. We felt that was important.

We also heard: "Oh, you are going to have a credit crunch. If you put workers ahead of the secured creditors, you are going to have a credit crunch". When we dealt with the revindication, when we discussed revindication as proposed in the bill, we heard the same argument from the banks. They said: "If you let the suppliers come and take their goods, 30 days from date of delivery you are going to have a credit crunch".

Quebec has had revindication of goods. The evidence we got from the province of Quebec was that it did not lead to any credit crunch. Credit in Quebec is not higher to businesses than it is in Ontario or any other part of Canada as a result of the fact that it had a revindication of goods.

For heavens sake, do not tell me that the $61 million based on a loan portfolio of billions of dollars is going to create a credit crunch. I do not believe it for one moment.

The other thing we said was that we wanted to speed up the payment to the workers. We suggested that we could move from the proposed six weeks the minister talked about in his wage protection plan to four weeks or less. We dealt with it by providing and dealing with the Canadian Labour Congress concern, the establishment of a fund by the Superintendent of Bankruptcies.

He could increase his administrative charges for bankruptcies and from that fund he could pay whatever the shortfall is in the moneys owed to workers. We increased the workers to $3,000 from $2,000 and we allowed walk-aways $1,500.

I am torn because of the fact that on the one hand I do want to see amendments to the Bankruptcy Act. I do want to see it upgraded, but I am not prepared to sacrifice the concerns of workers in a bankruptcy or in a walk-away just because I want to see some updating of the act.

I want to move:

> That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "that" and substituting the following therefor:
> > This House declines to give second reading to Bill C-22, an act to enact the Wage Claim Payment Act, to amend the Bankruptcy Act and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof, as the economic climate makes this an inopportune time to impose a new tax, notably on small and medium size businesses.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am ready to make a decision about the amendment tabled by the hon. member for Dartmouth.

After deliberation the Chair finds out of order the amendment tabled by the hon. member. I refer the member to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, Sixth Edition, no. 671(4)

> (4) An amendment which amounts to no more than a direct negation of the principle of the bill is open to objection.

[Translation]

The Chair will take under advisement the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Nickel Belt.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I hope you will not take this out of the 10-minute question and comment time but there have been discussions and I believe you will find unanimous consent for the following motion. I move:

> That, at the completion of the time provided for consideration of Private Members' Business today, the House shall suspend for the sole purpose of receiving a message respecting the giving of Royal Assent to Bill C-40, an act to provide for the continuation of postal services, later today, and that following such Royal Assent, upon return to this Chamber the Speaker shall adjourn the House until two o'clock p.m. Wednesday, October 30, 1991.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Does the hon. parliamentary secretary have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, this is two minutes on questions and commentaries.

I will do this as efficiently as I can. I would like to comment on the two speeches we have just heard, more particularly the allegation that we have had an increase in bankruptcies. The figures which were released last Friday show the contrary. In terms of business bankruptcies, we have a drop from August to September of 9 per cent and a year to year comparison shows a drop of 1 per cent. While the picture is not rosy, it is a distinct improvement over last year.

The question was raised by the hon. member for Dartmouth as to why we should have this bill after a deep and severe recession. I would draw to his attention the names of a few of our ministers who have had a go at it. The hon. member for Quadra had a go at it, the hon. Ron Basford had a go at it, the Hon. Robert Andras had a go at it, the hon. member for Windsor West and the hon. member for Papineau—Saint-Michel also had a go at it. The question may well be posed. The hon. member for Nickel Belt may have a go at it.

There was another question raised by my hon. friend from Dartmouth about a questionnaire for the Canadian Federation of Independent Business in which my name apparently appeared.

• (1700)

I would point out to him, and he can get this substantiated by two members on his side who have been parliamentary secretaries, that when you become a parliamentary secretary you go on a very tight learning curve and you can learn a lot more in a hurry about an issue. I certainly have learned a good deal about the whole issue of super priority. I can tell the hon. member, as will be brought out in debate I am sure in the hours to come, that—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I apologize for having stopped the hon. member but it being five o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 36, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

LOW-LEVEL FLIGHTS

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of ending all NATO-NORAD low-level flight training in Canada, rejecting the establishment of NATO operations in Canada, including the proposed tactical fighter and weapons training centre at Goose Bay, Labrador, and redirecting Canada's NATO-NORAD funding toward enabling Canada's aboriginal people to regain control of their lands and their livelihood and promoting sustainable development for all Canadians.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am very glad of the chance to speak on this motion that I have introduced. Although the matter of the low-level flights over the aboriginal people of what we call Labrador and eastern Quebec is much in the news, the low-level flights are continuing. Even though for the time being NATO has said it does not want to establish a base there, it is clear that the Canadian government by its statements earlier this year regrets that decision and would be happy if NATO would reverse that decision.

Therefore, both in the present and as a future possible threat, this matter of the low-level flights over Nitassinan, which is the name given to it by the people who have lived there for 9,000 years, is a serious threat to the people over whom the flights are tested.

I want to touch on the historical background first of all. While it only concerns a few thousand people in one corner of Canada, it is an example of something that has been going on for several centuries, that is to say the wilful destruction of indigenous people by the people who have been moving out from Europe and settling places like North America. These people were not causing anyone else any harm. They have not made war on anyone. They have simply lived there for about 9,000 years, according to what we are told and they want to continue living in the land that they have occupied.

They have lived there by sharing the land. They do not put fences around a plot and say: "You can't walk on here unless you pay me rent". They share the land they believe was created by the Creator to be used by all people with reasonable sharing and that includes the people who are yet unborn, the future generations. The land should not be damaged so that they cannot use it.

In their way of life, they live by co-operation. The children, parents and the elders live together in their settlements and moved as was necessary because of the limitations of the food in any one area. They maintained for dozens of generations a society of mutual respect.

I do not mean that nothing ever went wrong in there, but society was based on an assumption of mutual respect so that problems that did arise could be dealt with, with co-operation. This shows even in the present time, because it is a little less than half a century since most of these people were brought into the style of life that was imported into that land and other parts of North America by the immigrants from Europe, the ancestors of so many of us.

When these people are able to live on the land in their own way, their family life, their social life is much healthier. It is when they accept being drawn into makeshift housing settlements around places like Goose Bay that many of them fall into difficulties and addictions and bad habits which they have a difficult time to control.

They are not the only ones in our settlements who have these bad habits, but they show particular vulnerability to them except when they are able to go back for half the year at a time and live on the land which is where their social organization, their moral tradition is founded.

For the last four decades we have increasingly prevented them from doing this. We took a chunk of their land because we found there was a rich iron mine. They were simply pushed out of that. They were not allowed to hunt there to the extent that the hunting interfered with the iron mine operations and the transportation to and from the iron mine and the city that grew up there.

Then we found the opportunity to create a great hydro dam on the Churchill River. We flooded a section of the Churchill River. We covered not only their hunting grounds but the grounds where their ancestors were buried, a number of them. Without any notice the waters began to rise and they had to get out, taking what belongings they could take with them in a hurry.

They were given no compensation for it. We simply took their land by an act of violence, even though it may not have involved any physical fighting between any of us and any of them.

Then in the more recent decades we have again taken their land and large chunks of their land for low-level flight training, training of NATO flight pilots for wars somewhere else but having an immediate destructive effect on the people who lived there for 9,000 years and in fact, according to all reports, having the effect over a number of years of endangering the very existence of that society and even within that, then, the physical, social and moral well-being of the individual people.

This present low-level flight training means that pilots are trained to fly about 30 metres above the ground over the hills, up and down, and especially along the river valleys.

The argument is that by doing this, when they are attacking places like eastern Europe they can fly underneath the radar undetected in order to bomb or strafe enemy targets in the rear of the enemy's supposedly advancing armies.

Great Britain, Germany and Netherlands at present continue this low-level flight training. Italy may be joining them. The United States, for reasons of expense, has temporarily pulled out, but earlier this year the government predicted that there would be 7,000 or 8,000 flights per year over these zones of the inner land in order to train these people for attack.

The Department of National Defence announced that it would hope it would actually rise to more than 18,000. I do not know yet actually how many there have been this year or will be although the season is nearly ended.

The inner people are being harassed, terrified and damaged by these low-level flights. When you are out in a canoe with your family fishing or whatever else is to be done in a canoe and the plane comes over you at 30 metres, it is terrifying. There is the startle effect. There is the general stress effect of extremely loud noise and there is the uneasiness afterwards wondering when those planes will come back.

Children have been known to jump out of the canoe into the water in their terror and some of the children now do not wish to go with their parents any more to the land because of the terrifying effect of the fighter airplanes. It is not only low-level flying. It is also bombing practice. They do not, as far as I understand, actually use live bombs but they set up targets and identify them photographically by the simulating attacks of the airplanes. There are 57 of these bombing targets unidentified on Innu land and they are planning to build another such area northwest of Goose Bay for bombing targets.

This Innu land that is being used for targets also extends into eastern Quebec, in fact about 50 per cent of the low-level flight area is in Quebec around the towns of Natashquan and La Romaine. The Innu people there have suffered very heavily as have the Innu people living in Labrador.

There have been environmental studies. The environmental assessment panel is still studying it. I do not know how long it will take to study it. They want to revise their study because of the present removal of the plans for a NATO base, but according to the Innu people most of the faults of the plan identified within the study are still there, that is 36 out of the 38 deficiencies in which they are deficient from standards set by the environmental assessment panel.

The Innu people in Labrador have agreed to enter preliminary discussions about land claims which were long delayed by the government. They were put way down the list for land claims while the destruction of their land continues. They are willing to enter preliminary discussions with the governments of Canada and Newfoundland. They hope that maybe in a year and a half they will be able to define the scope of the negotiations for land claims and find out whether there will be some interim protection measures rather than chasing the people out of the land while we have a long-winded debate about whose land it is and what claims those people have there.

It is like the principle of being innocent until you are proved guilty. You should not be driven out of your land while it is being decided whether that is your land when you have been living there for 9,000 years.

The government claims it is uninhabited. What it means is that these people do not have a piece of paper saying: "This is a title deed and I own this land", but they have occupied that land for 9,000 years.

In Quebec the land claim discussions are going ahead under Le Conseil attikamek-montagnais that represents the Innu people there under that name.

As I said these noise levels from the flights have been identified as being very harmful primarily to the people but also to the caribou which is a major source of food in the half-year when they live on that land, to migratory waterfowl and birds of prey, also sources of food, and partly because the exhaust of the airplanes and the fuel that they sometimes dump into the rivers or lakes contaminate the waterways and contaminate the moss that the caribou eat.

The Department of National Defence has claimed that they have an avoidance strategy of staying five kilometres away from any concentration of caribou or waterfowl. What the Innu claim is that in too many of the sensitive areas it is not possible because the Innu and the caribou or the waterfowl that they hunt tend to use the waterways, the rivers and lakes, and that is what the low-level flights use. They follow the valleys. That is the whole point: flying low in the valley to keep underneath and out of detection of the radar.

They both want the same areas and it has not been possible in fact for the low-level flights to avoid them. In spite of the stated policy the low-level flights, for example, continue at Shipiskan Lake and at Wuchusk Lake. The DND finds out where they are because when they fly in there in the spring the bush pilots know where they deposited them. The DND have them registered there in their published memos known as Goose Bay Operation Directives. These two lakes, Shipiskan and Wuchusk, were both listed on the operations directive for May 31, 1991, but they still receive frequent overflights. It has been going on all summer. DND is not serious in claiming that it tries to avoid these people. It just does not avoid them. It knows they are there and still overflies them.

The Innu have done everything they can to make their point. They have spoken to the government for years. They pointed out that they were never conquered, never ceded their land. All they want is to be allowed to live in peace, which they did before we came.

They have complained to Ottawa. They have been put off with discussions of land claims some time in the future, while the flights go on. They have won support from a good deal of the public and the churches in Canada, but also in the United States, in Britain, in The Netherlands and in Germany because these people know what the low-level flights are like. They demanded that the low-level flights be eliminated or at least greatly reduced in those countries, and so they understand what the people in Labrador and eastern Quebec are suffering.

What is at stake here is not only the appeal of the present generation, but a deeper principle. These people are have respected the ancient tradition of maintenance of the land for themselves, their neighbours and future generations. Right now they have been willing to defend the land.

When I visited there two years ago one lady told me that on her grandfather's deathbed he said: "If the white people come, don't bother them; but if they hurt the land, defend it". She did, with others, defend it non-violently. She and others walked on to the airstrip and dared the planes to land while about a hundred or so of them were sitting there. Families went, mothers, fathers, children and the elders walking with canes, and sat down on the airstrip.

They knew they faced courts, they knew they faced prisons, but they had to make their point to defend their land in the only way they could. The system of land sharing, which is many thousands of years old in all parts of the world, has now come face to face with the very recent invention of private property of the land and all the wars that go with private property in the land, and with the most mighty war machine in the world, the NATO air force along with its army.

There is no justification for continuing this. Nobody thinks Russia is going to invade Canada or western Europe. The whole rationale that was put forward for this has totally collapsed over the past couple of years. But the low-level flights continue.

In fact, low-level training has never been used in eastern Europe but it has been used in the Middle East, in the gulf war against the people of Iraq, where there was little or no danger of their being detected by radar. In other words, this technique is continuing to be used, people are trained to use it, not so as to defend Canada or western Europe from invasion by the Soviet Union but to be used when we, as extensions of the west European nations, intend to invade other lands, whether it is to take the oil of the Middle East or something else, whether it be in South America, in Africa or in parts of Asia.

In order to be prepared to destroy other indigenous people, we are now year by year destroying the indigenous people of parts of northeastern Quebec and of Labrador. It is a shame that the Canadian government continues to do this, either for profit or for the sake of imperial conquest in the southern parts of this globe.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak on the motion put forward by the hon. member for Trinity—Spadina.

There has been an air base at Goose Bay since 1942. There was no community there before that so the air base is the community.

Of course the mission since the 1960s has been low-level flying. This practice is carried on over the Ungava Peninsula because the terrain is similar to that to be overflown in eastern Europe and because of the density of the population in western Europe, particularly West Germany. What is practised is flying at low altitude so as to avoid enemy radar.

There are those who say the mission should not be carried on because, first, it is offensive not defensive.

The Follow on Forces strategy is designed to penetrate deep into enemy territory, but only following an enemy first strike. The policy of NATO is still no first strike. However, once attacked the policy of NATO for Follow on Forces is to penetrate enemy territory so as to attack installations behind the front line and to disrupt supply lines. In that context it is a defence measure.

Second, it sends the wrong signal and we should discontinue low-level flying as a Canadian contribution to NATO.

We are a partner in NATO. The low-level flying is part of our contribution to NATO. It should only be discontinued as part of a NATO strategy and after consultation among NATO partners.

Peace is breaking out rapidly. But because we were strong not because we were weak. A time of rapid change is not time to make change in defence posture unilaterally, rather reduction of forces should be balanced. It may be that in the course of disarmament discussions the Follow on Forces attack policy of NATO will be discontinued and low-level flying deemed unnecessary. That is a decision for NATO.

Third, the Innu consider Labrador their homeland and the low-level flying a threat to their culture and environment.

The Innu are the original people of Labrador. There is no question that the Innu society today is fragile or that the Innu, a minority in Ungava, feel threatened by the society of the majority all around them, or that there are other serious problems in their communities, such as alcohol, abuse, social decay.

But others consider it their homeland too—the Inuit, the Métis, the Newfoundlanders, those from other parts of Canada, including Quebec. People from all these latter groups work at Goose Bay. Some are second and third generation residents. If the base were to close, the jobs, homes, schools, businesses that these people have built and are building would disappear, all in a province which has the highest unemployment rate in Canada, and the lowest per capita income, where the main industry, the fishery industry, is in crisis, and where there are no obvious alternatives.

The Innu have rights. The others who live in Labrador have rights too. How are the rights of all the people of Labrador to be addressed? Or what must be done to ensure that all the people of Labrador live in harmony and that some do not threaten or displace others.

A process is in motion that will shed light on the problem. FEARO, the Federal Environmental Assessment Review Office, has received the environmental impact statement regarding low-level flying and the NATO base and will be holding public hearings this winter.

My position is that we should wait for the report of the FEARO panel before deciding for or against low-level flying, for or against the NATO Tactical Training Centre, which NATO cancelled its plans announced May 22, 1990. Beyond that, the situation remains basically the same particularly with respect to the importance of the military to the well-being of the community.

I hope an accommodation can be found that will allow all of the people of Labrador to live in harmony. The first step in the right direction is an immediate start and a speedy conclusion to the settlement of Innu land claims. Within this land claims process provision must be made for the tailoring of military activities to fit the livelihoods of local people.

I hope and I believe this is possible.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, today the hon. member for Trinity—Spadina has put forward three proposals. The first that the government should consider the advisability of ending NATO and NORAD low-level training in Canada. Second, we should reject the establishment of NATO operations in Canada including the training centre that was at one time proposed for Goose Bay. Third, we should direct the funds now spent on NATO and NORAD toward enabling Canada's aboriginal people to regain control of their lands and their livelihood in promoting sustainable development for all Canadians.

The wording of the motion suggests that the hon. member does not fully understand the reason for low-level flying in Canada and does not understand all the social and economic impacts of what he really is proposing. The lack of understanding is not surprising since there is a lot of misinformation out there concerning low-level flying in general and about Goose Bay in particular.

I am afraid that many well meaning Canadians share the hon. member's confusion. I welcome this opportunity to try to clarify some of the issues.

Let me begin by explaining just how much low-level training is really being conducted here in Canada. On the NORAD side no routine low-level flying is conducted by NORAD assigned aircraft except in designated areas associated with our flying training schools, such as the one at Cold Lake in Alberta.

However, the United States Strategic Air Command does from time to time conduct low-level navigation training along authorized routes within Canada. On occasion Canadian NORAD assigned fighter aircraft conduct practice interceptions of these aircraft and may for brief periods operate at low altitudes.

I do not believe however that these are the flights that are causing concern for the hon. member. Strictly speaking, no NATO low-level flying is conducted in Canada either. However, three NATO nations are entitled to conduct low-level training out of Goose Bay, Labrador, under the terms of bilateral agreements with Canada. This training is frequently referred to as NATO training.

I have no objection to that terminology except to note that it is strictly not accurate. At one time Goose Bay was being considered by NATO as a site for a new tactical fighter centre. In early 1990 NATO abandoned the proposal to establish that centre. The tactical fighter and weapons training centre referred to in the motion is therefore essentially a dead issue.

Any comments that I shall make about Goose Bay today will apply to our existing bilateral agreements, not to the NATO centre mentioned in the motion.

To understand the significance of what the hon. member is proposing, one has to understand why low-level flying is necessary. Many people I regret to say have been led to believe that allied pilots operate at low-level altitudes solely as means of flying undetected over eastern European countries en route to launch a surprise attack. That idea of course is ludicrous, but it is actively promoted by various groups, groups who are opposed to Canada's involvement in NATO and who do not let the truth interfere with their anti-military agendas.

In fact, low-level flying is a vital part of virtually all tactical fighter operations. Modern air defence weapons are so accurate and so fast in reacting that the life expectancy of a pilot operating in altitude of much more than 30 metres in hostile airspace would be measured in minutes, if not in seconds.

Fighter aircraft must operate over hostile territory if they are to be of any use. If allied nations should ever become involved in a war, fighter aircraft would be a key factor in protecting friendly troops and preventing enemy forces from sustaining an advance.

• (1730)

Many of their missions would be flown at low altitudes over enemy held territory, relatively close to the front lines. Therefore, it is essential that fighter pilots feel as much at home at 30 metres as they do at 300 metres and that takes a great deal of training and a great deal of practice.

I am told that high speed low-level flying is perhaps the most challenging role that any pilot will ever face and that those who lack proficiency become a menace to themselves and to others.

Canadian and other allied pilots should not be expected to risk their lives on our behalf unless they have been given the best training available and that includes low-level flying.

To suggest that low-level flying is a needless frill or worse, that it is an aggressive tactic associated solely with a first strike strategy, is both inaccurate and irresponsible. The question is not whether low-level flying training is necessary, but rather where it should be done.

The hon. member for Trinity—Spadina has suggested that it should not be allowed in Canada. Presumably he wonders why our allies do not train in their own countries. They do train in their own countries to the best extent possible.

Each year about 80,000 low-level training flights are conducted in the United Kingdom alone. That is about 10 times as many flights as are conducted out of Goose Bay by all the allied participants combined.

However, there are problems with low-level flying in Europe. This kind of training is difficult. It is difficult because the countries are small and densely populated and the landscape is dotted with towns, power lines, hospitals, airports and other obstacles to low flying aircraft. Many restrictions are, therefore, necessary on both the routing and the altitude within Europe.

In Canada, on the other hand, we can designate low level training in areas that have none of these obstacles. We can offer a resource to our allies that is unobtainable elsewhere, and that resource is space.

To deny our allies the use of that resource for a relatively modest low flying program that lasts only eight months of each year would call into question Canada's commitment to the allegiance.

There is no free ride. If Canada is going to derive the benefits of collective security and if we are going to use European air space for our own training programs as we have done for years, then we must be prepared to make a contribution in return. The provision of low level training areas is only one way in which we can make an immensely important contribution to the alliance at very little cost.

It is no secret that the New Democratic Party has long opposed our membership in NATO and has long objected to our contributions to the alliance. Few members of this House will therefore be surprised that the motion now before us calls for an end to both our financial contributions and our provisions of air space for low-level flying.

I would like to go on record today as saying categorically that this Government of Canada does not subscribe to those isolationist views. We regard NATO as one of the cornerstones of our foreign and defence policy and will continue to support it politically, militarily and financially as long as the need exists.

That is not to say that we believe in business as usual. Far from it. With the changes that are now taking place in eastern Europe, the role of NATO will certainly change. We will see, for example, a grater emphasis on the political component of the alliance and less on the military component.

We will see a diminishing reliance on nuclear weapons, but the value of NATO as a force for stability and international co-operation will most definitely continue.

In the months and in the years to come we can expect to see NATO play a larger role in the disarmament efforts in establishing contacts with the countries of eastern Europe. As a matter of fact, Canadians can hold their heads high in Europe because they have always done their share.

I believe Canadians want to continue to do their share to reaffirm and reconfirm their commitment to collective defence. I believe that Canadians would want us to defeat the motion now before us and I propose that we do just that.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague from Trinity—Spadina for presenting this motion.

I am not sure it is going to be voted on, but in any case I am sure if there were a vote we would find the Liberals and Conservatives again voting on the same side. They almost read off the same speech notes. I would not be surprised about that either.

The Conservative member was so eloquent about low-level flying I thought for a moment she was going to recommend that it be done over southern Calgary.

I understand from the member's interjection that she is saying it should be done over northern Alberta.

It is interesting that low-level flying is okay to that member, provided it is done over land that she considers empty land. What I am suggesting is that is one of the problems in Canada. Nobody is talking here about our commitment to NATO or to NORAD or to good training for our military personnel.

We would all like to see our military personnel flying under the safest possible conditions. What we are talking about here is a concept that is of concern and is disturbing to many Canadians. That is the idea that land occupied now and for the last 9,000 years by aboriginal people is considered empty land.

That is an attitude which suggests that aboriginal people in this country are non-persons, and that is the concern that I have.

The member talked about our commitment to the alliance. I think everybody in this world recognizes that Canada has made a commitment to NATO, is a member of NATO and exercises its commitment and lives up to its commitment.

What is this alliance set up to serve? My understanding was that the alliance was established at the time of the last war to defend the democratic states of Europe and North America, and to make sure that those nations on the other side which did not defend the rights of individuals and the rights of human beings would end up not being triumphant in that war. That is why NATO was put together.

It seems to me that this low-level flying base violates the principles upon which NATO was originally established, because if what we are saying by continuing low-level flying over aboriginal territory is that they have to sacrifice their rights, their subsistence and that their lives, their futures and their land are of no consequence at all when measured against our commitment to the alliance, then that alliance no longer is based on the principles upon which it was established in the first place.

I think that is the issue that Canada should be re-examining when it looks at what it is doing to the Inuit people in northern Labrador and Quebec.

The Prime Minister in the last little while has been travelling to Commonwealth conferences and cabinet ministers have been travelling to China for example suggesting that in the future Canadian foreign aid is going to be tied to human rights performance on the part of the recipients of Canadian aid.

I think in cases such as this we should be examining exactly what Canada's human rights performance is and how we treat our aboriginal people. Canada's image is examined around the world and the image that many people have of Canada and its human rights record was formed at the time of the Oka dispute last summer when they saw the Canadian Armed Forces of 2,000 people lined up against 55 Mohawks who were attempting to defend their land and the rights to their land within the province of Quebec.

That is the image that many people around the world have of Canada and its performance with respect to human rights. The image that many other people have across the world when they hear Canada talking about human rights is the image of an aboriginal Innu woman being dragged off a runway in northern Labrador and dragged into court because she had the temerity to try to defend her land and her subsistence against the multi-million of dollars that were being spent to establish a low-level flying training base in Labrador.

The image that many people have of Canada and its human rights performance around the world is the image of Innu and aboriginal communities in northern Canada where there are no flush toilets, where there is no running water, where there is no adequate school system, where there is no adequate health care services, where families have disintegrated as a result of the way that Canada has treated those families and isolated them on the margins of Canadian society. That is the image many people have of Canada's human rights performance that the Prime Minister is trying to defend at Commonwealth conferences and in the meetings of NATO.

I suggest that the issue we are debating today is an issue of Canada's human rights performance. What the member opposite was saying was that the government considers land occupied by the Innu now and from time immemorial to be empty land. I say that is part of the problem we are experiencing in this country. This government considers northern aboriginal people as non-people. That is the issue we are dealing with here.

Nobody is suggesting that there should not be low-level flights. That is a red herring. Nobody is suggesting that our pilots and the personnel in the armed forces of Canada and other members of the alliance should not have the kind of training they need in order for them to be safe and effective. That is not the issue here. That is not what we are talking about.

What we are talking about is the fact that Canada has selected from among all of the areas in Canada land occupied by aboriginal people in order to do this low-level flying. It has said said that the subsistence, the hunting and fishing that these people do is secondary. It has said that these people are second-class citizens in terms of their right to hunt and fish free of the interference of foreign and Canadian military fighters doing their low-level training over the area, because it has never been questioned that this kind of flying has interfered with the subsistence activities of the Innu people and deprived them of the right to hunt and fish with some security. Nobody has ever suggested that.

The problem here is not as the member for Calgary suggests, that the NDP is opposed to Canada's participation in NATO. The problem is not that we would like to see our fighters go without low-level flying training. The problem here is that Canada does not respect the very human rights that it commands other countries in the world to respect as a condition of receiving foreign aid from us.

I would hope that the member from Calgary would reconsider the statement she made. I would hope that the Liberals would reconsider the position they have taken on the Goose Bay, Labrador site and the low-level flying training that takes place in northern Labrador and Quebec. This training is destroying the livelihood of Innu people. It is destroying the way of life of those Innu people. It is being done without their consent. It is being done in violation of their human rights. It goes against the principles that all Canadians claim to stand for. It goes against the principles that the Prime Minister trumpets Canadians stand for around the world. We should all in this House reconsider that base in northern Labrador and we should do away with that base.

On the other hand, nobody is suggesting, as the Liberal member suggested, that if we shut down the base we should do away with schools and hospitals and community services in that area, because this party has always suggested that there be a conversion strategy. That conversion strategy would plan a peaceful transition from a base in northern Labrador that is based on flying training for the purposes of war and destruction, to an economy that is based on peaceful uses. I suggest that one way we might do that is to develop through negotiations with the Innu people and through a land claims and a resource settlement the kind of economic development which would incorporate not simply the non-Innu people who live in that area, but the Innu and the non-Innu people so that jobs could be created, resource development could be embarked upon and we would not require that military base in order to maintain jobs, community infrastructure, health, education and social services facilities. That is what we should be looking at. It is unfortunate that the member for Calgary and the Liberal member who spoke did not direct themselves to those kinds of solutions, rather than simply adopting the solutions that look to the past.

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, I too am pleased to be part of this debate today. There has been much discussion in a pretty general way about this low-level flying program. In the next few minutes I would like to go into more detail about the program and its economic impact on the local community.

Both those topics have a bearing on the third part of the motion now before the House, that money be diverted from NATO and NORAD to support aboriginal people and sustainable development. In a typical year our allies who participate in the Goose Bay program—Great Britain, Germany and Netherlands—arrive at Goose Bay in March or April, leave in October or November, and fly about 8,000 low-level sorties while they are there. Lest I be accused of using military jargon, I should perhaps explain that a sortie consists of a take-off and a landing.

If we were to compare the total military activity rate at Goose Bay with the rates experiences at civilian airports in the country, we would see that it is about half that of Lethbridge, Alberta, about one-seventh that of Ottawa or about one-fourteenth that of Toronto. The low-level flying itself takes place in two specially——

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate has passed the following bills without amendment: Bill C-23, an act to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act and Bill C-16, an act to amend the Agricultural Products Marketing Act and to provide for other matters in relation thereto.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

LOW-LEVEL FLIGHTS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Heap (p. 4193).

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, the low-level flying itself takes place in two specially designated areas that together total about 100,000 square kilometres. That is an area 17 times the size of Prince Edward Island or almost twice the size of Nova Scotia. In comparison with Europe, it is about 40 per cent larger than Belgium, the Netherlands and Luxembourg combined. Within that vast area of Canada there is not a single permanent resident. The day-to-day population density in other words is zero.

Compare that with a population density of about 300 persons per square kilometre in northwest Europe and we can immediately appreciate why the Goose Bay area is so well suited to low flying operations. If the entire population of Canada were to be moved into the Goose Bay low flying area, the resulting density would still be lower than that of the Netherlands.

It is true that hunting and fishing parties occasionally enter the flying areas for periods of up to a few weeks at a time. At the peak of the season these transient groups may increase the population density to about one person for every 100 square kilometres. Although that density is still extremely low, the equivalent of about two bus loads of people in the province of Prince Edward Island, we recognize that no one likes to be overflown by low flying aircraft. The military, therefore, have avoided low overflying areas where any persons are present and continues to offer to avoid low overflying any person or group whose position is made known to them. If a group already in the area should decide to change its movement plans, the military is willing to change its flight routes daily if necessary to accommodate them. Since most groups are in radio contact with the outside world the passing of revised travel plans should not be a problem. Overflights in the Goose Bay area are a problem only for those who wish to make them so.

• (1750)

By contrast, the Goose Bay low flying program brings major benefits to the community of Happy Valley, Goose Bay. During the flying season the base employs approximately 900 civilians, about one-third of whom are aboriginals, and generates an additional 1,000 to 1,200 indirect jobs. In total the base is responsible for about half the employment in the local area. In 1991 alone the base will contribute over $100 million to the Labrador economy through wages and local purchases.

We are looking here at what is essentially a one-industry town. The base exists solely to support the low flying program. If that program were to be terminated, as my hon. friend has suggested, all those jobs and all those expenditures would cease almost immediately. We would see a thriving economy destroyed virtually overnight.

I wonder whether the member for Trinity—Spadina is aware of that. I wonder whether his party, which professes to have so much concern for the average Canadian, is aware that its doctrinaire, anti-military agenda for the Goose Bay region could force hundreds of people out of work and on to the welfare rolls.

Perhaps the hon. member feels that other industries could be attracted to the Goose Bay area to compensate for the loss of the base. If he has any ideas, I know that the people of Happy Valley, Goose Bay would be pleased to hear them. They have tried over the years to develop other industries in Labrador but none has produced more than a few scattered jobs and only a few have been economically viable.

The fact is that it is not easy to replace a $100 million a year industry in a relatively isolated part of the country. In case my hon. friend is thinking that we could merely the divert the money that is now spent on the flying program to some pie in the sky make work project or to increased welfare payments, let me set the record straight on that idea too. Most of the money being spent in Goose Bay comes not from Canada but from the European user nations. If the low flying stops the funding stops with it.

I am not suggesting that everything about the low flying program in Goose Bay is problem-free and heartily endorsed by all local residents. Problems do exist and some local residents, particularly those in the nearby aboriginal community, object strenuously to the program. But we believe that the problems can be overcome if all interested parties would work together to find solutions.

In the past five years DND has spent almost $7 million on various environmental studies to ensure that the low flying program is environmentally acceptable. In addition, the government has provided more than $2 million to the association that represents the local aboriginal communities so that they may prepare land claim documentation. A further $1 million is being spent each year by the user nations for monitoring and mitigation projects aimed at reducing or eliminating environmental problems.

The government is doing everything reasonably possible to make the Goose Bay project environmentally and socially acceptable to everyone.

No, the Goose Bay project is not without its opponents, but then how many $100 million a year industries are. In my view the benefits of the low flying program to the community of Happy Valley, Goose Bay, to the province of Newfoundland and Labrador, and to the aboriginal people who wish to take advantage of it far outweigh the real or imagined disadvantages.

That notwithstanding, if it can ever be shown that the environmental problems outweigh the economic, social and military benefits, we are prepared to terminate the program at the earliest possible opportunity.

Let me move now to the final proposal embodied in the motion now before us which calls for a redirection of NATO and NORAD funding to aboriginal programs and the promotion of sustainable development.

I find this part of the motion particularly intriguing. Does the hon. member really believe that support for aboriginal peoples and for sustainable development should depend on cancellation of programs that have been a cornerstone of Canadian foreign and defence policies for decades? Is he really serious in that proposal? I suggest not.

I suggest that the motion is nothing more than a blatant attempt to curry favour with aboriginal peoples and the unemployed in the full knowledge that the underlying proposal could never be accepted. It is grandstanding.

Of course the Government of Canada will provide funding for aboriginal development. We already devote billions of dollars every year to various aboriginal programs including those associated with land claims and we are opening up new avenues every year.

Of course, sustainable development remains an objective of the Government of Canada. Why should the fate of those very worth-while programs hinge upon our withdrawal from NATO and NORAD? Where is the connection? There is none, except in the minds of the members opposite.

To conclude, let me review very briefly just what we are being asked to support. First, we are asked to deny our allies the right to use Canadian air space for training that is an essential part of military preparedness and that cannot reasonably be accomplished elsewhere. If we do that, we will show ourselves to be an unreliable ally and will lose much of the respect we now enjoy in the alliance. At the same time, we will cause mass unemployment and hardship in an area of the country that has few, if any, employment options. The proposal is foolish in the extreme.

Second, we are asked to reject the establishment of NATO operations in Canada, including the proposed NATO tactical fighting centre. The NATO tactical fighting centre is the only NATO operation that has been considered for Canada and even that has been a dead issue for months. It is hard to understand why the hon. member is still concerned about it. If some other NATO facility were to be proposed for Canada, I suggest that the only reasonable response would be to examine it on its own merits. To ban all future NATO operations in Canada, even though none have been proposed, would needlessly call into question our commitment to the alliance. The proposal is pointless and potentially damaging.

Finally, as I have discussed, we are asked to terminate all NATO and NORAD funding so that we may divert the money to aboriginal and developmental projects. How very short-sighted that would be. Membership in NATO and NORAD provides Canada with influence in Washington and European capitals that we would otherwise lack. It enables us to advance our views about disarmament and international co-operation. It keeps us in the forefront of developments in eastern Europe and it enables us to maintain surveillance of our coast lines and to participate in other aspects of North American defence at minimum cost.

We are not so desperate that we must terminate our membership in very important international organizations so that we may further fund domestic programs, no matter how worth while they may be. The proposal, as I have already suggested, is probably nothing more than window-dressing for the NDP political agenda.

In short, the motion now before the House has nothing to recommend it. Its approval would do immeasurable harm to our international relations and our defence posture and would effectively kill a small town in one of the less advantaged parts of this country.

I invite all members of the House to join me in expressing their total rejection of an ill-conceived motion.

Mr. Guy Ricard (Laval-Ouest): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to today's debate on low-level flights near Goose Bay as part of Canada's commitment to NATO. I think that we must understand NATO's role in the world.

I have often heard members from the New Democratic Party say that Canada should withdraw from NATO because we have nothing to gain by remaining in that organization.

• (1800)

Mr. Speaker, one must remember that NATO is crucial to stability in the new Europe. This is not a new organization. It brings together politicians; it is a political group of 16 democratic countries. These are not totalitarian countries; they are not countries that do not believe in democracy; they are democratic countries.

I sincerely believe that we, as North Americans, must also give our support to these people. I was listening earlier to the member who presented the motion. He was telling us that airplanes flew at an altitude of some 30 metres. Mr. Speaker, if my calculations are accurate, 30 metres is roughly a hundred feet high. I wonder if the hon. member meant 300 metres when he said 30 metres—

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, the problem of airport noise from Pearson airport is very real and continues unabated.

The airport's surrounding communities have had to endure frequent aircraft take-off and landings every 30 seconds in late night flights on the routes directly over their homes well past the established airport's curfew.

During my meetings with the numerous community and ratepayer groups along with hundreds of local residents in my riding, they demand that the Minister of Transport enforce the regulations at least to alternate flights to and from Pearson on runways 24R and 24L.

In addition, the cavalier attitude expressed by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport against community groups is offensive to their concerns and displays his lack of understanding of the problem at hand. His misguided comments in the Mississauga news, for example, show blatant disregard for the plight of the public.

The minister and government must act now so that the pleas of community groups living around Pearson are not drowned out by airport noise or any noise emanating from the government benches.

CANADA POST

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. Marcel Danis, the Minister of Labour and member for Verchères, who managed to include an amendment to section 7 in the special back-to-work legislation for postal workers.

Thanks to this amendment, postal workers were able to have the legislation cover certain items on which agreement had been reached during the mediation process under Judge Alan Gold.

Mr. Danis did this to ensure that what had already been accomplished during the process would not be lost.

NUCLEAR VESSELS

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, today the Minister of National Defence announced that the government was consenting to all future visits to Canada of U.S. and U.K. nuclear powered and nuclear armed military vessels.

This decision is taken without any public participation or consultation. In fact by using the Order in Council route, a procedure already ruled illegal by the Canadian courts, the government is deliberately seeking to avoid a public environmental review.

The consequences of a nuclear accident, especially in built-up areas such as Victoria, are incredibly serious. Emergency procedures are not fully in place.

Finally the decision flies in face of the rapid de-escalation of the nuclear arms race. Instead of taking this particular position the government should have shown leadership and placed a moratorium on nuclear visits to Canadian waters at least until a full public independent environmental assessment takes place.

WHITE RIBBONS AGAINST PORNOGRAPHY WEEK

Mr. Lee Clark (Brandon—Souris): Mr. Speaker, many church congregations throughout my constituency of Brandon—Souris are actively participating in White Ribbons Against Pornography Week, October 27 to November 3.

I would like to take this opportunity to add my words of support to this campaign. In an age of increasing violence, which seems to be particularly and tragically directed against women and children, society must do all it can to negate the all too present message which erroneously suggests to some that such violence is an inevitable part of life.

Society must also address the problem of the production and utilization of pornographic materials, and particularly when children are the subjects. Such degrading and exploitive material by implication diminishes the values of those who are portrayed therein and in my opinion helps create a climate which leads directly to the violence which we abhor, to the violence which must be prevented.

PROSPERITY THROUGH COMPETITIVENESS

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade tabled a document in this House entitled Prosperity Through Competitiveness.

He started out his comments by saying "Canadians today are perplexed and confused". That was the most meaningful statement of his entire speech. He went on to talk about prosperity, education and other subjects. He did not mention the fact that because of the government's softwood lumber tax which was belatedly removed and the high Canadian dollar this government has been guilty of increasing welfare payments by 500 per cent to 2,000 per cent in some municipalities where lumber was the main industrial employer.

He forgot to tell this House that when he was Minister of Finance the transfer payments to the provinces for education were cut back. Training programs were cut back. He forgot to tell Canadians that his government promised large increases in research and development to help Canada to be more competitive. Today research and development is at its lowest point in decades.

Because of what the government has failed to do, it has created havoc and hardship for many families and has discouraged young people in their outlook for the future. It has failed the children and young people of this nation and it has failed the very nation itself.

LITERACY

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, it is with pride that I rise today to share the news of an important honour bestowed upon one of our members.

Last week the Canadian National Institute for the Blind and the Louis Braille Memorial Committee awarded the Louis Braille commemorative medallion to the hon. Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship.

It is a rare honour, having been presented to Canadian recipients only on two previous occasions since 1952 when the medallion was first struck in Paris. The distinguished award was given at the launch of the Braille Literacy Foundation in Toronto. The Government of Canada has placed $1 million toward the establishment of this vital and high profile project. This contribution is but the most recent of numerous steps forward that we have taken in the area of literacy, in partnership with business, labour, various levels of government and the voluntary sector.

The silver medallion was presented to our minister and is indeed a shining tribute to the universality of literacy in our land.

MEME BREAST IMPLANT

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the time for this government to act in the interests of Canadian women who have had the Meme breast implant has long passed. We have heard the words of concern from the present minister and the pious assertions of his predecessors that all was being done to safeguard the health of Canadian women.

What we have yet to see is any concrete action to address this serious health issue.

Following my meeting with the minister in July, we were assured that an internal review of his department, and the approval that followed of the Meme breast implant for use in Canada, was under way and would be available soon. We are still waiting.

I have asked the minister in this House and in other forums to establish an independent judicial inquiry into the actions taken by his department in allowing the Meme to be sold in Canada.

Today I request on behalf of the thousands of Canadian women who have had the Meme breast implant the establishment of an independent external audit of the working of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

In particular the actions taken or omitted by the Medical Devices Branch of that department need to be the subject of a comprehensive investigation. Canadian women have the right to know the exact extent to which this government has gone to safeguard their health.

INTERNATIONAL PEE-WEE HOCKEY TOURNAMENT

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, for more than 25 years, the best pee-wee hockey players have met annually to play during a ten-day tournament in the riding of Québec-Est.

This international event is absolutely unique. For more than 25 years, the tournament has received nothing but praise from heads of State, hockey organizations, and especially from parents and participants.

Many great hockey players consider this an unforgettable experience. We have never heard any remarks with racist overtones, when we welcome hundreds of native people, Europeans and Asians.

I must say, however, that with Max Gros-Louis, I deplore the negative overtones of an exchange between Bev Morin and the president of the tournament. I am sure it was an unfortunate misunderstanding, and I am convinced that no one wants to use young people for political purposes.

In February 1992, Québec-Est will once again welcome thousands of young people who will come here to have fun, demonstrate their skills and get to know each other. We hope the team from Thompson will be applauded just like other participating teams.

CHILD POVERTY

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, over one million children in Canada are living in poverty, too many of them deprived of the basic human rights of adequate food, shelter and clothing.

In response to concerns raised here by me and across this country by others, it is obvious that the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Health and Welfare have never been forced to deny their own children food when they were hungry, drink when they were thirsty, adequate shelter when they were homeless, a loving home because economic stress had caused familial breakdown and havoc. Not having experienced this themselves, they deny the harsh reality of it for other Canadians.

The consequences of raising over one million children in Canada in conditions of poverty will be more devastating to our nation's well-being than our current debt. Our children are our nation's future. More than enough studies indicate how impoverished children become the health, illiteracy, early school dropout, disabled and welfare statistics of the future. This government must get real, re-evaluate current policies and assure that all future policies set the well-being of our nation's children as its first priority.

Mr. Brian White (Dauphin—Swan River): Mr. Speaker, less than 4 per cent of Canadians live on farms today, yet the industry generates billions of dollars worth of exports each year. In fact, from 1969 to 1988 the value of agricultural exports grew from $1.2 billion to $10.3 billion.

However, in recent years our farm industry across Canada has been devastated by record low prices for their quality products. In the midst of this crisis in agriculture, Canadians continue to pay the world's second lowest percentage of disposable income on food.

I think it is time that Canadians consider providing recognition and long-term support for our food producers by paying a targeted levy on the over $40 billion we spend each year on food. For example, the levy could be an annually adjusted rate which is designed to ensure a minimum farm income equal to a pre-1990 five-year average.

If our pledges of support for the family farm are to be more than just empty rhetoric, then we as Canadians should be willing to pay a small premium on our food bill to ensure the survival of agriculture, which historically has meant so much to our national economy.

RIDING OF BEAUSÉJOUR

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to draw the attention of this House once again to a situation in the riding of Beauséjour that is most unfair. In most of New Brunswick, workers need ten weeks of unemployment to be eligible for unemployment insurance programs. In Westmorland, however, the requirement is sixteen weeks, which for some people is out of the question.

[English]

A big proportion of workers in Westmorland will not find the required 16 weeks of work. I ask the Minister of Employment and Immigration to make the necessary adjustments so that the people of rural Westmorland will be treated exactly the same way as the people of rural Kent who are treated differently.

I want to see everybody treated the same way. That is why I am asking the minister to treat all the fishermen and workers of the riding of Beauséjour with justice.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, today marks the 19th anniversary of the class of 1972, those members of Parliament first elected on October 30, 1972 who went on to unbroken re-election victories and still sit as members of this House. I believe these members deserve to be recognized as the rare breed they are: political survivors.

On October 30, 1972, 59 Conservatives, 23 Liberals, 11 New Democrats, and 3 Socreds were elected for the first time. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to say that you and I were counted among those numbers. However, of the 96 there are only 11 Conservatives and 2 Liberals remaining with unbroken electoral records.

In the Liberal caucus there remain Jean-Robert Gauthier and the Hon. Bill Rompkey. In the Conservative caucus there is you, Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Harvie Andre, the Hon. Perrin Beatty, the Right Hon. Joe Clark, the Hon. Paul Dick, the Hon. Jake Epp, the Hon. Otto Jelinek, Bill Kempling, Gus Mitges, the Hon. Frank Oberle, and myself.

In an age when public cynicism is high and the fortunes of political life at an all-time low, we are to be commended for our resiliency and ability to buck the trend.

TERRITORIAL WATERS

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Today the Secretary of State for External Affairs again gave in to pressure from the Americans. By order in council, she gave them the right of passage for their nuclear-powered submarines in Canadian territorial waters.

Mr. Speaker, can the Prime Minister tell us why the government again yielded to American pressure, when the cold war is over?

Does the government intend to rescind this utterly ridiculous order in council?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the matter of sovereignty over Canadian territorial waters is clear. We agreed to the situation involving submarines and we continue to consult the Americans, but it was done cooperatively.

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister.

It is not the first time that this government has failed to defend the sovereignty of Canada. It seems to me that every time President Bush sneezes the Prime Minister catches pneumonia.

When will the Prime Minister stop caving in to the President of the United States and start standing for Canada?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, allowing U.S. and British submarines into Canadian waters has been a part of Canadian defence policy for a great many years. This was done on a consultative basis. We have not in any way given up our sovereignty on the waters that are under dispute. It is clear to us that those are our waters. The Americans consulted with us. The submarines are coming with our consent and we have been able to achieve certain guarantees as a result of those discussions.

Now that is exercising sovereignty.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to know from the minister what kind of deal it is. We have said clearly for generations that we did not want any nuclear submarines in Canadian waters. Is it quid pro quo in order to have certain a concession, to accept that? We do not want these submarines in Canadian waters at all. It is clear; and this has been the position taken by this Parliament many times over.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as usual the Leader of the Opposition is totally on the wrong track. This is a part of our co-operative defence. It has been a part of our co-operative defence for a great many years and it will continue to be into the future.

I should point out that this is an acoustical testing facility only. It is not in any way a base for nuclear submarines. We are continuing to co-operate and we are realistic about our defence needs, about our deterrent needs and about our sovereignty, and that is what this is about.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, the government's decision has put our environment at risk. It has put at risk the lives of people. All the ports will now have warships visiting them. It thoroughly undermines our sovereignty, and it was done without any parliamentary debate, without any consultation with the people affected. It was done in secret.

How can this government claim there is any democracy left in Canada when it makes a decision like this that affects thousands of people and it is done behind closed doors?

• (1420)

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member seems to forget that in August 1967, long before Mr. Bush even thought of becoming President of the United States, we had a Liberal government in Canada which adopted a policy of allowing nuclear-powered ships to enter our territorial waters provided Canada had a verification procedure with the country concerned.

So this is not a new policy as the hon. member would have the House believe. Your government authorized such things in 1967!

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, we have a minister who says: "If you let a thief in your house and you say 'surrender', somehow you have won a victory, and it is not a crime".

I want to ask the minister this. The Order in Council explicitly says as follows: "if claims arise out of a nuclear accident, there will be a diplomatic conference". Are we saying that we are going to have a diplomatic international conference over the ashes of people if there is a nuclear accident? Is that the safeguard this government has provided?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I think that the hon. member should go back and see in his own notes what he would have done in 1968 in such a case, Mr. Speaker.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Today the Economic Council of Canada has confirmed that the economic and budgetary policies of this government have set us on the road to the most costly and least desirable constitutional options, and I quote: "The government's decision to alter its commitments to existing fiscal arrangements with the provinces unleashed pressures for decentralization".

I want to say to the Prime Minister that the most valued contribution he can make to unity in this country is to abandon the disastrous economic policies that have led to pressures for greater decentralization.

Therefore, I ask the Prime Minister, in the interests of turning the constitutional debate around in a direction that makes sense for all Canadians, will he immediately restore federal funding to health programs, post-secondary programs and social assistance so that we can deal with the needs of all Canadians?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not had the opportunity to read carefully the document of the Economic Council of Canada to which my hon. friend refers. Apparently the principal conclusion is in regard to some economic consequences for sovereignty association.

That may have been an interesting conclusion when the question of sovereignty association was debated 11 years ago, and resolved 11 years ago. Sovereignty association is no longer relevant.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: Apart from a few people who want to freeload on the back of Canada, I am telling you it is not an option.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: I have a little message for them. You cannot be a part-time Canadian. You cannot have the benefits of Canada while you are trying to undermine the integrity of the nation on the other.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: In Montreal last week I indicated that the question was one of great simplicity. You are either going to be a Canadian or you are going to be citizens of another country. Therefore, the Economic Council of Canada report might have been interesting 11 years ago, as it dealt with sovereignty association, the question that was on the ballot then.

The question now, for all of us to decide, is do you want one country Canada or do you want to be citizens of a foreign country? When that question is squarely put to Quebecers, they will opt for Canada.

[Translation]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question. I agree with the Prime Minister that we must have a united Canada, but it is also a question of the government's economic policies. I would call the Prime Minister's attention to page 101, where it says that clearly, the present constitutional crisis is exacerbated by a whole series of financial and economic pressures. For example, the fight against inflation has produced very high unemployment.

So if the Prime Minister wants to build a Canada where everyone would like to live, will he put forward a recovery plan so that Quebec's 400,000 jobless can find work before the referendum, not after?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am told that this study concludes that sovereignty-association would cost each Quebec family at least $1,800 a year for at least a generation. That is sovereignty-association. The Council did not study the real issue, which is the cost of independence. If the Council concluded that sovereignty-association would cost $1,800 per Quebec family for a generation, imagine the cost of independence!

[English]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I suggest to the Prime Minister that in this report there were very condemning conclusions about the economic policies of this government and the implications of that for national unity. Yes, sovereignty association was one subject. It was not the total of the report. It was the economic policies of this government.

For example, the report says the experience of the past two years should not be allowed to repeat itself. We on this side agree. Economic policies that caused unemployment cannot continue in this country.

I want to ask the Prime Minister again: Will his government immediately restore federal funding to such programs as health and social spending and post-secondary education? Will he do that now in the interest of national unity?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, while not having had an opportunity to study the report in detail, there is one thing that was drawn to my attention. That is the fact that the Economic Council is projecting real growth to reach 4.2 per cent in 1992 and 5.1 per cent in 1993. That compares with our projections of 3.2 per cent in 1992 and 4.1 per cent in 1993. They are considerably more optimistic on the growth front than we are. They are also more optimistic on the employment opportunities as well.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that clearly indicates that we are following a course of sustained durable recovery with price stability.

I am really surprised that the hon. member is so much against inflation. I thought that the NDP were the champions of the under dog, the senior citizens, the people on fixed incomes. It is runaway inflation that erodes the income base of senior citizens and low income people. They should be applauding our efforts.

With respect to transfer payments, when this government came into office, it transferred to the provinces in 1984–85 $25.6 billion. In 1992–93, in the next fiscal year, we will be transferring $38.1 billion, an increase of $12.5 billion or almost 50 per cent.

ADVERTISING

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Yesterday the government launched its so-called prosperity and learning initiative in the House of Commons. Two ministers stood in the House and briefed Parliament and subsequently briefed the press in a press conference and answered questions about the reported $15 million program.

I want to ask the Prime Minister this. Why did both those ministers, the minister of trade and the minister of employment, withhold information about an additional $4.5 million advertising program to be jointly funded by both their ministries, 50–50, and to be launched in the next few weeks, and an advertising blitz called "Yes We Can"? Why were Canadians not given all the information yesterday?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I believe at that press conference and certainly on other occasions yesterday I talked quite openly about advertising. I did say that there would be an advertising program. It would be financed in part from the secretariat, $500,000 from the secretariat, but in part from the budgets of other government departments.

It is those other government departments which have other advertising programs in government and will be doing so under the broad umbrella of the "Yes We Can" theme, the competitiveness theme.

• (1430)

It is not incremental spending in that sense. I have been quite open about it and I will continue to be open about it.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, Canadians should note that the program has grown from $15 million to $20 million in 24 hours.

I want to ask the minister another question. It was clear yesterday in the briefing with the senior official involved, Mr. Tony Eyton, that an unspecified amount of money is also going to be spent on consultants and to pay for studies.

The estimate given yesterday was $5 million for that program. Will the minister now confirm that yesterday's initiative is not $15 million, but with the $5 million he just admitted and with another $5 million in his new spirit of openness—I expect him to admit this—the total program is $25 million.

Rather than listening to Canadians, $15 million is going to be spent on a communications and advertising blitz. How can you say you are listening when you are dumping a barrage of propaganda on the heads of Canadians?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I think my hon. friend was told this morning by members of the secretariat that $5 million which he has just concluded now is going to be an advertising blitz is nothing like an advertising blitz.

It is moneys that will be spent on consultants, on printing and distribution, toll free telephone information services and things that are related to serving the consultation process on a community basis.

If the hon. member wants to ask me another question, he can ask the other question.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, on October 9, 1980, the then Leader of the Opposition, the right hon. member for Yellowhead said about advertising: "I think that attempts to spend public money to manipulate public opinion on public questions that have not been decided is an improper practice that offends the right of the House of Commons".

I want to ask the minister who has just answered how he can justify spending $25 million that Canadians do not have to propagate the policy of a failing government. How can that be right?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is suggesting that we should not be talking about the challenges of international competitiveness.

He is suggesting that these are not issues that Canadians want to learn more about and that Canadians do want to participate in in a broad way as we are proposing through the community consultations.

I would tell my hon. friend first of all that Canadians want to participate in them. They have said that international competitiveness is the most important issue that they are facing in a poll that was put out just on Monday by the Toronto Star and the CBC.

We are responding to that great concern by watching this prosperity initiative so we can strengthen the economy of this country in the coming years.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I want to remind the minister that the ultimate democratic consultation is called an election.

[Translation]

My supplementary is directed to the Prime Minister, the ultimate guardian of the public purse. Once more, Tory cronies are going to dip into it and receive advertising contracts. Will the Prime Minister make a commitment today and promise all Canadians that none of this money will be spent before there is a public tender for advertising contracts? Is he prepared to give us this assurance today?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, we have indicated our proposal to launch the broadest possible consultation process.

A large amount of the spending that is in that money that was referred to by his colleague is money that is being spent within the government on public servants who are being reallocated from other government departments.

To suggest that this is a total amount of new money first of all is wrong. It is reallocated money. It is reallocated people directed to focus on the most important economic issue that we are facing today, improving our competitive position internationally.

NUCLEAR VESSELS

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Despite the distortions and protests of the Liberals earlier in Question Period, it was in fact they who opened our territorial waters and ports to nuclear vessels a quarter of a century ago.

An hon. member: Shameful.

Mr. Fulton: What has happened today to the Dixon Entrance, the richest fishing grounds in Canada, is however much more serious. It is on those points that I would like the Secretary of State to address her mind. The technique that has been used to exempt U.S. nuclear submarines from transiting Dixon Entrance was found to be illegal by the Federal Court in May of this year.

My question to the minister is this: Why has she and the cabinet chosen to use a technique that has already been found illegal and denies the public in British Columbia the right to assess the real and measurable risks of submarines involved in testing activities in our waters and to the north of our waters?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first of all, let me remind the hon. member of two things. First of all, this is an acoustical testing facility. It is not a nuclear testing facility.

Second, let me remind the hon. member that the history of U.S. nuclear submarines is an excellent one in terms of safety, that we have discussed with them and we have consent from them concerning their use of our sovereign waters and that we have received from them assurances on how these waters will be passed through by these submarines to reach the acoustic testing facility.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the same minister because this is much more serious than what the minister wants to address. Certainly a public review is where you address the serious risks that the public face.

What I am asking is a procedural question of the minister. It is abundantly clear from documentation that was provided to cabinet that this technique was already found to be illegal in the Kemano–Alcan case. You cannot use Order in Council powers to exempt yourself in any decision from things such as this.

My question to the minister is will you remove yourself from this situation—

Mr. Speaker: The matter the hon. member raises is of course important, but I do ask hon. members to stay within the rules in presenting their questions.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think there are two important things here. First of all, the environmental aspects of this activity were reviewed pursuant to the 1990 cabinet decision to ascertain the environmental implications of cabinet decisions.

Responsible departments did analyse the information that was relevant to this activity including the final environmental impact statement assessment, as was done for the SEAFAC facility, the thoroughness of which has successfully withstood a court challenge in the U.S.

Pursuant to government policy, the results of a preliminary environmental assessment will be made available to the public.

CONVENTION ON THE RIGHTS OF THE CHILD

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, over a year ago, the Prime Minister co-chaired with great fanfare the United Nations World Summit for Children where the Convention on the Rights of the Child was passed. This convention still sits on the shelf in the Prime Minister's office gathering dust.

Some hon. members: You are all wrong.

Mrs. Finestone: Fine. Will the Prime Minister today then, if I am so absolutely wrong, do the right thing and send a message to all Canadian children and to the advocates who are sitting here in the House and tell them where, when and how this convention will be signed?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the convention is not on the shelf of the Prime Minister. The convention has been proposed to the provinces as we said it would. The provinces are first responsible for children.

What the Prime Minister and I said is that as soon as the provinces have ratified or accepted the convention, it will be signed. We are still waiting for two provinces, one of which was recently involved in an election, and we are told that the provinces will deal quickly with the matter. I still say that the convention will be ratified before the end of the year.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, if the minister knows when the convention is going to be passed then political will should get it passed now.

The plight of the children of Canada is really staggering. One in six live in poverty, homelessness is at emergency levels, too many children still live in families that live below the poverty line, health conditions for our aboriginal children compare to that of the Third World, and this government's economic mismanagement is driving more people on to the bread lines.

My question to the Prime Minister is this. What concrete steps is he taking that will address and redress, right now, the crisis conditions faced by over one million Canadian children who are still living in poverty in this country.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will answer right now. This week I had four meetings with people dealing with children. I do not believe there is one member in this House who does not want to deal with the problems of children. It is a very serious one and must be addressed by all Canadians.

The member will recall that all departments of this government spend approximately $15 billion a year. We would like to do more and we will. I have already announced that the government will come forward with a strategy before the end of the year. We will need the help of every Canadian.

I believe that Canadians understand that to be able to provide services to children we have to create the resources. I ask my friend to help me get the resources, starting with a good economy in this country.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, in times of economic distress, children must be the last to suffer.

A year ago the Prime Minister said at the UN World Summit for Children: "Canada still has serious problems that affect children in many ways".

This morning on Parliament Hill, some 500 child symposium delegates told members of Parliament: "Child poverty in Canada is a national scandal".

Since a national child care program is crucial to any child poverty strategy, when will this government make good on this age old promise?

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of the hon. member I will repeat what I said to his predecessor. This government has a long-standing commitment to dealing with problems concerning children, not just daycare but also the whole problem of child sexual abuse, family violence and school drop-outs. I think this is a global problem.

So far, in terms of available resources, the government has gone as far as it could in allocating those resources, and it is committed to doing more in the future. But this cannot happen, Mr. Speaker —As I told the groups this morning, I refuse to make any promises because it all depends on our capacity to generate the necessary resources. And as I said before—since I was asked not to talk about interest rates—when interest rates are at 25 per cent, there are no available resources to take care of Canada's children.

[English]

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the government knew its resources when it promised day care six years ago and several times since, but it did not fulfil the promise.

Another very sad fact is that aboriginal children in Canada live under horrific health and social standards, with an acutely high number of infant deaths and suicides.

What is the minister prepared to do today to eliminate these alarming problems? Will he allow Canada's children to become the lost generation?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I had the opportunity last summer to visit many reserves in Canada, particularly in the member's home province.

I totally agree with him that what is a problem for white people becomes a more difficult problem for aboriginal people in all parts of the country. That is why the health services branch of the department is working closely with the chiefs of the First Nations.

I asked the ministers of health of all provinces to be with me at a meeting in Winnipeg last September with leaders of the aboriginal communities to find a way to answer the health problems of children in particular. We put particular emphasis on children. Once again, it has to be done within the capacity we have. I am looking forward to continuing to work with Indian leaders to give all the relief we can to aboriginal children in Canada.

SOUTH AFRICA

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

South Africa has made significant strides in dismantling apartheid and perhaps now is the time to reconsider having normal trading relations with that country. Therefore, my question is this: when will the government lift trade sanctions?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to be able to report that, as a result of efforts by this government through working with the Commonwealth, the sanctions policy with regard to South Africa has proven to be an effective one.

As a result of the progress made in South Africa, the Commonwealth heads of government two weeks ago agreed to an immediate removal of people to people sanctions and indeed, Canada has already done that.

The trade and investment sanctions will be lifted when there are appropriate transitional mechanisms agreed to by all the parties. It is our hope that there will be an all-party conference in the near future, but we do not want to prejudge at this point what those transitional arrangements might be.

We are pleased to see some progress. We are looking for more, and once those transitional arrangements are in place, we will be happy to take further steps as outlined in the Commonwealth report.

RIGHTS OF THE CHILD

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

As the minister responsible for children, I would like to ask the minister a very simple question. Does the minister agree with his colleague, the Minister for International Trade, who last week claimed that no man, woman or child goes without adequate medical care, decent shelter or proper food in Canada, or does he believe the over 500 delegates at the Canada's children conference who told him today that it is a national scandal that there are over one million children living in poverty in Canada.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would agree that as long as there is one child in this country having a problem with poverty or violence, there is a problem. I agree with that. I said that on Monday and I repeated it this morning. But the fact of the matter is, we have to find the answers. The answers have to be based upon the fact that we have the capacity to provide even more than $15 billion a year by all departments of this government.

But I call on my friend to help me to find a way. He knows very well when 250,000 people lose their jobs in Ontario, it means more poor people, more poor children. If we can give these people a chance to find jobs in a good economy, we give a chance to the children of Canada.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to hear that from the minister. Perhaps the next time he is sitting beside the Minister for International Trade in cabinet he could explain a few things to him and maybe we will see some solutions for Canada's children.

Later this year Canada will ratify the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child. This convention commits Canada to recognizing "the right of every child to a standard of living adequate for the child's physical, mental, spiritual, moral and social development."

The government has capped social assistance contributions for over half of Canada's poor, deindexed critical social programs, cut back education, health funding and equalization payments and reneged on its commitment regarding child care.

I ask the minister if he can explain to us how these measures will fulfil the commitments this government has undertaken under the UN convention.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I simply repeat the commitment I made at the United Nations, that we expect the convention to be ratified by the end of 1991. That is within this year. That was the undertaking I made on behalf of the Government of Canada and it will be respected.

One of the problems we have is to make sure it is accepted and implemented within areas of provincial jurisdiction. In Saskatchewan, for example, I believe we are still waiting for a response. I am sure that the new government, upon its swearing in, will deal with this on a priority basis. As soon as it signifies its intention to fully ratify the provisions that apply provincially, we will make certain the rest of it is done.

We view our commitment to children as an extremely high priority, not only for the government but for all members of the House. My hon. friend suggests that we have been cutting back. The Minister of Finance has just indicated, contrary to the contention, that transfer payments by the federal government to the provinces, transfers to children, to the elderly, to welfare and so on, have increased by 50 per cent in seven years. The total amount is some $12.5 billion.

I want to point out to my hon. friend, when he is talking about the problems of children, these are not because we have cut back—perhaps as a nation we haven't done enough—but we have increased dramatically the contribution of this government to children; it is not because we have cut back.

We have increased funding, although as a nation obviously we have to do much more, and we will.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is for either the Minister of National Revenue or the Minister of Finance.

It concerns the GST credit for 18 year olds. In the province of Alberta, and I assume all of Canada, an 18 year old is considered an adult. They can drive a car, they can go into debt, they can vote and they can pay taxes. However, they cannot collect the GST credit unless they are a parent or married.

Many young people are very independent by 18. They live on their own and try to make ends meet. The refusal to pay them the GST credit is a slap in the face, saying that they really aren't independent at all.

The quirk in this new goods and services tax is discriminatory based on age. Is the minister going to correct this quirk and allow all eligible 18 year olds to collect the GST credit?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the GST refund for people under the age of 19 is handled in exactly the same way as the federal sales tax refund was handled. To do what the hon. member suggests would be administratively very difficult if not impossible. As he knows, if they are claimed as a dependent living with their parents, they do qualify. If they are married and under the age of 19 they qualify for the GST rebate and if they have any children they qualify for that as well.

But I repeat, it would administratively difficult to alter the way in which it is being administered as it was under the FST.

HENRIETTE HADDAD

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs and it concerns the Canadian woman who has been held hostage in Lebanon for the last six years.

The minister said in a letter to me earlier this week that there is no proof that Mrs. Haddad was taken hostage. What about Lebanese press reports of her kidnapping on September 26, 1985? What about the four people who heard Nabih Berri, head of the Shi'ite militia, say his group was holding Mrs. Haddad? What about the three Lebanese hostages who said they saw Mrs. Haddad during their own captivity? And what about the medical doctor who was told she was held hostage?

How much proof does the Canadian government need before we will act on behalf of a Canadian citizen who has been held hostage for six years?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government has been very, very concerned about Mrs. Haddad and has undertaken exhaustive inquiries as to her safety and whereabouts both through sending diplomatic notes to the government and through direct inquiries with a number of organizations within Lebanon.

There is simply some question as to how and where. There is no question about her disappearance at all and there is no question that this is a tragedy for the family. When this first happened the department worked very hard to establish her whereabouts and to establish if and how she was actually taken hostage by a particular group. We have made exhaustive inquiries. We have worked through every possible diplomatic level to try and aid both Mrs. Haddad and her family here.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the minister has not even put her on the international list of hostages.

Professor Humphrey, one of the world's leading scholars and for 20 years the director of the United Nations division of human rights, has called upon the Canadian government specifically to acknowledge that Mrs. Haddad is a hostage in Lebanon. I ask the minister to at least request the United Nations hostage negotiator to include her in the list of western hostages.

Will the minister ask that Mrs. Haddad be included in the list of western hostages?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there are certain ways of dealing with this. The Canadian government has made inquiries and it has pursued this matter aggressively in every forum available to it. Immediately following the incident six years ago and recently, it is has been a continuing file, a file that is continually open for us in a number of forums. We have also been in constant touch with the family.

I would like to be able to do more and we will continue to do everything we can. We are continuing to pursue this as a case that requires our very great sympathy, our concern and our action.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, at a time when 400,000 young Canadians are unemployed, the best this government can do is to offer the "Learning Well—Living Well" consultation paper asking Canadians for ideas.

The Economic Council made this observation in its annual report. I quote: "The problem of unemployment is cumulative. Young workers get trapped in a cycle of short-term, seasonal, insecure jobs and unemployment insurance dependencies and are unable to break away from it".

I ask the minister of employment this question. When is this government going to start learning well so that young Canadians can start living well?

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, for the past two years we have defended and promoted in this House an employment strategy requiring intesified training. We have put in place partnership mechanisms with a view to achieving these objectives. Any delay that ensued must be blamed on the hon. member and members opposite who spent a whole year obstructing the passage of Bill C-21.

What we are trying to do with the programs we have, as quickly as possible, is give the requisite training to workers to prepare them for market globalization.

[English]

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, if this government is serious about establishing a learning culture, then it must understand that education is a key component. In order for our young people to obtain an education, it must be accessible.

I ask the minister this question. Why has this government chosen to impose a 3 per cent tax on student loans? Why this attack on students who are in greatest need?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Secretary of State of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I have answered this question time and time again in the House and I will repeat the same answer.

This program is some 27 years old. It is a program that has helped thousands of Canadians through the years. It is a program that we intend to maintain, but obviously it is a program we have to review. The review is under way with the provinces and we expect to be able to propose a document to this House in the next few months.

BANKRUPTCY

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for ACOA and I think the acting minister is in the House. I hope it is the Minister of Public Works, who I know will be fully aware of the situation involving the Keddy's hotels and motor inns in Atlantic Canada. On November 1, Keddy's is meeting in a bankruptcy proceeding and unless there is some bridge financing at least and some understanding with ACOA officials the whole situation will go into receivership. Over 1,000 to 1,200 direct employees at 11 motels will go down the drain.

Knowing the situation, knowing quite a bit of history of Keddy's, going back to the Hotel Nova Scotia in 1984-85, I am wondering if non-partisan, objective support from all sides would be a catalyst. Could the minister have his officials meet the Keddy's interests so that this situation will not end up in dire headlines, let alone the spin-off effect of all the other little industries that depend on this situation.

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate very much the interest of my colleague opposite. He is right, most of us from Atlantic Canada are aware of the situation regarding Mr. Keddy's organization. He suffered from severe competition. He is in a difficult position. I spoke with him this morning. I have spoken with colleagues. In all fairness I am not sure that at this stage, taking into account all of the circumstances, anything can be done.

We are willing to look at it again and see if at the last moment some help might be available. I would be less than honest in saying that we could give any guarantees at this moment.

INTEREST RATES

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my questions is for the minister of corporate and consumer affairs.

• (1500)

Yesterday the minister responded to the recommendation of a floating cap on credit card interest rates by telling consumers to go out and negotiate a personal loan. In other words, you are not my concern. You are the bank's concern. Go and let the foxes get at you.

I want to ask this minister right now who he is looking out for: the corporations or the consumers? Why is the minister continuing to be an apologist for corporations and not a defender of the interests of the consumers?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised. I am not alone in saying that putting a cap on that is not acceptable. Even the Consumers' Association of Canada is on side with that. It does not think it is the solution.

I would say, Mr. Speaker, that it is especially important then to make the consumers aware of the fact that the credit card market is highly competitive. My colleague knows how committed I am to consumers, we were talking about this just last week.

You can go to your banker—something I would encourage everyone to do, as I said yesterday—who offers both credit cards and personal loans. Instead of buying goods on credit cards issued by department stores and other companies which charge interest rate between 19 and 28 per cent, consumers should take out a personal loan at 11 or 12 per cent, Mr. Speaker. I think we should first increase consumers' awareness because we brought interest rates down to 8.5 per cent for their benefit. Consumers should take advantage of it.

[English]

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister.

In light of the fact that obviously this minister has the interest of banks and financial institutions first on his agenda and consumers last, will the Prime Minister consider splitting this portfolio into two and appointing someone as consumer minister who would look out for the interests of consumers?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the only interest that I have in listening to my hon. friend is to make sure that he does not get sufficiently exercised that he does damage to himself again.

We think he is a national asset and we want to keep him in the House of Commons. We do not want him to hurt himself.

I take very seriously my hon. friend's suggestion. In point of fact the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is also Minister of State for Agriculture and does a remarkable job in both portfolios, and I am thinking of giving him a third.

PRIVILEGE

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE ON THE GOVERNMENT OF CANADA'S PROPOSALS FOR A RENEWED CANADA—EXPENSES OF MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT NOT SITTING ON COMMITTEE

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, this morning I contacted the secretariat of the Special Joint Committee on the Government of Canada's Proposals for a Renewed Canada, and I asked them who paid the expenses of members who are not on the committee but who went to Prince Edward Island and Toronto. I was told that although these members were not members of the committee, the committee had decided in this particular instance to pay their expenses, without being authorized to do so by the House. When I asked whether, as a member of the Bloc Québécois, I could have the same privileges, I was told I should get in touch with the Joint Chairman of the Committee, Mrs. Dobbie, and that each case would be examined on its own merits.

Mr. Speaker, I have two questions of privilege. One is about the different classes of members we have here: those who are members of the committee and those members in this House who are entitled to follow the proceedings of the committee outside Ottawa, outside the precincts of Parliament, and have their transportation expenses, hotel bills, meals and sundry items all paid for. Other members who, like members the Bloc Québécois, have a different ideology, would have to submit a request for approval by a steering committee of a committee of this House, with a majority government membership, which, I imagine, would judge our case according to our political ideology and perhaps also according to sex, age or any other consideration.

Mr. Speaker, I think a very important privilege and principle is at stake here. My role in this House and in committees of the House of Commons, including the Special Joint Committee, should in no way be dictated or appear to be dictated or influenced by the arbitrary rules of a steering committee controlled by this government.

In this connection, I would ask the Chair and the House of Commons to condemn this practice by the Special Joint Committee and prohibit this entirely arbitrary process, and decide that only members sitting on the committee, or their lawfully appointed replacements, are entitled to the committee's travel expenses. Or otherwise, that all members of this House, without exception, and without being subject to arbitrary decisions, should be allowed to be on these committees and take advantage of free travel. It should also be stated that all members are equal and have the same privileges and should never have to submit to the arbitrary decisions of a steering committee in an administrative matter like this.

Mr. Speaker, this brings me to the second part of my question of privilege which also involves points of order but is nevertheless a question of privilege. It concerns the legitimacy of expenses thus incurred by the Special Joint Committee on the Government of Canada's proposals for a renewed Canada. The committee, established on June 19, 1991 in this House, by a resolution of this House—you will recall the circumstances—cannot pay the expenses of members who are not members of the committee or replacements on this Special Joint Committee.

On September 24, 1991, the list of members was tabled. Further to a question of privilege that I raised the next day, the Chair ruled on September 27, 1991, that the NDP was entitled to only one member on that committee, Mr. Nystrom, who had been appointed, and that the other two members had not been appointed legally and were to be removed from that list until the NDP provided the Clerk of the House with the names of two members who had the right to be there, and any substitutes for them. The NDP never followed up this ruling the Speaker made on September 27, 1991. Since then, the four members who had been previously designated by the NDP, illegally, continued to sit—which they have the right to do, I agree—but at least three of them also went to Prince Edward Island, all expenses paid from Canadian public funds, with no authorization of any kind given for that purpose. I think that is completely unjust and arbitrary.

Mr. Speaker, in these extremely difficult times for all Canadians, our constituents in Quebec are shocked by such waste of public money. Mr. Speaker, much stricter control must be shown in administering public funds. I ask that the work of the Special Joint Committee be suspended until these administrative and financial issues have been clarified. I ask the Chair to see whether the funds of the House of Commons were actually used to pay the expenses of members who were not entitled to it. You know very well, Mr. Speaker, as I do, and members have always known that it is a well-established principle in Canada that no member can receive money or services from the government or the House of Commons, except his salary which is already provided for, without a special order of the House or a ministerial order. I think that hon. members who accepted travel advances may have unintentionally put themselves—it is not a matter of honesty or dishonesty here—in an illegal situation. It could even affect their ability to sit in this House. Nevertheless, a decision must also be made as to who shall refund to the House of Commons these amounts the committee did not have the authority to pay out and how.

I would ask the Chair to consider very carefully the allegations I just made, based on information obtained from the very members of that committee and from the deputy clerk of the committee because I am literally flabbergasted.

Mr. Speaker, as you may recall, we from the Bloc Québécois had requested to sit on this committee. The participation of the Parti Québécois was not allowed because of its ideology. I suppose that funding will now be denied to the Canadian Economic Council now that it has spoken out for sovereignty-association. This kind of partisanship that does not have its place in the House of Commons.

In closing I will say to you that I feel my privileges, as a Member of Parliament, have been breached, that such incident will never cast a doubt over my commitment to independence in the minds of the people of Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead and that any unauthorized expenses will have to be reimbursed. Mr. Speaker, you probably remember that we from the Bloc—

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief in terms of commenting on some of the points made by the hon. member.

The hon. member seems to be objecting to the fact that he is not on this committee and that he, as a member of Parliament, being an equal of any other member of Parliament has the right to be on that committee. Carrying that to its logical conclusion, the only committee we can have around here is a 294 member committee, committee of the whole.

That is not the way we operate, of course. We have the recognition of the complexity of certain issues and the need to deal with many issues at the same time.

We have had for decades and decades, going back I do not know how long, the practice of assigning to committees special subjects for study. Of course, that is exactly what happened in terms of the constitutional papers and the special committee. In this case, a joint committee was set up.

Membership was established based on numerous precedents going back many years. It was dealt with no differently than any other committee. The hon. member seems to say that because he is a member of Parliament, equal to the others—we agree—that he should have his travel expenses picked up if he chooses to travel with a committee.

Again, taking that to its logical extension, Mr. Speaker, any time a committee of this House were to travel to another country, for example, as happens frequently in terms of the studies they undertake, then every other member of the House has the right to go along.

I humbly suggest that would make it impossible for us to do anything. What is happening with the unity committee is precisely the same kind of thing that has happened in regard to committees of this House going back long before any of us were here and long before any of us were born.

There is no precedent being established here. It is established practice and I do not think the member's question of privilege has any basis.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, in ruling after ruling after ruling, yourself and other Speakers before you have determined that these kinds of interventions, although it is probably appropriate that they be heard, are matters which really are properly dealt with by the committee itself.

Certainly whatever arrangements the committee has arrived at in order to do its job properly, the committee has arrived at in the context of its own authority and this is not properly a matter for the House to consider as indeed so many other Speakers, including yourself, have ruled over the years.

The committee is its own master in this respect and it is not appropriate to be debating the arrangements that have been made in the committee on the floor of the House of Commons.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak on this issue, even more so after hearing my colleague from Winnipeg Transcona.

The basic issue raised by the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead is whether members of this House who are not official members of the Joint Committee on the Constitution had their travel expenses refunded or not. We claim that New Democratic members who are not officially on the Joint Committee travelled with it at the expense of the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker, other members, including the member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead, would have wanted to go with the Joint Committee across the country but did not and could not have access to travel funds.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I will go further than that. I think and I was told—I would like you to check these allegations—that the New Democratic caucus even tried to use a subterfuge by having its own members go as researchers, in contravention of the rules of this House. If that is so, Mr. Speaker, you know as well as I that they would be violating not only the practices but also the laws of this country.

The hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead thus raises a very serious matter. Mr. Speaker, all members of this House know that special provisions are required for a member to accept a cheque other than those to which he is entitled. An order in council is required for all members to go and represent a minister at the opening of a social housing project. I remember that practice, Mr. Speaker, and it took an order in council.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, for the sake of the integrity and openness of this House, we ask whether any New Democratic members had their expenses refunded and whether they acted legally. If not, Mr. Speaker, we ask you to take strong measures immediately.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, very briefly, I think that the minister who spoke earlier, the House leader, totally missed the boat. His comments were not related to the two questions asked.

I rise because I am one of those who wrote to the co-chairs of that Committee last week, to ask them precisely the question asked today by the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead. I asked myself that question because I wanted to be involved and I was told, "Well no, Mr. Gauthier, you are not a member of the group. The six Liberal members have been appointed." So, I asked for the list of New democratic members, and I was told, "There are many of them but there is only one official member. The others take turns on the committee, on a regular basis." I asked, "Who pays for the travel expenses of these members?" and I was told, "I don't know."

I want to get an answer to those questions because it is important to know who is paying for this. While it is true that committees are autonomous, it is also true, Mr. Speaker, that these committees must administer public funds in accordance with the strict guidelines of the Board of Internal Economy of the House of Commons, which ensures that those funds are spent properly.

So, the first question is: Who paid and why was this money spent on trips, hotels, and other expenses made by people who are not members of a committee? The second question is: On what authority did the Committee base its decision to spend on that? Again, I would like to receive an answer by letter or here in this House, to satisfy the curiosity of an hon. member who also wanted to participate in those meetings but cannot because the Standing Orders do not allow it.

I believe that these questions are appropriate. The question is clear and I think that the government missed the boat. I would like to get an answer.

Mr. Speaker: I listened with some concern to the statements by the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead, the Government House Leader, the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona and, of course, the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

Generally speaking, since the complaint has to do with the proceedings of a committee, this is not a problem that should be submitted to the Chair. However, in view of the circumstances and especially after having listened to those statements, it is probably appropriate for the Chair to consider these interventions or complaints, and it might be possible afterwards to give an opinion.

As I said, it is basically a problem that concerns the committee. However, in the circumstances, it may be that the problem has a wider scope. I would ask the hon. members to give me some time to take this under advisement and then to report to the House soon.

POINT OF ORDER

STANDING COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO TRAVEL

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, may I ask you if the Standing Orders allow the following. In the proceedings of the House of Commons for October 25, 1991, following Oral Questions, during Routine Proceedings, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons moved, and I quote:

> That seven members and two staffers from the Standing Committee on Transport be authorized to travel to Europe from October 30 to November 9, 1991 to complete a study on high speed trains.

The hon. member for Shefford opposed this motion, Mr. Speaker, and the government House leader simply answered, and I quote:

> Madam Speaker, if the Bloc Quebecois chooses to prevent this committee from proceeding on that travel, then I have no choice but to accept that at this point.

Mr. Speaker, barely ten minutes later, while my colleague from Shefford and myself had gone out for a few moments, the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan, seconded by the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond, moved to give unanimous consent to this motion authorizing seven members of this House, that is four Conservatives, two Liberals and the mover, the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan himself, to travel to Europe at the expense of the Canadian taxpayers.

Mr. Shefford: Sixty thousand!

Mr. Rocheleau: Some $60,000 will be spent, Mr. Speaker.

My question is this: we were against this motion and the government House leader accepted the Bloc Quebecois position. Just minutes later, in our absence, the motion was brought back and passed surreptitiously with the consent of the three parties. Mr. Speaker, is it normal procedure to bring back a motion during the same sitting when opposition to it has been expressed?

[English]

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I can somewhat sympathize with the concern of the member that the House had made one decision and because there was not unanimous consent, the same issue was raised later that day and there was unanimous consent given.

Now, the Bloc is not a party of the House. One of the things the legitimate parties in this House have always done to make sure that the government or any individual party does not run roughshod over the House is to make sure we have a roster of people who are in the House.

Therefore, we find it is an obligation in our caucus to make sure that we have members here at all times, so that if the government gets up and introduces a motion that requires unanimous consent, which we do not agree to, we are indeed here doing our duty in the House and able to express our disagreement.

I believe that if any group in the House feels that they want to be involved in an ongoing basis, they should follow a similar practice.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think I need to hear the hon. member for Shefford, not that he would not put the position of he and his colleagues with great clarity.

[Translation]

I want to tell the hon. member for Hull—Aylmer that I appreciate his point. However, the hon. member for Churchill has described the situation quite clearly to the House. This is a matter which, of course, concerns all hon. members, because the House obviously has authority over the conduct of business in this House, and sometimes circumstances change.

[English]

There is no rule and there is no law that says that because the House has at one moment refused consent for something, it cannot change its mind and give consent.

An hon. member: Call an election, call an election.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: It is not up to me to call an election!

[English]

An hon. member: Carried.

Mr. Speaker: I understand the hon. member's frustration, but I have to say to all hon. members that the hon. member for Churchill has put the position very succinctly. It is necessary for somebody to be here all the time.

COMMENTS BY PRIME MINISTER—REPORT FOR RULING

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, some time ago, the Right Hon. Prime Minister used rather unparliamentary language in this House when he called our leader hypocritical and stupid. At that time, the Chair had taken those words under advisement in order to decide whether they were parliamentary or not. I would like to know if a decision has been made as to whether the words "hypocritical and stupid" are acceptable parliamentary language in this House. If a decision has not been made, when will the Chair ask the Prime Minister to retract those insults?

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I believe the Speaker is still taking it under consideration. It depends on the context in which those words were used and he will come back and give a ruling on it.

PETITIONS

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, this will not require unanimous consent.

Pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table in both official languages the government's response to 54 petitions.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

FINANCE

SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Murray W. Dorin (Edmonton Northwest): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour today to present the second report of the Standing Committee on Finance dealing with Bill C-34, as amended.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

HOUSE MANAGEMENT

FOURTEENTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to table a report that has a good deal to do with certain points of privilege raised earlier today.

I have the honour to present the fourteenth report of the Standing Committee on House Management, pursuant to the order of the House of Commons dated June 19, 1991 and the Speaker's Ruling of September 27, 1991.

This report is deemed adopted when laid upon the table.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-319, an act to Amend the Canada Elections Act (non-listed electors).

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

• (1530)

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, at the last election at least hundreds and perhaps thousands of otherwise eligible electors in my constituency of Edmonton East were denied the right to vote because their names did not get on the list of electors by voting day. Several showed up at the polls, as they can do in provincial elections, thinking that they could be sworn in at the poll and then vote and were of course denied that right.

This amounts to a routine disenfranchisement of electors on an administrative basis and is on that basis alone, I submit, unconstitutional. However, in an effort to do away with this grievance, this bill is presented. I am hoping the government itself will act in this regard before the next election because to leave the matter hanging will again inevitably result in the administrative disenfranchisement of tens of thousands of Canadians.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Mr. Harvey moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-320, an act to amend the Canada Labour Code and the Public Service

Staff Relations Act (prohibition of strike and lockout in the Public Service).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Attewell: Mr. Speaker, the thrust of my private member's bill will be to preclude any future strikes by the civil service. This will be achieved by declaring all government services essential.

There are thousands of hard working, loyal civil servants, but many Canadians are fed up with the attitude of the more militant civil servants. Civil servants enjoy fully indexed pensions, good salaries and relatively secure jobs, but every few years they hijack Canadians by calling a strike thereby causing harm and anxiety to thousands of Canadians.

My bill would remedy this problem and I am pleased that my colleague, the hon. member for Mississauga South, is going to second my bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Mr. Attewell moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed to have been adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

MIDDLE EAST

PEACE CONFERENCE

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions and I think you will find unanimous consent to move the following motion. I move:

> That this House express its sincere hope for a successful Middle East peace conference. It calls on all participants to be open, flexible and understanding of each others' interests and fears, and prays for all who sit at the peace table, the wisdom to combine justice, security and stability for the entire region.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Official Opposition, I have the pleasure to second the motion. I think we want the principal players to know that other Parliaments around the world wish them success in this very historical conference. We hope that the outcome of this conference will bring long lasting peace, security and safety for the peoples of all of those regions.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, I also want to congratulate the hon. member for tabling this motion. I believe that, for the whole international community, the Madrid Conference is an historic event. We hope that this vexing dispute, which has upset that part of the world for so long, will be settled. Of course, we urge all the parties to put aside their historical rivalries, for the sake of human dignity and the right of people to exist and manage their own lives. We hope this conference will bring positive results for the greater good of all humanity.

[English]

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in discussing this motion with the member for Winnipeg Transcona, I do want to take a moment to compliment him on the motion and to say that, speaking on behalf of the government, we fully endorse the views expressed in this motion. We recognize that while this is seen as a miracle—we should see it that way—it is also the result of very difficult and painstaking work on behalf of many people around the world bringing opposite sides together.

We do pray that they will find a meaningful, lasting peace as a result of these meetings.

[Translation]

Mr. Leblanc: Mr. Speaker, I support this motion because, for at least 45 years, Arabs and Jews have been trying with great difficulty to talk to each other.

I would like to congratulate those who were instrumental in setting up that committee. It is good to see people sit down together and discuss things. Of course, I hope that the results will be positive for peace in the world.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

EMPLOYMENT EQUITY ACT

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the Employment Equity Act requires that it be reviewed by a committee of the House of Commons.

Therefore, I have the consent motion for that. I move:

That pursuant to Section 13(1) of the Employment Equity Act, Chapter 31, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1985, a special committee of the House undertakes a comprehensive review of the provisions and operations of this act and submits a report no later than May 1, 1992, and

That the special committee be appointed at the latest five sitting days after the adoption of this motion, and

That the membership be composed of eight members.

That changes in membership of the committee be effective immediately after a notification, signed by the member acting as the Chief Whip of any recognized party has been filed with the Clerk of the Committee, and

That the said special committee shall have the power of a standing committee as per Standing Order 108(1).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, we are certainly ready to consider support in that motion; however, I would like to ask the parliamentary secretary if only the hon. members who will sit on the committee will have the right to travel with the committee, or if we will have a sort of free for all, where all the members of the New Democratic Party in particular, will also be able to travel with the committee.

Will the rules be the same ones that apply to the Constitutional Committee or will they be more strict in this case?

[English]

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I have given the Chair my copy of the motion.

As I recall, it was silent on the subject of travel as I do not think that was required by the committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Again, the House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

HUMAN RIGHTS AND THE STATUS OF DISABLED PERSONS

AUTHORIZATION FOR STANDING COMMITTEE TO TRAVEL

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, this is a motion for travel of the Standing Committee on Human Rights to the Akwesasne reserve:

That the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons and necessary staff be authorized to travel to the Akwesasne reserve November 19, 1991 for the purpose of holding public hearings pursuant to Standing Order 108(3)(b)(ii).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Members have heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

AUTHORIZATION TO VIDEOTAPE AKWESASNE HEARINGS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I guess this is the day.

I would like to move:

That the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons be authorized to permit videotaping of its public hearings at the Akwesasne reserve on November 19, 1991 pursuant to Standing Order 119(1).

Should they make it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

JUSTICE AND THE SOLICITOR GENERAL

AUTHORIZATION FOR SUBCOMMITTEE TO TRAVEL

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I will try again.

I move:

> That the Subcommittee on National Security of the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General be authorized to travel to Toronto for the period beginning Thursday, November 7 to Sunday, November 10 in order to participate in a conference on matters pertaining to national security and that the necessary staff, the Clerk and a research officer do accompany the committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

• (1540)

Mr. Cooper: On a point of clarification, Mr. Speaker. We want to be certain that the members of the Bloc Quebecois understood that the motion we were trying to pass would send the subcommittee on human rights to visit a reserve in Quebec, the Akwesasne reserve. We just want to be certain that they understood that when they declined to give us unanimous consent.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Exactly, Mr. Speaker. We knew this was another federal committee coming to interfere in Akwesasne, and we think Quebec is perfectly capable of looking after its own affairs. We don't need any interference by a federal committee.

[English]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and privilege to represent Akwesasne in this House. The reserve is partially in Ontario, partially in Quebec and partially in New York State. It is one of the areas of this country that needs our attention the most.

Shame on anyone who would not want members of Parliament to take care of the native people of Akwesasne. Shame on those people. I hope that you would seek unanimous consent again, Mr. Speaker, and that members who perhaps in a moment of ill thought could not figure this out will reconsider for the good of the native people living in the Mohawk community of Akwesasne. Those people who were afflicted a year ago with a terrible insurrection have been affected recently by a dispute between the Warrior Society and the band council in which homes were burned and much of the community was destroyed. Handicapped people and other disabled people in that community need us, whether they live on the Ontario side, the Quebec side or the New York side.

I would ask that our colleagues take that into account.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I want to echo the comments of my friend and add that it is really unfortunate for the handicapped, not just on the Akwesasne reserve but in all of Canada. I gather this is a national conference which the committee wishes to attend to hear witnesses on the question of the disabled regarding the aboriginal community.

For individual members of this House, whether they call themselves Bloc Quebecois or whatever, to prevent that from occurring is utterly shameful.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Shefford. Would you like me to put the motion again?

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, I just want to say that if hon. members are so committed to aboriginal matters, how come none of them came to see us about this meritorious trip? If they are so interested in aboriginal matters, why didn't they—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. If there are going to be any further negotiations they will have to be conducted behind the curtain. If you want to come back and put the motion that is fine. I think we should carry on with the business of the day.

PETITIONS

CLEAN-UP AND MAINTENANCE OF RIDEAU RIVER

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I would like to table a petition, in accordance with the Standing Orders. This petition addresses the serious pollution problem in the Rideau River which flows into the Ottawa River not far from Parliament Hill.

The undersigned now avail themselves of their right to present a grievance common to your petitioners. They humbly sheweth that whereas our economic and social well-being depends on a clean and healthy environment; whereas past negligence with respect to the environment has had a disastrous impact on many communities, including pollution of our rivers and streams; therefore your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to ask the federal government to act as equal partners with provincial and municipal authorities in order to implement an action plan for the clean-up and maintenance of the Rideau River.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions on firearms. The petitioners are residents of Ottawa and Orléans, and they humbly sheweth that the availability of firearms is a critical factor in cases of homicide, accidents and suicides; that there are many types of firearms readily available in Canada which are not required for legitimate purposes such as hunting and competitive shooting. Wherefore your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to pass legislation now to prohibit possession of firearms by any person with a criminal record.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, having been unsuccessful to convince one or two members to give assistance to Akwesasne let me try my hand at a petition asking this House to assist with the terrible farming problems in all of Canada, particularly in Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. Aid from the Government of Canada is greatly needed because of the low prices of crops this year.

I am pleased to table this petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 of the House of Commons.

JUSTICE

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 and present a petition to the House of Commons regarding the murder of Nina DeVilliers last August. This incident exposed serious deficiencies in the criminal justice system. There are many vulnerable persons who have little protection under the current system. Women, children, and disabled persons are at particular risk.

Therefore petitioners from all over the metropolitan Toronto area request Parliament to recognize that crimes of violence against the person are serious and abhorrent to society. They say that we must amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act of 1972 and the Parole Act accordingly.

YUGOSLAVIA

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I am pleased to present this petition describing the serious situation presently raging in Yugoslavia.

Petitioners believe that terrorist activities are taking place. Our own Prime Minister has requested that the Security Council of the United Nations intervene and consider the use of peacekeeping forces. The petitioners call for justice and humanity to prevail and violence to cease. They also want Croatia and Slovenia recognized as independent and sovereign states without delay.

JUSTICE

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a number of petitions to present with hundreds of signatures from people in my riding of Hamilton Mountain and other areas of Hamilton, Stoney Creek, and Ancaster. The petitioners ask that Parliament recognize that crimes of violence against a person are serious and abhorrent to society.

They ask this government to amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act of 1972, and the Parole Act accordingly.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Point of Order

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, Question No. 116 will be answered today.

[Text]

Question No. 116—Mr. Boudria:

With respect to the calculation of costs for answering Order Paper questions, (a) what was the cost of the calculation (b) who devised the plan for the calculation (c) how much did it cost to devise the plan for the calculation?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): As Government House Leader, the Minister has full responsibility for the ordering of government business in the House of Commons. Included in this overall responsibility are the supervision of replies to written questions and the process involved in replying to such questions.

In 1975, the then Leader of the Government in the House of Commons requested that, for a period of six weeks, the cost of answering questions be provided to estimate the cost of producing government information through the parliamentary system.

The cost accounting system used (logging of time spent and salary of each individual) proved to be time consuming, unreliable and created delays in the process of answering questions as it was too elaborate and personal. The study produced an average cost of $60 per respondent. Some questions may have up to 120 respondents (all Departments, Agencies and Crown Corporations).

With the result, the government could estimate the approximate cost of producing government information for a Session or any period of time.

Ex.: 275 questions assigned to 625 Departments, Agencies and Crown Corporations
625 respondents X $60. = $37,500
(1975 cost)

Since then, only rough estimates have been released:

1979—$100. per respondent
1986—$175. per respondent

Last spring, the Parliamentary Returns Division (PRD) of the Office of the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons was requested to set up a cost accounting system to identify time consuming questions and determine their cost while minimizing the time and cost of the exercise.

Based on the 1975 experience, it was decided that respondents would only provide the approximate total number of hours/minutes spent to prepare each response. The total number of hours/minutes includes the approximate time spent on all preparation steps i.e.: assignment, research, preparation, editing, coordinating, typing, computer time, review, translation, approval, printing, etc.

The cost of answering is arrived by multiplying the total number of hours/minutes by the average hourly rate of the Public Service plus printing cost, if voluminous. The time to calculate the cost of answering a question takes only a few seconds.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The question as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary has been answered.

Mr. Cooper: I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

POINT OF ORDER

BLOC QUÉBÉCOIS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I plan on being very brief but I would like to ask the Speaker to investigate something for me.

Earlier we heard the concerns raised by the Bloc Quebecois about the activities of members of Parliament relating specifically to a committee. I saw a demonstration of their concern about their individual rights being protected by the Speaker.

We as members of this House have for as long as I can remember paid great respect to the committees of this House. We feel they are an absolutely fundamental part of our process. We are all particularly proud of our membership on those committees and very proud of the work that those committees do.

On several occasions the Bloc has insisted upon its use of obstruction to prevent committees from doing their work.

I would ask that in the deliberations the Speaker is already considering on the matter of committees and expenditures by members on those committees while they travel that the Speaker would consider one other thing. That is that the hon. members who have been doing this represent one of 295 members of this House.

It would seem to me therefore to be logical that they should receive about every 295th speech, every 295th question, and every 295th statement. I would ask that the Speaker look at this issue at the same time as he is considering these other matters.

• (1550)

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I raise a point of order on the same point.

I think that the parliamentary secretary is not serious when he makes a statement like that, especially because he tries to take measures against us, since from time to time, the parliamentary secretary, who is a little—has decided that he runs the House his way and that as soon as he asks for leave, all members should give unanimous consent, with apologies.

Mr. Speaker, you know that as members of this House, we do not have many privileges. You know that so far, we have not been allowed to attend parliamentary committees, even those we wanted to be on full time. Mr. Speaker, I think that the suggestion made by the Parliamentary Secretary to the House Leader is frivolous and contrary to the spirit of parliamentary reform.

Point of Order

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I do not think we should carry on the debate any further.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am in receipt of a notice of motion under Standing Orders 52 from the hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 52 to request the adjournment of the House because I believe the House has the responsibility to debate thoroughly and to look into exactly what happened in terms of the three Orders in Council that were passed today, one in relation to U.S. and British propelled vessels passing through Canadian waters and to visit Canadian ports, the second the consent for U.S. and British vessels capable of carrying nuclear weapons to pass through Canadian waters and to visit Canadian ports, and the third is a consent Order in Council for U.S. nuclear propelled submarines, in particular the Trident nuclear submarines, to pass through Canadian waters in Dixon Entrance on their way to the new U.S. nuclear submarine base in southeast Alaska.

The reason that I very firmly believe that this is an issue that is deserving of an emergency debate is that the Order in Council technique that was used for these three Orders in Council was found on May 14 by the Federal Court of Canada, trial division, before Mr. Justice Allison Walsh to be illegal, and he struck down the use of that technique in terms of Alcan's Kemano project.

I think because the Minister of National Defence will be leaving Canada for the next two weeks, apparently shortly, it is important that this be—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Speaker has had a chance to look at the hon. member's application and at this time he does not quite feel that it is necessary for us to have an emergency debate. But that does not necessarily mean that at a future date the hon. member could not have an emergency debate in regard to his application.

WAGE CLAIM PAYMENT ACT

The House resumed from Tuesday, October 29, consideration of the motion of Mr. Blais that Bill C-22, an act to enact the Wage Claim Payment Act, to amend the Bankruptcy Act and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Chair has now had an opportunity to examine the proposed amendment and finds it to be in order. I will propose it to the House. Moved by Mr. Rodriguez, seconded by Mr. Whittaker:

> That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "that" and substituting the following therefor;
> This House declines to give second reading to Bill C-22, an act to enact the Wage Claim Payment Act, to amend the Bankruptcy Act and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, as the economic climate makes this an inopportune time to impose a new tax on small and medium-sized businesses.

I believe we were finished with questions and comments. I will now go to the hon. member for Cardigan for 10 minutes plus five minutes questions and comments, and then return to the hon. member for Edmonton Southwest for debate.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, since this is the first time I have had a chance to speak in debate with you in the Chair since your return, on behalf of my wife and three daughters whom you know very well I would like to welcome you back. I am sure they are very pleased to see you there today. I am also very pleased to participate in the debate today on Bill C-22, amendments to the Bankruptcy Act. Everyone agrees the bill is an improvement over what is in place now but there are still some problems.

The bill as it now stands provides no protection for the primary producers like the farmers and fishermen. The sad state of the fishing industry in Atlantic Canada is obvious in the number of processing plant bankruptcies. The farming industry is going through some tough times and those people are going out of business as well.

The long and the short of the matter is that the economy is in such a mess because of this government's policies that we need a new Bankruptcy Act to deal with the situation.

I have fishermen in my riding who have lost thousands of dollars because the processor they dealt with went under. Fishermen sell their fish expecting to get paid for their work, but when fish companies go broke, they cannot collect a dime. This is just not acceptable.

In this bill there is a clause dealing with unpaid suppliers. It says that unpaid suppliers can go in after a company declares bankruptcy and retrieve their goods for up to 30 days. However, to do this a number of conditions must be met. The product must be in original condition and must be identifiable from other products.

For farmers and fishermen this is a very serious problem. Anyone who knows anything about fishing knows that you cannot tell one lobster from another in a crate. As well, lobsters that are processed are processed immediately, changing the condition of the lobster. Under the current proposals the fisherman would be out of luck and still would not be able to collect a cent. This is just not acceptable.

Similarly, in the farming industry there is no way I can tell a potato of the same variety that I grow from my neighbour's up the road who grows potatoes. All potatoes of the same variety as we well know look the same. In the fall a farmer usually sells his product to a single wholesaler or processor. It that company goes broke, the farmer cannot get anything back.

What many people do not realize is that a bankruptcy does not affect only one company or one person. In one processor bankruptcy a fisherman in my riding lost $30,000 and to a fisherman in my riding, that is a big loss and a lot of money. Fishermen have to pay their helpers, make payments on their boats, pay for bait and pay for many things. The $30,000 that was not paid to one fisherman ends up coming out of the pockets of many people. Thirty thousand dollars is a person's income for a year. In bankruptcy that is the same thing as losing your job.

These are the serious reasons why fishermen and farmers need protection. When a company goes bankrupt many people get hurt. For some time I have been trying to get some protection for farmers and fishermen who are affected by bankruptcies.

I wrote to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans asking him to help fishermen. The best the minister said he could do was talk to his colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, and see if it could be put in the Bankruptcy Act revisions. That was almost a year ago. We now have the government's revisions and there is still no protection for farmers and fishermen.

I and my colleague from Dartmouth and other members of the Liberal Party have been trying to make changes to Bill C–22. An amendment has to be put forward that will allow fishermen to retrieve goods from a bankrupt company after the value has been added. This gives greater protection to fishermen. Giving fishermen and farmers a so–called super priority when it comes to selling off the assets of a bankrupt firm should be considered. These are two small things that would give primary producers greater protection.

I would like to give another example of a problem that can happen in bankruptcies. Let us consider a farmer who is having financial difficulties and obtains employment off of the farm. This farmer, possibly in November, December and January works out and goes on unemployment in January. He could receive the UI all year. Then let us say in November or December the bank moves in and sells his property. What is above capital gains on the sale is counted as income for this farmer. Now the farmer will not receive one nickel of the money. It goes against his debts. Revenue Canada will then send this farmer a bill after he has gone through the problem of bankruptcy, the heartache and the worry. He has gone through hell. When he wants to get his life in order and start a new business, revenue Canada says: "I want that money back". The simple thing is that man does not have that money. He has used the dollars he has received in UI to feed his wife and family.

• (1600)

This is one example. It is grossly unfair and it blocks the person from getting back into business and becoming a productive member of society, as of course all farmers wish to be.

In my view there should be some strong measures put in the legislation to protect the primary producers of Canada. It is certainly unfair that a primary producer is generally the last person to collect a nickel in the bankruptcy.

The situation must change if fisherman or farmers are to receive any benefit from the Bankruptcy Act revisions. The bill goes a long way in improving bankruptcy processes in Canada. However, it does not give fishermen or farmers in my riding the protection they need. As I explained previously, there are so many things that can happen.

I hope the government will listen and make the proper changes in order to give the farmers and fishermen the proper protection they need under this new legislation.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, on a point order. I would like to move at this time that the hon. member for Mississauga South be now heard.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I believe you may wish to find that the motion is out of order. I understood you to have said that I would be heard following the intervention of our hon. friend from Cardigan.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): This was a special few minutes for the hon. member because he has to catch a plane. I did recognize the hon. member for Edmonton Southwest after. It is now questions and comments and I do not think the hon. member can put his motion at this time.

If there are no questions or comments. Debate. The hon. member for Mississauga South on a question or comment.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member has taken a look at the wage protection fund that is proposed in this bill and if he thinks his constituents would be prepared to pay into a wage protection fund. I am thinking of his hospitals, municipalities and people who work in fields where obviously the organization is part of government directly or indirectly. They are not likely to go bankrupt. Does he think they will be happy to kick in? It is only 10 cents a week per person to start with but these things grow and grow.

I wonder if he had a conversation with people about that and if he has spoken to his small business community about that.

For example, he has waxed about fishermen. I have not seen trustees or receivers appointed for fishermen. Perhaps he would enlighten us about that.

Mr. MacAulay: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question.

Only 10 cents. It is very unfortunate when you impose a 10 cent tax. It automatically seems to become $10 then $50 and whatever. A prime example is inspection fees in the seed potato industry. We agree with wage protection if it comes out of the product that is liquidated. It should be a super priority. That is what we feel.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I think you will find that Hansard for yesterday shows that when I was last on my feet, it was on questions and comments.

The clock should begin now on my opportunity.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have taken that into consideration. I know that the hon. member was on questions and comments. This is debate. He has 20 minutes plus 10 minutes questions and comments.

Mr. Edwards: I appreciate that clarification, and I am grateful for it.

I am very privileged to have an opportunity to rise before this House to speak in support of Bill C-22 which, as you know, introduces long awaited amendments to the Bankruptcy Act and other statutes.

Judging from the relatively strong consensus that emerged during pre-study that the proposed reform package represents a balanced approach to deal with the competing interests that arise in insolvency situations, I am confident that this Parliament will make every effort to ensure quick passage of Bill C-22 into law.

All members of this House recognize the over-arching responsibility which they have to update laws that impede economic growth and prosperity and to ensure that business and consumers are treated fairly in the marketplace.

Through Bill C-22 we have been given the opportunity to help build a stronger Canada, and it is an obligation we must accept with pride.

Before discussing these reforms, I would like to take a moment to place them in their proper context.

Since our election in 1984, this government has always espoused the position that to support and invigorate the economy, economic framework legislation has to be adapted to the needs of the modern marketplace.

That is why in the intervening years we have systematically sought to overhaul our economic framework legislation, those essential tools of commerce that set the ground rules for a fair, competitive and orderly marketplace.

For example, in almost every field within the purview of consumer and corporate affairs—copyright, trademark, corporations, competition, patent legislation and now bankruptcy—outdated and inadequate rules have been modernized and where necessary, new laws have been enacted.

We have taken these measures because we know for a fact that the interplay of market forces in a setting where there is a fair chance to compete is the foundation upon which a dynamic, prosperous economy can be built.

As a recent discussion paper prepared for the recently established prosperity secretariat makes clear: "Canada's long-term productivity and competitiveness depends on complimentary and coherent laws and regulations governing the domestic marketplace. Framework and regulatory policies must meet their objectives while, at the same time, enable firms to compete successfully at home and abroad".

We also know that a healthy economy is a prerequisite for maintaining and improving the social safety net of which Canadians are so justifiably proud.

While there may not always have been unanimity about whether the right medicine was being administered, there has always been a consensus that thoughtful and firm action was warranted.

Bill C-22 represents a continuation of this ongoing process of reform. It is a thoughtful, firm piece of legislation designed to better protect the interests of wage earners and consumers, and to help preserve jobs by assisting viable businesses in financial trouble to get back on their feet.

As was evidenced during pre-study of these reforms, all members of this House have strong views about the need to equip the marketplace with a relevant, fair and equitable set of rules that will support and invigorate it.

That is why in my presentation to you today I want to comment on certain aspects of the bill and on some of the issues raised in the report of the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations following its pre-study of this proposed legislation.

[Translation]

One of the main shortcomings of the existing Bankruptcy Act is the little protection it affords businesses in financial difficulty, and whatever little protection it does afford is not particularly fair or easily accessible.

Currently, the stay of procedings brought about by the filing of a proposal only protects the debtor against unsecured creditors such as suppliers or employees.

• (1610)

On the other hand, secured creditors such as banks, financial institutions, governments, equipment lessors, landlords, etc., remain free to claim the reimbursement of the debts or to exercise other remedies such as having a receiver appointed to realize their security interest.

For businesses trying to rationalize their operations or to restructure their debt, this type of unilateral action on the part of some creditors can make rationalization very difficult, if not impossible.

[English]

As legislators we have a far broader constituency to whom we must be accountable. That is the people of Canada. That is why we all share a responsibility to ensure that Bill C-22 achieves its myriad objectives quickly and effectively.

The vast majority of the recommendations suggested by the standing committee during pre-study are most welcome. In particular I can say to the hon. member for Cardigan that we welcome the recommendation concerning the situation of, as the hon. Flora Macdonald used to say, farmers and fishers. We can give a commitment that very soon, upon the proclamation of this act, a task force will be set in place to develop a consensus among all the stakeholders so that this problem can be properly addressed.

I wish to associate myself with the positive words of the minister yesterday when he congratulated the members of the standing committee for their excellent work during pre-study.

The recommendations suggested by the standing committee would have the effect of clarifying the rights, responsibilities and obligations of debtors, creditors and receivers in instances of bankruptcy and insolvency. They have been given full consideration by the minister. It is clear that many of them will significantly improve the bill.

The progressive approach to consumer bankruptcies that characterizes Bill C-22 reflects this government's concern that the emphasis on rehabilitation extend not just to business. The consumer provisions we are proposing, which will have the effect of providing individuals in financial difficulty with more breathing space in which to reorganize their affairs, are long awaited ones.

So too are the provisions that would allow a debtor to negotiate with creditors to pay less than the total amount of his or her debt owing and to reschedule payments over a longer period.

Faced with the alternative of forcing the debtor into personal bankruptcy and the likelihood of not seeing any compensation at all, most creditors will be glad for an option that provides some prospect for a return on their dollar. Should personal bankruptcy be the only real option open to the unfortunate debtor, our proposals would provide far easier access to affordable and expedient administrative procedures.

As the standing committee acknowledged during pre-study, these measures will make it easier for bankrupt individuals to get back on their feet and start contributing fully to society once more.

Mr. Speaker, I would now like to touch on a rather controversial aspect of this long awaited reform of the Bankruptcy Act. I am referring, of course, to the wage payment protection. Needless to say that the existing legislation is not particularly fair to the workers.

In fact, not only do they find themselves out of a job following a bankruptcy, but more often than not they cannot get their former employer to pay them the wages owed to them and other benefits they are entitled to.

The six previous attempts to reform this legislation over the past 20 years have all failed because we could never agree on things like the form this protection should take, its funding or under what jurisdiction it should come.

It is scandalous and quite intolerable that we have not finished talking and that workers are without any real protection. Workers have suffered too much until now and this situation has gone on long enough.

I call on my fellow members not to lose sight of this and not to let another opportunity to correct an injustice go by. Of course, everyone has a right to defend his ideas, but once the dust has settled, we could not claim victory unless the reform included adequate protection for workers.

[English]

On that note let me take a few moments to explain why I feel far more confident about the measures proposed in Bill C–22 than about other options that have been proposed. Earlier I mentioned that fairness and accessibility were important standards against which to assess Bill C–22.

The only other alternatives in the area of wage earner protection appear to me to be retrogressive when contrasted with what the government has proposed. The wage claim payment program guarantees all workers a minimum but realistic level of protection for the recovery of wages and other moneys owed to them when their employers go bankrupt. Faced with the bleak prospect of unemployment the last thing workers need is to have to spend time worrying about when and if they will see any of the moneys owed to them.

Financed by a 10 cent per person per week levy on payrolls the moneys collected would go into a fund that would guarantee workers receive the moneys they are owed fast and with a minimum of red tape. The program would be user friendly to both wage earners and businesses. The levy would be incorporated into existing unemployment insurance premium calculations and would therefore not add to the paper burden which industry faces.

Rather than accept the administratively simple procedure of creating a fund, some suggest that we should provide wage earners super priority on the remaining assets of the bankrupt firm for wages and other moneys owed to them up to a theoretical maximum level. The notion of a super priority is not new. It has been extensively debated before both in Canada and in the European Community and has been found to be seriously wanting for several reasons.

The first is that it is neither sure nor is it prompt. Super priority assumes that there will be sufficient available assets remaining in the bankrupt firm to cover claims for wages and other moneys owed to employees. That is an increasingly tenuous prospect given the greater latitude Bill C–22 provides for unpaid suppliers to recoup their assets.

Assuming the bankrupt firm has sufficient assets to cover wages and other moneys owed, what happens if these assets are not liquid? It may take several months before the firm's assets are liquidated.

The fact remains that before extending a loan, a financial institution will insist on some sort of collateral. This will require the lender to estimate the market value of the assets of a firm, a tricky and often imprecise exercise particularly when perishable goods or partially processed manufactured goods are involved. The result of a policy of super priority would unquestionably be a significant restriction in the availability of credit as secured creditors compensate for the higher level of risk they will have to contend with. There are no ifs, ands or buts on this score.

Yesterday in this House the hon. member for Dartmouth suggested that super priority would have little impact on the availability of credit. He indicated that since the fund created by Bill C–22 would amount to between $60 million and $70 million the impact on credit would be $60 million to $70 million on a total of $150 billion credit available in Canada. At first glance this appears to be a convincing argument. Unfortunately it is incorrect.

In fact the credit impact would total only $60 million when we know which companies go bankrupt, but lenders cannot predict beforehand which companies these will be. If they knew they would provide no credit at all to those firms.

In reality the lenders would have to establish a formula to protect their investments across the board. Here is how they would do that. Under the plan espoused by the hon. member for Dartmouth wage earners would be eligible for a super priority over other creditors up to a maximum of $3,000. For example let us take a company of 100 employees. To calculate the potential liability created by super priority the lenders would multiply 100 workers by $3,000 and come up with $300,000. That means that the first $300,000 of a company's assets would be unavailable to secured creditors in the event of insolvency. Even factoring in competition between lenders the total credit restriction for this hypothetical company would be at least $150,000 to $200,000. Under the wage claim payment program proposed in Bill C-22 the company would pay a levy of approximately $520 per year. That is $520 per year versus hundreds of thousands in credit restriction.

It is very clear which proposal would place a greater burden on businesses.

Indeed I recommend that all members of the House who support super priority read the 1986 report of the Advisory Committee on Bankruptcy and Insolvency, chaired by Gary Colter. It commented at some length on the legal and administrative murkiness of super priority, especially in light of the proliferation of innovative security instruments that have appeared over the past decade.

As Gary Colter put it: "In principle, super priority sounds very simple. However, it must be realized that there are many different types of security interests, and the allocation of the burden of paying wage claims among the various secured creditors is a complicated task. The courts will be clogged with cases attempting to determine the respective priorities of various classes of secured creditors".

I find it interesting that in his speech to the House yesterday the hon. member for Dartmouth invoked the name of Gary Colter as an expert on insolvency matters.

The hon. member quoted Mr. Colter as saying that the reforms to the Bankruptcy Act must above all be fair and equitable. I quite agree with those sentiments and also agree that Mr. Colter is one of the country's leading bankruptcy authorities. Why then does the hon. member for Dartmouth conveniently disregard Mr. Colter's clear warning about the tremendous unsuitability and danger of a super priority approach? One might suggest that the hon. member go back and read the entire report of the Colter committee.

An argument often used by advocates of super priority is that it is unfair to require companies and the federal, provincial and municipal governments which cannot go bankrupt to subsidize, in a sense, the companies that can go broke. They are also against having employees pay 10 cents a week. This argument makes no sense.

By agreeing to contribute, governments would knowingly agree to help lessen the tax burden on companies so that they can continue to create wealth and jobs. For example, asking employers to pay this very small amount is much better than asking all Canadians to do so, which would have been the case if we funded this program from the government's general revenues as some have asked us to do.

Furthermore, I am absolutely convinced that super priority would increase the risks for secured creditors, who would therefore tighten the credit requirements for businesses, especially labour-intensive ones.

[English]

In conclusion, I would like to quote very, very briefly from two communications recently received from two of the major stakeholders. First of all: "We do not believe it is necessary to reiterate the well-documented host of reasons for rejecting the recommendations of a super priority for wage claims. As you are aware, they include the very negative impact on credit availability for business, the difficulty in establishing a procedure to determine which assets of which secured creditor in an insolvency should bear the burden of the wage claim and the inability to pay wage claims quickly and efficiently where there is a delay in the realization of assets". That is from the Canadian Chamber of Commerce.

Finally, very briefly: "It is our view that in most bankruptcies the assets of the bankrupt firm are insufficient to meet most claims and raising wages to a super priority status would not guarantee either speed or certainty of payment. We remain unconvinced by the recommendations of the committee that elevating wages to a higher priority over the claims of other credits would guarantee speed and certainty of payment". That correspondence was in total agreement with the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and was signed by Shirley Carr, president of the Canadian Labour Congress.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to thank the hon. member for allowing my colleague from Prince Edward Island to speak ahead of him and for the patience of the Chair in sorting out that new speaking order.

I do not really have a great deal to quarrel with in the interpretation of most of the issues in the Bankruptcy Act or Bill C-22 as put forward by my hon. colleague from Alberta.

I do have some difficulty in allowing him to sort of buy holus-bolus and swallow hook line and sinker the line from the Canadian financial institutions, most particularly the banks.

We have gone through this many times. I have spoken to the parliamentary secretary. I have spoken to officials in the department. I have spoken to the minister. I have indicated that the banks came in at the beginning of this whole process when we did pre-study and told us two things. There is another provision in here which is a very good provision and it is one that I support whole-heartedly. It is on revindication of goods.

We all remember it, anybody who was at that committee. The revindication process says that if goods are sold within 30 days of a bankruptcy the supplier of those goods has a right to go in and reclaim the goods.

Prior to this in the old bill those goods would have been there and they would not have been revindicated. They could not get them back. Those goods would have been part of the assets that were liquidated by the bank to realize on their security. That is what would happen.

We heard early on that the banks were concerned about two things. The first was that the revindication was going to cause a credit crunch. That is what the banks said. We told them that we did not believe them for a minute. We proved it to them through the hearings. We proved it to everybody who was there. We got officials in from Quebec and asked them how the civil law was being interpreted in Quebec because they have a revindication in the province of Quebec which perhaps does not go as far. The bankers told us two things. They told us that if we allowed revindication there would be a credit crunch. Second, they told us if we allowed a super priority there would be a credit crunch.

We quickly disrobed the bankers and saw them standing naked without anything to back them up. After we spoke to officials from Quebec we found out there was no credit crunch in Quebec on revindication. They dropped their objection and turned their full guns on super priority.

As quickly as they dropped their objections when they were found out to be not factual, the government, the minister, the parliamentary secretary and everybody else have swallowed that if we put in a super priority all of a sudden there will be a credit crunch there.

We cannot have it both ways. The banks were found not to be truthful in their threats of a credit crunch on revindication, and thank goodness for that because it is still in the bill and it is a very good proposal. What in the name of goodness would lead the parliamentary secretary to believe that the banks' ominous predictions of massive credit crunch are going to be indeed the case if we go through with super priority.

We are opposed on this side to a tax. The member opposite was opposed earlier in the year to a tax. I think most members of this House are opposed to a tax.

What I want to ask the hon. parliamentary secretary is: Why believe the banks now? We know it was not the case in revindication. We know that the credit crunch was not the result of basically a super priority or a deemed trust situation a dozen years ago on source deductions owing.

I would like to find out what magical crystal ball he has looked into and why he now believes the banks when his own department and his own minister did not believe the banks and their ominous warnings on revindication.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the intervention by the hon. member for Dartmouth who has made such a good contribution to this debate and who did such outstanding work in the pre-study by the standing committee.

I want to say first of all that it was a pleasure to yield to the member for Cardigan who is a good friend and who represents a remarkable area of this country wherein lie the roots of my wife's family and which I know rather well. I envy him his return to that fabled island.

I am not sure my hon. friend was here to hear this yesterday, but I did respond to his reminder of the survey done by the CFIB of members of Parliament and their attitudes toward a tax in this regard. I will just summarize my response of yesterday by saying that we are all here to learn. One of the most wonderful things I have learned over the past few weeks since October 8 when I took an oath as parliamentary secretary is the lack of wisdom of super priority and the wisdom of a tax. We can all learn. We can be educated. The hon. member opposite in perhaps 20 years may have the opportunity to become a parliamentary secretary and may learn what I am talking about.

I believe the committee did not accept the idea that the banks would change their credit granting practices. Perhaps the committee should not have ignored what banks have done and are presently going to do with super priority for withholding. They have amended their margin formulas. Banks will always respond so as to best protect themselves. I do not think there will be any challenge to that truism around this House.

Credit may not be impacted in dealings with large corporations and multinationals. However, borrowers with less than the double a rating will undoubtedly face restrictions. Lenders will definitely take into account the impact of wage priority when fixing margin ratios, particularly for the riskiest and most vulnerable and labour intensive businesses.

The cost to such an employer of a reduced margin on credit availability would be much greater than $5.20 per employee per year. Furthermore, when a vulnerable borrower is up for credit review or given some financial difficulties, the lender requests that a viability study be performed by an independent third party account firm and such an accounting firm would see that the realization test applied in reviewing the credit should include a full reserve for wage liability, thus resulting in a cutback in credit to a business which terribly and precisely needs more credit and a break to survive temporary financial difficulties.

That would be the straw that breaks the camel's back for that particular business. That is not speculation. If the margining formula does not reserve for wage liability the viability report will do so at full values and exposure, and this will result in a sudden reduction of credit from the borrowers most vulnerable and when the borrower needs the credit most.

As to my friend's point on competition among banks, banks are not competing on the basis of more relaxed credit granting policies. Banks are competing by offering new and better products and services, not by relaxing credit terms. Competition and maintenance of sound credit granting policies are not congruent concepts.

In conclusion, a key policy of the government is to contain and reduce expenditures in order to contain and reduce the federal deficit. It is hard to know how this kind of a recommendation would impact on that.

The concept of super priority has been rejected by just about all the stakeholders in the game, except for the Canadian Federation of Independent Business and perhaps the Vancouver Board of Trade. All other groups, including the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the Canadian Labour Congress and the Canadian Federation of Labour, have indicated their strong preference for a fund over super priority.

Indeed, in the first few days of hearing, the hon. member for Mississauga South for one systematically asked each and every witness what they thought of super priority. Invariably the answer was that super priority would not work and would have a negative impact on credit availability and was not therefore the preferred option.

It is a total mystery contained in a conundrum within an enigma to me why the hon. member for Mississauga South who donated his not inconsiderable talents and wisdom to the work of this committee— as a contribution he offered himself into the work of the committee and I am sure that all who know and respect him appreciate that—came up with a recommendation for super priority in the face of such incontrovertible evidence.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I was interested in the compliments given to me by the member for Edmonton. I hope he realizes that I have had something to do with banks over the past decade or so in the finance committee.

I want to tell him that I get along very well with the bankers and the trust officers and the people in the financial community. I know where they are coming from when they want to protect their interest because I am faced with lobbying from them all of the time.

When I understand their concerns, I understand them well. I am also able to judge the validity of the concerns. I think that my friend from Dartmouth probably has the situation in hand in a more appropriate fashion than the minister and his parliamentary secretary who seem to swallow the whole problem of the banks, holus-bolus, in full, in toto.

I cannot understand why they would do that when even my friend from Nickel Belt understands them, and understands them well. I want to tell the parliamentary secretary—he left—but I want to put it on the record that my friend from Nickel Belt gets along exceptionally well with the banks. He was sitting beside Helen Sinclair for the last period of time in the finance committee passing the Bank Act and the insurance act, and taking instructions and help from the bankers.

He knows them well. He understands them, and he knows where they are coming from. We all know where they are coming from. The fact of the matter is that there are a number of problems in bankruptcies. I want to go over them.

I was nominated as a critic for this party when we were in opposition. During the period 1982 to 1984, there was a great deal of negotiation in connection with a bankruptcy and insolvency act.

Part of the problem developed from the Landry commission that, like all of these commissions, decided to talk about some kind of a fund. After some considerable negotiation, it was agreed on all sides that Bill C-17 be presented with a super priority. That was moving along very well in committee until a certain leader decided to take a walk in the snow.

That led to a certain convention and that led to a certain political party that was then the government going to the country and finding their popularity was a mile wide and an inch deep when they swam in the swimming pool.

Consequently in 1984 that act died on the Order Paper. Unfortunately it is only now, many years later that we bring it up again.

There are five basic issues in a bankruptcy. First of all, there is the issue of receivers. Right now, if a receiver is appointed, there is no law. He walks in. He takes over under the terms of the security agreement. If the security agreement is breached, somebody can start a lawsuit, but essentially the receiver takes over under the terms of the security agreement.

There it is. The effect of this act is to bring receivers into the insolvency legislation. That is very important. It must be done and it is about time.

The second thing is that there has to be something done in our bankruptcy law that has been required for a long time to deal with reorganizations where companies are in deep financial trouble. Can they reorganize, can we have arrangements with creditors that work? This bill again attempts to do that and does it very well.

Some of the suggestions the committee gave will make it work even better, and I am sure the minister will accept those.

The third thing is the question of revindication. When a manufacturer or processor sells something and does not get paid, in the very short period between when he delivers the goods and insolvency or receivership of some kind, under this bill he is able to go and get his goods back if he can identify them and they have not been further processed. That is probably a good thing.

I want to point out that that is a super priority. That is a super priority. All right. Good super priority.

The third issue has been the question of Crown priorities. Over a period of time, the Crown has been bit by bit putting its nose into insolvency so that it can be first in line. The Crown wants to be a super priority on income tax, on unemployment insurance, on Canada Pension and on one fee after another.

• (1640)

The provinces have super priorities on Workers' Compensation premiums and everybody wants a priority there. Under Bill C-17, those priorities were given up by the Crown. The Crown became an ordinary creditor. Under this bill, only the federal Crown on income tax deductions and on UIC and on Canada Pension keeps its priorities. Now the provincial Crown gets shoved down to the basement but the federal Crown somehow decides to keep its super priority.

Then of course the question is what do we do with wages. The current act was passed in 1949 when there were no or very few general security agreements. Banks and creditors generally did not have floating charge security and so the problem did not arise. When people went bankrupt, the wage earners had a $500 preference when the estate of an insolvent person was put through bankruptcy.

The trouble is today we do not have bankruptcies. We have a situation where the secured creditor sends his receiver in and the receiver sells everything out. Of course it is stuck with a Crown priority. Then the receiver takes the money and there is nothing left for anybody.

What bankruptcy legislation is really trying to do is re-orient the priorities because in an insolvency there never is enough money to pay everybody. If there was enough money to pay everybody there would not be an insolvency. So this legislation and all bankruptcy and insolvency legislation deals with sorting out what is left and how you divide it.

The issue really is, how do you work out the questions of priority? The current situation is that the Crown comes first: super-priority. The second person to come first is the big bank, who has the security on it. I want to tell you someone else who might come first. It might be the shareholders who were smart enough to register a floating charge debenture themselves. As a lawyer on many occasions acting for a shareholder, I have gone in and sent my trustee in or my receiver in, seized the assets, wiped out the ordinary creditors and sold the assets to someone else.

That is not very nice. You know that a shareholder does not have to be a director and therefore is not responsible for wages. So right now under the current system, the person with that floating charge security can wind up ahead. After the Crown they were there. Okay.

What we should be doing is re-orienting the priorities. That is what this bill should be about. That is when we talk wages, it is what we are talking about. We are talking about re-orienting the priorities. It was the view of the committee that workers should come first. Workers ought to have something out of what is left in an insolvency, first. Then the view of the committee was that the secured creditors should come, after revindication of early delivered goods. And then of course, eventually, the ordinary creditors come and the Crown would be an ordinary creditor.

That is what this is all about. This debate is about priorities. Who is to collect out of an amount of assets that are there? The view of the committee was that workers should come first. People who had a specific claim on a revindication should come in there and then the secured creditor should come on the floating charge claim. The view of the committee was that specific creditors who have specific charges like a first mortgage on a building or a lien on a specific piece of equipment ought to be able to take back their equipment or their building because they own it. Those who had floating charges against accounts receivable and unencumbered assets and stock in trade, the floating charge stuff that is secured by these floating security agreements, those agreements ought to be subject to these priorities.

That is really all we are talking about. The question really is: Is this question of looking after employees to be a social claim or a matter of social justice or something of this nature that perhaps the government ought to be involved in? Should we have the government creating a new social right? If your employer will not pay you, then you call upon the government in prayer and say: "Dear government, pay me". Is this the kind of social policy we ought to have?

This bill is a bill with a wage protection fund and is a social policy bill. Let us get is straight. It is a social policy bill. It says if you do not get paid, go to the government and get it. Do not get it out of the assets of the business. Go to the government and get the money. Is that the thing we really want? Do we really want to have further claims on the government? Is this the kind of social priority we want in social priority spending or would we rather have it in day care or in something else? Is this the social priority we should be setting up?

I suggest it is not. What do we do? We call it a wage protection fund. We say it is collected on the UIC, it is only collected from employers and it is only 10 cents a week and it is only a little bit. It reminds me of the baloney, it is a little bit now and a nice slice now. Bit by bit by bit, we make sure that Canada is unproductive.

What was this production yesterday about competition, competitiveness and prosperity? What was this all about? All about taxes on businesses. Only a dime a week, a dime a week, a dime a week. How many of us remember what the original contributions to Canada Pension were? How many of us remember what the original contributions to the unemployment insurance fund were? Does a dime a week not sound pretty easy? Maybe it was a little more.

I guess if we really think it is a social priority, if we really think social policy then this is a prime social policy and we should have a fund. What kind of a social policy is this bill? This is a social policy that only looks after some, not everyone, just some. Who are the some? They are the people who work for the companies, where there are enough assets in the till to hire a trustee or receiver. When we ask what these fellows earn it is sort of indicated that you could not get a receiver for less than $10,000 guarantee. So you had to have an asset or an estate of an insolvent person that was worth a few dollars in order to get a receiver or trustee appointed in the first place.

We are going to have social policy to look after the workers of insolvent estates where there is enough money in the estate that the bank or the person who has the security is prepared to pony up enough money up front to guarantee the trustee. Those are the very estates that there is enough money in to look after wages in almost every case, in almost every case. But these are the estates of bankrupts or insolvent people who are going to make sure that the creditor does not get hurt, that the state takes it up, that a fund takes it up, and who contributes to the fund? The little guy in business, who runs a business that when it gets into trouble does not have enough in assets to guarantee a trustee or a receiver $10,000.

What happens? Nobody puts it in bankruptcy, nobody puts in a receiver, and his employees, they get nothing. Over half the people who lose their wages as a result of an insolvency get zip. Here we have a tax that applies across the whole community. That is why it is only a dime a person. It applies across the whole community. That is all. It applies across the whole community but only people who work for employers where there is enough in the insolvency to cover the cost of a trustee can make a claim.

If we sat back and said "well, the premium ought to be against those people whose employees would likely be able to claim", in other words big firms, I suspect you would find the premium not a dime but maybe more like a dollar a week, plus, plus, plus. So we have a peculiar situation.

The Colter commission was made up of people who were professionals in the bankruptcy business. Who were their clients? Usually big secured creditors: banks, trust companies, RoyNat, these people. Of course they would like this because it is easy to administer an estate if you do not have to worry about these nagging employees asking: "Where is my money?" You just say: "Well, go see the government and you will get paid". Of course it is good for them, of course it is good for them.

However, the issue is: Is this good social policy? Is this the kind of social justice this country should have? Is this the kind of industrial legislation we should have? Is this the way we ought to be going?

I say to this House: no, it is a time when the minister and this House paid attention to its committees. They went back on this legislation and redesigned it.

There are ways. The minister knows there are ways to recognize unemployment earlier than the day a person applies at the UIC office. Yes, you can anti-date claims. Yes you could do something, but surely not this way. Surely, this bill must not pass in its present form.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to get back to a few things my hon. friend raised during his speech.

I appreciate the fact that he mentioned the committee looked at a few things like creditors in their takeover of assets, which he mentioned as a first point; the reorganization process; the revindication of goods; and the fact that we have reduced the Crown's priority. We have reduced it by a certain amount, all the money that is due to the Crown and not the money raised by the employers in trust, if I may. The deductions will stay there.

I have a question for the hon. member. This approach of super priority is very attractive. I discussed that with my hon. friend from Dartmouth and my hon. friend from Nickel Belt. We looked at this in depth.

As my parliamentary secretary said, only one group before the committee that said they were in favour of the super priority. It was Mr. Bulloch's group. All the others were opposed; not only the Colter report but the Canadian Labour Congress and the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. It was not only a single position.

My question is very simple. When we are looking at the assets it is not that easy.

I would just like to look at one point. I have not been able to find an answer to that question because it renders this question of super priority inapplicable. The assets of a business bankrupt may include one, two, three or four buildings, accounts receivable, a deed of trust that covers some other goods, inventories, bank accounts and collateral. It is quite complex.

How would we split this up if super priority applied? How are we going to decide the share that would be owed to all those creditors if, in a business that employs 100 people, super priority took $200,000? In this case, Mr. Speaker, and that is an important issue, each business that would seek financing from the bank would be confronted with a banker who would take that into account, if he did not know whether the amount he will have to give for super priority to these employees will be taken from his building, the second mortgage, the first mortgage on the other building, accounts receivable or inventory. It is totally impractical.

In fact, this super priority already exists, following the amendments made in 1987 to the Department of National Revenue Act, but it is not being used because it is unworkable at the present time. The Department of National Revenue only uses the deemed trust and enhanced garnishment to recover funds from the accounts receivable.

So, I consider this inapplicable and I ask my colleague to explain briefly how we could possibly use a formula that is in itself unworkable. Imagine the number of lawsuits that the various creditors could bring against each other; it would take months, even years before an individual would be able to see the colour of his money.

Mr. Speaker, the fund that we propose, which will cost 10 cents per employee, will enable people to recover their money in about a month or five weeks.

[English]

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the minister for his question. It is a very important question.

The issue is really what secured creditors would pay the super priority. When there are specific charges, for example a mortgage on real estate, a mortgage or a conditional sales contract on piece of machinery or a specific assignment of a specific receivable, clearly those specific assignments or specific agreements come first and are not subject to any priority, because the person who has those specific agreements has the right above the receiver or above the trustee in bankruptcy in the same manner as a landlord exercising his landlord's lien has a claim above the trustee or receiver.

The issue on which you claim here then is the floating charge type, unassigned or unspecifically assigned assets.

Since the last Bankruptcy Act, banks and other lenders to companies have found that they can register in Canada, though not in the United States. They can register floating charge security. Without getting any specific lien on any specific asset they claim a lien on all the stuff in the estate of the insolvent company or person that has not been specifically attached.

It is those assets that before those classes of security were available, and that class of security I want to again point out to the minister is not available generally in the United States where banks lend money, that are used as funds to attach. That is the very fund that the Government of Canada attaches, as the minister pointed out, when it goes after money it claims to be held in trust for unremitted income tax deductions and the like. The government says: "Well, you have not specifically assigned those receivables so we will seize the receivables, we will in a sense use the income tax garnishee putting us ahead of the receiver with respect to those receivables and get the money for us".

It is exactly that situation that we are dealing with here. We are dealing with this particular group of assets that are not specific assets, not specifically pledged, and not subject to landlord liens or anything. I guess they are subject to landlords' liens but usually the landlord is paid off because he gets his three months rent and that is the end of it. Those are what we are talking about and that is the kind of thing that is the subject of any claim for priority. That is what ought to be used. That fund ought to be used to pay the wages. It should be used for wages first and if it cannot satisfy wages then that is the way it is. Wages should be first before paying off shareholders who happen to have debentures registered, or banks or lenders that happen to have floating securities on top of specific securities.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to the speech by the hon. member for Mississauga South. It makes a lot of sense. That was the kind of atmosphere in which we discussed this bill in pre-study.

The member mentioned what the issues were. He mentioned a lot of issues. I want to ask him if he thinks that this is the time, given the state of the economy of the country, that any government should be introducing another tax on small and medium-sized businesses. We are talking about having to raise the unemployment insurance premiums in January so we can balance that account by $5 billion. Is this the time that we should be imposing another tax on small and medium-sized businesses in this country? Is it not a real fear that it will start at 10 cents but before you know it will be up to $5 a week per person.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I always have difficulty with a tax of any kind. What really sends shock waves up my spine is the specific provision in this act that calls it the imposition of a tax.

I think Canadians are fed up to their teeth with taxes right now. Our economy is certainly not strong in the sense that people feel good about things. The government says to employers: "Well, here is another levy, it is just a small levy, it is only another dime". It is not just another dime. Not only that, but it is a dime from a whole lot of people who are not going to collect or cannot collect or their employees cannot collect. Somewhere along the line government has to avoid that. My friend will remember that the Canadian Chamber of Commerce apparently thinks this wage protection fund is a great idea except it does not want to have any tax. It believes it ought to come out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund. The Canadian Chamber of Commerce, with Mr. Reid in charge, apparently thinks that out behind this place is a big orchard and any time you need some extra money you go out there and shake the tree again.

Members are starting to understand that there is not an unlimited capacity for business people or workers or anybody else to pay taxes. It is about time that we in this House started realizing that and we started priorizing our claims against the state. I am suggesting to this House that this particular wage protection fund is not a priority claim against the estate of Canada, the claim should be against the estate of insolvent companies.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member for Mississauga South is fully aware of the fact that the minister has seen fit to favour 15 of the 21 recommendations of the pre-study and whether he recognizes that this indeed is not a social policy and not a new social right.

The employers under this bill would pay into a fund. This would not be the government's money but the employees' money owed to them by their employers. Does the hon. member recognize that fact?

Finally, does the hon. member not recognize that with the scheme contained in this bill workers would come first, that they would be paid much more expeditiously than under any super priority scheme? Under super priority they might get nothing or might wait for months for any payment to come to them. Under this scheme they would receive their money and receive it expeditiously. Does the hon. member recognize that?

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the parliamentary secretary for his question.

Clearly some workers will get their money. The parliamentary secretary ought to realize that only some workers will get their money. Those employees of a small business for which a trustee has not been hired or a receiver has not been employed will get nothing. Yet every small businessman in this country will pay, every hospital board will pay, every municipality will pay, and this federal government will pay. Why will it pay? It will pay a tax to a fund to protect workers or possibly to protect banks.

Perhaps the act should not be called the wage protection fund but the bank and secured creditors protection fund.

[Translation]

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Basically, Mr. Speaker, I agree with this bill, and I am somewhat reluctant to mention my experience as the owner of a small business for a number of years. Our problem was, we were doing the job for governments and unions. We had to collect income tax, unemployment insurance premiums, and so forth. People will say the premiums are not that high. In any case, I agree with the principle that employees must be protected when a company goes bankrupt. I always thought it was unfair when employees lost two or three or four weeks of pay after a bankruptcy, although they were supposed to be at the top of the list for any amounts released after a bankruptcy. I wonder, however, whether the government has considered a process or mechanism that would make it unnecessary to collect this new tax which would otherwise put just one more burden on small business.

• (1710)

An hon. member: It's unemployment insurance!

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): They say it's part of unemployment insurance. Perhaps the hon. member for Mississauga South would care to explain the procedure for collecting this new tax.

[English]

Mr. Blenkarn: The government's intention apparently is to collect from the employer at the same time as it collects unemployment insurance an additional .024 cents per $100 of wages per week. That is said to come to about 10 cents. Maybe it is more than 10 cents but it may average 10 cents. It is supposed to be paid with the unemployment insurance remittances every month.

The problem of course is that when it is received it goes into a separate fund. While it may not increase the paper burden on the employer it certainly will create more government jobs and more arrangements for the payment of the fund. In other words a fairly extensive bureaucracy is required to look after the receipt of moneys that are paid out of the fund.

The real issue is whether that payment should be made by all employers or only some employers or only those employers which have operations large enough to have the advantage of a receiver or a trustee if they were wound up.

Bearing in mind the fact that the cost of bankruptcy is so enormous and the cost of a receiver is quite substantial surely small business employers ought not to be included in this fund and surely hospitals and so on ought not to be included.

The issue is another fund. I want to assure the member that this is not an additional necessary burden of bureaucracy on the employer but certainly does add to the amount he pays and therefore is a tax on him. It adds to red tape in the government and the cost of paying out funds and administering it.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I would first of all like to compliment the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs for the work he has done in presenting this bill and the tone he has presented during this debate over the last couple of days. It has been great that he has accepted 18 of the 22 amendments. It shows a willingness to work. It shows a willingness to listen. If we can just continue that tone for a little longer I think we can come up with a piece of legislation that will go a long way toward improving the productivity of this nation.

Yesterday in the House the Minister for International Trade released his paper on prosperity through competitiveness. Shortly into his speech on productivity he said the following: "Productivity is the heart of the issue and is essential to our prosperity. It supports our way of life. It puts food on our tables, schools and hospitals in our communities, roads across our great community, pay cheques in our pockets. That is why we are here today. We must find a way as a nation to improve our productivity. We must change the way we think, the way we work and the way we work together as a country and as a people".

I think that the member for Mississauga South was touching on something earlier today when he said: "Really this bill today is a bill about shifting our priorities".

If the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs could figure out a way to put the wage earner in a protected position in this bill, then he would go a long way in improving the productivity of this nation.

As this minister and all of us in this House know, right now we have a crisis of confidence in this country. We do have a productivity problem. Not only do we have two million people without jobs, but we have many people with jobs who are nervous, wondering whether or not the companies they are working for are going to survive the next six, eight, ten months.

One of the things that is essential to the survival of a company is the productivity of the work force. It is the human capital. The banker does not really decide whether a company ultimately stays or dies. It can go a long way in that direction, but the most important thing is to have a galvanized work force, a work force that does not need to look over its shoulder, a work force that does not have to worry that: "My goodness, the next payroll. My cheque may not be there. If my company does not make it, I am out of pocket. I am stuck."

The minister should listen to the member for Mississauga South who has shown a lot of courage here today by giving constructive advice to his colleagues in government and he is saying: "Let us shift our priorities. Let us take that leap of faith".

I think that if the minister were to put a super priority on the labour force of this nation, that would go a long way in giving credibility to the paper that the Minister for International Trade released in this House yesterday.

You see, Mr. Minister, the problem that we have in this country right now is the trust factor. Very few people trust this productivity paper process. They think it is a bit of a public relations sham.

You are sitting in the House today. You have a bill that can affect the productivity of this nation probably more than most people realize. If you take that leap of faith and put the labour force of this country in a protected position, you will probably minimize the number of bankruptcies in the next few years.

I give you credit for cleaning up a piece of legislation that is 42 years old. You are three-quarters of the way there, but you have to address this point. Quite frankly, I think if you do not listen to my colleague from Halifax—Dartmouth who so succinctly presented the case for the work force of this nation yesterday as well as the member for Mississauga South, if you ignore that, then you are going to make the words of the Minister for International Trade yesterday in this House vulnerable. It is going to show that you are really not committed to innovation, you are really not committed to shifting your priorities.

If there was ever a time in this country to take a leap of faith in the work force of this nation, it is today. I think you have a very special, a very unique opportunity.

The second point that I want to address in this legislation is the tax. It is not the 10 cents per se or 10 cents per week per every employee on every pay cheque. It is the principle that you are opening up another tax, and it is the paper burden that goes with it.

There is a third point. I do not like the psychology of this, that every week you are as an employer, reminding yourself about this bankruptcy legislation. That 10 cent a week payment has a negative psychological effect. There is enough negative press in this country. There is enough bad news in this country. You do not need to be reminded every time you fill out a payroll that you are insuring against bankruptcy. That is a factor we have never discussed.

It seems to me that we are too concerned about the banking community in this country. It is time to slow down our thinking when it comes to the banking community's agenda. I do not think there is any one of us in this House over the last 18 months, whether it be friends or constituents who have not experienced a relationship with the banks.

As a medium-sized businessman who has talked to many other businessmen, the banks always have their position protected. Find me a bank today in this country that has taken some kind of leap of faith on a consistent basis. I am not suggesting that there are not bank managers who are not fair. But there is a banking policy, mostly presented to the branches coast to coast to coast which dictates that they want every nickel of their investment covered. They want every nickel of their loan covered. They want it guaranteed with homes. They want it guaranteed with insurance policies. They want triple security.

I do not think we should be letting the banking agenda of this country get another form of security. We should let the work force of this country control a little bit of the agenda and put the banks into a secondary position.

I do not believe that in any way, shape or form that there will be a credit crunch. The minister will know that three weeks ago we debated the reorganization of the Bank Act. One of the amendments to the Bank Act that was put forward was the new appeals system to the Superintendent of Financial Institutions, whereby a client of a bank who does not feel he is being treated fairly, whether it is a small business or even a personal loan, could report that unfairness to the Superintendent of Financial Institutions. That is a pretty serious amendment to the Bank Act.

If a bank's actions do not hold up with its customer, it will then be part of the annual report which will be tabled in this Parliament. I cannot imagine a bank in Canada that would not be sensitive to that kind of bad publicity. In other words, it will be the first time that banks are going to be sensitized to the fact that if they do not treat their customers fairly, they are going to be exposed by the Superintendent of Financial Institutions. Therefore, I do not think we should really worry about a financial crunch.

It goes back to the point the member for Mississauga South made, that this is a bill about shifting our priorities. Our priorities, in my humble opinion, should first of all be to make sure that the payrolls, the workers are covered, God forbid, when bankruptcy happens.

The second position, of course, is to make sure that certain suppliers that have put goods into a company within a 30 day period of a bankruptcy proceeding, their goods are protected. I believe that is a good amendment. The government has accepted that and I applaud it. It will encourage suppliers which are working on fine lines, with just in time delivery type corporations, retailers, et cetera, that will encourage them not to withhold the shipment of goods because they basically know that as long as they are within the 30 day period their asset is protected under this new act. I think that is a solid amendment.

I want to go back to the fact that this country does not need any more taxes. It does not matter whether it is 10 cents a week per person, it is a tax. It is a bad symbol, it is a disincentive to productivity, it is a disincentive to the creativity that is needed to get the productivity of this country going and it sends out a bad signal.

I urge the minister to reconsider his position before we come back for third reading. I would ask him to show some faith in the work force of this country. He can show that faith by shifting the priority of protection from banks to the work force.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I am touched by my colleague's kind words. I knew that the bad news would follow, but I nevertheless thank him for congratulating me. Mr. Speaker, I would like the hon. member to clarify a number of comments that he made. I believe that with my colleagues, the New Democratic Party critics, the member for Nickel Belt, and the member for Dartmouth, we have worked very closely, precisely to try to find a solution to that issue.

It is never pleasant to propose a situation that takes money from employers. Incidentally, the recommendation that we made was suggested by the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway who, in the debate in 1984, suggested exactly what the member for Nickel Belt is now suggesting that we go back to. The important thing though is that you have gone back to the position expressed by the hon. member for Mississauga, and I would like to know if you share the idea of a super priority that your party seems to have proposed.. It is an interesting idea at first glance, but do you also agree that it should apply strictly to accounts receivable or to assets that are not already subject to a lien, like security on some equipment, a vehicle or a building? If so, it would considerably limit the assets available.

I must inform the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood that this right already exists for the Crown, the Department of Revenue and right now we can only recover about 60 per cent of the amounts owed to the government. If we were to replace the "super priority" that already exists for the Department of Revenue, we would of course have to say: "Move over; we are now establishing a new super priority for salaries." I would like my colleague to tell me how and where we would get the money, because if you change four quarters for a dollar, it is tantamount to giving with one hand and taking it back with the other, and the total amount will still not be covered.

I would also like the hon. member to elaborate on the fact, as he would admit—that many new businesses are in the service sector. Therefore, these businesses have no buildings; they have practically no valuable items. They usually only have a rented computer, a desk and two or three chairs. So, when these businesses go bankrupt, they have practically no goods. In that context, I would like my colleague to tell me how we could this money which, at the present time, is not in the hands of those businesses. The idea is commendable, but it is very important that we be able to give the money to workers who are waiting for their salaries. I would be grateful if you could clarify these points and tell me if you agree with the hon. member for Mississauga on that issue.

• (1730)

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the minister was listening to the point the hon. member for Mississauga South was making. We are talking about a shifting of priorities. We are talking about showing faith in the work force of this country. We must remember that we are only talking about one payroll here. We are not talking about the fact that a payroll keeps going on and on and on. We are talking about wage protection.

I say unequivocally that all other suppliers including the Crown now move into a secondary position. The minister has to remember that if he puts these people out of work they are going to be on unemployment insurance, which is a draw on the Crown.

If you lose your job tomorrow and you go on unemployment insurance, where does the money come from? Why not reverse your approach and take a chance on the work force of this country, because I think in the end that will lead to productivity which might minimize the number of bankruptcies in this country. That is the whole point.

This government does not understand that to motivate a work force you have to show some fairness. You have to send out some signals of fairness. This bill, on that specific point, does not show that. The Minister for International Trade came into the House yesterday and talked about productivity, about going across the country and listening to what people would say about what will make us productive.

We have listened to our constituents. We have been listening to people and I know the minister has too. They say they want fairness in the tax system and this bill flies in the face of what the people are asking for: "Show some good will toward us, show some faith toward us", and that is the point. In order to get to that point, they are going to have to put the banks and the Crown behind the payroll.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood's speech. He is always very impressive and I am always very supportive of the things he says.

We have heard that this is a tax or a levy on businesses, but I want the hon. member to comment on the fact that this is not just a levy on businesses because school boards are going to pay it, hospital associations are going to pay it and municipalities are going to pay it. Where do municipalities, school boards and hospital associations get their money from? They get it from ordinary ratepayers.

I want the hon. member to comment on that because it is more than just a tax on employers that are a great big corporation, a small corporation or a medium size corporation. They are we the people, taxes on the people. They are really taxing people and I would like some comments on that.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I have wondered why the government was putting this tax on hospitals. There is only one thing that concerns me about this tax on hospitals. This government has been dismantling national institutions for the last seven years. There are many people who believe that the next national institution that is about to be dismantled is our national medicare system.

God forbid that this is sort of the advance party of privatization of the hospital system in this country. If we are to maintain our national medical system—and I will not even get in to the schools; let us just talk hospitals—this 10 cents a week on a hospital employee does not make any sense. The only way this would make any sense is if there were some intention of this government to get into the game of privatization of hospitals. There are many in this country who think that is their next step.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to stand here today and speak for some period of time on the bill before us, the Bankruptcy Act, and the wage payment act. I do it with some feeling that there are accomplishments being made.

When we look at the act, originally it was an act that was passed in 1949. The act at that time took into consideration what was occurring coming out of the post-war years and thereafter. The wage payments were a maximum of $500 and these payments were based on the cost of living at that time.

We certainly know in looking at the cost of living index since 1949 and the upgrade that they used to do every 10 years in revamping the scale how things have changed in that period of time. In my own personal experience, I think about when I was 15 years old fighting fires for 75 cents an hour. The first job I had in a sawmill I remember getting paid $1.75 an hour. I left to work in a smelter and made $1.79 an hour. This was in the mid-1960s. I moved on to a high paying job in the pulp industry at $2.05 an hour.

You know the differences now. The mill workers now get paid $18 to $22 an hour. The smelter workers are slightly behind that but getting paid similar wages. That puts into perspective the type of wage that we were looking at in 1949 as opposed to the wages now in 1991. I think the member for Nickel Belt gave some examples recently where he pointed out the broad variance in that $500 to now.

The present bill looks specifically at the amount of wages that should be topped up. It sets that limit at $2,000. In terms of 1949 dollars my friend has pointed out it falls far short. I believe the figures he came up with were something in the area of $5,000 to $6,000 would be more in line with the dollar from the 1949 area.

We see right off the bat that although this bill has looked at the wage payment, the upper limit that they have set under this bill leaves something to be desired. The bill over all with some exceptions, as pointed out by other speakers, is a bill that is needed and has been needed for some period of time. It has been pointed out throughout the course of this debate that there have been many attempts—I think there were seven attempts since 1974—to amend the Bankruptcy Act.

This minister has taken the bull by the horns this time around and brought in a bill that with slight modification can probably work this time around. I think the member for Nickel Belt, the member for Dartmouth and the member for Mississauga South have pointed out very compellingly why the minister should listen to these changes. I believe it was the member for Calgary Southwest who talked about the reasons why super priority cannot work. It cannot work I say from the perspective of someone who has been in the labour force and has worked for the Department of Labour in employment standards. I have worked specifically on legislation dealing with payment of wages and lost wages and come up against bills such as the Bankruptcy Act, priorities and super priorities such as the priority of the federal Crown. I have also for 15 years been a member of the bar, a lawyer, and dealt with companies who are setting up, who have gone into receivership, who have been sent into receivership by the banks, and walkaways, as explained by the member for Mississauga South who have been unable to come up with sufficient assets to interest the trustee.

I think the member points out properly that in itself the trustees have a super priority or perhaps I should say they have a super sweet super priority. They do not go in unless they know there is money and under the act the trustee takes his or her money right off the top before secured creditors before the Crown creditors, the priority creditors, or before the unsecured creditors. Right up at the top, our super sweet super priority people, the trustees, get their money.

Yet under this bill I believe that one of the major flaws from my perspective and from that of my critic area, small business, is one that this minister should reconsider, super priority for wages.

I was a researcher for the provincial Department of Labour back in the 1970s for six or seven months in British Columbia. We constantly looked at ways of getting employees their wages.

We see the hardship that it causes and back then, almost 20 years ago, it was not uncommon to see wages owing well in excess of $2,000. Often when a company got into problems, one of the first thing it seemed to do was miss the payment deadline.

Often many of the employees were true to their company and had worked there for a number of years. Because of the employee-employer relationship, the loyalty that they felt toward their employer, they would use their savings over a week, two weeks, three week period of time with the assurance from the employer that everything would be fine. It was a temporary rough period, but once the finances were in order everything would be okay and the employees would be paid.

Now with the wage change differences, those wages add up, and they add up rather rapidly. If you look at just the wage alone it does not take very much to get up over the $2,000 level when you are earning $500 or $800 a week and you have set back your wages over that period of time.

The employee, the average worker, cannot afford to give up that type of money.

I look at this particular proposal that the minister has put forward. On the top of it, 10 cents a week an employee does not seem to be that much of a hardship. But talk to the small business community, not just the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. I had letters from Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing riding, some from my own riding, some from the maritimes, pointing out some of the problems that small business is having in this country and making a go of it. Certainly the minister has looked at the bankruptcy figures over the last year and a half. One of the government members has pointed out that things have improved over last year. It is an improvement over complete decimation of a small business community and although it is somewhat encouraging, we do not have a solid small business community. It does not point to that.

It points to major problems within the business community. Business people tell us, and have told me with some emphasis, that they are being taxed to death. The increase in UI was one of the nails in the coffin of small business.

The GST, in spite of what the Minister of National Revenue has told us, is not only hurting small business. Over the summer I spoke to presidents and board members of some major corporations within my riding. It is hurting them.

The monetary and fiscal policies of this government, the high interest rates and the high dollar rate are all hurting small business. Add, on top of fuel taxes et cetera, a further levy under this plan of the minister and it simply starts to add up to the point where it becomes the straw that breaks the proverbial camel's back.

Small business cannot take any more. It has looked hard for ways around it. It seems to me that the way out is a super priority. The Government of Ontario has set up a fund. It has looked at what it would cost and set up a fund of $175 million as a seed.

There is a proposal that this would bring in something like $61 million as the seed of the fund. The member for Mississauga South and the member for Nickel Belt have pointed out the problems that we have with the employees of the walkaways who do not have the money to go into bankruptcy or receivership.

The employees are hurt. We have a situation where if the government would examine core funding for a program it seems to me that it would protect the employees of the walkaways. It would protect those within the system so that as employees were placed out of work with moneys owing they could take money out of the fund immediately so that their families are not put into hardship. Their rights would then be subrogated to the federal government or the superintendent of bankruptcies, whoever administered the fund.

Through the subrogation their rights would then take priority over everybody including, and I walk on very thin ice here, the trustee in bankruptcy. The wages of the employees who have kept their employers going should have priority over all other creditors, whether they be preferred, secured or Crown creditors. Employees should come first.

I cannot emphasize enough that it is simply not good enough to say that employees will not have priority. That is something that should be looked at. It is something that should be looked at hard and fast. The rule as set out here simply sets up a fund that will be funded by an already overtaxed small business and business community. That is not good enough.

We must have a commitment from this government that the employees will be looked after in a manner that assures that they will be paid immediately and that the setting up of a fund for that payment will not hurt the business community by imposing further taxation.

We have heard today about the start of these taxes. In the First World War the federal income tax first came in as a temporary measure. Now look at the income taxes we have. Essentially the manufacturers' sales tax first came in as a temporary measure.

By the time it was done away with it was up to 13.5 per cent. It rose from 9 per cent to 13.5 per cent under this government since 1984, arguably from 8 per cent as the 1 per cent increase that had already been legislated was implemented under this government in 1984.

It is very clear that taxes increase as people see needs increasing. The examples have been given. We have just seen another major increase in unemployment insurance premiums for both employees and employers. Canada Pension Plan has been increased and will continue to increase as the government sees that more money is needed, as more and more people in Canada need it because they are 65 years of age.

Things have a way of growing like Topsy. They start small. Once the foot is in the door there is a tendency to push that door open and barge through with bigger and bigger taxes on those who can least afford it.

I believe the future of our country is in the area of small and medium-sized businesses. We should be giving these communities a hand up instead of pushing them down and giving them a kick further down the step to oblivion.

This is the government's next step to push down the small business community. The minister points out that it is a very small amount. However those small amounts have a tendency to grow, as they have in the past and as they will in the future. We have to look at that end of it.

Let us look at some of the other issues about this bill. I would like to talk about the retroactivity aspect of it, while we wait for this bill. We do not want to hold the bill up unnecessarily but we do want to protect the wage earners, we do want to protect the business community. There is no consideration in this bill for retroactivity. If the bill kicks in it kicks in at the time of proclamation. That is a concern that could be built into the bill. The provisions of this bill could be made retroactive to at least the date of the tabling of the original bill to give some protection through that period of time.

A positive section of this bill is that of reorganization. It is positive because it is a section that has been long required. All of us in law and business have run into situations where our clients, our business community or people in our business community have been put down and out as a result of the banks simply pulling the carpet for one reason or another, whether it be a political reason or something else.

For example during the early 1980 recession a fairly well-to-do and active business person in one of my communities was doing some fairly high risk investing. He was investing well and creating employment within the community. The banks got a little edgy and pulled the carpet. Luckily this gentleman had built up sufficient assets over the years and was able to come up with purchasers of some of his assets so he was able to bail himself out. Had he not been more careful in the past, as a result of learning through experience dealing with banks, we in our communities in the Okanagan would have lost a valuable member of the business community who to this day is continuing to develop condominiums and build buildings. He sees where the need is and steps in because he has the background. They would have done him in at that time.

The provision for reorganization opens up the gate for a few other people to to get into the system.

Over all the bill is one that we would like to support. However we see the necessity for some of those changes and see the necessity for that change in priority. We see the necessity to ensure that there is something to save people from the walkaways.

Also there is a necessity for some change in the revindication provisions for those who supply and, under the present system, could get left out in the cold.

I would like to be able to support this bill in whole. I implore the minister to consider making those changes so that I and my party can support him and the bankruptcy bill that is so dearly needed for the future.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the comments. Given that the member is a lawyer working in that area, as I have done over the years, we can appreciate how it works.

The member should maybe read the letter from the president of the Canadian Labour Congress as well. It may be interesting for him. He is not exactly in tune.

I realized something. The member talks about the walkaways. The committee in its pre-study addressed this point. We will all do our best to find a way. It is not only under federal jurisdiction therefore we have to be very careful. We all understood that, as far as I know.

We have addressed this concern, recommendation no. 3. It is acceptable and we are going to accept it.

He differs on where the super priority should be. The member for Mississauga mentioned that we should forget the secured creditors that already have a direct link with assets. He said the wage earners should come first, including secured creditors. I understand that. It is a major difference. We looked at the numbers.

We should mention that the super priority that the committee proposed and he agreed with includes not only super priority but a fund. As was said a few moments ago that will require a bureaucracy, red tape and so on. There will be another fund anyway, plus a super priority bureaucracy to look after it and put the system in place. It will be much worse than the 2 cents on the payroll. It is quite different.

He is the last but not the only one to have said that this 10 cents could grow after a few years, as the member for Nickel Belt mentioned. We should remember that we have an advisory board looking after the specific administration and monitoring it to ensure that the 10 cents fixed in the law will not change, unless we need to do that.

I must remind the hon. member that with super priority retroactivity is not practical. Even with the system we propose it is not possible. We cannot impose this small levy of 10 cents retroactively.

I would like to know how the member reconciles his proposal with the proposal of the member for Mississauga. They are not addressing the same assets.

• (1800)

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, the member for Mississauga South was speaking about the proposal of the committee which said that the Superintendent of Bankruptcies would levy the fee from the assets that would go into the fund.

I was saying that the government should look at seeding a special fund. Perhaps it could be built up after but the core funding, the core seed, would be put up front now by the government. If it did that it seems to me that retroactivity could be built into the bill. The fund would be there under what I envision as the super priority and the subrogation of the rights of the employees. Once he is paid out of this fund the employee would subrogate his rights to the superintendent. The superintendent would then have that super priority under the legislation that I envision to get the money back in.

If we extended it over so that we ensured that the walkaways were free and clear, that they got their money, there would be a deficit within that fund of some part that perhaps could be made up in the way that the member for Mississauga South and the committee have spoken about. However, the key funding would already be in place by the government and I would suggest probably that $100 million would do the job to start with, from the figures that I have seen.

That is what I am talking about there. I am talking parallel to what the member for Mississauga South and the committee are saying. I am expanding it a little to work in subrogation of rights of the employees to ensure that they are paid immediately. They do not have to wait. With those rights taken over by the minister or the superintendent it is ensured that the fund continues into perpetuity. There are not many that go into receivership or bankruptcy which do not have some assets. If we give that super priority the banks will have a bit less but we will have worked in protection for the employees.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I am glad I finally got recognized to straighten out the record a bit.

The minister has just asked a question of my hon. colleague from Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt. I do not want the record to be unclear about the work of the committee and it is a very important point.

There are some, including Shirley Carr of the Canadian Labour Congress, who perhaps have not read the document, certainly not the committee hearings, as closely as they should have. The committee was almost unanimous in its recommendation on super priority. We addressed two things which are constantly coming up: certainty of payment and immediacy of payment.

We put a number of proposals forward, any of which would have worked. The one we came up with was one whereby the trustee in bankruptcy or the receiver would be encouraged or compelled by legislation after verification of wage claims to go and borrow against the assets of the bankrupt firm to ensure that there was immediacy and certainty of payment. In the event that the assets may not have been sufficient to cover the amount borrowed against the assets, the Superintendent of Bankruptcy, the superintendent's office, would guarantee any shortfall.

Everybody asks how that would be funded. What we said, Mr. Speaker, if you would just give me one more second, at that point was that he could either adjust his fees upward or, if necessary, if there was some small shortfall since the government under its proposal was prepared to put in $3.6 million, the government could at least have followed that.

I wanted to clear the record because my hon. colleague from Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt is quite correct in the second scenario he put forward. It is one that we examined and it is one that the government should look at as well.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to make certain comments with respect to the legislation before the House.

First I would like to compliment the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs for bringing forth this legislation. I wish he would pay attention. I know he does not get that many compliments and I can see I am still not gaining his attention.

An hon. member: You have got him now.

Mr. Comuzzi: I just wanted to compliment him.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): He is trying to convince his own people.

Mr. Comuzzi: I just wanted to compliment him on his courage to bring this legislation before the House. As we know bankruptcy law has been discussed many times before we got here. For some reason or other it has never failed to make the agenda.

More so I would like to compliment my colleague from Halifax—Dartmouth who has led our input into the changes and the considerations that we should be looking at with respect to bankruptcy law in Canada. I certainly thank him on behalf of all of us for the very fine effort he has put forward. As the member for one of the areas in Toronto said earlier, most of the recommendations we on this side of the House have asked for have been implemented in this legislation.

We are talking about legislation that changes the law of Canada affecting the affairs of individuals and the affairs of corporations that find themselves in economic difficulty or financial distress in Canada. I thought it might be important in my submissions or my intervention in the House to talk about this legislation first from a historical perspective, as to how we got here looking at our economic climate and, second, from perhaps a conceptual basis and explain to our friend why I think it falls short. I would like to give him particular examples on how the present legislation falls short with the protections that we should afford the workers of Canada. I do not think the legislation before this House is strong enough to protect those particular interests.

We cannot discuss this bill without considering it in some form of historical perspective, particularly in the context of our North American mercantile economy. There were some fundamental decisions made by those who governed us in the early years following Confederation and some fundamental decisions made by our friends in the United States with respect to the economic future of their country. It is obvious that those early decisions were instrumental in the formation of a mercantile climate as to how each country would function economically. They were fundamental decisions that were made to dictate how the internal economic policies of each country would operate. There were some fundamental decisions made with respect to trade, some fundamental decisions with respect to capital and availability of capital, and some fundamental decisions with respect to the mercantile economy, credit and credit availability.

It is obvious those decisions have been made and basically began the formation of our country. The early decisions on mercantile policy and mercantile economy led very obviously to the vast differences we find today between the United States and Canada, having both started basically at the same place.

We see today that our friends in the United States opted to develop a country which enhances the economic climate. Accordingly they passed all necessary legislation to enhance that economic climate and allow workers to be protected and businesses to flourish. What do we see when we compare Canadian legislation today with respect to their uniform commercial code and other pieces of legislation such as their security interest legislation that was passed so many years ago and we have just started to use in the last 10 years in some of the provinces of this country? Given the fact that they chose to have an economy that was vibrant and tuned into the business climate, we see that there is a difference between the economy of the United States and the economy of Canada.

That brings us to the legislation that is before the House today. It is one of those fundamental laws we have that shows that our economy has failed to compete. Bankruptcy legislation truly focuses what the laws are and were and what we are just starting to do.

Let us be realistic. Any mercantile legislation has two aspects as you approach and study it and eventually pass it. It provides protection for those within the system and it is important in any piece of legislation that it can and should provide the opportunity to create a climate for business venture. As we know today in the global economy, it should provide a climate that promotes the Canadian economy on an international basis.

When you consider this legislation as an aside and you think about what has happened in this House in the three short years that we have been here and your mind goes back to the trade deal that we first passed in 1988 in the very first sitting of this House, the word that kept coming through was harmonization. The success of trade depends on the harmonization in the United States and Canada. I am sure we will hear this as the trade deal with Mexico starts to take shape, not that we agree with it, but as we progress toward that.

The success of trade depends on harmonization of standards between our two countries. I want to broaden that because I am of the opinion that harmonization includes standards and in other areas includes the mercantile laws of the two countries. This fact in the negotiating process of dealing with the United States on a trade deal has been obviously overlooked by the government of the day to our detriment. We can see today the effects of this tragic oversight of not being able to harmonize the laws of our country to compete and make the Canadian businesses as competitive as the American businesses. This has been one of the main factors why the trade deal is not working and why there is such a disparity in the amount of jobs that are being created.

Let me give an example of which I speak. It affects one of the very large industries in this country, it affects the airline industry in Canada. I am sure you will agree that the airline industry is not only fundamental to Canada's future, but it has been very important in the transportation policy of our country.

Some time ago, this government proposed an open skies policy for North America. In essence, the concept of open skies is that all of the airlines in the United States could fly into Canada and pick up passengers without the threat of cabotage. The two major airlines in Canada could fly into the United States and have a wide open competition for the U.S. market and for the Canadian market.

Through the transport committee at the time, we reviewed in great deal the concept of open skies and we travelled throughout Canada. We heard all kinds of submissions, brought it all back together and eventually submitted a report to the Minister of Transport for the House of Commons.

It was very interesting to note that on the very day that we submitted our report to the Minister of Transport on the open skies concept in Canada, Pan American Airlines in the United States filed for section 11 bankruptcy proceedings. This meant that airline, which was competing with Canadian airlines for Canadian traffic and for international traffic, filed for section 11 bankruptcy proceedings for unsecured credit and they put over $7 billion of unsecured credit aside so that it could be restructured and they could continue to operate. Pan American Airlines, from that day to today, has not missed a flight even though there is $7 billion of unsecured debt that is before the courts and in the process of being restructured.

During this same process, and staying with the airline industry, Eastern Airlines about two years prior to that had filed for section 11 bankruptcy protection. You know that at Ottawa airport, Eastern Airlines had a terminal and for two years competed with Canadian Airlines, Air Canada and other carriers. It also competed with Inter Air, the flight that was going between Toronto and Montreal and is no longer in business because it could not afford to pay its bills, as I understand it. I should check the authenticity of that statement as I do not wish to mislead. But I do not think Inter Air is in business any longer. While we were competing in Canada, Eastern Airlines, under a section 11 bankruptcy proceeding, continued to compete in our Canadian markets while it was going through extensive debt restructuring.

Here we have two airlines based in the United States competing with Canadian airlines for the same markets. What does this mean with respect to our situation in Canada? How does the bankruptcy legislation affect our ability—and I get back to our mercantile position again—to compete vis-à-vis American competition, not only in airlines but in all other economic endeavours?

Under the present legislation what would happen if Air Canada or Canadian Airlines, our two major operating airlines, were not able to handle their unsecured debt, their unsecured creditors? I would doubt very much that those two airlines would be able to continue to exist on a competitive basis, or would continue to exist at all. We saw the competition in the United States under Eastern, which has finally closed three years after the fact, and what Pan Am is going through. That shows fairly clearly that a mercantile law passed by one country compared to a mercantile law and bankruptcy law in Canada failed to make Canadian corporations as competitive as the American corporations. I say harmonization should include the mercantile laws of both countries.

With that bit of historical perspective and some of the facts that have led us up to the legislation that is before us, we have now tried to harmonize the bankruptcy laws in Canada and the United States. Unfortunately, what we have before us is a piece of legislation that closely copies or parrots the legislation of the United States. I feel badly about that because certainly we in Canada can let our vision expand and say "here is what has been effective in other countries in the world with respect to this type of legislation, and how can we become better in Canada to make us more competitive and to protect our workers within our own country?"

We must understand that there are differences in our economies, differences in our sizes and differences in our lending institutions. Our lending institutions are more secure in Canada today than those in other countries of the world. The fact that our economy may be more important is resource based. We can be more effective and develop a more progressive piece of legislation that would benefit not only our economic position within Canada, our economic position outside of Canada, but would provide a degree of safety for all of our workers who work within any business in Canada. We see on a constant basis that they are being hard done by when companies fail to respond to the burdens that are placed on them in a financial way.

When we discuss commercial competitiveness today I don't think we can look at bankruptcy legislation again in isolation. When this present legislation was brought into force what we see is the advent and the copying, as I said, from the uniform commercial code in the United States. It is what we call today and what we, those who practised some law before we came to this House, term the security interest and the personal property security law that has been adopted within the last eight or ten years in Ontario and other provinces in the country.

We all know, Mr. Speaker, that when we start talking about personal property security or corporate security that it is the priority of the registration, the performance of the registration, the perfection of the registration and the registration itself. There was a phrase that was coined in our school, that when it comes to security legislation, the race goes to the swiftest.

We are faced with a dilemma. Prior to this legislation being operative in Canada, we were not faced with these security interests that cause us to have some concern with respect to the protection. However, we are trying to correct them.

Coupled with this security interest legislation, we can never discuss bankruptcy legislation without talking about the security that the chartered banks have available to them. I forget what the section is, but I think sections 142 and 144 of the Bank Act allow banks to take a security interest in all of the chattels of the business and all the merchandise that might come in as raw material. It can follow the progress of that material. The security interest applies as that material flows through to its final product and might follow right through until the final sale of the product to an individual. So that extended security interest is available to certain banks in the country which finance corporations.

The security interests that I talk about, the personal security interests and the bank security interests, play a vital role in any bankruptcy proceedings. That is what I want to spend a few minutes on, Mr. Speaker, if I can.

Let me close by saying that the security interests that we have in the sale of a Crown corporation to a company called Route Canada Incorporated should teach us all a lesson in this House as to how employees in different small industries throughout Canada become affected because we do not have the proper legislation in place to protect smaller businesses or the workers.

We all know, Mr. Speaker, that a Crown corporation was sold to a company called Route Canada Incorporated. Because of the ability of corporations today to bulletproof or boilerplate themselves, all of the assets of that corporation that went to Route Canada Incorporated were boilerplated. The assets went into other companies and were taken for the benefit of those who held a security interest in the real estate and the rolling assets. What we had left, Mr. Speaker, in Route Canada Incorporated was a shell corporation. There were no assets of the company but only the accounts receivable. It was a shell corporation that operated with hundreds of millions of dollars in sales and when it went down the tube 16 months later there were only two sections of this country that were hurt. The banks were not hurt. The Royal Trust Company was not hurt because it mortgaged the property. It had its own security interests in place. There were only two groups in this country which were hurt; the workers and the small businesses that supplied goods and services to Route Canada Incorporated. Many of those, I am told now, Mr. Speaker, have gone bankrupt because of the failure of Route Canada Incorporated.

Let me emphasize what has happened to the workers. It is a good point on which to end my submission to the House, Mr. Speaker.

What has happened to the workers is not only what this legislation calls for with respect to the wages that are earned on a weekly or bi-weekly or a monthly basis, it includes holiday pay, it includes benefit packages for which they have had to barter, it includes termination pay and it includes pension plans. This legislation falls short of protecting the benefits for which the workers in this country have bargained. Employees who have worked for a company for 25, 35 or 40 years will lose their benefits unless bankruptcy legislation protects those interests.

I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for allowing me to go this far. I suggest to the government that it strengthen the legislation in this area to protect the workers of this country so we will never have another Route Canada fiasco.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On a point of order, the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

WAGE CLAIM PAYMENT ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Blais that Bill C-22, an act to enact the Wage Claim Payment Act, to amend the Bankruptcy Act and to amend other acts in consequence thereof be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations, and the amendment of Mr. Rodriguez.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Questions and comments.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your courtesy and I assure my friends opposite that I will be very brief with my one question.

I want to ask my hon. colleague for Thunder Bay—Nipigon one question relating to the Route Canada bankruptcy which he described so well.

Does the hon. member feel that the availability of super priority such as has been advocated by members of his party would have assisted the employees of Route Canada, and would he not agree that the wage protection plan as envisaged in Bill C-22 would do a far more expeditious job providing certainty of wage compensation to those employees?

Mr. Comuzzi: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that question from my colleague. Yes, the legislation as it is presently written, would assist the former employees of Route Canada but only a little bit.

We are finding that the former employees of CNR who transferred to Route Canada Incorporated without benefit of the right to say if they wanted to go or not were assured that their contract rights with CNR would transfer to the new employer. Those contract rights, which included termination pay of one week's salary for every year worked, holiday pay, pension benefits, severance pay, and so on, were not compensated for in the bankruptcy. There were no assets left in Route Canada Incorporated to pay the employees what was rightfully due to them.

Super priority would have helped a little bit.

An hon. member: Yes it would help.

Mr. Comuzzi: What was happening with those Route Canada employees, former CNR employees, is that most of them are out $25,000, $35,000 and $40,000 because of the long term of service they gave CNR. That is what is owed to them under the terms of the employment contract from Canada Labour, plus the union contract that was negotiated. It is their right and it is what they are entitled to and it is what CNR in the sale to Route Canada has forbidden these employees to collect.

That is the inequity. That is the injustice. That is what I would hope this legislation would correct.

• (1830)

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate today on Bill C-22. First of all I want to congratulate the hon. member for Dartmouth who was the lead critic for our party and who, Mr. Speaker as you undoubtedly will remember from his remarks yesterday, demonstrated tremendous knowledge in this area, knowledge that he has acquired of course through studying this bill very carefully.

The bill we are dealing with has gone through an unusual process, and I will admit it. This whole business of pre-study is a novel one. I think it has been most beneficial and I recommend it to the government for future bills. Mind you, Mr. Speaker, I hope that the government listens to more of the advice of members when it tries this again. Actually I hope the government listens to the advice of members even at this late hour in those areas where it has already indicated that it was not favourably disposed to listen to the advice of the members.

I see the parliamentary secretary across the way. I do not believe he participated in all of our deliberations because I believe he was a parliamentary secretary to another minister at the time. He will know because of his conversation with other members of this House of the tremendous level of unanimity that was displayed in our proceedings. Members on all sides of the House got together and formed quite an extraordinary consensus on a piece of government legislation. I do hope the member has noted that, as I am sure he has.

One thing our committee was unanimous on was this whole business of increasing the amount of wage earner protection from $2,000 to $3,000. That is fine, but our committee recommended that the payroll tax scheme be abandoned—that scheme of course is part of the bill—and that it be replaced instead with a form of super priority whereby the wages of employees in the event of a bankruptcy or liquidation would have priority over virtually everything else.

I noted that the parliamentary secretary responded to a question from my hon. colleague from Thunder Bay—Nipigon by saying that in the case of Route Canada a super priority would not have helped the employees. I do not know if it would have helped them in all cases, but he has to remember how we proposed to go ahead with this scheme.

First of all, the scheme is kind of a two-step affair. What we proposed, at least as a committee doing the pre-study, was that there would be a super priority. The effect of that of course is first to remove this payroll burden on small and medium sized businesses, on all business and all employers actually. Second, there would be a fund to guard against any shortfall, that fund to be paid for by consolidated revenue. With the combination of these two obviously the employees of Route Canada would have been covered.

If the parliamentary secretary has read our recommendations carefully, he will recognize there are two components to that. The reason we want to have it that way is twofold. One is to cover the shortfalls and the second is to ensure expeditious payments to employees of companies that have gone under. In other words, you could go in and take funds out of this pool, pay the employees, liquidate the assets and replenish that fund afterward. I believe that is something the parliamentary secretary should realize. I think it is very important for all of us.

Let us look at who is against super priority. The Canadian Chamber of Commerce is against super priority. It is virtually against everything except abolishing social programs and stuff like that.

I have here a letter that was sent to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs dated October 11. It says in the second paragraph: "In particular, there is one recommendation to which we are totally opposed, namely the suggested method of super priority to fund a wage protection program". Interestingly enough this same group was also against the payroll deduction, which leads me to believe that it is against the protection for workers in any way, shape or form.

Who is the other group against this? The bankers. By coincidence these are the same bankers of course who were not that long ago against another provision of that bill, namely that of revindication of goods.

Bankers led us to believe, at least that is what they tried to do, Mr. Speaker, that, if a supplier could go and retrieve the goods supplied he has not been paid for, within 30 days of the bankruptcy, this would make the cost of the loan go up.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, as a member from Quebec, a similar provision already exists in the Quebec Civil Code. Members asked the bankers—and I was the first one to do so: "Must we conclude, therefore, that the interest rate on a commercial loan is higher in Quebec than elsewhere?" "No, they answered." The bankers were forced to admit that it was not the case. So, we asked them this: "If it is not higher in Quebec right now—in a jurisdiction where a similar, not absolutely identical, but similar provision exists to protect suppliers—why should we believe you when you say that this provision to authorize suppliers to go and retrieve goods would have such an effect elsewhere in the country?" Naturally, we dabbled for a couple more minutes, but we did not get an answer for the simple reason that there is none to give.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that all bankers want is not to do anything that could increase the risk even marginally. It would seem that, in the event of a bankruptcy, it is alright for everyone else to loose anything, but that bankers can take absolutely no chance.

[English]

Let us compare what I have just said about bankers and the Chamber of Commerce that are against the super priority with the following letter that I have received. It reads:

> Dear Mr. Boudria:
>
> The Canadian Federation of Independent Business wishes to express our congratulations for your recent work on the parliamentary committee studying the bankruptcy legislation.
> The decision to recommend a super priority of wage claims rather than the payroll tax is certainly welcome by the small business community.

That letter is signed by Bill Parsons, director of national affairs, Canadian Federation of Independent Business.

I say to the minister: He has the bankers on one side and the Chamber of Commerce, although I always have difficulty understanding where it is coming from most of the time, and on the other side he has the Canadian Federation of Independent Business telling us that this unanimous recommendation of our committee to have a super priority is the right approach, that it is the right way to go. That is the recommendation we have.

Furthermore, on the premiums, this whole business of a payroll tax, I bring to your attention a letter which was sent to our committee by His Worship Al Duerr, mayor of the city of Calgary. It says:

> The city of Calgary and all other municipalities will be liable for paying this tax because it is extremely unlikely that the city of Calgary or any other municipality in Canada will ever go bankrupt. No municipality should be required to pay this tax—

The letter goes on to describe how this tax is unfair against municipal governments. Hospitals have made the same kind of representation. I have indicated to the minister that small business has made that kind of representation favouring super priority over a payroll tax.

The minister should look at this again. It will be going to committee very soon. We only have a dozen or so more speakers and then it will be going to committee. It is at that time that the minister should consider and reconsider what he has indicated, at least verbally, that he is not willing to consider that kind of an amendment.

This is not just an amendment proposed by one far-out member of the opposition, if that is what someone on the government side thinks. This is a unanimous recommendation of our committee. Government members, opposition members, members of the third party, everyone was unanimous about that provision. The minister and his parliamentary secretary should remember that.

Had it been merely a recommendation from the Liberal Party that in itself would have been good enough. However, in the unlikely event that the government thought this might have been a purely partisan motion, it was not. It was one that was bipartisan, made by both sides of the House. It enjoyed the unanimous support of everyone on our committee.

There are several other provisions that our committee addressed in this pre-study. For instance we addressed a recommendation that the government investigate ways to reimburse arrears of wages of employees whose employers are insolvent and have walked away from their business where bankruptcy receivership or liquidation has not been initiated.

One of the problems is that there are instances where someone just physically leaves everything there. In many cases, there is also a little environmental disaster, such as a bunch of barrels of chemicals that were buried or some other mess left behind when the people walk away. There is a tremendous concern for anyone to petition an organization like that into bankruptcy. If you do, what happens if you inherit those assets and the mess that is there which you might have to clean up.

Incidentally there was another recommendation by our committee regarding environmental cleanups. Our committee was very concerned and wanted any environmental disaster or mess to be cleared up as soon as possible.

However, we do not think that the employees or anyone else petitioning someone into bankruptcy in order to seize the assets should be forced to pay the cost of environmental cleanup in order to be able to access their owed wages. After all their owed wages are just that, they are wages that are owed to them. That is one other area that our committee addressed, again with a remarkable degree of unanimity.

We were talking about this whole business of unpaid suppliers. Our committee unanimously approved of the government's plan for the revindication of goods. However, upon looking at it, we came to the conclusion that the plan in the bill does not work. It is a technical flaw in the bill because there is a 30-day provision for revindication of goods but someone has 10 days after the bankruptcy or forced liquidation to actually initiate that claim.

That is fine except that in the cases of receivership there is also a possibility for the owner of the insolvent organization to file a proposal in order to try and keep it going. If that happens those two dates work together and the revindication of goods could be nullified 100 per cent of the time. While not changing what the government wants to do, we have provided a number of dates and a number of steps which actually cause this procedure to work. We invite the government to look at it. I know it is studying it. I think the officials in the department have agreed with us that the bill as presently worded will not work and that we need some sort of amendment such as the one we have offered or another one that is slightly different, not necessarily married to that principle, that will actually make it work.

There is another concern as well with the 10 day period. My colleague from Dartmouth and I have looked at this and have actually come up with a scenario in which during a 10 day period, depending on the time of the year, there are actually only three working days.

I invite the minister to look at that, particularly the Christmas period. If a company were to become insolvent just a few days, or one day, before Christmas, the 10 day period in some years may in fact have only three days. How could anyone get organized to revindicate goods or do anything else that must be done in the 10 day period?

The revindication of goods provision is only one of the provisions that has that 10 day feature. There are a number of others as well.

We bring that to the attention of the minister but our report has addressed that in a number of places and his officials should examine that.

We are trying to be constructive in our approach. I think all members want this new bill to work, if and when we do get it. We want wage earners to be protected. We want suppliers to be able to revindicate their goods so they do not come out the losers, as they do now.

[Translation]

And of course, the minister himself represents an agricultural riding and is also the Minister of State for Agriculture. He must know that some farmers sell their whole annual production in a single sale; that is, one fine day, a truck comes and takes everything produced in a year, corn from one farm, livestock from another, and so on. Much of the year's income could be from a single transaction. If, for example, a truck took all of a farmer's cattle to the slaughterhouse, which went broke the next day, he should be able to go and see his cattle on location and of course reclaim what is his. In that regard, we all agree with what the minister intends to do. Of course, we want the procedure to work even better. The minister is himself a lawyer and represents a Quebec riding and as I said earlier, he knows very well that such a measure exists in certain cases in Quebec's Civil Code. We want Canadians who live in other parts of the country to enjoy the same or even better protection.

[English]

I must express disappointment with the position of the minister and the government that it does not want to abolish Crown priorities.

This is a modern way of looking at this bill. If we are going to do this right we should be giving the priority to the employees not to the tax collector. At least that should not be the first priority.

There is a proviso to what I am going to say and the minister should pay attention to it very closely. We said in our recommendation that an unpaid debt to the Crown should not be utilized against a third party.

If an employee has withholdings of his or her income tax and the employer does not pay them to the Crown, that should not be a deemed debt on the part of the employee. We do not want the employee to be put out because the employer stole, ran away with, or otherwise did not give credit for collected income taxes, unemployment insurance premiums, Canada Pension Plan deductions, or what have you from the employees in question.

• (1850)

With that I will conclude my comments. One of my colleagues wants to contribute as well to this debate. She is our critic for financial institutions and is a far greater expert on this than I could ever hope to be. I want to again tell the minister that we want to work in co-operation with him. However the minister should understand that we are talking about unanimous recommendations and an unanimous report by our committee.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the hon. member, who raised some important points. I think it would be useful to consider them one by one.

Earlier, he mentioned the revindication of goods, which I would call a major element of this reform. Under the Bankruptcy Act, suppliers of equipment or goods will be able to recover those goods within a given period of time. This provision, which already exists in Quebec and has been in effect for about ten years, is expected to work satisfactorily.

The hon. member mentioned the impact this might have, now the holiday season is approaching. Of course, we will always have this kind of problem. I practised law, and lawyers know how this works. Often people come to the office on a Friday afternoon at a quarter past three and ask us to start proceedings, because the deadline is at midnight. This kind of thing happens every day. I think lawyers everywhere have had that experience. We would all prefer to stay away from the office on Friday afternoon. So it is hard to find a formula to deal with extreme cases.

In the case of farmers, the hon. member must know—and I think he does because he was actively involved in the committee's proceedings—that members of the New Democratic Party and members of my own party agreed to look for a way to do this. It is very complex, because of the problem for farm producers. Yes, I have a rural riding. In fact, the same applies to fishermen. They deliver goods, and five minutes later, those goods are processed to protect them, and so forth. We are going to try to find a way, in a relatively short time, and not just the government, because we intend to invite people, including farm producers, fishermen and processors, to look at how we could find a formula that works. Finding a formula is not enough. It has to work.

I heard some comments about abolishing the priority of the Crown. I think we agree that the Crown's position should be changed somewhat, in fairness to other creditors. The problem is, and the hon. member will understand because I heard him say so on the radio a while ago, that if we use or diminish the priority of the Crown, the latter, which would already be acting generously by losing about $25 million, would, for instance, by withdrawing its present priority over accounts receivable, lose another $50 million. We would have to find the money somewhere else, Mr. Speaker. That is more or less the problem we face.

It is not enough to say there is a problem and remove this priority, because the $50 million will have to be made up by the taxpayers. We will have to find this amount somewhere else. That is why we prefer to proceed with the reduction as tabled.

I was rather surprised by the hon. member's comments, Mr. Speaker, and I would like to ask him about this. Recently, during an interview on the CBC on September 7, I almost had the impression, and I am of course joking, that the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell had crossed the floor, because his comments on the radio were so supportive of the bill, and he put up such an intelligent defence that I thought —The hon. member said, and I quote:

[English]

There is no good time for a tax after all. However, as the hon. member for Portage—Interlake has said, this involves a relatively small amount of money, six dollars and some cents a year per employee.

[Translation]

That was one comment, and here is the other one:

[English]

I do not think it has some of the negatives that some people pretend are there. It is a small amount and could benefit some of the same people who are going to make the contributions.

[Translation]

Those comments were made by my hon. friend from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell while answering questions about peoples concerns with a tax. So I would like my colleague to tell me if he has changed his mind since, because when I heard him say those things a few weeks ago, I thought his comments rang true. I thought his remarks made sense. I was glad to see that one of my friends on the other side understood the problems that we had and that we had no choice. You even mentioned that employees would be involved, since we would only pay 90 per cent, and that there would be some sharing by employers and employees. I thought this approach was constructive and positive, much simpler and much more practical than super priority.

Therefore, I would like to get the hon. member's opinion on this, since his comments were very positive. I would like to know where he stands today.

[English]

Mr. Boudria: Very briefly, Mr. Speaker, the minister has just said that I agreed with the member for Portage—Interlake. All members, Felix and I, opposition members, third party members and his own colleagues were unanimous in our decision. Yes, I did agree with the hon. member for Portage—Interlake, but not on what the minister is saying we did. I invite him to read the report.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have consulted with both the parliamentary secretary and the New Democratic Party to determine if there was unanimous consent not to see seven o'clock until after my colleague from Malpeque has had an opportunity to participate in the debate. I think, if the Speaker consults the House, he would find that there is such consent.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent for the suggestion of the hon. member for Dartmouth to give more time to the member for Malpeque?

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, there have been such discussions. It is my understanding that the hon. member for Malpeque has a short speech of perhaps 10 minutes. We would be prepared to give consent for her to deliver that speech now. We would not want to encroach unduly on Private Members' Hour and we hope that the vote at the end of that hour can still be held on time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I certainly appreciate the opportunity to participate in the debate this evening. This bill is one that is certainly overdue. As we know the legislation on the books now was presented in 1949. It is time that we had new bankruptcy legislation.

I know that this bill covers many areas. This evening, since I am limited to 10 minutes, I will try to stay within that timeframe and address three of the areas under this legislation.

The first I want to talk about is wage earner protection. The situation right now pertaining to the legislation of 1949 is that employees of a company that goes bankrupt have a legitimate claim for $500 in unpaid wages out of the assets of that bankrupt company. There are a lot of problems with that. Certainly $500 does not represent very much today. That figure was set in 1949 and simply today, 42 years later, that amount is inadequate.

• (1900)

The second is that according to statistics only 72 per cent of employees did not collect even their $500. I am sure that all members have at one time or another talked to constituents who have been in a situation where a company has gone bankrupt, a company for which they have worked for maybe a year, five years or ten years. All of a sudden it goes bankrupt and they cannot get the wages due to them. Certainly we are seeing that more and more these days.

Last week statistics came out from Statistics Canada which showed that bankruptcies in Atlantic Canada increased 62 per cent over September of last year. In this climate, if an employee loses his job today because a company goes bankrupt, it is very difficult for him to find another. In fact it is practically impossible in some cases.

Imagine, Mr. Speaker, losing your job and on top of that not being able to collect wages which really you are entitled to. That is the situation that we have under the present legislation. I feel it is extremely important that wage earners be protected, and I am delighted that this legislation has come forward.

I certainly have some concerns about what the government is proposing, because what it is talking about is a tax on employers of approximately 10 cents a week per employee up to $2,000 for unpaid wages. What we have here is a government imposing another tax on small business and certainly we know that small business today cannot stand any more taxes. I mentioned earlier the bankruptcy rate that came out last week. It showed that in Atlantic Canada our bankruptcies have gone up 62 per cent this September over the same month last year.

The government may say: "Well, it is a small amount. It is only an average of 10 cents". That is how all taxes start. They start small like income tax and unemployment insurance which last year went up 24 per cent and there are indications we are going to see another increase this January 1. Here we have another tax being inflicted on small business. Not only that, think of the paperwork that this is going to cause. As I talk to small business owners, that is one of the main complaints they have: the amount of paperwork this government has inflicted upon them.

The committee also recommended that that amount would go to $3,000. In other words if a company goes bankrupt an employee can claim up to $3,000. The approach I am proposing here has certainly been proposed by the consumer and corporate affairs committee and by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. They realize that this is a better method than imposing a tax on small business.

I think we all know that Canadians have been taxed enough. How does the federal government ever expect small business to lead us out of this recession if it continues to slow down the potential growth with even more taxation?

What has been proposed here is that the employees would have super priorities. That of course would take care of the old problem we have where companies go bankrupt and there is not enough money there to pay the employees because they would have super priority. They would be in a preferred position for up to $3,000. If the money were not there, it could come out of a back-up fund. I recommend that the minister strongly consider this proposal that has been put forward by the committee on consumer and corporate affairs.

Another area of improvement in this bill concerns unpaid suppliers. As the situation is now, suppliers who sell goods to companies that go bankrupt have very little recourse. Often they simply do not get paid. Under Bill C-22 goods delivered to a company within 30 days or within the 30 days that the company goes bankrupt may be repossessed under certain conditions. One of those conditions is that the goods not be altered in any way.

One of the drawbacks of that certainly is in the case, for example of agricultural products. If a dairy farmer supplies milk to a dairy and that milk goes into cheese there is no way the dairy farmer can go in and take back the milk. The same problem is true with fishermen. If they sell their lobster to a canning factory and that factory goes bankrupt, there is no way they can go in and take back their lobster.

Last January the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs received a letter from the Prince Edward Island Fishermen's Association which certainly outlined their concern about this very problem. I am not going to take the time to read this letter, but they expressed very eloquently their concern. Here we are nine months later and there really does not seem to be any indication by this government that it is going to try to deal with this problem.

I certainly support the recommendation of the consumer and corporate affairs committee that the government examine this flaw and try to come to grips with it because it is extremely important for the fishermen and the farmers not only in my province but all across this country.

Mr. Speaker, I know that my time is up. I want to thank you for allowing me to put those remarks on the record this evening. I again say I am pleased that we are discussing legislation which is replacing the old act. I certainly believe in the objectives that have been put forth to help consumers and companies avoid bankruptcy, to try to find a better balance between the creditors and the debtors, and to help avoid the red tape.

As I say I have concerns about the legislation. I have not had ample time to go into them in detail this evening. I hope at a later date I will have that opportunity. I certainly look forward to seeing the amendments that the committee will come up with when it goes to the consumer and corporate affairs committee. Hopefully they will improve the legislation.

INCOME TAX

QUARTERLY INSTALMENTS

The House resumed, from Monday, October 7, 1991, consideration of the motion of Mr. Harvard (p. 2805).

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Thank you for giving me the opportunity to make a few remarks on the motion presented by the hon. member for Winnipeg St. James. By the way, I wish to congratulate my colleague from Manitoba who was kind and thoughtful enough to present this motion to correct a serious shortcoming in our tax collection system, one that penalizes the elderly.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, people who hold more than one paid job and those who receive a pension must pay income tax quarterly; they must estimate their annual income and then determine the amount to pay every quarter.

At first glance, this may not seem to be a problem. However, it often happens that they underestimate the amount payable or are late making their payment. In such situations, Revenue Canada imposes heavy penalties and charges high interest.

Mr. Speaker, as my colleague from Winnipeg St. James said in his speech on September 26, seniors in this country do not have the choice they deserve. Is it not obvious that these citizens worked long and hard for their retirement and that they should have the choice not to pay their income tax in four quarterly instalments? The law says that seniors and the self-employed who owe more than $1,000 in income tax must pay quarterly instalments on the estimated annual amount.

Furthermore, the payment deadlines must be strictly respected and the income estimates for the following year must be reliable. It should be mentioned, Mr. Speaker, that the quarterly instalments are supposed to even things out and prevent one group in society from receiving special treatment over another. Unfortunately, for many people, this compromise is ineffective and unfair. Seniors often overestimate and pay too big instalments because they are unable to predict their income.

Like everyone else, they are affected by changes in interest rates. Therefore, they do not know what their income for the year will be. They cannot break it down quarterly.

Mr. Speaker, I think that we in this House should show some compassion and flexibility towards our nation's seniors. Therefore I do not think that it would really be too expensive for the government to allow them to pay their income tax once a year.

The option of a single payment could eliminate the guessing game for seniors and the need for Revenue Canada to constantly examine their accounts.

[English]

The purpose of the motion presented by my colleague from Winnipeg—St. James is very simple. It is to allow senior citizens in our country to make one payment on their income tax rather than the quarterly system that is now in place.

I believe if we examine the motion of the hon. member from Manitoba, we will find that it is a very just one. It is a motion that allows flexibility in the Income Tax Act. It is a motion that shows that we have some social conscience. I believe it is important that we, as parliamentarians, listen to our citizens out there and guarantee that when we feel there is an injustice in the system that we will make sure that injustice is rectified as soon as possible. I would say, Mr. Speaker, to go a little further in examining the Income Tax Act that there are many problems with it and no doubt it has to be brought up to speed as soon as possible.

Looking at this one particular one we could say that the motion has a lot of common sense and I would like to read a few things about the motion.

The Income Tax Act as it now stands forces people, senior citizens, to pay income tax on income they have not yet seen. Bonds and other investments do not mature until the fall quite often and they are still forced to pay tax on them in March. Paying quarterly means paying on income that they have not yet received. Thus they are losing interest on money paid in advance while Revenue Canada collects interest on it.

Another point that should be made while speaking about this is that quite often if there is a miscalculation and the senior citizen has not contributed the right amount, a little less than what they should have contributed, they are not assisted in any way, shape or form. They are told simply in a form letter. There is no reminder. It is straightforward. Give us the interest you owe us, period. Pay up, in other words. We do not want to hear from you again. Just pay up.

I would hope—I do not plan to speak much longer, Mr. Speaker—that hon. members here this evening will support the motion we have before us and when we look at senior citizens across Canada we have, and I am sure every member will agree, we know that they have contributed a great amount to our society in the past and continue to do so.

In closing, I would like to say that another injustice that should be corrected is the $1,000 interest free per year that was removed from the Income Tax Act a couple of years ago. That should be allowed for senior citizens. They should be allowed to earn $1,000 of interest per year. I would hope that in the very near future that the government and members here will see the light and allow senior citizens to earn $1,000 of interest without being taxed on that interest. I think it is very important. I think that most members would agree with that. I find it very difficult to understands why members would not agree to make those changes and make representation to the minister in question.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank you for allowing me this time to speak toward the motion.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, indeed this evening it is a pleasure to rise on this particular motion having been the seniors critic for the federal New Democratic Party up until approximately a year ago, and having taken an interest in seniors for most of my lifetime, that interest certainly continues, Mr. Speaker.

I can say without doubt at all this motion, while perhaps needing some refinement, is a way that we can assist our senior citizens in making things easier for them. The motion reads that the government should consider the advisability of changing the collection of the income tax as it affects citizens whose income is not taxed at source so that senior citizens who are required to pay income tax in four quarterly instalments will be permitted to pay only one annual instalment.

What I have found over the number of years since I was a child delivering newspapers to seniors is that one of the difficulties that some seniors have is the difficulty with bureaucracy, the difficulty with keeping dates that perhaps some others find rather easy, the difficulty in keeping track of and properly looking after their money.

What the government has done in requiring them as of 1990 to pay quarterly instalments is add one more problem into the lives of seniors who have, many of them, active lives and who do not need any more of this bureaucratic problem to murky the water for them.

I think the member for Edmonton Northwest, now the chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance, suggested when this bill was before the House on September 26 that while he did not disagree with the thrust of the bill, he would suggest that there were senior citizens who made sufficient income who could afford and should in fact be paying quarterly instalments.

I have no difficulty with that and I would agree with the member that perhaps a refinement to this particular motion might be setting a top-up limit. It might be on the earning amount below which level you only have to pay an annual instalment. It could be in the tax payable amount, above which limit you would pay quarterly and below which limit you would only need to make an annual payment.

It seems to me that by setting an amount such as that, you catch those who are well able to afford to pay their taxes in instalments. In fact as we look at it in the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, some of those with tax collection problems should probably be paying those instalments. If they have income on interest and pensions that tax payable is $15,000 or $20,000 a year, it seems to me that those people can well afford to pay their taxes.

I think the major thrust should be a simplification of the system as suggested by the member for Winnipeg—St. James. We should ensure that for the vast majority of seniors who make just enough to get by on in this world and are often still below the poverty line, their taxation qualification and their taxation requirements be made much simpler.

It seems to me that an annual instalment is not going to make that much difference. It makes it simpler, it makes it easier, because once a year these people know as of April 30 they must file their income tax returns. They know they must complete the necessary forms in order to qualify for guaranteed annual income supplements, guaranteed income supplements and this type of thing.

They are used to doing the paperwork at that time of year. But they are not used to, and I believe should not have to each quarter try to figure out well, what investment have I got, what amount of money is that investment making for me. Goodness knows, we know how the interest rates climb up and down. Some years you may invest your money if you are very fortunate at 11 per cent, 11.5 per cent, 12 per cent, and other years you may be much less fortunate and end up with your money at 6.5 per cent to 7.5 per cent.

You have to watch this and do your calculations and try to ante up the required amount. I know from listening to the speeches of other members throughout the course of this debate and from my own experience speaking with seniors within my own riding that the penalty provisions of this for seniors and others not filing their quarterly instalments on time are another step, another road block if you will, in the way of seniors.

I look at the over-all effect of the taxation. We should be trying to make it easier for people to pay their taxes, to encourage them to pay their taxes. I mean, we talk to seniors and we talk to others and over the course of years since income tax was imposed back in the First World War, people have always tried to work out ways so they do not have to pay the—and I quote—"tax man" as much each year. I believe that has become part of what we all look at, regardless of age, in trying to work out ways of avoiding the payment of taxation. When talking to a number of seniors this summer I ran into situations where seniors were investing their money at low or no interest rates in order to get out of paying income tax at all. In this way they do not run into the quarterly instalment provisions. In some cases they were investing their money at low or no income rates in order to ensure that they continue to get the guaranteed income supplement.

It seems to me that instead of making it more difficult for them and penalizing them by adding interest and penalty charges when they do not pay their quarterly income tax instalments, we should be making it easier for them and encouraging them and explaining to them that if they pay their taxes they can assist all Canadians. The government should be saying to them: "We will make it easier for you to ante up your taxation at the end of the year in one simple form, but we will also teach you, if you do not already know, that it is to your advantage to invest your money at high interest rates, paying the tax and taking the balance and putting it in your pocket".

What I have found is that the government does not do that. Some people are confused by the complicated tax rules. When you look at some of the pamphlets that are sent out and the instructions in them, it is confusing. Some of the wording of these pamphlets is sort of ridiculous with respect to this particular provision within the tax, which says "You may be required to pay your taxes for 1990 by quarterly instalments". To my way of thinking, "may" is not mandatory, it is optional. It makes sense that they do not have to, that there is another option and yet if they do not they are penalized.

The thrust of what I want to say in concluding is that we should be making it easier over all, for not only seniors but all Canadians to pay their taxes, but particularly for those who are in their golden years we should ensure that things are made easy for them and that they are not made more complicated, as this provision within the Income Tax Act is. I implore this government to pay attention to the member's motion and pay attention to what has been said in this debate, that there is a better way to make things easier for our seniors in Canada.

Let us do it for them and let us do it now by supporting this motion.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise tonight in this debate. I congratulate my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg—St. James, for this good motion.

Maybe not everybody in the House has been approached by constituents about this particular hardship in the Income Tax Act, but I have had people approach me. I just want to say that some study by this House should be allowed on this motion. I say that because if the minister and his officials had put a level of income tax owed that one would have to pay quarterly on anything above that level, you might not have seen the hardships that have developed since.

This motion pertains mainly to seniors, but there are special cases too where there is an amount of money put away in a banking institution which comes due only once a year. Perhaps it only gives a return of a thousand or a couple of thousand dollars in interest, which should not force the person to pay quarterly instalments.

• (1930)

The idea of quarterly instalments I can see for those who have a large income coming in, but for someone who has perhaps $20,000 and is getting 10 per cent interest on it at the bank, it does not make sense to make them pay taxes quarterly. It does not make sense to make them go to the bank and change the arrangements from a yearly term deposit to a quarterly term deposit. They are going to lose money. They are not going to get the best value as the higher income people can who would perhaps fit that category.

I have spoken to the department. Some of the officials feel that perhaps it should be looked at. It definitely was not meant to catch the people who earn income at the lower income levels.

The other thing I want to say about this is there are special cases who are not seniors, widows perhaps, people living on very low income and getting interest back from their investments that are not high enough or they should be below a level that they have to do it on a quarterly basis.

I want to say that the way it was done is an affront. People did not realize they had to pay quarterly. They get a notice and it says: "You should have made instalment payments in 1990. Since this is the first time you have been notified of this requirement we did not charge you interest", that was for 1990, "If you need to make instalment payments in 1991", that is the first confusion, "your first payment is due 30 days from the date of the notice".

All of their banking arrangements that have been done for a year and this is the first time they get notice. They have to borrow or they have to break that investment in order to pay quarterly. Further it says: "We will send you more information about instalment requirements shortly". It goes on, and this is the part that really gets me: "Your balance payable includes interest on arrears which is compounded daily at a prescribed rate and calculated from the due date of your balance to the date of this notice".

This is the first time probably this senior or this special case had this happen and automatically runs to a bank, takes out their investment and the government is going to get less on the taxable return because there will be less income from that investment.

It makes no sense at the lower income level to force a person to pay quarterly. I say force, because this is the next notice that this person got: "We have processed your application form for the GST credit that you submitted with your 1990 income tax return". The GST credit is to help lower income people through the 7 per cent GST. It goes on: "We have calculated your GST credit as shown below. Your yearly entitlement to the GST credit is shown", as such and such a line, "and it is payable to you now. However, the amount of x dollars payable now has been applied to the income tax account to reduce or eliminate the balance owing. If the balance has been paid, we will send the remaining credit".

Look at all the red tape that this government has imposed on a senior citizen who has a couple of thousand dollars or under of interest or in one of the cases I have, a special case, where there was under $2,000 owing and they have to either break that investment, in order to get their GST back as well as not have the arrears payable on something they only found out that was due. It is crazy.

On that note, I will allow my colleague from Winnipeg—St. Boniface to finish with my time.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to be able to stand in the House tonight to address the motion which perhaps for the purpose of the viewers I should explain. It is basically to reduce the amount of red tape, give a choice if you wish, to seniors who now have to pay quarterly instalments providing they need to pay $1,000 of income tax. This is a laudable initiative and I want to commend my colleague, the member for Winnipeg—St. James, for his sensitivity towards seniors. He has recognized, as many other members have, that our seniors have built this country.

They built this country. Today we have what they left to us and I believe that it is up to us, as parliamentarians, to try to make life easier and simpler for them. We now have this splendid opportunity to do just that.

I received telephone calls as well as letters, and people have come to see me, in my office in Winnipeg, on that issue. To some, it is annoying because it shows a certain lack of sensitivity towards them, even though this was not necessarily intentional. These people used to pay taxes at the end of the year, and now they are faced with a new system. This creates some confusion. Sometimes they forget, sometimes they underestimate their income and this creates all kinds of problems and headaches. There is simply no reason for that to happen.

I just want to say that I, as the member of Parliament for St. Boniface, support this motion.

[English]

As far as I am concerned, this type of question should not necessarily be in the House of Commons simply because it makes so much sense. It needs to be looked at and it should be looked at immediately. It should be rectified.

[Translation]

It seems to me that this could be easily rectified by experts in the field, so that it would not even be necessary for the House to spend time on this.

This proposal should not require a long debate, because it makes so much sense that we should simply go ahead with it. We know that our seniors deserve that kind of consideration.

[English]

I would like to propose that while we are looking for this kind of consideration for seniors, we should extend the net a bit. What about other citizens today who are similarly affected, who could profit from this kind of review and who might benefit from some changes in the act so that they too can reduce the amount of paperwork. The government may also reduce its red tape and somehow we can do this more easily than has been the case in the past.

What we really want to do is give people a choice, un simple choix. We are not saying it should be done one way or the other. There are a number of ways this can be done. Our job surely should be to reach out and respond as sensitively as possible to all of those particular needs of seniors and others if appropriate. It is appropriate in certain cases. I am thinking of small business persons and other individuals in Canadian society.

I believe it would reduce bureaucracy. Certainly it would reduce the work of those who have to fill in those forms continually and who are frustrated by over-estimations or under-estimations of revenue, who receive those letters that are processed by computers that are sometimes very insensitive, rather rude and upset people a great deal.

At the very minimum—and I hope it is not the way we are going to go—we must at least look at the limit of income tax that is now paid and ensure that a whole lot of other people do not unnecessarily fill in those forms that take up so much time and are not terribly productive.

While we are doing that, I would hope that we might look at other types of reform. I am really suggesting that this committee of finance has a great deal of work to do. Not only can it look at this, but I think it should and I support it.

At the same time they might want to extend their mandate and, perhaps, set up some new objectives and look at the tremendous amount of taxation they have imposed on the middle class of Canada, which is really the motor of our economic infrastructure in this country.

It is really the group that contributes so much and because of the over-taxation, that motor is not running well right now. That is one objective.

I would hope that they might also look at another difficulty I have addressed, the difference between married and unmarried couples, where the unmarried couples get more deductions than married couples. I am not looking to lower the unmarried couples' reductions. I would simply like the married couples' reductions to be at the same level.

• (1940)

Likewise, another discriminatory practice they should be looking at is the question of parents who choose to stay at home to raise their children and those who have their children, at least part of the day, brought to a day care and receive care and a receipt that they can use as a deduction. That is a contradiction and is unfortunate and discriminatory. I would hope that in the process of looking at this they might extend their mandate, set up more objectives and review a number of difficulties that we find.

I would suggest that it is time then to come to the end of this debate, at least very, very shortly. Let us fix this thing now, as well as others that need attention. I am delighted that we have support, as I understand it, from all parties. There is a willingness to go forward, to address this, study it and come up with some remedies. Hopefully those remedies will be in line with the comments that have been made this evening, not only by me but by my colleagues from both opposition parties.

I would hope that this can then proceed to committee so it can get the study and attention it deserves.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I conclude by asking my colleagues to find solutions, as soon as possible, not only to this problem, but to the others that I enumerated and to many more that need attention.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to participate in this debate on motion 484 standing in the name of Mr. Harvard, the hon. member for Winnipeg St. James, which reads as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of changing the collection of income tax as it affects citizens whose income is not taxed at source so that senior citizens who are required to pay income tax in four quarterly instalments will be permitted to pay only one annual instalment.

Mr. Speaker, this concerns me because some 7,500 of my constituents are so-called senior citizens and I hear their comments having to pay quaterly instalments.

[English]

I have had numerous representations from constituents on this matter, senior citizens all of them, who have had little experience with the obligation of the employers to send the usual deductions at source to the Government of Canada. These people are not used to this system and are surprised and sometimes very upset that even though they have low incomes, that is below $20,000—I am not talking about rich people I am talking about people who live with incomes that are less than $20,000—they have to, because of the system, anticipate the income they are going to make in a year and send Revenue Canada quarterly payments.

The income tax regulations are there for all of us to obey. They do not question the law, they question the process more than the appropriateness of paying income tax. They do not question the fact that they have to pay their share. They have paid it all their lives and they intend to continue.

The difficulty is that many of my constituents happen to be at this time of the year waiting for their cheque from the investment they made last year in Canada Savings Bonds, for example, which are paid once a year. They have GICs which are paid once a year. The income comes in a lump sum once a year but they still have to anticipate paying income tax every quarter. That creates problems.

We know what it is to have to administer a budget. For these people there are sometimes difficulties arising from the fact that the insurance on their homes or their furniture or the public liabilities that they like to keep are due.

They also have other bills, credit cards, God knows. Things that you and I have to cope with on a daily basis or on a monthly basis appear to be a charge upon their ability to pay, and they have to budget. They find that difficult because their income is not a monthly income any more. It is not an income which has been taxed, because the employer took away some of the deductions that were normally required.

They have to anticipate. For most people in retirement if they underestimate the payments or if they are late in making their payments, they are penalized. They do not understand that.

In a case—I do not want to read the lady's name because I think it would be revealing personal information—that happened on October 11 of this year, just a week ago or so, a lady whose income bracket was below $20,000 was penalized because she failed to make the quarterly income tax payments on time. Now Revenue Canada is saying: "Not only are we going to penalize you but we are taking the moneys that you owe us from the instalments you are making now".

In other words she is trying to put in place a system of paying whatever she owes. However, they are taxing not only her past failure to meet the required timeframes and deducting that from her actual payments which are in keeping with what she has been told is adequate. It makes it difficult.

Senior people sometimes think—I believe that they are right—that the system is not operating in a way that is just for them. We should possibly look at the advisability, because that is what the motion calls for, of changing the collection of income tax as it affects citizens whose income is not taxed at source.

I would possibly be one of those who would propose or suggest during study in committee that we should put a ceiling on the taxable income so that the rich do not get any benefit. I do not see any reason why those who have high earnings should be favoured by this measure.

I do believe sincerely that in the lower brackets, the lower two quintiles, that we should possibly be considerate of the situation and allow these senior citizens to make one payment once a year at income tax time on the income earned during the year.

The debate has been very interesting. I have read most of it and have followed it attentively. I know most members are in favour of this position and I want to congratulate the member for Winnipeg—St. James for bringing this to the House.

I think it is a simple measure of justice, a simple measure of equity, and a simple measure of fairness for our senior citizens that would help them to avoid having to make decisions that would possibly jeopardize their financial situation.

I believe there is a disposition before this House today which is in keeping with our Canadian way of life. These citizens have earned their keep, they have proven to us Canadians that they are indeed, in my view anyway, not looking for special consideration but looking for fairness. In view of the importance of this matter I would like to move a motion at this time. I am seeking unanimous consent to do this and I would like to put it to you, Mr. Speaker, that you seek unanimous consent for the following motion:

> That Motion No. 484 in the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg—St. James be withdrawn and the subject matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance for study.

• (1950)

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Does the hon. member have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There is no unanimous consent. Resuming debate. The hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley.

[English]

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, just before I start I wonder if you would be able to give me an indication of how much time we have just on a point of order. Is it four minutes? How much time do we have available?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There are only three minutes left in debate.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, I guess I probably used up two minutes finding out I had three minutes left.

In any case, very briefly, we in the New Democratic Party want to register our support for the motion presented by the member for Winnipeg. I think it is an important one given the contribution that seniors have to Canada, the extra effort they always make in their communities. Certainly I think it is an important measure on the part of the Parliament of Canada and the Government of Canada to ensure that in the case of taxation policy every effort is made to make their lives as easy as possible.

This motion presented by the member would change the current requirements that the collection of income tax is done on a quarterly basis. As I say, it is an important motion and certainly we offer our full support to that motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being 7.54 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 93 the time provided for debate has expired.

The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

[Translation]

And the division bells having rung

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, on a point of order.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, since this vote will be taken during Private Members' Business, I think it would perhaps be appropriate for the Chair to proceed by row instead of by party.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to have the vote taken row by row?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion negatived on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion lost.

[English]

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I rise to object to this procedure. The bell rang for less than five minutes. I just arrived from Vancouver; I was at a meeting. There are other members around. I see the member for Skeena. There is a member across there from the Fraser Valley.

We wanted to vote on this matter and we were not given sufficient time to get over here to vote. Had I been able to vote, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please.

[Translation]

I may simply remind the hon. member that the Order Paper indicated this was a votable motion, and I do not think anyone in this House was taken by surprise.

The hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur.

[English]

Mr. Arseneault: Mr. Speaker, I would like to raise an objection as well on a point of order.

I spoke in favour of the motion this evening. I returned to my office to do some work and I was waiting for the vote. It was supposed to have been a 15-minute bell; it was a 5-minute bell. As you know my office is in the Wellington Building and there are no buses running from Wellington in the evening. I got here and the vote had already started so I did not participate in the vote, although some members who arrived after me did vote against the motion.

I would like to say that had I been here on time—and had there been a 15-minute bell I would have been—I would have voted in favour of this motion as any sensible person would have.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, members who were not present in the Chamber may not have realized that the mover of the motion attempted to withdraw the motion and move the subject matter to the finance committee. That takes unanimous consent. Unanimous consent was not given. One member present in the Chamber refused that consent.

An hon. member: Who was it?

Mr. Hawkes: But I do understand, Mr. Speaker, I have had consultations with members of the finance committee, they do have the power to examine the subject matter and they will indeed be examining the subject matter as the mover of the motion proposed.

Mr. Volpe: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry but I would have wanted to be here for the vote as well. I was caught in the same dilemma as many of my other colleagues who found that the bell was a rather short one. I also would have wanted to have spoken in favour of this motion. I had the opportunity to do neither.

Had I been here on time, I would have voted in favour of this motion.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. Before entertaining further points of order, I may remind hon. members that according to long-standing practice here in the House, when a vote is scheduled, the bells shall ring for not more than fifteen minutes, and when the two Whips enter the House and indicate to the Chair that members are ready to vote, the Chair has no alternative but to proceed with the vote. That is what happened this evening.

It being 8.10 p.m, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m, pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 8.10 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MEMBER FOR PORT MOODY—COQUITLAM

Mr. Speaker: I should advise the House that I have received a number of applications on a question of privilege.

• (1010)

I might indicate to the House before we commence that I expect and I know that all hon. members will conduct whatever debate is to ensue here with the dignity to which this House is entitled, keeping in mind our traditions.

I call upon, first of all, the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise on a question of privilege pursuant to Standing Order 48 and according to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, Sixth Edition. Paragraph 114 defines a question of privilege as saying:

> (1) By its nature, a question of privilege is of such importance that it may be raised at any time.

Standing Order 48 makes provision for the precedence of a question of privilege over all other business of the House.

That is how seriously I take this question of privilege. I gave the Chair notice last night. In fairness to the member concerned, I also notified the hon. member because of my deep respect for him as we entered this Chamber at the same time.

It pains me to raise what I have to raise in this question of privilege but I had to weigh my respect for the hon. member and the respect for the authority of this House, and the respect for the authority of the Mace and the Speaker.

My question of privilege arises from proceedings in this Chamber at approximately 8.10 p.m. on Wednesday, October 30, 1991 when the Speaker was in the process of adjourning the House until the next sitting day.

We have Standing Orders which regulate the behaviour of members when the House rises at the end of a sitting. The Standing Orders ensure that House proceedings are carried out with a degree of ceremonial order. If I can quote to the hon. members our Standing Order 16(3) which reads:

> No member may pass between the Chair and the Table, nor between the Chair and the Mace when the Mace has been taken off the Table by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Standing Order 16(4) says:

> When the House adjourns, Members shall keep their seats until the Speaker has left the Chair.

Last evening, the Speaker did adjourn the House with ceremonial order and with dignity. The members who stayed in their seats according to Standing Order 16(4) were shocked to observe an hon. member of this House, the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam, get out of his seat, run down the Chamber right in front of us and grab the Mace which was on the shoulder of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The Speaker was still in his chair when the member got out of his seat and began running down the floor of the Chamber, clearly debasing the decorum of the House and contravening Standing Order 16(4).

I am not accusing the member of contravening Standing Order 16(3). When the member was clutching the Mace, he was behind the Sergeant-at-Arms, not between the Chair and the Mace.

The contempt for the authority of the Mace, which is the authority of the House, was an even worse offence than contravening Standing Orders 16(3) and 16(4).

The Mace is the Speaker's authority and it is this authority that maintains decorum and order which under Standing Order 16(4) commits members to be seated when the Speaker leaves the Chair at the end of a sitting.

In the question of privilege that I raise, the Speaker was on the stairs by his chair waiting for the Sergeant-at-Arms to precede the Speaker, which is the correct ceremonial process. Had the member held on to the Mace stronger or longer, the Speaker would have been prevented from leaving his place. In other words, one member of this House, by holding the Mace, the authority of this House, could have prevented the Speaker from leaving this Chamber.

In presenting my question of privilege I wish to emphasize the authority of the Mace and again I refer to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, Sixth Edition. Section 136 reads under the heading "The Mace":

> The symbol of the House's authority is the Mace.

Section 137 reads:

> During the election of a Speaker, the Mace is placed on a cushion on the floor under the Table. When the Speaker has been elected and is in the Chair, the Mace is placed on the Table.

Ladies and gentlemen, if we disrespect that Mace, that authority, we show disrespect for the Speaker of this House. We show disrespect for this entire Parliament. That is how serious this contempt for the authority of Parliament is.

Section 168 in the same edition of Beauchesne's reads:

> The chief characteristics attached to the office of Speaker in the House of Commons are authority and impartiality. As a symbol of the authority of the House, the Speaker is preceded by the Mace which is carried by the Sergeant-at-Arms and is placed upon the Table when the Speaker is in the Chair.
> Reflections upon the character or actions of the Speaker may be punished as breaches of privilege.

What we observed last evening was clearly a member challenging the decision and action of the Speaker and this must be punished as a breach of privilege. The Speaker made a decision to adjourn the House. An hon. member of this House showed contempt for that decision.

The Speaker's action was to adjourn the House and to proceed ceremoniously out following the authority of the Mace. An hon. member showed contempt for that Speaker's action and the authority of the Mace.

Beauchesne's rules in the same edition. I would like to share with you section 117 on page 29, "Role of the Speaker":

> Once the claim of a breach of privilege has been made, it is the duty of the Speaker to decide if a prima facie case can be established. The Speaker requires to be satisfied, both that privilege appears to be sufficiently involved to justify giving such precedence (or as it is sometimes put, that there is a prima facie case that a breach of privilege has been committed); and also that the matter is being raised at the earliest opportunity.

Our rules provide that when a member accuses another member of contempt of this Parliament it must be done in a motion. I conclude my case with the following motion:

> Whereas the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam by his actions on October 30, 1991, at approximately 8.10 p.m. did show contempt to the authority of Canadian Parliament, and
> Whereas there appears to be a prima facie case that a breach of privilege has been committed, and
> Whereas this matter is being raised at the earliest opportunity, I move that the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam appear at the bar of the House.

Calling for an order for a member to appear at the bar of the House is a procedure which has rarely occurred in Canadian parliamentary history. The kind of behaviour displayed by the hon. member has never occurred in the history of this Chamber.

Mr. Speaker: I want to assure the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam that I will hear him at an appropriate moment.

• (1020)

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I was in my place last night when the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam ran down the aisle of this House of Commons and grabbed the Mace while it was in the hands of the Sergeant-at-Arms as he was leaving the Chamber at the end of the day.

The Speaker had made a ruling on an earlier point of privilege that had been raised in regard to the timing of the vote. We know, Mr. Speaker, that decisions on the part of the Chair are final.

The member for Port Moody—Coquitlam obviously was not willing to accept the judgment of the Chair, and therefore in this way was challenging the authority of the Speaker.

We have seen moments of emotion displayed in this House on many occasions, but in my time here I have never seen anyone run after the Sergeant-at-Arms and grab the Mace. It comes at a time when we have an ongoing discussion before this House on the conduct of members in this Chamber and I think it is something we have to talk about and think about, not only on a particular day when we are debating that subject. Certainly it is something we have to be thinking about and have in our minds every day that we sit in this place.

I agree with my colleague from Parkdale—High Park that the standing orders are very vague on this subject. I suppose when the standing orders were studied by committees of this House and recommendations made that no one ever perceived that a member would be running after the Sergeant-at-Arms to grab the Mace.

The question of decorum in this place is a very serious one. If 295 members in this Chamber decided they were not going to abide by the rulings of the Chair and were even going to challenge the Sergeant-at-Arms himself as he performed his duties at the end of the day after the House had been adjourned, then this place would simply cease to operate. Therefore, this matter must be taken very seriously.

I saw the look on the Sergeant-at-Arms' face as he stood just about six or seven feet away from me last evening when he suddenly realized someone was trying to pull the Mace from him. It is totally inappropriate, Mr. Speaker, and I think it points up why we must take a serious look at our conduct in this House.

If we are going to talk about the need for decorum in this House, for decency to one another, and respect for the institution of Parliament itself, then we have to do more than talk. We have to act accordingly as we perform our duties in this House.

It comes down to the fact that members must try to control their emotions. The Mace is the symbol of the authority of Mr. Speaker and that is why it heads the parade going down the Hall every day as we enter this place. Therefore, it should not be meddled with in any way. It was a challenge to your authority in the House, Mr. Speaker, there is no question about it.

The Speaker last evening made the appropriate ruling on the point of privilege and adjourned the House. All was in order. But I agree with my colleague who raised this issue originally, that we cannot treat this lightly. We have the authority of the Chair to protect if this House is to function properly, and certainly we have the image of members of Parliament to protect if we do not conduct ourselves properly.

I do agree with the comments of the previous speaker. I would ask, Mr. Speaker, that you take this incident very seriously because I have never seen it happen before in all my years here and it should never happen in this place again. I think members have to take stock of themselves and realize that if we are going to sit in the Parliament of Canada then we had better start treating this place and the institution of Parliament itself, and indeed the authority of the Speaker of this place, with the greatest possible dignity so that we can conduct the business of the people of Canada with respect.

Mr. Speaker: Just so that the House knows where we are going, I will recognize the hon. member for Calgary West and immediately afterwards I will recognize the hon. member for Eglinton—Lawrence and the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon. Then, given the disposition of the House, I would go to the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I too was present in the House last evening and witnessed the events. I think the description of those events that has been laid on the Table is accurate and is confirmed by the television tape. From my point of view, I think we have little choice in this Chamber but to support the motion that was moved by the first speaker today.

I had the opportunity last Friday to rise in the Chamber and speak on the issue of decorum in the House. I tried in my own fashion to indicate how I felt when the House allowed contempt inside this Chamber. It is difficult for people outside the Chamber to have a positive feeling about the Chamber and its importance in our society, and that contempt inside the Chamber had to be stopped by the collective courage of the members of the Chamber if we were to ever have a hope of restoring this institution to the kind of level of esteem with which it should be held.

Perhaps more eloquently than I could say are the words of a constituent from Melville, Saskatchewan. When I arrived at the House this morning there was a three page letter from a Mr. Almasi to the member for Port Moody-Coquitlam, with copies to a number of the people in this Chamber, including yourself Mr. Speaker, and the member who was in the Chair last evening. I would like to read three short paragraphs because I think they capture the message that was probably conveyed by television to constituents in the country and their sense of disappointment in that behaviour. The first paragraph begins thus:

> As I was watching television last night (Wednesday, Oct. 30), I saw a high placed politician in a certain country abandon the use of words and take up the use of force and bullying in an attempt to get his point across.

Paragraph 3 continues:

> Instead I was watching the parliamentary channel and witnessed you, sir, take the tradition, honour and dignity of the House of Commons and trample it.

This is a letter to the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam and the fifth paragraph of that same letter reads:

> After barracking at the Acting Speaker, the Hon. Charles DeBlois in a bid for attention, you stormed up the centre aisle, like a spoiled child who doesn't get his way would do, and used force against an Officer of the House.

• (1030)

In my remarks last Friday, I spoke about the escalation of verbal violence in the Chamber and the need to bring it to a halt, the need for all members of this Chamber to support the Chair in the enforcement of our rules and, Mr. Speaker, I did not in my wildest imagination think that we would be facing, just a few days later, the use of actual force in this Chamber to attempt to put one person's will against the majority of the House and against the institutions of the House.

I simply want to signal that I think the only course of action available to us, if we care about the issue of contempt of this House, is to support the motion as moved by the member for Parkdale—High Park.

Mr. Speaker: As I have often done in the past, I perhaps can assist the House by indicating that I have the facts. I am fairly familiar with the procedural law. I know the hon. member would not need, necessarily, to repeat of what has gone on before, but I certainly will hear him.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, much of what I would have to say would be repetitive, and I would not want to impose that repetition on hon. members in this House.

I must associate myself with the motion presented by my hon. colleague from Parkdale—High Park. He has put it very eloquently, very cogently and in a framework that is representative of the kinds of manners that we are accustomed to in this House, that is that reason and dialogue and negotiation prevail in all instances.

Last night we had a circumstance, a situation where one of the members abandoned those kind of traditions and imposed his will by force than by reason and by dialogue.

I want to just reaffirm something that my hon. colleague from Renfrew indicated. That action was not only inappropriate because to suggest that it would be inappropriate would diminish the gravity of the offence.

It is an offence not merely upon the Speaker and the Mace, but against all members is this House by virtue of the authority that all members in this place rest in both the Chair and the Mace, and other symbols of the citizens' right to have his and her views expressed and to have those views decided upon.

In closing, I do not think that this House can do anything less than to support the motion of my colleague from Parkdale—High Park so that we can restore to this House, not only the decorum but the appropriateness of the mechanisms that we need to have in place in order to arrive at decisions without lapsing and collapsing into some of the scenarios that we have seen in some far eastern Parliaments.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, I rise briefly on this same point.

In terms of the decorum of the House of Commons and what we have seen happen in the last few weeks, I know that from my experience in high school as well as parenting that what we need to look at here is the whole idea of consequences.

When there is some behaviour that is inappropriate, or if we are looking at some wrongdoing or an action that is not appropriate, we need to look very specifically at the idea of consequences: What is it that will happen to me if I misbehave in the home, at school or in the work place, or in fact in this institution, the House of Commons. I would just raise two points before we move on. First of all, the idea of consequences must fit the seriousness of the action or the wrongdoing. When we look at consequences in this Chamber of what might happen if somebody acts inappropriately in terms of not obeying or respecting the Chair or in terms of not respecting other members of Parliament, as we have talked about at great length in the last few months.

First, the consequences must fit the seriousness of the wrongdoing.

Second, I think every one of us in this Chamber has had dealings with other people in terms of work place or family or in a school setting, and the consequences must be administered as soon after the wrongdoing as possible. That is where somebody will be able to feel the most impact of those consequences. I believe that none of us would deny that. As soon as a consequence can be administered is the most important time and certainly has the most important effect.

In terms of recent behaviour we have seen in the House, we are looking at a number of weeks already. We saw most recently an event that happened last night. That certainly is first and foremost on our minds this morning. Several weeks have gone by since we have seen other dreadful things happen in this House.

I am calling on you, Mr. Speaker, to act as quickly as possible to administer consequences so that there will be some real and powerful effect.

In terms of this decision you are going to be called upon to make very shortly, I recommend to the House and also to you, Mr. Speaker, for whom I have such a great deal of respect, that the seriousness of this and the consequence could very seriously be watered down if a certain amount of time is allowed to go by.

I would like to say to the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park that it is important that we all support this motion and get on with the business of this House.

I will close by saying that I have had several calls in my constituency office and my Ottawa office within the last number of weeks and months. People in my riding are saying: "I forbid my children to watch the Parliamentary channel". I am sure we have all heard that. To me it seems a very unnerving and frightening experience for those of us here who are supposed to be representing the highest institution in the land.

Mr. Speaker: It would seem that the House would wish that I recognize the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I did arrive right away and as I suggested to you earlier, I would like to stand up as soon as possible on a matter of privilege to deal with this matter.

You did recognize various other members and on reflection, I very much appreciate that. I listened very closely to all members of the House whom I respect a great deal, and I think they know that.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I do unequivocally apologize for the events last night. I expressly apologize to the Sergeant-at-Arms and other members of the House and to the Chair. I did not intend to show contempt for the House or for the Speaker. I have nothing but admiration and the deepest feelings for the House, which I have served for 12 years. I am now serving on a number of committees of the House on a number of issues, including all the issues that are coming up today in the House and next week.

Mr. Speaker, this is not an excuse, but I do want to say that I was, I suppose, angry last night because I felt that I could not vote on this seniors bill. The seniors issue concerns me very deeply. I felt at the time, for some reason that I do not understand, but I guess it will be explained, that we had a short bell and I rushed over here fresh from a meeting on the Young Offenders Act, just having arrived from Vancouver. I rushed over here to try and vote. When I got here there was no vote. I was not alone. There were a number of other members.

I tried to explain my position and get it on the record. I felt that I was cut off. I also felt that other members were cut off. There were a number of members, including the member for Skeena, the member for Fraser Valley East and other members, trying to get up to explain why they did not vote on an important issue and to clarify the matter.

I thought the Speaker did near hear me or understand me. I was going down to try and alert him to that. That is no excuse, but I want the members to know because I value all those members who spoke very deeply. I know them. I want them to know what was going on in my mind.

• (1040)

For some reason, I thought that perhaps the Speaker might reconsider and listen to those members. Foolish in retrospect, but I do want to say that I did not intend to show contempt for this House. I did not intend to show contempt for the Speaker. I have worked in this House as well as any member and I have always shown great respect for the House. I was thinking about British parliamentary tradition, and I know the dangers of touching the Mace and what it represents. I know what happened to King Charles when he did that, he got his head cut off.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Waddell: I do not want to give the members any ideas. The members will forgive me, but there was a young MP in the Bahamas years ago who picked up the Mace and threw it outside actually. His name Lynden Pindling and he has been Prime Minister for 30 years I think now There have been other incidents.

Mr. Speaker, let me return. This is a serious matter and I do not want to joke about it. I listened to what the member said. I offer my complete apologies to the Sergeant-at-Arms, to the other members, to the gentleman who sent you the fax. I have not received my fax but I will get it no doubt and I will reply to it and other letters.

I do not think I can say any more than that. I have offered my apologies. I know that there have been incidents in the House where people have been accused of being racist and sexist and so on. This is a different sort of incident, nevertheless a serious incident as well. I say to the members who spoke today that I offer them and the House my apologies. Those were not excuses, my concerns for seniors and the procedure of the House and the vote, but I want the members to know that this is not just for me, that I had in my mind that I was trying to do something to further my own ends in any way. In my own mind, there were members standing up in the House, we were a long way from the Chair, and there members standing up here from the House who wanted to get on and wanted to speak and I thought they should get a chance and then the House could be adjourned. I was trying to alert the Speaker. I walked up and the Mace was there. I touched the Mace and I should not have done so.

This is the fourth time I have said it and I will say it again. I know the member from High Park and I know the member from the Ottawa Valley, Renfrew—Nipissing, and I deeply respect them. When members like that stand up and say that they were hurt and everything, I want to tell them that I understand. When it comes from members like that then there was something wrong and I apologize for that.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I certainly want to say how much we appreciate the very thoughtful interventions that all members have provided to the House this morning. In respect to the institution of Parliament, to the position of The Speaker and to the position of the Sergeant-at-Arms, I want to on behalf of all of the caucus join with the member and apologize for this unfortunate and inappropriate incident.

Mr. Speaker, we acknowledge that the traditions and symbols of this place are very important in terms of our democracy, the democratic way of government and the institution of Parliament. The member has apologized to yourself, Mr. Speaker, to the members of the House and to the Sergeant-at-Arms. We realize that this is a very, very grave and very important issue.

There has been a suggested course of action that you will undoubtedly reflect upon. I want to suggest, Mr. Speaker, that another course of action would be for you to name the member. This is a tradition of this House for inappropriate actions that members take from time to time. I simply leave that with you, Mr. Speaker. We apologize for this unfortunate incident and I want to suggest an alternate course of action that you may wish to consider.

Mr. Speaker: The first thing I want to say is that the Chair appreciates very much the manner in which all hon. members in the Chamber this morning have dealt with what is clearly a painful and difficult matter. That is very much appreciated.

Perhaps I do not need to say this, but I intend to say that the expressions of support for the Chair, and the officers of the Chair, the Deputy Speaker who was in the Chair last night, are also very much appreciated. They do not come as a surprise. I think I know as well as anyone in this Chamber the very high regard that this House and its members have for the Chair and for this institution.

The hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam has expressed his apologies and regret. He has also said that he holds this place, and the members in it, in highest esteem. This does not come as a surprise to us. The hon. member for Kamloops has, of course, made a painful, and as I say, a difficult decision with dignity and frankness.

I am conscious of the fact that this matter ought to be dealt with as soon as possible. The motion is to bring the hon. member to the bar. Clearly there is a prima facie case in this matter and I would ask hon. members to bear with me, at least for an appropriate moment, because I am going to consider exactly what our practice has been in the past when there has been a motion to bring a member to the bar. I shall try to clarify that and return to the House as soon as possible.

In the meantime, we shall proceed with Routine Proceedings.

The hon. member for Kamloops, on a point of order.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, part of the difficulty of last evening arose when there was a breach from the tradition, in my judgment, of the way Private Members' Hour was handled.

I simply want to seek guidance more than anything. I was unfortunately ill when this incident took place and was not in the House when the Whips and so on got involved in Private Members' Business. Perhaps the more appropriate thing to do would be to ask my colleague from Winnipeg Transcona, who was watching the proceedings more carefully than I, to make a few comments at this point. I see this as something on which we need some guidance from the Chair.

Mr. Speaker: I am fully aware of what the hon. member is raising, but I am not at all sure that this is the most appropriate time to engage in this. I get some sense that, in view of everything, there is not a disposition in the House to get into a debate on it.

Hon. members know that a vote takes place when both the Whips come in. That sometimes means that the Whips come in earlier than the expected time for the bell. I understand that is the point of concern for the hon. member. However, I would ask hon. members to leave this matter, at least for the moment, and perhaps, with some discussion, we can return to it.

I think it would be appropriate to proceed with Routine Proceedings.

The hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I understand your appropriate desire to have time for reflection on what to do. I am not trying to delay that. But if it is your judgment that we should not deal with this other issue, which in no way bears upon your judgment on what has already been before you, and we should deal with that at another time, then that is fine with me. But I would like to know what you suggest as being that other time. I think there is a legitimate point of order to be dealt with here as to the role of the Whips in voting on Private Members' Business. I think that is a legitimate concern and separate from the issue which is now before you.

• (1050)

Mr. Speaker: As I indicated, I know that it is a concern to some members. However, given the incident last night and what has taken place today, the Deputy Speaker clearly ruled on that last night. It may have been part of the reason for hon. members' concern, but that has been ruled on.

What I am suggesting is that if the members want to change the rule or change the practice, we might find a more appropriate way to discuss that. I, of course, am always prepared to listen to hon. members on the matter.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure of this but I suspect part of the problem that we are facing in the House at the moment is that the debate that we are about to enter into after Routine Proceedings is completed is a debate in which the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam is a central player. Therefore, he is obviously concerned, and I am sure his party is, as to what role he can play in that.

May I suggest a possible solution for the Speaker. We can proceed with Routine Proceedings, but just before calling Orders of the Day, we can suspend to the call of the Chair to allow the Chair to deliberate. That would prevent anyone from getting into a situation that might be very difficult for all of us.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. parliamentary secretary has I think offered some assistance to the Chair. I was hoping that by the end of Routine Proceedings I could return, but I may be a few more minutes. In any event, I think the appropriate thing to do now is to proceed with Routine Proceedings. I shall return to the House as soon as I can.

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FORESTRY AND FISHERIES

PRESENTATION OF REPORT BY UNITED FISHERMEN AND ALLIED WORKERS UNION

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, I realize this is somewhat unusual, but I am seeking the unanimous consent of the House to table a document presented by the representatives of the United Fishermen and Allied Workers Union to the fisheries committee where it was very well received by representatives of all parties.

The problem on the west coast—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent to have the hon. member present a document?

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret there is not unanimous consent.

PETITIONS

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition concerning firearms from people in Ottawa, Gloucester, Cornwall and Summerstown. The petitioners humbly declare that the accessibility of weapons is a critical factor in murders, accidents and suicides and that many types of weapons which are easily available in Canada are not needed for legitimate purposes like hunting and competitive shooting.

For these reasons, the undersigned ask Parliament to legislate now so that no one with a criminal record can own a firearm.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise under Standing Order 36 and table a petition on behalf of several Canadian farmers who are upset, with reason, with the low commodity prices for agricultural products in Canada.

The petitioners are asking this government to provide assistance this year, not next year.

JUSTICE

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I am pleased to present a petition on behalf of 157 citizens in the Kitchener-Waterloo area. This petition is in support of the parents of Nina DeVilliers. It highlights some serious deficiencies in the criminal justice system, that crimes of violence against women and children are intolerable and constitute the most abhorrent crime society faces. Our laws, sentencing, bail hearing processes and parole provisions do not appropriately reflect society's abhorrence of violence to protect society from such offenders.

Therefore, the petitioners call upon Parliament to amend the Criminal Code, Bail Reform Act and the Parole Reform Acts accordingly.

RURAL CANADA

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed here by over 200 people from communities such as Dauphin, Manitoba, Red Deer, Alberta, Sackville, Nova Scotia, Quesnel, B.C. and Alida, Saskatchewan.

These people have watched the erosion of the rural way of life in fishing, farming and forestry communities around the country. They call on Parliament to support Canada's rural way of life, to support the maintenance of rural post offices and to reject the Conservative government's agenda of cutbacks and closures.

EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to stand in this House today to present this petition with respect to national standards in education, recognizing obviously the provincial responsibility in education and its constitutional responsibility as well.

[Translation]

This petition is from people in Quebec and Ontario who want the various sectors of Canadian society to dialogue with the national federal government and the provinces in order to try to articulate a policy that would make us much more competitive and that could meet Canadians' needs throughout the country in all fields of education.

[English]

I must add that this petition and similar feelings have been voiced by other Canadians in other parts of the country, including my own province of Manitoba.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall all the questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[English]

SUSPENSION OF SITTING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it agreed that we shall suspend the House to the call of the Chair?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The sitting of the House was suspended at 10.58 p.m.

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 11.27 a.m.

Mr. Speaker: Before proceeding further, I want hon. members to understand very clearly the procedure in this particular case. The hon. member for Parkdale—High Park has proposed a motion. I have retired and discussed the motion with him and it will be, as I understand it, changed very slightly to call the hon. member to the bar to receive a reprimand from the Chair.

At that point, if the Speaker rules that it is a prima facie case, the House is entitled to debate the motion that is before it, that is the motion of the hon. member. If the House approves that motion then it is incumbent upon the Chair to call the hon. member before the bar at a certain time to receive the reprimand.

The important thing to remember is that the hon. member has proposed the motion and the punishment is the reprimand. The House then decides on whether that is the punishment the House wishes the Speaker to exercise.

If there is any doubt about the procedure I would like to hear those doubts.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, it is a doubt because certainly in my memory I do not recall any of us having been through this before.

May I just explain the procedure as I understand it. The Speaker would rule. If the Speaker rules that it is a prima facie case of privilege, the hon. member would introduce his motion, which is then debatable and amendable and should that motion pass, whatever the motion ends up being, and assuming it were to be the motion to call the member to the bar the member would then appear before the bar to hear what in effect is the Speaker's ruling.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, you raised the issue of punishment. Is that a second motion after the examination before the bar or is it inherent in the original motion and once it is voted on then that is what follows? The passage of the motion in the form which you have suggested, does that specify the punishment and that is what prevails? That is where the confusion came in. You made a couple of remarks I was not sure of.

• (1130)

Mr. Speaker: The hon parliamentary secretary stated the position as succinctly as I can. Let hon. members be very clear on what we are doing. The motion is to call the member before the bar and to receive a reprimand from the Chair. If that is passed, the hon. member will be called before the bar and the Chair will in this place, in front of all of the hon. members' peers, deliver a reprimand. That is what will follow, if in fact the House supports the motion. Is that clear?

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, in light of the sincere apology that the House heard from the hon. member and the sincere apology from the House leader and probably my original motion not giving clear direction to the Chair, I would like to move:

> That the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam be called to the bar of the House and be admonished by the Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: There is no doubt in my mind that this is a prima facie case of contempt. The motion is acceptable and I propose it to the House.

It is moved by the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park and seconded by the hon. member for Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke:

> That the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam be called to the bar of the House and be admonished by the Speaker.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, the form of the motion comes as a bit of a surprise to us on this side of the House. I am having just a little bit of trouble with it.

I heard earlier this day the precedents in the British House of Commons for an incident not dissimilar which involved a suspension from the chamber for I believe it was a period of a week. I believe the mace was damaged. It is my understanding at least from other people that the mace was damaged and the member was responsible for the repair of the mace.

I read earlier this day a letter from a constituent from Melville, Saskatchewan, not someone I know, expressing their thoughts and feelings in three pages of what they witnessed in the House last evening. In my remarks last Friday I spoke of this Chamber as the highest court in the land.

Certainly the member is a member of the bar and in his home province he is an officer of the court. Early this morning I asked a colleague of mine who is a lawyer what would happen if a similar incident occurred in a court. I was informed that jail would be the immediate automatic outcome with the duration of that incarceration to be determined at a later point because the contempt would be held to be so grievous.

Canadians are indeed very concerned about the decorum in this Chamber, very concerned about this democratic institution. I do not want to pretend on behalf of the government that I am speaking for the government or for all members on my side, and I do not intend to move an amendment. I would urge some members of the House to rise and to consider whether or not the protection of the institution is sufficient if the punishment is an admonishment.

With all the formality perhaps it is. Perhaps the public embarrassment is sufficient. But I think there is a kind of fairness principle which exists in Canadians from coast to coast. Sometimes they think that we are a body, we are a group, that gives ourselves privileges that the rest of the world does not have. They ask themselves if they had assaulted an officer of the court what would happen to them. What happened in this Chamber last evening was an assault on the Sergeant-at-Arms of this the highest court in the land.

I just have a feeling that out there in the constituencies across the country there will be some sense of disappointment with an admonishment for an act which is so clearly captured on television and does indeed involve a physical assault on the person of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House.

I do not for a minute think it is appropriate for me as an officer of this Chamber to move an amendment to a motion which I am sure the member has well considered, but when I spoke earlier the motion without the amendment was one I thought was appropriate to the circumstance for the message that it would send.

My heart goes out to the member who in a moment did something that I am sure he sincerely regrets and certainly his comments were of that nature.

The institution is a very important one and at a very important time in our history some kind of process that would be more readily understood in the country, somewhat beyond a simple admonishment, my heart tells me would be more appropriate to the circumstances.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I think this House and Canadians in general take no pleasure in the fact that it has come to this—that we must now reprimand one of our colleagues. I think we all wish the incident had not occurred.

However, Mr. Speaker, although our ideologies may differ, I believe that respect for the institution lies at the very core of the democratic system in this country. For those who object to the rules of the game, there is always the democratic solution. That is the only weapon we wish to use, and I think that is part of the traditions and values of this country. Whatever our reservations may be about institutions, I think it is incumbent on us to respect this institution, because otherwise the entire structure will collapse.

It is the primary source of law and order. Mr. Speaker, of course we regret we must support a motion like the one tabled today. We bitterly regret this. Despite all the differences that exist between our various ideologies, our respect for the institution, for democracy and for the rule of law requires that we act thoughtfully and effectively in this case. I bitterly regret that we must vote on this kind of motion, but I feel that, if our fellow citizens are to have any respect for our institutions and for the rule of law I must vote in favour of the motion.

[English]

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, I have a couple of brief comments to make on what has become a very unfortunate incident which occurred here last evening. I listened to all sides of the point of privilege as well as the member's statement.

I was here as well, Mr. Speaker, and I must say I reviewed the tape. What I did not see was the member just walk down and touch the Mace. I saw the member charge down and grab the Mace with some physical force.

I think this is such as tremendous breach of etiquette in this House it by no means should be allowed to pass with a slight tap of the wrist. That is all I have to say.

• (1140)

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Hubert): Mr. Speaker, I must say I was shocked to see what happened yesterday.

However, a few weeks ago this House witnessed events and language which in my opinion were far worse than what we saw yesterday. The language was used in referring to a woman, as we all know, and the word translates as plotte, which is a better translation of "slut" than traînée et putain. In any case, the latter term is not exactly idiomatic, and the correct term is extremely vulgar in Quebec.

My point is, Mr. Speaker, that at the time, no motion was tabled. There was no movement to reprimand the member in question, while this morning, people are making a big fuss. I agree we must have decorum in the House, and perhaps one way to achieve this is by reprimanding the hon. member directly, and that is why I support this motion, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult for me to put myself into the feelings or the scenario that existed at the time of this incident. I understand it is very serious and I also understand that we must respect the decorum and the traditions of this House.

I am particularly concerned right now at what I see to be a tendency to place all the blame on an individual. This incident is the culmination of what I believe is a progression, at least since I have been here. I believe both sides of the House and all parties and most members have been engaging in conduct which surely has not been the kind of conduct most beneficial to the image of this House.

Surely you, Mr. Speaker, who witnessed all of these incidents over the past few years must realize that we are the last people perhaps to tell you of how decorous we have been in our own conduct.

It seems to me as if I have suddenly arrived on another planet. There are people from some parties whom I have seen making certain gestures, who have said certain things, and all of a sudden today are white and pure as the snow. This is appalling. If this means that we are going to have decorum, if this means we are not going to have from both sides of the House the name calling, which I am not going to repeat because I think the names are disgusting, and if this means we are going to have a better functioning Parliament that all Canadians can believe in and can be proud of, then so be it.

I would just like to address myself to the question of a tap on the wrist. I am embarrassed by the incident. I believe my hon. colleague is embarrassed by the incident. I believe what is proposed is a serious gesture on the part of the Speaker. It is not the time right now to settle scores. It is not the time right now to gang up on anybody. Right now is the time to put to rest all of the foolishness we have been doing for the past few years. It is time for us all to turn over a new leaf and finally respect this House.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to take up too much of the time of the House, but I do believe that what we are discussing this morning is extremely important.

What the previous speaker said truly astonished me, Mr. Speaker, and I would like to say very briefly that the incident we are discussing this morning is not just a matter of decorum. During debate, a member will occasionally use certain terms, but this debate is about the authority of this House, the authority of the Chair and the Mace. I think this is a very important matter. If we want to continue to express ourselves freely, and if we want the Chair to make decisions, we must respect the authority vested in the Mace and the Chair in this House.

Mr. Speaker, there is another equally important question we discussed not long ago, which we will have an opportunity to discuss in the days to come and I am referring to the question of decorum. In this case, however, I think we should concentrate on the issue of authority as represented by the Mace, and on what the Chair in the House represents, to guide us in future debate.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I was here in the House when the incident occurred not far from my seat. I think it is most regrettable, and I agree with those members who believe that we cannot go on as if nothing had happened. The Speaker of the House had decided to adjourn the House. He was leaving, while the Sergeant at Arms carried the Mace, and the hon. member actually attacked the Mace, the symbol of order in this House.

Perhaps I may say that last night's incident, unfortunate though it was, is no reason to forgive previous incidents.

[English]

We are not forgiving in this House of other members who may have abused the privileges of this House either by word or by act or by gesture.

I would like to tell the member from Chambly that I agree with him that none of us are pure and white, but I do not forget and I do not think he does either that other members at one time in this House did similar things. We do not forget but we do not forgive either.

Yesterday was, in my opinion and to my way of thinking, a rather hard attack on basic order of this House. It was a charge on the symbol of order in this House. As much as I may deplore the gesture that was made, I can understand the frustrations and I can understand the difficult situation we were in last night because of that vote which was not expected. There were few members in the House. Many of the people did not have time to come here in response to the bell which was short. I understand that. The issue was an important one for many of us and I sympathize with the members who could not be here because of the shortness of the bell.

Nevertheless, I do not excuse and I do not forgive anybody in this House who has the kind of behaviour that attacks the symbols of this House and, as I said at the beginning, I am as embarrassed as anybody in this House with this incident and I deplore this type of behaviour.

Mr. Chuck Cook (North Vancouver): Mr. Speaker, I rise in defence of the member. Everyone here seems to have forgotten what caused this incident and how it came about that he was so incensed that he lost his cool, charged toward the Chair and committed an act which all of us deplore. I believe he should be admonished for that, but I also believe that the mitigating circumstances should make that admonishment very gentle.

The Deputy Speaker in the Chair last night, with four people standing and waiting to be recognized, chose to shut down the House. I think the Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. That is getting to be very close to an attack on what the Deputy Speaker did last night.

• (1150)

The Deputy Speaker made a ruling. This whole case is about whether, when a Speaker has made a ruling, anyone has a right to challenge it, whether it be by debate or by extraordinary behaviour as has been the case here.

I certainly will hear the hon. member on a plea of mitigation. The hon. member must be very careful not to attack the ruling the Deputy Speaker made last night.

Mr. Cook: Mr. Speaker, I will apologize if that was the way the remark was interpreted by the Chair.

The point I was making is what caused the member's conduct. It was four people waiting to be recognized who were not recognized.

The Speaker of the House of Commons must be the master of the House of Commons, but also the Speaker of the House of Commons is the servant of the Commons. Last night we had an incident in which at least one member was so incensed by what took place that he lost his temper and did something he will regret for the remainder of his life. It was improper. He must be admonished but it must be a gentle admonishment.

Part of the reason for the loss of his temper was the action of two other officers of the House of Commons, the chief government Whip and the chief opposition Whip. In the government's case, members were informed that there would be a 15 minute bell and the vote would be taken. I believe they both should be admonished as well, for their actions in ignoring the rights of members for 15 minutes. They did not allow sufficient time.

There were at least two cabinet ministers and eight members who expected that 15 minute bell and did not get it. That, I am sure, will be raised in the individual caucuses later.

In terms of the member, I understand his loss of temper. I deplore what he did, but I think we should be very, very careful as to how strong an admonishment he gets for attempting, in his view, to do his job for the misguided people of Port Moody—Coquitlam.

Let us not forget the other factor involved here. I was here the night that four members of my own party charged the Chair, stood in front of the Chair waiving their fists and stayed there for some time. The Speaker was a very strong man that night and I admired him tremendously. He stood there and took it and kept yelling for order until things finally settled down. That incident did not result in members being called before the bar and it was certainly as serious as the incident last night, in my view.

I ask the Chair, with the greatest respect, to make that admonishment fairly light in terms of the history of unorthodox conduct in this place and in terms of the mitigating circumstances of the man simply losing his temper totally over what had taken place.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, let me state at the outset that I was also in the House last evening when this incident occurred. The member for Port Moody—Coquitlam and I were both on our feet trying to be recognized by the Chair when the decision was made to adjourn the House.

I would just like to make these succinct comments with the thought of trying to assist the Chair in its decision. The thought that permeates my mind is the dynamics of the moment. It all happened in a fraction of a second. There was no pre-thought about the incident. The House had adjourned and the member was obviously upset and within 30 seconds it was all over.

I would ask that the Chair take those comments into consideration when it is making its decision. I am sure the member seriously regrets it. There are incidents that sometimes we would all like to forget. I would use the charity of the House in admonishing this member.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I simply want to add a few brief comments.

First, it is a most regrettable incident. It is an embarrassing situation for the House of Commons, for all members and for all Canadians.

I think that there are two issues, however, and we must not get them confused. One is the challenge, if you wish, or an attack on the authority of the Chair. The other one, of course, is inappropriate behaviour.

If we are going to deal with the inappropriate behaviour, I submit we cannot forget the inappropriate behaviour that has occurred within the last month. I am referring to the sexist comments that were made in this House to the member for Hamilton East and the racist comments that were allegedly made to the member for Windsor—St. Clair. Let us try to keep the two issues separate.

Concerning inappropriate behaviour, it seems to me we have to look at the other issues as well. Otherwise, we are not being consistent. We are being, in fact, unfair.

My personal preference would be that the response would be sufficient to remind members that this is inappropriate, this cannot be tolerated and will not be in the future. Hopefully, it will not occur again. But should that be the case, it will be dealt with in the most severe way possible.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I do not suppose there is a member here in the House who does not regret the incident as it transpired last night.

We are fortunate here today in that we have a situation where all of the material facts are either agreed to or apparent on the face of the record that we have here in the House. In addition, the hon. member involved has himself forthrightly addressed the matter already and has even put forward an apology in a very sincere fashion.

It is regrettable, but I suppose that we must, from time to time here in the House, stop our ordinary business to address matters involving our own conduct. In my view, the proposed procedure is adequate to do two things. One, it will address the incident itself adequately and expeditiously. Second, it will provide a precedent which may become useful to members here in the House in the future.

I would like to encourage members to get on with this matter now and address the question.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I also wish to see us get on with the issue.

I feel I have to stand and add a couple of comments. I would ask the indulgence of my colleagues while I do so. Obviously, I join with them in regretting the incident. I have to say that over the nearly three years that I have been here I have always admired the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam. I see him as a very energetic and intelligent, committed member of Parliament.

I look at the incident last night and, quite frankly, a phrase comes to my mind: "There, but for the grace of God, go I". In that sense, I hope I would never do that. I hope no hon. member would ever do that, but who knows? We are all human. As the hon. member from Vancouver said a few minutes ago, these things happen.

Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, there are two or three points that I want to make that I think are very germane. This provides an opportunity to make points that I have wanted to make for some time, since I came to this place.

I think there is a difference between the incident that took place here last night and the more recent incidents that involved the use of language that is utterly and completely reprehensible in this place with respect to other members.

Nobody could be more combative in debate, perhaps, than I can. Nobody enjoys heckling any more than I can. But the fact of the matter is there are people watching out there. People are losing respect for this place because of the kinds of things that are going on here.

Let it be clear that when we use inappropriate language back and forth across this House, it is doubtless provoked by one to the other, and back and forth. This happens sometimes.

What took place here last night was an action taken against an officer of the House who did nothing to provoke that incident. What took place here last night was a physical action as opposed to calling somebody something.

Let us not wash over this fact, much as we all might like to say: "Let's just forget the whole incident". I am sure the hon. member understands my motivation in making the comment. We cannot wash it away. When something wrong is done, it must be brought to account.

I would hope that we would use this, however, as a launching pad because of the gravity of this situation. I was bothered by the incidents that took place in the last couple of months and referred to by the hon. member for St. Hubert. I was bothered by the fact that nothing happened with respect to those incidents which to me were unacceptable, though perhaps not at the same level of gravity. I have been bothered by other things I have seen here. I have been bothered by the fact that one cannot get up and call someone a liar in this place, but it is okay for someone to stand in their place and mislead, distort and twist information. That has always seemed kind of perverse to me, that it would seem one can lie here but one cannot call someone a liar.

• (1200)

I suggest and I would urge that perhaps you might use your good offices, Mr. Speaker, to urge an appropriate body like the Standing Committee on Privileges to take a look at incidents like these. I know there was a committee set up, I believe it was a committee of female members of this place, to look at certain aspects. I think we should get on with dealing with those things because we are all negatively impacted by those things. They reflect badly on Parliament and on government. It is one of the reasons the public is losing its respect for politicians and public figures who, from what I have observed, are people who are here because they want to serve Canada, no matter what side of the House they are on.

Therefore, we must deal with the reality of this situation, though we do not wish to, and we must condemn the action, as we must condemn all other actions of a similar nature. Hopefully, we will not have to be faced with them any more.

I urge that we do not let it drop there, that we take up these issues and that we do something about making this place a place that will earn the respect of Canadians.

[Translation]

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Very briefly, I must say that I deplore the behaviour of the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam. For days and even weeks, we have been talking in the House about improving the behaviour of certain members. The behaviour, or rather misbehaviour, is often vocal, but last night, it became physical.

We have an incident that really must be dealt with. This place, the House of Commons, is where the future of the Canadian people is discussed. We talk here about the life and quality of life of all Canadians and must do so properly and professionally. Moreover, we must set an example.

Every day, children and schoolchildren visit us, so our behaviour is very important. We have professional colleagues in the community who watch the debates on television or who come here to see us. We are here to debate and discuss different ideologies and points of view, but not to react violently in word or deed.

Mr. Speaker, since we have a very specific, clear and obvious example, I believe that it should be dealt with immediately in order to set an example and serve notice to all other members in the House so that we can continue to have a proper healthy dialogue in the House of Commons.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: It is my duty in accordance with the motion to order the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam to appear at the bar of the House this afternoon at three o'clock.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-12, an act to amend the Young Offenders Act and the Criminal Code, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before we commence, we have a ruling. There are 27 motions set down on the Notice Paper for the report stage of Bill C-12, an act to amend the Young Offenders Act and the Criminal Code.

Motions Nos. 1 and 2 were ruled out of order in the legislative committee. In doing so the chairman stated that the proposed amendments went beyond Bill C-12 by attempting to amend the parent act, namely the Young Offenders Act itself.

I fully concur with the chairman's ruling that a member can only amend a specific clause of a bill referred to it, the committee, by the House. Citation 698, paragraph 8(b) of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, Sixth Edition provides:

> An amendment may not amend sections from the original Act unless they are specifically being amended in a clause of the bill before the committee.

Motion No. 3 will be debated and voted upon in combination with motion No. 5. An affirmative vote on motion No. 3 will obviate putting the question on motion No. 5. A negative vote on motion No. 3 will require that the question be put on motion No. 5.

Since motion No. 6 is identical to motion No. 5, it will not be selected.

Motion No. 4 was moved, debated and negatived in the legislative committee.

There are minor differences between this motion and the amendment moved in committee, but they are not sufficient to overcome the prohibition in the Standing Order. Therefore, under the authority of Standing Order 76, subsection (5), I will now not select motion No. 4 for debate.

Motions Nos. 4(a) and 7 will be grouped for debate. An affirmative vote on motion No. 4(a) will obviate the need to put the question on motion No. 7. A negative vote on motion No. 4(a) will require the question to be put on motion No. 7.

Motions Nos. 8 and 9 are acceptable. They will be grouped for debate. An affirmative debate on motion No. 8 will obviate the need to put the question on motion No. 9. A negative vote on motion No. 8 will require the question to be put on motion No. 9.

Motions Nos. 10, 11, 12 and 13 will be debated and voted upon separately.

Motions Nos. 14, 15, 16 and 17 will be grouped for debate and a vote on motion No. 14 will be applied to motions Nos. 15, 16 and 17.

I have serious reservations with respect to motion No. 18. In my view, it is outside the scope of the bill and, in addition, it would require the expenditure of public moneys which only the Crown may authorize through a royal recommendation. Therefore, a new clause by a private member creating a charge on the public purse is not acceptable. It would infringe upon the financial initiative of the Crown. In this connection, I would refer the hon. member to chapter 15 of Beauchesne's sixth edition on financial relations between the Crown and Parliament.

Motions Nos. 19, 20, 22, 24 and 26 will be grouped for debate. Each of them deletes a clause of the bill. They will be grouped for debate, but each will be voted upon separately. Since motion No. 21 is identical to motion No. 20, motion No. 23 is identical to motion No. 22 and motion No. 25 is identical to motion No. 24, they will not be selected.

Therefore, I will recapitulate for the hon. members for the convenience of the House. Motions Nos. 1, 2, 4, 6, 18, 21, 23 and 25 will not be selected.

The following motions are in order and will be debated and voted upon, as follows: Motions Nos. 3 and 5 are grouped for debate. An affirmative vote on motion No. 3 will obviate the need to vote on motion No. 5. A negative vote on motion No. 3 requires the question to be put on motion No. 5.

Motions Nos. 4(a) and 7 will be grouped for debate. An affirmative vote on motion No. 4(a) will obviate the need to put the question on motion No. 7. A negative vote on motion No. 4(a) will require the question to be put on motion No. 7.

Motions Nos. 8 and 9 will be grouped for debate.

• (1210)

An affirmative vote on motion No. 8 will obviate the need to put the question on motion No. 9. A negative vote on motion No. 8 will require the question to be put on motion No. 9.

Motions Nos. 10, 11, 12 and 13 will be debated and voted upon separately.

Motions Nos. 14, 15, 16 and 17 are grouped for debate. A vote on motion No. 14 will be applied to motions Nos. 15, 16 and 17.

Motions Nos. 19, 20, 22, 24 and 26 will be grouped for debate and each will be voted upon separately.

I will now put motions Nos. 3 and 5 to the House.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam) moved:

Motion No. 3.

That Bill C-12 be amended in Clause 2 by striking out lines 32 to 38 at page 2 and substituting the following therefor: "young person, and the court shall order

(a) that the young person be proceeded against in youth court, or

(b) that the young person".

Motion No. 5

That Bill C-12 be amended by deleting Clause 2.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I would just note in passing that it is somewhat ironic that my motion is the first after this morning's debate. I have nothing to say about this morning's debate except to say that I listened to my colleagues very carefully and what they had to say.

Getting on with the justice amendments. This is the Young Offenders Act. It has been around for a long time. There are amendments to the Young Offenders Act. These amendments have been around a long time. They were around even before prorogation of the House. They have been brought back, and we have been waiting and waiting and finally they have arrived. I am pleased that the government has brought them forward because I believe the Canadian public and my constituents I know want action in matters to happen in juvenile matters.

There has been an increase in juvenile crime in the country. There have been some real concerns about the alleged weaknesses of the Young Offenders Act. There is a great concern in my riding. A few weeks ago there was a meeting on juvenile gangs. The public is really interested in that and it wants us to respond to that.

To deal with the specific amendments let me say, before I go into that, generally what the act does. I think it is important that the members know the three principal objectives of the act, just to bring people back to what this act is doing. The act has three principal objectives, that is the government's amendments to this bill, C–12, to make it easier to transfer a youth to adult court. The youth can be transferred up to adult court and be treated as an adult. That is a rather unusual procedure, if I might say. It is a harsh procedure and that is in this bill. That is what I am going to deal with in proposed amendment 3 and proposed amendment 5.

The second objective of this act is to increase the penalty for youth convicted in youth court of first and second degree murder from three years to five years less a day. Part of the debate today will deal with the murder provision, over which there has been a lot of press and a lot of objections and difficulty.

The third principle of the government's bill is to permit earlier parole eligibility for youths transferred to adult court on murder charges. The adults were getting the paroles and the youths who were transferred and being treated like adults were not being eligible for parole.

Therefore that is the thrust of the government's Bill C–12. These are the first amendments. What I am trying to do with the first amendment is this. I am really addressing a principle and let me put the principle like this. Although he speaks adequately for himself, the justice critic for the Liberal Party, my friend from Cape Breton, expressed in committee, and we believe, that you should treat children as children in the criminal justice system. This is the period to reach them. This is the period when you can rehabilitate them and stop them from being adult criminals. If you are ever going to reach them, this is the place.

When the Young Offenders Act came in a number of years ago, what happened was that we did have a principle in this bill.

It is a very forward–looking bill, a very progressive bill, and the principle in the bill was that we would treat juveniles as juveniles. The problem was, having done that, we never provided facilities for that.

My first amendments, therefore, tackle the notion of transferring kids to adult court. Amendment No. 5 wants to abolish that provision.

Amendment No. 3 is somewhat more difficult and more complicated. My amendment was in line with the the Canadian Council on Children and Youth's recommendation. It did not favour, in transferring children to adult court, the paramountcy of the principle of protecting society. It was felt that there should be a balance in here and we should also consider the interest of the child as well.

The government's approach to affirming the principles of rehabilitation in the test for transfer will affect only those who are eligible for transfer. The government's wording implicitly assumes the young person is guilty as charged and is in need of rehabilitation. If the government is serious about affirming the principle of rehabilitation it should do so in the statement of principles. I believe it is set out in section 3 in the Young Offenders Act and that is where it should put it.

If I might sum up, my amendments here have the thrust of tackling the major issue and that is the issue of having these transfers. Why do we not just deal with juveniles as juveniles and provide tough juvenile penalties? We should not be afraid of providing tough penalties for them, but should deal with them as juveniles. Let us not make them adults and put them in a prison which is a school for crime, let us deal with them now. That is what these amendments are directed at.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I would urge the members of the House to turn down both these amendments. I think perhaps they are as important as any amendments that we will be looking at today and they go to one of the very important aspects of this bill, and that is the question of transfer of youth from youth court to ordinary court or sometimes referred to as adult court.

The amendments by the member for the New Democratic Party question if a transfer should be considered ordinary and if a transfer is going to be considered, under what circumstances. I have to disagree with the comments he made. I think the bill is clear that the objectives of the Young Offenders Act have been continued. I believe they are stated unequivocally in this bill. I believe as well that it is very clear that the vast majority of cases committed by young people will be dealt with in youth court.

However, there have been some problems with respect to the seriousness of crimes and under what circumstances we might want to consider a transfer. Provincial attorneys general have brought to the attention of the government the unequal interpretation across the country of the present transfer provision. There are concerns among members of the public that they want to be assured that in circumstances dealing with very serious crimes the protection of the public is paramount. That is what the present section, the present proposal of the government, intends to do.

It says that we tried to reconcile the benefits of keeping a youth within the youth system, but we also have to reconcile that with the protection of the public. The government's amendment makes it very clear that where you cannot reconcile the two, the protection of the public is paramount.

Many members will disagree with that and say: "You know, there are other considerations you should take. You should never consider transferring an individual to ordinary court". But there it is, the government is saying the protection of the public is paramount. I think most Canadians can live with that and for that reason I would urge the House to turn down both these motions by the member for the New Democratic Party because I believe they attack that principle.

• (1220)

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words about both of these suggested amendments.

I have been listening to the hon. parliamentary secretary and I tend to agree with some of the points he made with respect to amendment No. 3 which states some of the objectives on this bill and what we hope to achieve and certainly the rehabilitation of the offender is important and the safety of the public is very important.

In that regard I do not think amendment No. 3 really offers that much. It may be more of a problem.

However, with respect to amendment No. 5 I feel very differently about that. I think that this bill is a bad bill. I do not think it comes anywhere near doing what we on this side of the House feel should be done in light of rising youth crime in this country, and the concern that the citizens have.

On the other hand, I do not think it does justice to the offender. I think that what we are saying is that the terms, the sentences, should be longer. While they are longer there should be something done to rehabilitate and to train the offender because we are talking about young people. We are talking about young people according to this act as it presently states from the ages of 12 to 18.

If we do not rehabilitate these young people, we are going to have them re-enter our criminal system later on. We are going to have them re-offending. We are going to be putting them in adult institutions again and again.

What we want to do is try to rehabilitate these young people at a formative age. In that regard I think the minimum age on the young offenders act is no longer applicable. I think 12 is too old to really start rehabilitating some of these young offenders. I think we have to look at the age of nine. In light of our society and in light of the fact that there are a great many of our children who are just out on the streets at all times, we have to be able to deal with them. We have to be able to take these young people at an early stage.

At the same time we have to be able to rehabilitate them. We want to do something to get these people on the path of being good and constructive citizens.

The other feature as was mentioned by the parliamentary secretary is the transfer provisions. There can be an application to transfer an individual from the youth court to the adult courts.

Then, if that application is made and approved, the young offender can in turn appeal that and have it moved back to the youth court.

This whole process could take up to two years. It is counter productive. We should have one youth court, quite probably and realistically, combined with the family court to deal with all of these issues.

Family courts at the present cannot deal in jury trials, but that can be changed. We need a continuity in this area where we are talking families and young offenders because one quite often is part of the other.

I feel this bill does not deal with that. All we are doing is papering over the problems in our society and the anxiety faced by our citizens, particularly in our urban communities.

I would like to offer my support to the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam on his motion No. 5. I think it goes to the heart of what is wrong with this bill.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I want to support the motion that my hon. colleague has made.

One of the things that people get concerned about is the problem of juveniles and they feel that the solution is an ability to transfer to adult court. I want to recount a couple of my own experiences. Before I comment in more detail, my own background is working with youth and working in correctional systems. I became interested because of an incident involving a young fellow I knew when I was in university. A young man from my home town, as a young teen, was cutting through a lumber yard one night and picked up a splitting wedge. For that he was sentenced to nine months in reform school.

Of course while in reform school he met many youths who were much more sophisticated than he was, much more involved in crime than he was. They convinced him to go on a little trip up through the central part of B.C. There were five kids travelling in the car. Three of them had been sitting in a restaurant, two of whom were hardened kids who had relieved an elderly gentleman of his wallet. The kids were charged with robbery with violence.

They were raised from juvenile court to adult court. They were convinced to plead guilty. They were sentenced to two and a half years in the federal penitentiary. The court asked them to waive their rights to appeal, which they did.

Here is a situation where a boy who had some difficulties had been treated in a manner by the court system that simply guaranteed he would spend his life in crime. It did not rehabilitate him. It did not treat him as a youth or a child. It pushed him into the federal penitentiary system as a young teenager. And what had he done? Very little.

I wrote my master's thesis on the whole business of the Juvenile Delinquency Act and the Juvenile Court and came to the conclusion that it was a star chamber court. Kids could be removed from their homes, sentenced to long periods in reform schools, raised to adult court for offences that would be considered as an adult trivial. The Young Offenders Act made great process in the handling of youth. The principles of the Young Offenders Act are sound. The problem has been that the resources necessary to invest in our youth who are in trouble have not been forthcoming. Because of that there are those people who say: "We have to be more punitive. We have to be more harsh. We have to teach these kids a lesson. Let's make it easier to raise them to adult court. Let's make it easier to send them to adult penal institutions".

The New Democratic Party and I simply say that this is a wrong approach. Let us look at whom we are talking about when we are talking about youth in conflict with the law. A large proportion of them in this country, regrettably, are native. There are indications that in Manitoba as high as 84 per cent of kids in detention centres are native. Native youth in this country have more of a chance of going to jail than going to university. These are the youth we are talking about making it easier to raise to adult court.

In child welfare circles in some jurisdictions 80 per cent of the children in care of the Superintendent of Child Welfare are native youth. There is a tremendous overlap between child welfare, young offenders and poverty in this country.

Resources to help families that have been mainly directed through the Canada Assistance Plan have been curtailed by this government. It has put a ceiling on services under the Canada Assistance Plan in three of the largest provinces, which account for 50 per cent of those in need of child welfare services.

This is how and when we should be putting our resources into working with families on a preventative basis to make sure that youth do not get into trouble with the law later on. If you go into an elementary school, most grade one, two and three teachers will be able to tell you the kids who are going to end up before the juvenile court when they are 12, 13 or 14. They know by their behaviour, by the lack of support they are receiving from their families and by their inability to function in a school environment that these are the kids that are in difficulty.

We choose to ignore that. We do not put in the family support resources that they need. We do not provide adequate income for the families to ensure that these children are not in poverty. We simply wait until the child gets into difficulty. Then we stand and say: "The time has come. We have to teach this kid a lesson. We have to show him that we will not tolerate unacceptable behaviour". Yet we have refused to extend the help and resources that we now know would prevent that child from coming before these courts and becoming a long-term drain on our society.

The overlap of illiteracy and offenders in our adult prison system is well known. We know that 60 per cent to 80 per cent of all adult offenders have a learning disability. Yet we are unprepared to put in resources on a significant basis to deal with this problem in the formative years or even in adult years.

We will not put in place the kinds of programs in our school systems that will ensure youth with disabilities are able to pick up the fundamentals necessary to function in this society: to be able to read at a level so that they can get a job, to be able to handle basic mathematics at a level where they can function in society where they have to understand interest rates, banking and mortgages. We simply are unprepared to put in the kinds of resources. Then four or five years later when this child comes before the youth court we want to say: "It is your fault". We want to make it easier for them to transfer and to say that the paramount thing must be the protection of society. The best way to protect society is to provide the resources to ensure that this child never gets before juvenile court.

I would support the amendments my colleague has made because I think they maintain the principles we want to see in the Young Offenders Act.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of this report stage debate I felt a need to address the principle lying behind the discussion of this proposed amendment.

The previous member when speaking quite properly raised the issue of public safety. I think we should all make sure that we stop here and take note that hundreds of years ago, perhaps a couple or three hundred years ago, we in western society made a bargain. We made a bargain with the state that in return for public safety, law and order we would give up some of our own personal liberties, liberties like going out and taking care of retribution or the enforcement of revenge after an offence.

We have turned that over to government. We continue, all of us as citizens, to have a right in the quid pro quo here to demand from government that it provide the public safety that we bargained for, that the state holds out it is able to provide for us, and that we all pay for it.

Lying behind the Young Offenders Act is a concept that young people who are not fully matured, who have not formed their minds yet in terms of their relationship to society, should be treated differently. I agree with that. I know all my colleagues agree with that.

What has happened is that in the big city—I represent an urban riding—many of my constituents, many people in metropolitan Toronto, are starting to question the artificiality of the distinction between a 17-year-old and and 18-year-old. They realize that in many cases we have individuals defined as youths, 17, 16, 15, who have embarked on a pattern of crime that is no different in any material respect from the pattern of crime perpetrated by those who might be 18, 19 or 20 years of age. They justifiably ask the government to which they give their taxes: "Where is the public safety? Where is the system that will provide for safety for me and my family in relation to the assaults, the robberies and the killings?" The proposed amendment to this Young Offenders Act provides a mechanism to address directly, head on, the young offender who may be of significant concern from a public safety point of view.

The way the amendments are drafted permit a judge in a court to deal with differences in region. We have urban areas. We have rural areas and we have a large number of potential native offenders. Each of those categories can be addressed differently by the courts involved.

What my constituents are asking for is a mechanism that will permit the justice system to deal with public safety head on for cases which merit that when the individual happens to be of a young offender age. I speak in a manner that would not support this particular amendment.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam) moved:

Motion No. 7

That Bill C-12 be amended by adding immediately after line 17 at page 4 the following new clause:

"3. The said Act is amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 17 thereof, the following section:

"17.1 (1) Notwithstanding any other provision in this or any other Act of Parliament, where an order is made pursuant to section 16 and the young person is proceeded against in the ordinary court, and is sentenced to custody, the judge who sentences the young person may order that the young person serve that sentence in a place of detention for young persons until the young person attains the age of eighteen years.

(2) Where a young person is held in custody in a place of detention for young persons pursuant to an order made under subsection (1), and an application is made to the youth court by the Attorney General, or the Attorney General's agent, the provincial director of the province in which the young person is held in custody shall cause the young person to be brought before the youth court and the youth court may, after affording both parties and the parents of the young person an opportunity to be heard and if it is satisfied that there are reasonable grounds to believe that the young person should be transferred to a place of detention for adults, order that the young person be transferred from the place of detention for young persons and to a place of detention for adults.

(3) For the purposes of determining an application under subsection (1), the youth court shall consider without limiting the generality of the foregoing,

(a) the young person's difficulties in controlling violent impulses to the point of endangering the safety of any other person in the place of detention where the young person is being kept;

(b) whether the young person is a psychological threat to other young persons in the place of detention where the young person is being kept; and

(c) whether it is in the best interests of the young person to keep the young person in a place of detention for young persons.

(4) Six months before a young person in respect of whom an order has been made under subsection (1) attains the age of eighteen years, a youth court may on application of the young person, the young person's counsel, the Attorney General or the Attorney General's agent, after affording both parties and the parents of the young person an opportunity to be heard, order that the young person's detention in a place of detention for young persons, be extended until the young person reaches the age of twenty years, provided the court is satisfied that it would be in the interest of the young person for the court to do so.''''

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, first of all, just as a point of clarification for the House, it would seem to me that if motion No. 4A were passed that motion No. 7 would not be necessary inasmuch as I believe they deal with the same thing.

This clause arises out of a number of areas and certainly not the least of which are concerns raised by members of the legislative committee that looked at C-12 or its predecessor C-58 in the last session of Parliament. That concerns the placement and detention of young people both prior to trial and post-conviction of individuals who have been the subject of a transfer provision, the one that was spoken of in the last motion. If a young person has been transferred to ordinary court, the question arises as to where and how that individual would be detained.

In motion No. 4A, the government motion, we break it down into two parts, the pre-trial detention and the post-conviction. Within the pre-trial detention we make a distinction. We say that if the individual is under the age of 18 there is a presumption that he would be kept separate and apart from adult offenders. At the same time, if the young person who has been transferred has now reached the age of 18 or older, there is a presumption that he would be held in the ordinary courts with other adults.

One of the things I should say is that both these presumptions are rebuttable. They are reviewable. The motion indicates to whom and how an application might be made to change that and the notice that should be given.

The crux of what we are talking about here in the pre-trial phase is young people should be treated different and it is a good idea for the long-term rehabilitation of an individual for his or her well-being as a young person that he or she should be kept separate and apart. As I say, that is not an iron-clad rule. Circumstances may make that impossible. Circumstances may make that undesirable but prior to the trial those are the two presumptions that we are suggesting in motion No. 4A.

On the other hand, for an individual who has been transferred to ordinary court and has been convicted, the second part of the government motion deals with that. It gives a judge basically three choices. One of them is that the young person could be kept separate and apart from an adult. Second, that individual may be placed in a provincial correctional institute or, in cases where the sentence is two or more years, a penitentiary.

One of the important things to remember in asking the House to pass this clause is that there are a number of considerations that go into a judge's decision as to where the most appropriate place is that this individual will be confined.

The motion and the proposed amendment, as you see, take into consideration a number of of considerations we believe the judge should take into consideration, among them the safety of the young person and the safety of the public, which I already spoke of in the previous motion.

The person's accessibility to his or her family is an obvious consideration.

Ultimately, we want individuals who have been convicted of a crime to be rehabilitated. In almost all cases, contact with one's family is an important component of that. When a judge has to make a decision as to where the best place is for the confinement of that individual, proximity to family has to be taken into consideration.

Other things the judge would take into consideration are the young person's level of maturity, the availability of treatment, education and other resources that might be helpful in reintroducing this individual into society, and any other factor the court considers relevant.

That is the crux of the government's motion. There are sections here as to how and when notice should be given, who should be notified, how the application could be made and the circumstances under which a review could take place. I believe it is a substantial step forward. It is in line with the commitments the Government of Canada has made over the years concerning the treatment of young people in our judicial system.

I might point out to members of the opposition that I think it is in line with suggestions they made at the committee stage and suggestions they have made publicly. Therefore, I am asking this House to accept 4A. At that point, it seems to me that motion No. 7 would be redundant.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, this is an important motion. I agree with the parliamentary secretary that it does help the bill somewhat. Unfortunately, it does not go nearly far enough. While the parliamentary secretary has made representations that this is largely what we in the opposition were looking for in committee, I would say this is a small part of what we were looking for, certainly in this party, at the committee stage.

I do not think we would have this amendment had it not been for the government signing the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child and realizing that with its own Young Offenders Act it could not abide by the convention which, not only had it signed, but was a co-sponsor of. Therefore, this is to really tidy up and to bring it into line with its sponsoring and signing of the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child.

This is not just for the benefit of justice in Canada or for the young people who have been incarcerated or charged in this country. This is to save an embarrassment for the government. Frankly, we will take any reason at all to improve this act.

That reason having been stated, we will accept it as a basis, regardless.

I would like to speak to this and to the parliamentary secretary and the government in particular.

The first part of the motion is good. What we are talking about in the first part of the motion are young people who have been charged and who are now subject to a motion, having their charge heard in the adult court as opposed to the youth court. As I said, if the motion is successful, the young person or his or her representative can appeal. This process can take up to two years.

What has happened in the past is that while this young person is waiting for the question on whether he or she is going to be transferred to adult court to be heard or the appeal is to be heard, that young person is held, most of the time, in an adult institution where the young person is subject to physical and sexual abuse and at the same time learning all the tricks of the trade as far as how to enhance your career as a criminal is concerned.

• (1250)

That is not what we mean when we say we want rehabilitation and assistance for these young people to make them good, worth while, law abiding citizens. In a lot of these cases the young person is a victim of where they lived or their own economic situation. These young people at that age can be helped. By putting them in this facility during this critical formative period of time, quite often when they come out it is too late to do anything for them. Their whole future has been formulated.

The government has made a very important step here. It says:

> That, notwithstanding anything in this or any other act of Parliament, where an order is made under section 16 that a young person who is under the age of 18 be proceeded against in ordinary court, and the young person is to be in custody pending the proceedings of that court, the young person shall be held separate and apart from any adult who is detained or held in custody unless the youth court judge is satisfied on application at the time of the making of the order that the young person, having regard to the best interests of the young person and the safety of others, cannot be detained in the place of detention for young persons.

That would say that the basic presumption is this young person can be kept in a youth facility and is not a danger "having regard to the best interests of the young person and the safety of others", and that this young person does not represent a safety problem for the other people in this youth facility. In most cases the youth who are detained are not a problem to the safety of others. They may be a bad influence, but one could say they are a bad influence on one another. I can understand what we would call incorrigibles, youth who cannot be placed in a youth facility.

Having regard for the safety of others, I would rather have it defined and say a certain type of young offender, one we would call incorrigible, that is fine. This is not perfect but it is a major step forward.

In that regard, for that period of time while the young person is awaiting a decision of whether he or she is going to be heard in youth court or adult court, that does help the young person.

The other feature which is important is at the end in subsection (7) which says:

Notwithstanding anything in this section, no young person shall remain in custody in a place of detention for young persons under this section after the young person attains the age of 20 years.

That is fine because presumably in the two year period, and surely it would not be much more than two years to have this matter resolved, the person would be 20. That looks after that. That is good. This is a major improvement. The problem is when you go on to the next section in which we are talking about the actual incarceration.

Once again, what we have here is a rehashing of what is already in the bill in different language. It says:

The provincial director and representatives of the provincial and federal corrections have an opportunity to be heard—.other than the young persons serve a portion of their imprisonment in a place of custody for young persons separate and apart from any adult who is detained or held in custody, a provincial corrections facility for adults, or, where the sentence is for two years or more, a penitentiary.

What we are doing, once again, is giving the judge or the court the choice. They already have that choice, that choice is in the Young Offenders Act right now. It is in Bill C–12. This amendment does not change that.

What we want to see is something similar to what we have in the first part. All we are asking the government to do is be consistent in the second part, that is the incarceration after the sentencing, with what the government has said about the incarceration of the young person prior to the determination of whether that young person is going to be heard in adult or youth court. That is all we are asking; to say that the young person will be detained in a youth facility, unless the young person is a safety problem for the other inmates of the youth facility. That is not a lot to ask, to say that the young person perhaps cannot be incarcerated in that youth facility after he or she reaches the age of 20 years. But it does give the system a chance to rehabilitate that young person. Before the determination whether the person is to be in adult or youth court, after the sentencing the young person, until he or she is 20, can be in a youth facility where we can treat and work with that young person. He or she will not be open to physical and sexual abuse and not constantly bombarded with the criminal expertise that older inmates can give.

I say this is a minor improvement. I just wish the government had followed through and changed the second part to coincide with the first part. Then I think we would really have something here. Unfortunately it does not go nearly far enough.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, this amendment as proposed by the government certainly does go a long way toward answering some of the concerns that were raised.

I particularly am happy to see the section makes it very clear that a young person shall be held separate and apart from any adult who is detained or held in custody unless the youth court judge is satisfied on application at the time of the making of the order that the young person, having regard to the best interests of the young person and the safety of others, cannot be detained in a place of detention for young persons.

This is a principle that is well set out and is valid, that the preferable place of detention shall be in a place for detaining of young persons. It is only in rare and specific exceptions where the safety of others, or the interests of that young person, can maybe help in any other setting.

I think it has been the unfortunate practice in many jurisdictions in Canada to detain youths, particularly those who are before the court waiting on applications to be raised to adult court, in facilities to detain adults. Often this is done on the basis, almost of a prejudgment, of the court decision that this child is a child who should be raised to adult court. Therefore, based on the fact that we have made that application, we now see fit to have the child detained in adult facilities.

This, of course, makes it clear that that is not possible.

The other parts of the bill try to set out the circumstances or considerations under which a judge will determine the place of custody of a young person once they have been dealt with by the court. It is set out that it may be in a place for youths, it could be in an adult correctional facility under provincial jurisdiction, or it could be in a federal penitentiary under federal jurisdiction.

One comment I would like to make refers to 2(g). It says that the court shall take into consideration availability and suitability of treatment.

This is where the government has totally fallen down because this is where the greatest lack of resources is. We do not have adequate resources for youths. We do not have them to provide adult offenders with the treatment and rehabilitation that is necessary. Without that, we are always trying to force that young offender into increased incarceration rather than into a situation that is for treatment, education, and other kinds of resources.

It is very commendable for the government to set this out in legislation. My concern, however, is that it has not provided the resources that really and truly give the judge the alternatives that he or she can look at to make that kind of a judgment: what is in the best interest of the child, the best treatment for this child and what is in the best interest of society.

I will end on those remarks, being conscious of the time.

THE CANADIAN HEARING SOCIETY

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, a letter was sent to me today by The Canadian Hearing Society. On behalf of 1.6 million Canadians who are either visually or hearing impaired, they are asking questions. For example, a recent Canadian Human Rights Commission report stated that the basic telephone communication via TDD with federal departments was inadequate.

They gave Ottawa airport as an example. Ottawa airport claims to have a telecommunication device for the deaf, as it should, according to Transport Canada policy. However, no one has ever seen this device or been able to use it. The information booth claims it does not have one.

The Minister of Finance promised to make further tax deductions in 1992 towards making accessible buildings owned by landlords for the benefit of the deaf and hard of hearing. In 1991, only flashing fire alarms were recognized as deductible. What items will be included on the list in 1992?

As another example, Treasury Board does not have a policy supporting the training of public servants in American sign language. This is necessary as deaf persons face primarily attitudinal and communication barriers to employment in the federal service. A policy should be passed as soon as possible.

Finally, they are asking, what are the number of deaf and hard of hearing Canadians employed by the federal government and in what capacity: clerical, professional, management? How does this compare to the general population? They are calling on the government for action.

We are honoured by the presence in our gallery of 22 winners of the Canadian award for business excellence. These people proudly represent Canadian companies outstanding for their innovative approach and firm commitment to the highest possible production standards.

These Canadian men and women are proof that with vision, commitment and determination, we can meet the challenges of an increasingly competitive world economy and come out winners. They are setting standards for a new era in business in this country, an era that will prove that Canadian businesses can compete with the best in the world and come out on top. Mr. Speaker, we are proud of these people, and I know that all my colleagues will join me in offering them our sincere congratulations.

VISIBLE MINORITIES

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, there is growing racism in this country and the government must show more leadership in fighting against it. There will be an excellent opportunity to do this because the Employment Equity Act passed in 1986 requires a parliamentary review after five years and that review will start shortly.

The purpose of the Employment Equity Act is to provide more jobs for visible minorities and other target groups but it has not been successful. The percentage of employment of visible minorities and firms covered by the act has barely changed since 1986. In order to make this law effective, the government must make the following changes; first, put more effective sanctions in the law to enforce affirmative action; second, make the law applicable to all federal departments and Crown corporations; third, make the law applicable to all firms with 25 or more employees rather than 100 employees. Furthermore, governments and political parties must appoint more officials and run more candidates who are visible minorities.

Fine words and good intentions are not enough. Political and social justice demand that we take effective affirmative action now before this country is overwhelmed with racial and social unrest.

MADRID CONFERENCE

Mr. Guy Ricard (Laval-Ouest): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in Madrid, Spain, a conference was launched to negotiate peace in the Middle East. Several countries are participating, including the Soviet Union and the United States. All eyes are on Israel, but there is also the fact of the status of Jews in Syria. About 4,000 men, women and children are being held by a regime that has no respect for the concept of human rights. I ask the Canadian government to support the peace talks negotiations at this conference and to put pressure on the Syrian authorities to allow Jews in that country the same freedom to travel, speak and live in their country as their fellow citizens.

OZONE DEPLETION

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, today is Hallowe'en and a good day to remind this government that the sun's rays are becoming increasingly dangerous and not just to Count Dracula.

Dracula never goes outside any more, not since the recent UN scientific report warned that the protective ozone shield is disappearing faster than was forecast.

But help is on the way in the form of CFC sucking vampire units. Development and distribution of Canadian technology to combat ozone destruction can give Canadian's anaemic economic a much needed boost.

One Canadian company estimates markets for vampire units to be worth over $2 billion. Recovering used CFCs will create local employment, help save the ozone and protect people's health.

I urge this government to bring in regulations to require every industry to have vampire units on site so that all CFCs in use will be recaptured and recycled.

Let us make Halloween and every other day safe for little hobgoblins, witches and Draculas everywhere.

PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION

Mr. André Harvey (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, the Liberals, the NDP and the Bloc Québécois often talk about good public administration but never mention the hard work and successes of the present government. A simple comparison with the Liberals' record from 1980 to 1984 will show how far removed our administration is from that of the Liberals, who increased their spending by 15 per cent annually, compared with 3.5 per cent by our government, since 1984.

If we had pursued the same disastrous policies as the Liberals, Canada would be bankrupt, and here is why: The Liberal's budget today would be 250 billion instead of 150 billion; the deficit would be 160 billion instead of 30 billion; and worst of all, the debt would now be 800 billion instead of 400 billion.

To keep the deficit at its present level, we would have had to raise the taxes of every Canadian by $4,700 annually. That is why our government must keep doing its job and ignore the demagogic outbursts of the opposition.

DEMOCRACY IN HAITI

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, there are many who have tried to discredit Haitian president Jean Bertrand Aristide. However, the events speak for themselves. Under his regime, human rights violations substantially decreased, and no abuses were attributed to his government.

As Aristide pointed out, during the short period of seven months in which Haiti's democracy developed, for the first time in its history, Haitians worked to create a responsible government. They resurrected an independent judicial system. These achievements are now in danger of being reversed.

It is now one month since the Haitian army overthrew President Aristide, and during that time, our government has failed to act on its commitment to freeze Haitian assets in Canada and impose economic sanctions.

Action must be taken now to bring President Aristide back to power. We cannot renege on our commitments. Democracy must be restored in Haiti.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, I recently asked my constituents to let me know what issues are concerning them most these days. Over half of those who wrote to me are very concerned about the lack of confidence in many Canadian politicians.

Wallace Armstrong of Thornhill writes: "Our elected members of all parties are well-meaning people, but TV's Question Period does not always show that. Fix that and our unity and economy will follow".

I seek a consensus from this House to begin the process of rebuilding confidence in MPs and in this great institution. Our conduct in the House of Commons must be mature. Let us attack the issues and not each other's character.

We are accountable to our electorate and we must show them that we are serious about our responsibilities and our conduct. Let us begin a new chapter in the proceedings of this House where mutual respect for one another and total respect for this institution will be paramount.

SHIPBUILDING

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the government of a promise it made in 1984 to provide Canada with a competitive shipbuilding industry.

In a press release of August 23, 1984 the Progressive Conservative Party's Atlantic caucus stated that: "A top priority of the PC government will be to create a more viable and prosperous shipbuilding industry". It went on to call for a comprehensive series of steps that created a national shipbuilding policy for this country.

• (1410)

Eight years later, the legacy of the Tory national shipbuilding policy is clear. A commitment to build a Polar 8 ice-breaker at Versatile Pacific broken. A commitment to build submarines in either Quebec or New Brunswick broken. MIL bailouts and closures round out this government's so-called national shipbuilding policy.

Shipbuilders in the Atlantic region demand that this government stand up and enact a comprehensive series of policies to ensure that its industry is competitive. Increase the tax on vessels constructed offshore. Extend support to the smaller ship repair facilities such as the Dartmouth marine slips. Establish Canada as a leader in cold water shipbuilding technology and create an investment climate so that we can rid ourselves of the 90 per cent rate of offshore vessel construction.

Mr. Speaker, I urge the government to act now.

PROSPERITY

Mr. Jean-Pierre Hogue (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, the announcement made two days ago in this House by the Minister of Employment and Immigration and the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade puts us squarely in the present-day reality and the third millennium, which we will enter in a few years.

The Province of Quebec has no reason to think that there is any intrusion at all in any field whatsoever. Setting standards of excellence and pursuing them can ultimately only help the provinces and the whole country meet the new challenges well.

Furthermore, in many fields of art and science, such criteria exist and institutions, like individuals, are only better for it. Economists such as Professor Porter in his study have given us the same message.

Canada's prosperity, Mr. Speaker, depends on adequate knowledge and well-managed human resources. Seeking improved productivity is not a visionary approach but a necessary consequence of our society's evolution.

YUGOSLAVIA

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I rise today in response to the continuing crisis in Croatia. The continued aggression of the federal army is totally unacceptable. Thousands of people in Croatia continue to live in miserable conditions without decent food or clean water. Thousands have been wounded and killed and many others are living in fear for their lives.

Humanitarian aid must be allowed through immediately without further interference. Wanton damage is being perpetrated against internationally recognized sites of Croatian culture such as the city of Dubrovnik.

The federal army must stop this aggression at once and withdraw from Croatia immediately. Many people in my community and others with families in Croatia are currently raising money for humanitarian aid. These people feel helpless and frustrated at the continuing violence in the area.

The federal government can alleviate this frustration and anxiety by establishing a 1-800 information hot line on the Croatian conflict. Canadians have a right to know what is happening to their loved ones. I call upon the government to establish this service immediately.

INTEREST RATES

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, The Globe and Mail today devoted space to attacking me for raising the issue of credit card interest rates in Parliament. Taking the side of the banks, the newspaper continued its familiar attempts to discredit me.

This is fine but Globe readers should remember that this is little more than continuing an old newspaper war against a former rival business journalist. Worse, the Globe is both selective in its coverage and wrong in its facts. Why is it supporting credit card rates of almost 20 per cent, when the prime is 8.5 per cent? Why does it not run the story saying that the Consumers Association of Canada welcomes an inquiry into these rates? Why does the Globe say today that I supported price controls during the introduction of the GST when I authored a report saying exactly the opposite?

By calling Canadians with credit card debts "foolish" in these rough economic times, The Globe and Mail is being both arrogant and insensitive.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance in his budget of 1989 said this with regard to unemployment insurance premiums:

> The government will continue to contribute to the financing of unemployment insurance in difficult economic times when it is inappropriate to raise premiums.

In July 1991, the government raised premiums 24 per cent and next year, January 1, 1992 they will be increased 5 per cent again.

It has come to our attention that unemployment insurance once again will be raised approximately 14 per cent by the Minister of Finance. When the Minister of Finance was questioned on Thursday and Friday, October 24 and October 25, he said unequivocally he would not give an assurance to this House that unemployment insurance premiums would not rise.

I want to point out to the Minister of Finance that if unemployment insurance premiums go up once again it will further erode business confidence, particularly as it relates to small business. It will have a devastating effect on employees of small business as well as workers across this country.

I urge the Minister of Finance to take heed of this advice and not increase the unemployment insurance premiums—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

IRAQ

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, why is Canada helping to kill babies in Iraq? According to the October 22 report of 87 specialists who visited 30 Iraqi cities: "Unless Iraq quickly obtains food, medicine, and spare parts millions of Iraquis will continue to experience malnutrition and disease. Thousands of children will die". Already mortality of children under age 5 has risen 380 per cent.

The United Nations with Canada's active support stopped Iraq from selling enough oil to feed its people. Iraq cannot use oil revenues to buy arms because the money is deposited in a United Nations account only for UN approved purposes. Yet the UN restricted Iraq to less than $1 billion to buy and transport food.

We did not do that to the Germans and Italians when we won World War II. Why impose death on Iraqi babies, some not even born when the gulf war began?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE ECONOMY

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. The minister keeps on repeating that his government's economic policies are succeeding. He never stops repeating that the recession is over. However, we learned today that the gross domestic product has fallen again. If the recession is over, why is steel production falling? Why are sales of metals and machinery falling? Why are aircraft production, gas distribution, construction, fishing, agriculture, mining, transportation, insurance, real estate and sales of automobiles and manufactured products down? Why?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the question the hon. member poses is very legitimate but some of the descriptions she has put forward in the body of her question are grossly inaccurate.

There has been a slight contraction in the service sector. The monthly output data is somewhat volatile at this particular time.

I remind the hon. member that if she were to look at the September preliminary figures she would see that growth in housing starts was strong. As a matter of fact, housing starts increased 19 per cent in the third quarter over the previous quarter. I believe automobile sales increased by 9 per cent or 10 per cent. Truck sales increased by 17 per cent in the month of September.

Employment rose. Unemployment went down from 10.6 per cent to 10.2 per cent and 65,000 new jobs were created.

As well, Canada's composite leading index improved in the month of September so I would ask the hon. member to consider the September figures because they certainly do look a lot better.

I might just add in conclusion that coming out of the 1981–1982 recession there were two months within a year wherein there was negative growth. So this is not unusual.

I take the hon. member's question seriously. We said all along that recovery would be moderate and modest and we still stand by that.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance talks about a slight downturn. Manufacturing is down $5 billion from the same time last year. Construction is down $1 billion. The retail trade is down $1.5 billion. This economy is in desperate trouble and the member behind the minister is supporting me in my comments.

Once again I ask the Minister of Finance, instead of running a multimillion dollar advertising campaign, why does the government not act today to solve our current desperate financial problems?

• (1420)

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would draw to the member's attention that in the first eight months of 1991 the volume of exports in Canada is up by 11 per cent. A lot of that is manufacturing and the goods producing sector.

The goods producing sector did not weaken in the month of August. It maintained a very vibrant pace and what happened in the month of August was the fact that the service sector declined somewhat.

I indicated to the hon. member that to some extent these data were stale-dated because there are data that have come forth in the month of September which supersede that.

I should also draw to the hon. member's attention that we have had another 13 basis points reduction in interest rates today, which really puts the Bank of Canada rate at 8.03 per cent or Treasury bills at 7.75 per cent.

That is the lowest in 14 years and that ought to be a good indicator.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, the government's advertising campaign may be yes, we can, but to the steelworker in Hamilton the answer is no, you haven't. We are talking about a $5 billion drop in the manufacturing sector alone.

What can the minister say today to the steelworker in Hamilton about the policies of his government, policies that have led to a $5 billion drop in the manufacturing sector?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I can say to the hon. member and to the steelworker that as we said in the February budget the key to growth is to bring down interest rates. The key to bringing down interest rates is to bring down inflation and inflationary pressures.

That is occurring. With the continuing decline in interest rates, that should provide for a new investor confidence in investing into plant and equipment.

I think it is time to shed the charge that this government is pursuing a high interest rate policy. Interest rates are the lowest in 14 years. It is now time for the business community to take up the challenge because it cannot hide behind that forever.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, my question for the Minister of Finance is very simple.

On Monday he told the House: "The economy is starting to boom". That was Monday of this week. Today we realize that the economy declined by .3 per cent in August.

Was the minister misinformed on Monday? Has he now changed his mind, or does he think that a declining GDP is consistent with a booming economy?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I take it from the tone of the hon. member's question that he is almost ecstatic about the fact that there has been a small, modest decline in output in the month of August, .03 per cent.

I am concerned about it. When I said that the economy was starting to boom I may have been somewhat over enthusiastic. The hon. member knows as well as anyone else what I have always said. After a growth of about 4.9

per cent in the second quarter we indicated that we did not expect to achieve and maintain that level of growth, that we were projecting modest, moderate recovery, but that if we got the fundamentals right to bring inflation down and to bring interest rates down that would be the recipe to a durable, sustainable recovery.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, of course we are all happy to see the interest rates come down, but the minister should accept that in the current circumstances lowering interest rates is rather like trying to push a string when it comes to trying to stimulate economic recovery.

Based on the fact that Statistics Canada has today said that the rate of recovery is about half what it was over the first five months of the recovery in 1981–82, is the minister prepared to consider measures that will improve consumer confidence, or is he prepared to stand by and let this haemorrhaging that continues to go on continue indefinitely?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as we have indicated and as is occurring, the interest rates are continuing to decline because we have been able to get inflation rates down and inflationary expectations.

I know my hon. friend agrees with that. I know that there is a very interesting internal debate going on within the Liberal caucus. I think the hon. member shares the view of the government that we must get the fundamentals and we must get the basics right.

I have not heard one positive suggestion coming from that side of the House; only to spend more money and to drive up interest rates.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, the minister suggests that perhaps he was over-enthusiastic.

Let me suggest that the minister has been Mr. Sunshine right from the start on this recession. A month ago he talked about us being on the road to recovery. Two weeks ago he talked about us being on the right track.

Let me ask the minister whether these figures do not show that we in fact have returned to recession which is hurting people right across this country. Will the minister get up and admit that he was wrong? Will he do something to help those thousands of people across this country who have been hurt by the free trade deal and to whom his government promised adjustment assistance help which it has never come through with?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I admitted that I may have been somewhat over-optimistic when I used the words "starting to boom", but I must say I was certainly less optimistic than the IMF, the OECD, the Economic Council of Canada and the Bank of Canada. They are all projecting growth far in excess of what we are projecting in the Ministry of Finance.

In so far as the hon. member's question is concerned, he talks about the free trade. Just the other day I happened to visit Edmonton where the Dow Chemical Company was opening up a new petrochemical centre, a new facility, investing about $600 million with about 700 jobs and $300 million worth of output. The President of Dow said we would not be building this unit here if it were not for free trade.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that Investment Canada, the government's own agency, came out and said this week that investment by foreign firms in this country dropped by $3.9 billion this past year.

[Translation]

My supplementary question is for the Prime Minister. His finance minister announced two months ago that the recession was definitely over. Today, statistics show that the recession is back. Will the Prime Minister change his economic policies or will he change his minister?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we do have some indication of that today, but it in no way changes the projections for fairly impressive economic growth next year and the one after. The fact is that interest rates today are at their lowest level in 14 years. For three months, the inflation rate has been at its lowest level since 1971, I am told, or in the past 20 years. These are very important indications of an impressive lasting recovery for Canada.

Instead of complaining—The hon. member just accused the Minister of Finance of being Mr. Sunshine.

[English]

Better Mr. Sunshine than Mr. Rainstorm like you.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, most people when they face a rainstorm would prefer to have an umbrella rather than a pair of sunglasses.

• (1430)

This week the government tried to divert Canadians with the so-called prosperity papers. These figures today show that the recession is still bashing people day after day.

I ask this government: When will the tricks stop? When will the treats start? When will this government start to take seriously the damage that it is imposing on people with its economic policies?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I suppose my reply to the hon. member should be he does not have a ghost of a chance.

The hon. member obviously relishes in the fact that there has been a slight drop in output in the month of August. I indicated in earlier answers that in terms of automobile sales the month of September has seen an increase by about 9 or 10 per cent. In truck sales it is about 17 per cent. Housing starts are up by 19 per cent in the third quarter over the second quarter. The merchandise trade balance has risen by $5.4 billion. There is a $17 billion trade surplus. The hon. member talks about the free trade agreement, investment shifted from a $2.5 billion outflow ion 1988 to a $4.5 billion inflow in 1990. That is what the free trade agreement is all about.

I understand in his own backyard that Chrysler Corporation is opening a third shift for the construction of a mini-van. If Chrysler sees some optimism and prosperity in the future, why doesn't a little bit of that rub off on the hon. member?

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology. The consultation exercise proposed by the government last Tuesday is merely a repeat of what has already been done by the Conseil du patronat du Québec at Rendez-vous économique 91. How can the minister justify spending $20 million to ask the public to provide solutions to the economic problems for which he is responsible?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am amazed that the hon. member overlooked the fact how important it is to involve business, the financial community and labour in developing a plan of action that will help us meet the challenges all Canadians will face in a globalized economy.

The hon. member may be appalled by the fact that the government has decided to involve all sectors in this exercise, but we are convinced it is in the best interests of Canada.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, I don't think the minister understood my question. Rendez-vous économique 91 generated 48 promising job creation projects. Fifty leaders in Quebec managed to do in three days what the minister intends to do in one year, at a cost of $20 million.

Instead of spending millions to consult the public, why doesn't the minister use the recommendations made by Rendez-vous économique 91 and start by revising his monetary policy? That was one of the recommendations.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised the hon. member didn't mention the drop in interest rates. I was in Montreal yesterday, and I was talking to the people there, and they were very keen on seeing our monetary policy work, because interest rates have now reached a level that will boost economic growth in Canada and Quebec. Instead of always talking about gloom and doom, I think the hon. member should get up and admit that our fiscal and monetary policy in this country is doing some good and that it will guarantee durable economic growth across Canada.

EDUCATION

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

In a document released this week by the government it talks about setting world-class standards in our education system. At the same time the federal government has imposed a 3 per cent tax on student loans and a 7 per cent GST on their books.

If the minister were serious about improving our education system, will he make a commitment today to remove those unfair taxes on students?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would like to know how the hon. member would answer, what she would say, if the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade and myself announced on behalf of the government that in the next 10 years we are going to invest $400 billion into education. What would she say?

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would ask them to remove those taxes.

This government has not increased student loan allowances since 1984. Tuition fees have increased dramatically because of this government's underfunding. Will the minister admit that it is impossible to achieve these educational standards that are talked about in this report if this government continues its destructive policies, making it difficult for students to afford post-secondary education?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if that is going to be the contribution of the Liberal Party to the learning challenge of Canadians, so be it.

But let me tell the hon. member and members of this House that Canada is spending at a rate only surpassed by two industrialized countries in the world. The question we have to ask ourselves is that it is not so much the money we threw at the problem the way the Liberals did; it is the results. We are slipping and Canadians are concerned and preoccupied. We should find ways of trying to keep up with the challenge.

NUCLEAR VESSELS

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. British Columbians are outraged that the cabinet considered, let alone approved, U.S. nuclear submarine rights to Dixon Entrance without first publicly assessing the risks to Canadians.

Since as recently as last month the minister's own department advised the contingency plans for a nuclear submarine accident in Dixon Entrance provide only some assurance, will the minister do what cabinet has approved for him to do, which is to respond to the public concern in British Columbia and appoint an independent panel today to review in public the risks that cabinet have been advised of to date only in private?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to clarify a point that the member brought up yesterday. He alluded to the fact that there had been a decision by the court in Kemano on which he draws a parallel for this event.

I respectfully submit that that parallel is not correct in this area. In the case of Kemano, there was an exemption of an environmental assessment review process and the court found differently. That court decision is still before the courts in appeal.

But I would also like to remind the member that the case we are dealing with now is a lot more similar to the Naskapi Montagnais case where in the case of the low-level flying in Labrador the government had proceeded by Order in Council. It had been challenged also and had gone before the courts, and the court had found that the government had proceeded correctly.

A big difference, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): My supplementary question is for the same minister, Mr. Speaker.

Yesterday the Secretary of State for External Affairs tried to leave the impression with Canadians that the U.S. nuclear submarine fleet is safe, contrary to the facts, because since 1983 the U.S. nuclear submarine fleet has suffered at least 12 groundings, 50 collisions, 113 fires, 14 on board explosions and 31 on board crew suicides.

Will the minister stop making excuses like he just did about why he has found a loophole and why he is not doing what he is supposed to do and stand up for Canada and stand up for British Columbians and do what he can do legislatively, that is to appoint an independent review panel today to look into the risks that are facing my constituents, British Columbians? Stand up for Canadians for once.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, let me add for the benefit of the hon. member that, first, an environmental assessment has been done of this Order in Council decision consistent with the policy of cabinet that was announced in June of 1990. That is something that was not done by previous governments. It is a new policy, and that is part of the announcement we made. Second, let us be completely honest about this. The fact of the matter is that the NDP is against NATO, it is against collective defence, it is against anything to do with any co-operation with other countries in the area of defence. Whether there would be an environmental assessment or not has nothing to do with the position of the member for Skeena.

TRADE

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, the minister of industry claims that he must spend over $15 million and delay economic actions for at least a year so that he can find out what Canadians already know.

Will the minister recognize that there are many areas in his prosperity primer where there is consensus where he can act today.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, there may be consensus between my hon. friend and myself as to areas in which we might want to act. I would appreciate it if he would tell us where those areas might be. I think he does think more along our ways than the member for Windsor West or the member for Winnipeg South Centre.

The only point I should make is that we have to work together more to develop the consensus between yourself and Mr. Axworthy and Mr. Gray.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, he is really scraping the bottom of the barrel there.

Two days ago, a Toronto manufacturer entered the office of the Program for Export Market Development, PEMD. He sought $1,500 to promote the sale of his product in Europe. He was told: "Sorry, PEMD is out of funds until next April".

Why does this government have over $15 million to spend flogging its prosperity primer but not even $1,500 to help one of Canada's exporters go head to head in the world market?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to get in to the internal machinations of the Liberal caucus, but I do not think he should refer to the ideas of his colleagues as being the bottom of the barrel.

An hon. member: I think he is right.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister should refer to them by their riding names.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, my friend raises a good point. The budget for PEMD, the Program for Export Market Development, is very tight. It is one indication of the very positive response of Canadians toward exporting. That is precisely what we are trying to promote in this document that I tabled on Tuesday. We will continue to work on it.

As far as the budget is concerned, we are discussing that to see whether there are ways of stretching that budget more than has been the case because of this tremendous response and the tremendous desire of Canadians to export.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour.

A year ago last summer over 2,400 miners in Elliot Lake lost their jobs when the mines shut down. Now their unemployment insurance has run out and they are facing welfare.

The minister has had a report on his desk since the end of August to provide pensions for some 260 older workers under the POWA program.

I want to ask the minister when these pensions are going to be paid? Tomorrow is November 1. These miners do not have UI benefits any more.

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the Program for Older Workers Adjustment is one where both levels of government have to authorize the payments.

We in the federal government have done that and it will be done very shortly by the government of Ontario. I am sure it is not due to any bad faith on anybody's part. It takes a little bit of time. I authorized ours recently and I am sure Mr. MacKenzie will do the same soon.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows that these workers are in a community where some 15 per cent of the work force is facing welfare this coming winter.

Would the minister be willing to meet later this week with the Ontario Minister of Labour to make an arrangement so that cheques could be sent out next month and these workers will not have to go on welfare as many others face in that community and in that district.

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I would be ready to meet with the Ontario Minister of Labour at any time he would choose.

CULTURAL IDENTITY

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Communications. Yesterday in committee the president of the CBC warned that any further government cuts would severely harm the CBC's ability to do its job reflecting Canada's cultural identity.

I would like to ask the minister whether he can tell us why he has not replied or responded to the serious funding proposals put forward to him by the CBC. I wonder if he can advise us as to when a final decision on this funding will be made and whether he could advise whether such a decision will in fact involve CBC's request for long-term and stable funding.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, we are very sensitive on this side of the need to ensure that the CBC can discharge the mandate given to it by Parliament.

Unlike members on the other side who daily get up in the House and make dire predictions for the CBC and the requirement for them to close stations and so on, that is not going to take place. The government continues to work with the CBC on the issue of long-term funding and in ensuring that the whole of the broadcasting system in Canada is well managed and is soundly financed.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question also deals with our cultural identity and is directed to the same minister. During Tuesday's committee meeting, the member for North Vancouver mused that not enough Canadians read books to justify federal assistance to the book publishing industry.

Does the minister support his colleague's opinion that federal assistance to Canada's book publishers should be discontinued? Does he agree with his colleague that Canadian publications are just not good enough? Does he not recognize that such—

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member can ask if it is government policy to do something, but I do not think it is in order to ask whether the minister agrees with something that somebody else has said.

The hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap may wish to put his question directly in an appropriate way.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my question in regard to those comments to the minister was simply this. Was the member from North Vancouver speaking for the government when he voiced those particular opinions?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member should know, the government has done a great deal in order to support the cultural industries in Canada. It is our full intention to continue to do so.

One of the things which this government did was to bring in systematic parliamentary reform in order to ensure that individual members of Parliament were able to express their personal points of view and to play an important role in the conduct of Parliament.

I might say that in doing that, our members have brought greater distinction to our party and to this Parliament than one of his colleagues did last night.

TRADE

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, the media coverage of the government's competitiveness and prosperity initiative has many Canadians confused as they witness business people, labour spokespeople, academics and special interest groups making claims and counterclaims.

My question to the Minister for Industry, Science and Technology is this. Will the minister please explain to Mr. and Mrs. Front Porch in my riding what this agenda means to them and how they can participate in it.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think the principal reason why this is important to people in his riding is because the initiative is designed to review the challenges we have in improving our competitive position and the standard of living of the people in his riding, are related to our competitive position.

• (1450)

Normally when views are sought from Canadians on matters such as this in a normal consultative process, people such as he is referring to do not have an opportunity to feed into the process, to express their views, to get into a dialogue, to discuss the problems and the challenges that we are facing. Since we are going to 175 or 185 communities across the country, people such as my hon. friend is referring to will be able to feed directly into the process and have their views heard.

SOVEREIGNTY–ASSOCIATION

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Right Hon. Prime Minister. Since yesterday, when he had his initial reaction to the excellent report by the Economic Council of Canada, I know that the Prime Minister has tried to play the bogeyman and pretend that there is no question of Canada one day having economic agreements with a sovereign Quebec. My question for the Prime Minister is: Will the 100,000 workers in Ontario who owe their jobs to the $30-billion trade that Ontario has with Quebec be unemployed to punish Quebecers the day after sovereignty is attained?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think that my friend has been overtaken by events. Important events are taking place in Quebec. He is the manager or assistant manager of the Ontario Branch of the PQ, but his big boss made an important revealing statement last night in Montreal. Mr. Parizeau said that in an independent Quebec, Quebecers who wanted to could keep their Canadian citizenship. So Mr. Parizeau is now proposing independence, but keeping the Canadian currency, an economic union with Canada and Canadian citizenship. It may be less costly for Quebecers to remain Canadians.

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question. I know that the Prime Minister will have fond memories of that great Quebec leader with whom he plotted to get elected in 1984 and 1988 and the Prime Minister cannot deny it.

Can the Prime Minister tell me whether western farmers who sell $750 million worth of beef to Quebec will say that once Quebec is sovereign, they will no longer sell their beef but eat it in the West?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know with whom I plotted in 1984, but I know that my opponent then belonged to the Liberal Party.

TRANSFERS TO THE PROVINCES

Mr. André Harvey (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board and concerns transfers to the provinces. Since 1984, when our government held program spending increases to 3.5 per cent, most provinces continued to raise theirs too rapidly. Since then, they must also adjust to economic reality, while trying at times to put the blame on the federal government, with the demagogic help of the opposition parties. To my knowledge, Mr. Speaker, the figures on transfer payments contradict these ridiculous statements and I would like to have them confirmed by the President of the Treasury Board, especially with respect to programs like equalization, Established Program Financing and the Canada Assistance Plan.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, although the government has striven since 1984–85 to reduce public spending, it has always made a point of remaining sensitive to the needs of the provinces and, as evidence of that, I would mention that since 1984–85, the principal transfers to the provinces have risen 40 per cent, or over 6 per cent a year. Established Program Financing, for example, has gone from $14.500 billion in 1984–85 to $20.368 billion this year; equalization, from $5.422 billion to $8.115 billion this year. Finally, Mr. Speaker, public services and other transfers have risen from $6 billion under the Liberals to $9 billion this year. That is steady growth.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of immigration. It was reported last week that the minister intends to further restrict family class immigration. Unlike some members on the other side, I do not treat as gospel what is reported in the media.

I ask, not a reporter but the minister himself, a novel idea: What is he planning respecting family class immigration?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, speaking of novel ideas, one thing is it is all right—

An hon. member: Family class.

Mr. Valcourt: Yes, family class is coming. One sure thing, we will not put them in refugee camps.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, if people's actions were judged by what was reported in the media, the minister might not be a minister.

Last year the previous minister delivered the annual report on October 25 and announced the five year plan with great fanfare. This year the minister will wait until the last possible minute on the last possible day to deliver his report. We are dealing with people's lives here.

Why the delay? Is the news that bad?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the news is maybe not that bad but it would be better if he stood in this House and dissociated himself openly with that report which I believe really exists.

Last year we indicated that there would be restrictions on the family class because that class had mushroomed. What we want to ensure is that the family, as we know it, is reunited in Canada. When the regulations come out the hon. member will thank us for not interning them and for making the family class eligible to come to Canada.

JUSTICE

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Last night the CBC informed us that Mr. Frank Majeau, a close friend of former minister Roch LaSalle, attempted in 1979 to receive a bribe from the McDonnell Douglas aircraft manufacturer for the awarding of a government contract. McDonnell Douglas has confirmed this fact.

When did the Prime Minister find out about this situation and did he know it when Mr. Frank Majeau was appointed as an assistant to a member of his cabinet, namely Roch LaSalle?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the matter is under review by the RCMP and the government is not in a position to comment.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Solicitor General. According to the same report, an officer of the RCMP's Montreal office accompanied Frank Majeau to St. Louis, Missouri when Mr. Majeau tried to get bribes from McDonnell Douglas for a government contract. Can the minister tell us who this agent is? Was he on duty? And especially, is he still a member of the RCMP?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as I said in English, there is an investigation. The government cannot comment.

FISHERIES

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Today the labour and employment subcommittee passed a motion recommending reinstatement of the emergency response fisheries program for fishing industry workers in B.C. The motion from the all-party committee also urged the Minister of Employment and Immigration and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to co-ordinate their efforts to ensure the earliest possible delivery of this program.

• (1500)

Has the minister decided to support reinstatement of the emergency response fishery program for B.C. fishing industry workers?

Mr. Valcourt: Mr. Speaker, I sympathize with the plight of all Canadians who work in the fishery.

I will be contacting my colleague, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, who is responsible for the management of the resource. Together we will look at the situation of the fishery in British Columbia and then decide what form of action is required.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, I think the minister recognizes that the problem was created by the government when it changed UI legislation to require more weeks of work.

On the other hand it controls the harvesting of the resource and shortened the fishing season. Really the government is responsible. I hope that the answer is positive and that the minister recognizes the importance of an early reaction and gives it soon.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the hon. member that the emergency response feature is mainly for catch failure. There has not been a catch failure in British Columbia's fisheries.

The herring roe and the salmon catch has been as high or higher than the average of the last five years.

Nowadays there is a tremendous compression of the catching as a result of the change of gear and the ability of fishermen to move around. The catch is as high as it has been but is much more compressed. That is causing structural changes which are taking place in the industry.

Mr. Speaker: I must ask the indulgence of the House for a moment. It being 3 p.m. it is my duty, pursuant to the order made earlier this day, to direct the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam to proceed to the bar of the House. I would ask for absolute order for the next few minutes.

House of Commons

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MEMBER FOR PORT MOODY—COQUITLAM

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Waddell, you stand at the bar of the House because your peers have decided that the conduct you displayed in the House on Wednesday, October 30, 1991 offended the privileges of the House of Commons of Canada.

Just before adjournment and shortly after eight o'clock p.m. you were given the floor on a point of order. After your intervention the Deputy Speaker made a ruling on your point of order and proceeded to adjourn the House in conformity with the Standing Orders whereupon you left your seat in breach of our conventions, interfered with the Sergeant-at-Arms, an officer of the House, and you physically attempted to prevent the Mace from leaving the Chamber.

The Sergeant-at-Arms is a servant of this House and acts under the authority of the Speaker. The Mace is the symbol which embodies not only the authority of the House but its privileges as well.

The special privileges that members of the House of Commons enjoy are part of the constitutional law of Canada. Freedom of speech is one of the most revered of these privileges. However, with that privilege comes the responsibility to use it wisely and for the good of Canada.

It is not a licence to say whatever one wishes under all circumstances, or permission to disregard the rules of the House or the common practices of civility.

There is little doubt that the incident of last evening is one which all members regret. In your statement to the House earlier you expressed your personal regret and apologized to the House.

Nevertheless because of the seriousness of your action the House has chosen to agree to the motion directing me to reprimand you. You have been duly elected a member of this House. It is incumbent upon you to represent your constituents and to fulfil your duties and obligations as a member. In honouring those onerous obligations it is essential that you always respect this institution and its rules and practices.

The House of Commons can only function when its dignity is upheld by all members and its rules followed. That you disregarded the rules and practices of this place and the authority of the Speaker is a matter of grave concern to this House and to all who cherish and respect this institution.

As Speaker of the House, and upon its instructions, I therefore reprimand you as guilty of a breach of privilege and of a gross contempt of the House.

The hon. member may retake his seat.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, may we have an outline of the business for the next week?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): It is my intention tomorrow to call Bill C-22, the bankruptcy legislation, for completion at second reading.

Hopefully we will have completed Bill C-12 this afternoon but if that is not the case, we will proceed with C-12 tomorrow.

On Monday it is my intention to call Bill C-36, dealing with the conditional release of prisoners, to begin and hopefully complete its second reading stage.

On Tuesday and Wednesday of next week it is my intention to call for report stage and hopefully completion of report stage and commencement of third reading of Bill C-17, dealing with firearms.

On Thursday, November 7 it is my intention to call Bill C-31, the Extradition Act, the act to make our extradition procedures more efficient, and to complete third reading on Bill C-17 at that time should it be necessary. I will have the usual consultations with House leaders with respect to Friday of next week.

PRIVILEGE

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege arises from Question Period. When you have the opportunity to review the "blues" from the first answer of the hon. Minister of the Environment, I believe that you will find that there is in fact a prima facie case not of debate but of the minister presenting information contrary to the facts. That might be described as an intention to mislead the House.

The reason that I say that is there is a memorandum from the Director General of Operations of the Federal Environment Assessment Review Program office to the minister which has two sentences completely contrary to the facts that the Minister of the Environment placed before the House during Question Period. I quote them: "If approval is sought from the Governor in Council it will be seen as an effort to bypass the EARP, it could lead to a legal challenge similar to that mounted against the exemption order for the Kemano completion project in British Columbia. Given that a Governor in Council decision is soon going to be announced regarding the transit of nuclear submarines through Dixon Entrance, the issuance of another Order in Council for a similar activity on the west coast could draw undue attention to the use of this technique to avoid the application of the EARP".

That was provided to the minister. It is now a public document. Mr. Speaker, I believe that you will see that there is a prima facie case that what the minister said about the Kemano court ruling of May 14, 1991 is not sustained by the facts.

QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, this point also deals with Question Period.

I think one of my privileges should be to ask a question. In 45 minutes we on this side of the House were only permitted two questions, and as well the procedure is that we cannot even ask a supplementary. Surely it is not asking too much of the Speaker to allow this side to ask at least three questions.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, to facilitate his particular objective perhaps the hon. member could have conversations with the government House leader and the parliamentary secretary and then the matter could be raised at a House leaders' meeting and we could extend, for the benefit of all and with the consent of all, the length of Question Period to accommodate the hon. member.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, with regard to my hon. friend's intervention I would like to join many others in suggesting that there are many questions that ought to be put to the government. A way to maximize the number of parliamentarians with access to Question Period would be to extend it for half an hour each day.

I would like to go on record and join my colleague from the Official Opposition and say that we would enthusiastically join with the Official Opposition in supporting this proposal to make this place more democratic.

Mr. Attewell: Mr. Speaker, my question had the greatest urgency. It needs to be answered by tomorrow. It concerns 400 refugees in New Delhi. I wanted to ask the minister an urgent question about that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please.

It is not the first time that question has been raised in this House.

[Translation]

We have a House Management Committee, and if the hon. member wishes to make representations, I am sure that both sides of the House would be very interested in improving the Standing Orders, if necessary.

[English]

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I would like to hear from you when you might come back before the House regarding the privilege I have raised. I believe it is a prima facie case. I am prepared to move the necessary motion to refer it to committee but I would certainly appreciate learning when you will come back from reviewing the "blues" and determining what the minister said and what the facts really are.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Chair will take the question raised several minutes ago under advisement, and if there is a genuine question of privilege, the Chair will announce its decision as soon as possible. Thank you for your co-operation.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-12, an act to amend the Young Offenders Act and the Criminal Code, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative; and the motion of Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre) (p.); and the motion of Mr. Waddell (p.).

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, I believe we voted on 4A just before one o'clock. The clerk is shaking his head. You are quite right, one member did indicate that he wanted to say a few words about it. I do not see him in the House right now.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There has been no vote yet on motions Nos. 4A and 7. Resuming debate.

[English]

Resuming debate on motions nos. 4A and 7.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I want to make some comments regarding these particular amendments. Perhaps I can use this as an opportunity to ask members of Parliament, as we debate this important piece of legislation, from time to time to cast their minds back to the reason for these discussions.

We are trying to find ways and means to make the Young Offenders Act more appropriate.

While we must do this some time or another, we have to spend time in this House asking why these young people are getting into trouble in the first place. We are dealing with the situation after the fact. Of course we have to do that. However, at some time we have to make a much greater effort to ask ourselves if there are initiatives we could take as Parliamentarians and new policies that we could urge the government to take that would result in fewer young people getting into difficulty with the law in the first place.

All too often we spend time discussing situations after they happen. How do we assist a business after it is nearing the stage of bankruptcy? How do we assist a region after it is in a state of economic decay?

Once again this provides us with a reminder that while this must be done—important interventions by various members have already been made today—let us provide an opportunity to identify ways and means to initiate policies and legislation to encourage young people to not participate in illegal activities and get into trouble so that they may have a more fulfilling life that makes sense to them and contribute to society as positive citizens rather than being waylayed by behaviour that is unacceptable.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, I just want to make a brief intervention with respect to the Young Offenders Act and some of the things we have been dealing with, not only with the amendments themselves but the over-all act.

The incarceration clauses and some of what has come before us show that there is a movement in my riding of Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt and throughout much of the country to examine the problem of youthful offenders, to examine in what situations they should be incarcerated, the rehabilitation provisions and how to best work with young people who have been misguided.

In doing that I think we have examine not just the severity of the offence. As the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam has pointed out it is so easy to raise children into adult court, with all that comes with that such as the incarceration, the conviction and the time limits. That is a major problem. People are saying: "If there is the crime, the punishment must be suited to the crime".

There is another perspective on this, and I think the member alluded to it in his earlier talk on the incarceration provisions, that perhaps we should be looking at the Young Offenders Act and punishing young offenders as youths and making the punishment more fitting within the Young Offenders Act to the crime. This should be done because of the circumstances of for example a 16 or 17 year old child who may well know the ramifications of his or her actions entering into a crime but still being young, foolish and impressionable, not looking at the end result of what is going to occur to them with respect to robbery with violence, 10 years imprisonment; second degree murder, 25 years with a minimum 10 years without ability to be paroled, or first degree murder provisions being life imprisonment with a minimum of 25 years.

This is pretty serious stuff when we are looking at a 16 or 17 year old. Yet I cannot disagree certainly with many of my constituents and many others who say the punishment must be more fitting to the crime. I think perhaps this is the area that we should be looking at, the provision of strengthening within the Young Offenders Act the penalty provisions.

Those are the words that I would like to say at this juncture.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to agree with these government amendments. The amendment was very much like my amendment. I also want to tell my mother I still have my head on here so that I can speak.

Anyway, the amendment 4A is very much like the amendment I proposed and I am pleased that the government has really looked into this in some depth and that the government has moved on this. I congratulate the parliamentary secretary. It may have helped that the Prime Minister went to New York and chaired a committee of the United Nations and ran smack into the middle of some United Nations rules on this very subject. As a matter of fact, those rules I speak about are the United Nations standard minimum rules for the administration of juvenile justice and at the United Nations Convention of the Rights of a Child, of which Canada, and I congratulate the government again on this, was one of the leading advocates, promised to ratify this by the end of this year.

I just want to quote from the brief of the Canadian Bar Association to our committee. The Bar Association said:

> Detention of young offenders in adult institutions appears to violate the new United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child, which Canada proposes to ratify in the near future.

Article 37 of the convention contains the following provision:

(c) Every child deprived of liberty shall be treated with humanity and respect for the inherent dignity of the human person in a manner which takes into account the needs of persons of his or her age. In particular, every child deprived of liberty shall be separated from adults unless it is considered in the child's best interest not to do so.

I quote again from the United Nations rules from the so-called Beijing rules, rule 13.4:

Juveniles under detention pending trial shall be kept separate from adults and shall be detained in a separate institution or in a separate part of an institution also holding adults.

And more broadly, rule 26.3:

Juveniles in institutions shall be kept separate from adults, shall be detained in a separate institution or in a separate part of the institution also holding adults.

The hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca spoke earlier in the debate some months ago when we were debating the Young Offenders Act. He had experience not only as being a premier of a province but as a social worker and a court worker, and so on, and many of my colleagues have this. What all the probation officers and court workers will tell you is that if you take a 16 year old kid and you put him or her into an adult jail and literally, if I can be so crude, they end up getting raped and getting assaulted within days, sometimes within minutes, you will never after that experience really change that person properly.

I congratulate the government.

I am glad the Prime Minister and his government saw the light of their own speeches in the United Nations if I might say. Nevertheless, it is done and I would be pleased to now end the debate on this and to support that amendment.

I understand if this amendment goes, there is no necessity for my own amendment on this matter and I would accept that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt motion No. 4A?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion No. 4A agreed to.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): And by the same token, motion No. 7 is also carried, if I am not mistaken.

[English]

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that be withdrawn because it would be redundant. We would not pass both of them.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): You are right. Thank you.

[Translation]

The House will therefore proceed to consideration of motions Nos. 8 and 9, which have been grouped together for debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The debate is on motion No. 8 and motion No. 9.

Mr. MacLellan: Mr. Speaker, as you have stated correctly, I sponsored motion No. 9 which is quite similar to motion No. 8 presented by my friend, the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam.

I will speak to my motion, motion No. 9, because I feel that is the motion that best reflects the concerns of this party. The concern is that this bill just does not do anything to correct the problem of youth crime in this country.

As I stated earlier, with respect to the offender, the offender under this act is not getting rehabilitation, counselling, training, except when the young offender is waiting for the disposition of the question of whether he or she will be in youth court or adult court.

The young offender is going to be housed quite likely, particularly if there is sentence from an adult court, in an adult institution and subject to sexual and physical abuse by senior inmates of that institution, and will be subject to learn more about the criminal how-to-do than really that person should be learning.

We are not helping the situation. We are not looking at the individual. That individual is going to come back and is going to be subject again to the temptations of crime.

• (1530)

With the additional knowledge, I think we are likely to see a rise in the rate of recidivism in most of these situations in which that person will wind up breaking the law again and going back into the institutions.

That is one concern this bill totally fails to address. The other question is: Is it protecting society? Is it protecting individual Canadians? Right now there are a tremendous number of complaints about the Young Offenders Act. I remember when we had this bill, which was then named Bill C-58 before we entered into a new session and it was renumbered Bill C-12. This goes back to December. So the government has had a long time, nine months, of complete inactivity on this bill to bring it up to date, but has chosen to do nothing except bring forward motion 4A which protected its political neck with respect to the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child.

We had a witness, Mr. Maurice Rose, whose son was killed by a young offender on public transportation in the city of Montreal. He had applied to see the minister. The minister would not see him. He presented his case before the committee and he has circulated a petition throughout this country. He has on that petition now 800,000 signatures of people of Canada as to the inadequacy of the Young Offenders Act to deal with the problems of youth crime in our country today, particularly in the urban areas.

This has to be addressed. Certainly we want rehabilitation. We want counselling and we want training for the offenders. We want assurances that the public is going to be protected. What our party is recommending is that the length of the sentences be increased to allow for parole, to allow for an adequate period of time for counsellors to deal with the problems of these young offenders so that they will be able to receive help and so they will not come back in to society more bewildered, more apprehensive and more bitter than before they went into our institutions. Hopefully then they will not again be recidivist statistics, they will not be committing further crimes and coming back into these institutions.

We need these additional periods of time, first of all so that the young people realize that these crimes they are committing are not jokes. These are not childish pranks they are doing. They must know that they cannot thumb their nose at authorities, particularly law enforcement authorities. There will be the period of time, even taking into consideration parole, for these young people to receive the instruction and the counselling and the rehabilitation that they need.

It is absolutely vital that this period of time be increased. It is a question of doing the job in this case. It is a question of whether this act is going to be relevant or whether it is not going to be relevant. Unless we have adequate periods of incarceration, this act is not going to be relevant.

What we are seeing now, and the most diabolical and most frightening aspect of youth crime, is that it is now a front for organized crime. Organized crime members are intentionally using young people under the age of 18 because they know they are not going to receive a long sentence if they are caught, and that if they are caught and receive a sentence, their parole possibilities are tremendous so that they will be out on the street in just a few months.

This has got to be stopped. We have to stop organized crime members from using our young people for their own insidious and damaging purposes as far as our society is concerned. Unless we are going to be realistic about the terms of incarceration, organized crime is going to continue to take advantage of our youth and our society as a whole.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak on this amendment of my friend from Cape Breton and on my own amendment which is grouped with this. Let me just set the context for the House and for the Chair.

What the government is doing is making it easier to transfer people to the adult court. It is making some changes in the bill that we have agreed on in terms of where people are incarcerated and in terms of probation and so on. The big difference between the opposition and the government is that the opposition is saying:

"Treat children as children and keep them in the juvenile system".

As my friend from Cape Breton said, people are going to say: "That is fine, but the sentences are too light". We are saying: "You're right, so let's make the sentences tougher in the juvenile system". There is the difference. We want to keep the children in the juvenile system, not in the adult jails which are schools for criminals for these young people. We should simply deal with them in the juvenile system, but hit them in the juvenile system. When we have these offences, the young people should have to pay the penalty. I differ from my friend from Cape Breton who spoke last. I adopt a different sentencing procedure from his. I think his is excessively harsh, if I might say. I think this one would be preferable. I call it the three, five, seven option. As I said, we do recognize that they should be held accountable for their actions. Three years, in the case of some offences like murder and so on, may sometimes be insufficient for treatment. Some crimes require a strong response and the public believes three years to be an inadequate response to certain crimes. It is in the community's interest to ensure the best available treatment to youths. Young offenders will still have the benefit of the Young Offenders Act special presentations.

My amendment introduces a sentence which could be, for some crimes, three years and for others five years and for others seven years. But all within the juvenile system.

Overly long incarceration makes institutionalized young people, and we think it works against community integration, against the community's interest in the long run. That was told to us at the committee by the Canadian Foundation for Children, Youth and the Law. I draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the legislative committee on what was then Bill C-58 and now is Bill C-12, page 4:7 in the committee proceedings.

The second reason is that we recognize the need for a strong response, but we must place it in the context of a need for vigorous emphasis on eradicating the roots of criminal behaviour. Child abuse, poverty and learning disabilities are the things to attack. Those are the areas where we can really stop juvenile crime.

As the member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys said, when we have adults using juveniles to commit crime, then we have got to punish those juveniles, and harshly, but within the juvenile system.

The third reason is that seven years as opposed to a 10 year maximum proposed by my friend is already a very long time for a young offender. As the Criminal Lawyers Association and the Ontario Social Development Council pointed out, it represents half the life of a 14 year old, which is the threshold age at which a youth may be transferred to adult court. If you transfer them at 14 and give them 10 years, they will be spending half their life in jail.

In the adult court system, seven years is the first date for parole consideration in a case where an adult is serving a life sentence. Moreover, seven years in the youth court system is seven years to the day. There are no earned remissions. Seven years means seven years, unlike the adult system.

Finally, psychiatrists working in the field of youth justice say that five to seven years is sufficient framework to treat the most serious cases which come into the young offender system. If you do not get them then in that five to seven years, you will never get them.

Let me sum up by saying that I see what the member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys is trying to do. We are on the same side. My amendments I think follow a little more on what the witnesses were saying at committee and it is a little less harsh. In any case, I would be prepared to accept either one. I think that has to be put in there, as opposed to the government system, which is just to put them in the adult system. I think that creates more criminals. Let us hit them hard while they are still juveniles.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words about both these amendments.

With respect to the hon. member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys, I am not quite sure from which direction he is coming on this. He talked at one point about the necessity of increasing the penalties. He talked about the problem of organized crime. He made comments to the effect that people involved with organized crime know how young people will be dealt with in the youth system.

I am not quite sure what the upshot is of all his comments.

I think a few things should be very clear about the amendments from both the New Democrats and the Liberal Party, very clear in relationship to this and where they have been coming from on all these motions.

The first point I would like to make is that the Liberal Party member does not want any transfer available to ordinary courts. He is nodding his head and so I have that right. There would be no transfer. A completely separate juvenile justice system is what he is calling for.

He would probably remember the controversy surrounding the implementation of the Young Offenders Act. There would be overwhelming pressure from a lot of Canadians who would be quite concerned about the fact that there was no longer available a transfer to ordinary court, that 16 and 17 year olds who may commit very serious crimes will remain in the youth system. I can tell him that there would be considerable pressure from across this country to lower the age back to what it was under the Juvenile Delinquents Act.

As far as I know it was his party, as well as other political parties here, which were in favour of raising the age. I can tell them there would be considerable pressure to move that down if we abolish the transfer.

At the same time he indicates that he wants tougher penalties. I think anybody listening carefully to this debate would get confused and believe that somehow if we adopted the Liberal amendment that we in fact might have people liable for longer sentences.

Mr. Horner: Or the NDP amendment.

Mr. Nicholson: Or if we adopted the NDP amendment. They talk about young people paying the penalty, then they want something considerably less than what the government is proposing.

I should say that in terms of protection of the public and the incarceration provisions, I do not think they are at odds with the rehabilitation of the young person. I think the protection of the public and the rehabilitation of the young person go hand in hand. The protection of society involves making sure these individuals are not repeating their crime.

Getting back to this whole level of increased penalties, I thought I heard the member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys say that that is not the case. Under the law that the government is proposing, there is a transfer provision. Let us take the most serious case, that of murder. It is the one that gets a lot of publicity. It is the one that offends the most people, I would guess, those who write to members of Parliament.

When they talk about the Young Offenders Act they are often talking about individuals, a 17 year old for instance, who commits murder. Under the Liberal system the penalties would be increased in youth court to a maximum of 10 years and a maximum custodial sentence of seven years. That is their increased penalties.

The bill itself says that if that individual under the new transfer provisions is transferred to ordinary court, he or she is liable to life imprisonment. I find it difficult to reconcile talk that I have heard about the NDP wanting to get tough with the youth crime and the Liberals wanting to increase penalties. I cannot reconcile their amendments with what the bill actually says. The bill says that an individual transferred to ordinary court who has committed first degree, premeditated murder, is liable for life. That is what the bill says.

I would suggest to hon. members of this House that this is in line with provincial attorneys general, police officers, people who work with individuals in this area and the great Canadian public. This is what they are saying. They think something like this is reasonable.

One of the things that is an improvement is that the parole provisions have been changed. They are five and 10 years under the government's bill. There is a possibility of parole, but nonetheless for that most serious of all crimes in society, the maximum penalty under this bill is life. I would suggest that there is a little more to the story than what hon. members in the opposition are saying, that somehow we are increasing penalties when in fact the maximum penalty for the most serious crime in society is considerably less than in the existing bill.

The upshot of both of these motions is to kill the thrust of the government's bill which was to clarify the transfer provisions. These say basically that we are to try to reconcile and co-ordinate the interests of the young person with the protection of society. However we make it clear in this bill where that cannot be done, where the protection of the public is paramount.

Both opposition parties do not want to see that in there. I can say that that position is at odds with what Canadians want and what Canadians have been telling us about the Young Offenders Act. I hope that this House has the good sense to turn down both these motions.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I think that as we take a look at this legislation and the very progressive amendments which have been put forward by the opposition parties, we realize that what is at issue here is not the goal, but the methodology. Quite frankly, the government's methodology is to take young people and transfer them into the adult system and let them be treated by the adult system.

I listened to the parliamentary secretary who made the point about somebody who commits a premeditated murder. He doesn't get the same penalties under the young offenders legislation, but if he goes into the adult system he would get a life sentence. This could be anywhere from 20 to 25 years, if you wish. You are taking somebody who is 15, 16 or 17, and then putting them back out on the street after 20 years. What you have then is a 35 year old person who has been abused by the system for 20 years and he or she is probably going to recommit.

I think what we are saying is that we want to try to find a different method. We feel that the basic approach is one of keeping youth out of the adult system. In that system, you are in effect saying that there is a failure. We are abrogating our responsibilities by putting them in the adult system and leaving them for the maximum period of time that we can get.

We realize on this side that there is a problem. I just have to quote the recent statistics that were in the media. Violence by youths rose by 34 per cent over four years:

> The number of youths in court charged with violent crimes has increased a staggering 34 per cent in the past four years, Statistics Canada reports.
> The figures released yesterday show that violence-related cases among youths aged 12 to 17, including homicides, robberies and sexual assaults, are up from 1986-87, when statistics were first collected.

It went on to point out that the report showed that more than 60,000 youth court cases were heard in Canada in 1990-91. In 9,013 of these, the principle charge was of a violent offence, in most cases assault, followed by possession or use of weapons and then robbery. There is no question that we have a problem. It is in the way of trying to find the solution to that problem that we differ with the government.

What this legislation does is make it easier for youths to transfer and end up in the adult system. More than likely we are going to destroy youths by putting them in that system.

At the same time, in trying to find the right balance, we agree that there should be increases in sentences. We believe that there are problems in the legislation, that they have not worked properly and that some youths look at being caught under the youth offender situation as a joke. You can talk to police officers who will tell you that you can almost set your watch as far as break and enters are concerned. This is because there are gangs of youths who get involved in break and enters, they get a light sentence of six months or something like that in a community home and they are back on the streets causing the same problems again.

We acknowledge that is a problem and that is why we on this side have suggested keeping them in the youth system, but increasing the penalties. Let the youths realize that they are going to pay for the crimes that they commit and that payment is going to be in time, their time. At the same time we believe there has to be a commitment to rehabilitation and, for want of a better word, to treatment for these individuals. We have to structure the system so that we are trying to salvage the youth in our communities rather than sending them off to university by sending them off to prison. That to us is not effective. It will create a situation in 10, 15 or 20 years where we will have some very highly trained criminals who have spent years and years in the adult system so that they are so-called university trained criminals. They will be very good at it when they are back out on the street.

We on this side are looking for is a solution to the problem. Youth have to pay for their crimes, but at the same time when we look at the causes of youth resorting to crime we as society have an obligation to them to make sure that they are not penalized by the system and that they do receive help so that they can extricate themselves from that terrible situation of crime.

We would urge members opposite to see the wisdom of this far thinking and far-sighted amendment. They should adopt this progressive piece of legislation.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I find it quite interesting how people seem to talk about this matter with a great deal of confusion. They interchange words like "punishment", "rehabilitation" and "treatment", as if they are all the same thing. I really think we have to start looking at what our court system and our penal system do.

I used to have a professor in criminology many years ago who said that if we set out to design a penal system and a court system that would guarantee hardened criminals, we could not have done anything better than what we have done in Canada with our jails and our federal penitentiaries. We could not have done anything better to guarantee hardened, life-long criminals.

Let us not talk about transferring of juveniles and sentencing them to adult penitentiaries in the same breath that we talk about rehabilitation treatment. That is just so much malarkey. I wonder how many members in this facility have actually visited places like the old B.C. penitentiary or Kent Institution or Matsqui and have talked to inmates, particularly inmates who are young and vulnerable in that population, about what has happened to them. Did the the fact that they were raped contribute to their rehabilitation? Did the fact that they were abused by other inmates contribute to their treatment? Did the fact that they were manipulated by guards and correctional staff contribute to them becoming responsible adults?

We have to make a fundamental decision in this country. We on this side are saying that youth must be protected from the ravages of adult correctional facilities. Therefore we oppose transferring them, but we are saying that we should give the judges more options based on the ability and need to treat this person. We may not be able to provide treatment in less than three years or five years or seven years.

Who are these kids that we are talking about? There has been repeated documentation indicating that a percentage of these kids are offenders who have come from abusive homes, have been abused themselves, have failed in educational facilities, have learning disabilities and have psychiatric and emotional problems. We need time to provide treatment, but not treatment in a federal penitentiary. It should be treatment in a juvenile facility.

This is why I support my colleague's amendment which addresses periods of three, five or seven years based not only on the seriousness of the offence but on the seriousness of the youth's problems. That is a concept that somehow in all of this is being abandoned. What we are talking about is treatment and rehabilitation. That takes time. With some children their backgrounds are such that they have difficulty functioning in a community on a constructive basis.

I cannot help but comment on a remark that a lot of juveniles are being used in organized crimes because organized crime knows that they are not going to get lengthy sentences. For anybody so naive as to think that if we increase juvenile sentences organized crime is going to stop using them is nonsense.

I have worked on the streets of Vancouver where organized crime does not give a dang—I could use stronger language—about the fact that its exploiting 14 or 15 year old girls. It does not care that those youths are in danger of a long sentence of four, five or ten years. Those youth are endangering their lives from drug addiction, from being put at jeopardy with violent johns. Organized crime does not care. These kids are expendable.

If you think you are going to solve the problem of organized crime by increasing the penalties for juveniles, you must never have been involved with criminal behaviour in this country.

An hon. member: Have you ever said that?

Mr. Karpoff: The member asks: "Have you ever said that?" That was one of the arguments used for increasing the penalties, that it would stop organized crime from using youth. That argument has no bearing on it. We must have the ability to provide treatment, rehabilitation and education for youth at appropriate times and for appropriate lengths of times in youth facilities.

I commend my colleague from Port Moody—Coquitlam for his amendments. I think they are based on the concept that we must provide appropriate treatment for these youth over a longer period of time.

There has been a lot of talk about murder. Murder is always the most difficult. We assume right away that because it is murder the youth is most dangerous to society and to himself. That is not necessarily so. Murder involving juveniles amounts to one-fortieth of one per cent of youth coming before juvenile or youth court. I do not thing that we should be designing laws and transfers and penal institutions based on one-fortieth of one per cent.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to continue along the same theme as my colleague from Moncton and the member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys.

We have found in my riding in downtown Toronto, Broadview—Greenwood, as in every other region of the country, that since this first Young Offenders Act was passed youth crime has doubled. As some members have said earlier, organized crime is now using the refuge of the Young Offenders Act to promote their dealings, especially in the area of drugs. I think it is really important that the government, in its review of this act, really takes some of these amendments seriously. The ability and the understanding of youth today with regard to this Young Offenders Act are so sophisticated that we are actually shackling the hands of our police forces. They do not feel that they can really develop any kind of an honest program of rehabilitation or even crime control because the youth use the refuge of this Young Offenders Act. The youth use this refuge and the criminal element is exacerbating the situation by adding to the numbers of people involved in youth crime because of its excessive support.

• (1600)

Any sort of review or any amendment to this act that does not take that reality into consideration is really avoiding or not listening to the advice of our police forces from coast to coast. We are not listening even to the parents of a lot of these children. I am actually hearing in my riding from some of the parents. Some of them may not have the economic resources to support their children as well as they would like and as a result the children are using all means they can to make their way through society. Of course when they know they have the protection of the Young Offenders Act as it is structured right now, they are literally getting away at times with murder.

I think we have to be very dramatic in our reform of this bill. I think we have to listen and support not only our police forces but our community service agencies that are pleading with us to give them the tools to help rehabilitate those youth in our society that are using this act for their own negative purpose, which is ultimately causing a disservice to everyone in our community.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I could not help but note the good remarks of the member from Moncton. In the statistics that were cited, the 34 per cent increase for the period of time noted completely excluded the province of Ontario, Canada's largest and most populous province with its most populous urban area. Those statistics actually underestimate by a long shot the frightening increase in crime by youth and young offenders in this country.

We have to keep in mind that the purpose of this Young Offenders Act is to try our very best as a society to salvage a young life, to salvage it before it goes the way of the classic criminal life. These proposed amendments are premised on the assumption that we as a society are more likely to salvage a young life if the young offender is dealt with in the youth offender system rather than the adult system.

If we have to toughen the laws and increase the sentences, as we are going to, the thrust of these amendments is that the increased sentences to be spent by young offenders should be more appropriately spent in the young offender system rather than the penitentiary system.

Since the thrust of the government's amendments to this act is to better enable a transfer to the adult system, there is a fear on the part of the opposition and among a number of members that there will be a greater tendency or a predisposition to transfer more young offenders to the adult system and thereby lose the opportunity to salvage what is left of that life.

I wanted to point that out so that it would be on the record. There may be from time to time some apparent inconsistency as the opposition and government debate this but our position is that the young offenders ought to be given as much chance as society can possibly give them in the youth offender system.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I remind all members that an affirmative vote on motion No. 8 will obviate the need to put the question on motion No. 9.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: No.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed to the motion will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

An hon. member: On division.

Motion No. 8 negatived.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): A negative vote on Motion No. 8 will require the question to be put on Motion No. 9.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: No.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Some hon. members: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion lost on division.

Motion No. 9 negatived.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Westminster—Burnaby—Child care; the hon. member for Edmonton East—Carbon dioxide emissions; the hon. member for Nepean—World Summit for Children; the hon. member for Don Valley East—Employment; the hon. member for St. Boniface—Linguistic minorities.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam) moved:

Motion No. 10

That Bill C-12 be amended in Clause 5 by striking out lines 15 to 22 at page 7 and substituting the following therefor:

onment imposed in ordinary court, the young person shall, until attaining the age of eighteen years, serve the disposition, or any portion thereof, in a place of custody for young persons, unless it is considered in the young person's best interests not to do so, and after the young person has attained the age of eighteen years, the young person, in the discretion of the provincial director, may serve any remainder of the disposition or sentence in a place of custody for young persons until attaining the age of twenty years, or in a provincial correctional facility for adults or, where the unexpired portion of the sentence is two years or more, in a penitentiary.

He said: Mr. Speaker, we basically dealt with this in the other amendments so I ask leave to withdraw No. 10.

Motion No. 11 is a French translation, and we could discuss motions 12 and 13. I wish to speak to Motion No. 12, Mr. Speaker.

• (1610)

[English]

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I respect the point of view of my hon. friend but I understand that the motions are still before the House and I still have an opportunity to speak. I wanted to talk about the youth court.

It has been stated that we are trying to mislead—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I understand there is not unanimous consent to withdraw Motion No. 10.

Mr. Waddell: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. I did not realize that the hon. member for Cape Breton wanted to speak on No. 10 and so I will not ask—

Mr. MacLellan: I can speak on the other.

Mr. Waddell: All right. We have pretty well done Nos. 10 and No. 11. I would ask for unanimous consent to withdraw those two and I would like to proceed on No. 12.

Mr. Nicholson: I agree with the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam about the withdrawal of motion No. 10. I am not sure he would want to withdraw motion No. 11. I believe the wording suggested by him in No. 11 is better than what is now in the text of the bill. I suggest that he withdraw No. 10 if he likes but I believe No. 11 should be called by the House because the wording suggested better reflects the sense in both official languages.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I would agree with that. I gather the government is going to accept my amendment. I could use one break today anyway, so I will accept that.

Perhaps we could proceed with No. 11.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent to withdraw motion No. 10?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam) moved:

Motion No. 12

That Bill C–12 be amended in Clause 7 by striking out lines 13 to 18 at page 9.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak on this motion. The proposed section set out in this bill directs the court to take into account a number of factors in deciding whether to grant a youth conditional release from custody.

These factors include evidence of a pattern of persistent violent behaviour, psychiatric or psychological evidence of a physical or mental disorder or illness, reliable information that the young person plans to cause the death of or serious harm to another person, and whether alternative measures, treatment, and supervision are available in the community.

In my view the latter factor, whether alternative measures, treatment and supervision are available in the community, is unnecessary. It is an anomaly on the list and it should not be there and so my amendment would cut it out. The reason to me is obvious. Why should it be a factor for the young person who is being released or being tried in this matter whether there are places available in the community. There should be places available in the community. It is not for the young person to get them. It is up to the authorities to put them there.

It should not be part of judging whether a person can be released, whether there are facilities available in this case. That is the point of the amendment.

When I raised the question in committee, that requiring the court to consider whether supervision, alternative measures and treatment were available in the community could work against the youth, I think it was argued that it was a good proposal. I do not believe that the provinces spend enough to ensure the availability of such supervision, treatment and alternative measures.

That problem has been further compounded by the federal government's decision in May 1989 to freeze the federal government's financial contribution to juvenile justice programs and services for a period of five years, and that finally, directing the court to consider this factor might effectively punish the youth, as I have said, for a lack of commitment of human and financial resources exhibited by both levels of government.

What the federal government has done is made the province provide the facilities and then some poor accused kid comes before the court and it says: "We can't release you because the facilities aren't there". I do not think that is the way to go at all.

I do not think it is encouraging that this factor comes at the end of such a grim list. I do believe that it will be subject to the type of negative interpretation that I have just described. That is the gist of my amendment.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I understand the gist of the motion of the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam. I understand exactly how he feels. There is an inequity here. The problem is that there should not be this distinction that peoples in areas where we do not have availability of supervision should not be punished.

The problem is that in areas where there is the availability of supervision people incarcerated in that area may not get the advantage of the fact that that availability is there, so they may not be able to get the benefit of the doubt. It is a very difficult point. Do we go for the uniformity which I think my friend and I both would like to see in the act and feel should be in the act? Do we vote for this not to be there and deny those young offenders, who are in areas where they can take advantage of this provision and thereby be able to be on parole earlier, the right to be able to take advantage of that and to be out of incarceration that much earlier?

There is a real problem here because of the nature of the act and because of the federal-provincial involvement. This is not the only example of this. It is involved in the transfer provisions.

My learned friend, the parliamentary secretary, has mentioned some of this. He talks about the fact that we are blind to the fact that those who commit murder can get life. That is a very stiff penalty and so there are stiff penalties in this bill. I agree with my colleague from the NDP who announced that one-fortieth of one per cent of the young crimes are actually murder. That is the problem.

• (1620)

We are not dealing so much with the murders, as horrendous as they are, we are dealing with youth crime in general. The problem is that now under the Young Offenders Act the charges laid will result in very short penalties, and we feel that the penalty should be longer to give more time for treatment and training and consultation in incarceration for those young people who need this, so that when they come out they are more aware of how to live within society. That is very important, not only from the point of view of punishment and deterrents, but it is a rehabilitation. There is time needed.

We had before the standing committee witnesses who said they object to the transfer provisions because it is wrong to put these young people in adult institutions. We feel, as my colleague from Port Moody-Coquitlam has said, that you really do not need more than five years. These witnesses acknowledged the fact that there are situations in which maybe some people do need more than five years to be fully rehabilitated. While they probably did not want that in the bill, they did not object to that too much as long as the youth court would be making the sentencing and that the offenders would be in a youth facility.

The transfer provisions are very, very unfair. The province of Quebec has probably the best record of any province. Only about 20 per cent of young offenders are transferred to adult courts. In one province as much as 80 per cent of young offenders are transferred to adult court. That is because of the large native population in that province. This is discrimination. It is blatantly unfair and something has got to be done to deal with that unfairness. We cannot allow that to continue.

I think what we must get is fairness in the system. We must get equal opportunity and equal treatment across the country. We must get proper time for young people to be able to receive their rehabilitation and treatment, and we must get a fair period of incarceration so that we can have this.

It has been said that organized crime will not be influenced by the fact that the youth will get a longer period of time. In most cases organized crime cannot make the youth do anything they do not want to do. The youth are more susceptible to committing these crimes if they feel that they will not get a long period of incarceration. The longer period of incarceration may cause them to rethink exactly whether they want to become involved in that. I do agree that there is a tremendous inclination here for our young people to become involved in crime and to be subjected to the influence of organized crime and adult criminals. Hopefully this can be addressed but it is certainly not going to be addressed with this bill.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, first of all just a point of clarification to make sure we all understand. Motion no. 12 is grouped with No. 13 and I did not hear hon. members address motion no. 13.

The Speaker earlier today ruled that a group of motions would be put together, and I think it is a good way to proceed. I would like to address my comments both to motions Nos. 12 and 13. If the hon. member who proposed No. 13, the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam, would like unanimous consent to re-enter the debate and talk about motion No. 13, that would certainly be acceptable on this side.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I apologize for interrupting the member. I think motion No. 13 will be debated separately. We are on debate on Motion No. 12.

Mr. Nicholson: That is fair enough, Mr. Speaker.

I heard the Speaker this morning say they would be grouped together, but it is neither here nor there. I will confine my comments then to motion No. 12.

Motion No. 12 removes one of the considerations that would be before the court and, as the government thinks, should be before the court in determining the release of an individual who has been convicted of murder.

This section and the criteria involve the case of a young person, say a 17 year old , who has been convicted of murder but has remained in the youth court. The government has suggested that there would be a three year custodial sentence and a two year period of supervision.

I suppose I ask the public and I ask you, Mr. Speaker, and the House to see whether it is fair for a judge considering the application to release an individual who has been convicted of murder to take into consideration: "The availability of supervision programs in the community that would offer adequate protection to the public from the risk that the young person might otherwise present until the expiration of the disposition the young person is then serving".

We have heard the debate. Some would say it is unreasonable to put that section in there. I am suggesting to the House that when we are about to release an individual who has been convicted of murder, we should consider whether there would be adequate protection to the public from the risk of a young person and whether there is adequate supervision available. I think it is reasonable to put it in.

Others may disagree, and as a result I hope the House turns down the motion by the NDP to have that removed as one of the considerations that a judge has at his disposal.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I rise again to support my colleague in his amendment. I do so from the basis that what is happening here is basically an application to be released.

The government is responsible for providing adequate supervisory services. That is the government's responsibility. It is not the youth's responsibility. What you are saying is if collectively we the community and the government have not met our responsibility, we are going to punish the youth. We are going to leave them in custody.

We are not saying: "Look, if we failed to provide these resources that should be there, we are going to punish ourselves". We are saying: "We are going to put the onus on the youth". Again, let us think of who we are talking about.

These are kids who have been in difficulty. Most of them have been in difficulty all their lives. They have been incarcerated and now they get ready to be released and somebody comes along and says: "Look, I am sorry.

We decided to not provide adequate supervision so you have to stay in jail".

I particularly find this offensive in view of the record of this government. It has put a ceiling in 1989 on cost-shared programs. It has stopped providing the provinces with funds to develop these services and so its solution is: "Let's just change the law to punish the youth some more".

It is time society started taking its responsibility for these children fully, and stop putting the blame on them and not always taking the attitude: "If we fail, we will punish youth".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Motion No. 12 negatived.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): moved:

Motion No. 13

That Bill C-12 be amended in clause 7 by striking out line 23 at page 13 and substituting the following therefor:

"person has breached a"

He said: Mr. Speaker, this clause in the bill concerns the provincial director having reasonable grounds to believe that a young person has breached, and here are the words, "or is about to breach a condition of an order made under a subsection, he can do as follows".

Other sections of the bill are similarly worded. I believe that these sections should be amended. I have proposed an amendment to remove the phrase "or is about to breach" as a condition of the youth's conditional supervision. The provincial director is about to release the youth on conditional supervision.

In my view the phrase "or is about to breach" grants too much arbitrary authority to the provincial director and other law enforcement officers and runs contrary to the statement of principles in this particular bill. It specifically interferes with the affirmation that the freedom of a young person should be interfered with as little as possible. In other words, if the provincial director has reasonable grounds to believe that the young person has breached his probation then hit him, but "is about to breach his probation" is pretty wide and could be abused. That is the content of my amendment.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the "about to breach" section would cover the case of an individual who is under supervision after having been convicted of murder. Very often there would be conditions concerning the individual's release. I suppose one of the most common is that he or she would have to remain within a jurisdiction. For instance, this section would cover a case when the individual might purchase airplane tickets. Reasonable inference could then be drawn that the individual may be trying to leave the jurisdiction.

Therefore I do not think there is anything unreasonable about it at all. There is a review process. There is the caveat that there must be reasonable grounds for believing this. I do not think it is out of line.

[English]

Motion No. 17

That Bill C-12 be amended in Clause 7 by striking out lines 13 to 30 at page 15, substituting the following therefor:

"26.5, the provincial director shall forthwith cause the young person to be brought before the youth court, and the youth court shall, after affording the young person an opportunity to be heard, review the decision of the provincial director to suspend the conditional supervision and shall make an order under subsection (2)."

He said: Mr. Speaker, I might add at the outset that the reason we are not pushing for a recorded vote on some of these amendments is that the bill is so flawed that even if these amendments are approved the bill is not going to be much of a help in dealing with the problems of youth crime and urban crime. However we would like to improve the bill as much as we can, and there are some places where this bill can be improved.

I would like to deal first with Motion No. 14. It relates to page 13 and strikes out line 36, which says: "The provincial director may issue a warrant in writing authorizing the apprehension of a young person, and until the young person is apprehended the young person is deemed not to be continuing to serve the disposition the young person is then serving".

It is our feeling that this should not be the responsibility or the role of the provincial director, that this is subject to a good deal of abuse. The provincial director can very well become personally involved in a particular case and develop a particular attitude toward a young offender and may not be in a position to deal with it on an impartial basis, while a judge would be.

We are recommending that a justice may on application by the provincial director issue this right. This may seem to be a difficult and very time consuming process, but really it is not. An application can be made very easily and if the proper substantiation is given it would be granted. A matter of this importance should be the responsibility of a justice and not the provincial director.

Motion No. 15 asks for the striking out of lines 4 to 48 on page 14. The most important section of this and the one that really sets out the objection is subsection 3 starting on line 4: "Where a peace officer believes on reasonable grounds that a warrant issued under subsection (1) is in force in respect of a young person the peace officer may arrest the young person without the warrant at any place in Canada".

This is outrageous: "Where the peace officer believes on reasonable grounds". There is no reason that the peace officer cannot assure him or herself that the warrant is issued. There are computers, fax machines, all sorts of communications that police departments and police officers have linking each other that can provide this information.

My colleague, the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam, said that a prior motion gave grounds for abuse. Certainly this can give grounds for abuse. It is a subjective test. If the peace officer acted arbitrarily, and grossly arbitrarily in some cases, there is no way of disciplining this peace officer because the peace officer can say that he or she believed.

It is so open-ended and such a big loophole open to abuse that I think it should be corrected.

• (1640)

I would ask the government to do so.

The next one is with regard to clause 16, on page 15, striking out line 7 at page 15 and substituting the following therefor: "forthwith after being informed of the arrest of a young person, the provincial director may review the case and within 48 hours' cancel the suspension of the conditional supervision".

I would suggest that the 48 hours is not sufficient because it says: "the provincial director shall review the case". That is the first portion of that. The second one is: "within 48 hours".

How long is it going to take the provincial director to review the case? How long would it normally be necessary to review a case? The section states: "48 hours after reviewing the case". I think that again leaves a reason for abuse so we are saying: "48 hours after the remand to custody or after becoming informed of the arrest, as the case may be" to cancel the suspension of the right. I think it puts much more of a burden on the authorities to deal with this expeditiously and not, once again, to give grounds for abuse which can occur.

With respect to Motion No. 17 it says striking out lines 13 to 30 on page 15. I just want to read a portion of it: "Where the case of a young person is referred to the youth court under section 26.(5), the provincial director shall, as soon as practicable".

"As soon as practicable" is not very good wording. It is not even good legal wording. I just do not think there would be any way of predicting what "as soon as practicable" would mean. I think it once again opens lots of opportunity for abuse, once again at the expense of the offender, once again at the proper disposition of justice in this country.

We are saying that term should be replaced and should read: "the provincial director shall forthwith cause the young person to be brought before the youth court" to tighten this up and to make this system, if this bill passes, which we hope it will not, at least in some moderate ways more efficient and more realistic to the needs of the young people and the needs of society. We hope these motions are successful.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, we are dealing with Motions Nos. 14 through 17. Beginning with Motion No. 14, the hon. member from Cape Breton—The Sydneys is suggesting an extra process should be involved with the issuance of warrants.

The people we are referring to are those people I referred to earlier who have been convicted of murder and they are in the two-year supervision portion of their sentence. The section refers to an instance in which if a provincial director believes a breach has occurred of the conditions upon which this individual is free he may issue a warrant.

The member from the Liberal Party has suggested there should be a two-step process and that therefore you should apply to a justice. I agree with him that society moves very quickly, that there are fax machines and so on, but my comments on this are the same as I will make on the next one. There may not be time. There may not be time to have a number of applications for an individual whom the provincial director believes has breached the privilege to be free. I do not think it is necessary to have an extra step. It is judicially reviewable and I think the House should turn down that motion.

Likewise with Motion No. 15 which says that where a peace officer believes on reasonable grounds that a warrant issued under subsection (1) is enforced he or she may arrest that young person with a warrant in any place in Canada.

In a perfect world when somebody who is out free after having been convicted of murder and a police officer believes there is a warrant out for that individual's arrest we would want to give them every benefit of the doubt because they may not be the person. However time is of the essence in most of these cases. Again, these are subject to judicial review. I might add that these provisions parallel those in the Parole Act as well. They are consistent with other provisions of the Criminal Code.

Quite honestly I am not sure what clarification Motion No. 16 adds. I think the section is pretty straightforward, and I will not read it again. I do not see what value there would be in accepting the recommendation.

Under Motion No. 17 the individual is brought "as soon as practicable" before the court, or the individual is brought forthwith to the court. I do not think, as does the hon. member, that the former wording leaves a huge hole for abuse. As well I note that he also removes the burden of proof from the individual who appears before the court. I think that goes far beyond just tightening up the language.

I do not see any particular improvement in the last two amendments. As for the first two I have serious concerns about adding any extra process in a case where somebody reasonably believes that someone has breached the conditions under which they have been released for murder.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On a point of order, the hon. member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): In light of the motions that have been defeated prior to this I do not feel that motion No. 26 will really add anything and I am prepared to withdraw it.

• (1650)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent for withdrawing motion No. 26?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion No. 26 withdrawn.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I will speak to these amendments together. They would delete certain clauses of the bill. Those clauses were designed to amend the parole provisions of the Criminal Code in order to relax parole ineligibility periods for young offenders convicted in ordinary court of first and secondary murder.

Our basic position was and still is that we would like to deal with juveniles as juveniles. We want to deal with them in juvenile court. If we send them to adult court they are going to be adult criminals.

That means facilities. The provinces have to provide the facilities and the federal government has to help them with some money. It means also, as my friend from Cape Breton—The Sydneys put it very well today, that we are not being tough on them. We are gong to hit them hard but we are going to hit them as juveniles.

Finally we are going to attack the whole notion of why there is crime by juveniles. It is because of poverty, child abuse, literacy and other factors, with the difficulties they present.

That is the way to approach juvenile crime. We should not be blown away. The Toronto Sun and the Sun newspaper chain had a big story. It continued every day, as one witness told us. It was featuring, featuring and featuring the fact that someone got three years for murder in Scarborough.

The person got three years for murder because it was a mistake. Neither the Crown counsel or the defence counsel asked that the person be transferred to adult court because they thought the person was going to be declared insane and therefore be locked up for even longer, perhaps for life. That did not happen so the person got three years. It was wrong, but it does not mean that the whole act is wrong.

People did not focus on that. The judges have a terrible choice. On a murder case the choice is either three years or 25 years. We have tried to make some changes so they would not have to face that choice.

If transfers are not abolished then relaxation of parole ineligibility seems to me to be the next best option.

Let us deal with a youth as a youth. Let us have the facilities and let us try to eliminate the causes.

I have to be careful of the rules of this House. I am not supposed to comment on how many people are in the House. Let me put it this way. It is not exactly overflowing.

The fact is that Canadian people are really interested in young offenders. I just want to conclude by saying that these are the last of my motions. I am particularly pleased that the parliamentary secretary has been amenable to a couple of amendments. I wish he would accept another couple of these. Perhaps he might consider them.

I am especially pleased with the co-operation of the member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys who was solid as usual. Mr. Speaker, I thank you for listening to me, at least today.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, I just want to take a few minutes to enter into this debate for a number of reasons. First, I would like to pay tribute to the work the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam has put into this bill over the years.

This bill has been around a long time. In addition to his many other duties he has done an excellent job of helping to focus the debate in this country on the real issues involved in this Young Offenders Act.

Second, I would also like to recognize that in my own community of Prince Albert this is a very lively issue. It is an issue that was debated from many different sides because Prince Albert is a community that has a number of correctional facilities, including a federal penitentiary, provincial jail, a women's jail, and other facilities.

As well it has a school of human justice run by the Gabriel Dumont Institute, a native institution that is trying to grapple with the emerging justice issues in the native communities. Many of these issues are very hotly debated within our own community and I want to pay tribute to the contribution people in my own community have made to this debate.

A number of points that have been made here do deserve underlining. A number of points have been eloquently made by other members. Certainly principal among them is the need to get at the causes of crime. Dealing only with the consequences and the correctional aspect of crime, with what happens after a crime has been committed does not solve the problem at all.

The problems of abuse, poverty, illiteracy, and hopelessness—youth seeing no future for themselves—are endemic in many communities and certainly in my own.

I would feel much better about this kind of legislation if I saw a concurrent commitment to deal with the causes that lead young people to be in trouble with the law in the first place.

I do not see that kind of commitment to deal with the causes of crime. Therefore I am somewhat sceptical about the underlying philosophy which is driving this whole process forward.

Second, I am somewhat disturbed and certainly disappointed that this whole process has not taken into account the whole question of the emergence of a distinctive aboriginal view on justice matters. Many of the young offenders in this country are of aboriginal ancestry. Certainly in the province of Saskatchewan, my own province, too high a majority of the young offenders are of aboriginal ancestry.

This legislation does not recognize that there may well be an unique situation within our country that might call for unique responses. Looking at what is happening elsewhere in the country, the Manitoba justice inquiry and inquiries under way in my own province of Saskatchewan and in Nova Scotia, I think that we are all becoming aware that there is an emerging recognition in this country that we need to evolve an approach to justice issues unique to the aboriginal community. That would serve not only the aboriginal community but the whole community by ensuring that the aboriginal people in our communities are in a position where they feel that the justice system works as well for them as for everybody else.

Last, in keeping with that I would like to pay tribute to people in our community who are preparing a proposal to establish a healing lodge for aboriginal women prisoners who will be sentenced to our community when the Kingston penitentiary for women is closed. I think the process being undertaken by that particular group is one to which all of us should pay attention. This group of people is concerned about justice issues, corrections, and the security and future peace and order of our communities but are using a healing approach.

I do not see any recognition of the need for healing in this legislation before us. I see legislation that in many ways deals with justice issues from a punishment point of view and not from a healing point of view. That is the approach that we need to take in our country and I just wanted to put that on the record. I think that is the direction we need to go in the future, not the direction that is incorporated in this bill.

HEALTH

FAMILY PLANNING

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of taking action to reduce the numbers of unwanted pregnancies in our society by reinstating a Family Planning Division at Health and Welfare Canada; reinstating funding to the Planned Parenthood Federation of Canada at its previously adequate levels; establishing new programs to combat sexually transmitted diseases and unwanted pregnancies; establishing a national clearinghouse on family planning; and increasing funding for research on safe and effective methods of birth control.

She said: Mr. Speaker, I could quote a lot or statistics to you, and I will later, but first I want to make it clear in very human terms what we are discussing here today.

A young woman walked into a clinic recently to get the results of her pregnancy test. Her period was late but she had always used birth control and she did not seriously think that she could be pregnant, but the test results were positive. She sat in that clinic and cried for 20 minutes. She had to decide whether she should quit school and go on welfare to raise a child, whether she should have an abortion or whether she should go through nine months of physical discomfort and emotional bonding and then give her baby up for adoption. The father was also young and unemployed.

There are consequences for all of society on each of these decisions. They all involve a great deal of spending on health care, on social service agencies and social assistance. They embroil our society in emotional debates and all of it is preventable.

One in six Canadian teenagers will experience these decisions because they were not educated thoroughly enough about family planning or did not have access to safe and effective contraception. They think that condoms are foolproof. They do not know that condoms fail 12 per cent of the time. One in 10 times that a couple uses a condom it will fail if it is not used in conjunction with spermicidal foam.

Many people from teens to seniors do not know that. Even with spermicide, condoms are not a 100 per cent effective form of birth control.

A McMaster University study which was released just today has clearly shown a link between family planning programs and a reduction in teenage pregnancies. Sheltering teens from information about birth control and sexuality simply results in unwanted pregnancies, fear, guilt, shame, abortion or single parenthood spent in poverty.

The study in question was a comprehensive research project on teen pregnancies, abortion and family planning. It was conducted in Ontario over a 10-year period.

The report begins with two sentences. The first is: "It cannot happen to me". That is what teenagers and even some adults think. The other is the institutional response: "We do not have that problem in our school, in our group". The study concluded that the substantive decline in adolescent pregnancy in Ontario paralleled the growth of preventive programs.

In Ontario, public health units have been offered 100 per cent funding to provide comprehensive family planning. Not every one lives in Ontario. Access to family planning is uneven across this country and is especially uneven in schools. Fifty per cent of Canadian schools have no family program planning of information, although a poll showed that 83 per cent of Canadians feel family planning should be a part of school programs, 83 per cent.

Some people believe we should rely on parents to impart family planning knowledge to their children. In many cases, parents themselves do not have enough information to guide their children.

A large percentage of Canadian adults are ignorant about family planning issues. Parents do not always feel comfortable about discussing these issues with their children and some parents are morally opposed to telling their children about birth control.

Although I have focused my comments on unwanted teen pregnancy, I am hoping for education and action that is aimed at adults as well as adolescents. A Gallup poll also found that 46 per cent of Canadians felt they had too little access to contraception and family planning services. That is rather bizarre in an industrialized country like Canada.

Some people assume that everything is okay, because Canada has a low fertility rate. There are over 66,000 abortions performed in Canada every year and much of that pain, the agonizing of that decision, is preventable with proper access to contraceptives and family planning education.

It is well known in this House that I believe strongly in a woman's right to choose. That right to choose must include accurate and accessible family planning education. No one wants to face an unplanned or an unwanted pregnancy and have to make that decision about whether to have an abortion.

One of the few sources of family planning education is Birthright. It draws in young women with a promise of a free pregnancy test and confidential counselling. Once that young woman is drawn in, she is inundated with anti-abortion propaganda. We cannot let this stand as one of the few sources of information for women. Not giving people information about reproductive health leads not to abstinence, but to unwanted pregnancy and to abortion.

Catholic girls and women have the highest abortion rate of any identifiable religious group in our society. Everyone is entitled to accurate information about their own bodies. Lying to people, misleading people or blocking their access to information is really what is immoral. It was only in 1969 that the dissemination of birth control information became legal in Canada and perhaps this is one of the reasons that Canada lags so far behind in this area.

Many of us have grown up in silence about these matters and some feel that everybody today already has adequate information about contraception.

A study from the Health Science Centre in Winnipeg indicated that the pregnancy rate for adolescent girls in Canada is five times the rate in the Netherlands and three to four times higher than in Scandinavian countries where contraceptive information is school-based and readily available to the public.

• (1710)

Twenty-six per cent of Canadian grade nines and over half of Canadian grade eleven students do have sexual intercourse, that is the reality.

A 1988 study found that the majority do not use contraception on a regular basis. They believe again that it cannot happen to them. Over 66,000 abortions are performed in Canada every year. Most of these are preventable with knowledge and access to family planning information.

Our children learn information about sexuality from television and movies in which actors do not stop to use contraception, that is not part of the script. They learn from pornography, they learn destructive roles and behaviour and they learn lies about their own bodies and about their own self-worth as people.

Unwanted pregnancy can lead to poverty, misery, crime and escalating health costs due to increased abortions. This is no trivial matter. It is a national problem.

Since last year when the Senate defeated the proposed abortion legislation there has been no movement in this area at all. This motion that I am presenting today fills the very needed gap in our society.

The government has stated that it is committed to family planning, but has taken no legislative steps in this area. This motion provides the government and all members of this House an opportunity to express themselves on this matter that is so important to Canadian society.

Everything that I have mentioned in the motion is a federal responsibility. The federal government has already played a role in this area. What is shameful about the whole situation is that the federal government has been decreasing its role in this area for over a decade now. Access to family planning education is very uneven across the country. The previous government, the Liberal government, began to decrease funding to planned parenthood from $627,000 in 1977 to $237,000 in 1984 when it was voted out of office.

The Conservative government decreased the funding from $237,000 to $146,000 in 1989-90 at which level the funding has been frozen until today.

Year after year the value of the funding decreases because it does not keep up with inflation and so you have the situation in which the funds have been cut back, cut back, cut back and there is no consideration of inflation.

The government itself disbanded the Health and Welfare Canada Family Planning Division in 1985.

A current proposal to establish a non-governmental sexuality information and resource clearing house is in jeopardy because no further federal dollars are forthcoming. Although the initiators were given start-up money to do the research, there is no money to continue the program now that all that work has been done. It seems like a foolish waste of money to hand them this money for the start-up costs and the research to plan a program and then not to fund it for a period of time until it can become self-sustaining.

Not spending money on family planning is very short-sighted. Family planning is a cost saving measure. Not spending a few dollars on family planning now means spending a lot more later. Not spending money on the prevention of sexually transmitted diseases now means spending a lot more later on health care and infertility treatments.

The choice is not between spending money on family planning now or reducing the deficit. It is between spending some money now or a heck of a lot more a few years down the road.

Since the defeat of the abortion bill last year there has been little discussion, as I said, in this House about family planning issues. I do not think there has been any discussion.

The motion I introduced today states that the House believes the Family Planning Division at Health and Welfare Canada should be reinstated. Health and Welfare engages in a number of primary prevention activities. It launched a national anti-smoking and anti-drug campaign. Unwanted pregnancies also endanger the health and well-being of individuals. Sexually transmitted diseases threaten the health, life and future fertility of individuals and the health of any infants born to a person who is carrying this sexually transmitted disease.

Many of the provinces have not picked up the slack from the federal withdrawal in this area. In fact, with health care funding to the provinces diminishing, provinces are now in a worse position than ever to even begin to pick up the slack.

In this day of AIDS, education on prevention of sexually transmitted diseases and unwanted pregnancy is all the more important. We must break down that "It can't happen to me" attitude. We will only do that through education.

When I checked last year to see who at National Health and Welfare was working on family planning issues, I found only one full-time staff person out of the whole, huge health and welfare bureaucracy. It is a huge bureaucracy and only one person was working on family planning issues. That says a lot about where family planning is on this government's agenda and list of priorities.

Criminalizing abortion was high on the agenda. Preventing unwanted pregnancies is not even there at all. This government wanted to put women and doctors in jail for having an abortion, but does not want to do anything to prevent that situation from happening in the first place.

Unintended pregnancy has been identified as the number one problem by health specialists who are dealing with people 15 to 19 years of age. Health and Welfare Canada has not been exercising its mandate to promote health in this area for Canadians, particularly young ones. My motion also seeks the agreement of the House to reinstate funding for the Planned Parenthood Federation of Canada. Funding has decreased by over $400,000 since the 1970s.

Planned Parenthood has family planning information centres that are often the first, and maybe the only contact adults and teens have with accurate information about their bodies and about what is available to them for contraception.

My motion calls on the government to establish new programs to combat sexually transmitted diseases and unwanted pregnancies, and a national clearing house on family planning. Young people under the age of 20 account for 22 per cent of reportable sexually transmitted diseases, 22 per cent. Young women aged 15 to 19 have the highest rate of gonorrhoea in this country.

Sexually transmitted diseases have serious health consequences which even include death. This is a completely unacceptable situation. Why has there been so little government action over the past decade on this issue? The government granted $264,000 to assess the feasibility of a national clearing house for sexual and reproductive health information. Out of that came the establishment of a sexuality information and resources clearing house, or SEARCH, for short.

Well, SEARCH is up and ready to go. It has a full-time staff person. It has the resources available. It has dedicated people who have been working on this project now for five years. It would provide materials to parents, educators, public health nurses, doctors, social workers, counsellors, group leaders and other service providers.

Since health and welfare backed out of this role some time ago, and two-thirds of Planned Parenthood's funding was cut, there was no comprehensive source of this information anywhere in Canada. There was no comprehensive source. The government is once again backing out in this area. It will not provide the funding to SEARCH for even one year of operation, after giving them that grant to get started.

In 1986, the Health Protection Branch at health and welfare conducted regional meetings. One of the recommendations in that report was for a national clearing house on fertility control.

In 1990, the summary report of the special adviser to the Minister of National Health and Welfare on child sexual abuse identified a federal role in encouraging healthy attitudes toward sexuality as one of the factors in preventing sexual assault and child abuse.

A 1990 report on adolescent reproductive health said that effective education is the cornerstone of primary prevention. Therefore, it is essential that such education be universally available and accessible. The Canada Health Act, Mr. Speaker, states that the federal government is responsible for ensuring that health care is universal and accessible.

A Gallup poll found that 46 per cent of Canadians felt they had too little access to contraception and family planning services. Obviously, there is a gap across the country in the provision of these services.

A rapidly growing multicultural and immigrant population in Canada needs access to culturally appropriate information and services. Information about sexual orientation is also needed. Individuals often do not feel that they can discuss these issues with their family, friends, teachers, co-workers or even the family doctors.

There is apparently a higher than average rate of suicides among gay teens. There is no unbiased information for them.

I have been working on the issue of warning labels for alcohol. Many pregnant women do not know how much alcohol intake can affect the foetus that they carry. They deserve the right to make informed choices about their bodies.

My motion also calls for more research into safe and effective methods of birth control. A 1990 U.S. study found that there was a paralysis of the development of new, safe and effective contraceptives, leaving millions of women without adequate birth control.

The threat of lawsuits, inadequate government funding and pressure from social and religious groups have forced all but one major U.S pharmaceutical company to abandon the field of contraceptive research.

There are new contraceptive devices available in Europe, but the Canadian government seems to be stalling on improving them in Canada. No currently available method of birth control is foolproof. There is no one method that is safe for all Canadians to use.

Up to 25 per cent of Canadian women cannot use the pill for medical reasons. The pill fails in 3 per cent of cases even when it is used properly. That may not sound like a lot, but it is more than one in fifty. Hundreds of women have become pregnant while on the pill. We must seek improved methods of birth control.

I know that the minister of health has been receiving letters from citizens demanding that health and welfare begin on RU-486, otherwise known as the abortion bill. If proved safe, it should be allowed in Canada as soon as possible. They are discovering now that it may be effective treatment for a type of infertility that women suffer as well.

Family planning issues, I know, are still controversial in our country, but most Canadians do have a desire for more information. Currently, they get their information about sexuality and reproductive issues from friends who may not themselves be well informed, or from pornography which does not foster a healthy or realistic attitude toward sexuality. There have been cases of women in Canada who did not even know when they were pregnant. That is how much they knew about their bodies.

I want to challenge the members of this House to say that this is no longer acceptable, that we will save costs and save lives by implementing family planning, education and sexually transmitted disease education programs now.

I urge all members of this House to vote in favour of this motion.

[Translation]

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the hon. member's speech, and I know she is very concerned, very interested and very articulate on matters that concern women, family planning and children's issues.

Mr. Speaker, I must admit I am not sufficiently familiar with the programs that exist in other Canadian provinces as they relate to the services available to people in various locations. I am familiar with the programs in Quebec, and although there are a number of shortcomings, I believe that in Quebec, with our network of LCSCs, we have some very useful programs that serve Quebec families very well.

Mr. Speaker, the federal government is fully aware of the need for effective programs for sex education and family planning, especially for young people. And speaking of young people, not long ago, a pilot project was launched, which the hon. member may not have heard about, and this project has now been started in the LCSCs and deals with prevention of sexually transmitted diseases, AIDS and, of course, teenage pregnancies. There is some rather innovative material which I have not seen yet. I only saw the adds that appeared in the various media which mentioned a brochure that, I am told, speaks in a very direct style to young people, to make them realize that their health is at stake, and that this is for them. I think we should all have a look at this material.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member may not know that in 1977, there was a conference of provincial health ministers, and they declared unanimously, at a federal-provincial meeting, that family planning services came under provincial jurisdiction.

After this declaration in 1977, the role and impact of the Canadian Federation for Planned Parenthood and even the Serena Group started to shrink somewhat.

Mr. Speaker, I have a lot of notes here, but I would like to stick to the essentials. Responsibility does not lie exclusively with the State. I think the churches, provincial governments, volunteer groups working in our ridings and all Canadians should stop playing hide and seek and start speaking openly about these matters to the young people we meet.

Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Federation for Planned Parenthood has done remarkable work since 1955, because it set the scene for a host of provincial volunteer organizations to start dealing with the important question of family planning.

That being said, I will admit, and I agree more or less with the hon. member—it is a personal matter—after the debate we had on the Abortion Bill, it was said repeatedly by the people and groups that came to testify before the committee that there was a great need for information and family planning and prevention.

Today, we have a federal-provincial system. The hon. member for the New Democratic Party is in favour of a strong central government, if I am not mistaken. That is her view of Canada, and it is her right to have this vision of Canada. Personally, there should be a division. We must have programs administered by the provinces who are in a better position to know how to serve the target population. As you know, education is exclusively a provincial matter. Now I think that a family planning program must be pursued in cooperation with the Department of Education and the Department of Health. The federal government could use its spending power to help the provinces set up such programs, which have become absolutely necessary.

Mr. Speaker, I often wonder about it because a great deal of documentation exists and much has been done. It seems absolutely incredible to me that in 1991 we face such an alarming number of unwanted pregnancies. The hon. member mentioned the number of abortions performed in Canada. I agree with her and I also think that women must be able to choose whether or not to have an abortion, which is an extremely difficult choice, as we know.

The Planned Parenthood Federation of Canada receives a $146,000 grant. That may not seem like much, it is true, but with that statement by provincial health ministers at a federal-provincial conference, the provinces now have programs and I think they have some good ones. As I said earlier, we obviously need research on reproductive health throughout Canada. The government set up a royal commission of inquiry on reproductive methods that I hope will give us good results. The minister responsible for the status of women also made an announcement concerning a national study on violence against women and violence against children.

Mr. Speaker, I know that my time is nearly up. You know that as members of Parliament, we are all amazed at the tremendous work done by volunteers in our ridings. You know that volunteers do a remarkable job in community health, hospitals and local community service centres. We often cannot find words to express how much we owe to these many Canadians who give their time. Certainly national organizations like Serena and the Planned Parenthood Federation of Canada should receive more funding to help the provinces, groups and volunteers throughout the country set up good prevention programs for young people, because I think the situation has become a tragedy to which we cannot remain insensitive.

I hope that the government can play a leading role, but with the help and support of the provinces and the youth protection branches in the various social service systems. For example, the Laurentian region has the youth protection branch in St. Jerome. In short, a whole series of organizations should get together to come up with a good policy that I think should begin in early childhood, in the schools. We should stop being afraid of calling a spade a spade and tell children the facts, tell them from their first days in school that drugs and sexual abuse are intolerable and that the problems related to sexually transmitted diseases are serious. If these children are educated about it from a young age, I think that we could have results. But I must say that parents have to be convinced that it is necessary and through concerted effort we can do that.

I conclude, Mr. Speaker—you are indicating to me that my time is up—by again congratulating the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby who moved the motion. I encourage her and my colleagues in all parties in the House to continue trying to solve this serious problem so that in future our young people will know what it is about before they have sexual relations.

[English]

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, it is with somewhat mixed feelings that I rise today to give my strongest support to this motion of my hon. friend from New Westminster—Burnaby.

I support her motion in every way possible. I underscore and underline everything she said with regard to the drastic importance of reinstating the family planning division at Health and Welfare Canada, reinstating funding to Planned Parenthood of Canada and, perhaps most important, establishing new programs to combat sexually transmitted diseases and unwanted pregnancies.

I appreciate the remarks of the hon. parliamentary secretary. I think, in a non-partisan way, I know where she stands on many of these issues as well. I know there have been issues that have been very divisive in this House, that have split all our caucuses. Sometimes it has been hard for women on all sides of the House regarding certain issues, particularly those relating more specifically to questions of gender and sexuality, but I appreciate the hon. parliamentary secretary's beliefs and statements.

However, I have to take a little exception to what she says not in the pure philosophical sense, but in the practical sense. It is with regard to the question of volunteers and programming.

I would be the first to admit that in the area of social programs Quebec probably leads the nation, but it does not deny the statistics that Quebec has the highest rate of unwanted pregnancies. It does not deny the statistics that there is, and I stand here as a Catholic and say this, a connection between religion and these unhappy statistics. If we think that we can solve this very deep-rooted problem through a volunteer program we are dreaming. I think the only thing that is going to solve this problem is direct government action.

Some of that government action can come from the provincial governments and some of it can come from the federal government, but the federal government, particularly with regard to provinces such as the hon. parliamentary secretary's and my own, will have a dual role to play because of the funding necessary for provincial governments to put in place in my province and in the province of Quebec such programs as we are talking about.

I think our problem goes even deeper than that because although we are in the 1990s, if I can say that Canada and Canadian society is still sicklied o'er, if you will, with a pale hue of Victoriana. We still refuse to come to grips as governments, provincial or federal, with questions of sexuality. There is this left over idea somewhere that if we keep on ignoring it, it will go away.

The hon. parliamentary secretary and the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby and I suffered, and I use that word advisedly, through the legislative committee on Bill C–43. We suffered abuse, we suffered insults, we suffered threats and we suffered, I think, as women parliamentarians trying to deal with the legislative response. If I overstep I apologize to the parliamentary secretary, but I think that not one of us felt what we did was really adequate in the long run.

I think that we have a unique opportunity through a motion such as this one to look at the root of the problem and try to solve it at the root where it belongs. There is not a woman in this House, I doubt in this country, I doubt a woman in this world, who is in favour of abortion. To each one of us, on a personal level, it is a terrible option, but for a number of women it is the only option and it is the only option because governments have not acted, because governments have not put money in place for programs to educate.

Someone once said to me in a debate some years ago that I thought education was the answer to everything. I want to say that I guess I plead guilty to that accusation because if education is not the answer then I fear there is no answer, but I refuse to believe that.

We have to look at the question of education and the tools to give young people, and I agree again with the parliamentary secretary that you have to start at a very early age. We have to ensure that there are family life programs at every age level. My own personal idea, and I have held this idea for some time, is that the federal government could contribute significantly to the educational side without getting into a jurisdictional hassle with the provinces if it looked at some sort of national advertising program.

We have seen, and it has been done by the province of Ontario, it has been done by other provincial governments as well as the federal government, advertising campaigns that can be fairly explicit and that will have an impact.

Twenty years ago, as a university student, I was a resident's assistant and many of the younger students would come to me with questions. I was absolutely appalled at the level of ignorance they held about their own bodies, about procreation, about biology. What horrifies me even more today is that while in some areas through some school programs, through some public education, we have managed to alleviate that ignorance a little bit, there is more ignorance out there in a broader and a more dangerous sense.

• (1740)

The ignorance about sexually transmitted diseases, for example, and not just AIDS which kills but also other venereal diseases such as gonorrhoea which leaves women chronically ill, chronically infertile, in chronic pain and so on, is absolutely appalling. Yet we do nothing as a national government to combat it.

I use as an example the programs that were put in place by provincial governments to deal with impaired driving. That is one example. I do not say it is the only example but it is a start.

I refer back to what I said about the Victorian mindset that still holds Canada in a death grip. I use the term "death grip" advisedly. We are not prepared to say to our young people: "Yes, we understand that your sexuality drives you, particularly strongly the younger you are, in your teens and in your early twenties". We throw them out into this kind of a world with a great number of people saying: "Just say no". Just saying no does not work. Just saying no does not answer the question. What has to answer the question are national programs and a national commitment to assist provinces on the educational level and on the funding level for family planning and education.

If we do not do that, then the lives it is going to cost will be laid at our doorstep.

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to compliment the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby on her initiative in this important motion in which she recommends programs to combat sexually transmitted diseases and unwanted pregnancies. Her motion speaks to family planning and also the need for research on safe and effective methods of birth control.

Most of us, if not all on this side of the House, agree with the urgency and the seriousness of these problems but I guess we will differ a little about how we go about solving them.

I would like to make a few remarks. Research in the area of sexual and reproductive health has been identified as a priority by this government. The government is aware that peer and applied research related to the biological and psycho-social aspects of sexual and reproductive health will improve educational programs and service delivery.

It also argues that medical research will improve the present reproductive technologies and will assist in the prevention and treatment of reproductive health problems.

This year a report on adolescent reproductive health, written by a provincial/territorial working group and published by the Department of National health and Welfare, was distributed across Canada. The report outlines recommendations for future action in the area of sexual and reproductive health. The report recognizes reproductive health as an important component of adolescent health and calls for a focus on sexual and reproductive health as a separate field of research.

The adolescent reproductive health working group indicates that the report on the national consultation on research needs and sexuality and reproductive health, a public health perspective, should be used to set priorities. This 1988 report identified and priorized research needed in the field of reproductive health. Twenty five experts from across Canada, sponsored by Health and Welfare Canada, met in Banff, Alberta to develop the report.

The report on adolescent reproductive health acknowledges the existence of inadequate standardization of collection methods and terminology for reproductive health statistics as well as a shortage and inadequate use of Canadian data on sexual and reproductive health in adolescents. The government is committed to support provinces, territories and organizations to address these research needs identified in the report on adolescent reproductive health.

A major initiative of this government in this area of reproductive health research has been the establishment of the Royal Commission on New Reproductive Technologies. The commission has undertaken a comprehensive research and evaluation program to provide data about the critical analysis of the issues surrounding the new reproductive technologies.

The commission set up a research and evaluation program that will study, among other areas, causes and prevention of infertility. The commission's mandate is broad, involving consideration of social, ethical, health, legal and economic implications of the public's interest. Public input has been considered as extremely important in the over all data collection.

Written submissions as well as many public hearings across Canada have been effective means of gathering this information.

In the spring of 1991 the royal commission released a guide to the research and evaluation program of the Royal Commission on New Reproductive Technologies. This brochure has been extremely popular among members of the research community and the general public. The commission's final report will be completed in the fall of 1992. The recommendations of this royal commission will have a substantial impact on the future directions of research on contraceptive technology and sexual and reproductive health services.

Research results in these areas will also provide Canadians with a greater understanding of safe and effective family planning, methods, and reasons for infertility.

This government's commitment to research in the area of contraception is also evident in the research funded by the National Health Research and Development Program, known as NHRDP.

Since 1986 the government has allocated funding to research through this program, specifically in the area of family planning. NHRDP funded research projects totalled $3.7 million over the last eight years.

The research studies have dealt with subjects such as the use of condoms and the pill, adolescent contraceptive practice, vaginal contraceptive devices, and clinical efficacy of the cervical cap. Much of the research focused on aspects of reproductive health other than contraception. Therefore the government made an additional commitment and issued a special call in 1990 for research into family planning, including contraception and problems associated with fertility.

To ensure adequate follow-up the government directed $500,000 a year for the next three years to this special research competition. The research was required to address particular areas of research to be eligible. One of the priorities identified the need to examine the accessibility, availability and acceptability of family planning programs and services to various populations, for example the handicapped, the economically disadvantaged, different cultural groups, and adolescents.

Another area of required research concerns the evaluation of the impact of educational programs, peer counselling models, and the media on sexual practices and contraceptive use.

Finally analysis of the reasons for use or non-use of contraceptives and prevention and effective management of problems related to sub-fertility or infertility is needed.

To this date NHRDP has received 14 proposals. These will be reviewed by a scientific committee in November 1991, just next month, to determine successful research projects.

In summary I again want to compliment the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby. Hopefully together, government and opposition parties, we can make a significant and real headway on these vital social issues.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, I am really pleased to be able to speak on this particular motion today. I think back to the very emotionally charged debate on the abortion issue. One of the things I talked about was about my having spoken to a number of women, some who had to go the route of seeking and obtaining an abortion for an unwanted pregnancy and others who made the choice to continue with pregnancy to term, having the child, and then having to deal either with single parenthood in many cases or with giving that child up for adoption.

• (1750)

At that time I emphasized that the answers did not lie with abortions but that women should have the right to choose whether they needed to terminate the pregnancy. What I emphasized over all was that there was a crying need for proper education, for proper funding, for proper facilities and for proper counselling so that particularly young women but not exclusively young women do not have to deal with the horrible choice of whether to terminate the pregnancy or not.

Certainly for the women I have spoken with over the course of my lifetime it is not and never is an easy decision. One way or the other there are psychological ramifications for whatever choice the young woman takes.

I wanted to get up and speak on this motion because I believe that everybody on all sides of the House, and I believe anybody within Canada, would see the good sense in supporting the motion of the member for New Westminster—Burnaby with respect to education on reproductive technology.

Within that motion, and I think it might be beneficial to read it once again into the record, it asks the government:

> —to consider the advisability of taking action to reduce the numbers of unwanted pregnancies in our society by reinstating a Family Planning Division at Health and Welfare Canada; reinstating funding to the Planned Parenthood Federation of Canada at its previously adequate levels; establishing new programs to combat sexually transmitted diseases and unwanted pregnancies; establishing a national clearinghouse on family planning, and increasing funding for research on safe and effective methods of birth control.

If we look at the the beginning of it we can certainly see the advisability and need for reinstituting the Family Planning Division in Health and Welfare Canada. It is not good enough to say that this is a shared responsibility. I believe that certainly in the western provinces of British Columbia and Saskatchewan we will now see some of these things being dealt with on a provincial level. However I believe the federal government has the primary responsibility for health care and I think it has admitted that to some extent by forming the Royal Commission on Reproductive Technology.

It should stand up and take that step to ensure that those 66,000 people, usually young women and in some cases older women, who are forced to terminate a pregnancy do not have to take that step in the future. With money properly put into programs for education and counselling, and proper research into reproductive technologies these young women, and in some cases older women, will not have to make that final horrible decision about which way to go.

In my life as a lawyer in British Columbia, I acted for almost 10 years on an ad hoc basis for the Ministry of Social Services and Housing dealing with child paternity suits. I dealt on an ongoing basis with young women, and almost always young women often under the age of 20, who had chosen to have the child but could not bear to give up the child to adoption, to somebody else. By making that decision, unfortunately in almost every case that I dealt with over that 10-year period of time, they were sentenced to a life of poverty.

We did not have the proper and adequate support systems to help these young women. What did they do? Normally they were forced by government policy to sue the father for support. Often the father, in those cases, did not have a good job. He had a low paying job. He was often uneducated and unable to properly and adequately support the child. Yet he was forced to make payments out of his meagre income and the young woman lived a life below the poverty line using the services of social services and housing.

They should not have to make that choice. Those levels of assistance should be there both federally and provincially. As I say it is not adequate to cop out and say it should be done voluntarily or it should be done by the provinces.

The buck stops here. I think it is time that we, as parliamentarians, in the government and on the opposition side began to put our money where our mouth is and say to these people: "We will ensure that we will reduce the number of unwanted pregnancies through the methods set out in this motion".

It is broader than that. I think the statistics presented by the member for New Westminster—Burnaby have pointed out there is and has been a problem of sexually transmitted diseases. All of the speakers have spoken to some extent on that.

We have to bring that level of awareness up within our school system, and I think the parliamentary secretary was correct in saying that we must start at the primary levels to educate the children and talk about sexuality, talk about the consequences of our actions as we grow up and discover our sexuality. I think the point has been very well made that if we do not deal with it now through counselling and services to begin with, the costs into the future are horrendous.

A dollar added now to a program, I believe firmly, will save thousands and thousands of dollars in the years to come on welfare payments, on difficulties with the children in poverty. We now have identified over one million children in poverty. Establishing those programs will also ensure that the problem of sexually transmitted diseases is blocked at the start so that we do not have to pay to assist these people in very expensive hospital care in the the future.

Finally, the government must realize that money put into research is money invested in the future. I implore everybody in the House to support this motion and pass it when it comes up for voting.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate briefly in this debate on the motion from the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby.

I thought I was going to be allowed ten minutes, but I realize that I have barely two minutes, so it will be very difficult for me to say everything I expected to say on the subject.

Like my colleague for Argenteuil—Papineau, I would first congratulate the hon. member for Westminster—Burnaby on having made this issue the subject of a debate in the House. It is a very important subject and we all know how active the hon. member is on social issues, the statut of women, and so on. So I congratulate her.

Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief in saying that the government has taken many initiatives; I cannot list them all, but there are a lot. There is for instance the creation of the Sexually Transmitted Diseases Division, at the National Laboratory for Sexually Transmitted Disease Control, as well as other initiatives. Mr. Speaker, I see you are telling me that my time is up. I was extremely pleased to have an opportunity to elaborate on such an important issue.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

CHILD CARE

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, the previous motion will come back for two more hours of debate. Some of the members on the other side may be interested in knowing that.

I asked a question some time ago about whether Canada would honour its own commitment to the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child, which clearly requires the government to ensure the development of institutions, services and facilities for the care of children whose parents are working outside the home.

Sadly the response I received was inadequate. The Minister of National Health and Welfare simply stated that his government came up with a proposal in 1988 and that the Senate turned it down. In fact, the senators never had an opportunity to turn it down. The Prime Minister called an election a few hours before the bill was to be voted on in the Senate, in one of the most manipulative manoeuvres I have ever seen. But the bill itself was not even a good one. At the time, it looked even worse than simply continuing under the Canada Assistance Plan, which is how child care in this country is currently funded.

That was before this government capped the Canada Assistance Plan for the provinces of Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia.

There is a child care crisis in this country. Almost three million Canadian children require child care. There are only 300,000 regulated child care spaces in the entire country. The minister tried to sidetrack the question by claiming to be spending $136 million on child poverty and on violence.

But it is a funny thing, every time I ask a question in this House, that same $136 million keeps popping up. It is supposed to be for women, and then it is supposed to be for seniors, and then it is supposed to be for aboriginals and then it is supposed to be for child care. In fact, it is not $136 million, it is $49 million that will be spent before the next election that is supposed to solve just about every social problem we have in this country. A lot of that money is going to research.

We do not need more research. We know what the problem is. We need action. What is more, not a single red cent of that money is going to eliminate child poverty.

We hear over and over again from the other side of the House that you cannot just throw money at a problem. The people who say that have enough to eat. They have jobs. They are not the people who line up at food banks, who cannot get job training. They are not the battered women with children who are turned away from shelters because of a lack of space.

In fact the Tory reduction of funds to the Canada Assistance Plan amounts to more than $155 million over the next two years. It funds programs to help poor people to get back on their feet. It helps families of poor children. Some 37 per cent of all welfare recipients are children. The lack of affordable child care is a barrier for people looking for jobs. Fifty per cent of Canada's poor live in the three affected provinces. The poor in these provinces are just as poor as those in other provinces in Canada. The children who need child care in those provinces are in just as much need as the children in other provinces. This government is playing political games with people's lives.

The second part of the question I asked dealt with how Canada was going to keep the commitment that it made to the UN on a child's right to health care and education services. How can it do this when it has cut back already on these services?

The minister's response was that we had to consider Canada's ability to pay. That is just fine. Why did this government not consider Canada's capacity to pay before it made that commitment to the UN? Why did the government make a commitment it had no intention of keeping?

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I am particularly proud to speak this evening to reply to two points raised in this adjournment motion by the hon. member. First, as regards the United Nation Convention on the Rights of the Child, the Prime Minister clearly said this week that he thought that the provinces which must ratify the convention before the federal government should do so by year's end. The Prime Minister also told the House that, in his opinion, there was no doubt that the convention would be ratified within the timeframe to which we are committed.

As for me, I sent the complete text to all the churches and elementary schools in my riding to remind my constituents that a convention had been signed, because it is extremely important that all the people in our ridings know about this. As you know, Mr. Speaker, each and every one of us must do something about the issue of daycare.

Do you know what I did? In 1988, I held a meeting for business people from the St. Janvier region, in Mirabel. I convinced them that daycare also concerned them. And do you know what happened? Through the national Child Care Initiative Fund, we were able to finance a small study that cost $25,000, and the province of Quebec, through l'Agence de garde en milieu familial, provided 60 daycare spaces. Moreover, with the help of three large companies, Bombardier (Canadair Division—Military Aircraft), Bell Helicopter and Air Transat, and the City of Mirabel, we opened a daycare facility for 60 children last week, thanks to the initiative of your humble servant in this House. It is a unique concept in the work place in Canada. I invite hon. members to do the same, because I think this is an example that could be followed across the country. Because we were able to get daycare spaces for 120 children, Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Two minutes to reply is very little time. I must now recognize the hon. member for Edmonton East.

CARBON DIOXIDE EMISSIONS

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, when is a cap not a cap? When it is ethereal, a gaseous vapour, a hovering mist dissipating and reforming in mysterious and unpredictable fashion. The government claims to be firmly committed to capping Canada's emissions of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases at 1990 levels, by the year 2000. Unfortunately, upon close examination this commitment which seems not just firm but rock solid, vaporises into some ghostly, shifting ethereal mist.

There are three ways in which this commitment is less substantial than most people think. First, there is good evidence that the government's commitment applies to net emissions, not to gross emissions. Page 102 of the green plan indicates that the government is considering action to limit net emissions of greenhouse gases. The reference to net emissions is repeated in Canada's intervention to an international climate change convention on September 18, 1991 in Nairobi, Kenya.

The apparent insistence on net emissions could be very important. It is a rather straightforward task to compile an inventory, as Environment Canada currently does, of gross emissions of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases. It is much more complicated to estimate both sources and sinks for these gases. Canadian estimates could very well be tied up in scientific controversy even as we approach the year 2000 and the cap from a practical standpoint will have been useless.

Even if Canada decides to make monitoring easier and caps gross carbon dioxide emissions, that commitment remains vague because within the government there seems to be no agreement on how much CO_2 was emitted in 1990. In the national action strategy on global warming the Canadian Council of Ministers of the Environment estimated 1990 emissions at 467 megatons. A document dated July 18, 1990, issued by the energy and fiscal analysis division of Energy, Mines and Resources, offers an estimate of 508 megatons. The National Energy Board's June 1991 estimate for 1990 CO_2 emissions is 517 megatons. These three government estimates for Canadian 1990 carbon dioxide emissions differ by 11 per cent. This is hardly precise for a cap. However there is a third problem. According to a senior government official, 1990 might not mean 1990 after all.

• (1810)

On October 3, 1991, I asked the deputy minister of the environment: "Is it reasonable to assume that the 1990 emissions level will not absolutely and without variance be the basis used for comparison by the year 2000? Is it possible that it might change as a consequence of international negotiations and of methodologies within the country?"

The deputy minister, Dr. Good, replied: "It is quite possible". So the government's own estimates for carbon dioxide are significantly divergent. Small wonder then that few people seem to take the government's commitment seriously.

My question is clear and simple. When the government says it wants to cap CO_2 and other greenhouse gas emissions at their 1990 levels by the year 2000, what in heaven's name does it mean?

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the government remains to committed to stabilizing the emissions of CO_2 and other greenhouse gases at 1990 levels by the year 2000.

Our efforts to address the issue of global warming are taking place at both the national and international levels. Internationally, Canada has participated in intergovernmental negotiations and framework conventions on climate change. It is important that Canada act in concert with the international community on what is after all a global issue.

On the national front, the federal government's commitment to address climate change is clearly spelled out in Canada's green plan. We are pursuing a comprehensive, flexible approach to limiting net emissions of greenhouse gases, addressing both sources and "sinks", while at the same time acknowledging regional differences.

Carbon dioxide is one of the main greenhouse gases, and most man-made CO_2 comes comes from our consumption of fossil fuels. Consequently my department is developing a series of initiatives to promote energy efficiency as a cost effective way to reducing energy consumption and CO_2 emissions. Measures will be announced in due course to regulate minimum efficiency levels in energy using equipment, to label products regarding their energy use, promote more energy efficient building codes and to initiate a further round of fuel efficiency targets for new vehicles. These are but a few initiatives at the federal level.

The accelerated development and market penetration of alternative motive fuels, as well as research and development of alternative energy is also being pursued. In addition, we shall be initiating information and education campaigns for the public on the wise use of energy. These, along with other measures yet to be announced, are an indication that this government is committed to taking action to meet our stabilization goal.

Provincial and territorial governments, as well as municipalities have important roles to play. Many provinces have undertaken measures to limit CO_2 and other greenhouse gas emissions. Others are planning to do so. My government is pursuing discussions with the provinces and territories on this matter in order to better co-ordinate actions and share information and data.

WORLD SUMMIT FOR CHILDREN

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to stand here and to again ask for answers to the question I asked of both the Secretary of State for Canada and the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Specifically I was trying to learn from the Government of Canada what steps it would take in honouring and moving to honour the Convention on the Rights of the Child.

I listened very carefully to the parliamentary secretary who responded a moment ago. Although Canada has certainly indicated its interest, and has signed the agreement at the United Nations on the Rights of the Child, it still has not ratified it. Many countries around the world have ratified it.

My question was simply to ask why this was not happening.

In addition to that, I have also written to the Minister for External Relations and International Development. I had asked these questions in the House, and I had written, and still, I am not any closer to getting an answer. What I really need to know is what steps the government still has to take before honouring this agreement. I want to know about the process for ratifying this agreement and these are the answers that I need.

The facts on the convention are that just over a year ago representatives of a 159 nations around the world gathered at the United Nations to begin the process of ending child poverty world-wide. It is interesting to hear the member for Burnaby in her private member's motion talking about child poverty and then her adjournment proceedings with regard to the rights of the child.

There is incredible child poverty, not only in this country but around the world. The summit's main goal was to encourage governments to sign and ratify this agreement. The convention is committed to recognizing the right of every child to a standard of living adequate for the child's physical, mental, spiritual, moral and social development.

As I review Hansard over the last few months I note that every time the government is asked about the convention's ratification it becomes defensive or, in my case, each time that I have posed questions it refuses to answer.

There is reason to believe that Canada will have trouble ratifying the convention because several areas of minimum standards for children, including health, health care and education, fall under provincial jurisdiction.

The federal government has put a cap on the Canada Assistance Plan which pays for many of the programs needed by impoverished people, the majority of whom are children.

This week the Child Welfare League of Canada, the Canadian Welfare Association, and the Canadian Council of Children and Youth held a national symposium in Ottawa to review the state of Canada's children and youth as it relates to the UN convention. At the closing of the symposium they stated that the Canadian government's disastrous social and economic policies have turned child poverty into a national scandal.

One of the conference organizers, Patrick Johnston, said it best when he said: "We are getting tired of hearing reasons why kids cannot be made a priority. We deal with the Constitution. We deal with interest rates, but we never talk about Canada's children. "One in six children lives in poverty. Poor children experience a 50 per cent higher death rate from all causes. Poor children are more than twice as likely to suffer long-term disability and other health problems. The average life expectancy for aboriginal children, for example, is eight years lower than the national average. The high school drop-out rate is more than 90 per cent in some parts of the country for poor children."

Surely if other countries around the world can ratify this agreement then Canada can. We know it probably will be costly. But, for goodness sake, let us get on with it. I and others in this House are very tired of asking why, when, and how, and we have yet to receive an adequate response.

We are all on the side of children I would hope in this House of Commons. I am not attacking the government. I just want an answer, Mr. Speaker, thank you very much for giving me the opportunity to ask my question again.

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, we all know that the Convention on the Rights of the Child at the United Nations was an historic event and the culmination of almost 10 years of discussions that began shortly after the International Year of the Child in 1979.

The member knows very well that many of the convention articles apply directly to provincial and territorial governments and the services they provide.

Aware of this reality and within the human rights tradition of the Government of Canada, steps were taken in 1982 to establish a federal-provincial-territorial committee of human rights officials to provide full Canadian input into the drafting of the conventions and, more recent, to review federal and provincial law to ensure Canadian compliance with the convention. This process has been thorough, consultative and successful.

I am informed, as I said earlier, that the final stages of the review are almost completed. Governments have been asked to signify formally their support for the ratification by the Government of Canada of the Convention on the Rights of the Child.

Much has been made recently of the observation that Canada has not yet ratified the convention, the implication being that the Government of Canada might be delaying or purposely avoiding ratification. This is not the case. It was never the case. In fact the reverse is true.

• (1820)

Canada's commitment to the ratification of the convention has never wavered, nor has our policy to work closely and in collaboration with provincial and territorial governments with a substantial stake in the convention.

I know the member would like the Government of Canada to overrule provincial obligation and responsibilities, but we do not.

EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, for over 30 years EFL Furs International was a thriving and a growing manufacturing business.

Its founder, my friend Simos Papadopoulos, came to Canada from Greece with virtually nothing. Through his hard work and the hard work of his family, his late wife, his two sons, Harry and Peter, built a thriving and a very prosperous business which employed close to 100 people. It developed a very significant export trade for Canada in the United States and in Asia. It paid very substantial taxes and provided the basis which allowed the Papadopoulos family to participate in a great many volunteer organizations and charitable organizations in the wider community which did all of us an enormous amount of good.

Now EFL is gone. It has gone bankrupt and the Papadopoulos family has been wiped out. It did not miss an interest payment on its bank loan, but the bank called its loan anyway. Simos voluntarily mortgaged his own home and put all that money into the business. The bank took the money and Simos lost his own home.

Harry sold his home. He put his money into the business on a voluntary basis. The bank took his money and now Harry and his family have been left without a house.

They asked the government for help, for a temporary loan, not for a grant, and the government let them down. They prepared a business plan to show how they could pay off all of their debts. "No", said the bank, "we would rather lose millions of dollars than give you a little more time".

Perhaps EFL and the many families which relied on it for their living, for their jobs that provided them with their living, could have been saved if we had only had in place a U.S.–style chapter 11 bankruptcy law.

The formal Liberal government promised a law of that sort some six times over a period of 25 years and our own government promised that sort of a law in the 1989 Speech from the Throne. Finally this past June a bill of this sort was introduced in the House, Bill C–22. It is now before the House for its second reading.

If we are going to prevent any more tragedies, like the tragedy that happened to EFL, if we are going to prevent any more tragedies like the tragedy that has happened to the Papadopoulos family and so many other like families, we have to get on with passing this legislation and passing it as quickly as possible.

Tonight I want to call on the minister to ensure that this bill gets passed just as quickly as possible and gets put into place at least by January 1, 1992 so that we will never again have a tragedy like the one that happened to EFL and the Papadopoulos family.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, on June 13 of this year, to overwhelming stakeholder interest and applause, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs introduced Bill C–22, the reforms to the Bankruptcy Act.

This new legislation is the result of extensive consultation with provincial and territorial governments, labour, business, consumers, legal and insolvency experts. This government knows that saving business means saving jobs.

Accordingly, the focus of this bill is on rehabilitation, not on liquidation. By making reorganization provisions more flexible and more accessible, the reform package provides a greater latitude for debtors to get back on their feet. The new act will strengthen the Canadian business to make it more competitive. The new act also is an important initiative for other segments of the Canadian economy. It will provide greater protection for the most vulnerable participants in the economy, the wage earners, consumers and unpaid suppliers.

Wage earners will be guaranteed a minimal level of protection for the recovery of moneys owed to them in bankruptcies. The program will be accessible, user–friendly, and designed to put cash in their pockets. The Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act will give consumers an opportunity to negotiate arrangements with creditors in order to avoid bankruptcy and start all over again. That is what my colleague is talking about with his friends in the fur industry.

The reforms offer broader protection for unsecured creditors. Unpaid suppliers will be given the right within 30 days to reclaim goods from a firm that is subsequently declared bankrupt.

The new bill offers flexible, modern rules that recognize natural market forces. It is an important element in the framework that will allow this government to foster a competitive, productive and national economy.

We feel that in giving viable enterprises the chance to reorganize we can avoid many bankruptcies and save thousands of jobs and avoid losing the expertise essential to encourage Canadian competitiveness.

LINGUISTIC MINORITIES

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Others may recall that on June 17 I stood in this House and asked a question of the Secretary of State with regard to the kinds of protections that might be given official minority language groups. There were rumours at the time that the government might be thinking of changing that.

I am here this evening to quote the response and to raise a few questions. For example, part of the response says, and I quote: "his government was standing for the rights of linguistic minorities outside and inside Quebec". When people heard that they said: "Where was the government when Bill 178, the sign law, was passed?" Some questions were raised. What was it able to do? Where was the government? Was anything said about this poor elderly gentleman? He was around 65 years old I believe and was the bus driver who was dismissed even though he had driven the bus for 18 years. Apparently he was not able to speak the language sufficiently for the students. He was dismissed in spite of the fact that the parents supported him, the parents wanted him. Where was the government, for example, when the French language rights in Saskatchewan and Alberta, just a few years ago, were diminished significantly?

When the government says it is standing for the rights of linguistic minorities outside and inside Quebec, people are just a little nervous. They ask: "Where is the government with respect to the Supreme Court decision that says that French language groups outside of Quebec should have governance over their educational systems?"

There is a second part of the answer that I want to address, and it is referring to the government:"It is a commitment that we maintain and it is a commitment that we will respect in years to come", that is with respect to the protection of minority language groups.

Some of you will know that in current constitutional proposals there is a reference to the preservation and promotion of the distinct society. I have no particular difficulty with that. I understand the desire of people to want to do that. Those same words were there in the Meech Lake Accord with respect to the minority language groups. Now we know with respect to minority language groups, the French language group, that the only word that is there is "preservation". Why has "promotion" been dropped? Was it an accident?

[Translation]

Nothing is more sensitive or touchy than this language issue, and one really has to be careful. As you know, there was an incident last week. Some young aboriginal hockey players wanted to go to Quebec, but were apparently not allowed or accepted in French-speaking homes. I tried to talk to both sides in order to find out who was right. I still have not found the answer, but I can tell you that this issue generated a lot of calls.

It is a sensitive issue and one must tread very carefully. That is why I asked the question; I said that the national government must protect its minorities. We must know where it stands on this issue. We need leadership. If it is not done for these minority groups, others will also be afraid.

I am trying to be very, very reasonable and I request an answer.

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I went to a meeting with the Fédération des parents francophones in Winnipeg, in the hon. member's riding I believe, in St. Boniface.

He knows perfectly well that Francophone parents and Franco-Manitobans are very grateful to the Prime Minister of Canada, the Right Hon. Brian Mulroney, for saying that he supported and stood behind Franco-Manitobans in their struggle, in 1984, after the Supreme Court's decision on the province's statutes. The hon. member knows perfectly well that the Conservative government and the Prime Minister enjoy great respect in Manitoba, in his riding.

Mr. Speaker, the reform of the Official Languages Act is the best indication of this government's commitment and vision with respect to the interests and concerns of official language groups.

Our commitment goes further, Mr. Speaker. As partners sharing the same values, the federal government, the provinces and the territories have concluded new bilateral agreements on minority language education and second language education. We have also signed co–operative agreements with nine provinces and territories, to promote an increase in minority language services. We have also increased support for organizations and institutions in official language communities.

The hon. member alluded to a minor problem that occurred in connection with children who wanted to play hockey in Quebec. Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member either had a poor interpretation or perhaps misunderstood, because that is what often happens. People tend to misread the facts. I know the hon. member did not pass judgment. I know him well, and I know that he would be the last person to pass judgment on this matter, being the perfectly bilingual member for Manitoba. However, it is all a matter of understanding and occasionally of being more open to our minorities, and so we have these minor problems.

That is all I wanted to say. Thank you Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m, pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

WAGE CLAIM PAYMENT ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Wednesday, October 30, consideration of the motion of Mr. Blais that Bill C–22, an act to enact the Wage Claim Payment Act, to amend the Bankruptcy Act and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations; and the amendment of Mr. Rodriguez (p. 4192).

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I have been here a little better than a year now and I think I finally have an occasion when I can say something nice about this government.

This is sort of a kinder, gentler Bankruptcy Act and in many respects the process that was used to arrive at this act is worth noting. I notice that a number of members have done so on the way through and I want to do it again.

I think there are two or three things that need to be said about the way in which this particular piece of legislation has been brought to the floor of the Chamber. It has been discussed by a House of Commons committee in a very broad sense, what is wrong with the old Bankruptcy Act and things of that nature. This is one of the few occasions when one can point directly to a process that is somewhat different, somewhat unique and a lot more sensible than the normal legislative flow.

A bill was introduced and sent to committee. The committee then had the opportunity, before everybody was locked into position, before everyone had decided exactly what they wanted in the bill, to have some options open up. Some groups were provided with an opportunity to comment in a public way before the legislation was put together in final form. This is somewhat unusual. Normally that is a private process carried on by most governments behind closed doors. There is a kind of negotiating process that goes on before a bill is tabled.

This time there was much more thought, consideration and opportunity. It was not perfect, but it was much better than what we had seen on many other occasions. I commend the government for making that change in the way that legislation, particularly this kind of legislation, is put together. I think that is helpful, because I believe that makes the legislative process a much more open and legitimate process. I think all of us know, if we go home to our ridings at all, that people are very angry that someone has designed a bill, a law and after it has been put to paper, so to speak, it rarely can be changed. At that point, a government is committed totally to almost every single word in the bill, especially in a majority. Even good ideas that are recognized by all sides somehow cannot be fitted into the bill. It is just not possible to do that.

I believe that what was used as a parliamentary process here is one which the government should pay a lot of attention to. It ought to think more of ways in which laws can be brought before the Chamber, and then aired. By airing I mean not just hearing complaints about it, but hearing suggestions or ideas, about hearing concepts, about hearing how the bill will have an impact on various groups that will come under that legislation.

I think that the first order of business here this morning is to congratulate the government for its role, and all the opposition parties for their role, in trying to work out something that is a little different from the norm. I believe it will be a more positive one.

The second thing that I think is important to note about this bill is that it is one of those areas of law that is not quite politically attractive. I suppose that is the polite way to say it. It is one of those things where, in talking about bankruptcy, there are not many political points to be gained. It does not have a broad appeal among the population.

It does have a tendency to be the kind of law that gets drafted, set in cement, and never changed. The previous law, for example, went for some decades before changes were made to it.

I want to note too that there is a provision to review this bill on a regular basis. I believe it is every three years.

The government should also take note that none of us is a perfect human being. With all the work being done by the staff that are around, all the people who draft legislation, all those who advise governments and opposition parties, all the consumer groups and manufacturing association groups, we sometimes forget things. We sometimes do not put provisions in the laws that are flexible enough to reflect that our society is changing. What looked like a good law in the 1920s, 1930s, and 1940s does not even seem relevant to many people today.

This is one of those areas of law that falls into that category. There is a need for legislation, such as this one which deals with bankruptcies, to be reviewed on as regular basis. I do not just mean it should be looked at in the sense that a parliamentary committee can go and criticize an existing law. I mean in a way that allows a parliamentary committee to do something a little more positive than that. It should take the law, hear how it is working in our Canadian society, and adjust it regularly.

That should be the norm. It should not be the norm that someone drafts a law, passes it, and it stays there for 30 or 40 or 50 years. It should be the norm that every single law on our books gets a regular review from a parliamentary committee. In areas of our society such as this, where pressures change regularly on businesses and on people who work for businesses, I believe there is a need to have the laws of the land adjusted regularly.

I think there are some good basic concepts that have been brought forward in this particular piece of legislation.

There is another provision in here that a number of business people have talked to me about that strikes me as just being good plain common sense. That is a cooling off period. There is a period of time when a business under the previous law would have gone bankrupt today. Under this proposal there is a short period of time, 30 days, a window of opportunity to go out and see if there is a way they could reorganize, to check out some other forms of financing, to see if there are some things that they could do which would keep that business alive. That is important.

Some would argue that legislation such as this deals almost exclusively with the business community. I do not believe it does. It certainly has its prime initiative in that realm, but it is people who work for those businesses. Those are jobs. Those are people who have their livelihoods thrown away at the same time.

Much criticism has been levelled against companies that go bankrupt. Sometimes it is a rather creative process that a company that has not enough assets to keep it going today somehow manages to emerge from a bankruptcy with lots of assets and lots of cash in its hands. Most of the people who work for that company wind up with nothing and a small group of people wind up rather well off.

I believe that legislative review and the kind of provisions that are in this act will tend to mitigate against that concept, that kind of perception that these laws are just written straight for the business community. There are some important principles that have been incorporated into this act that I think give it a little better balance. Part of the credit for that goes to the hon. member for Nickel Belt, who is of course our mentor for the private sector. He advises the corporate sector in Canada on what they are doing right and what they are doing wrong, and from time to time he gives them little awards, and he is a friendly, knowledgeable chap. The work that he did in this committee, and the work of all the members in there, I think has been quite helpful. He has certainly given me more information than I ever wanted to know about the corporate sector. But that is his job and I think that is a good description of the job of most ordinary members in this Chamber.

Most ordinary members are not burdened with the responsibility, thank God, of sitting in cabinet and coming forward with a new policy or a new law which they then have to defend, even if they think that it is not exactly what they personally would want to do. But ordinary members on all sides are not carrying that big rock on their heads. They have an opportunity to go in and speak their minds, and I think this law reflects that.

This legislative proposal shows initiatives here from all sides of the House, from a number of different members and from a number of different organizations. I think that is one of the things, frankly, that is wrong with politics in Canada, that we simply have not been able to find a way to do that very often.

This bill, although it is not a perfect piece of legislation, reflects that, and it is better legislation because of it.

I want to move to a couple of areas where I think there is a little room for improvement. Perhaps it reflects on some of the things that I have been saying already. There is an attempt made in here to put together a wage protection package. All of us who have sat in our constituency offices and listened to individuals who worked for a company that looked pretty healthy last month, but is now out of business this month, have just kind of shaken our heads. Somehow, the laws of the land exclude those who made a contribution to that company. They are kind of shut out. The proposal in this act for a wage protection plan may not be perfect, but at least in principle it is a recognition that somebody else has some sweat equity in that business, that somebody other than the owner made a contribution, that somebody has a right to get something out of the bankrupt company just as other creditors do. In other words, the employees have an investment. It might not be an investment in stocks in the company, and it might not be a title on the board of directors of the company, but they have been there every day when the business opened up in the morning and they generated the income for that.

There is a reflection, perhaps for the first time in this kind of legislation in Canada, that they also have a claim on what happens here.

I think our arguments, when the bill goes to committee, are going to be a little hot and heavy about the exact nature of that claim. I want to give credit where credit is due. This is the first occasion that I can think of in bankruptcy legislation where Canadian workers have at least been acknowledged. We want to argue a bit more about how that is done. We specifically want to argue exactly how practical it is to levy yet another tax on a small business. Without getting fervent about all of this, there cannot be anybody left in here who has not had some small business person in the riding come and talk to him rather loud and rather long about all the changes that have occurred in their financial world in the last little while.

A lot of business people can handle a great many things with ease. Change is not one of them. Many of them are very small businesses where the financial and accounting side of the business is often not something that is going to make General Motors quiver in its collective Gucci boots. This is often one person with a ledger, trying to figure out when the taxes are due, and how much they are, and what they are for. Even though the dollar amount may not be much more than it was under some other tax scheme, the fact that you have got to change them all around causes aggravation. That means less productivity in the work place.

Even we New Democrats have to ask ourselves this question once in a while: Does this method of raising money seem appropriate for the moment? I have to agree with those who say that to do this kind of wage equity program by means of some kind of levy is going to cause some hardship. Perhaps we ought to look at some other ways of accomplishing the same goal. We are in agreement, on all sides now, that people who work in these companies deserve some wage protection.

We are in agreement that some wage protection package has to be put together. Let us explore the ways in which we might do that. We are arguing, particularly on the amendment that has been put forward already, that it is not appropriate to do that at this point in our history by adding yet another tax to the process. That may upset the apple cart.

This is going to be a tough argument. I do not deny for a moment that we are going to encounter some very strange allies in this process and that they are going to agree with the position put forward by the member for Nickel Belt for some very unusual reasons. At least we are acknowledging that there is a problem out there and that businesses and individuals are encountering that problem.

Take a parallel situation like a goods and services tax where the government has tried the traditional techniques of negotiating a different way of collecting tax. It is estimating it on a different basis, providing rebates to certain people who might have a more negative impact than somebody else. It has spent a lot of money on advertising to tell people how wonderful and painless and absolutely necessary this really is, even to the point of saying that it was only going to use this money to pay down the national debt. Even though all those traditional devices have been tried, people in Canada are still saying: "But it is still wrong". That is my concern about some additional taxation process around a wage protection package.

The good idea, the wage protection package, may suffer immensely because of the technique that is being used to fund it. I urge all members to go back, when this bill goes to committee, and revisit in your own minds that wage protection package which has been agreed upon. Let us look for any alternatives for funding that wage protection package. I hope that is what happens.

I noted that there is a section of the bill which deals with the matter of people who have supplied goods, in this case to a company that has gone bankrupt. It concerns their right to go in and retrieve their goods during a 30 day period. I know the argument I am going to get on this. I know there are going to be people who say: "Well, I did not find out about it until the 29th day, and I could not get a truck there on the 30th day, so it was the 31st day when I was able to retrieve my goods, so I did not get them". Maybe there is a little room for flexibility there.

I want to introduce one other area which might be useful that I did not see in the legislation. There are a number of individuals, consumers, who have bought and paid for a car, a truck, a boat, a piece of furniture, a television set in a company that has gone bankrupt. I am aware that in each of the provinces there have been attempts made to provide them with some mechanisms to retrieve those goods. Perhaps it would be useful to just simply apply the same rule to individual consumers as you have clearly applied to the suppliers in this instance. That is that when a bankruptcy occurs, they have a right to be notified and a right to retrieve something that is theirs, in essence, but which has not yet been delivered. For some people this is going to be a lot of money.

I recall in the province of Ontario about a year or two ago we discovered that people had purchased boats in marinas which were encountering difficulty and sometimes going bankrupt. These boats can be pretty expensive pieces of merchandise and it was questioned as to whether owners had a right to retrieve their boat from the property of a marina that had gone bankrupt.

The same thing is true of a car dealership that goes bankrupt. You have just bought your brand new Chevy Lumina, made in Oshawa and built entirely in Canada. You are happy as can be. But you will not be very happy if you bought it, paid for it and your Lumina is sitting in a bankrupt dealer's showroom. I think you have to give fairness on both sides.

I agree that the provisions are in here for suppliers to recover things that are rightfully and legally theirs. That should be there, but so should some mechanism whereby a consumer who has done exactly the same thing has a legal right to retrieve whatever it is that they have bought from a company that has gone bankrupt.

All of this is kind of arcane legislation. None of us in this Chamber want to become experts on bankruptcy laws. But all of us, in an economy like the one we are in at the moment, becomes just a little more critical day by day because this is for real. For example, one of the provisions that is in here that everybody agrees with, the wage protection plan, is not meant to be retroactive. There is going to be an argument about that, I hope. There ought to be an argument because a certain cut-off date is put in the legislation, and people after that point have a legal right to make a claim against the wage protection package. Before that date, they are just plain out of luck. That would be denying that we are in the middle of a recessionary period where there have been substantial problems with companies going bankrupt. A lot of Canadian citizens have had their lives ruined because of a bankruptcy.

I believe we have to at least take a look at precisely how we are going to handle that. I do not want to be the one who sits in the constituency office and says to someone who is jammed in exactly that situation: "Well, if your company had gone bankrupt next week, instead of last week, we would have had these things to offer you".

I understand that when a law is passed there has to be a starting date in the law. I understand all the problems about making it retroactive as well. I have no illusions about that, but I believe it should be recognized and it should be dealt with.

One final thing I think is useful in the considerations that have gone on about all of this. This is kind of strange territory for me, so I would ask you to bear with me.

I have listened to a number of business people who have explained to me the wonderful world of finance, and how the smiling, friendly face who was so anxious to give their company a lot of money last year has now been replaced by some other face who is not smiling quite so much. This face does not want to give them money, they want all the money back. They are angry about that particular set of circumstances, without question. They are also angry over who did this.

Very often in a lending institution it is not the manager of the institution who is sitting down with an old friend making these decisions. It very often is somebody who is in that branch for six months or perhaps a year for some training, and they are arguing vehemently that the rules are the rules and you cannot bend the rules. These individuals who have borrowed money are in a rather unusual position. They thought they were doing what the lending institution considered to be good business. All of a sudden, it is not good business anymore. More than that, they will be forced into bankruptcy.

I do not know whether we want to take a look at some kind of system of providing an impartial referee, or whether we should do something a little more positive than that. There are certain things I do know, having been around at different levels for a while. All governments, at almost every level now, have set up some organization to try to deal with this, to promote industrial development in their area.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. Your time has expired.

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, I listened to most of what my hon. colleague opposite had to say this morning with respect to this legislation and the amendment that was put forward by his colleague.

Let me first say that my hon. friend opposite did make a point about the methodology now being used and hopefully will be used some more in dealing with legislation that is going to be coming before this House from time to time. That was the one in which he and others referred to the pre-study which began when I was chairman, while most members of Parliament were still on their summer leave. In the early part of September, while others might still have been getting their last fishing trip in, or a vacation with their families, we were doing the nation's business.

Not all members of Parliament are away during the summer. Some are working. Well, we are going to work on that too. I understand that this particular pre-study was somewhat unique and I was grateful to have the co-operation of all parties of this House. It seemed that there were a lot of good intentions to try to resolve what all consider to be a need for changes to the Bankruptcy Act and the bankruptcy laws. They were last really reviewed many years ago.

It is too bad there is not the same spirit of co-operation that went into that pre-study on the other side of the world where they are trying to negotiate peace. As we all know that is important in world matters. Here we have actually accomplished and set some precedents for further pre-studies of legislation that will then be introduced to the House.

The report which the committee released, which I am certain most who are following this legislation read quite closely, reviewed the legislation that was originally proposed and drafted in a very detailed manner over some 20-odd pages. The committee brought in experts to give testimony for the different parties which feel the legislation would benefit them or cause some difficulty for their businesses or employees. We heard opinions about that area from individuals, organizations, bankers, real estate people and those affected. Of some 21 recommendations that we put forward about 16 have been adopted and included in the legislation.

Compared to other reports of the past in this House I think that is almost a record setting endeavour. I hope the message is that backbench members of Parliament and those who have an interest but do not sit in the cabinet can directly influence through their interventions the policies that we put forward in the form of a bill.

As the chairman of the committee it made me feel that that exercise is one that we should continue because it does have a very positive and beneficial effect.

I do not want it to be construed that in this particular area we are trying to beat up on the institutions that loan money, basically the banks and trust companies. That certainly is not the case. It is fairly safe to say that the banks are the most protected institutions in this country. Possibly they would argue that is best for Canada, best for a country like ours, that it not be wide open. We do not have bank failures on a regular basis. The kinds of laws and protections that are there keep the system stable.

However, in defence of business entrepreneurs who have to go to the banks for their finances I will ask: Why should the fact that they did receive large advances and loans from the banks jeopardize someone else who is doing business with that company? That to me is one of the very key parts of this legislation.

Everyone talks about wage protection. I know that has been the topic on people's minds in drafting this bill. The ability to revindicate your goods should a bankruptcy occur has an immense beneficial effect on so many suppliers who may be forced by a bankruptcy to go into bankruptcy or insolvency. That to me warrants a lot of protection.

It was one issue that the committee reviewed and believed was a very integral part of this legislation. A farmer in my area a couple of years ago delivered his cattle to a dealer for slaughter. That particular slaughterhouse went into receivership or bankruptcy the next day. The receiver locked the gate. The farmer could see his animals on the other side of the fence. He put a whole year, or two years or three years, into producing those animals. That was his income for the entire year. He could see his livestock but he had no legal right to them because he turned them over to a company that subsequently went bankrupt.

Under this legislation if they are identifiable and across the fence, the owner can go in and take back anything delivered to that bankrupt person that is identifiable in the previous 30 days.

That is the kind of protection that this legislation gives those suppliers and I think it is most welcome.

A second very important point in the legislation is that the Government of Canada, the Crown, does not put itself in a priority position. It stands in line with the unsecured creditors in almost all cases except for the deductions of tax and unemployment owed.

That is a major shift and a welcomed shift. Those suppliers or unsecured creditors now may have a little bit of an opportunity to recover some of their moneys put into a company. Before, the Crown, the big Government of Canada, was sitting there first to make sure it was looked after. It was felt that this possible loss of revenue would not be significant to the government.

The committee looked at some other very important considerations that altered the legislation. It is very interesting for a group of legislators like ourselves to hear firsthand how the bill can be improved, as opposed to those who originally drafted it, mainly departmental bureaucrats. We should hold our heads up high because we are probably as capable of drafting legislation as those so-called experts. I see my colleague across the way nodding his head. I want to also thank him for putting a lot of hard work into this pre-study.

The main contentious point of the legislation was in terms of wage earner protection and how they should be paid. That is certainly where we heard testimony concerning introducing a tax at this time, albeit one I always thought was never a significant amount. We are talking about 10 cents a week per person by the employer. It is hardly calculable and I felt that we certainly should not be alarmed. However the very word "tax" in the economic climate of Canada today did find disfavour with a lot of people. My colleague from Mississauga made his point very strongly that adding any kind of a tax at this time would not auger well for a lot of businesses.

I think I could agree that the climate is such today. There is a fairly heavy reliance on taxes because of our deficit in Canada, because of demands on federal moneys. Taxes on businesses today makes it very difficult because tax has to be calculated in the price and Canadians want to be competitive in marketing their goods. There are all the different levels of tax, not just the federal government tax by the way. There are municipal taxes, property taxes, provincial taxes, and surcharges levied on businesses and business locations. We now have stricter laws on the environment adding more expenses to businesses trying to operate. One wonders sometimes why people want to venture into business because of the very fact that the big hands of the government have a hand in your pocket.

• (1040)

It may well be that the Minister of Finance may have to revamp the entire tax structure of this country to make it more equitable to do business than it presently is with tax on top of tax. I see some nodding across the way.

The tax structure obviously evolved over the course of years as the demand on money increased. A Utopian system would have meant that all governments in Canada, even provincial, would not have spent money without knowing they had the money in the bank to do so.

We have all gone into deficit spending. Almost all provinces and certainly the federal government have been in that position since the 1970s. It is very difficult to reverse the trend, as hard as we try. Upon any suggestion by any other party that it would reduce the trend of deficit spending faster than we have, I suggest that their popularity would go down just as fast. Those are the realities we as politicians face. You can talk a good line but when you deliver it the public then sees that somebody has to do with less and consequently you fall into disfavour.

I want to get back to the wage protection plan which is a major part of this legislation. I know the different forces that are at play here. In trying to be a balanced chairman I heard both sides of the issue and knew there was strong evidence that the wage earner should be put in a super priority.

At first glance this has some benefit. However, on the other hand, in the case that there is still not enough money in the system once a company goes bankrupt, we had to add other measures to cover the funds. It was suggested that the Superintendent of Bankruptcy would be in a position to find the funds in order to pay those that would not. We discussed in depth walkaways, those businesses that do not go bankrupt but just sort of dissolve. Three or five employees are promised the previous months' pay and then do not get last month's pay and finally the place closes down. Then they are out two months pay. What is the provision here while we are collecting moneys from all employers across this nation?

We were lobbied really hard by those who do volunteer work or are maybe paid for it in a small way. They would be contributing to this fund. They basically are in the business of doing work for humanity, you might say, or for the charitable organizations. They said: "Why are you taxing us? Why are you penalizing us when we are basically doing this for the benefit of all Canadians? Is it not unfair? We just cannot come up with that kind of money, the 10 cents a week".

Another argument that I heard my colleague on the committee from Sudbury make was that today it is 10 cents, but what if the money is not enough and the demands are higher. Next week or five years from now it could go up to $4. I hope that we never get into that kind of a position. However, that is a concern that could be alarming in the context of politics at a convention or during the next federal election. He would say: "Yes, they put it in and they will be the first people to put it up after the next election". All those things. We might do that to the taxes too. That argument can be used on anything.

The idea was to find as best we could a consensus as to how to make the bankruptcy legislation modern, make it ready for the 1990s and the problems that business faces while still being fair and equitable to those unpaid workers. That was one of the major areas. We could sit and debate either way.

I would not want to hold up this legislation because we could not come to a unanimous conclusion in this House on how that bill should be paid. I would like to try this idea out on the members of this House today. If we found some kind of a compromise—I see the minister standing in the House—I wonder if they would consider postponing the tax and maybe consider using Consolidated Revenue to pay off these unpaid employees in the case of bankruptcy.

We have heard business people say that the climate for additional taxes is certainly not going to be very good for us. I wonder, as a brainstorming measure, if we, all parties of this House, should not consider as an option foregoing the collection of additional taxes at this time. Then when the country is back into a far more prosperous boom cycle we might be able to introduce a small levy to recover some of these funds.

I would like to close by stating that I hope the government would refer ideas of future legislation, as it pursues the area of consumer and corporate affairs which I am involved with, to pre-study. That pre-study has been very effective. Fifteen out of twenty-one recommendations were basically accepted by the government. I congratulate all members of this House who participated in it.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I was interested to hear what the chairman of my committee had to say about this bill. We worked on it together, and I appreciated the fact that our chairman went to great lengths to hear all points of view and to be strictly non-partisan. That being said, I think it is very important for us to have this bankruptcy legislation.

I have the following comment on the hon. member's speech. Contractors and their associations said before the committee that they didn't want another tax. That is true. The chairman just confirmed this. They said they did not want another tax, not even a 5-cent or 10-cent tax. People are fed up with taxes.

I may say that as New Democrats, we supported this view. And after two or three months, everybody was saying: "We cannot afford another tax, so what can we do?" Then, all of a sudden, a group from Quebec appeared before the committee, the Association des contracteurs du Québec. I imagine the chairman will remember. I asked these people what Quebec was doing about the bankruptcy problem, because we were talking about compensation for people who were in dire straits. They told me there were two aspects to consider. In Quebec, according to law, all contractors must have an assistance fund paid for through taxes, but construction workers had top priority, in any case. I then asked them whether it caused them any financial difficulty and whether they or members of their families had gone bankrupt as a result of this priority. They told me there had been no problem and that the system was something people in the rest of Canada could live with.

I was delighted to hear this, and I am also delighted to hear that our committee chairman endorses the same views.

Mr. Speaker, if you will allow me, I have one last question. If you agree that we have to set up a $60 million fund, where is the money going to come from? I believe the government mentioned there was no more money in the Treasury. Where are those $60 million going to come from, because 5 cents or 10 cents per worker will amount to almost $60 million? Who is going to pay?

[English]

Mr. Holtmann: Mr. Speaker, I am standing here somewhat in amazement. My colleague from the New Democratic Party is talking a very different line than some of his other colleagues. He asks if we are going to spend some money, where is the money going to come from? I want to thank him for that point of view because we don't hear it very often from New Democrats.

The member is absolutely right. That is the biggest concern we have. Automatically going to the government's coffers while in a deficit situation, without looking at ways of recovery, is not the way we want to operate. That is for certain. Those days are gone. We may have to go there to initiate this fund but certainly we will want to look at a way of recovering it as well. Somebody has to pay. That is for certain. If you are going to pay out to wage earners, if you are going to give them something that they have been denied then somebody has to pay. Collecting it through the UI fund was the suggestion.

He mentioned the Quebec construction people who built in a little protective system for themselves. I suspect that this is just that on a grandiose scale. However the answer still is that once the government gives out its money it must find the source of funds. The source obviously has to be in the form of a tax. That is the only way the government gets its money. I would only suggest that he stay on that wavelength.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I want first of all to congratulate the hon. member who chaired the committee. I said at the beginning of my speech but I will repeat that it was a very useful process for members of Parliament to be allowed to pre-study a piece of legislation prior to the approval of the principle of the bill at second reading.

I have to commend the Chair for allowing us the latitude that he did. He certainly has set the tone for the deliberations we had. It has perhaps been the most productive committee exercise I have been involved with since I was elected to this place back in 1988. I would urge all ministers, all members, and all committee members to look at the process that we went through because it was very seldom marred by partisanship, it allowed every member who chose to participate to participate. The result is that the government and the minister responsible will probably have a better bill.

The member indicated in his remarks that perhaps, just perhaps, committees might not be a bad place to write legislation. I certainly hope that his comments will be prophetic and at some point in the reform of how we do our business here committees will receive draft legislation from the government and the bureaucrats and it will be left up to members of Parliament, working with those same bureaucrats, to recommend pieces of legislation. That is one way that we can involve all members no matter what their political stripe or party affiliation. It is one way that we can involve them in a very positive way in the legislative process.

I think the chairman has gone a long way in setting the tone and for that I wish to thank him.

I have a comment to make and I would like the member to comment on it. We heard a lot during deliberations about revindication. One of the things we heard from the banks about revindication was that if we did that there would be a massive credit crunch. With the able assistance of the Chair some witnesses appeared and they told us that was simply not the case in the province of Quebec where under their civil code there is a revindication process.

I would like to ask the member to comment about the pressure that was on us initially concerning banks and revindication and then how that dissipated as soon as we had the witnesses and we refocused on super priority.

Second, I would like to hear his comments dealing with farmers and fishermen because he has a great interest in both of those areas. Perhaps he could speak about what we might be able to do subsequent to this bill, if it does pass, to ensure that farmers and fishermen are protected with regard to revindication.

Mr. Holtmann: Mr. Speaker, I take note of the comments made by my hon. colleague from the other side with respect to drafting legislation. I think I am going to reconvene the committee this afternoon to draft some legislation to bring bank interest rates down.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Holtmann: I think some of my colleagues from his side would assist me in doing so.

Let me comment briefly on the revindication part of this bill. Once again this revindication of the supply of products to businesses that have found themselves in trouble is a very important and integral part of the bill. It does apply to farmers and fishermen as well, though possibly not as comprehensively as it could. Maybe we should look at it and talk about a farmer who delivers grain to an elevator company or to a feed lot that went bankrupt. How do you tell which is his? It is not really identifiable. How does he recover it? I think that is what the member was referring to. Could we even go further?

I know the minister, being associate minister of agriculture, also has a keen interest in this area. Fishermen and farmers find themselves in the most vulnerable positions because their products quickly change form, are unidentifiable and in many cases are not possible to revindicate.

This is what the member was referring to. Very possibly our committee could brainstorm to determine how to strengthen that portion of the bill for the agriculture and fishing industries of Canada. There are many farmers and fishermen who are vulnerable.

I thank my hon. colleague for the idea and look forward to further work with the other members of the committee.

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, I want to begin by recognizing the efforts of the committee under the able chairmanship of the member for Portage—Interlake and in hopefully a new spirit—we talked about decorum earlier this week—also recognize the efforts of the members of the New Democratic Party, the members for Chambly and Nickel Belt.

I particularly want to congratulate the members of our party, the Liberal Party, the member for Dartmouth and the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, who so ably represented us in this pre-study of Bill C-22.

The report issued by the committee on Bill C-22 contains several recommendations which I believe improve the bill. I hope that when the bill returns to the House at report stage we will see the recommendations of the committee incorporated into the legislation.

During its pre-study of Bill C-22 the committee examined a number of the major concerns that my colleagues and other members of this House have with this bill. To its credit the committee also sought the views of a wide variety of interested organizations, including representatives from the financial, business, and labour sectors.

I was also pleased to see that the Canadian Federation of Agriculture appeared before the committee. A major concern which I hoped would be addressed in Bill C-22 relates to the important issue of having protection placed in the Bankruptcy Act for farmers. The present act offers very little protection for agriculture producers who, for example, have little chance to recover or receive financial compensation for lost produce when a purchaser of that produce goes bankrupt. I will address this matter in greater detail later on.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. On resumption of debate the hon. member will have, 17 minutes maximum to speak.

[Translation]

It being 11 a.m, pursuant to Standing Order 30(5), the House will now proceed to Statements pursuant to Standing Order 31.

MIGRAINE AWARENESS MONTH

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, November has been designated Migraine Awareness Month. Millions of Canadians are affected either directly or indirectly by the problems associated with victims of migraine headache. In fact, 3.2 million Canadians suffer from migraines. It costs $500 million in lost work productivity as well as millions more in medical costs. The incapacitating pain and nausea that renders the victim helpless from a few hours to several days can cause major disruptions in the family and in professional duties. The cause or causes are still being sought as is a universally effective therapy. For many relief with expensive medications are minimal at best.

The Migraine Foundation of Canada is to be commended for assisting the many victims. We lend full support to its efforts in finding an effective cure for this excruciating and often debilitating illness.

INNISKILLIN WINES

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, the biennial global wine competition which was held in Bordeaux, France, in June attracted 4,100 wine entries from 38 wine producing nations.

Inniskillin Wines of Niagara-on-the-Lake walked off with one of the nine gold medals awarded, the Grand Prix D'Honneur, for its 1989 vidal ice wine and thus instantly elevated the wines of Ontario into international fame and acclaim.

Information gleaned from the media indicates strongly that there were no Canadian wines served at the luncheon held at Rideau Hall for the Royal visit of Prince Charles and Princess Diana. If Canadian wines were overlooked, even the winner of a gold medal, I express my great disappointment at the lack of sensitivity shown by our government toward our Canadian wine industry and its workers.

I might add that at another wine competition, Intervin, which attracted 1,800 wine entries, Ontario wineries garnered 53 medals.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I apologize, you have had one minute.

EATING DISORDERS AWARENESS WEEK

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Louis-Hébert): Mr. Speaker, this is eating disorders awareness week in Canada.

This year, the week is intended for adult women whose desire to be slim is often a concern. Everyone should be aware of the dangers to health that result from eating disorders.

If we wish to prevent or reduce the problems related to eating disorders and make Canadians more aware of them, we must convince them to adopt a philosophy of life that excludes dieting and to accept their bodies as they are. Self-acceptance is a fundamental objective of the National Eating Disorder Information Centre.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare supports the centre's efforts to this end and joins all members of this House in wishing the organizers of this public education campaign success.

LOW-LEVEL FLIGHTS

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I rise to congratulate the government on its decision to scrap low-level flights that were planned for northern B.C. In fact, the minister, in a letter to me, stated very clearly:

> The international events of the past two years and the recent initiatives announced by the United States have considerably reduced East-West tensions with the resultant re-evaluation of our own and allied military requirements. Consequently, it is not envisioned that IR 910—
> The flight path:
> —will be utilized in the foreseeable future.

I want to point out however that the government still does not get the whole message on a coherent defence policy. Its plans to allow U.S. submarines to use the Dixon Entrance has been pointed out by the member for Skeena and at the very least that project deserves a full environmental assessment.

Let us hope that the reduced tensions around the world will not only help northern B.C. but also the rest of the world, and especially now, the Middle East.

CANADIAN UNITY

Mr. Lee Clark (Brandon—Souris): Mr. Speaker, as someone who has studied and taught Canadian history for most of my adult life, I have a love for and an admiration of Canada that will never diminish.

I am well aware, however, that this country has never been nor will it ever be easy to govern, due in part to our geographical immensity and to our resulting diversities.

In fact, one could easily conclude that we have survived to date in spite of our geography rather than because of it.

I was delighted to learn, therefore, that the 11,000 members of the IODE have been circulating a petition in support of a united Canada, a petition in which they affirm: "That Canada's diversity is a national blessing and a tradition to be cherished and preserved".

Most of us who sit in this Chamber are parents and some are grandparents. As such we can, I hope, concur with IODE's request that we never forget the needs and interests of future generations.

In the words of the petition itself, as no one could say it better, I quote: "For our children and their children, Canada must remain whole".

BANKRUPTCIES

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, according to the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the rate of individual and company bankruptcies continues to grow at an alarming rate all across Canada. The total number of bankruptcies continues to grow at an alarming rate all across Canada.

The total number of bankruptcies for the first nine months of this year reached over 56,000, a dramatic 50 per cent increase over the first nine months of 1990.

The fact that the cost of borrowing money has improved while bankruptcies continue should suggest to the government that for far too long there has been some fundamental and deep underlying problems preventing individuals and companies from doing business in Canada.

When is the government going to show some interest and announce measures to alleviate the plight of thousands of Canadians who are threatened with bankruptcy because they are still unable to do business in this country?

SOCIETY PROTECTION WEEK

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, this Monday begins Society Protection Week and the government will be dealing with legislation to improve the safety of Canadians.

There have been 72 murders in metro this year already. All of last year the total was 55. Of the 72 murders, 33 involved firearms while guns were used in only nine murders last year.

Many of the residents of Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville are demanding that the government overhaul the justice system.

Next week the gun control legislation, the Extradition Act, parole reform legislation and a revised Young Offenders Act will be important steps toward a more equitable justice system, a system that protects Canadians and allows them to feel safer.

I have addressed these issues on many occasions in this House. The government is making important inroads by introducing laws that more appropriately recognize the pain and suffering of innocent victims and the need to provide tougher laws to protect all members of society.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Canadian Ethnocultural Council appeared before the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution.

As expected, this umbrella group of 74 ethnocultural and racial minority organizations, reflecting one third of the Canadian population, emphasized their great concern about the minority equality guarantees in the Charter of Rights and the compromising impact on them of the notwithstanding clause.

The press, through which Canadians are supposed to be informed about the constitutional process, typically ignored the CEC brief completely or portrayed it primarily as a defence of the distinct society clause.

Apparently in what the majority press defines as the real national agenda, the real concerns of the CEC hardly count.

By many this would be seen as a typical example of the marginalization by the media of real minority voices. In fact, it should raise the more fundamental question: If the media do not fairly report the national constitutional debate, can there really be one?

THE PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, last weekend the Prime Minister faced what was surely the toughest decision of his life. He had to choose between being the Secretary-General of the United Nations and Prime Minister of Canada.

On the one hand, the world's leaders wanted to recognize his skills. On the other he faced a hostile media and personal attacks on him and his family. Those of us in public life in a much more minor way know the pressures of politics on the family.

• (1110)

We can only surmise too well the intolerable weight which hung on Mila Mulroney and their children. On the world stage the Prime Minister was being asked to serve the billions of people who live on this planet. In Canada he was being criticized en bloc by media and opposition politicians for even letting his name stand.

I do not know how many of us in this House could have made the decision that man did. He decided to do his duty for Canada, when this nation had given him every reason to take a walk. If this is not selfless commitment to country, I do not know what is.

ENERGY EFFICIENCY

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, call in the Mounties. I think I have been robbed. Either Christmas has come early or the government is still playing Halloween tricks.

Bill C-41, the National Energy Efficiency Act, is nearly the same as a private member's bill that I presented last winter called the Energy Conservation Standards Act. I am pleased that the minister of energy has taken the advice of the Liberal Party that strong, consistent national energy standards are needed, that special labelling is required to show consumers the most efficient products.

I am hopeful that there will be some teeth to the government's new-found commitment to an environmentally friendly future. We need only to look at the 92 per cent cut to alternative energy research programs and the laying off of one-third of the energy department's staff who is working to stem the impact of global warming.

Is Bill C-41 a death-bed repentance for the Tories? Is this bill too good to be true? When we notice that since 1984 the research branch's budget has been slashed from $500 million to $40 million.

I must say that I congratulate the government for taking this initiative on energy efficiency, and for following the skilful and capable lead of the Liberal Party of Canada.

CHRYSLER CANADA LIMITED

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, two days ago, the Minister for International Trade announced the winners of the awards for business excellence. The categories of those winners were entrepreneurship, environment, industrial design, innovation, invention, marketing quality and small business.

I want to draw the attention of this House to one of the highest categories, the category of quality. The winner of that prestigious award was Chrysler Canada Limited of Windsor's mini-van assembly plant, which introduced a long-term quality policy in September 1985.

That program ended up with the dividend of having this tremendous award given to it, in recognition of not just quality product but of management and of the people who work in that plant. I think we should all congratulate a Canadian company for doing so.

ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, the days of special loopholes, secret deals and lax enforcement of pulp mill effluent had better be over. The Environment Canada report entitled Effluents from Pulp Mills Using Chlorine was released this week and concludes that the government will classify the total effluent from chlorine using pulp mills as toxic under the Environmental Protection Act.

The report concludes that 75 per cent of the mills have effluent that kills fish, effluent that is still toxic 1,400 kilometres from some mill outfalls.

The 47 chlorine pulp mills dumped more than a million tonnes of chlorinated organic compounds into our lakes, rivers and near shore environments in 1989. This is Canada's largest single industry and biggest water polluter.

The present law, the 1971 Fisheries Act, requires all pulp mills built since then to have non-toxic effluent. The November 1991 pulp mill regulations must cover all mills and be legally binding and be enforced. Some of the fat profits of the pulp sector will have to be used for cleanup, to compensate for damages done, and to implement zero toxic discharge technology.

CANADIAN KARATE CHAMPIONSHIPS

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out today the outstanding performance of five karate experts from my region who, at the most recent Canadian championships held in British Columbia, won six medals, including three golds.

With his two gold medals, one silver and title of male athlete of the championship, Marc Hamon of Terrebonne is Canadian karate champion and he has done our region proud. Once again he has proven the vitality and excellence of our sporting organizations.

I would not want to forget another excellent performance, the one turned in by Michel Landry of Mascouche, who won two medals and was outdone only by Marc Hamon.

I congratulate them and their coaches and wish them the greatest success in the next international competitions. Their success is the result of discipline and hard work. Three cheers to them all and keep up the good work. We are all behind you.

EDUCATION

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to add my support to the thousands of Canadian post-secondary students who are outraged at this government's introduction of a 3 per cent guarantee fee on Canada student loans.

It is grossly hypocritical for this government to claim that it is fighting for accessible post-secondary education, while at the same time imposing an additional cost of 3 per cent on Canadian students who are already suffering from a recession and the imposition of the GST on books and learning supplies.

Many students must rely on Canada student loans in order to have the chance to attend post-secondary institutions. After all, these are loans for the needy, not grants for the greedy.

This policy is anti-education. This government must work to encourage, not discourage education. The removal of this inane fee will move us in the right direction.

CANADA CAREER WEEK

Mr. Allan Koury (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, let me tell the House about an initiative that especially interests me, Canada Career Week, which this year will be held from November 3 to 9. For seven days, more than 1,000 communities in all regions of Quebec and Canada will work with the federal Department of Employment and Immigration and organize a host of original activities, in the hope that all students will make choosing a career a top priority.

I am proud of the ever-growing support which the government receives from young people, of course, and also from teachers, parents and the business community. Last year, for example, over 2,000 employers and thousands of participants took our suggestion and helped make Career Week an outright success.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Earlier this week when the minister said the economy was starting to boom, he was patting himself on the back. Yesterday when the numbers proved him wrong, he decided to blame Canadian business people who have been critical of the government's interest rate policies. He said: "It is now time for the business community to take up the challenge because it cannot hide behind that forever".

That is not a fair remark. Does the minister really think that business does not want a recovery? Did the business community bring in the high dollar? Did the business community bring in 33 tax increases? Did the business community deliberately cause the recession? Or, did the government do all of those things?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the government's economic strategy has been to create the conditions for a durable reduction in interest rates and for sustained non-inflationary growth. That is precisely what is happening.

Interest rates are coming down, not going up. They have come down by over 6 percentage points since the high of May 1990. The spreads have narrowed from about 5.75 basis points to 2.5. basis points. With respect to the prime rate, there is about a three-quarters of 1 per cent spread between the U.S. and Canadian prime rate. Inflation has declined dramatically. The annualized rate of inflation on a three-month basis is something in the order of between 2 per cent and 3 per cent.

Interest rates are coming down. Inflation is coming down. The composite leading index that takes into consideration all the components of the economy is going up. September figures indicated that the unemployment figures were going down, not going up. Employment is going up. Housing starts are up. Automobile sales are up. Residential construction is up.

There are signs that the economy is indeed improving.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, today, November 1, the Canadian dollar is worth 89 cents U.S. Everyone in Canada understands that this high dollar is stifling our economic recovery, everyone except the government. Is the minister prepared today to admit that his monetary policies are strangling the Canadian economy and would he be prepared to adopt a more reasonable monetary policy to save hundreds of thousands of jobs for Canadians who are now paying for those policies?

• (1120)

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think what the strength of the dollar does indicate is the inherent strength of the Canadian economy. In spite of the hon. member wanting to downgrade the prospects for the future of the Canadian economy, I think the other point of view should be expressed as it is by organizations like the IMF which suggests that Canada's rate of growth will be 3.8 per cent next year. The OECD suggested that Canada's rate of growth will be 3.5 per cent. Why? Because we have the fundamentals right.

If the hon. member has any suggestions about the value of the dollar, maybe she might like to enlighten the House as to what she considers to be an appropriate value of the dollar, how she would get it there and how she would keep it there. Perhaps she might want to take Canadians into their confidence because quite frankly she is proposing simplistic solutions that are totally unworkable.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, why does he not listen to the Canadian Steel Producers Association which told the government several months ago that this dollar policy was killing the Canadian steel industry? Why is he pursuing the government policies that are costing Canadians thousands and thousands of jobs?

Will the minister understand that every cent the dollar goes up is literally costing thousands of Canadian jobs. Will he today follow the recommendations of his colleague, the member for Burlington South, who endorsed the position taken by the Canadian Steel Producers Association that we should have a lower dollar? Will he do that?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that the government does not set the value of the dollar. The rate of exchange of the dollar is established in the marketplace.

If the hon. member is suggesting that Canada should go to a fixed exchange rate, if that is the policy of the Liberal Party, why does she not come clean and tell Canadians that is their policy? She cannot have it both ways.

JOB TRAINING

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

This morning we learned of yet another shell game practice by this government. Reports indicate that the only funds this government could find for training is the $400 million it has squeezed out of unemployed Canadians: no new moneys, no new commitment from this government, money taken away from unemployed Canadians.

We know that the employers have paid their share. We know that the employees have paid their share. We know that the unemployed Canadians have already paid their share. When is this government going to pay its share?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the fallacy of the Liberal thinking persists. Where is that money coming from? He is forgetting about the Canadian Jobs Strategy. There is a program for 1991 of $1.9 billion. It is not much money I guess to a Liberal to go in the pockets of taxpayers and pick up $1.9 billion.

The Liberals should come clean with Canadians and tell us if we should increase the deficit or borrow more. They should make their stand clear. He is not. He is trying to make people believe that $3.1 billion is no money for workers who are in need of training.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, the question here is whether or not we are committed to the unemployed Canadians and to training.

Despite the rhetoric the government has continuously increased UI premiums and has cut $200 million from the Canadian Jobs Strategy in the last two years. It has completely divorced itself from its responsibilities to the unemployed. Canadians are tired of this sleight of hand, of this disappearing act in the areas of training and unemployment.

Halloween was last night. When will the government stop tricking Canadians and treat Canadians with dignity and respect?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the tricking stopped in 1984 when they were spending zero dollars on training.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Valcourt: Mr. Speaker, I want to correct myself. Maybe it was little bit more than zero but not much more. Maybe you could compare the numbers.

Anyway I invite the members to stay tuned. At twelve o'clock I will be tabling in this House the UI developmental use for the people in this country and they will have good news.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

On October 10 the government announced a farm aid package of $800 million. At that time the Minister of Finance warned that he would be continuing this government's policy of robbing from the poor to pay the desperate.

Today there are reports from his department that the minister is considering taxing Canadians who have been encouraged by the trade deal and the GST to make purchases in the United States. This government is considering putting a tax on those consumers.

The government has two choices: Further tax the consumers who are overburdened or close some of the corporate loopholes. I want to ask the Minister of Finance: Will he commit to take the other way and close some of those corporate loopholes like the $1 billion free lunch program for businesses so we can pay for needed programs?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member would realize that it would be inappropriate for me to comment on any speculative stories about tax proposals. I did indicate at the time the $800 million farm aid package was announced that it would have to be funded from within existing resources or tax measures or a combination of both, because I clearly indicated that increasing the deficit was not an option.

That is what I am looking at right now. Of course I will be pleased to entertain any suggestions by the hon. member or any other hon. members. But her suggestion may not find favour with representatives of the restaurant association so she may want to check with them before she advances that proposal.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the question here is who pays and what is the fair method of doing this.

I want to remind government members that it is their policies. If they look at Statistics Canada they will see that since the GST has come in, purchases in the United States have gone up 215 per cent. There is a direct link between this government's policies and what is happening in terms of cross-border purchasing.

I want to ask the minister again: Will he look at fair tax reform, close those loopholes for the powerful and wealthy, make sure that the people who should be paying are paying, and stop overburdening the middle income consumer who cannot pay any more taxes?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, of course I am interested in fairness in the taxation system and fairness in spreading the burden among all Canadians.

The hon. member was blaming cross-border shopping on the GST and cited figures going back to 1988. The GST came into effect in 1991, not 1988. I think she will agree with me that my predecessor closed a number of loopholes with respect to corporate taxation. If she has some further suggestions of course I would be glad to look at them.

[Translation]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, three days ago, this government established the prosperity secretariat. I say to the minister that it is not necessary to spend $20 million to ask Canadians: Who should start paying the nation's bills?

Can the minister assure the workers of this country that they will not face any new taxes as long as the wealthy enjoy tax breaks?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's sensitivity about new taxes. I think that all Canadians share that view. I would hope that they would consider that when they continually ask the federal government to spend more money, because if you are going to spend more money on programs there are only two sources from which you can get it. You either impose a tax or you borrow against the future by increasing the deficit.

• (1130)

We hear suggestions across the way every day about spending more money. When this government came into office the Liberal Party in office at that time was spending $1.33 for every dollar's worth of revenue that it was taking in or its program expenditures were increasing at the rate of 14.8 per cent per year.

An hon. member: What has that got to do with it?

Mr. Mazankowski: What has that got to do with it? If we would have continued along that line, the deficit today would have been $130 billion more and we would have had an $800 billion national debt if we had followed the spendy-trendy ways of the Liberal Party.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance who should also remind the House that the public debt has more than doubled since his government came into office.

Some hon. members: Shame.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance admitted yesterday that he might have been overenthusiastic when he said that the economy is starting to boom, but he has also been saying that the recession is over. Yesterday, a senior official of Statistics Canada, Phillip Cross, speaking of the current situation said: "We haven't said the recession is over yet".

I ask the minister: Will he admit today that he was also overenthusiastic when he said that the recession is over?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the minister has not explained why he has given this answer in the face of the words of the expert from Statistics Canada.

This week, speaking of the current recession, the Economic Council of Canada said: "There may be some evidence that unemployment is cumulative. Many young workers who get trapped in a cycle of insecure jobs and (UI) dependency are unable to break away from it when they become adults".

I ask the Minister of Finance: What does he have to say to the young people who are trapped in a permanent cycle of unemployment due to this government's policies? Will the recession ever be over for them?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): The hon. member knows all about youth unemployment. I think when the Liberals were in office the youth unemployment rate was between 18 and 19 per cent. It has dropped dramatically.

If he wants to quote the Economic Council of Canada, maybe I can use a quotation that he would find very interesting, because it certainly goes against every suggestion, interpretation and grain that he is suggesting. The Economic Council of Canada said that growth will pick up significantly in 1992 and beyond. The real GDP is expected to grow at 4.2 per cent in 1992 and 5.1 per cent in 1993. That compares with Department of Finance's projections of 3.2 and 4.1 respectively.

They are suggesting that growth will be very stimulative in 1992 and 1993, contrary to what the hon. member suggests.

THE CONSTITUTION

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for Canada's Constitution, indeed Canada's future.

The inherent right to self-government is the cornerstone of what aboriginal Canadians want to see in the constitutional proposals. Will the minister clarify for members of this House what he presented to the Assembly of First Nations hearings yesterday, when he reportedly indicated the government's flexibility on the important issue of inherency of self-government to be entrenched in the Constitution?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I was pleased to be able follow the hon. member who appeared before the Commission of First Nations yesterday on behalf of her party and the Leader of the New Democratic Party.

I indicated that the government had very serious reservations about the idea of inherency standing alone, but that we were encouraged by the discussion that was developing that would define inherency in the context of Canadian laws or in the context of Confederation.

I think this is a very helpful development and one that I encourage the commission and would through this House encourage members of our special joint committee to consider. The government has made a proposal that relates to a justiciable right, but we have made it clear that the proposals we put forward are capable of improvement. If there are means by which the proposal we have put forward can be improved in the manner I suggest, we would look at them very carefully.

There are, I think, two criteria that we want to respect. One is to have a proposal that will be acceptable to the aboriginal people and governments in the country. The second is to have something we can have accepted under the formula of 7/50 as a proposal in the Constitution.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister.

As the minister knows for aboriginal Canadians, there have been several false starts on the constitutional rounds. It is not fair at this point to keep First Nations guessing nor is fair to keep Canadians guessing on how the government plans to deal with their concerns.

Will the minister clarify whether the government is flexible on the issue of inherency being entrenched in the Constitution without a deadline?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): I am not sure that I understand all of the implications of the question. I think everyone in the House knows the importance of precision.

I have just spoken about the kind of discussion I hope will begin with regard to inherency in a context. Obviously, if there is a definition of a right of self-government, we would want to have that agreed and entrenched.

We have proposed in our document that 10 years after the entrenchment that could be interpreted independently by the courts. We have also proposed, however, that once an agreement was negotiated among governments and a particular band or aboriginal organization, that particular agreement could be immediately entrenched and would then have constitutional force.

Obviously the question of 10 years is also a matter that the special joint committee will want to consider to see if that should be lengthened, kept or shortened.

HEALTH

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is for whoever is answering for the minister of health.

The Canadian Medical Association report has found the Meme breast implant is unlikely to cause cancer, but notes at least nine potential problems that Meme implantees can face and also notes a lack of study and information on these problems.

The CMA among its recommendations verified what we have been trying to tell the minister all along, a need for biochemistry and toxicology studies and an implant registry to aid research.

Will the minister commission the research and the registry right away?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, I must repeat that the first responsibility of the Department of National Health and Welfare is to protect Canadians' health, and that is why we are working closely with all concerned regarding breast implants. The Meme is no longer available on the market. Studies and opinions are divided, even among users of this implant, and I especially call on women to be vigilant and informed before taking any action. We at National Health and Welfare are following all studies very closely in order to protect the health of Canadian women.

[English]

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the minister responding will be able to better answer my next question.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare now has his department's internal review of Health and Welfare's handling of the Meme breast implant issue. Will the minister table that report today so that we can all see it? Does that report contain a call for an external audit?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, I must repeat that my colleague, the minister responsible for Health and Welfare, has always been interested in this very important issue, as we have been saying for months. A study was ordered and I can, on our behalf, ask the minister, as soon as he receives the study, to table it wherever appropriate.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister of Employment.

He will be aware that when his colleague, the minister of Fisheries, announced the fish aid package, it was indicated that it was designed to help those who needed it most. He will probably know that the ground rules on the issue have been changed in the past week or so and a whole category of people, indeed all the fishermen on the west and southwest coast of Newfoundland, have been told they are not eligible to receive any assistance or funding under the program pending the outcome of the winter fishery.

• (1140)

He also knows that these people cannot wait until next April without any source of income. Will he call off this perverse toying with people's lives and undertake now to ensure that they will become eligible once again for funding under the program?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, a program has been put in place to try to help those who are living in these difficult times in the fisheries in Newfoundland and Labrador and, for that matter, in all of Atlantic Canada.

Certain criteria under the program are being applied. If the member has suggestions, I am ready to look at them, but my understanding is that those we claim are now not eligible, it is simply because of the fishing pattern. But I am ready to look at the issue.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, the suggestion is very simple, apply the same rules to those people as are being applied elsewhere in the province.

My supplementary question is for the minister, and this matter comes, even more directly, under his jurisdiction. He will know, of course, that fishermen who have qualified this year for unemployment insurance will not have any source of income under that program until early in December.

These people, because of the very poor fishery this year, have been without income of any kind for several weeks already and are facing another five weeks before they get any unemployment insurance.

I wonder if the minister would undertake to see to it that these fishermen are given some immediate access to income through these special projects under the aid package or otherwise.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am ready, of course, to look at how, with the flexibility that exists under the UI act, we can answer some of these problems. But the UI act cannot be the answer to everyone's problems when they face difficult economic times. The money paid into the UI fund by employers and employees throughout the country is one that has to be managed according to the legislative framework that embodies it. If there is that flexibility within the act, I am ready to look at it as I indicated earlier.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, interest rates have dropped. I listened to the Minister of Finance suggest that there was some simplistic proposals being made by the opposition, yet his predecessor and the Prime Minister both told us on a number of occasions that when interest rates came down and the bank rate came down to a reasonable level the dollar would fall as well.

The Minister for International Trade knows that was said. It even said in the budget documents that the dollar would come down as interest rates fell.

I want to ask the Minister of Finance directly whether or not he is now prepared to tell us when the government is going to respond to the devastation that is being directed on industry in this country, especially exporters. When will the government act to allow the Canadian dollar to come down?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would really be interested in knowing from the hon. member where in the budget that precise quote stating exactly that the value of the Canadian dollar will come down as interest rates fall appears. I think the hon. member may be making a supposition but I do not believe that he will find it in the budget.

What the hon. member is saying is that the Canadian dollar is showing considerable strength and a lot of it has to do with the borrowings by the provinces and the inflow of Eurodollars and other foreign currency which is being transformed into Canadian dollars and therefore driving up the price of the dollar. There are a whole host of factors that enter into the exchange rate and the hon. member knows that very well.

I think the bottom line is that there is an inherent strength in the Canadian economy that others see that perhaps the hon. member and others in this House do not see.

If the hon. member is suggesting that one can just simply snap one's fingers and bring the value of the dollar down, I would be interested in knowing how he would propose to do that. The value of the dollar is not set by the government, it is set in the marketplace and the hon. member should know that.

[Translation]

Mr. Douglas Young (Acadie—Bathurst): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance loves to look at headlines, but yesterday's headlines in New Brunswick read as follows: "Stone Consolidated of Bathurst to cut back. Fraser to suspend operations at Atholville plant. Brunswick Mining no longer competitive, mainly because of high dollar".

Does the Minister of Finance agree with the Prime Minister of Canada who said this year that when interest rates went down the Canadian dollar would also drop substantially? Does he agree or not?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I can only indicate to the hon. member that in spite of what he is saying, we have a merchandise trade balance of about $13.5 billion and it is increasing. It is a positive trade balance and it is increasing.

Our trade with the United States is increasing. We realize that the exchange rate has an impact upon competitiveness in the international marketplace, but it clearly demonstrates that we are doing very well in terms of what we are achieving in the export market.

I should also say to the hon. member that the impact of interest rates, for example on a person who is carrying a $50,000 mortgage, his monthly payments today are about $130 a month less than they were a year ago. On a $20,000 loan on a car, a person is paying $50 a month less on the payments on his car than he did a year ago. A small business firm with a $200,000 amortized loan over 10 per cent is paying about $600 per month less than he was a year ago. Those are pretty positive features and the hon. member should recognize that.

CANADA–U.S. FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Many questions exist surrounding the events that led up to that final signing of the free trade agreement.

The minister responsible for stick-handling those final negotiations today in the press astonished everyone by saying that her files had been destroyed on purpose. She said the government actually stole her files and destroyed them. She went on to say that as a former minister her files would not have been destroyed without someone's authority.

My question to the Deputy Prime Minister on this incredible act of sabotage within the government is this. Who authorized the destruction of those files?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. McLaughlin: Hear, hear. Good question.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, Senator Carney has her version of events. My department looked into this in some considerable detail.

Files were inadvertently destroyed following her departure from the portfolio. By examining material in the National Archives, we were able to estimate what the value of that might be. We have looked into this matter very thoroughly and are satisfied with the conclusions.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, the minister says files were inadvertently destroyed. We are talking here about thousands and thousands of pounds, a small forest of files that were destroyed.

We recognize that the $20,000 may be some effort to pay out the member of the other place so she does not say anything more about this, but what we see,—

Some hon. members: Order, order.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member knows perfectly well that that is an improper suggestion. I know he would want to withdraw it and then he can complete his question.

Mr. Riis: Obviously there has been a clandestine covering up—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Riis: Let me finish—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member could put his question directly and leave out the suppositions.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, my question to the Deputy Prime Minister is: in view of the fact that thousands of pounds of critical, sensitive documents mysteriously disappeared like the Al-Mashat letter, does the government not feel that a public inquiry would be appropriate to find out what went on in those critical hours before that free trade agreement was signed?

• (1150)

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there was an investigation within our department. I have answered this question and I have no intention of pursuing it any further.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have questions for the Secretary of State for External Affairs on two very urgent international humanitarian issues.

As the minister well knows, there are 4,500 Jews in Syria whose human rights are being violated. They are not allowed to emigrate, arrest and torture are commonplace. In particular there is the desperate situation of a number of people, particularly the Swed brothers who have been in prison for over four years without any trial at all.

I want to ask the minister if she will make a direct request of the Prime Minister to appeal to President Assad of Syria to release these people as a demonstration of his own government's commitment to trying to find some peaceful solution in the Middle East.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think what is most important about the peace process in the Middle East is that the parties that are at the table pursue their discussions in what now is seen as a reasonably positive atmosphere.

In the case that the hon. member is referring to, we have been in constant touch with the Syrian authorities at the highest levels within the government regularly over the period of their incarceration, and indeed were successful in having those sentences reduced.

I will be very happy to look into it again and make further representations. We have been doing this fairly constantly and I am quite prepared to do it again.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I recognize that representation has been made, but we are asking that the Prime Minister himself make a direct appeal to his counterpart in Syria to try and release these people who are having their positions so desperately violated at the present time.

I would like to ask a supplementary on another humanitarian international question. We have all witnessed the siege of Dubrovnik and the over 60,000 people who are without water, without food and without any form of electricity. Limited humanitarian assistance was received last night but we know it is not nearly enough.

I would like to ask the minister if the Canadian government would make a direct appeal to member states of the United Nations and the European Community to undertake the kind of serious airlift of food and medicines, similar to what happened with the plight of the Kurds, and will Canada offer to directly participate in such an international effort?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, once again this has been constantly in the forefront of our discussions internationally, both at the UN and in the European Community. As monitors of the potential ceasefire in Yugoslavia, we are very much a part of what is going on, both through the European Community and the WEU.

Certainly we are prepared to raise the issue of an airlift of goods for humanitarian reasons and to try everything that we can to ensure that things get through to the people in this really tragic situation in Dubrovnik.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same minister.

Mr. Anton Kikas, a Toronto businessman and Canadian citizen has been under arrest in Belgrade, Yugoslavia since August 31 of this year. As of last night, no charges have been laid against him by either the civil or the military authorities. The military courts holding Mr. Kikas refuse to release him or to begin legal proceedings against him.

We are talking about a Canadian civilian who is being held by military authorities. What is the Canadian government doing to protect Mr. Kikas' rights?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, at Mr. Kikas' personal request he has claimed the provisions of privacy and has specifically requested of the Canadian government and others that his case not be discussed publicly by anybody. Our consulate is in touch with Mr. Kikas and is also in touch with the Yugoslavian authorities in an attempt to protect the rights of a Canadian in another country. Beyond that it is not possible for me to comment at the request of Mr. Kikas himself.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I have spoken to Mr. Kikas' counsel. What Mr. Kikas asked is that counsel address all issues in the press and that was the extent of his request. I add again that Mr. Kikas has been held for 60 days without charges. That surely is unreasonable.

Will the minister press the Yugoslav authorities today for an immediate release of Mr. Kikas? Such release is already authorized under Yugoslav law.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would assume that Mr. Kikas' request for privacy should apply to other members of this House besides myself and that we respect that request on his part. I think it is most appropriate to address inquiries through his lawyer. Beyond that, once again I have no further comment.

REFUGEES

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

On September 30, the Canadian chairman of a south Asian community wrote to the minister making a one time request to sponsor about 400 of their co-religionists who have been stranded for years in New Delhi, far away from their homeland. The committee has also tried to assist these desperate refugees through various Canadian church organizations and NGOs. Sadly to date only a small number of Afghan Ismailis have been successfully sponsored.

Does the minister really understand the serious plight of these refugees and will he give the utmost priority to the request to include them in the 1992 refugee cycle which I think he is announcing today?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the member's concern. I can assure him that we are always prepared to help sponsors seeking to bring convention refugees to Canada.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, and as members of the House know, we work very closely with the UNHCR, the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and we will continue to do so.

I must tell the hon. member, however, that the UNHCR is encouraging repatriation for this group and not third country resettlement. Of course we are always prepared to consider individual cases.

CANADA-U.S. FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, I would like to return to the Secretary of State for External Affairs on the matter of the shredding of the free trade agreement documentation. The minister says she will not pursue this matter any further.

I want to assure the House that the New Democratic Party will pursue this matter further because Canadians want to get to the bottom of this sort of thing.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will put the question.

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): The question that I have for the minister, and the one question I think Canadians need to know the answer to is: What was the money paid to Senator Carney for?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first of all what I said was that I would not pursue this any further under these circumstances. I was referring to the manner in which the question was asked. The amount was paid in recognition that documents that had some value to Ms. Carney had been destroyed. The value was determined independently on the basis of the value of other documents within the National Archives.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, earlier this week there was a conference here in Ottawa on the effect of putting property rights in the Constitution. The issue of environmental protection was raised.

I want to ask a question of the Minister of the Environment. In his opinion, does the entrenching of property rights in the Constitution in any way threaten existing environmental legislation? Will the right to own property give the right to pollute it?

Mr. Speaker: I have to advise the hon. member and the minister that that is asking for a legal opinion and it is not appropriate. If the minister wants to give his comment he can.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): I will be very happy to offer a comment, Mr. Speaker, as you so correctly point out. I would never offer a legal opinion and seek to substitute myself as a judge, as you know.

This is an important issue in regard to the environment because it has been brought up as a concern.

Let me first state the fact that the federal government's intent in regard to constitutional proposals is not to diminish our role in the area of the environment. Quite the contrary, we look upon these constitutional proposals as an opportunity to clarify some roles and establish some working principles.

• (1200)

In the area of property rights, I have been a bit concerned about some remarks by some people who seem to indicate or think that because there would be property rights that in itself would negate the possibility for a government to legislate or produce regulations in the area of the environment.

As far as we know that is not the case. Rights do not exist on and upon themselves. They do not exist in a vacuum. They exist in the historical, social and economic context and it should be viewed in that way.

That being said, we look forward to comments that will be made by people who are concerned about this in the context of the committee or the Standing Committee on the Environment.

NUCLEAR VESSELS

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

On Wednesday cabinet consented to U.S. submarines to transit internal Canadian waters at Dixon Entrance effective October 30, 1991.

Would the minister advise this House whether there have been submerged U.S. submarine transits of Dixon Entrance in the past two years and, if there have been, has the public been informed? Under what form has Canadian government consent been given to such transits?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would be very happy to double check the information that is at my disposal.

My understanding is no, but I am quite prepared to look into it and let the member know.

POINTS OF ORDER

WITHDRAWAL OF COMMENT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, obviously I have not had a chance to see the "blues" yet, but if I have inadvertently alleged that the former minister for External Trade had accepted the $20,000 as a pay-off I fully withdraw that remark.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I appreciate that withdrawal, but I thought it should have been a more fulsome withdrawal, because as I heard Mr. Speaker ask for a withdrawal—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. government House leader has the floor.

Mr. Andre: I heard Mr. Speaker during Question Period ask for the withdrawal of a question that as I heard it would have been slanderous if uttered outside this institution. I then heard no withdrawal but heard another question being put.

I humbly submit if slander is to be permitted and after the fact later one can impart "if I said something inadvertently" and then go on to ask questions, that behaviour will be carried on in perpetuity.

I humbly ask that if we are to restore to this institution a reputation we all say it needs, perhaps we should be a little more willing to admit transgressions, more immediate in our withdrawals, and less willing to slander in this institution in a way that would be subject to court action if done outside this institution.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, just on the point of decorum, I think the government House leader should be aware of the fact that while he was thrusting and jousting with the NDP his colleague, the Minister of Justice, characterized another NDP member as slimy. The former Minister of Finance told me to go back to kindergarten.

It seems to me that when we are talking about decorum the use of words like slimy and kindergarten really do not have a place here either.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, this is a charter member of the rat pack who in her own book says: "I have a big mouth"—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. government House leader has risen on the point of order in which the hon. member for Kamloops made a withdrawal. The hon. government House leader has made a comment. Does the hon. government House leader wish the floor further?

Mr. Andre: I happen to sit right in front of the Minister of Justice and I did not hear the accusation, the word that the member for Hamilton East attributed to her, and in her absence I wanted to make the point that was not said.

Perhaps we should remind ourselves of the kinds of things people are saying around the country about our behaviour and remind ourselves that yesterday there was a very serious and important debate in this House about decorum based on a motion which was unanimously passed by the House in terms of the behaviour of the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam. Yet we unanimously pass that motion in the House, leave this House, go outside and immediately condemn this House for its decision.

That is the kind of thing we have to stop doing if we want to bring respect to this institution and to members of Parliament who try to represent their constituents here.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to ask the government if it would consider making a statement on the terrible air crash in northern Canada. A number of members have concerned constituents and we would like to have some information about it.

If the government is not in a position to make that statement now, could it undertake to do so if information is available before the House adjourns this afternoon?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the concern expressed by the member. I know it is a concern shared by all members of this House and our thoughts are with the families and the victims of this terrible crash.

I do not yet have final information about the number of survivors. At this very time the rescue efforts are continuing. There are people on site providing support to the victims and the evacuations will be taking place as soon as they can be effected safely.

There are survivors but there are also critical injuries. We will of course be assessing the situation and advising the families. We will be making that information public as quickly as possible. If information is available before the House closes, I will be pleased to return and provide that to the member and to the House.

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. During Question Period and in response to my question on training, the Minister of Employment and Immigration stated that during the years when the Liberal Party was in government we spent nothing on training. The reality is—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is entering into debate on what the minister said or what was done many years ago by another government. That really is not a point of order.

I will hear the hon. member further.

Mr. Bevilacqua: Mr. Speaker, we cannot get away with saying all sorts of things in this House that are not based on reality.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: First of all, I can understand the position of the hon. member. When there is a sharp disagreement as to what the facts are there is a natural tendency to want to correct it, but I ask hon. members to remember that there is a distinction between the kind of deliberate statement which may be untrue and the understandable difference of opinion as to what was done by whom and in what place.

I could point out in this case that the hon. minister a moment or two later said that he might not have been altogether correct. However, once we get into that there is no stopping it.

Another thing I point out is that preambles often make statements that could well be quarrelled with by the other side. I think that if we had everybody up on points of order after every Question Period we would be going for quite a long time.

• (1210)

I understand the hon. member's concern, but there must be another way to correct it. Of course the late show would be an excellent usage of that opportunity. You could return to the matter in Question Period or return to the matter in questions and comments at the close of the government member's speech on a bill, provided of course that the Speaker does not hold you too closely to relevancy.

Mr. Bevilacqua: I just wanted to point out to the minister that there is a difference between zero and $2.2 billion.

Mr. Speaker: I suppose I have to concede there is no question of debate there.

WITHDRAWAL OF REMARKS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask you when you are reviewing the "blues" from Question Period to look at what happened in the incident of the question raised by the New Democratic member.

I want you to look at it, Mr. Speaker, if you do not mind, from this perspective. I believe that what happened is that the hon. member introduced a question that contained inflammatory language on which you then called him to order and asked for his withdrawal. He did not withdraw it. He got up and asked another question. What happened from that is that we had a very quick escalation of the failure of members to live up to our own standards that we want to see in terms of decorum.

Mr. Speaker, my point is this: I would ask you to review those "blues" because I believe your action was correct in the first instance, to cut the question off and ask for a withdrawal. I would ask you to examine that because I think that is a pattern for practice that will allow us and prevent us, I guess in fact, from getting into these situations of an escalation of an ugly event.

Mr. Speaker: As always, I will take the comments of the hon. parliamentary secretary and consider them in the continuing effort to maintain the kind of decorum that the public is expecting of us.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I am deeply concerned by this continuing exchange in view of the fact that when I last rose in this House with respect to some comments made by Conservative members which had been withdrawn, the ruling of the Chair at that point was that once the withdrawal had taken place the matter was finished.

My House leader has withdrawn the language which has been referred to at length by various people on this side. I think to be consistent, that should be the end of the matter.

Mr. Speaker: So far as the hon. member for Kamloops is concerned it is the end of the matter.

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the topic of decorum in the House. I know you feel and we agree that all of us members have a role to make it happen, but in the case that we are just discussing, I have seen the hon. member for Kamloops slip up or make a mistake the odd time, but I do believe he is very calculating person and when he—

Mr. Speaker: If the matter is closed, how many members are going to get up and comment upon it? Perhaps the hon. member could tell me what his point is then.

Mr. Attewell: It is this, Mr. Speaker: I do not think it is good enough for somebody to make that type of remark—

Mr. Speaker: Look, I am sorry. The hon. member now is retrying the issue. That is the very thing the hon. member for Essex—Windsor complained about. I see it as a retrial of the issue. The issue is over with, just as over with as I have—

An hon. member: We are talking about your responsibility.

An hon. member: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Not in connection with this case. We can talk about my responsibility some other time in another place, but I am not going to pursue the question that was raised with respect to the hon. member for Kamloops no matter how ingenious the attempt may be made to do it.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE PROGRAM

1992 EXPENDITURE PLAN FOR DEVELOPMENTAL USES

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 32(2), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the 1992 expenditure plan for developmental uses of the unemployment insurance program.

I am especially pleased today to announce this plan, which is an increase in funding for the developmental uses of the unemployment insurance program. We will be allocating $1.8 billion in 1992 to support training and other adjustment programs for unemployed Canadians.

These programs will be available to UI claimants to assist them in getting more permanent high wage and high skills jobs to make them and all Canadians more competitive and more prosperous.

Funding for training and other adjustment measures was increased as a result of changes to the UI act in November 1990. These changes to the act reflect the government's commitment to prosperity. This is the prosperity message which, by the way, my colleague the Minister for International Trade and the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and I announced on Tuesday.

This 1992 expenditure plan for developmental uses, which I am tabling today, provides a comprehensive picture of why and how these expenditures will be made. This is an historic development. It is the first time in Canadian history that business, labour, educators and social action groups formally acting together in partnership as the Canadian Labour Force Development Board, have made a joint recommendation to government.

The government has accepted in full the board's recommendations. The government's labour force development strategy, in seeking to establish a new partnership in Canada, has today delivered hard evidence that, yes, partnerships are possible and work, and the benefits of collaborating can be substantial and positive for all.

The labour force development strategy, an exercise of the mandate the government gave to this new board last year, represents an historic departure in the making of national economic policy. No one can fail to be impressed with how our major competitors derive substantial economic and social benefits from real partnerships between labour and management.

• (1220)

The Prime Minister of Canada, my predecessor at employment and immigration and many others in government, key figures in business and labour provided real leadership over the last two years in pressing for this new level of co-operation.

We can all take pride in this accomplishment today, in seeing the reality of the partners working closely together. It is a landmark in the evolution of the relationship between management and labour in Canada in this century. It provides ample evidence of the government acting when action is called for. It is a self-evident truth that some fundamental changes in Canadian society cannot be effected by government fiat or acts.

If the hon. member opposite and especially the hon. Leader of the Opposition would take the time to read their briefing notes or, better still, read those two discussion papers which we tabled Tuesday on prosperity, he and they would better understand this truth. When you hear them speak they want Canadians to believe—

[Translation]

They want the people in my riding to believe that the government can solve all the problems of our economy.

[English]

These documents are trying not to do that.

Competitiveness and prosperity cannot be achieved by actions of government alone.

[Translation]

That is not the way to competitiveness and prosperity.

After reading the two papers we tabled last Tuesday, hon. members will realize we cannot force Canadians to learn. Governments as such cannot create a learning culture or in any way impose one on Canadians.

The federal government has given Canadians all the facts. We have explained clearly and concisely what the costs and consequences will be if we refuse to learn on a continuing basis. We also explained all the benefits that accrue from acquiring knowledge and skills.

It is now up to Canadians to choose. They will also have to decide what other changes in attitude and behaviour we will all have to consider if we want to ensure our future prosperity. Starting a dialogue and forging a consensus for truly concerted action are goals recommended by experts throughout the world, not just here in Canada, to all peoples and all nations. It is also the conclusion reached by all studies so far. We are not re-inventing the wheel.

To deny Canadians an opportunity to speak to each other in a broad national dialogue amounts to rejecting all the wisdom that has come down to us through the ages. The national dialogue on prosperity which we started this week will not be interrupted or delayed for even one day by the implementation of other important measures. I announced one of those measures today: The allocation of funding totalling $1.8 billion.

This may be an historic step but it is only the first step. The situation in the world today demands a much closer partnership involving all parties.

[English]

Hon. members in this House and all Canadians will want to know that the board has made specific recommendations on the amount of money which should be allocated to training and adjustment programs in 1992.

The board also recommended in this budget allocating the following sums to each of five programs: $100 million for work sharing; $120 million for job creation; $1,005 million for income support while training; $500 million training course costs; and $75 million for self-employment. This total of $1.8 billion represents a significant increase in the level of funding for these developmental uses.

During the 1980s funding remained in the range of $300 million to $500 million and this new level of funding for 1992 delivers on the commitment made by the government during the debate on Bill C-21.

Of even greater importance, in the great debate on the free trade agreement, this government committed to put adjustment programs in place for displaced workers. We often hear that there are no such programs. This is the tangible proof of the government's commitment to workers in Canada.

Many of those who are unemployed today will now receive, because of this new level of expenditure, new opportunities to gain the high wage jobs that the FTA and other economic measures are bringing to Canada. Every hon. member, I am sure, will want to acknowledge that the efforts this government invested in developing the labour force development strategy and in creating this historic board has yielded tangible results. With the effort and support of all parties at the table, the strategy is working and working well.

In conclusion, I know that I am going to be followed by people on the other side. I expect the Liberals to stand up in this House and apologize to all Canadians for having held up the implementation of Bill C-21 which has delivered the kind of money which people who are unemployed in this country badly need. So I cannot wait for his apology.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, right from the offset I tell the minister that we on this side of the House have no intention of apologizing to the minister and his government for any vision that we have for prosperity in this nation.

During our years in government we were truly committed to the issue of training. We were truly committed to a vision that would bring prosperity to Canada.

While we, on this side, are obviously disappointed with the statement and the proposal made by the government, we are not however at all surprised. While the government enjoys speaking about global competitiveness, prosperity agenda, learning culture and all the other catch phrases that are designed by some media gurus in the backrooms, we are looking at the substance of this government. When we look at substance in the area of training, when we look at the indifference that this government has shown in the past seven years in the area of training and education, it does not auger well for the future of this country nor does it auger well for the future of our children.

I think we in this House should always be mindful that every decision we make as a government is going to have an impact on the future.

Today's statement by the minister is a clear indication that once again this government is abdicating its responsibility to the unemployed people of this country. This government has been a government that has been involved in shell games, taking credit for moneys and commitments that certainly do not come from the government itself, but are commitments that come on the back of unemployed Canadians, those individuals who need our help the most.

• (1230)

Today we heard a report, and we read a report that $400 million was once again going to be squeezed out of unemployed Canadians for training. Between 1984 and 1988 this government cut total funding for job training from $2.2 billion to $1.6 billion. Last year alone it cut $100 million from the Canadian Jobs Strategy.

If you want to speak about global competitiveness, if you want to speak about responsibility in a global environment, then this government should take note of the fact that while our competitors are increasing their total commitment to training, in Canada, federal training expenditures have gone from .24 per cent of the Gross Domestic Product in 1984–85 to .17 per cent in 1989–90.

Finally, we are certainly not going to buy the cosmetic veneer of the government on the issue of training. We are not going to buy the falsehoods presented on the issue of helping young people. From 1985 to 1990, the budget for SEED, the Summer Employment Experience Development program, was cut in half from $150 million to $77 million. Those are not figures that are often cited by the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

I ask the minister how these practices are helping Canadian workers adjust to the changing skill requirements. How are these practices helping Canadian students acquire the education they need to compete against the rest of the world?

If we are serious about global competitiveness, if we are serious about building an agenda for prosperity, then we must act on it. This government talks a good game but at the end of the day it is clear that it has abdicated its responsibility to training and education.

The minister speaks about co-operation between business, labour and government while his government is in the process of withdrawing from the field of training. That is contradictory. It emphasizes the essential problem that this government has. The problem is that it lacks a coherent approach to training and education. If the Conservatives had a coherent approach, they would realize that there is a relationship between a tax on books and the problem of illiteracy. They would realize that putting a 3 per cent tax on students makes education less accessible, more difficult to acquire. They would realize that when university students are studying in overcrowded classrooms, using antiquated materials and outdated texts, the education one is getting is not the very best.

Instead of seriously attacking the crisis in skills training and education, this government continues to offer Canadians half-baked plans like the program we see today. It uses the money that it has squeezed out of unemployed Canadians for this. For those individuals who really need our help, this government allocates an amount that does not even begin to reverse the damages that it has done.

I also want to draw from an article that appeared in the The Toronto Star of October 24, 1991, I believe. Of the additional moneys, the $400 million allocated today, half of that would simply make up for the $200 million cut over the past two years from the government's Canadian Jobs Strategy.

This is the same government that parades throughout Canada advocating the wisdom of training, education and world-class economy.

If one is serious about it, then one should be committed to it. Today it has demonstrated it has absolutely no commitment in the area of education and training. It is only willing to do it by raising premiums. It is only willing to do it with employers, employees and unemployed Canadians, but it is not willing to participate in a responsible and dignified manner in helping those people who elected this government and this House to help them.

Therefore, I am not at all happy, as I am sure many unemployed Canadians are not happy. I am sure many Canadians feel cheated by this government that has decided to enter the new era of global competitiveness, but it does not have a clue how to become competitive in a global competitive marketplace.

I will take just one last minute to wrap up. I would just like to say that the time has come to act. The government has had seven years. The time has come to be serious. The time has come to stop tricking Canadians. The time has come to put your money where your mouth is so that we can build a prosperous Canada.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I want to say that a little ways back in his speech, the hon. member who just spoke before me asked some pretty provocative questions about where the training is for a number of categories of young Canadians. I think those are questions we all hope the minister will answer very soon.

In his announcement today, the minister said this was an investment of $1.8 billion in Canadian workers. Let us be perfectly honest here, this is $1.8 billion of UI premiums paid for by the workers of Canada and by the employers of Canada. Not one dollar is paid for by this government. Let us be absolutely clear what we are talking about when we make these announcements that we are doing all these grand and wonderful things for the workers in Canada.

This $1.8 billion is only possible as well because of longer entrance requirements and shorter eligibility for those who are on unemployment insurance or need to go on unemployment insurance. Let us not monkey around with what the real world is about in the world of unemployment insurance. Let us not try to give the workers a snow job that this government is doing them a great big favour. Let us be really clear about what we are talking about.

Having said that, I want to acknowledge that the government is recognizing the importance of training and education. The recommendations of the Labour Force Development Board are being acknowledged by this government and are being implemented, as the minister just stated.

It is not a case any more of whether or not we agree with Bill C-21. That bill has passed and now we are dealing with a reality based on that bill. Therefore, I must say that I am pleased to see this training being made available for Canadian workers.

Recommendations are very important, but I think it is also important that we read into the record something said by the co-chairs of the Canadian Labour Force Development Board. That recommendation was to the minister:

> You are no doubt aware that there has been a great deal of controversy about whether unemployment insurance funds should be used to pay for anything other than income support

It is important to be explicit here, as it is in the report, that the board is not passing judgment on this issue within its recommendations. Indeed, the board is committed to dealing with this issue as part of an ongoing work program. In other words, we all have our hands tied and can only deal within the parameters of what is in the Unemployment Insurance Act since Bill C-21.

• (1240)

The previous speaker from the opposition side of the House said, and I concur, that it is terribly unfortunate that on one hand we see an increase in funding for training, but at the same time this government is providing for cuts. Actually, it is not at the same time, it provided for it earlier this year in the Canadian Jobs Strategy. Only yesterday we had representatives here from the United Fishermen and Allied Workers Union from British Columbia. They were seeking a meeting with the minister, which they did not get, to plead with the minister to ensure that the employment fund that was provided last year be extended this year. This is because fishermen in B.C. and shore workers in B.C. are unable to qualify for unemployment insurance under the new guidelines of Bill C-21.

The minister responded to a question in the House by saying that he would review this. We must plead that if this government is concerned about the unemployed in this country, if the minister is supporting his colleague on this prosperity kick we are on in Canada on this big $20 million show, then surely to God we could get $1 million, or between $1 million and $3 million, out of a $20 million budget. It started at $15 million on Tuesday and by Thursday it was a $20 million budget for prosperity bumf in Canada. Now we cannot get $1 million to $3 million to save the fishermen and the industry in British Columbia. It would seem to me that we have a government speaking out of both sides of its mouth on this issue.

I want to talk a little bit about what is in this statement by the minister and what is in his announcement. As I have said, we believe that the UI fund should remain primarily an income support program. We should be finding alternate mechanisms for training funding. At the same time, we should be looking elsewhere. I want to give a couple of examples of elsewhere. In Sweden, training is seen as a responsibility of the employer. Wages are subsidized to new entrants to the work force and the employer ends up with a skilled worker in the future. This is not so in Canada. The workers have to pay for training out of the very fund that has been set up to protect them when they are unemployed.

A couple of years ago the president of Boeing said that he could sell 10 Dash-8 aircraft per month, but they only had a work force capable of building five Dash-8 aircraft in that time. This represented a multimillion dollar loss every month, not to mention the tax losses that this government sustained by not being able to produce those aeroplanes.

Yet there was no mechanism in place to provide for the kind of high-tech training that those workers needed in that industry to be able to produce 10 airplanes instead of five.

We have an announcement today of this wonderful increase from $1.4 billion to $1.8 billion but still we have not addressed how to deal with situations like Boeing was faced with a couple of years ago.

David McCamus, who is the chairman of Xerox Canada, is not a person whom you would consider to be, or I would consider to be, sharing my views on this very important subject. But on June 3, 1991, Mr. McCamus was quoted in The Globe and Mail:

> Canadian firms spend $98 per person annually to teach workers new skills. "That's less than the cost of a dinner at a moderately good restaurant in Toronto".

This is also probably less than the cost of a moderately good dinner in Ottawa.

It should be noted as well that most of the money employers are spending is being spent on managers rather than on those workers who are producing the product, those workers who are on the line and need the skill upgrading and need the ability to operate the new equipment coming in to keep our workers competitive.

While we are very, very happy to see this kind of program in place we have made it very clear that we do not appreciate where the money is coming from. We believe very strongly that the minister should be "fessing up" that it is not coming from this government but that it is coming from the workers and the employers of Canada.

We believe very strongly that while we are funding this particular program there is tremendous confusion about what programs there are and what funding there is. As a result of that all kinds of people are falling through the cracks and are not getting the training that they should be having.

In conclusion, I wish the minister well with this second year's initiative with this program. I am glad to see that he takes the Canadian Labour Force Development Board seriously and I hope that relationship will continue.

PETITIONS

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour and indeed a privilege for me to have an opportunity today to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 from the citizens of Kamloops, British Columbia, and actually a number of other western communities. They are concerned about the ability of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to fulfil their mandate as a result of cutbacks that have been experienced over the last number of years.

They point out a number of reasons why they feel the RCMP should actually receive increased funding. They point out a concern about the increased level of lawlessness that some communities are facing, and they call upon the Government of Canada to restore adequate funding to our RCMP so that it can fulfil its mandate and role as the only visible police force for many communities across British Columbia and remain as a viable symbol of Canadian unity.

NORTH THOMPSON RIVER

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): The next petition is on another matter that is actually unrelated, but equally matter. It has to do with the decision—and I understand this was made public in the last number of hours—of a firm called Multinational Resources, which is a company on the Vancouver Stock Exchange, that plans to invest $4 million in accelerating its plans and designs to dam the North Thompson River at Valemount, British Columbia in an effort to divert the water into the San Diego, California basin.

This is one of the many proposals of what is known as the NAWAPA plan. That is a plan to divert Canadian rivers into the United States and northern Mexico. Our government is presently negotiating a deal with the United States and Mexico and so the petitioners are calling upon the Government of Canada to state categorically that it will not permit our fresh waters to be dammed and diverted into the U.S.A.

JUSTICE

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I am pleased to present many petitions with hundreds and hundreds of signatures of residents of Canada to add to those already presented.

These petitioners feel that there are serious deficiencies in the criminal justice system. There are many vulnerable persons who have little protection in the current system. Women, children and disabled persons are at particular risk.

These petitioners request that Parliament recognize that crimes of violence against a person are serious and abhorrent to society and they ask that Parliament amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act of 1972, and the Parole Act.

YUGOSLAVIA

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour under Standing Order 36 to present a petition on behalf of approximately 300 Canadian citizens who are concerned about the ongoing carnage in Yugoslavia. They call upon Parliament to bring justice to those responsible for crimes committed against humanity and to recognize without delay Croatia and Slovenia as independent sovereign states.

• (1250)

These petitioners are from Burlington, Hamilton, Guelph, Kitchener, London, Rexdale, Toronto, Mississauga, Woodbridge, Etobicoke, Downsview and Richmond Hill.

At the same time they also commend the efforts of the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada for his efforts and requests to the Security Council to have the United Nations intervene in the Yugoslavian civil war and to send peacekeeping forces to Yugoslavia to prevent further carnage in that tragic conflict.

EAST TIMOR

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed an honour to present a petition which has been signed by several hundred Canadians from Vancouver Island, the lower mainland in B.C. and various points in Ontario. I am sure these people were shocked to hear what seemed to be the de facto blessing which the external affairs minister gave to the illegal and brutal occupation of East Timor by Indonesia recently. They call on Parliament to condemn the Indonesian military occupation of East Timor, the genocide of the East Timorese people, and to publicly support the right of the East Timorese people to determine their own destiny by referendum and free elections and to support these causes in the United Nations and all other international arenas.

NORTH THOMPSON RIVER

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I would like to submit on behalf of a number of residents in the constituency of Okanagan—Shuswap a petition to the government. These individuals are very concerned about Multinational Resources, a company that has just announced its intention to dam the North Thompson River and divert water from British Columbia down to California.

They are asking the federal government to state categorically that it will not permit our fresh rivers to be dammed and diverted into the U.S.A. They are very concerned that under the provisions of the free trade agreement the export of bulk water from Canada to the U.S. would essentially enshrine Canada's obligation to maintain such exports, and they are very, very worried about it.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): On another matter a number of constituents throughout the Okanagan—Shuswap are very concerned about the government's intention to cut back on the services of the RCMP throughout Canada. In particular, they ask the government to re-examine its decision to force provinces to increase funding for the RCMP while essentially withdrawing federal funding.

I know there has been some movement in that regard just recently. However I think the submission of these petitions at this time reinforces the very strong feelings that people have about the RCMP and its service in the communities throughout the Okanagan—Shuswap.

MERCHANT MARINE

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from the merchant mariners of Canada who draw Parliament's attention to the critically important contribution made by the merchant mariners to the defence of Canada during World War II and the victory of the allied forces, and also to the fact that merchant mariners placed themselves under great risk in carrying out their duties. Many lost lives and many were seriously injured.

They would like Parliament to designate Canada's merchant mariners as veterans of World War II, extending to them all the benefits accorded to the veterans of the regular forces.

TAXATION

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): I also have a petition from several hundred people across Canada mentioning that the Government of Canada has not taken due consideration for aboriginal immunity from taxes under the aboriginal rights and treaty rights in the goods and services tax legislation. They are calling on the Government of Canada to revise the legislation and the regulations so that it respects the tax immunity of aboriginal people based on their aboriginal or treaty rights, whether they live on or off reserve.

NORTH THOMPSON RIVER

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Finally, I have a petition from people who are concerned about the development of Multinational Resources Corporation which intends to dam the North Thompson River near Valemount and to divert that water to the southern California area. They urge the Government of Canada to state categorically that it will not permit our fresh water rivers to be dammed and diverted into the United States and to state that all our Canadian rivers are not for sale.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition under Standing Order 36 in regard to a very important issue respecting the diversion of water in Canada. It is signed by a number of residents of British Columbia, in particular the Okanagan.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to urge the Government of Canada to state categorically that it will not permit our freshwater rivers to be dammed and diverted into the U.S.A. and to state that our Canadian rivers are not for sale.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition from a number of my constituents' neighbours in south central British Columbia.

It seems appropriate as the MP for Kootenay West—Revelstoke, which as I think without a doubt is the most dammed constituency in Canada, that we should have considerable sympathy and our petitioners do for the issue of concern that has been mentioned earlier regarding Multinational Resources announcement of an intention to dam the North Thompson River at Valemount.

The petitioners urge the Government of Canada to state categorically that it will not permit our freshwater rivers to be dammed and diverted into the U.S.A. and to state that our Canadian rivers are not for sale.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, yes, I have a petition to present that has been certified correct. The petition duly states that the Multinational Resources Company has announced the intention to dam the North Thompson at Valemount to divert water to sell in San Diego, California, and other areas.

The petitioners are urging the Government of Canada to state categorically that it will not permit our freshwater rivers to be dammed and diverted to the U.S.A. and to state that our Canadian rivers are not for sale.

As a member for Kootenay East who has seen the devastation of the Columbia River Treaty, my residents are concerned about this matter.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I recognize the hon. member for Kamloops on a point of order, I believe that the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier would like to revert to presenting reports from committee.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, with the patience of the House, I would like to revert to presenting reports from committees.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the second report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts. This report deals with the disbandment of the tax evaluation division of the finance department which occurred last summer.

Pursuant to Standing Order 109, this committee requests a government response to this report.

[Translation]

I may add that the committee took this matter seriously, hence our intention to give notice with in the next few minutes so that the report can be considered and concurred in by the House.

[Editor's note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will recognize the hon. member for Kamloops on a point of order after I hear the hon. member on Questions on the Order Paper.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, Question No. 92 will be answered today.

[Text]

Question No. 92—Ms. Hunter:

Has the government allocated any resources toward the development of exportable environmentally friendly technologies and, if so, how much and what percentage of federal government research and development funds does this represent?

Hon. William Charles Winegard (Minister for Science): It is important to draw a distinction between environmental technologies which are specific to improving or protecting our environment and environment friendly technologies which may not relate directly to the environment but the application of which does not injure the environment.

It is very difficult, both in a technical and statistical sense, to separate expenditures into these two categories. This having been said, it is estimated that for the fiscal year 1991/92, the federal government will allocate $3,287 million to support R and D in general and $65 million specifically targeted to the environment. The $65 million represents 2.0 per cent of the total estimated allocation for the support of R and D in 1991/92.

STARRED QUESTIONS

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call Starred Question No. 118.

I ask that it be printed in Hansard as if read.

[Text]

*Question No. 118—Mr. Duhamel:

For each year since 1987–1988, what is the total of all grants paid to businesses by the federal government for (a) small (b) medium (c) large businesses?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): I am informed by the Office of the Comptroller General of Canada as follows:

The total grants and contributions paid to businesses by the federal government since 1987–1988 by fiscal year is as follows:

1987–88—$2,849,321,460

1988–89—$2,828,328,867

1989–90—$2,926,137,890

1990–91—$2,493,222,484

The information is not available for amounts paid to small, medium and large businesses.

[English]

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The questions as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Riis: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Standing Order 39(5) indicates that when members submit a question under this category of the agenda they can request that a minister respond to a specific question within 45 days.

We have these Standing Orders. We have agreed to them and we are expected to follow them. Yet, I look at a whole list of questions that have been there, not for 45 days, not 50, not 60, but over 70 days.

I know it is difficult, but government ministries do have people working for them. Their job is to respond to these and to follow the Standing Orders.

Mr. Milliken: 120 days.

Mr. Riis: My friend from Kingston and the Islands says even as many as 120 days. I seek some guidance from you, Mr. Speaker. We either have Standing Orders and we follow them or we do not.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Maybe we can get an explanation from the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader.

• (1300)

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, we do try to make every possible effort to answer those questions within 45 days. We often run into difficulties. One serious problem which we have faced has been the fact that some of the questions are addressed to all departments and it takes a great deal of time to co–ordinate that information.

Mr. Speaker, I would ask that you take under advisement Standing Order 39 (5) (b):

> If such a question remains unanswered at the expiration of the said period of forty–five days, the member who put the question may rise in the House under "Questions on Order Paper" and give notice that he or she intends to transfer the question and raise the subject–matter thereof on the adjournment of the House.

In other words, they can transfer it for debate. I would recommend in cases where we are not able to answer within 45 days that the House follow that procedure. That would be an easy way for all of us to make sure these questions are answered.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I say to my hon. friend that in some cases that might be an appropriate way out. However, I have looked at some of these questions that are in excess of 70 days. They are not tricky.

Here is one that simply asks: "Has the government assumed any costs relating to the furnishing of 24 Sussex Drive?" This is not a tricky question. You simply go to Public Works or the appropriate department and ask. This has been sitting on the Order Paper for months and months.

The intent is not to embarrass the Prime Minister or the government, but simply to find out whether renovations have been made and, if so, what did it cost the government. This is not a complicated question. I cannot accept fully the explanation put forward by my hon. friend.

These are our Standing Orders. These are the rules and regulations that govern our behaviour. Every day the government consistently abandons the Standing Orders, ignores them. We either follow our Standing Orders or, as the government is doing, select which Standing Orders we want to follow.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It might be wise if the House leaders would discuss this further behind the curtains or among themselves at their management committee meetings or come into the Chamber and talk to the Speaker at his leisure.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief.

I was in the Chamber earlier this day when the member rose and presented two petitions to the House. In the presentation of the second petition, I would like to point out to the House, he did indeed break Standing Order 36(7) and very clearly so. If he wants the rules enforced, I would suggest he start with his own behaviour.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I do not think we should debate this any further. I understood that he was just about ready to finish as far as his particular petition was concerned. I do not think we should consider that any more.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a very short point of order.

My hon. friend, the government Whip, has pointed out that I have not followed Standing Order 36(7). I might say that what I did was read my petition.

If the government Whip is saying that I am not allowed to read the words of my petitioners then this is a muzzling of democracy and I will not stand for it. If my petitioners who have collected the petition want me to present it, I am going to present it whether the government Whip wants me to or not.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I just want to bring to the attention of the hon. member for Kamloops that there is only 15 minutes allowed for the presentation of petitions. There were a lot of colleagues in his own party who wanted to get on too. That is why in future, when there are about 10 members from his own party who have petitions to present, the Chair would appreciate it if he would sort of try to cut it down in order to get everybody on.

WAGE CLAIM PAYMENT ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Blais that Bill C–22, an act to enact the Wage Claim Payment Act, to amend the Bankruptcy Act and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations; and the amendment of Mr. Rodriguez (p. 4192).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I wish to inform the House that, pursuant to Standing Order 33(2)(b), because of ministerial statements Government Orders will be extended by 29 minutes.

The hon. member for Stormont—Dundas has 17 minutes plus 10 minutes for questions and comments.

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to speak today on Bill C–22 to enact the Wage Claim Payment Act and to amend the present Bankruptcy Act.

With the in–depth review given Bill C–22 by the committee I hope the government will pay serious attention to the recommendations which have been put forward. During the committee's hearings and when the government first introduced the bill, it became apparent that there is a general consensus in Canada that the present Bankruptcy Act is in need of reform. The time has more than come for changes to be made.

It is very unfortunate that we are witnessing record bankruptcies in Canada today. A revised Bankruptcy Act is needed more than ever before. It is also important to remember that the Bankruptcy Act can do much to save a business or individual from actually going bankrupt just as it deals with the regulations governing the process of bankruptcy.

In today's tough economic climate it is obvious that the present act is indeed inadequate. A modernized Bankruptcy Act is required, one which offers every reasonable avenue to prevent bankruptcies.

[Translation]

Bill C–22 is but the seventh attempt in 16 years to reform the Bankruptcy Act. The current legislation, which dates back to 1949, should have been amended a long time ago. Bill C–22 proposes eight main changes dealing with: wage protection, commercial reorganization, consumer proposals, secured creditors and receivers, Crown claims and priorities, protection of unpaid suppliers and, finally, technical provisions.

[English]

In dealing with these eight principal areas of bankruptcy law, Bill C–22 avoids an attempt to overhaul the entire Bankruptcy Act. Such an endeavour has proven to be difficult in the past and is perhaps one reason why the act has remained without serious amendment for so long a period.

We are at a stage now, as I alluded to earlier, that far too many bankruptcies have occurred in Canada. High unemployment, the recession, inadequate government measures to stimulate the economy, high interest rates, the goods and services tax and even cross–border shopping have taken their toll on businesses, especially small business.

The phenomenal growth in business and personal bankruptcies, especially in Ontario, is a significant indicator of the tough economic climate prevailing in Canada today. The number of bankruptcies have indeed been high.

In addition, when a business closes it often sets off a chain reaction. Not only are there job losses as a result of a bankruptcy of that particular business, sometimes other jobs in businesses which had dealings with the original firm are put at risk. Therefore, I am pleased that the reorganization amendments to the Bankruptcy Act contained in Bill C–22 provide more time for a business to prepare a reorganization strategy rather than have it forced to close its doors for good.

[Translation]

Bill C–22 would amend part III of the Bankruptcy Act by adding new general provisions to give insolvent persons time to prepare and negotiate a reorganization proposal and would allow for a stay of proceedings instituted by all creditors whether secured or unsecured.

[English]

In addition, Bill C-22 contains proposals to provide protection for unpaid suppliers. The bill will afford short-term creditors an increased level of protection that they do not possess under the existing act. The provision will however only apply to recently delivered goods. Suppliers of identifiable unprocessed and unpaid goods will be permitted to reclaim their merchandise within 30 days of delivery. The provisions relating to unpaid suppliers raises a question concerning farmers who at times find themselves with little recourse when purchasers who have taken possession of their product go bankrupt.

• (1310)

As the committee noted in its report, the protection offered to unpaid suppliers is of no benefit to those who supply perishable commodities. In most circumstances the nature of the produce requires quick processing such as for example in the case of meat and poultry products.

Obviously the processing of such products makes them ineligible for revindication as they are no longer considered as being in an unaltered state. Their perishable condition also means that their value is lost in a short time span.

In such cases suppliers would in fact be getting back a product that was worth less than it was when first delivered.

I therefore join the committee in its call that the government re-examine this flaw in the provision that protects unpaid suppliers. A reasonable measure must be implemented to give farmers and fishermen protection with regard to perishable commodities.

Bill C-22 also proposes to create a wage claim program. Direct compensation for unpaid wages will be provided to workers who lose their jobs due to the bankruptcy, receivership, or liquidation of the employer. At present employees only have a preferred status claim for three months of unpaid wages up to a maximum of $500 and $300 for sales persons' expenses. However, this does not include vacation pay.

Preferred status is of little value as the assets of a bankrupt employer is used first to pay secured creditors including government liens. Thus the current priority given to employee wages is clearly inadequate.

Clause 6 of Bill C-22 will however establish the amount of benefit at 90 per cent of an employee's unpaid wages, including vacation pay earned within the last six months up to a maximum of $2,000.

It also covers 90 per cent of a sales person's expenses unpaid during the same time period up to a maximum of $1,000. The program will not however cover severance or termination pay.

The fund is to be financed by a payroll tax on the employer. The amount paid per employee will be calculated by .024 per cent of insurable earnings and collected through the unemployment insurance system. It has been estimated that for average wage earnings this will amount to 10 cents per employee.

The tax is scheduled to be imposed January 1, 1992 whether or not Bill C-22 is passed.

There are several problems with the wage earners' protection fund that deserve consideration. The fund itself is not the most efficient possible. It also imposes another tax on tax weary employers, especially small businesses. The Liberal Party has recommended that workers should be given super priority for wages and vacation pay and that the maximum coverage should be $3,000.

To facilitate the immediate payment of wage claims the receiver would pay up to the maximum allowable with the Superintendent of Bankruptcy guaranteeing the amount and paid out of a fund to be financed by an across the board increase in the fees charged by the Superintendent of Bankruptcy.

The committee which pre-studied the bill has put forward a recommendation which supports the establishment of increased protection and compensation for employees of bankrupt employers.

[Translation]

The committee suggests that, in the event that a firm goes bankrupt, goes into receivership or liquidation, wage claims and amounts owed for business expenses up to $3,000 should have priority over any other claim, including Crown claims. Such priority should be subject however to the right of the employer's unpaid suppliers to repossess goods.

[English]

The committee went on to recommend that where in a bankruptcy there are insufficient assets to cover an employee's total wage claim, the trustee should be able to claim any shortfall against a wage fund.

In the opinion of the committee, the fund should be administered by the Superintendent of Bankruptcy and financed from increases in the fees levied by the superintendent.

Most of the witnesses which appeared before the committee supported employees being able to receive some of their unpaid wages if the employer goes bankrupt. There was, however, severe reservations expressed as to how a wage protection fund should be financed. The Canadian Manufacturers' Association thought the fund should be financed out of general government revenues. This idea was previously put forward in 1980 and as recently as 1988 by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

The department proposed that the fund should be financed out of general revenue rather than by employer-employee contributions. The department also proposed that the Superintendent of Bankruptcy should administer the fund instead of UI.

The Canadian Bankers' Association and the Canadian Chamber of Commerce believe the fund should be financed by a tax paid by employers and employees. Such a proposal had earlier been put forward in January 1986 by the Advisory Committee on Bankruptcy and Insolvency which is commonly referred to as the Colter committee.

Other witnesses such as the Canadian Federation of Labour suggested that funding should be the employers' responsibility. But this raises the argument that all employers should be made to pay into a fund which will pay the wages of employees of the disproportionately lower number of companies that go bankrupt.

Finally, the Canadian Federation of Independent Business categorically rejected the government's proposal in Bill C-22 to establish an employer only payroll tax to fund employee wage claims. The CFIB has consistently called for the super priority of employee wage claims in cases of bankruptcies or receiverships and that any such fund should have strict limits and be funded out of general revenues.

The CFIB has suggested however that should the government nonetheless introduce a fund financed by a payroll tax, it should at the very least be based on equal contributions by employers and employees.

Notwithstanding the various positions on the wage claim protection fund, there is a different way to protect unpaid wages of employees. Giving employees super priority status would permit them to have first claim on the assets of the bankrupt employer above all other creditors. The super priority concept could be a sound alternative to the wage claim fund.

I hope the government will give super priority due consideration. The committee recommended that employees should be given priority, but this would be subject to the right of unpaid suppliers to repossess their goods from the employer.

Bill C-22 is a substantial and complex bill which has as its objective the reform of very important components in the present Bankruptcy Act. I have touched on some of the more salient points of the bill. There are others and I know the bill will receive further examination before it receives third reading and eventual passage.

In conclusion, I hope that the concerns expressed by the witnesses who appeared during pre-study of Bill C-22, along with the comprehensive recommendations outlined in the committee's report will get serious consideration from the government.

I believe the inclusion of the committee's recommendations to Bill C-22 would be beneficial. There is no doubt that the present Bankruptcy Act requires reform and I hope we will soon see the necessary changes in place in the very near future.

[Translation]

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I listened to my hon. colleague who also sits with me on the consumer and corporate affairs committee.

I am particularly pleased to hear him say that he supports super priority, the priority given to workers when companies go bankrupt, the precedence or super priority of these workers, as preferred creditors, to make claims.

• (1320)

The problem that we noticed a long time ago is that workers employed by a company that goes bankrupt, are the last to receive compensation. Statistics show that for every dollar the company owes its workers, they receive about five cents. This is unforgivable and unacceptable.

I was therefore pleased to hear my colleague on the Committee support the idea that workers should have super priority when a company goes bankrupt. I know that my colleague from the NDP, the hon. member for Nickel Belt, also supports this idea. I hope that the government in a non-partisan way will hear us NDP and Liberal members and everyone who worked on that committee.

I would like to say that I received comments from my constituents about the super priority for workers in bankruptcies. I would like to tell you about Jean-Sébastien Bélanger of Saint-Hilaire who asked why one always had to go to court, a costly and unnecessary process, when the government should shoulder its responsibilities. That is precisely what we ask today: that the government assume its responsibilities and for once give workers the right to recover the money owed them for which they worked.

I would like to ask my colleague a question on retroactivity. We talk about giving compensation to people who are affected, namely the workers, when a company goes bankrupt. However, many workers are affected but will not be able to get any compensation because that legislation has no retroactivity clause. If this is the case, a large number of workers who suffered from bankruptcies—after all, let's not forget that we are in a recession—will not be entitled to that wage protection.

Therefore, I would like to know my colleague's opinion on retroactivity, since this is an extremely important element if we are to make sure that there is justice not only for some but for all.

M. Kilger: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my NDP colleague, the hon. member for Chambly, for his questions and comments.

On the matter of super priority, we in the Liberal Party want to work on building a better balance, and more specifically, we do not want another tax.

To get back to his second question, about whether to support this retroactive concept, I must say I would favour of this kind of formula because it would be fair. Consequently, and also because of the recession, which is largely what dictates the government's financial policies, perhaps it would be an opportunity for them—

[English]

If I might, to take the money out of general revenues, if you will, and to give Canadian workers that retroactive supplement suggested by the member for Chambly.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, the subject matter of this particular piece of legislation has been talked about from time to time through my entire 12 years in this Chamber. It began I think long before that.

The act that is currently in place was passed in 1949. Sometimes it is wise to reflect on what Canada looked like the last time a bankruptcy act was passed by this Chamber. It certainly was not the same country. We had just finished World War II and were entering a new phase of our existence. I do not know what the population was but it was certainly less than half of what it is today. The origins of the people of this country were very, very different.

I simply bring those facts to the attention of the House to indicate that it is time for a change.

I was elected to this Chamber in 1979 and the previous year I had started a small business, an office coffee business. It had grown to some reasonable size with six employees and 350 coffee machines and delivery trucks, telephones, stationery and coffee supplies and so on. I remember the nervousness my wife and I felt as we went to the bank and signed the appropriate documents to get the funding to be able to buy some of the required capital equipment in the first instance and then to fund the cash flow.

Cash flow is a foreign concept to people who have never had a business of their own. It concerns how fast your money is coming in and how fast your money is going out. If it is going out faster than it is coming in you have a negative cash flow. If it is coming in faster than it is going out you have a positive cash flow.

I remember the National Energy Program in 1981. In my community discretionary spending was cut to the bone by company after company in 30 days. As a consequence of that sudden, abrupt downturn in the economy there were suicides, spousal battering, and increases in violent crimes. There was enormous stress and strain. The unemployment rate increased from less than 4 per cent to 11 or 12 per cent practically overnight in Calgary, Alberta. That was caused by a piece of public policy, the National Energy Program. It was a consequence which I do not think was intended by the government of the day. It was a consequence which the government of the day could have avoided if it had listened to some of us in opposition. However the bureaucracy's wisdom is frequently taken by governments to be better than that of members of this Chamber.

We make that mistake from time to time in our party, but less frequently, much less frequently.

Since 1985 one of the big achievements of this particular Parliament is the fact that we changed the rules for committees. Those of us who served prior to that time recognize the enormous difference that exists today in the functioning committees. Standing committees can in fact investigate things they decide to investigate, with resources to help them do it and witnesses.

We have a lot more witnesses in our legislative committees. With the latest changes made in May we are trying to force them to be a little more disciplined in their presentation and orient them toward the fine print of a particular bill.

The big achievement, which members who arrived subsequent to 1985 may not realize, is the fact that there is a genuine discussion on amendments which takes place. It is not simply with the minister, not simply with the bureaucracy, but with the members of the committee who have heard the witnesses and have listened to the testimony.

At the end of the day sometimes every single amendment is moved by all members of the committee. On other occasions there will be one member who is discrepant. On other occasions it will be government members versus opposition members, though that is not common.

I sat on the gun control committee recently, the first legislative committee I have been on in a while. The committee made 32 amendments to the bill and we split on one. The government and opposition split. People were nervous about the split because it essentially established democracy's control over the regulatory process. It said: "We shall hear witnesses on regulations under this act". Government members supported that. It was an amendment I personally felt strongly about. Opposition members were nervous about supporting it, I think for other sets of reasons, and did not in the final analysis. They voted against that amendment but somewhat reluctantly. They felt that the place of democracy in that process would be more positive than negative.

I will come back to the downturn in the economy of the city of Calgary and my struggling young business which at that time was a couple of years old. In 30 days we lost close to 40 per cent of our market. Prior to that downturn in the economy we were paying suppliers in 90 days and customers were paying us for our services in 30 days. Virtually overnight suppliers required payment from us in 30 days and our clients paid us in 90 days. We moved from a positive cash flow to a negative cash flow position, and with quite a few dollars involved you have no choice but to seek more funding in the middle of a downturn.

Thank heavens there were some assets. Our home was not heavily mortgaged and we were able to offer a lender some security of that kind, and we survived. Most of those 350 coffee machines I had out in the community were in small businesses. We would deliver them their coffee and put our machine in their firm to make their coffee.

Over 50 of them went bankrupt within six months, and the coffee we had advanced to them was gone with the receiver. The machines, which were never the property of the companies, were most often taken and simply disappeared. There I was on the other side of the fence as a small business person with nothing in law to enable me to get back my product, which still belonged to me because it had not been paid for, or to take back my machine, which was only on loan in the first place.

That is the domino effect of bankruptcy which this House, for the most part collectively, intends to change with this piece of legislation. It should be changed.

Listening to this debate, if there is any sort of disagreement with this bill it is probably an ideological difference between the New Democrats and my party, with some members of the Liberal party on either side of the fence. We believe you have to pay for something before you can do it and the New Democrats seem to believe you can borrow the money and do it anyhow.

There is a provision in the bill that would take care of the expenditure for employees who lose out in a bankruptcy case through a kind of tithe on all the businesses in the country. That includes public sector businesses that do not go bankrupt as well as private sector businesses. It is really a piece of unemployment insurance, a small extension of that principle.

Members rightly, I think out of conviction, do not like the tax. However it is amazing how little you hear about the pay-out side. Nobody is complaining about giving money to people, nobody is disagreeing that those people deserve money, that they are the victims of a bankruptcy simply because they were working for the wrong employer at the wrong time. The complaining we hear is about raising the money.

We have had discussions about decorum in the House. There are a lot of deeply felt feelings about that because it relates to our image in the community as members of this institution, and it relates to the image of the institution in the public's mind. People are common sensical and when we do not act responsibly, when we do not examine both sides of an issue, the expenditure side and the income side, when we try to pretend that something is free or that it is okay to go on forever borrowing money, we lose credibility with them.

In our debates if all of us were more dedicated to the principle of being practical, having a difference of ideas but carrying an idea through to its conclusion—if you want to make a pay-out then you have to produce the income—and sharing with members of the House how that might best be done then I think our credibility in the community would increase because we would be seen more often as common sense people. If we showed respect for each other a little more often in the Chamber that would be intensified and positive for our kind of democracy.

I rose today to simply put a little bit of my own personal experience on the table. The provisions of this bill when it comes to the protection of all the small businesses out there which supply businesses that go bankrupt are very positive. The protection of the workers is very positive. The disagreement is from where the income shall come to take care of those employees.

I have faith that hard working members of this Chamber are willing to meet on the standing committee and consider the bill. I have faith they will come up with an amendment or two which will satisfy hopefully all corners of the House. All corners of the House believe in responsible legislation, that if you have to spend you have to raise, that going on with borrowed money is not an option.

If members on the opposition side believe that borrowing money is the way to go, then there will be a split on the committee as well. If they work collectively at the situation and devise something that will work a little better than what is in there now, I think they will find support from the government members. They may even find some leadership among government members. Government members are as concerned as other members of the Chamber about the practicality of one proposal over another.

What I do not like to see is the NDP amendment that we are debating right now which would stop the bankruptcy bill. Voting for that amendment would mean no bankruptcy bill. For my 12 years in this Chamber we have said collectively it needs to be changed. The NDP at the end of the line stands up in this Chamber and moves a motion that would kill the whole thing and keep the act the way it is. That is totally unacceptable to us.

I would hope maybe the NDP might rise in this Chamber later this day and ask for unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment. I would guarantee on behalf of this side of the House we would be pleased to go along with that suggestion.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the input of the hon. member in the debate. I listened very carefully. I am pleased to report to him two things.

First of all, the committee process we have just gone through was a very complete process. We did not leave any ends untied, indeed we found many ends of the bill that were very much untied. We sought, with unanimity I might add of the committee, we unanimously agreed to what the flaws were and we unanimously agreed to what the solutions were.

The member was begging us almost to come to our senses, to come to some conclusion and think our thought process through. I want to report to him, first, that even members on his side thought the process through and thought better of the bill. As a result the committee in pre-study came up with 22 recommendations for change. One of the major recommendations deals with the wage earner protection fund.

The hon. member just mentioned that it is important for us to realize we cannot live on borrowed money. I could not agree with him more. If he reads the committee report or if he reads the Hansard from the committee deliberations, he will see what the committee has done, Liberal members, New Democratic members and Conservative members. It is that we recognize that fact and recognize that no, if we have a wage earner protection fund, the government, using borrowed funds will have to put $3.5 million into the fund. We said there must be a better way to do it.

Second, we did not think that small business in this country would support another tax no matter how small. We are concerned about consumer confidence and business confidence in the system.

We said there has to be a better way. The government's objectives are admirable and supportable. We do support the objectives. We came up with a proposal that is very detailed. We studied this thing inside out, upside down, every which way to Sunday, and we came in with a set of proposals that take the government off the hook. That means the government does not have to spend any money. We are doing the government a favour.

It has already been blamed for 32 taxes. We did not want it to be blamed for 33. The recommendations of the committee were to save the government from the embarrassment of another tax. In addition to that, we had a system in place whereby it should be self-financing through the superintendent's office.

Every position that we have put forward the department has had plenty of opportunity to come back and indicate to us that our logic is wrong. Not in one case has the department done that.

I want to let the hon. member know that we have done our job. We do not want to hold up progressive legislation, but at the same time this pre-study gave members of all sides of the House the ability without a noose around their neck from their respective Whips on policy positions.

That process has worked and what we have here is a good committee report and I would like to get his response. We urge the government not to take the easy way out which is to create a fund that is going to cost taxpayers money because the government has to contribute, but to look seriously at the amendments that their own members have put forward. It is a process that will work and it will show that the government has truly cared about saving small business from another tax and saving taxpayers from more taxes.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I have heard the arguments about super priority, the magic way of funding without cost to anybody. My experience tells me there is always a cost to somebody.

There is a tendency when speaking of super priority to say we are going to take the money from the bankers, take it from these rich guys who loan the money. That is a great concept.

The hidden part of that is the little guy who cannot borrow the money in the first place to try and achieve his dream. That is the one who does not come as a witness before parliamentary committees. That is the one members are unlikely to know about and understand unless you have done it yourself, unless you have signed your family home and your family's future to a loan to borrow the money to start an enterprise, unless you have faced that sudden change from positive to negative cash flow and had to go back to lenders a second time.

If those lenders need to protect themselves on a 2 per cent basis, a 3 per cent, or 5 per cent or whatever in making the decision about your loan when they look at those financial statements in all of their glory and all of their detail and they need to build in that extra factor for super priority they will. When they do they will choke the lifetime dreams of thousands of Canadians who are every bit as small and every bit as deserving as the employees of the bankruptcy.

It is an illusion to think this money can come out of the hide of the lenders. The world does not work that way. The costs come out of the hide of the borrowers and the real cost of this is the person who never has a chance to try his dream because he cannot get adequate financing in the first instance.

That is what is wrong with this proposal.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would like to bring to the attention of the House that we are now under Standing Order 74. The maximum time for speeches is 10 minutes with no questions or comments. I will now recognize the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak today on Bill C-22, the Bankruptcy Act.

I recognize, as my colleague who spoke before me pointed out, that the act allows unpaid suppliers to retrieve goods from bankruptcy within 30 days. However, there are two very serious catches. If a farmer for example cannot get his product back, if there is any added value for example a meat packer declares bankruptcy and the cattle have already been processed, he cannot get the meat back. If a vegetable crop has even gone through a washer which is part of the processing process, the farmer cannot get them back or get paid for them. Or if grain is delivered to an elevator and dumped into one of the silos along with other grain it cannot be identified as the farmer's particular grain so therefore he cannot get it back.

I would think that these areas do have to be corrected.

As I think back to the other forms of legislation that offered protection in parts of Canada quite a few years ago, I think of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. It provided for many of the same recourses but was far more specific in terms of extensions of time to allow a herd of cattle in a feedlot to mature to market weight or crops to ripen.

But it also had recourse so the farmer could have schemes or arrangements. They could make compositions in addition to the extension of time, and if necessary, renegotiate a mortgage. That legislation also reflects clause 11(1)(e) of the Farm Credit Act, which also states that the act gives the corporation the authority. Under that authority, the corporation may make schemes of arrangement, compositions, extensions of time or renegotiate mortgages.

I cannot understand for the life of me, with all the hardships in Canada today, whether it is the prairies or whether it is in central Canada or Atlantic Canada, why the Farm Credit Corporation is not using those provisions in the act to try to give some relief to those thousands of farmers across this country who are literally being forced off their farms in this financial crunch that has been brought about by the lack of attention of this government, first of all by the damage that is being done under the free trade agreement, and second, by the damage being done by export enhancement programs being used by our neighbours to the south of us.

Those export enhancement programs violate not only the spirit of the free trade agreement but also the free trade agreement itself, which is very specific and says that neither country will subsidize exports into markets of the other nation.

This government has not even called for consultations under chapter 18 of the free trade agreement, nor has it asked for compensation. So here we have a government that has ignored what is happening to us on the world markets, ignored the violations of the free trade agreement that are taking place, and have not even asked for consultations or compensation to help those farmers that are being forced off the land, and for not using the act as provided under the provisions of that act specifically chapter 11(1)(e) of the Farm Credit Act.

I also want to point out that there are other areas of grave concern to me and that is what is happening in our economy. Just yesterday I had some frantic telephone calls asking for help. "What can you do to help us, as small business people, who have ploughed our lifetime savings into not just a small business enterprise, but a business enterprise designed to renew the vitality and the growth of a small town?"

These young entrepreneurs in my constituency, in the township of Sombra, spent their savings which they had accumulated over many years to buy up the old stores and to renovate them. They made it into a tourist town. It is on the St. Clair River, with a ferry operation across to the state of Michigan, just a few miles from the city of Detroit in the heart of a potential tourist area of several million people. They spent their lifetime savings putting all of this together, restoring those old stores, having tenants come in who set up boutiques and gift shops, restaurants, all sorts of attractions.

As they opened these up, the businesses took off and prospered. But then we had a downturn in the economy. We know what went into effect on January 1, 1989. These real Canadian entrepreneurs who were attempting to attract American tourists to Canada and working for the last six years on this tourist development are the kind of business people the government claims it wants to help. It spent $1.2 million on a competitiveness study by an American it could have purchased the same at a book store for $40. They are going to spend tens of millions of dollars to study our Canadian economy, but they do not want to hear about free trade and the impact of that, the GST or the Canadian and U.S. interest rate spread or the high dollar.

These tourism operators could explain to the government what is happening without the cost of this $1.2 million. Yesterday, they had a notice of eviction delivered to them signed by the sheriff of Lambton County. I have a copy of it right here. It gave them just a few days to vacate.

This afternoon I had a note delivered to me in the House by the tenants of some of those stores who have thriving businesses who also have to vacate. The notices were delivered by the sheriff on behalf of the Federal Business Development Bank, which is willing to force them out of these facilities and close down the businesses these tenants are operating. It is completely unacceptable.

I have to ask, what will this act do in a case like this where these tenants have invested their lifetime savings in making these businesses go, competing against the free trade agreement and the GST and the high Canadian dollar, but are surviving and prospering and had their merchandise in place for the Christmas rush.

This is unacceptable. I ask this House to stop and take another look at this bill, the Bankruptcy Act, and tell us how it is going to help these tenants. How is it going to help these entrepreneurs who are being forced out just at the start of the Christmas rush, when they have put their lifetime savings into building up these businesses that are attracting tourists to Canada and then having the rug pulled out from under them by the government of this nation and the policies it put in place.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words on Bill C-22. At the outset I want to commend the minister and the committee for the pre-study it did on Bill C-22. I think it was a wise move on the part of the minister, and of course there was some excellent work done by the members of the committee. They are all to be commended.

The fact that the minister accepted, I believe, 16 of the 22 amendments they suggested to the bill is an indication of how much he thought of their work.

In the limited time available to me I want to talk a little bit about super priority. I wonder if many members realize where this all began. We had a previous bill before us on bankruptcy. I believe it was in the early 1980s. The minister I believe was the Hon. Judy Erola. The bill was before committee and it was sort of flip-flopping through the House. There was not too much attention being paid to it. All of sudden Maislin Transport in Quebec went bankrupt.

Members familiar with the transport industry will know the name Maislin, an over the road company. It had bought into a transport company in the United States and as a result of that investment and some other difficult times, it found itself faced with bankruptcy.

The employees of that company had cheques bounce all over Montreal and the various communities where they had their depots. At that time the minister brought in super priority. She suggested a $3,S000 per employee super priority. We asked her at the time where she got the $3,000 figure. At that time the average wage in a bankruptcy across Canada was $250. Why the $3,000? She said that was the semi-monthly wage of a machinery salesman. I could not see the connection. I don't know how many machinery salesmen there are in Canada as opposed to transport truck drivers and numerous other employees, but that is the origin of super priority.

There were other developments as a result of the super priority. The banks felt endangered to some degree. Looking at super priority, my own personal preference would be this 10 cents per employee per week. I think that is the least cost involved and I think the administration of it, putting it through the unemployment insurance fund would be the best way to do it. I cannot agree to put another charge against the general revenue fund. We are, in fact, saying that all Canadians who contribute to the general revenue fund through taxes and tariffs and so forth should indemnify the wages owed by an employer to an employee. I cannot agree with that at all.

I want to talk a little bit more about what happens to a business when it goes under. I have run a business, and fortunately I was never bankrupt, but I was a creditor in a number of bankruptcies and I know what you go through as a creditor.

Why do businesses go bankrupt? If you analyse bankruptcies, you find in most cases that the reason the business went bankrupt was it just did not have enough money invested. There is no crime against that. If you look at business start-ups, business start-ups usually are in boom times. "Let's go in business for ourselves, the market is there, profit is available and product is available; let us go into business". You put the minimum amount possible into your business, never thinking you are going to have a downturn, and away you go. Some of them grow very rapidly, and if the market turns down they are in jeopardy. It is classical.

I had a look at this bill and I see that they are going to give people who supply merchandise to somebody who eventually goes bankrupt 30 days to retrieve that merchandise. I think that is a great move. I think that is a very positive thing in the bankruptcy. Nobody will find this written anywhere, but there is a feeling out there among people who are creditors in bankruptcies that there is an effort if you are going to go bankrupt to load up your inventory. If you are going to go bankrupt and you know it, load up your inventory so there will be more that can be sold to satisfy whatever creditors there are.

I had an experience in my own business, and it was a typical business arrangement, where sales were down for the quarter that we were operating in. One of my salesmen came in with a sizeable order but we looked at the name of the customer and we said "Wait a minute, we got some bad vibes about this fellow, we heard that he was kind of shaky". We did the normal checks through the banks and Dun and Bradstreet and other credit reporting agencies and they said that, yes, while he was having some cash flow difficulties he did seem to be well enough financed and he probably would be able to survive this. On the basis of that we went ahead and shipped the merchandise to him. Within seven days we heard that they were going to put a padlock on the door. Unbeknownst to me, the salesman who had arranged the sale went back to the gentleman who was going to go bankrupt and asked him if we could borrow back this merchandise because we had a large order to ship and we had to ship it by the end of the month—none of which was true—and could we have the merchandise back so we could complete this order. They gave us the merchandise back. We took it to our shop and we sold it. The company then went into bankruptcy and the receiver in bankruptcy called me on the phone and he said: "You owe us a bunch of merchandise here, you took merchandise from our inventory and we either want the merchandise replaced or we want you to pay for it".

I said: "We are not going to do that. You cannot expect me to deliver back to you merchandise from which you are going to give me 10 cents on the dollar." He said: "I will take you to court". I said: "Be my guest. I do not think there is a court in the country that would agree with you". Fortunately, by just hanging tough, we got away with it, but there are a lot of other people who did not get away with it. That is one of the tragedies in bankruptcy. Those are the people who, as a result of someone else going bankrupt, are thrown in jeopardy themselves.

What I like about this bill is that it is a package. It says we have done pre-study, we have accepted some amendments, we have this business of taking care of up to 90 per cent of the employees' wages by a 10 cent per employee per week plan. I think that is the least costly of all the plans. We have virtually a chapter 11, as they call it in the United States bankruptcy, a provision to allow the company to restructure over a short period of time. We also have this business of super priority and the general revenue fund to adjudicate, I guess, when we get to committee.

I think the over-all package is good. I hope we get to the legislative committee shortly. I would like to see this bill through and operating in the shortest possible period of time. I think that if we can get it into operation it is going to help a lot of people.

I am aware that some people have spoken against John Bullock of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. They have spoken against the 10 cent a week per employee. He apparently prefers the super priority. I am afraid of the super priority because I believe that is going to inhibit the ability of small business to borrow from banks. I do not want to do that in any way, shape or form having said that lack of capital and lack of a line of credit is the main reason why businesses go under.

With those few remarks, I will pass the baton on to someone else.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin here by mentioning, perhaps for a third time in this House, that this proposed bill is not going to make it difficult for small business to get loans.

I worked on this committee, I worked on this bill and I would like to illuminate the hon. member with some additional information he may not have that came from business. I am specifically speaking about the Quebec Contractors Association. These people came before us and said: "Look, in Quebec we have to deal with super priority. That means that the workers are first in line and whenever there is a bankruptcy they get their money first". That is what we are asking for here in this bill. I asked the representative: "Well, what does that do for the banks and the caisses populaires and all those other lending institutions?" They said: "You know, it is funny. We not only have that, but we also have a tax or a lien in the construction in Quebec. Do you know what? The banks are not kicking". It has worked out pretty well. It has worked out for not quite several decades, but at least, I believe, since 1980.

I was surprised because I have heard the government say: "If we let workers have what they are due, the small businesses will never be able to get loans". That is not true at all. I think that we have to set the record straight.

I should add, by the way, that I do not think we should add another tax. My party does not believe that we should add another tax. Canadians are fed up with the taxes that we have had already. My party is fed up with the taxes that we have had already. We would like to see a more creative solution. We think that there is one. That creative solution is for the government not to spend the very little money that we already have on science projects. These are of little value in western Canada and British Columbia. Even our national scientists have said there is no reason to spend this $250 million. This $60 million or $70 million that we are asking for to protect workers could be coming out of general revenues if the government would learn not to spend money foolishly. That is what it is doing. We are having a $400,000 travelling committee to learn about prosperity.

We are having a great deal of money being spent on committees. We are having a great deal of money being spent on things which most Canadians would feel are superfluous. We are asking in this bill for approximately $60 million to $70 million. That money, as it has been expressed here, would come out of a tax. It must not come out of a tax, even if that tax is going to be 5 or 10 cents per worker. There is no such thing as a free lunch. We have said that. The Conservatives used to say that before they were in government. Now they pretend there is a free lunch.

It is not a free lunch and those people who need this money should not be taxed. Businesses should not have to pay the tax. What should occur, as I said before, is that this should come out of general revenues. There is money there for it if the government would just quit wasting the little precious money it has left.

The important thing to remember is that the people who are in bankrupt situations, the workers, must get their money right away. If they have priority, even before the government, these people will have a greater chance of getting their money than ever before.

I rise to speak on this Bill C–22 mainly because I am afraid that the government, as much as it pretends that it wishes to help workers involved in bankruptcies, does not really intend to take the committee's recommendations on super priority and revenues coming in order to protect the money that they will get from general revenues. I believe that this government is going to want to bulldoze through another tax, the 33rd tax that it has passed since it has been the government.

I will not accept that, and neither will Canadians. The members of all parties in that committee, Conservatives, NDP, Liberals, have actually presented some sound suggestions that the government can use in order to deal with this very difficult situation.

[Translation]

I am surprised to see that this government will not listen to the sensible suggestions made by its own members on the consumer and corporate affairs committee. A consensus was reached by the New Democratic Party, the Conservatives and the Liberals on requesting that a worker trapped in a situation where his company goes bankrupt be considered a secured creditor, in which case the money owed him, between $2,000 and $3,000, can be paid.

I know my constituents do not want another tax. So we must not levy another tax to set up a fund to help workers trapped in a bankruptcy situation. It would be better to take this money from existing funds. The federal government has plenty of money, but unfortunately, the government tends to waste it.

One of my constituents, Mr. André Dubois of Saint-Bruno, who is fed up with the GST, wrote me as follows: "Politicians in general don't work for us but for their own personal glory, and they don't care about the well-being of Canadians. All programs are launched on a short-term basis. What we need is the will to change our political perspective and our political traditions. Programs, goals and promises should no longer be changed after each election".

• (1410)

The Canadian public wants some common sense from this government. Instead of more taxes, it wants the government to spend smarter. No more spending right and left on plane trips that may or may not have been necessary. No more wasting money on those big limousines you like to use because you happen to be in government. No more spending money on your friends in the advertising business who expect a reward for supporting you in the last election. All this has to stop. The time has come to spend money on our workers, to give them more protection. I believe that if you would only realize that, Canadians would be far better protected than they are at the present time.

[English]

In conclusion, I would just like to add that a lot of people out there are involved in these bankruptcies as workers and they realize that presently they have no protection, or very limited protection at best.

I have pleaded for retroactivity in this Bill C-22 because it is important that there be protection for those people who went through the recession and who represent the largest group concerned. If we pass this bill without retroactivity, they will be left high and dry. We must not allow that to happen.

I spoke with the government Whip and I explained why this was necessary. I told him that it does not appear that super priority or retroactivity will cause the banks any harm. I believe that essentially what we are looking for is protection for Canadian workers. I believe that with a minimum of good will from the other side of this House we can work together as we did in committee and protect all workers.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to say a few words on this important piece of legislation.

I want to begin by congratulating my friend and colleague, the hon. member for Dartmouth, on the masterful way in which he has directed our party's analysis and response to this legislation which touches a very complex and difficult set of issues. It affects in a profound way the conduct of business everywhere in Canada. As he has done on so many subjects since being elected to this Chamber, the member for Dartmouth has tackled this bill with enthusiasm, skill and with sure-footedness.

The reform of Canada's bankruptcy laws is long overdue. Our current Bankruptcy Act dates back to 1949. In the face of the manifold changes that have occurred in the Canadian economy and in the business environment in the past 42 years, the provisions in this legislation are increasingly anachronistic and woefully out of date.

These years have witnessed a growing library of departmental reviews and parliamentary studies and at least six failed attempts at legislation. Clearly all members of this house share the desire to see this legislative attempt succeed.

We applaud the government on having introduced this bill and also on having submitted it to pre-study before second reading. We think that was an eminently worthwhile thing to do.

The member for Dartmouth and other members on this side of the House have worked assiduously to enable the bill to be improved.

While we support the government's introduction of this legislation, it does not mean that we should accept anything the government puts before the House. It does not mean that we should suspend our responsibility to scrutinize and evaluate critically both the broad principles and the detailed provisions of the bill. Nor does it mean that this government will get a blank cheque on this legislation.

Nevertheless, while we will be diligent in our questioning and in our examination of the bill, our intention which we assume the government shares is to secure workable, fair bankruptcy legislation, legislation which provides balanced and adequate protection to creditors and debtors and creates a stable climate for entrepreneurship and investment. That is what my colleague, the hon. member for Dartmouth, has done so well in his interventions at the pre-study stage of this bill and in his remarks earlier this week on second reading.

His approach has been to examine Bill C-22 bearing in mind not only the need to balance the competing and conflicting interests of the various direct participants in a bankruptcy, that is to say the debtor and the various creditors, but also bearing in mind society's broader interests, namely ensuring that the bankruptcy rules do not adversely affect the climate for business investment, risk taking, job creation and the incentives for the prudent management of business enterprises; the need of the worker to a fair settlement and recovery of wages lost as a result of a failure of a business enterprise; the interest of society in supporting reorganization where it may avert a costly bankruptcy without creating a cushion for sloppy management or preventing the difficult but sometimes necessary adjustment role that bankruptcy performs in a dynamic, modern, free market economy; and, finally, the strong opposition which all of us in this House have heard loud and clear from our constituents, the opposition to any addition to the already unacceptable burden of taxation which Canadians are obliged to pay.

It is this last consideration which has led us on this side of the House to take issue with the government's proposed design of the Wage Claim Payment Act, one of the central components of Bill C-22. With the Wage Claim Payment Act, the government proposed a scheme to ensure that the employees of a company thrust into bankruptcy or placed in receivership are reimbursed for salary or commission not paid by the bankrupt company.

Under clause 6 of Bill C-22, this payment would apply to unpaid wages and vacation pay as well as sales persons' expenses during the six-month period prior to the bankruptcy and up to a maximum of $2,000 or $1,000 in the case of sales persons' expenses.

In order to claim the benefit, an individual would have to submit a claim to the trustee, liquidator or receiver who would in turn submit it to the Superintendent of Bankruptcy for verification. The payment of these claims would not come, as in the case for example of the claims of the other creditors, from the disposal of the assets of the bankrupt company but would come from a fund financed by a new payroll tax on all employers, a tax equal to .24 per cent of the employer's weekly insurable earnings.

This is where we are in fundamental disagreement with the minister's proposal. Not only does this new tax constitute an additional burden on the employer and a burden which is directly related to employment, but I would submit it represents an inconsistent way of treating the outstanding claims by workers to the value of the debtor company. All other creditors receive their claims from the value of the disposed assets of the company. In this case workers are treated differently. They will be asked to receive their claims out of a fund raised by taxing all employers, in other words all businesses regardless of whether those businesses went bankrupt or not, in order to pay the workers' unpaid wages in the event of a bankruptcy.

We on this side of the House have suggested a different approach. We have suggested that the payment of wage claims be made up by the receiver to a legislated maximum of $3,000 with the amount guaranteed by the Superintendent of Bankruptcy and paid out of a fund financed by an across the board increase in the fees charged by the Superintendent of Bankruptcy.

• (1420)

The Superintendent of Bankruptcy would charge an additional fee out of the fee he charges on the assets of the bankrupt company in order to finance the payment of the unpaid wages and related expenses going to the workers of the company. It would be the company's assets, the bankrupt company's assets, from which the fund would be drawn in order to meet this creditor claim on the bankrupt company.

Second, we have suggested that unpaid wages have a super priority. In other words, this claim should be the first claim addressed by the creditors in disposing the assets of the bankrupt company. Super priority would mean that when the bankrupt company's assets are disposed of under the supervision of the Superintendent of Bankruptcy, it would be the workers' unpaid wages as defined more or less in the bill that would be dealt with first, ahead of the other categories of creditors.

There has been some question by government members on this concept of super priority. Apparently they believe that acceptance of the super priority concept would create a credit crunch, would impede investment and would make it more difficult for small businesses to receive loans from the banks.

We should bear in mind—and this is where I will conclude—that businesses go bankrupt as 56,000 businesses did in Canada this year. Regardless of what the cause of the bankruptcy is, and it may have nothing to do with the soundness of the business but simply the economic conditions like the recession caused by this government, when a business goes bankrupt and there are several categories of creditors there is always one creditor that gets super priority. In Canada the creditor which has been given super priority in the past has been the banks.

We believe on this side of the House that it is time. It is eminently fair for another category of creditor, namely workers and their families who are left high and dry by the fact that their source of income has eroded and there is no backup in many cases, to have chance to receive what small payment is due them from the company in which they have invested time and labour. Rather than give this credit priority to the banks, we suggest super priority should go to the workers.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have a chance to speak on Bill C-22 because it is a very important bill. It is important at any time and in any place, but certainly never more than in the current economic difficulties facing our country with thousands of businesses going bankrupt and requiring reorganizations of varying sizes. For instance, the Algoma Steel situation will see over 6,000 workers facing the threat of a company becoming totally insolvent. At the present time the company would have to go through the old Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act which of course is very out of date. This legislation would terminate that bill after three years.

What I want to talk about this afternoon, besides the impact on small and large business of not having adequate bankruptcy legislation, is the impact of reorganization as it affects Canadian farmers.

In 1984 the Bankruptcy Act was before Parliament and at that stage amendments were brought in to assist farmers in reorganizing the debt. Unfortunately that bill died on the Order Paper. The opposition of the day, which is the government of today, did not expedite that legislation as many pieces of legislation were being expedited in June 1984.

The whole situation of course since 1984, since the current government has been in power, has been one of tragic difficulties for Canadian agriculture. It has really been a tragic comedy of errors. The Minister of Agriculture imposed a moratorium on farm foreclosures under the FCC and then did nothing about it for 18 or 24 months in terms of bringing in debt restructuring mechanisms.

Finally Farm Debt Review Boards were brought into play, and some months after that process was put in place the government finally brought in the farm debt review board fund to carry out rescheduling of farm debt carried by the Farm Credit Corporation.

Farm Debt Review Boards have had some value I believe in mediating disputes between creditors and farmers, but the report that was put out by the Standing Committee on Agriculture really was quite critical of the way they have handled the work. It talked about the confusion in the role of the boards. Some boards operate on the basis that they are advocates for the farmers. Others simply put it through as mediators. It talked about the process and the delay of resolving the problems, the lack of expertise in financial analysis, the incomplete and poorly prepared financial information and the problems that exist in relationship to the sharing of information between the various stakeholders in farm debt. It talked about approaches that are inconsistent across the various provinces and about there not being enough follow-up after agreements have been reached. It went on and on and on.

The reason I speak this afternoon is that the agriculture committee in 1988 put forward a number of recommendations to deal with the operation of the Farm Debt Review Boards. One recommendation really stands out and that is recommendation No. 6 under section 3 of the farm debt review board report which reads:

> To correct these difficulties the committee recommends that the federal government institute the following: a procedure whereby the Farm Debt Review Board, in each case where no agreement is reached, shall make available to the farmer a report outlining their recommendation.

The reason I proposed that to the committee—and it was accepted by the committee—is that I foresaw new bankruptcy legislation in the future modelled after that in the United States which under chapter 11 in the United States provided for companies, proprietorships or in this case farmers provisions for reorganization of debt.

Although when this legislation first came out it was reported to be non-applicable to farmers, it is my understanding that legal officers of the House who were advising the committee said clearly that it applied equally to farmers, small businesses and other individuals seeking reorganization.

As I see the legislation, if this proposal in the agriculture committee of the House of Commons were adopted and the government were to put in place a procedure where Farm Debt Review Boards issued a report to each farmer where no agreement was reached under the farm debt review board procedure, the farmer would be free to apply to the Superintendent of Bankruptcy for a reorganization. He would go before the court and be able to ask for a reorganization. He would be armed with the report of the farm debt review board committee. Where that report suggested that if all the creditors had been willing to take a write down of 25 per cent or whatever, the creditors would get more that way than they would by simply foreclosing and selling off the assets.

As I understand the bill that is before us, there would be a vote of the creditors. Where two-thirds of the creditors agreed with that recommendation, the restructuring or reorganization would take place, whatever that restructuring was, whether it was to extend longer periods of time or rescheduling of debt or reorganization. In any event, that is the kind of thing that takes place under the existing Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act. Only this act would apply to all creditors, including farmers.

I think the legislation can be very beneficial and can work in harmony with the existing farm debt review boards, provided the government requires them to issue the report which I suggested this afternoon. I will be very interested in what happens in the committee hearings. Perhaps this proposal which I have outlined can be considered by the committee just to see whether there has to be some technical arrangements made in the way this new Bankruptcy Act will work, especially as it applies to company, corporate and individual reorganizations.

In the last two weeks I have attended two farm rallies, one in Regina last Thursday, where over 7,500 farmers attended, rallying to protest this government's cutback of support programs in the 1990 year, rallying to protest that a government would be so insensitive, almost insane we could say, that it would cut support programs by 40 per cent in a year when commodities, grain, wheat, oats, barley, are dropping by 30 per cent on world markets.

They are not rallying because they like to take a day off and go to Regina from all over that province and across Manitoba and Alberta as well. They are rallying because they cannot make it. Many of them are going to face reorganization, bankruptcy, foreclosures and so on. Today and every day two farmers in Saskatchewan walk off the land.

I believe that the procedure that I have outlined here today combined with this new legislation could be very helpful in carrying out those reorganizations and assisting where the government has failed over the past year or two in its reorganization programs, in its support programs to farmers.

I hope that this legislation ultimately will be passed, taking into account those very worth while, very capable recommendations of the hon. member for Dartmouth. He has really brought a lot to—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Essex—Windsor on debate.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I think it is important for us first to see just how serious the whole question of bankruptcy in this country has become. We have across this country in the past year seen over 13,000 firms which have gone bankrupt. We have seen close to 60,000 consumers who have gone bankrupt. We are talking about something which has cut a wicked swath right across small business, and not just the small business community in this country. It has hurt people badly.

We in this party have been calling for this kind of legislation for months. It has taken the government a long time to come forward. I have to congratulate it on finally having the courage to bring to the House of Commons a piece of legislation to change the Bankruptcy Act.

The previous Liberal government which faced an even worse recession did not even bring forward a piece of legislation to improve the Bankruptcy Act. I say that is to their shame.

As I think about this act, I think about some of the people in my constituency. I think of the people at Brant Castings, for instance. Brant Castings was a firm which was originally established by Birla Corporation of India, a firm which brought a great many employees into the operation and a firm which was quite successful for a period of time. That firm, however, after several sales, ultimately went bankrupt. It went bankrupt leaving workers in the lurch.

That is for us at the very heart of the problem of bankruptcy. The workers that I represent who worked at Brant Castings have not been able to get their vacation pay. They have not been able to get their severance pay. They have not even been able to get, in some cases, wages which were owing to them from Brant Castings, this despite the fact that the owners of Brant Castings continued to operate other enterprises in our community which are viable, which have all sorts of assets and are making a great deal of money for those owners. There is something about that which is terribly unfair.

I think of the workers I talked with just last week from GTL, Glengarry Transport Limited, which went bankrupt. Workers in my city, truck drivers who sat around the table in the teamsters headquarters talking with me, told me about the thousands of dollars in back pay, in severance pay and vacation pay which they were not going to receive because GTL had chosen to go bankrupt.

In the case of some of these trucking firms that have gone bankrupt it has been even more scandalous. Some of these firms had first established operations in the United States in order to be able to take over the business of their operations in Canada when the Canadian operations were permitted to go down the tubes.

Surely that kind of reality is something that should not be possible in this country.

It has not just been industrial workers or truck drivers. Farmers have come to talk to me about being forced into bankruptcy in my constituency. Throughout Essex County the rate of bankruptcy for farmers has increased dramatically in the last few years. The debt review board which was established by the federal government, as many of these farmers see it, has not become a defence for the farmer but instead a defence for the financial institution at the expense of the farmer.

• (1440)

This legislation in front of us is certainly a response, and I say a serious response, to some of these problems. I do not think it is a sufficient response but it is an important step forward, something which we have called for and which we are pleased to see in front of us. The approach which is being taken has two very good things within it. The first is a respect for companies and an attempt to keep them, to give them breathing space so that they can continue as viable institutions. The second is the establishment of a wage protection fund. These are both very positive steps.

There are however three serious problems with the legislation as it presently stands, and I hope these will be addressed in committee. The first is the amount of support which workers can receive from the wage protection fund. In my view the $3,000, divided $2,000 and $1,000, is too low a level. The province of Ontario, which has just established a wage protection fund, has set the level at $5,000 and has also established much more funding than is being proposed with respect to this particular wage protection fund.

Second, it is very important that this government look very carefully at the question of super priority. I hope that people will approach it on the committee as they approached it in the pre-study, on an non-ideological basis, with an open mind. I hope the government will accept amendments which suggest the super priority approach is something that deserves emphasis.

Finally, to be very blunt, to suggest to small businesses, medium businesses, and public sector institutions which are already being squeezed right across this country that they should have to pay the whole cost of this wage protection fund is frankly irresponsible. It has been opposed by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business and by many other business groups and public sector groups. It is not an approach which any government should be taking, given how weak our economic recovery is. I hope that there will be a rethinking of these three points at the committee stage.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to make a few comments on this particular bill because I think it is more than opportune that at a time when we are seeing record bankruptcies in this country we are discussing a new approach to bankruptcy legislation. In fact the legislation that we have on the books now was passed in 1949, which was the year after I was born. Certainly the economy in many ways has changed as much as I have in the time since then.

I would also like to point out that within my own province of Saskatchewan this is a very critical question because the rate of bankruptcies has been mounting dramatically over the years. The figures I have before me show that the last year the Blakeney government was in office, 1981, there were 167 business bankruptcies in the province of Saskatchewan. By the time the federal government opposite was elected in 1984 there were 309 business bankruptcies. By 1989, the last complete year for figures which I have, there were 556 business bankruptcies. That is about a fourfold increase since 1981 in business bankruptcies in the province of Saskatchewan. That is an outrageous record. This is a timely piece of legislation.

As well I want to compliment the people involved in the pre-study process. I think the members of the committee who undertook that are justly proud of the work they did. We have much stronger legislation as a result of this. I hope that at the further committee stage, following second reading of this bill, further improvements could be made.

There are three specific areas that I would however like to comment on which need to be revisited and need some serious amendment. The first deals with the whole question of how this bill relates to agriculture producers and farmers in this country.

The farm community, as we all know, is under perhaps the greatest stress that it has been under since the 1930s. In fact it might well be under the greatest stress that the family farm community has ever been under. Certainly if we want to protect the family farm sector in this country, if we want security of food supply, if we want to be a sovereign country when it comes to feeding ourselves, we have to be more than cognizant about the situation facing farmers and we have to be proactive about it.

As previous members have mentioned there have been rallies attracting as many as 7,500 people in Regina, 4,000 people in Rosetown, and in Spirit River and Winnipeg that have underlined the point that the farm community is in desperate straits and that many of these people are facing imminent bankruptcy.

There are a few aspects of this bill that need to be addressed when it comes to giving farmers some support in bankruptcy situations. I am not now speaking about their own bankruptcy but rather their interaction with businesses that go bankrupt. Certainly the farm community has been making representations to governments for a long period of time. When I read the transcript of the presentations that were made in the pre-study process it was evident that the farm leadership in this country is getting more than impatient with the lack of action which has been taken.

One of the problems is that while there is a recognition in this bill that there is a 30-day period of retrieval for suppliers of a good or somebody whose products are involved with a bankrupt company, this is basically meaningless in the case of most agriculture products. How do you separate your kernel of wheat from your neighbour's kernel of wheat? How do you separate one tomato from another or one apple from another? Even in the case of livestock it is often very difficult to sort a specific animal from another once they have been through the sales process.

For many producers the deliveries they have made to a company that has gone bankrupt represent the whole year's income, a whole year's production for that farmer. Therefore, if the company goes bankrupt the whole year's income is wiped out. That is something that I do not think is recognized in this bill which I think we need to address specifically.

There are a few aspects to that which bear looking at. One is that there has to be a new look at how super priority applies to farmers. Second, I think there needs to be a special fund which farmers can draw on given the impossibility of identifying an individual farmer's production from other farmers' production of many commodities in the case of a bankrupt company.

Third, and I think most important, we have to stop the erosion of the orderly marketing process because the marketing boards, the Canadian Wheat Board and other similar institutions do not go bankrupt. They pay farmers in cash and on time, and offer a secure market for farm products that does not leave farmers vulnerable to the vagaries of small companies and fly-by-night operators and others who might go bankrupt.

I think the whole trend we have seen away from orderly marketing is one of the things that has made farmers much more vulnerable to the whole process of bankruptcy than they otherwise need to be.

• (1450)

The second criticism I have of this legislation is one which was pointed out to me by the Saskatchewan School Trustees Association. It pointed out in a letter that the proposed legislation would cost education in Saskatchewan some $130,000 to $150,000 per year at its current levels. Certainly that is a large sum of money for school boards which are struggling in the current economic environment to absorb.

School-boards have been placed under increasing pressure through a number of processes. Obviously the whole process of downloading from the federal government to the provincial government to the local government has resulted in a situation where education and other public services, like municipal government services and hospital boards, are much more dependent on the local tax base and local taxpayers than they otherwise would have been.

Given the fact that those taxpayers and tax bases are being squeezed extremely tight at this time, it seems inappropriate to me for us to be contemplating legislation that loads a new cost on to those publicly funded bodies.

It also is inappropriate to load this cost on those kinds of bodies because there is not even the remotest possibility of those bodies ever going bankrupt. These employers are forced to bear a cost for a situation which will never apply to their employees. A school-board has never gone bankrupt in this country, nor has a hospital board, nor have provincial governments, nor have federal governments, though they might if the present trends continue. If these government bodies go bankrupt everyone else will have gone bankrupt first.

It really is quite academic to contemplate a situation where these bodies would go bankrupt. It seems inappropriate to be applying this tax to those bodies.

It is inappropriate to fund the wage protection fund through an increased level of taxation. As other speakers have pointed out this would represent the 33rd increase in new taxes by this government since its election in 1984. The business community and consumers are saying: "Enough is enough when it comes to taxation".

Grant Devine found that out in Saskatchewan. He had just introduced a provincial sales tax harmonized with the GST to the citizens of Saskatchewan. Not only was he rejected by the consumers of the province but his actions were decisively rejected by the business community of that province as well.

Not only is it inappropriate in a time of recession and tough times for business to load on another tax but if this government has any regard for its political future it should be looking very closely at how much the consumers and the business community will bear when it comes to new taxes. The government should take a new look at how this is funded and ensure that it is funded out of general revenues as it should be.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to interrupt for just a second. Earlier today the member for Kamloops rose and raised an issue of conduct in the House. At that time I indicated that I thought he should look at his own behaviour in terms of Standing Order 36(7). That was followed by an intervention from the member indicating that he had done nothing wrong, that all he had done was to read from a petition, and that I as a government member was trying to keep him from his rights of free speech in representing his petitioners in the House.

I have had a chance to examine the petition and to examine the tape of what the member said in the House. I would simply like the House to know that he went beyond the petition in dragging in the issue of a Canada–U.S.–Mexico free trade deal and that he dealt with the motivation of a company called Multinational Resources which was not indeed part of the petition. Therefore the statement he made in the House about his own behaviour is simply incorrect and I think very inappropriate given the nature of the day and other things that had happened earlier in this House.

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, I certainly concede that I have not been a member of this House for as long as the government Whip but I have learned, and I hope that you will bear me out, that it is the custom of this House that if one decides to launch a personal charge of some sort that notice be given to the person and generally speaking that one waits until the person involved is actually in the House.

I would hope very much in the spirit of trying to see to it that we do have civility in the House that the government Whip would get up and withdraw his comments now. If he wishes to raise them at a future point when the member is in the House I am sure that our House leader will be quite prepared to respond.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The comments are unanswered now and I think that once the hon. member for Kamloops is in the House he may reply if he likes. I do not feel that we should get into that any further. The hon. member for Kootenay East has the floor on debate.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to enter into the debate on Bill C–22, an act to enact the Wage Claim Payment Act.

It is without a doubt a step in the right direction. Bill C–22 is proof that the government shares many of the concerns of the area of protection for workers affected by the Bankruptcy Act. I would also like to say that although it took seven years for the government to act it has at least started to act in bringing in this bill.

I do not think I need to remind members of this House that the previous Liberal government failed to act on this important matter during its time in government. The member for Nickel Belt has risen on numerous occasions identifying the problems workers have when bankruptcies take place in trying to acquire their wages.

I agree fully with the basic principle of Bill C–22, that it addresses the issue of compensation for employees and it allows for some breathing room for businesses facing bankruptcies. These are actions that New Democrats, I believe, and all Canadians support.

This bill like all legislation is based on a principle but it is also an attempt to define and put into place regulations that attempt to bring the principle to life. While I support the principle and general thrust of Bill C–22 there are in my opinion a number of ways to greatly improve the legislation.

I would like to offer a couple of suggestions which I believe were also made in committee. First, there is the issue of priority in cases of bankruptcy. Bill C–22 does not really give jurisdictional priority to workers. It does not challenge the traditional hierarchy of creditors. The only wage claim payment contained in the bill is in fact external to the bankruptcy settlements process. It comes in the form of employer tax to be collected through the system.

What this government is doing is getting some additional taxation by passing a bill and again hitting the very people who are going to have the hardest time in trying to pay, and that is the small business people and the various small businesses which are trying to operate in very competitive markets.

Yet the government is determined to bring in this kind of taxation that will bring about those kinds of problems. For instance, it does not address the issue of private pensions. What about the pensions within the protection of a bankruptcy act. People have paid into pensions, or are part of a private pension scheme. While we look at the protection of the wage portion of it, what about the pensions? I say to you that while we are addressing the kind of work that went into this kind of bill, that is this big and this thick, and with all the committee work that went on, surely the government could have considered protecting pensions also. There are some very serious flaws in this bill.

• (1500)

As well, the $60 million wage compensation fund which is supposed to cover all of Canada is a band-aid. This fund will be eaten up in no time at all if the present levels of bankruptcies continue.

In my riding alone, I know of many bankruptcies that have taking place and of the serious affects they have, not only on the workers but also the people who are losing their pensions. It also hurts the surrounding community.

Finally on this point, the tax of 10 cents per week per worker is unfair. Surely we should take into account the size and health of the business. Should a small business really be taxed at the same rate as, let us say, the finance industry which employs 500,000 people? Should municipal governments, hospitals or school boards be forced to pay this tax when they cannot go bankrupt?

I feel these are questions that should be looked at seriously before the final bill is passed.

The idea of establishing priority for workers would have many advantages over a fund created by a new tax. By giving employees priority over banks the legislation would be practically self-financing.

In most cases banks are the first in line to collect outstanding debts during bankruptcy. By giving employees first priority we would not need a new tax and I cannot for the life of me see banks suffering. It is common practice for banks to ensure that the market value of assets pledged as collateral is much less than the size of the loans. Why not give employees a priority? Who would lose? The only thing lost would be the new tax on business. Why bring in a new tax when the money is already there?

I would like to finish by simply summing up my position. Bill C-22 represents a long overdue step in the right direction, but I think we can accomplish even more with no additional cost to the taxpayers.

Again this government is emphasizing its tax grab to the ordinary Canadian people in another way in another bill. It is like every piece of legislation. When the government brings in a piece of legislation it always tacks something extra on to it. I would like very much to be able to support this bill as a principle, but some of the things that are added into this bill and some of the things that are going on in this bill makes it almost impossible for me to do so.

I am very pleased to have had the opportunity to make my comments. I will close by urging the government to finally do away with the tax grab it is trying to bring about. Every bill we see in this House is further taxation. For goodness sake, get away from this idea of taxation and find another way that is more evenly balanced and fairer for our people.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order, in light of the comments made by my friend the government Whip who had some comments to make about a petition I had introduced earlier.

I do not know if the government Whip was embarrassed by some of the comments I made. I do not see why he would be. He was concerned that a reference I made about a company in British Columbia was inappropriate.

I simply want to say that I have a copy of a similar petition. As a matter of fact, it is the same petition, which I will introduce Monday and it refers to a firm called Multinational Resources. This is not a figment of someone's imagination. This is a firm that trades on the Vancouver Stock Exchange. Its principal is a fellow by the name of Bill Clancy who used to be executive assistant to—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I think the hon. member can either bring up the point of order immediately or he can defer it until the government Whip is in the House at a future time. I am not going to make a ruling on it yet, but I know exactly what is coming on here. However, I wish the hon. member would bring his argument to a close, please, on his point of order.

An hon. member: Here is the government Whip.

Mr. Riis: My point of order is that apparently the government Whip did not believe what I was saying in my petition when I was reading it on behalf of my constituents, and he threw some doubt as to its legitimacy or whether my constituents were reflecting reality in their concerns.

I simply want to say, particularly now that my hon. friend is in the House, that I have followed the rules as laid out in the traditions of the House of Commons whereby 15 minutes is set aside each day for members of Parliament to present petitions on behalf of their constituents. I was doing that.

As a matter of fact, to save some time, because it was a long petition and rather than read out all parts of it I thought I would summarize it. As you so aptly pointed out, Mr. Speaker, a number of my colleagues were waiting to also present petitions. So I said: "How can I condense this and yet reflect the basic thesis of the petitioners?"

Mr. Milliken: That is what the rules say you must do.

Mr. Riis: Well, as my hon. friend from Kingston and the Islands points out, that is what the rules indicate. One is to summarize as best one can the content of the petition. I did that. I pointed out that a particular firm was planning to introduce engineering works to divert the North Thompson River into the Columbia valley basin and eventually to transfer water to San Diego, California.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Does the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands wish to say a few words on this in regard to this debate? Then I will set it aside for a ruling.

[Translation]

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, by chance, I consulted the sixth edition of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules & Forms and I found citations concerning the presentation of petitions in this House. Citation 1041 reads as follows:

> A member, when presenting a petition, may not make a speech nor present argument in support of the petition.

Only a brief summary of the petition is allowed. Citation 1042 reads as follows:

> When presenting a petition, a Member may make a brief statement of the content of the petition. In making such a statement, the Member should avoid going beyond the thrust of the petition and entering debate.

I think that the rules are very clear. If there is a problem with what the hon. member for Kamloops said when presenting his petition, I am sure that the hon. government Whip immediately raised the problem with the Speaker.

Perhaps the hon. member for Kamloops said something that was in the petition. I do not know and I cannot say, obviously. He can only present a summary of the petition and that is what he said today. Now if you want to hear more from the hon. government Whip, fine. If not, I think the case is very simple and you should give your opinion on it.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I do not think I have to hear any more arguments. I want to thank the government Whip for coming into the House while the hon. member for Kamloops put his arguments forward. I also want to thank the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

I will review the "blues". I would like to have another look at the "blues" just to see exactly how that petition did read and then I will come back with a ruling. We will carry on with debate.

• (1510)

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, since it was not clear when the government Whip indicated his concern, could I ask for a clarification? What is the point of order? What is the concern that was raised by my hon. friend?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Do you want me to repeat it, or do you want the government Whip to repeat it?

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I know that you could repeat it, but I would like my friend to repeat it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I think you will have an opportunity to read the "blues" and I do not think we should get into the debate any further at this time.

Mr. Langdon: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but surely now that my House leader is back in the House it is the time that the government Whip, if he has something that he wishes to raise, should raise it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I just said that he did raise it. The hon. member for Kamloops had heard the remarks. I think he will be able to look at the "blues," and then I will be able to make a ruling on it as soon as I have an opportunity to read the petition again in the "blues". I feel that the matter is closed now.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to enter into debate on this most important piece of legislation. I remember years ago when I was first elected to this House. I think calls were then being put forward for legislation on bankruptcy. Year after year those same pleas kept coming forward, that we needed to do something in order to update our bankruptcy legislation. For one reason or another, while various ministers took various initiatives at least to indicate their intentions, they never went anywhere. Consequently once again here we are debating Bill C-22 regarding the Bankruptcy Act and the Insolvency Act.

Talking about bankruptcy these days seems to be a most appropriate discussion topic when we consider what is going on out in the real world. As we speak, thousands and thousands of bankruptcies are unfolding each day that the House is in session. This has become almost an unbelievable statistic that is presented on a monthly basis when we once again get the aggregate composite of the number of bankruptcies for the month of July, the month of August and the month of September. It is staggering.

We all know that this is only the tip of the iceberg. For every business that goes bankrupt many others simply close their doors, simply become a business that no longer exists. There is a graveyard of businesses that have gone under and the scorched earth policy of the various programs this government has imposed on businesses which has resulted in a travesty nothing short of embarrassing.

Literally thousands and thousands of Canadian firms went bankrupt during the past year, with liabilities in the billions and billions of dollars. We should also acknowledge the fact that while this is referring to business bankruptcies many individuals had to declare bankruptcy as well. The sad thing is that this has occurred many times as a result of nothing the individual or the firm has done, but they have been caught because of various policies and various economic circumstances beyond their control. I think all of us acknowledge the fact that from time to time we make mistakes, from time to time businesses make a bad judgment call and find themselves in dire economic straits and consequently pay the ultimate price of bankruptcy.

These days many people—and I am thinking particularly of those in the agricultural sector—find themselves having to abandon their means of livelihood, abandon the nature of their business, the nature of their enterprise. They are simply driven out from the life and business they have pursued because of reasons beyond their control. It is obvious that this is something we must discuss, the whole matter of bankruptcy.

We are talking today about the principle of this legislation. I want to put it into some context by simply suggesting that the current Bankruptcy Act dates back to 1949 and has never been seriously amended over the years. As far back as 1970, a study committee report commissioned by the government noted that the 1949 act essentially reflected economic and social conditions existing before the Second World War, that the Bankruptcy Act was inhumane, antiquated, and gave the lowest priority to people while making it easy on those who were making good incomes to walk away from their debts. It also indicated that employees of bankrupt firms were virtually assigned an expendable commodity status and that after the banks and secured creditors had scavenged the remains of the corporation or firm, workers were granted a preferred status for up to $500 in wages and up to $300 for unpaid sales person expenses.

We could go on and on in terms of the obvious shortcomings of the present legislation.

Between 1975 and 1984 no fewer than six bills were introduced by successive federal governments and they all died on the Order Paper. That clearly indicates that the governments of the day really had no will to proceed with bankruptcy laws that would treat employees equitably, that they were quite prepared to continue with the status quo which gave the employer, the banks and secured creditors a priority. The reality was that in spite of what appeared to be initiatives by various federal governments the results were that the bills all died on the Order Paper.

In 1986 the then Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs indicated that amending the Bankruptcy Act to give more protection to employees was one of his priorities. Here we are in 1991 and we are still dealing with it. As a matter of fact we still have a long way to go. Hopefully, though, we will now move expeditiously because of the work done in pre-study by the committee.

Earlier this year a member of cabinet had promised us a new and more equitable bankruptcy law for the spring of 1991. Seven years after this government had been in power and four ministers later we finally have a new bill before us, Bill C-22. It was introduced and read the first time back in June 1991 and the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations conducted a preliminary study of this bill in September 1991.

The representative of the New Democrats participated in that study. I must first of all acknowledge and give the individual a great deal of credit for working with his colleagues in a co-operative and productive way. He has come up with a piece of legislation. While there are certainly concerns, and they have been registered by members from all sides, it is a relatively positive piece of legislation that benefited greatly from the pre-study that took place in that standing committee.

I must say in terms of the basic principle of the bill that we do agree that the principle itself provides compensation for Canadian workers for a situation in which they have no control and cannot be held responsible. I am referring to wages and vacation pay protection for up to $2,000 for 90 per cent of their claims and possibly an extra $1,000 refund for travel expenses incurred by those people involved in the sale of business. It also gives bankrupt firms some breathing time to reorganize, negotiate and possibly recover before secured and unsecured creditors move in. This gives a 30-day moratorium which the court could extend up to five months if it sees appropriate.

However, Bill C-22 has some major weaknesses and the work done at the committee level clearly addresses virtually all of them. The Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs has tabled for us 21 recommendations. I think it is fair to say that almost all of those recommendations are the result of thoughtful and dedicated work by members of the committee. Having looked over them, all but one or two I think we support enthusiastically.

However the question is: Will the minister incorporate them in the legislation? This will be in a sense the acid test or the litmus test of parliamentary reform. If the government believes that the work of committees is legitimate, if the government really believes those members of all political parties who contribute unbelievable amounts of time and talent to those committee hearings and committee proceedings, and if the government believes that this is important for this institution, which most of us certainly share as a very important part of our work, it is up to the minister to indicate his good faith and introduce these recommendations into the legislation.

I hope we will see the majority of these recommendations being accepted and incorporated. It is, however, unlikely that the minister will have the political courage to adopt some of the fundamental recommendations, particularly those pertaining to the Wage Claim Payment Act. If that is the case, Bill C-22 will pass at second reading and proceed to committee. I believe at committee stage members participating in that committee considering the multi-faceted legislation will be provided with an opportunity for them to introduce these particular changes.

I want to concentrate on the major weaknesses of the bill which were addressed by the committee and that the government is least likely to correct. They are primarily in two areas: the priority of claims for workers and what they call walkaways coverage.

Bill C-22 does not really give a judicial priority to workers and really does not challenge the traditional hierarchy of creditors, with the exception of course of the Crown priority being reduced on one minor point, that is when the Crown is acting as a regular creditor to the firm it will be considered to be so. The project cost of this is $25 million.

The government has merely built in a wage claim payment that is external to the bankruptcy settlement process and the workers' compensation will be financed through a tax levied on employers and collected through the UI system.

Mr. Speaker, you are probably asking as you listen: Why a super priority? Workers are morally on top of the hierarchy of creditors and should be legally treated in that fashion. This has always been one of the pillars of our position on this issue. In that spirit I refer back to the member who represented us on this committee and his private member's Bill C-217 which seeks to amend the priority of claims section.

Mr. Speaker, I notice you are indicating my time is unfortunately coming to an end. There really is so much more to say, but perhaps we will have another opportunity to do so at committee, report stage and third reading. With that I will say there is much more to say but I will use another occasion to say it.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, I have been listening to the debate most of the time in my office. I want to take about three or four minutes to say something particularly to my good friend, the hon. member for Mississauga South.

It seems to me there is something we are forgetting in the arguments that have been made from all sides on this legislation, that is employees, whether they are management, working staff, those on commissions and whatnot, should be the lenders of first resort and have first priority in compensation in the event of a bankruptcy or being forced into receivership.

I want to remind my colleagues that employees, whether in management, on the production line or on commission, lend their physical presence, lend their minds and lend their labour in the production of whatever the company is producing. What they have lent is only repaid as and when they receive their salary, wages or commission. That is why I want to submit that these people in a company in bankruptcy, large or small, are the lenders of first resort.

The institutional lenders, the financial institutions, shall be next in line. There is the case of the suppliers who I believe should have the right under a receivership or a bankruptcy to enter a premises and take back any of the unsold product that was sold to the company but had not been paid for. It should also apply to any unpaid holiday pay, expenses that are eligible for reimbursement and sick pay. They should all be included because they are part of the costs of labour. They are included in the total cost of a labour package of any corporation. I just wanted to say that the employee of a company that has gone into bankruptcy is just as much a lender as any bank or other financial institution. If he has not been paid for the labour he put in, then he should have first priority on the recovery out of either any cash that is on hand or any assets that will be sold. They should be first in line before anyone else.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I recognize the hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley, the hon. Associate Minister of Defence said earlier that she would like to come into the House and report on the air crash in the Arctic.

Is it agreed that the hon. minister will have an opportunity to report?

An hon. member: Revert to statements by ministers.

An hon. member: Will we get back to debate?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Yes. I have to recognize the hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley for debate after. The hon. government Whip.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, in terms of order, I am not sure whether the entire House would like to see this matter disposed of in the sense of a voice vote which would then incur a referral until Monday at six o'clock.

I believe there are about 13 minutes left in the normal time.

An hon. member: There are four minutes left.

Mr. Hawkes: There are four minutes left. If that is not the predisposition of the House, should we maybe just take a minute and do the voice vote and get rid of that item, then have the minister's statement? I just raise the question.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I think we are going to run out of time. I know there is at least one other speaker and unfortunately he will not have time to complete his remarks. Perhaps the best thing to do would be to simply call it 3.29, which is the end of the debate period, and then move directly to ministerial statements.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it agreed?

An hon. member: We will agree to let him finish his remarks.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is whatever the House would like me to do. Shall I ask the hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley to complete his remarks, or start debate and I will cut him off in two minutes? The hon. government Whip.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I can be helpful. I am not sure what my hon. colleague was saying. If we wanted to go on for 10 minutes after the remarks of the minister of Defence to allow the completion of the remarks and dispose of the item, I think there would be a large majority of the House quite prepared to do that. If they do not want to dispose of the item today in terms of bringing it to vote, that clarity would help us and then the suggestion of calling it 3.29 would be appropriate.

If we need more time for debate on this bill on another day, that is one thing. If all we need is 10 more minutes, I think the House would unanimously agree to complete those 10 minutes and then vote.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, what I am saying is that we need a few more moments to complete our remarks beyond what we are able to complete today. Therefore, I suggest to my hon. friend, and to members of the House, that we call it 3.29, resume debate and finish this off in a matter of minutes, perhaps, on Monday. Now we can go directly to the ministerial statement.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Therefore it is 3.29.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I just want to understand where we are and where we are going on Monday. It is very important for us and for everybody to know.

I thought we had an agreement on that. I just want to make sure. If the member needs a few minutes more to finish his speech, I understand that. We had an agreement about the time from all three parties.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I find it now to be 3.29 p.m.

The House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, for goodness' sake, we called for the minister to make a statement. We are prepared to listen to that statement immediately. It is important that we do that. I think we should suspend Private Members' Business to allow the minister to make a statement and if the parties want to respond appropriately as per usual that ought to be allowed as well.

• (1530)

For goodness' sake, this is a serious issue and the minister has agreed to be here. She is here. Let us hear her.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall I revert to ministerial statements?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CRASH OF HERCULES AIRCRAFT

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the co-operation of the House at this late hour on Friday afternoon.

Before the weekend began I did want to rise in the House and provide you with the most recent information on the search and rescue efforts which are continuing at this time near Alert in the Northwest Territories.

All hon. members know that on Wednesday, October 30, a Hercules transport aircraft crashed with 18 persons aboard while on approach to Canadian Forces Station Alert.

Soon afterward, a massive search and rescue operation was mounted by air and land from several bases and installations across Canada, including CFB Trenton, CFB Edmonton, and of course CFS Alert.

I think all hon. members will know that at this time of the year the conditions in the high Arctic are harsh and unpredictable. The temperature fell to minus 20 degrees Celsius. There were severe winds which created wind-chill factors and poor visibility, including total white-outs. Last but not least, the terrain in that area is extremely rugged and efforts to reach the downed aircraft were hindered by these very inhospitable conditions.

The personnel persevered and, at a brief break in the weather last night, specially trained search and rescue technicians were able to parachute into the crash site. Shortly thereafter the ground search party also reached the crash site.

However, it is with deep regret and sadness that I must inform the House that five members of the Canadian Forces have perished in this most unfortunate incident. They are: Captain Couch of CFB Edmonton, Captain Trepanier of Canadian Forces Communications Command Headquarters in Ottawa, Master Warrant Officer Jardine of CFB Trenton, Warrant Officer Grimsly of the Canadian Forces Communications Command Headquarters in Ottawa, and Master Corporal Pitre of CFB Edmonton.

Their families have been notified of the loss of their loved ones. I am sure that all members of the House will join me in extending our very heartfelt sympathies to the families of these personnel.

The rescue effort is continuing. I am informed that at two o'clock this afternoon the first four of the injured survivors were evacuated to the Canadian Forces Station Alert.

Our skilled search and rescue technicians are on the scene and a medical evacuation of the remainder of the survivors is currently under way. It will take time because of the very demanding circumstances, but progress is being made.

The casualties are being evacuated by helicopter from the crash site to CFS Alert. From there, after further assessment and treatment, they will be evacuated through the Thule Air Force Base to the most appropriate locations for required medical care.

I would like to acknowledge the generous assistance that has been provided by the United States Air Force to this rescue operation.

Finally, on behalf of all Canadians and the families involved, I would like to extend my sincerest gratitude for the outstanding efforts that have been made by all the men and women involved in the search and rescue effort.

Obviously at this point it is premature to speculate on the cause of the crash. There is an investigation which is under way and I will be sure to keep the House informed, perhaps on Monday, of further details on this. Over the weekend we will be making information available through the media about any further circumstances and the location of the injured.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the minister taking the time out of her busy schedule today to come back to the House with this statement. I know that this problem must be preoccupying for her and I appreciate her taking the time to inform the House, and all Canadians, of the situation that has arisen in this tragedy on Ellesmere Island.

Like the minister, we would share the sense of loss that has occurred here for the five who have died in the crash. We extend our sympathies to the families and friends of those persons. It must be very difficult for them when these persons have been killed in the line of duty. We appreciate their service to our country and particularly in the very difficult circumstances they found themselves in in northern Canada at this time of year.

I want to commend the rescue efforts that the minister has indicated are being undertaken. I am pleased to hear that some of the persons on the site have been returned to safety. We hope, as does the minister, that the rescue efforts will continue successfully and that all the persons who are currently on Ellesmere Island can be removed safely to Alert and other places and receive the required medical treatment.

Our prayers go out to the survivors of the crash, that they may be returned safely to their families and friends in due course. We will certainly bear them in mind over the course of the weekend. We look forward to progress reports being forthcoming in the course of time and to hear that everyone has been safely removed and that everything will work out for the best for them.

Again I wish to express the sympathy of the opposition for the loss of these people who have died in the line of duty. On behalf of all Canadians, I wish to express our gratitude for their service to their country and our sense of bereavement at their passing to their families and their friends.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, all members of the House will join I am sure in offering our condolences to the families of those who died in this very tragic accident. They died in the service of their country and we honour them for the service they have given and say to those who have suffered this loss that, as my predecessor said, they will be in our prayers this weekend.

We also join in the minister's words of praise for those who have worked on the rescue effort. Obviously it was an outstanding effort and we want to acknowledge that today.

The minister has been very helpful and forthcoming in saying to the House that there is an investigation going on into the causes and that the results will be made available to the House.

I would just like to say that all members of the House will be aware that this is not the first accident with a Hercules aircraft. It is not to suggest any prejudgment of the cause of this accident to say that I hope this House will have an opportunity to review the report and to assure all Canadians that every effort is being made to understand the causes of this accident and previous accidents that have taken place so that we can do everything we can to ensure that it simply does not happen again.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I recognize the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden, on Tuesday, October 22, 1991 the House was informed that Bill C-251, an act to amend the Department of Veterans Affairs Act, standing in the name of the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden was causing the Chair some difficulties from a procedural point of view.

This bill proposes to include merchant seamen as war veterans, thereby entitling them to all benefits that are presently enjoyed by Armed Force veterans.

This proposal seems to infringe upon the financial initiative of the Crown and to attempt to accomplish indirectly what procedure precludes from doing directly regarding disbursements of public moneys.

I would appreciate receiving the benefit of comments from hon. members regarding the procedural acceptability of proceeding with this bill.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, very quickly, I want to react to your call for comments regarding the appropriateness of whether this bill requires royal recommendation or not.

I submit that for the answer to this question, it is necessary now to determine an answer to the following questions. Will the passage of this bill necessarily result in an expenditure of funds? Could any funds be spent pursuant to this bill without a royal recommendation supporting those funds?

The requirement that a royal recommendation be attached to proposals for taxes and expenditures is not only core to the British parliamentary system, it is engraved in our Constitution and in our Standing Orders.

The same provision is contained in Standing Order 79(1) as is found in section 54 of the Constitution Act, 1967, and it reads:

> This House shall not adopt or pass any vote, resolution, address or bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue, or of any tax or impost, to any purpose that has not been first recommended to the House by a message from the Governor General in the session in which such vote, resolution, address or bill is proposed.

• (1540)

This requirement is stringently applied in the House and prohibits private members from introducing taxation or expenditure bills and requires all private members' motions, all opposition motions, et cetera, to be worded in such a way that despite the unlikelihood of their passing without the implicit consent of the Governor in Council, they would not, if adopted, result in the necessary expenditure of public money or the imposition of tax.

However, the House does not restrain from debating or even passing motions which relate to taxes and expenditures. In order to permit debate, we adopt a basket clause which permits debates on such issues. The basket clause in motions is usually phrased as: "That the government consider the advisability of". Basket clauses provide a means for the House to adopt suggestions that expenditures or taxes are desired to lend moral or political support to such proposals without imposing on the Crown a duty which is beyond the authority of the House to do so.

Legislation can also contain a basket clause. A basket clause is used in Bill C-251. On page 1 at line 24 we find the phrase:

> (g) subject to such appropriations as Parliament may provide.

Is there any reason why basket clauses should be less acceptable in bills than they are in motions? Is there any real difference? If Bill C-251 were adopted and proclaimed there would be no automatic expenditure of funds at all. The bill is only permissive. It allows the Minister of Veterans Affairs to extend veterans' benefits to merchant seamen. It does not require him to do so.

Nor can the Minister of Veterans Affairs extend such benefits unless a royal recommendation is attached to the Appropriation Act which would approve such funds.

The answer then to the question identified above is clearly no. The passage of this bill does not necessarily result in an expenditure of funds. No funds could be spent pursuant to this bill without a royal recommendation supporting the expenditure of those funds.

Thus I submit that the bill does not require a royal recommendation.

This point of order raises a secondary important consideration concerning our Standing Order 79(1). That Standing Order requires that no vote be taken in this House on any tax or expenditure bill without a recommendation, but all bills, once introduced, are given an automatic vote at first reading. In other words, it is left entirely up to The Speaker to decide whether or not a bill is in conformity with the provisions of Standing Order 79(1).

The Speaker has, it is clear, found Bill C-251 to be in order. He permitted it to be introduced, to be given first reading and to be printed. To suggest now that Bill C-251 is out of order is to implicitly criticize the earlier decision of the Chair to permit introduction of the bill.

I do not suggest that the hon. member for Peace River was challenging the Chair's ruling that C-251 was in order, but all members are in a difficult position when all such rulings are made and resolutions adopted before a bill is actually printed.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I will speak simply to your request for some input on the procedural aspect of this.

I draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to Standing Order 79(1):

> This House shall not adopt or pass any vote, resolution, address or bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue, or of any tax of the public revenue, or of any tax or impost, to any purpose that has not been first recommended to the House by a message from the Governor General in the session in which such vote, resolution, address or bill is proposed.

The reason for that, and it is a Standing Order of long standing, is that in our system of government, the Queen as represented by the Governor General in Canadian terms is responsible for paying the bills and he must have the concurrence of the bill payer to pay the bills. That is where it begins. If we expect the Queen, through the Governor General, to pay the bills then we must have some notification from the Queen, Governor General, royal proclamation it is called, that there is a willingness to pay the bills.

If you go to citation 599 of Beauchesne's, it reads:

> (1) If any motion, whether in the House or in a committee, requires, but fails to receive, the recommendation of the Crown, it is the duty of the Speaker to announce that no question can be proposed upon the motion, or declare the bill out of order, or to say that the problem may be rectified by the proposer obtaining a Royal Recommendation.

It goes on to say:

> (2) In like manner after the question has been proposed on an amendment—

Right down to the level of an amendment.

> —and it has appeared that the amendment would vary the incidence of taxation or increase the charge upon the Consolidated Revenue Fund, the Speaker has declined to put the question.

Speakers have followed that principle through to another level. We have established that it is against the rules to propose something to spend money and that it is the duty, not a decision for the Speaker to make but simply a duty of the Speaker to impose on the House not to take it further.

To bring just two precedents to your attention, Mr. Speaker, one going back 12 years to February 1979 when Speaker Jerome was in the chair. One short paragraph is germane because it speaks not to the wording of a bill but to the objectives of a bill. He said:

> It is also difficult to believe that the objectives of the bill can be achieved without some substantial expenditures, at least for an initial period. Of course, this could only be of indirect consequence to the public purse and it could be corrected through the voting of a subsidy or a grant through Estimates.

In a case not as pronounced as this Speaker Jerome did move that the motion was not in order because of the achievement of the objectives. The objectives of this bill are compassionate. They are ones which most members of the House could support. However if those objectives are to be achieved, if money is to end up in the hands of the merchant seamen, then we must have the royal prerogative and it is the duty of the Speaker to indicate that the bill is not in order.

A more recent precedent was nine days ago in our own Senate. I would like to read just a couple of parts of that ruling on a bill remarkably similar to the one before us in subject matter.

The Speaker said in the Senate on October 23, 1991:

> After carefully reviewing the parliamentary authorities, the Chair has concluded that this interpretation of the general rules and practices of financial procedure is much too narrow. Our parliamentary tradition, strictly adhered to over many years, consistently indicates that bills emanating from private members which bind the House to future legislation appropriating monies is not in order in either Chamber of Parliament.

He goes on to say later about Bill S-5 in the Senate:

> If Bill S-5 were enacted it would seem that many Canadians, including the merchant seamen of Canada during World War II, and their spouses, would feel that Parliament is obliged to directly appropriate monies to provide the benefits promised by the bill, since the bill amends the appropriate categories of the Pensions Act and the War Veterans Allowances Act to include wartime Canadian merchant sailors. It seems clear to the Chair that the provisions of Bill S-5 represent liabilities to the Crown. Erskine May, 20th edition states at page 797, "a charge is also involved by any proposal whereby the Crown would incur a liability or a contingent liability payable out of money to be voted by Parliament". On these grounds, Bill S-5 requires a Royal Recommendation.

That is an additional caution to the Chair that the passage of something which creates an expectation on behalf of Canadians would bring the entire process into disrepute if the expectation were not met. We cannot have the expectation of the Queen, through the Governor General, paying a bill without the royal recommendation that must precede it. It is perhaps unfortunate but I think it is the duty of the Chair to rule in that fashion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before the hon. member for Kingston and the Island commences I should inform the House that because of a ministerial statement an additional eight minutes will be added to Private Members' Business today. It will be 4.37 when we finish.

• (1550)

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have listened very carefully to the hon. member for Kamloops and the government Whip. I basically side with the hon. member for Kamloops in my argument because I think the government Whip was correct in his initial statements but then he cited as his authority the Speaker of the Senate in a recent ruling in the other place.

With great respect, aside from any doubts one might have on a ruling from the Speaker of the Senate after the rulings he made in the GST debate, I can tell the hon. member that I would have very grave doubts about any ruling of the Speaker of the Senate.

This one deals with another bill entirely. The other bill seeks to amend two acts which are not touched by the act that is before this House. It deals with a rule in the Constitution requiring that bills involving the expenditure of money not be introduced in the other place. Frankly it is a ruling on a different bill and a different aspect of the law relating to the royal recommendation.

I know that my friend from Calgary West will want to agree with me in that respect. To turn, as I must, to the provisions of the bill, I point out that in the bill itself the amendment that allows for the payment of money to veterans is couched in very careful language. The new section 5(1)(g) of the Department of Veterans Affairs Act says: "Subject to such appropriations as Parliament may provide" and it goes on.

There is ample authority for the idea that clauses can be inserted in bills that will prevent money being expended under the bill unless and until Parliament appropriates money for the purpose set out in the bill. I refer Your Honour to citation 613 of Beauchesne's sixth edition where it states:

> A bill, which does not involve a direct expenditure but merely confers upon the government a power for the exercise of which public money will have to be voted by Parliament, is not a money bill, and no Royal Recommendation is necessary as a condition precedent to its introduction.

That is the first point. This bill does not require that the government pay pensions to these persons. It says that the payment of the pensions is subject to appropriations as may be given by Parliament. The government in order to pay these pensions would have to bring in an estimate in the usual way with a recommendation from His Excellency recommending that estimate to the House.

I submit that it falls squarely within the ambit of citation 613 of Beauchesne's. I could cite in further aid citation 614 which states:

> A bill, designed to furnish machinery for the expenditure of a certain sum of public money, to be voted subsequently by Parliament, may be introduced in the House without the recommendation of the Crown.

There is a supporting citation in Journals of the House of Commons of Canada, Tuesday, January 16, 1912. The Speaker in a ruling that day was confronted with a bill that had been introduced to amend the Inquiries Act. It provided for the appointment of additional commissioners under the Inquiries Act who would be paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

If I may cite from page 119 of the Speaker's ruling, he stated:

> It has been urged that though the present bill does not deal with the question of payment of the persons to be engaged by the commissioners, they might under its terms incur expenses which will be payable out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund and thus be a charge upon the people without Parliament making any provision for their payment by a resolution in supply.

Your Honour will recall that a supply bill had to be preceded by a resolution tantamount to the procedure that the Royal Recommendation fills in for today because that resolution required the royal recommendation at that time.

Then he stated:

> The question is not free from difficulty. Mr. Bourinot in his observation seems to have extended the scope of the rule rather beyond the terms in which it is worded. What those terms cover is "a motion for any public aid or charge upon the people". This bill does not constitute such a motion. The most that can be said is that under its provisions something may have to be done which may rise to a claim against the government. If this be sufficient to bring it within the rule, then it would have to be held that every bill conferring a power upon the government in the exercise of which expense might be incurred, it comes under the rule. This, in my opinion, would be giving altogether too extensive an interpretation to the words "a motion for any public aid or charge upon the people".

And he went on:

> While the authorities are not absolutely reconcilable, I am not disposed to attach to the rule this very enlarged meaning, I am therefore of the opinion that no resolution is necessary.

In this case, since the bill has the very specific provision in it that it is subject to such appropriations as Parliament may provide, Your Honour could follow the precedent established in 1912 and rule that this bill does not require a royal recommendation. However before any payment could be made under the bill the government would have to, if it chose to do so, bring in estimates to permit it to make the payments. In the absence of such estimates the payments would not have to be made. I think that is the test.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, I am on the verge of tears but I will wait until you have made your ruling.

I will not repeat the arguments of my colleagues from Kamloops or Kingston and the Islands. My bill is deliberately worded as it is in order to obviate any requirement for a royal recommendation because I cannot provide one. I know that. I sought out the best legal advice I could find.

We have been 45 years in failing to redress a wrong to the merchant seamen of Canada. They suffered higher casualty rates than any other service in the forces and were paid less than people in the Royal Canadian Navy. There were 12,000 of them and there are now 3,500 left.

Mr. Speaker, let us assume that you rule the bill in order. What happens? It passes second reading, it goes to the committee and passes there, passes report stage and passes third reading. As a result of lines 24 and 25 in my bill nothing happens with that legislation as passed. Assuming it goes through the Senate and receives royal assent still nothing happens with it. It remains lying there in the Statutes of Canada unless and until the government attaches a royal recommendation for its expenditures of money to fill the purposes and intent of this bill.

This does not fly in the face of the traditional practice. I want to thank my hon. friend for Kingston and the Islands for his fine research on precedents which fly in the face of the arguments put forward by the government Whip.

I am certain that the overwhelming majority, if not all members of the House, want this done. That is why the bill is worded as it is. I would hope, Sir, that if you were thinking of ruling it out of order you would be willing to reconsider and report back at a later time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I recognize any further speakers here I want to thank the hon. member for Kamloops, the hon. government Whip, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, and the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden. I will take this matter under advisement. Meanwhile, I will permit debate to take place on the item until the end of the time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business.

However no question may be put on this item which, in any event, is not a selected item.

• (1600)

Once we get to the end of the debate, I will have another pronouncement to make.

I will call upon the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden on debate.

I am sorry. After listening to all the arguments, I guess it would be nice if I did put the question.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden) moved that Bill C-252, an act to amend the Department of Veterans Affairs Act, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee G.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity you are providing me to make my speech on this bill and I will wait with great trepidation as to what you are going to decide on it.

I am proud to be able to rise today and speak in support of this bill, an act to amend the Department of Veterans Affairs Act. This bill, if it became law, would define those who served in Canada's World World II merchant fleet as war veterans. These former merchant mariners would thereby become eligible for all of the benefits that have always been extended to all other war veterans.

Anybody who would deny that these merchant mariners are not war veterans is totally wrong. I am afraid I cannot use the language that I am thinking of. They are war veterans, period. The bill would also, finally and forever, extend to our wartime merchant mariners the status of war veterans, recognition which they purchased at a terrible price.

Following World War II, the Government of Canada extended 18 benefits to veterans of our Armed Forces. Of those 18, only four were granted unconditionally to the merchant seamen. A further seven were extended only under certain conditions. For example, in the Veterans Land Act, a merchant seaman could qualify for it only if he was disabled. How the hell is he going to farm if he is disabled? What outrageous stupidity we have perpetrated on these veterans.

Twelve thousand merchant seamen served their country in World War II. About 3,500 are still living, while 1,259 of them died in combat. This was one of the highest casualty rates of any allied service during the war. Canadian seamen served with distinction on all oceans of the world during World War II. Nearly 200 were imprisoned, some of them for many years. The loss of seamen's lives during the battle of the Atlantic was the highest proportion of any other allied force.

Those Canadians who served in dangerous waters during the last great war seek today what they have sought since the end of the war: equal recognition, entitlement and the benefits now received by their fellow veterans.

We are approaching Remembrance Day and, my God, it is high time, 45 years past time, that we remember our merchant seamen.

Last year for the first time the Royal Canadian Legion agreed that World War II merchant seamen should be given full war veterans status, as have several other veterans organizations. That is why I have moved this legislation before the House, because it is high time to extend those benefits.

It is time Parliament acted on this, past time, and if it would become law it would give veteran status to those merchant seamen who served in our merchant navy.

I want to remind the House that this question has been studied for almost a half a century, 45 years. We have had all kinds of reasons and foot dragging, procrastination and outright refusals over that 45 years. One put forward in the early years of the merchant seamen's fight was that they got paid more. The fact of the matter is in all but one or two categories in the merchant navy, they got paid less than members of the Canadian Armed Forces, and particularly the Royal Canadian Navy.

During the war they were not only paid less but they faced risks that were just as great, if not greater, than those in the other Armed Forces. To say that they were civilians and they could move or work for one company or another, from one ship to another, was totally false. That was another excuse that was put up for years after the war.

Members of the merchant service during the war could not leave that service. They were compelled to remain in that service. They were bound by military discipline and military orders for the duration of the war. We have still failed to repay our debt to these veterans of the war against fascism.

Successive governments, in my opinion, and successive Parliaments have shamefully failed to act in refusing to recognize adequately the contribution of these courageous Canadians and what they did during those terrible years. I find it therefore especially gratifying to see the members of the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs, members of Parliament from all three parties, coming together with such unanimity on the need to act now. After the war, merchant seamen were not provided with the same rehabilitation benefits given other Canadian veterans. That is why I and other members of the committee are calling for it as being urgently required.

It is puzzling. Merchant seamen have been awarded the same medals as those given to Royal Canadian Navy veterans. It seems to me that successive governments and Parliaments have been trying to have it both ways.

The United States, the United Kingdom and Australia recognize their merchant mariners as veterans. Since January 1988 merchant seamen in the United States have been eligible for full benefits of the Veterans Administration.

On this issue, the ball is in the government's court, and Parliament's for that matter. We are all on the hook on this one. During the Battle of the Atlantic, as I mentioned, they suffered the highest casualty rate of any other service. On October 2, 1991, the standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs unanimously passed a report on this issue. The minister, of course, has 150 days in which to respond to the report in question.

I would not want to prejudge his response. However, I have no doubt that while he considers the committee's recommendation he will be asking his officials to consider the cost. I hope that at some point he will present his findings in this regard to cabinet for approval of the action required to implement the recommendations of the committee.

I do not quarrel with the government's responsibility to examine the fiscal implications of any policy initiative. That is why that clause is in my bill, subject to any appropriations by Parliament. In considering costs of acting on the committee's recommendations, the government must not lose sight of the ethical and moral obligations Canadians have to our World War II merchant mariners who have never received the recognition and reward they earned during their wartime service.

• (1610)

There can be no price tag on doing the right thing because we can never fully repay our merchant seamen as well as all other veterans. We as a people must not let any costs of these benefits cause us to deny them to those who have earned them.

Our committee was unanimous in its support of the merchant mariners' quest for justice. We agreed that our recommendations are long overdue. Even we felt some shame as to them being so overdue.

Another thing happened following the end of the war. A certain Hal Banks was brought into Canada. Merchant mariners who served during the war all of a sudden found themselves without jobs, frozen out, black-balled. They could not work at their trade. Many of them who survived the war and stayed in the fleet found their jobs sold out from under them and U.S. gangsters imported to destroy their union.

The destruction of the merchant fleet, the importation of Hal Banks and his methods, meant that many merchant seamen were deprived of their livelihood after gallantly serving their country at great personal risk, which means that our obligation to them is even greater than to other veterans.

Arguments have been made over the years in favour of extending merchant navy veterans the same vocational training benefits as given to other veterans. It is too late now to do so, but there remains the question of retroactivity for some other benefits. Why not, for example, extend to merchant seamen, merchant navy veterans who are eligible, retroactive disability benefits?

The other benefits that merchant seamen were denied could and should be at least partially restored. For example, the clothing allowance. I got $100 when I got discharged. For $100 in 1946 I was able to buy a hat, new suit, shirt, tie, socks, underwear and shoes. I will not say I went to the fancy stores in Calgary, but it sufficed to get me home in civilian clothes.

Why not give them some kind of recompense? Maybe we do not have to call it a clothing allowance, but why not give them a few hundred dollars, allow for a bit of inflation even though we have had lots of it, to use in some other way? Maybe there are a few who desperately need some clothes. No doubt there are.

Last spring a man whose name is honoured in this city and among veterans, Gordon Olmstead, came to Parliament looking for something denied him for almost half a century: recognition. Gordon Olmstead, the Second World War veteran and prisoner of war, should have been entitled to the benefits offered to other veterans by a grateful nation. However Gordon Olmstead served with Canada's merchant marine, and the federal government and Parliament still refuse to acknowledge the contributions and sacrifices made by those who served in that fleet. Mr. Olmstead and other merchant marine veterans appeared as witnesses before the House of Commons committee. Their goal was to obtain legal recognition of their status.

Olmstead served as a prisoner of war, captured by a German submarine, and spent years in a prisoner of war camp. We have done nothing for him.

We heard from all the witnesses. the nearly 200 letters I have received, most of them from merchant navy veterans from across Canada, would wring tears out of a jury full of bankers.

It is no wonder that Canada's wartime Minister of Transport called the merchant seamen the fourth arm of the fighting services. On many merchant ships there were four, five or six Royal Canadian Navy men who were there as gunners. On the same ship there were merchant mariners who were trained by the Royal Canadian Navy to man those guns.

Who says they were not subject to military discipline and military law? Sadly the sentiment of Canada's wartime Minister of Transport about them being the fourth arm of the fighting service was conveniently set aside when the war ended in 1945. Then it was time to award and honour our merchant seamen but their service was ignored.

I mentioned that there were some 18 benefits provided for veterans of the regular armed forces. The merchant seamen got four of them. We must undo this injustice. That is the least that our nation, this Parliament and this government can do in order to show our gratitude. We can do no less, because to do less would demean not only them but us and all the other veterans who are unanimous in wanting these merchant mariners to receive these benefits. Nor were their dead given the same honours they had purchased at so dear a price.

There is not a single taxpayer in Canada who has or does object to benefits paid to our veterans over all these years. There is not a single taxpayer in Canada who objects or will not be willing to help pay for additional benefits for merchant mariners. I defy anybody in this House to bring forward one person who opposes this, one person.

This must be acted upon without delay. My bill does no harm or injury by way of financial implications because of the clause in my bill, subject to appropriation by Parliament. The government may or may not as it sees fit act upon that very provision. That is up to the government. You will not hear me crying about it if it chooses for a variety of reasons not to act on it. That is its prerogative. It is the government.

May I close by saying that I have another objective and motive behind this bill. I have been praying we could get it past second reading so that the House could express its wishes on this matter. I am not going to get into arguments about free votes and that sort of nonsense. I know there are members on all sides of the House who want to support this in no uncertain terms.

My colleagues from the Conservative Party and the Liberal Party on the veterans affairs committee were adamant and made no bones about it: merchant mariners are veterans, period, and should be so recognized.

May I make a final point. If this bill could pass second reading, when it is in committee I will offer to the government that it can take the bill, make it a Government Order and bring in the appropriate royal recommendation. The government can have the credit for it. I do not give a damn, as long as we do it. I for one am sick and tired of the foot dragging, procrastination, obfuscation and sometimes deliberate stalling. The time for stalling is over with. The time for delay is over with. This has to go and it has to go now.

• (1620)

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the proposed legislation continues to keep the spotlight on the vital and gallant part played by Canadian merchant seamen in wartime. Some of these mariners have been hurt by the lack of attention given to their wartime efforts. The bands played and the crowds waved for members of the armed forces at the end of the war, but the reception given to our merchant seamen was too often muted. There was that perception and it has been the same ever since.

Until recently the story of our merchant navy has been lost in a fog of indifference. Only the perseverance of a handful of former merchant seamen has brought this story to the attention of members, the media and the public.

The history of our wartime merchant navy is one of bravery, stamina and success. They did indeed deliver the goods. Just how important was the merchant navy during the Second World War? Was it, as some claim and as the hon. member has mentioned, the fourth arm of the fighting services? Here is how General Eisenhower saw it.

It was 1944 and the allied advance toward Germany had stalled through lack of supplies. It was vital for our Canadian troops to clear the approaches to the great port of Antwerp. This they did and in November 1944 the Canadian built vessel Fort Cataraqui sailed into Antwerp to a joyous reception. Said General Eisenhower:

> The end of Nazism was in clear view when the first ship moved unmolested up the Scheldt.

High tribute, Mr. Speaker. The three fighting services relied upon the merchant fleet who with courage and stamina maintained the lifeline between North America and Europe. We have not forgotten their efforts.

Canada has indeed done a lot for its merchant seamen for a very long time. For example, a Civilian War Allowance Program was introduced in 1962 that gave merchant seamen the equivalent of the War Veterans Allowance. Today's legislation is asking us to do more, but that does not obscure the fact that there is a generous and varied package of programs available to our merchant seamen right now.

It has been said that the United Kingdom and more recently the United States and Australia have given their merchant seamen the status of veterans. The United States declared the service of their merchant seamen to be active service and that triggers the U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs benefits. Australia has not given them veterans' status but has given them health care benefits comparable to those of veterans. In any case I very much doubt if any of those three countries has done as much for its merchant seamen since the end of the war as we have done for ours in Canada. This is something this House and the Canadian public should understand. Canada has probably the most generous package of veterans' benefits and programs in the world. The large majority of this package is already available to our merchant seamen and has been available for many years.

Now the member for Regina—Lumsden wants the government to eliminate all differences in treatment between those who served in the army, navy and air force and those who sailed with the merchant navy. He wants merchant seamen to carry that proudest of all titles: Canadian veteran.

Mr. Benjamin: Hear, hear.

Mr. Richardson: However the title wartime merchant seaman is also a very proud title, one that was earned at great sacrifice. The challenge now is to ensure that we are being absolutely fair to them but not to confuse the issue by improper and insensitive use of two justly proud titles. These arguments deserve every attention.

The Minister of Veterans Affairs has shown a great interest in this matter. He has met with individual seamen and representatives of their associations. He has asked the leaders of our veterans' organizations to get together and give him their views. This they have done. The Senate subcommittee on veterans affairs has also presented the minister with a set of recommendations.

The House Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs has released a comprehensive report on the subject, complete with recommendations. The member for Regina—Lumsden is a member of that committee, and it is a bit surprising to see that he has decided to go outside the committee and freelance on his own.

Mr. Benjamin: I rise on a point or order. Maybe the hon. parliamentary secretary does not know any better but my bill was put in long before there was any veterans affairs committee report.

Mr. Richardson: As usual an irrelevant comment from the member, Mr. Speaker.

As members have heard, our merchant seamen have certainly received attention in the last year. I suggest this interest has been helped by way of the Minister of Veterans Affairs. He has gone a long way and has welcomed this advice.

He and his officials have a lot of material to work through. There are matching recommendations in some cases but there are some differences. This legislation containing a retroactive measure adds to the suggestions for consideration.

Surely the member for Regina—Lumsden would have the minister properly assess and compare his amendments with the recommendations he has received from other quarters. Surely he expects more than a cursory review. Officials of Veterans Affairs will obviously have to cost out the individual proposals. Surely proper consideration requires more than a few hours of review.

Appropriately the minister is not yet in a position to say whether or not some or all of the various recommendations can be acted upon. After all, it has been less than a month since our own House of Commons committee released its report.

In the meantime let me repeat that our merchant seamen will continue to enjoy the vast majority of the generous benefits available to all other veterans of Canada.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I consider it an honour to be able to speak on this Bill C-251 presented by the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden.

In so doing I am pleased to be able to speak on behalf of not only myself but a number of members of my party who would have liked to contribute their thoughts to this debate, including the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce who has been concerned with this issue for many years, the members for Hillsborough and Kent who are critics of Veterans Affairs and who I think share the deep feelings of the member for Regina—Lumsden.

It is unfortunate that the tone taken by the parliamentary secretary suggests something of a partisan element, particularly in light of the report the House of Commons committee recently released. I would like to read from that report, because it does set a very clear tone for the matter we are considering: "On the basis of evidence heard before the committee, there can be little doubt that our wartime merchant mariners have been unfairly treated. We are unable fully to correct old mistakes, but we believe it to be appropriate and necessary for the Government of Canada to recognize the errors of the past and make the proper amends".

It goes on to say: "The committee is in full agreement with the Royal Canadian Legion when it stated: 'Let us now obtain full access to all veterans benefits for those who so gallantly served in wartime aboard the ships of the merchant navy. The Royal Canadian Legion has long accepted these men as veterans but the name veteran without access to the benefits is cold comfort indeed. We should treat them as full veterans and identify them as such".

For many Canadians it would be helpful to think back to the days particularly of World War II. I was not born yet but I have heard and read the stories. It is a fascinating tale. There was a German naval staff memorandum dated 1939, for example, in which the German high command defined the target of its principal strategy as: "The merchant ship, not only the enemy's but every merchantman which sales the sea in order to supply the enemy's war interests". The memo goes on to say that: "The final aim of such attacks is to cut off all imports into and exports from Britain".

Of course the merchant navy played a role in World War I, as well as in the Korean War. Its role in World War II is that I suppose for which it is most famous and most well known. If we follow the speeches of Churchill, for example, in those early days of the war, 1939-1940 and on into 1941, we find the incredible peril Britain was in. The Nazi war machine swept across continental Europe, took France almost without a battle, marched to the very shores and began the aerial invasion of Britain, the Battle of Britain. Had Britain been lost, according to President Roosevelt: "All America would be living at the point of a gun". I think he is referring to the North American continent.

Some of the statistics have already been introduced into the record by my colleagues. However, I think it is important to highlight the fact that of about 12,000 Canadian merchant seamen 1,146 were killed in the line of duty, a ratio of nearly 1 in 10. This compares with a ratio of 1 in 47 for the Royal Canadian Navy. The dangers faced and undertaken by these individuals were enormous.

The situation in the North Atlantic is well described in this tale by Joseph Schull, in a volume entitled Canadians at War—1939 to 1945. He states:

> In March 1943, about 70 U-boats were in the northwest Atlantic, in three great lines of patrol: one between Labrador and Greenland, another running due south and to seaward of Newfoundland and Nova Scotia, a third paralleling the Nova Scotia coastline to a point below New York. They barred every exit and entry for the ocean convoys. Eastward, to the fringe of British coastal waters, were 40 more U-boats.
> This North Atlantic force of 110 U-boats was by no means the total. On one day, March 9, five convoys were attacked simultaneously: two transatlantic convoys, a north Russia convoy, a convoy bound from Brazil to Trinidad, and one on passage from Britain to Gibraltar.
>
> But the North Atlantic was still the crucial area. Three escort groups, struggling to keep convoys together in the great gales, had the impossible task of warding off attackers who came from many directions at once, often outnumbering the defenders two to one, sometimes more heavily than that. Evasive routing was practically useless in view of the number of U-boats at sea. Every sailing was made with the virtual certainty of encountering a larger German concentration. Losses were outpacing the entire shipbuilding efforts of the allies. So many escort vessels were laid up for repair or weather damage in March that the group system was in danger of disorganization. It began to seem that the convoy system, after all the years of effort, could not be maintained.
> March losses were 627,000 tons of merchant shipping. It was not the highest figure of the war, but the ominous fact was that for the first time 75 percent of the ships had gone down while protected in convoy.

An amazing statistic.

It is clear from the statistics that I have mentioned and from the facts that surrounded the important role that the men of the merchant navy played that these were people of courage and gallantry who performed an essential and necessary service, not only for Canada but for the protection of freedom in the world. One wonders what would have happened had it not been for the sacrifice and contribution of these individuals.

Thirty-five hundred of them are left today.

When they came back from the war they lacked many of the benefits that the regular servicemen received. They did not have full access to the Veterans Land Act which many veterans took advantage of to get a foothold, to re-establish themselves when they returned. They lacked the educational programs. Many veterans were able to achieve their higher education as a result of the programs available to them.

I am almost out of time but I would like to say in closing that one of the finest Canadians that I know was a merchant seaman. He wanted to join the air force but was unable to do so because he did not meet the educational requirements. Therefore to serve Canada he joined the merchant navy. He married on a shore leave and still continued to serve. He returned at the end of the war ineligible for education benefits. He and the wife he married during the war had a daughter who is my wife. I am very proud of him and think that he deserves every bit of recognition that any other veteran has received.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I am more than pleased to take part in this debate. I do want to thank the hon. member who was responsible for this debate today. Since I have been here, it has been an issue that he has brought to the floor of this House of Commons on many occasions. I think we all have sometimes a grudging respect for the member, but certainly a very deep respect for the concern and absolutely genuine respect for where his heart is in respect of this issue.

It is a strange irony, or an unsettling irony, that we are taking this debate up today given the fact that the Associate Minister of Defence spoke in the House today on the latest tragedy that has struck our Armed Forces. She spoke of the ultimate price that some of those individuals paid, that families are experiencing today, for serving our country so very well. We, as a nation, are only two weeks away from the day that we remember all of our war family people and past war experiences. I think it is very fitting that we do debate this today.

There is no question that the merchant seamen served us very well in World War II, exceptionally well. They were just some of many hundreds of thousands of Canadians who served us during the war that in a sense have gone unrecognized. That is not right. I believe they do deserve more recognition than they get.

One of the things that I want to do today, to the benefit of the member from Saskatchewan, is bring to the member's attention the benefits that we do give to the merchant seamen in recognition of the great service that they have given this country of ours. I do not think the member dismisses this. In total, that amounts to about $20 million from the Government of Canada every year. That is from, of course, the taxpayers of Canada.

It is a real recognition of what they have done. These benefits are indexed benefits, indexed to the rate of inflation. They are also tax free and deservedly so. We will not argue whether it is enough or not. I guess enough is never enough when we come to repaying those service people, war veterans and merchant seamen for what they have done for us. Mr. Speaker, I guess my time has elapsed. Could I have unanimous consent to continue?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is agreed for just a couple of minutes.

Mr. Thompson: I appreciate that very much, Mr. Speaker. It is a generosity that is very seldom extended in the House, and I very much appreciate it.

In addition to that $20 million, I want to identify some of the areas in which that is spent. It is spent in terms of income support health care. We provide a number of services. One of them is health care benefits not covered by provincial governments. That includes such things as eye glasses, prescription drugs, dental care, hearing aids and chronic care and community beds.

One of the things, and very rightly so, brought up by the member that is not covered is the availability of extra-military to these people in regard to civilian access to departmental or contract bids throughout the nation which is, of course, available to those designated as veterans. That designation as veteran is the area in which we will end this debate today, given your consideration.

We do not officially recognize merchant seamen as veterans. Some countries do. For example, the United Kingdom recognizes its merchant seamen as veterans.

This is a very important point for all of us to recognize. They recognize them as veterans but do not give them the same kind of income support as we do here in Canada.

In a sense the question becomes one of definition. It is fine to be designated as a veteran but it is another thing to receive the programs and support that you need.

I will quote from a Royal Canadian Legion submission to the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs which sums it up much better than you or I. It simply states: "The name veteran without access to the benefits is very little comfort indeed". It says it is cold comfort indeed.

We do not recognize them officially as veterans but we do have support programs for them and their families, their dependents, which may not go far enough. However the government certainly recognizes the great service the merchant seamen performed for this country during a time of war and will continue to recognize them in the manner that we do.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The time provided for consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1) the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

Even though this item is dropped from the Order Paper I will nevertheless give my ruling on the procedural acceptability of this bill at a later time, for the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden.

This House stands adjourned until Monday next at 11 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

SUGGESTED TERMINATION OF NORAD AGREEMENT

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should serve notice on the government of the United States of America that the current NORAD agreement is to be terminated by May 31, 1994, and that in the meantime, the government should institute a thorough public review of Canada–U.S. defence relations, including discussions between U.S. and Canadian parliamentarians.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I especially thank the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca for the alacrity with which he moved to get to the point where he could second my motion. I thank him for that.

The motion I have put before the House, which I am inviting the House to support, has two essential parts to it. First, in the opinion of this House, the government should serve notice on the Government of the United States of America that the current NORAD agreement is to be terminated by May 31, 1994.

Second, in the meantime, the government should institute a thorough public review of Canada–U.S. defence relations including discussions between United States and Canadian parliamentarians.

The motion arises from the discussions that took place last fall before a subcommittee of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade. The subcommittee was considering whether Canada should proceed to renew the NORAD agreement on May 31, 1991. The committee heard briefs from citizens across-Canada, had a special panel of experts that prepared some useful material for the committee and debated the issue at some length internally.

The results of those deliberations was that the committee could not agree on the issue as to the renewal of the current NORAD agreement. The committee did agree unanimously that there should be a thorough public review of Canada–U.S. defence relations. The precise terms of the committee's recommendation I would like to put on the record. All members agreed with the following. Given the extraordinary changes of east–west relations and the ending of the cold war, the government should carry out in the first two years of any NORAD renewal period a comprehensive public review of Canada–United States defence co–operation and the future surveillance needs of Canada, the United States and their northern neighbours.

As part of the review process there should be a full and frank Canada–United States political dialogue about NORAD's future, about Canada–United States defence co–operation and about the future surveillance needs of Canada, the United States and their northern neighbours.

To that end, Parliament should initiate an exchange of views and information between Canadian and American legislators with the first of the meetings for this purpose taking place before the termination of the NORAD agreement on May 12, 1991.

The Canadian relationship with the United States in defence matters has been a critical part of this country's foreign and security policy since the early days of the Second World War. Prior to that, those who have some historical interest should note that, in fact, there was no specific agreement between the two countries on defence matters. Canada took responsibility for its own military security. At the outbreak of the Second World War, Canada responded quickly in September of 1939 to the outbreak of war in Europe. Canada declared war against Germany and proceeded to play a very critical role in that war.

The United States, as all will know, did not enter the war until December 1941. In that intervening period, however, there were agreements reached between the two countries on defence relations. During the Second World War, of course, there was intense co-operation between the two countries. Following the Second World War and with the rise of the perceived threat to North American security by the Soviet Union and its allies in eastern Europe, Canada entered into co-operative agreements with the United States under two main headings. The first was NATO, with the other western European countries, under the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. But for Canada in the mid-fifties, we reached a very specific agreement in respect of North American defence. This has always been seen as a subagreement under NATO, but in fact it is not necessarily under NATO. It stands on its own as an agreement between the United States and Canada.

Initially, the perceived threat to North American security was that of the U.S.S.R. attacking North America using manned bombers, carrying nuclear weapons and conventional bombs. As we got into the sixties and seventies, the nature of the threat changed to essentially a missile attack. This was not only from land-based missiles in the Soviet Union, interballistic missiles going from the Soviet Union to North America, but also sea-launched, sea-based missiles from submarines and other forms of attack on North America.

As the nature of the threat proceeded, the defence to that threat began changing. Initially there was the thought that we could put fighter planes up into the air to actually knock down the manned bombers coming into North America. But we fairly quickly got into missile defences against those who were attacking or perceived to be potentially attacking North America. But again, as we got into the sixties, seventies and eighties, it became very clear that there was no possibility whatever of defending against an attack in the sense of defeating an assault on North America. So the focus moved to surveillance, to knowing what was happening in the approaches to North American air space.

• (1120)

All of this has been predicated on the cold war and the proposition that the Soviet Union, which is the only country that had any capacity to attack North America in this way, might conceivably attack North America. We should be prepared, primarily through deterrents to respond to such an attack.

What is now critical for this House and for our country to acknowledge is that the fundamental premise that has shaped NORAD and U.S.-Canada defence relations in respect of North America has completely and unalterably changed.

The premise that has changed is that the Soviet Union has any intention or any capacity to launch an attack on North America. I give you the words of the then Secretary of State for External Affairs on November 28, 1990 addressing a major international conference in Ottawa in which he said the following: "In region after region, on problem after problem, the Soviet Union now brings a welcome flexibility and assessments remarkably similar to Canada's. We see this at the CSCE, in the Pacific, in Cambodia, in Central America, in Angola, in South Africa, Afghanistan and the gulf. We see it in the fight against drugs, in the struggle against terrorism, in the pursuit of arms control. Disagreement with the Soviet Union was once the rule. It is now the exception. What disagreement does exist is often one of degree, not kind, and flows from national interest, not ideological intransigence or ambition. We are no longer enemies. We are no longer foes in a cold war one could win. We are friends. We are partners in building a structure of co-operative security and prosperity in which we all win".

These words were stated in November of 1990. Since then movement has been even more dramatic to underline the truth of the words spoken by the then Secretary of State for External Affairs.

The Soviet Union is no longer a military threat to North America. It retains some marginal capacity. We deal with that problem, not by building expansive defence systems, but by negotiating down, through arms control and disarmament measures, the Soviet capacity to attack North America.

We build in controls that would flow in the break-up of the Soviet empire and we ensure that there is no attack. We also remember that we cannot protect ourselves against the outside possibility of a single madman in the Soviet Union sending missiles to North America or some accident triggering a launch of a missile. There is no possibility, scientifically or technologically, to protect ourselves against that by the kind of system that NORAD has now in place or any other system that might take place.

The so-called star wars of the United States, the Strategic Defence Initiative, does not even claim a capacity to provide protection against that kind of accidental or terrorist attack.

The time has come to completely review and change our approach to the North American air defence system. The key to how we change that comes in the comments of the then Secretary of State for External Affairs because the time has come for us to begin urgently to build a polar security arrangement.

The Soviet Union now needs our economic and social help desperately. It would not be unreasonable, in fact, it ought to be a required condition of that assistance that the Soviet Union join with Canada, the United States and other polar countries to form a completely different form of security than that which has served us for the last 40 and 50 years and which is now obsolete.

The government has pointed the way to that. I would expect the government to respond more quickly.

Gorbachev himself said in 1989 in Murmansk that this was the direction he wanted to go. The then Secretary of State for External Affairs accepted that in the very speech from which I have quoted, but we have heard nothing from this government since then to respond to those initiatives. In fact what we see is the government renewing the NORAD agreement without any condition as to this being the final term of the agreement. We see no sense of urgency from the government in changing the approach it takes to North American defence.

The government has not done what the committee asked it to do, which was to launch a full public review of these policies. It has remained absolutely silent on that. The government continues to spend hundreds of millions of dollars a year on NORAD. In the current fiscal year we are proposing to spend something in the order of $500 million on NORAD. We have in train a very expensive capital upgrading of NORAD facilities which is costing the Canadian taxpayer $1.214 billion, of which $500 million is still to be spent.

There is no sign whatever of the government getting off the train and saying that the time has come to save Canadian taxpayers this money and to look at different ways of approaching the issue of Canadian sovereignty, of surveillance in the north and of polar security.

This motion calls on the government to start the clock running on the end of NORAD by advising the Americans now that the termination of this agreement must take place and set in motion a process of discussion most particularly with the Government of the United States of America. Clearly one of the key problems is that the Americans perceive that NORAD should just continue as if nothing else had happened.

It is important that we make it clear to the Americans that we see a different future for the north and a different future for Canadian participation in continental security.

The requirements have changed. The world has changed. It is now necessary for the government to change. I would ask the House to endorse the motion that is before it, to give its wholehearted support to it, and to see if we cannot get some of these issues finally moving.

Many questions need to be asked and if I can, Mr. Speaker, let me quote from Ken Lewis, president of Aerospace Industries Association of Canada, who when he came before the committee posed some of the questions, and this is from the aerospace industry.

> Is there a likelihood of an attack by the Soviet Union or others against North America? If so, under what circumstances? If not, what is the threat? If there is no perceived threat, or one of little consequence, should Canada disengage from the joint defence of North America by not renewing the NORAD agreement? If disengaged, what kind of an aerospace defence system would be needed by Canada?

That is the nature of the questions being posed by our aerospace industry. We say to those on the government side who perceive themselves to be friends of the aerospace industry that that industry needs some assurance as to where things are going. The government can no longer keep its head in the sand on these issues. It has to move and this House could give leadership to the government by agreeing to the motion today.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, our Prime Minister has said that Canada does not want to be a super power, just a super country. However, it has been our geographic fate to have been between the two super powers, the U.S.A. and the U.S.S.R. throughout the cold war. Now that that has changed and the cold war as we knew it has ended, the time has come to reappraise and reinterpret a lot of the relationships that developed during that time.

• (1130)

The resolution before the Canadian House of Commons this morning is a very timely and important one because it deals with one aspect of the furniture of the cold war, the North American Air Defence Agreement, NORAD. I would like to make some general comments as a Canadian, as a parliamentarian, and someone speaking also for the government on this issue.

First I would like to address specifically the provisions of the resolution which the hon. member for Victoria has asked this House to support. There are two elements to this resolution. The first is that the Canadian government should unilaterally notify the United States that we want to terminate this agreement which exists between our two sovereign countries. The hon. member sets an outside date for that of 1994. Then he goes on and says that in the meantime the government should institute a thorough public review of Canada–U.S. defence relations including discussions between U.S. and Canadian parliamentarians.

The member is suggesting that we cancel a long-standing treaty between our country and the United States and then begin to hold hearings, discussions and public debate as to whether or not that treaty is valid, whether it has a continuing role. I cannot understand the logic of giving notice of an intention to annul an agreement today and then calling for discussions about the appropriateness of it that would begin tomorrow.

Second, as I read this motion, I see that this parliamentarian from the New Democratic Party wants the government to institute a public review, including discussions between Canadian parliamentarians and the United States elected representatives. I have a serious problem with that as a parliamentarian. I think one of the great difficulties we find in Canada today is the diminished role of our House of Commons, this Chamber of the people's elected representatives. We have lost our historical position in relation to power, going to the cabinet; policy, going to the senior public service; and public opinion, going to the opinion pollsters.

We have abdicated our role for far too long to these three other elements. It is little wonder that today Canadians have a low view of the Canadian House of Commons because we parliamentarians have not adequately asserted our right, our position and our voice on behalf of the Canadian people.

When we have a motion brought to the floor of the House of Commons by a New Democrat member urging that the government get parliamentarians to have these discussions rather than parliamentarians themselves, who after all populate the committee on defence, who after all have the capacity to debate right here on the floor of the House of Commons, as we are doing this very moment, these important issues affecting the future of our country, then I think this is certainly not worthy of a party that includes the word democrat in its name. I think we can expect better than that from a so-called New Democrat.

These are the problems I have with this motion. These are the reasons I cannot not support it. I do think it is very timely that we discuss this issue and bring into perspective what is happening for our country's future in relation to defence. The hon. member has outlined some of the history of the cold war threat and how the initial response was to manned bombers and with changes in technology shifting that to rocket technology, intercontinental ballistic missiles and, over time, although he did not go into it in great detail, the shifting role of NORAD in response to that.

I think it is important to stress not only the historic evolution, the technological changes and the military and political dynamics in this relationship, but equally the fact that the NORAD agreement itself has not stood still, frozen in time in relation to this evolution. The NORAD agreement has been revised and renewed on six or seven occasions, most recently in April. These have been opportunities to take into account the changing world around us.

If we were so good in the past at being able to negotiate treaty changes with the United States when circumstances warranted, why should the New Democrats throw overboard the whole approach of co-operation and negotiation between two sovereign countries and say now that things are changing yet again, we are no longer going to change the agreement yet again to reflect it. Instead, we are going to give them notice today that by 1994 this whole agreement ends, it is over, it is done with.

When the New Democrat spokesman for defence was giving the reasons for his motion this morning, I jotted down his fundamental premise so as not to misquote him. He turns a phrase well and argues with logic. He said: "The fundamental premise has changed". The fundamental premise for the NORAD agreement was put in the context of the end of the cold war.

If it is viewed, as apparently the New Democratic Party views NORAD, as existing entirely in the context of the cold war, yes he is right. The fundamental premise has changed. If it is viewed, as I do and as I think other party spokesmen and other parliamentarians do, that the fundamental premise of Canadian foreign policy and the fundamental premise of Canadian defence policy is co-operative action, a shared responsibility, a sharing of the burdens, a sharing of the costs, a collective approach to security, then most assuredly the fundamental principle has not changed.

The fundamental premise of our policy is that Canada does best as a relatively small power in a complicated and aggressive world to share with others through treaties and other arrangements on a shared basis. That is why we are active in the United Nations, why we are in NATO, why we are in the Conference on Co-operation and Security in Europe, the Commonwealth la Francophonie, the Organization of American States and yes, even NORAD. This is all part of a piece.

I want to make it very clear that the Government of Canada, now, today, no longer views NORAD from a cold war perspective. That is very clear. We do not view NORAD from a cold war perspective any more. We view this international treaty as we view all of our others, as part and parcel of the well developed Canadian tradition, developed by governments led by Prime Ministers who were Liberal and Prime Ministers who were Progressive Conservative, who felt that co-operative security and playing an internationalist role was the greatest basis for Canadian long-term success and dedication to the fundamental interests and the fundamental values of Canada as a strong and sovereign country.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, as befits a middle of the road party, I am torn on this issue. I see a lot of merit in the motion. However, I cannot support the unilateral termination of the agreement in 1994. I want to say, parenthetically, that if the Liberal amendment before the House of Commons committee that was reviewing NORAD had been accepted, we would only have a two year agreement. I find it very unfortunate that that amendment was not accepted so that we could have realized the changing world and the changing circumstances and been able to review our policy accordingly.

I agree that there is need for review. I accept what the parliamentary secretary has said about sharing. We are a mouse living next to an elephant. It is tough for a mouse to share with an elephant. The elephant has to be a bit more sharing, a bit more caring and a bit more co-operative.

Nobody has mentioned the Straits of Juan de Fuca and nuclear submarines transferring through Canadian space. The Straits of Juan de Fuca are not an isolated incident. We have had similar incidents in the Arctic with American ships going through Canadian sea space, not to mention submarines, but we do not know where they are and we seem to be powerless to do anything about it. Although, high on the Canadian agenda, it seems to me, is Canadian sovereignty. Canadians want us to get control over our own territory and that includes the north.

Co-operation and sharing is all very well and essential. It makes no sense at all for a power like us to be living on the North American continent with the United States and not have a joint defence policy. It is meaningless. It does not make any sense at all. Sure, we have got to have a joint defence policy, but it has got to be a two-way street. We cannot always be saying yes to the Americans and we cannot always be letting the Americans do exactly what they want because that is not co-operation, that is simply subservience. I do not think Canadians want subservience.

There has got to be a fundamental review. I agree that the cold war is over, but let us remember that the threat still remains. I want to quote from the submission of the Arms Control Centre before the standing committee. They say that they support the renewal of NORAD, but they say: "You simply cannot say yea or nay". The threat may have diminished, but there is still instability. The threat today is not so much the cold war as the instability that exists in that region where the threat from the cold war originally came from, and that is the Soviet Union.

There is still in that area in a time of instability a great deal of armament that is threatening to us. Through no motivation, because the motivation for the cold war and the motivation for attack is gone obviously, but inadvertently, in a time of instability and in an area of instability, there could be a releasing of weaponry that is potentially dangerous to us and that is what the Arms Control Centre pointed out.

It says that it agrees that Canada, in light of that, should renew the NORAD Agreement for two years. It also says that Canada should complement its role in NORAD with a more activist approach to strategic arms control as it relates to air breathing weapons and air defence and to confidence-building measures for the north.

I liked what my friend said and I think he and I were in agreement about the kind of thing that must happen in the Arctic, and the weakness.

Let me deal with one point before that and that is the role of parliamentarians. It is all very well for the parliamentary secretary to say that Parliament must initiate this review. If Parliament is to initiate the review, why is the government having its review on constitutional matters? There is no call for Parliament to initiate a review of the Constitution. The government has a paper, the government gives that paper to a parliamentary committee, it travels across the country, it hears Canadians, it reports, it advises and it recommends. Why cannot the same thing happen in defence?

We have been asking, I have been asking and my friend has been asking, the government for the last two years to initiate, to put down its policy similarly in defence as it has on the Constitution so that we can examine it and so that Canadians can examine it. Unlike constitutional matters, the government has refused to do the same thing in defence matters.

I think it is facile to say that you can do it with the Constitution, but you must not do it in defence.

The government is the government. It is responsible for initiating policy. Our role is to review policy and I think that is what must happen.

In that review, I agree with my friend that we have got to go beyond the present NORAD. There is instability and we have to come to grips with that instability and the need for security in the polar area. We are a polar country and it is time we stopped looking to the south of us so much and started looking to the north. There is an opportunity now for us to do that, for us to change our vision and to go far beyond the present NORAD.

Why can we not have a NORAD of the sea for example? Why can we not have NORAD of the sea? The government policy did not address that at all, did not show any initiatives for getting together. It talked about the Murmansk speech but where is the Canadian initiative for getting the super powers together in naval arms control? Where is the initiative for bringing together the United States and the Soviet Union.

The United States travelling through Juan de Fuca, travelling through the Northwest Passage, still thinks that its role, its right, is to travel anywhere it wants in the world. I think we have to talk about that with the Americans to say there is such a thing as Canadian space and there is such a thing as Canadian sovereignty. Maybe it is time for the United States, in view of the fact that the cold war is over, to look at the policy of the American navy and to see whether in fact it should be defending the United States and maybe the polar region too, but that it is not the naval policemen of the whole world.

Why can we not have in the polar area a security force? There is an Arctic Council that exists now. Canada is part of an Arctic Council and that Arctic Council has taken a very interesting initiative in the environment.

I ask the question: How can you take initiatives in the environment, multinational agreements in the environment, and have them become effective unless you have security? There is no security in the polar area at the present time. Why can we not have a multinational force? Why can we not have, first of all, confidence building measures and then going beyond confidence building measures, a security system like the Arctic Council in the same way as we have in the environment. Why can Canada not take that kind of initiative, and why can Canada not say to the United States and to the Soviet Union that they, the United States and Russia, Canada, the Danes, the Norwegians, should have a multinational sea security system, a surface and air security system in the polar region. That is absolutely necessary and its time has come.

After all, if we can do that in the Persian Gulf, why can we not do it in the polar area? What we had in the Persian Gulf was in fact a security system, a 16–nation or more security system. It was not attacking anybody, at least in the beginning it was not. It was simply establishing security. By the way, a lot of that was due to the experience of NATO, of which we and the United States are both partners, and part of the success of the gulf was the fact that we had worked together over the years. We knew our communications systems and we knew our strategies and we were operating jointly. If it can be done in the gulf why can it not be done in the polar areas?

That is the kind of initiative I would like to see. That is the kind of review of NORAD that we need. That is why I am in a dilemma. I like the motion but I cannot unilaterally say just to terminate it and let us see where we go from there.

I have to say in conclusion that if our amendment before the external affairs committee had been accepted, we would have only a two–year agreement and possibly we could have supported the motion.

Hon. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I had not realized the matter that was before us until about half an hour ago. I came over because the mover of the motion, the member of the New Democratic Party, knows that I have some interest in the issue of NORAD renewal, NORAD treaty matters, given in fact what did happen in the external affairs committee. I will come back to that in a minute.

• (1150)

Before I get to that, the hon. member for Labrador has made a statement that I hope he did not mean because it flies in the face of some of the things we have been trying to develop around here for some time. I made the note and wrote it down that the government's role is to initiate policy, our role in the House of Commons is to review policy. I know the hon. gentleman has been here for a long time and has been an esteemed member of the defence committee for a long time. I am sure he does not mean what that says, that it is not the role of members of Parliament in the new capacity of committees to initiate policy reviews on their own and to make policy proposals on their own.

I hope that that is what he meant to say, because that is certainly what the committee on which he serves and the committee that I chair regards as our proper role. I think he may have meant that he wishes the government had come forward more quickly with a defence policy paper, and I accept that that is his concern. I am sure he does not want to leave on the record the idea that the only role of members of Parliament is to review government policy initiatives. If that is in fact what he meant to leave on the record, I would be surprised.

He may want to respond to that. I will leave him a minute at the end to respond to that on a point of order, Sir, because that is precisely what he said.

Let me, however, come back to the subject matter that is here. It is true that the standing committee of this House deliberated on the matter of the NORAD renewals here for quite a long time. If I remember correctly, the composition of the joint committee was members of both the defence committee and of the external affairs committee. Certainly the hon. member who proposes the motion today was a member of a distinguished group of members of Parliament who spent some time reviewing this matter. If I remember, they also commissioned a fairly substantial and lengthy piece of research, and on at least one panel I know four experts met. I should say that while I chair the parent committee, I did not participate in the deliberations of the subcommittee but I value the work they did.

That subcommittee commissioned a panel of four experts to prepare a series of papers examining in great detail five aspects of the renewal issue. Those were, specifically, Soviet Strategic Developments and their Implications, United States Strategic Developments and their Implications, Strategic Arms Control, Aerospace Surveillance and U.S.–Canadian Interests in Consultation.

That panel of experts wrote a long report which they asked our consent later to publish, which we happily gave them the right to do. In that particular report, Sir, they made a specific recommendation, and I quote it:

> Taking all considerations into account, the panel believes that NORAD serves Canada well and, therefore, ought to be renewed for a further period.

That is a precise quote.

The debate at committee, as the previous member so carefully characterizes it, became a question of is it possible to find some way to agree on a period of time during which the defence policy review and the foreign policy review that we all wanted to see happen could be conducted? In fact, the external affairs committee report specifically recommended a review of policy in both those areas, and we are still interested in pursuing that matter.

I only make this point, Mr. Speaker: At the time we thought we had an understanding. It wasn't that we would pass the Liberal amendment for two, it was that we thought we would be able to agree in the interests of encouraging a defence and foreign policy review, to some period of time less than five years, in order to express our sense that, I think collectively, it could not just be business as usual in the development of policy in the foreign affairs field with regard to security and strategic interests; that the key issue had disappeared and that we had to now find some way to make urgent the necessity to talk about what you do in conflict resolution in the new world order; what do you do in Arctic surveillance issues, and all of the things that the previous member has spoken so eloquently about and knows so well.

Those were the matters that motivated us. As the hon. member for Victoria knows well, there was an attempt to come to some conclusion. He knows full well why we did not get there. I am constrained, because if I remember correctly, those votes were held in camera and I will not, therefore, talk about what happened in camera. The hon. member for Victoria will know that I believe there was an understanding that was breached in that room. The hon. member knows I believe that. And, so, he will not be surprised. I do know that.

Mr. Brewin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. This is a very serious point which the member has made because he has suggested that I know there was a breach of some understanding in the committee. I want to put it on the record of this House that, first, I had no idea that that is what the member believed was the situation in that committee; second, I want to state categorically that there was no understanding whatever on that issue.

There were differences of opinion on the issue of how long we should recommend the continuation of the agreement. I understand that but there was no understanding nor was it my knowledge, until the member just got up and said it, that he believed otherwise.

Mr. Bosley: Mr. Speaker, that is an unbelievable statement.

The hon. member has had five discussions with me on this matter. They started before the committee reported. They began in this Chamber sitting in these chairs. We talked about the possibility of building a consensus around the NORAD report.

I indicated to him and I will indicate it here that there were two or three of us on the government side who thought there was some virtue in the position of recommending a shorter period of time if we could get a unanimous committee report to adopt that position.

The hon. member undertook, and I say it here on the record, that if it were possible to obtain a shorter period of time, three years was the agreed number, he would support a position which said in that case he and his party take it upon themselves to support a NORAD renewal for three years at a time.

I say precisely, without saying what happened in committee, that is what he and I discussed in this Chamber in these two chairs. He knows full well how furious I was because he has heard me personally on this before.

It came time to deal with the subcommittee report which would have adopted a shorter period of time and urged the foreign policy reviews. I am constrained from describing what actually happened in votes in committee.

It was not possible to obtain the necessary majority of the votes in that committee to adopt the three-year figure. He knows why because he was there.

I have never been able to understand how it is possible thereafter for the members of the New Democratic Party, particularly my good friend, when there was a chance in their hands to deliver a shorter renewal period in order to get both that shorter renewal period and the defence policy review, which they chose to say they wanted to meet here, but somehow did not get it, to now come back and put on the record this motion. It is quite incomprehensible to me.

If people at the time wanted both things, the defence policy review expressed through an agreement on a shorter renewal of the NORAD agreement, they were there to be had. It was not the members of the government side or the members of the Liberal opposition who made that not possible.

NORAD had served this country extremely well, it will continue to serve this country extremely well, and we have every right to try to move our security arrangements into the new world. That is our obligation to our children, and it is not credible to try to have one position on this issue here, and another position on this issue when it is time to deliver in votes and proceedings. I say that with respect.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I simply cannot believe that by my silence on the record of this House, I made any agreement with the hon. member in the terms in which he described them.

There may be an honest difference of understanding of what we did agree to. I will concede without hesitation that we were seeking to try to find some way in which we could get a solid and useful report before the House.

In the end, we did not succeed but I must say categorically, because my friend put it categorically, that his recollection of what we agreed is not mine.

Mr. Rompkey: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am not sure that the hon. member has a point of order. I am in doubt.

Mr. Rompkey: Mr. Speaker, I just want to clarify the record. My hon. friend across the way suggested that I had said only the government can take initiatives, only the government can initiate policy and it is the responsibility of Parliament simply to review.

It is quite obviously untrue. An individual member can take initiatives, as my friend is doing today, but let me remind the House the government controls not only the government itself, but committees.

It is very difficult for an opposition.

• (1200)

The numbers are such that the government controls not only the House but the committees. Unless the government is willing, it is extremely difficult, if not impossible, for the opposition to initiate reviews. I suggest to you that while—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada) moved that Bill C–36, an act respecting corrections and the conditional release and detention of offenders and to establish the office of Correctional Investigator, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee G.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to stand in the House today to speak on second reading of Bill C–36 which will create the new Corrections and Conditional Release Act.

There are few issues more emotionally charged or of greater concern to Canadians than that which is at the very heart of this bill, crime and public safety. The need for government action in this area has become increasingly apparent in recent years as public sentiment has been aroused across the country.

Increasing violence in our streets, much publicized abuse and just plain stupid errors in our criminal justice system have aroused considerable and justifiable anger and apprehension among many Canadians. In a nutshell, public confidence in the system's ability to protect society has been severely undermined. There is a very real and disturbing perception within society that the balance is all wrong.

As well, particular public attention is directed to the plight of victims who are perceived as being victimized twice, once by the offender and then by an uncaring system.

This bill seeks to address these perceptions by dealing clearly and forcefully with the issue of public safety. We have made public safety the number one principle in this bill.

[Translation]

The interpretation of this one important principle is this—if the release of an offender threatens society, the offender will not be released. The government wants to get a message to two groups. First of all, the government wants to assure the public that from this point forward, they, instead of offenders, will get the benefit of the doubt. The government also wants to send a strong message to all those who work in the parole and prison system that law-abiding citizens come first and that at no time should public safety be put in jeopardy.

Now having said all that, I want to turn briefly, for the record, to explain who is responsible for what in this complex and huge process known as the criminal justice system.

First of all, as Solicitor General, I am the minister responsible for a number of federal agencies but most important and of direct relevance to this bill and the criminal justice system, I am the minister responsible for the Correctional Service of Canada and the National Parole Board. To make the point, I am responsible for criminals after they have been sentenced by a court, and my colleague, the Minister of Justice, is responsible for the Criminal Code and the development of sentencing procedures, both of which are administered by the provinces through the provincial court system.

Members will realize that a great many of the proposals which are in Bill C-36 were put forward last year in the consultation document or Green Paper that was widely distributed called "Directions for Reform".

This document was jointly released in July 1990 by the then Solicitor General, Pierre Cadieux, and by the Minister of Justice, Kim Campbell.

[English]

As well, the bill reflects the recommendations of the June 1991 report of the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General on Bill C-67.

[Translation]

This bill contains significant changes concerning parole.

It may come as a surprise to many members—because it certainly surprised me—to learn that this bill represents the first comprehensive review of correctional legislation since the Penitentiary Act was passed 123 years ago.

[English]

The proposals set down in this bill come at the end of a prolonged period of study, evaluation and consultation. They are the product of experience. Some of that experience, tragically, is the result of miscalculation, misadventure and the slow widening of deep cracks between components of the criminal justice system.

Historically we have turned away, as we have had to turn away, from prison regimes that produced riots, unending bitterness and an inmate code of permanent non-co-operation. A prison system that represents neither justice nor humanity will not transmit our values to inmates and therefore cannot protect the public.

While we have placed a properly needed emphasis on rehabilitation, we have also seen the development of some very serious deficiencies which have led to some horrific and tragic results. Much work has been done to correct this and we believe the bill has achieved the right balance. Now is the time to act with resolve and dispatch and to take the very best the present system has to offer and mix it with these necessary reforms.

We will put into place a corrections system that will not only protect the public but will serve to rehabilitate and assist those who can be helped. It is a tall order and we think we have it right.

Let me briefly explain the bill, which I concede is complex and not an easily understood piece of work.

Bill C-36 is in three parts.

Part I sets out correctional legislation and is a modernization and a replacement of the Penitentiary Act. In essence this section provides the prison service, known as the Correctional Service of Canada, with its operating mandate and its rules of operation.

Part II defines the system of parole and the operation of the Parole Board. It will replace the Parole Act.

Part III establishes the office of the correctional investigator in law.

I anticipate that part II, which deals with conditional release, will be of most interest to the House. However, before turning to the provisions of part II, I would like to deal in a little more detail with the essentials of part I and part III.

As I said before, part I tells us how the correctional service will operate and under what rules. It is a complete modernization of correctional legislation, representing a decade of intensive work in collaboration with voluntary and professional groups, judges, Crown attorneys, the police and provincial governments. It reflects recent jurisprudence and the impact of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Part I also sets out a very important guiding principle, the protection of the public within its statement of principles of correctional law.

• (1210)

Along with this all important principle, protection of the public, there are a number of other principles enunciated in the bill: staff powers, the right of search and seizure, inmate rights, procedural safeguards , principles that compel the different parts of the justice system to stay in touch. Understanding this part of the bill is essential to understanding the entire bill. It is important to emphasize that the principle of protection of the public is fundamental.

Part III of the bill at long last establishes the position and mandate of the correctional investigator in law. Since 1973 this office has operated under part II of the Inquiries Act. Part III clearly describes the correctional investigator's mandate, investigative powers and procedures, which are essentially to act on behalf of inmates who feel that they have been dealt an injustice while they are within the corrections system.

The correctional investigator will have full discretion in determining when and how an investigation will be conducted. The bill establishes the power to hold hearings, the right of access to information and documents, authority to examine persons under oath, and access to correctional premises as required.

In general terms part II of the bill will toughen the existing rules of eligibility for parole, in particular in relation to violent offences, serious drug offences and sexual offences against children. However, as a necessary balance, first time, non-violent offenders will have a chance to gain regular parole when they are first eligible at one-third of their sentence.

It is a curious truth that sometimes society is better protected by moving certain offenders through the system and out of prison faster rather than leaving them behind bars where hope, job prospects and family support can fade away all too quickly. The rationale for doing this, while well supported as a rehabilitative measure, will also allow us to free up almost $1 billion which we spend each year to lock people up. By doing so we can place a greater emphasis on keeping the violent and dangerous offenders behind bars longer. Again, as in part I the protection of the public is the paramount principle.

Since the proposed changes to the different types of conditional release are not easily comprehensible without reference to the existing system, let me quickly set out its fundamentals.

Currently offenders receiving a sentence of more than two years will normally serve their sentence in a federal penitentiary. Under the old system an inmate was eligible for day parole and unescorted absences at one-sixth of sentence, full parole at one-third of sentence and release on mandatory supervision at two-thirds of the sentence. Escorted temporary absences could also be granted from the start of the sentence, although this was rare and release on mandatory supervision could be denied through the operation of a review hearing established under Bill C-67 in 1986.

Most of these provisions in the bill have been altered to reflect our commitment to deal more severely and effectively with violent offenders. We believe that the release for most offenders at one-sixth of a sentence is simply too soon. We propose therefore that the minimum time in prison before consideration for day parole be set at six months before the normal full parole eligibility date of one-third of sentence.

Furthermore, the purpose of day parole would be limited to preparation for eventual release. Other activities, such as training, attendance at educational or health related programs or work detail, would be transferred to the temporary absence program where release periods are shorter and supervision more intense.

With this change, for example, the minimum possible time in prison for a six-year sentence would be 18 months instead of 12 months. For a nine-year sentence the minimum to be served in prison would be 30 months rather than 18 months. Those serving sentences of three years or less would be unaffected.

The unescorted temporary absence regime will be changed to alter the emphasis from preparation for release to programming and training. Maximum security inmates will not be eligible at all for unescorted absences. The National Parole Board will be responsible for conditional release decisions respecting lifers, schedule offenders and detained offenders who have been classified to other levels.

Additionally we believe that the court, having heard all the evidence and having had before it the police, the victims and the expert witnesses, should not be limited in setting the over-all sentence. Therefore the government proposes a new provision called judicial determination whereby judges will be able to specify that offenders convicted of a schedule offence or a serious drug offence must serve at least half their sentence behind bars instead of the current one-third of sentence before parole review.

We do not propose this role for judges because they have demanded it or even because they favour it, but because they are best placed within the criminal justice system to say whether there should be a higher guaranteed minimum prison term in some cases. This proposal is in recognition of the fact that there is a wide gap in our sentencing and correctional system, to put the problem politely. To put it less politely, the problem under the current system is that judges are seen by the public to set a certain period of punishment and then the parole board later applies a different set of criteria that sometimes result in parole decisions that do not seem to follow the intention of the court.

I acknowledge that this provision places a burden on the courts, but it is one that they alone are equipped to fulfil and one I hope that they will not hesitate to accept and apply where warranted.

Further, I think this provision gives Canadians the assurance that the view of the court will be more accurately respected and reflects the government's view that early release may be just too early in some cases and does not, I hasten to add, signal a change in our belief that parole is an essential part of the criminal justice system.

We have signalled out some offenders for a potentially longer period of incarceration, but we believe that it is desirable that others, the first time non-violent offenders, have a final chance to show that they can and will take steps to straighten out their lives and quickly become law abiding members of society.

This group is the one already most likely to benefit from release on parole at the earlier date, but unfortunately the failure to release them is too often the result of the complexity of the bureaucratic process of determining parole rather than the merits of the case.

Therefore this bill proposes a new provision to the House to be called accelerated review which would set out a more efficient review process for eligible offenders. The process would work in the following way. There would be in the first instance a review of the files by one parole board member accompanied by the recommendation of correction officials. The essential criteria, as with everything in the bill, would be public safety and whether or not the offender has the potential to commit a violent crime if released.

If an offender were accepted under this process release on parole would take place at exactly one-third of sentence. If during the accelerated review, evidence were put forward suggesting that even though the offender was not serving time for a violent offence the potential for a violent offence was there, then the offender would be referred to a full panel hearing for a decision in the normal way. Evidence of the potential for violence might be suggested by a previous conviction which did not result in a penitentiary sentence, behaviour while in prison, or any other factor relevant to future behaviour.

It is important to remind the House at this point that release on parole is not a right but is a privilege to be earned. Parole is a form of conditional release, meaning that any release must be accompanied by supervision and strict conditions which relate to the original crime, the parole location, persons not to be associated with or provisions relating to the use of drug and alcohol. Violation of these conditions may mean a return to prison and future parole determined by a full and very sceptical panel.

• (1220)

The next important changes being put to the House are in the regime currently known as mandatory supervision. Earned remission has with the years become virtually automatic. Other disciplinary procedures such as loss of privileges or confinement in segregation have proven more immediate and more effective.

The Bill C-67 regime itself is an incentive to good behaviour because the potential lengthening of the sentence through absolute denial of remission is far more drastic for the inmate than a slight reduction in earned remission. In effect the entire earned remission scheme has evolved to a point where it is unnecessary and release at two-thirds of the sentence is almost automatic, with the very important exception of the detention provisions.

Offenders on mandatory supervision who violate the conditions of release are of course returned to custody. The first proposal therefore is to recognize the evolution of the system and accept that earned remission has become effectively statutory. Recognizing this formally means a shifting of resources to the programming, classification, parole supervision and security activities which can directly enhance the security of the public.

Second, I propose a further modification of the detention provisions to include serious drug offences which are set out in schedule II to the bill. It is our government's view that the major drug offences, trafficking and importing, for example, do enormous physical harm to Canadians. This violence which often may end in the death of a person is no less violent because it is indirect. Offenders convicted of serious drug crimes will be liable to a hearing if by virtue of their past record continuing associations or links to the prison drug trade it is likely that they would return to the active participation in the illicit drug market.

These same offences, as I described earlier, will also make the offender liable under the judicial determination provision to having parole eligibility set at one-half of the sentence.

Compare this to the present system with the possibility of day parole at one-sixth of the sentence and a very good chance of parole at one-third. Drug offenders often have external characteristics which might suggest good parole performance and release at two-thirds is almost a certainty unless a crime of violence was also committed. The reality is quite different and this amendment recognizes the very real harm that is done to society.

I also want to announce in connection with detention that the government will be adding five new offences to schedule I, all directly related to sexual offences against children. The offences are: incest, invitation to sexual touching, sexual exploitation, anal intercourse and oral intercourse. Adding these offences to the schedule not only means that the offenders could be detained if the harm done and possible repetition were serious, but the offenders would be liable to the imposition by the judge of parole eligibility at one-half the sentence instead of one-third and would not be eligible for the accelerated review process which I described a minute ago.

I would like to turn my attention to the victims of crime. As I said at the beginning of my speech, I believe that victims are often victimized twice: once by the criminal and again by a system that is unable to recognize the trauma and the suffering that they endure. What we are proposing is a fundamental change in favour of victims' rights. As I have set out, the different forms of temporary release and conditional release will continue to be a key element in the reintegration of the offender in society.

However, in the past our justice system has not given enough attention to the anxiety of victims who frequently cannot legally be given information which is essential to their peace of mind and cannot be sure that their voice will be heard once a trial is over.

There are therefore several changes to the operation of the National Parole Board and the Correctional Service that deal with openness of the system and go to the heart of what the victims want.

Provisions I am going to describe add up to the first formal recognition of victims as legitimate and real players in the parole system's decision-making process.

I want to say that I am very pleased to bring forward these provisions. Currently if the victim of a crime writes to me or to the board and asks that a victim impact statement be put before the board, I cannot guarantee that is going to be done. Statements are considered a matter of policy only.

If the request is to attend the Parole Board hearing, the inmate has the right of veto. If the request is to find out when or where or under what circumstances and conditions an inmate will be released, the Privacy Act will frequently prevent a disclosure.

Under part II of the bill these provisions will be changed. In future, the National Parole Board panel that is hearing a case will determine who may attend. The inmate will be consulted but will not have a veto. With the passage of the bill, victims will be entitled to have their statements become part of the inmate file on which the hearing will be based.

Currently, very little information can be released even to victims who want to know if an offender is likely to be released. We are unable because of the Privacy Act even to assure a victim that the offender will not be released, which is frequently the case.

Under this bill, if a victim contacts the board or CSC and asks to be kept informed, he or she can be informed of the release eligibility date, the hearing date, the offender's destination and any conditions imposed. This will apply to temporary absences as well as conditional release decisions.

In addition, the board will maintain a decision register containing information on board decisions and reasons for those decisions. Together, these measures will give victims information about hearings that are relevant to them and contribute to informing the public about parole.

I want to mention one last thing before beginning my concluding remarks and that is the issue of paperwork. Paperwork, whether we like it or not, is at the heart of this very large and sometimes very cumbersome system. With such diverse groups as the courts, the police, parole officers and provincial agencies all working as part of the criminal justice system, the chance for error can be very real. As we know, they can be deadly.

Everywhere in this bill, the emphasis is on the requirement that accurate and complete information be obtained and exchanged between the various elements of the criminal justice system.

There is a requirement that courts provide reasons for sentencing to the correctional system, and that all information collected by the Correction Service of Canada and the National Parole Board be shared.

This will help to ensure an end to those tragic instances in which a failure to keep files complete has led to escape from custody and even murder.

The changes proposed in this bill also complement others currently under way. As members will know, the prison for women in Kingston is being closed. The process for choosing sites for the regional centres that will replace others is advanced. Other changes are being developed as part of the response to the task force on federally sentenced women. Action is also advanced on many initiatives respecting aboriginal offenders, and correctional programming for them is rapidly expanding.

Certain provisions of this bill will facilitate progress on these files but much is under way already.

As I said earlier, this bill constitutes one part of the program set out in the consultation document Directions for Reform. When reinforced by sentencing legislation currently in preparation by the Minister of Justice, we will have reformed the criminal justice system from sentencing through to the end of the penitentiary sentence. This is no small feat and it is an issue that I am sure will go a long way toward restoring sagging public confidence in our criminal justice system.

Finally in closing, let me say that I am anxious to work with members from all sides of the House to have as full and effective a committee process as possible. I know that the justice and solicitor general committee members will be thorough, thoughtful and constructive when considering this bill.

• (1230)

I have told everyone I have met, including those many groups I have spoken with, that I sincerely want an informed discussion to take place on this bill. I want the best possible product to come forward from this process.

Therefore I appreciate that the motion was to send it to a legislative committee, but I would think that perhaps at some other time it might be appropriate for the House leader, in conjunction with the opposition leaders, instead to refer this bill to the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General. I am sure members from all parties with their backgrounds will give the bill a very full hearing. We contemplate the calling of witnesses, a very detailed clause by clause examination, and the bill coming back to this House a refined product benefiting all Canadians and speaking to the public safety of all Canadians.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to make submissions on Bill C-36, an act respecting corrections and the conditional release and detention of offenders and to establish the office of correctional investigators.

I suppose an editorial headline in a newspaper in Ontario, the Whig Standard sums it up: "The parole system overhaul a big scam on public". That is the headline of an article written on October 12, 1991.

I have been the solicitor general spokesman for the Official Opposition for the last seven years and you will have to forgive me for my cynicism and the cynicism of a great number of people interested in criminal law reform when we approach this particular government initiative with considerable scepticism.

This is the third attempt or the third time this government over the last seven years has said or announced to much fanfare that it intends to reform the criminal justice system. I remember about three years ago, it was just a few months before the general election campaign in November 1988, one of my friend's predecessors, Mr. Kelleher, had a huge press conference at the press theatre on Wellington Street and announced parole reform.

Many of the same or similar headlines were in newspapers right across the country: "The government intends to get tough on parole", "The government intends to change the parole system".

What happened to that legislation? Nothing. Absolutely nothing. It was not even introduced in the House of Commons and it appears obvious now that what the government was engaged in was a public relations scam. What the government is doing this week is again trying to manipulate the process and it is involved in a public relations scam again.

This is crime prevention week. Crime prevention week has been in effect for close to 10 years. It is a week set aside by municipalities and police forces right across the country to focus attention on matters affecting crime prevention.

This government has chosen this week to debate and discuss a number of different pieces of legislation affecting the criminal justice system. We have to ask why the government waited so long. Why has it waited seven years before bringing in legislation to deal with the criminal justice system?

I will speak more specifically about the legislation before the House but before doing so I have to call into question the government's credibility, its sincerity and commitment to meaningful criminal law reform, given its track record over the last seven years.

We know that this government is desperate. The government's popularity is at an all-time low. We know that the Reform Party is now a more popular political party than the governing party. This government is trying to do whatever possible to try to gain some public support. As part of that desperate attempt to gain some public support, it has decided to bring in a series of law and order pieces of legislation, at least to bring them forward this week when a lot of these bills have been on the Order Paper, have been discussed and debated at committee for the last seven years. All of a sudden the government decides that it is going to bring this legislation forward this week.

At the very same time it claims to be committed to criminal law reform, what does the government do? It cuts $2 million in funding for crime prevention week. This week is crime prevention week and this government has decided to axe $2 million.

It is fine for the Prime Minister to go abroad as a buffoon, whether it is in the Caribbean or elsewhere, and write off multimillion dollar loans and grants to other countries. It is fine for the Prime Minister to say that and to try to score some cheap political points overseas, and yet when it comes to programs in Canada that have had a positive effect, the government decides to be chintzy in cutting $2 million from crime prevention week. Groups right across this country see right through this government's agenda and they have justifiably criticized in a very severe fashion the federal government's credibility and commitment to crime prevention. On one hand, the minister stands in his place today and says: "We are concerned and we are moving with dispatch and resolve", and on the other hand the government has cut $2 million for crime prevention week.

It was a Liberal government that started this program in 1983. It has been extremely successful. Municipalities and police forces right across Canada have come to rely on this federal funding in order to increase the profile of crime prevention week, and here the government cuts it back, totally eliminates $2 million in funding for crime prevention week.

I would like to comment briefly on the government's approach to criminal law reform. Over the last seven years this government has ad libbed its way through criminal law reform. It does not have an over-all plan to fundamentally change or reform the criminal justice system in Canada. The government is in a piecemeal fashion addressing problems, attempting to resolve problems, as they arise in the criminal justice system.

When one considers the legislation presently before the House, a number of bills are not here as a result of an initiative by the Government of Canada. The bills are before the House because the Supreme Court of Canada, in a decision or in a number of decisions, has said to the Government of Canada that it had better start acting, it is a legislator and it is essential that it deal with certain aspects of the criminal justice system.

For example, we have before the House on the Order Paper legislation that deals with the criminally insane. The law was struck down in May by the Supreme Court of Canada. The Supreme Court said to the Minister of Justice: "You have until November 1 to bring in new legislation in order for it to comply with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms". The government obviously had to act. It introduced a bill. It did not act quickly enough and then it had to go, cap in hand, back to the Supreme Court of Canada for an extension. Now the Supreme Court has granted an extension.

The point I am making is that in the area dealing with the criminally insane, the Law Reform Commission over 10 years ago recommended changes. There was a bill some four or five years ago that was considered, and yet nothing happened until the Supreme Court of Canada in effect instructed this Parliament to act with regard to a law dealing with the criminally insane.

Regarding the rape shield law, another piece of legislation or at least a proposed piece of legislation, why is the government acting? Not because it took the initiative and said we have to reform this aspect of criminal law in Canada, but because the Supreme Court of Canada rendered a decision considered to be an inequitable result, a result that does not meet with favour with a great majority of Canadians. The government again has to act in this particular area.

With respect to matters dealing with young offenders, it is not because the government has taken the initiative and has said it wants to reform the law as it applies to young offenders, but rather it is responding to public concern. The minister admitted in his place today that what has sparked the introduction of this bill in the House is not the government's leadership, it is not the government's initiative, but it is because the public is pushing the government into acting and acting swiftly.

Some four or five years ago this Parliament was recalled in the middle of summer to pass Bill C-67, the gating bill, to deal with gating or issuing detention orders. Again, it was not because this government took the initiative and provided the necessary leadership, it was because the public was pushing the government to act. We on this side of the House have been pushing the last seven years for the government to act. I was on the justice committee, and I note that the present chairman of the justice committee is present in the House today. He was on that committee as well.

In the spring of 1987 we began a comprehensive review of the criminal justice system in Canada. The committee reported in August 1988. The title of this report is "Taking Responsibility". It cost taxpayers hundreds of thousands of dollars. This report of the justice committee, which was tabled in this House, had 97 recommendations for reform. It was well received in the criminal justice community across the country. What has it been doing over the last four years? It has been sitting on the minister's desk gathering dust. The government has done absolutely nothing over the last three or four years with this expensive piece of work by the justice committee.

Now the minister comes forward and says: "Well, we want you to do it all over again, we want to send this matter back to committee". The pushing has not only come from the public and those interested in criminal law reform, but also from a standing committee of this House which has, over the last seven years that I have been a member of that committee, repeatedly demanded that the government take some action with regard to criminal law reform.

At the end of it all, here we are in November 1991 at the beginning of crime prevention week and the government says: "Well, we are taking the initiative, we are going to provide the leadership, and look at what we are doing. All week long we are going to be introducing and discussing and debating changes to the criminal justice system".

That is absolutely no way to deal with criminal law reform; a cynical, manipulative, public relations-driven way of trying to score some cheap political points in the middle of crime prevention week to pretend to the public that this government is concerned about criminal law reform.

I refer back to the headline "Parole System Overhaul a Big Scam on the Public".

Bill C-36 is certainly a lengthy bill. As we can see here and as the minister said, it is complicated legislation. I carefully read this a number of times and I have come to the conclusion that again, as was the proposal in the fall of 1988, it is tinkering. It is tinkering with the criminal justice system. This government has no over-all comprehensive plan to deal with criminal law reform in this country. Again, it is an example of the government ad libbing its way, almost with a blindfold on, ad libbing its way through criminal law reform when what is necessary in this country is some fundamental reform. I am afraid that this government has not approached the problem in a comprehensive way.

The minister says his counterpart, the Minister of Justice, will be introducing legislation dealing with sentencing reform. With all due respect to the Solicitor General, how can the legislative committee or the justice committee that will be dealing with Bill C-36, and the witnesses that appear before the committee, adequately and intelligently deal with reform of the parole system without looking at sentencing reform at the same time?

Therefore, what we have here is only half the package. Correctional law reform is only half of the package because it only deals with people once a judge sentences an offender to a period of incarceration. What we need is the other half of the package at the same time so we can move forward together with a comprehensive proposal and we can look at the sentencing structure in Canada, look at some of the very good recommendations that were made in this report Taking Responsibility and to look at ways of changing the system so that the public in Canada starts having some respect and confidence in the criminal justice system.

The sad reality is that today the public has very little, if any respect at all or confidence in the criminal justice system. Is it any wonder when you pick up the morning paper and read about the latest murder or the latest rape or robbery in your particular community?

I picked up The Toronto Star this morning, and what are the headlines? "Disabled man slain by intruder in home". The lead paragraph states: "A partly paralyzed North York man was beaten to death in his bedroom by an intruder as his elderly wife ran for help".

A headline right beside it: "Motel guest found by maid is metro's 74th homicide", 74 homicides this year compared to 46 murders at this time last year.

The public is justifiably alarmed at what is happening in our communities and in particular in metropolitan Toronto. I represent a riding in west metro, and my constituents have told me time and time again, and more so now, that they are afraid of what is happening in our community.

Just down the street, a few doors away from my constituency office a few days ago a couple of people walked into an after hours club and shot and killed two people. We see that day in and day out in Toronto, Vancouver, Calgary, Edmonton, Halifax. The crime rate is increasing. People are becoming afraid to walk in their own communities. Women in particular are afraid to walk in the evenings. If you will recall, it used to be a concern walking in downtown Toronto in the evening. Now people are afraid to walk in their own communities. They are afraid to take an evening stroll after dinner in their own community because of a fear that something may happen.

In a community not far from where I live, a business woman by the name of Caroline Case has gone missing. She disappeared a number of weeks ago and foul play is suspected there. I can say that my wife and other people in our community are afraid to walk alone at night and in fact are afraid to walk in groups.

There is a fear out there, a concern that the criminal justice system is not working. Whether it is justifiable or not, whether the evidence supports the perception that there is an increase in crime and a lack of feeling of security, whether it is justified or not, the reality is that people are afraid. The people are looking to governments, whether it is municipal, provincial or federal governments, to take action immediately in order to at least show them that legislators care about what is happening.

• (1250)

Yet we in this Chamber seem to be preoccupied with the Constitution, Meech Lake here and Meech Lake there, Constitution here and Constitution there. The reality is most people just do not care about the Constitution. They just do not care about constitutional reform.

What they would rather see is this Chamber and members of Parliament talking about the real issues that are of concern to people. They want to see a preoccupation in this House with economic concerns. People want to get back to work. That is one of the key issues that people are concerned about.

The other key issue is crime, law and order. They want to see this government, they want to see legislators, parliamentarians, politicians standing up and talking about issues of real concern to people, rather than simply taking crime prevention week as an opportunity to highlight a problem and then come Friday afternoon all the MPs will board their planes, buses and leave this place and the issue again will be buried on the Order Paper.

Criminal justice reform should be on the agenda every day in this House as long as people are concerned about what is happening on the streets in urban centres and even in rural areas right across the country. Toronto this year will set a record in terms of the number of homicides. As of today there have been 74 homicides in Toronto compared to 46 last year. We are breaking records in metro Toronto. The previous record for murders in metropolitan Toronto was 60 for all of 1987. We are already at 74 murders and we still have two months to go in metro Toronto.

The police estimate that there will be anywhere from 75 to 100 murders this year. We are looking at 25 more people who are living and breathing today who will be murdered, who will be killed over the next two months in metropolitan Toronto alone.

Toronto is number three in per capita violent crimes in Canada. Violent crimes are up 22 per cent so far this year. Some blame the rise in crime on drugs and the proliferation of guns in metropolitan Toronto. I spoke a little earlier about how people feel about walking in the evening. According to a recent poll 56 per cent of women are afraid to walk the streets at night alone. We are talking about streets in their own community and 75 per cent feel that the courts are far too lenient with criminals.

The point is that the public does not have confidence in the criminal justice system, that there is a concern out there and the concern is that the government is not doing what is necessary in order to deal with the problem.

I indicated that the government was not taking a comprehensive approach to criminal law reform and in fact was tinkering with the system. For example, the government by introducing this legislation has accepted that parole should remain a feature of our criminal justice system in Canada. It has not addressed the question of whether or not we should abolish parole all together, as has been done in jurisdictions outside of this country, in particular south of the border in the United States. Should we carry on with parole as we know it today?

I do not believe that we should carry on with the parole system that we have. This government has already accepted that rather than abolishing parole all together, it wants to retain it, tinker with it a bit to change the time periods. This government has not addressed the whole concept of mandatory supervision.

If I can just take a moment to talk about mandatory supervision, I support the complete abolition of mandatory supervision, and let me explain why.

Right now in Canada, if an individual is sentenced to a period of incarceration, they become eligible for day parole after serving a sixth of their sentence. They become eligible for full parole subject to certain exceptions after serving a third of their sentence, and they are automatically released subject to certain exceptions after serving two-thirds. That is called mandatory supervision.

Even though a judge says that this person is to serve nine years for an armed robbery or a violent offence, the law says that this person should be released after serving only six years, unless the government can show that a detention order should be issued to keep the person detained longer.

When we deal with those who are considered for mandatory supervision, we are dealing with the worst offenders. We are dealing with the bad apples in the system. It is these individuals who cannot convince the Parole Board that they should be released any earlier.

In fact, they are automatically released by operation of law. It does not make any sense at all. Again, is it any wonder that people do not have confidence in the criminal justice system. You have to ask yourself, Mr. Speaker, when you consider these time periods—one-sixth, one-third, one-half—what is the scientific rationale or the reasons why these time periods have been pulled out of a hat to say: "Someone should become eligible for full parole after serving one-third of their sentence".

The government now is saying: "For certain offenders, they should serve at least a half". Why?

An hon. member: There is no real supervision.

Mr. Nunziata: As my colleague says, there is no real supervision once inmates are released on mandatory supervision.

The whole concept of mandatory supervision is an experiment that has failed. It was introduced by a Liberal government over 10 years ago. It just does not work. People confuse it with parole when in fact it is not parole.

This government should have read the writing on the wall and abolished it altogether. That will be one of the amendments that the Liberal Party proposes at committee.

With regard to parole itself, the Law Reform Commission in Canada, a number of very prominent criminal lawyers in Canada, a number of groups and organizations in the criminal justice system have recommended the abolition of parole. It is a far-reaching proposal, but it is a proposal that makes a lot of sense because right now the whole system is warped.

Judges sentence individuals not because of the crime they committed. They sentence individuals trying to take into consideration when the individual might be released on parole and for that reason, the sentencing system in Canada has gone haywire. There is no rhyme or reason to it.

What has been recommended in the proposal that I support is the abolition of parole with some release period, say six months before release that the person be released into the community in order to reintegrate, that that be part of the sentence, that sentencing be reformed so that rather than handing out a nine-year sentence and people only serve five years, let us make the sentence more realistic and bring sentencing in line with reality and inject some certainty.

I note that I have just a few more minutes to talk about the particulars of this legislation. I would like to start talking about some of the specific provisions of this bill.

We will support this bill going to a legislative committee or the justice committee. We support that proposal because a body of expertise has developed. There are a number of members of the justice committee who have been there for a number of years.

We do not support a full blown cross-country tour in order to reacquaint ourselves with the problem. We know what the problems are. We already spent over a year putting this report together. A lot of good work went into this piece of work, and we believe this should form the basis of the committee's consideration.

We look forward to this bill going to committee. This party, the Official Opposition, will be moving a significant number of amendments. We will be asking the more general questions about parole, for example, and whether or not we should continue to hang on to the parole system in Canada. We will listen attentively to groups that appear before the committee. We will also consider some of the specific provisions in Bill C-36, first with regard to the first item that is listened on the government's propaganda here. It says: "Protection of the public will now be the paramount consideration in all decisions relating to the treatment and release of inmates".

• (1300)

What is new, as my colleague asks? Protection of the public will now be the paramount consideration. Has it not always been the paramount consideration? If it has not been then something is pretty screwy when it comes to the parole system or the penitentiary system in Canada. Yet the government makes it its first highlight as if something new is about to be introduced, that the protection of the public will now be the paramount consideration.

The second point the government highlights is the role of victims in the system. For a number of years I and my colleagues on this side of the House have pressed for more involvement by victims as well as for victims' rights. Victims simply did not have any rights in the criminal justice system. The system was too heavily weighted in favour of the offender. Finally the government is listening, but it has not listened completely.

The government has indicated that victims will be kept informed of an offender's prison and parole status. This is a good point. Information from victims can be considered at a parole hearing. We say it should be considered, not that there should be discretion, if a victim or the families of a victim want to be considered. Then the government says: "Victims can attend a parole hearing at the discretion of the parole board." We ask: "Why should it be at the discretion of the parole board?" At present, it is at the discretion, believe it not, of the offender. The person who is seeking parole, up until now, decides whether or not the victim or the families of the victim can appear before the parole board hearing.

The government says: "We will move a little in the direction of victims and will allow victims to appear or for their submissions to be considered at the discretion of the parole board". We on this side of the House say that the victim should have an absolute right to appear before parole board hearings to make submissions. We also say, and we will be moving amendments accordingly, the parole hearing process should be opened up to the public and to the media.

Right now, the parole system is a system which is behind the scenes. It is a private little affair between the parole board, the offender and a caseworker at a penitentiary. What we say, on this side of the House, is that the system should be open, just as a court case, a criminal trial, is open to the public. In order for there to be confidence in the system, the parole board hearings should be completely open and public so that anyone who wishes to attend can attend and that certain people, and in particular the victims of crimes and/or their families, have the option to attend if they so wish to attend.

A few years ago, I had a call from a constituent who had been raped in her community. She went into the local grocery store to do some grocery shopping. She paid her bill, turned around and who was standing behind her in line but the person who raped her. He had been, just a few weeks earlier, released on parole. If there was an open system where the victim had a right to be represented at parole board hearings that would not have happened. If this person qualified for parole at all, the parole board, in this particular case, as a condition of parole, surely should have said: "You are not to go back into the community where you committed the crime". Surely that should have been a condition. If this woman would have had the opportunity to appear before the National Parole Board, she would have done, and she would have made those submissions

We also have the case of John Rallo who is now in a federal penitentiary. He murdered his wife and two children. He was convicted of three counts of first degree murder. He has served about 14 years of his term. A few months ago, he was seen in the Hamilton area. The parents of the murdered woman were told by others that this John Rallo character was in the community. He was released on day passes. The parents of the murder victim, the grandparents of the two children, did not have an opportunity to appear before the National Parole Board to say that this person ought not to be released. This person, John Rallo, still has not admitted to the crimes, still will not co-operate with the police to indicate where the body of one of the young children was stashed or buried, or whatever. Yet the person is released on day parole. Is it any wonder there is so little confidence in the criminal justice system? If parole board hearings were opened up, that would not happen in the future.

We will be moving amendments with regard to parole eligibility. We will be moving amendments with regard to comprehensive reform of the parole system and the abolition of mandatory supervision.

With regard to the specific provision of the government to delay parole eligibility to one-half of the sentence for those inmates who are violent offenders and serious drug offenders, the government proposes to leave this up to judges to determine. Right now, inmates are eligible for full parole after serving a third of their sentences. What the government says is: "For certain individuals, leave it up to the judges to decide whether or not these people should have to serve one-half their sentences".

At the very least, it should be mandatory. Rather than giving more discretion to judges when it comes to parole eligibility, there should be less discretion and as a matter of law, if that is the direction we are going, then people who commit certain violent offences and serious drug offences, should be denied parole automatically until they have served at least one-half of their sentence.

We will be proposing a number of other amendments at committee. Some of the provisions in this bill are provisions that we have been pressing for the last seven years, and we will support those provisions. We will be insisting that this government take a comprehensive approach to the problem of criminal law reform. We will want to have all the legislation, all the different aspects of the criminal justice system considered at the same time in order to show that we are serious about what we are doing. We will ask, for example, for a single streamlined system when it comes to corrections in Canada.

Right now there are two systems of penitentiaries, or prison systems, in Canada. If one is sentenced for a crime and the sentence is two years or less, then one serves the time in a provincial penitentiary. If the sentence is two years or more, the time is served in a federal penitentiary. It makes absolutely no sense at all. It is time that the federal and provincial governments get together to introduce a streamlined system so there is a single penitentiary system in Canada. It is an area that has not been dealt with by this government in this bill and we believe that there should be some further co-operation in that regard.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, criminal law is a federal responsibility. The administration of justice is a provincial responsibility. Again we believe that in certain areas there can be some streamlining in order to better deliver criminal justice in Canada.

In conclusion, let me say that the Liberal Party intends to support, in principle, this legislation, not because we support the details of this legislation but because we believe that it is high time this government moves ahead with criminal law reform. A great number of us will be participating at committee. We will be participating in second reading debate. A number of my colleagues will also be speaking. We will be introducing amendments which we believe will make this bill better. We will be introducing amendments which we believe will go a long way in allowing the Canadian public to once again have some confidence and respect and support for the criminal justice system.

• (1310)

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I am also pleased to participate in this debate today at second reading of Bill C-36 known as the corrections and conditional release act.

I hope I can present a more positive critique of this bill than the previous speaker and I will try not to indulge in the cynicism to which we just listened.

The criminal justice system in this country certainly is not perfect but then again it is not perfect in any jurisdiction of which I am aware. When we are dealing with the criminal elements in our society, particularly the violent criminal elements, it is extremely difficult to balance what is fair, what constitutes, first of all, safety to society and what also provides rehabilitation of those who have committed the offences.

We have to take a long, hard look at what we are attempting to do. There are no fast fixes. There are no easy solutions. The previous speaker made reference to the fact that in the United States they have done away with parole and mandatory supervision.

Let us look briefly at the situation in the United States of America which is statistically the most violent country in the western industrialized world. It is manifestly clear to me, and I think most experts—and I am not one—that the problem of crime in society cannot be solved by simply extending sentences or denying parole or mandatory supervision. If that was the case, the United States should have one of the lowest crime rates in the western world. Instead its prisons are bulging and it has just introduced a bill in Congress which will cost the American taxpayers $25 billion to build new penitentiaries. Yet the crime rate, the murder rate, the rate of rape and violent assault in that country is going up and up and up as the prisons get bigger and bigger and bigger.

It is not a quick fix. By simply extending the sentences and removing the criminals from society, the problem of violence in our society is not being solved. It is manifestly clear that we are not doing that.

We support and always have supported the number one principle of public safety in the criminal justice system: to protect the innocent. We support this bill at second reading. We hope we can improve this bill at committee but we support it at second reading.

We also agree that rehabilitation is important. We agree with the principle that even violent offenders, if we think it is safe, should be gradually released into society if it is possible. In some instances it is not. The Clifford Olson case, I think, is a prime example. There are sometimes when we, regrettably, simply have to throw the key away, as they say, in the interest of public safety.

However, that is not true in every case. The door should be left a little open where it is possible to reform and rehabilitate. We also agree with the additional offences listed in Schedule I and Schedule II to include sexual offences involving children, arson, and serious drug offenders. I am not quite sure what is meant by serious drug offenders, whether it is a quantitative thing, the amount of money involved, or the size of the illicit drug empire.

These things have to be addressed with greater resolution.

While we are on the subject of drug offences, let us not forget that there is a certain hypocrisy in this country. We talk about illicit drugs, hard drugs, heroin, crack cocaine and so on that are devastating. They are devastating to youth in particular.

Let us not forget that tobacco, which is a drug, and alcohol, which is a drug, account for the deaths of 50,000 people a year in this country. Hard-line drugs account for the deaths of approximately 350 to 400 persons. I am not accusing the government of being hypocritical, or any previous government, but that is something that some government is going to have to look at one of these days. I have had some experience as well.

I am not cynical so much as I am perhaps a bit disappointed, because we do have some really basic social problems in our society and other societies that, of course, this bill does not address. It cannot address them, I suppose. But let us not forget, Mr. Speaker, where and how violence begins in our society. Good heavens, the overwhelming majority of violent offenders in our society were born into violence. Their parents were violent. Their parents were either drug addicts or alcoholics, under-educated or non-educated or they were not raised by their parents. They were introduced to crime on the streets as teenagers or even younger. They became exposed to drugs and alcohol at an early age, illiterate, no respect for law and order or authority. These are the ones who end up in our prisons. They end up as serious violent offenders and we are left, of course, with legislating as to what we do with them and how we try to rehabilitate them.

We also, of course, have the problems of people born mentally ill, or people who become mentally ill. There is no legalistic safeguard against that except, of course, medical treatment. Then, of course, we have this whole growing problem in our society of guns, of weapons, and this is on the increase. Violent crime is on the increase in our country, and we have to do something about it. This bill goes part way toward doing something about treating the offenders as well as punishing the offenders.

I hope that the public who are watching today and the public who are reading our speeches or the editorial writers who write editorials will not confuse passing laws, statutes and regulations, with actually tackling the problems in society that create violence and that are acting as a momentum to the increase in violent crime. This bill will not do that, or it will do very little to prevent or to ameliorate that situation.

It seems that you cannot turn on television these days at any hour of the day without seeing violence portrayed on television, violence against women, sexual violence, violence against children. It seems that you cannot sell a program, you cannot get advertisers without that kind of story being portrayed in all its ugly graphics on television.

That is something else that knowledgeable people, experts, psychiatrists and psychologists in the field are telling us more and more, both in the United States and in Canada, that that kind of programming is bad for young people to be subjected to. Yet I do not see us regulating. I do not see this government or any other government bringing on stream regulations that would try to reduce that impact by regulating the kinds of programs that the young people in our country are subjected to today.

At the outset I am simply saying that in tackling the problem of violent crime in our society, it is one thing to keep prisoners in jail longer. It is one thing to add to the list of violent offenders, the types of crimes they commit. Unless this government is completely committed toward newer and better programs of rehabilitation, unless it is committed to really getting to the very core of the problem of violence in our society, it will make very, very little difference whether an offender spends one third of his time before parole or one half of his time before parole in jail.

Bill C-36 introduces changes to the rules of parole eligibility, making it harder for violent and sexual or drug offenders to obtain parole releases. Unescorted temporary absences will be denied to the most serious offenders. Day parole will be intended specifically for preparation for release before parole eligibility.

That may be good, but let us take a look at some of the statistics. For example, under the heading "Successful completion of escorted temporary absences" presently, without this bill, we have a 99.93 per cent success rate. Also, unescorted temporary absences, a 99.18 per cent success rate. So, let us not be in too great a hurry to throw everything out the window and start over again. Our system is working.

The unfortunate thing and the very tragic thing is that every now and then somebody gets through it and commits a heinous crime. Gingras is one very good example, Legere is another one. He was just convicted, I believe, over the weekend for murdering four people while at large. There are others. I am not saying that this is all part of the success rate. We have to think about the other 99 per cent as well.

I believe that inmates have to be gradually reintroduced into society. If you are going to throw the key away, their expiry date is still going to come. I would suggest to members of this House that it is better to try to rehabilitate, it is better to encourage inmates to rehabilitate themselves and to release as many as possible, as safely as possible. Risk management is not an exact science. Let us face it. It is not exact. But at least attempt to get as many through the system as is reasonably possible, based on all the criteria available. That is better than to keep them locked up for their full sentence, knowing they are going to come out anyway, probably in some cases animals, certainly more animalistic than they were when they went in.

The highlights of the bill have been mentioned already. I do not want to repeat them here. I want to mention the clauses of the bill that we are prepared to support and mention areas where we are convinced that change or additions have to be added on to the bill.

We support the tougher criteria of the detention provisions of the parole process, making it harder for violent criminals to get out on parole.

We support the opening of the parole process so that victims may have an input into that process.

We support the streamlining of communications between the judiciary, Corrections Canada and the National Parole Board.

While I am on this topic, I differ with the previous speaker, the hon. member for York South—Weston. I want as full a committee process as possible. I want to listen to many groups and individuals, expert and non-experts. If it means going to the west coast or the Northwest Territories or the east coast, I am going to support that.

I am going to push for that. The member said he has been a member of the justice committee for seven years. Maybe he is tired of looking at penitentiaries. I do not blame him. I was a member of the defence committee for six years and I do not want to see another naval shipyard for a while either. If he does not want to move with the committee, he can send a replacement. That is no problem there.

What we are concerned about is basic government policies with respect to the changes introduced in this bill: rehabilitation, drug and sexual offender programs, skills programs, upgrading programs and so on. Programming is very important.

I know you can take a horse to water but you cannot make it drink. I think we can do more in our system to encourage those people behind bars to take advantage of the rehabilitative process. If they do not take advantage and learn from it, that is another matter. I am convinced with greater resources, and this means more money, time, effort, commitment and personnel, it can be done. It certainly can be improved upon.

It means that resources have to be properly assessed to make absolutely certain that those resources result in the proper people being released prior to expiry and as few mistakes as possible made. There will be mistakes. I cannot argue on this side of the House and condemn the government, or any government, when a mistake is made in terms of a person going out and recommitting. As I said a moment ago, it is not an exact science. You do not know. You have not got 100 per cent proof that somebody will not recommit.

The statistics again are very interesting on this point. For example, the figure of those who are in breach of parole, that is for technical reasons, is only 18 per cent. That is a lot but they have not recommitted. Eighteen per cent of those people who are on full parole break the parole agreement and therefore are recommitted.

Twelve per cent reoffend. That is high, I know. If your son or daughter or your wife or your loved one happens to be one of the victims of that 12 per cent, it is damn serious and it is very tragic but I do not know how you establish or write a perfect system in this respect.

I want to see a greater number of National Parole Board psychologists. National Parole Board staff competence has to be improved upon, certainly in the face of allegations of massive patronage appointments of completely inexperienced, unqualified staff. We are going to have some amendments here.

It is not right that somebody who goes out and knocks on doors for a government candidate ends up on the National Parole Board as a temporary or a part-time member of that board, or ex-MPs for that matter who probably have no experience in that field at all.

I do not like the idea. I am not mentioning political parties. It can be and it usually is. When the Liberals are in, they appoint Liberals. When the Tories are in, they appoint Tories, and when my own party is in at the provincial level, we appoint too damn many New Democrats.

I am not being hypocritical on this issue. What I am saying is that people should be appointed according to their ability, their merit. Let us get rid of this old patronage system which has existed for far too long.

I said a moment ago that all parties at all levels do this. It has got to be addressed and can be addressed in this bill. There will be an amendment on that.

There should be a careful review of the details of this complex bill in committee, which I mentioned a moment ago, and the participation of members of all communities interested in and involved in the criminal justice process from a corrections and a parole point of view.

This brings me to a very vital omission in this bill. Quite a bit has been said lately about native problems in relation to the criminal justice system. We are making some progress.

The Six Nations Reserve which used to be part of my constituency now has its own police force and it is doing an excellent job.

• (1330)

We are making some progress on the law enforcement side of it. We are making very little progress on the corrections side of it.

My personal view is that we should be looking much more seriously at a separate corrections system for native offenders. I am not totally convinced yet that it should be a separate system but we should be much more serious and much more vigilant. We should be looking at it much more seriously because I am truly convinced, when you consider that aboriginals in our country make up about 2.5 per cent of the total population and yet 10 per cent of the prison population in Canada are native Canadians, that something is wrong. We are somehow not addressing the problem.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member's time has now expired.

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): I was wondering if I could have three or four minutes more.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I thank my colleagues. I will finish just as quickly as possible.

The native community, I think, has to be brought into the process. I am anxious to listen to as many native community leaders as possible with respect to the correctional system and how it impacts on natives in our system. I am also deeply concerned about women in the prison system, women offenders, and whether the programs are adequate. I do not think they are in many cases. I hope that this bill, through amendment, will have a positive impact in this category.

We are also going to have to do something about increasing the number of experts in the whole system itself. We just do not have enough trained people to work with severely disturbed inmates, severely handicapped inmates and the violent offenders.

I know that in psychiatry and in medicine and in psychology this part of their regiment and this part of their professional field is one that most shy away from. There is not much glamour and money in it and many of them treat it as an almost hopeless dead-end kind of professional practice. It does not have to be that way. We have to encourage more and better people to become involved in the correctional service and also with the National Parole Board itself.

Those are some of my concerns about this bill. I simply want to conclude by saying that there is much more I would like to have said but I do not want to indulge on the time of the House because I know my time is up. All one has to do is watch the American TV programs. Every state prosecutor and every judge who is up for re-election in New York state says: "I am tough on law and order. I put x number of people away behind bars. I kept x number of people behind bars for 20 years or 50 years or whatever it is".

Keep in mind that politicians can very easily stand up at election time or just before an election or in a pre-election period and preach the virtues of being tough with offenders in society and yet if you look at the reality and, as I said at the beginning of my speech, at the real causes of crime in our society, it is little wonder that we are really emphasizing the wrong thing.

We are not really getting to the causes of crime before it is committed. We are not trying to do something about poverty, about slums, about lack of education, violence on television, violence in the home, sexual molestation in the home. All of these things are what ultimately lead to the prosecutor, the defence attorney and the judge. We are left, we meaning the Correction Service of Canada and the Parole Board, with finding a way of trying to deal with these people so that we can bring them back into society as law-abiding, useful citizens.

Longer sentences, the absence of parole, supervision and no release before expiry, are not going to reduce the crime rate. I do not have any divine knowledge on the subject, all I have to do is look at the facts and figures before us in the media day in and day out to know that in the United States and in other countries that is not the case. You can be tough on law and order in the courts and in the jails and yet the crime rate continues to increase.

In conclusion, one of the profound ironies of the 20th century is that Europe, which gave the world two great world wars in which millions of people lost their lives, innocent civilians lost their lives, is a far safer place to live at night on the streets no matter where than the western world which has been at relative peace in the political sense, in terms of war. Violence on the streets is increasing, violence in some areas of the United States is virtually out of control and now there are indications that in our larger cities in particular in Canada, violent crime is not out of control, but it is certainly on the increase and causing the citizens of our country grave concern.

Our number one concern is public safety, but we are also very concerned that this bill does not mislead the public, certainly at second reading, into thinking that by simply passing it we are somehow going to reduce the crime rate. It is going to take a lot more than that.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, the member seemed to misrepresent my position with regard to parole and the whole issue of whether parole should be abolished altogether. I should remind the member that the Law Reform Commission of Canada and a number of other groups in the criminal justice area have debated and discussed the idea of the abolition of parole. A number of prominent criminal lawyers have recommended the abolition of parole. Inmate groups have also supported the abolition of parole. The inmates do not like the uncertainty that is associated with lengthy sentences and the uncertainty of when they might be released on parole.

To accompany the abolition of parole, I am sure the member will agree, and he is not misrepresenting my position, you would have to reform sentencing at the same time. Let me just take a hypothetical situation. If we are dealing with armed robbery, the average sentence may be nine years. The average length of time served in a penitentiary may be four or five years. Those who are advocating the abolition of parole say when you abolish parole you would also bring into line sentences so that you would take the average length of time served and make that the new sentence for armed robbery, for example. The maximum sentence for armed robbery would become five years as opposed to nine years.

I am not advocating lengthier sentences in a general way in the abolition of parole but rather the abolition of parole with a reform of the sentencing structure. In certain areas sentencing ought to be reformed and sentences ought to be increased. For example, if you drink and drive in Canada and if you are convicted for the second time, you automatically serve seven days or a week in jail. There is a mandatory period of incarceration, and yet if you are caught for the second, third, fourth, fifth time and convicted of selling drugs to kids in school yards, there is no minimum sentence. It does not make any sense at all why a drug pusher should not be treated at least as severely as someone who drinks and drives.

An hon. member: At sentencing.

Mr. Nunziata: At sentencing, that is correct.

An hon. member: We should reform that too?

Mr. Nunziata: The reform should be here now. Let me close by asking the member a question with regard to the position of his party. The New Democratic Party traditionally has favoured, or its philosophy is more supporting of, inmates rather than the protection of society. What I sense from the member's submission is that he is not seeking greater rights and more lenient sentences for inmates. He is not recommending that our prisons be emptied.

There seems to be a shift in the position of the New Democratic Party toward an emphasis or priority placed on public safety and that aspect of the criminal justice system. Perhaps the member could comment.

• (1340)

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for his question. I want to make a point very clear, that where we have advocated lesser sentences or greater acceleration through the prison system, is in the non-violent area. We believe, and I continue to believe, that we have far too many people in prison today who could be released and be no threat to anybody else in society. I am not saying they should be free, but we believe that they should go through the system faster, to halfway houses, do community service work, do public service work. If they are found guilty of very large frauds or serious frauds, so-called white collar crime, maybe at sentencing a prohibition of staying out of the business community for three, four, five years after release could be part of the sentence. We still maintain that there are people behind bars today who should not be there because they are non-violent and they would not be a risk to society.

We have never been opposed to being severe in our sentencing of those who are violent and those who continue to show violence while they are in the prison system. We do believe that no matter how mean or miserable a human being may be, and we are not perfect beings—and as one philosopher said, we are the only beings capable of reason and not rational beings—we still think that there is often hope that people will rehabilitate themselves and can re-enter society. Emphasis should be put on that, but not ahead of public safety and the security of law-abiding citizens, but that other process should be part of the correctional system.

That I think is very important and that is our position on it.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the member for clarification in his response to my colleague from York South—Weston. He seemed to be suggesting that white collar crime was not really putting society at risk, there was not as much of a danger. It seems to me that if we send out a signal that white collar crime is not as serious in the community, we tend to promote the idea that someone will tamper with this white collar crime because the sentencing is not as severe, and even if that person is sentenced there is really no form of incarceration or no sentencing that is going to have a sustained penalty.

White collar crime is really serious in this country today. If we send out a signal that we are not going to really consider this crime as just as dangerous to society as some of our other crime, we are not going to do anything about minimizing its presence.

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): Yes. I am not suggesting for a moment that white collar crime is not important and does not hurt people in a material way. I am suggesting that there are other ways of punishing many of those who have offended as white collar criminals other than putting them in our prison system. That is what I have said.

Repayment is one way of doing it, if it takes a lifetime. My God, what a sentence to repay the money stolen by fraud or by cooking the books.

I also want to make it very clear that I am not including organized white collar crime in that category.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, having been a prosecutor and a defence counsel, I am hard put to find out where exactly the member is coming from. It seems to me that what he is really saying is he likes the status quo just the way it is in the criminal justice system, in which case I would ask him if he has ever spoken to a victim or to the family of someone who has been raped or murdered. What planet is he living on when he gives a speech like that?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Very briefly, the hon. member for Brant.

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad I only have a brief time. A question like that really does not warrant any kind of intelligent answer.

I am just as concerned about the hapless victims of violent crime as any other reasonable human being is. The question, as phrased by that member, unfortunately is all too common from that seat and is not worthy of a responsible answer.

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West): Mr. Speaker, I understand I am allowed 20 minutes. I only have 15 minutes before Question Period resumes. I hope you will allow me time later to finish. I will do my best to tell the reasons why I am supporting this bill fully, the corrections and conditional release bill.

The role of government is a lot of things, such as providing a framework for economic prosperity, providing infrastructure to support all citizens in their efforts to develop skills in order to play an active role in society, and providing social programs to provide the basic needs for Canadians. It must also provide a system of fair laws that are enforced by the courts and police and provide for the safety and well-being of our people. It is this issue of safety of security of Canadians that we are addressing today.

For the past seven years, since I was elected in 1984, I have served on the Standing Committee of Justice and the Solicitor General. For the past two and one-half years I have chaired that committee.

It is a great honour for me to chair that committee, because it is the first time in the history of Parliament that committee has ever been chaired by someone other than a lawyer. I am not a lawyer. I will admit that lack of legal knowledge is somewhat of a hindrance in that capacity.

However, I do have great support from the legal system such as the very fine clerk who is a lawyer and some people from the Library of Parliament who are lawyers and who assist me and make it very easy for me to operate this committee. I am very hopeful that this bill will be referred to our committee because I feel we have an area of expertise developed through which we can give a fair hearing to this bill.

I listened with great interest to the Solicitor General, the hon. member for York South—Weston and the hon. member for Brant giving their various positions. Some of them surprised me.

I joined the justice committee the same day as the hon. member for York South—Weston. He talked at great length about the Taking Responsibility report which was a unanimous report of that committee. At no time did that report say we should get rid of parole or mandatory supervision. As a matter of fact, it stated we should keep parole and mandatory supervision.

Now he says that he believes we should get rid of them. I do not believe it will serve any purpose. During crime prevention week this government is moving to bring in bills that I have been advocating since the day I came here.

People will agree that the most interesting work that MPs carry out is the work of standing committees. I also have found it rewarding, but sometimes frustrating. Frustration comes when, after months of research and hearings, a document is produced and tabled in Parliament and it receives limited acceptance from the government. We have had this happen. It happened with numerous situations we have studied.

I have openly criticized the government for failing to adopt the recommendations produced by committees, not only the justice committee but other committees. These reports collect dust in a maze of bureaucratic bookshelves. This is not the case with this bill.

Let me explain exactly what happened. We were asked by an order of reference from the House of Commons to study Bill C-67. We studied it. We came up with 16 recommendations. We tabled a report in the House of Commons. The government came back and accepted 13 of those recommendations and many of them have been integrated into Bill C-36, the corrections and conditional release bill.

• (1350)

Canadians have always felt threatened by a parole system that jeopardized their safety. Other people have spoken of the Gingras case. It is absolutely ludicrous that we should have a justice system where a murderer, who is known to be dangerous, should be allowed to go to the West Edmonton Mall to celebrate his birthday, overpower a guard, and murder two more people. One man was shot in the back of the head, execution style, and a young girl was strangled with her own shoelaces. This is a terrible, terrible situation.

There has been reference to the Legere case. There were mistakes made there. It is no wonder that the public does not have confidence in the judicial system, in the penitentiary system that they should have.

There is talk about a 99.93 per cent success rate. Any failures are too many and this bill goes a long way.

Let me tell you other things the government is doing. The importance of public safety is reflected in other areas. The firearms legislation restricts possession of dangerous weapons and provides better screening of firearms acquisition applications. Surely that will help. It is supported by so many people, the police chiefs association, among others. We are bringing in amendments to the Extradition Act to allow a more streamlined extradition process to prevent criminals from using our courts to avoid facing criminal charges in other countries. Is there something the matter with this? Why should Canada keep Charles Ng and Joseph Kindler in this country?

Who is bringing it forward? This government is bringing it forward. Canadians have witnessed a disturbing increase in violent acts carried out by young people. Bill C-12 proposes amendments to the Young Offenders Act allowing the courts better flexibility in sentencing youths who commit murder. Bill C-30 is before my committee right now. We will be meeting Wednesday morning on clause by clause study. We hope to report to the House very soon. There was great to-do made about being late. We were late not because we could not have reported on time, but because committee members would not come out and go through clause by clause. That will be done Wednesday morning. I just want to point that out to the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam. I hope he will be there Wednesday morning at 8.30.

Our commitment to public safety is clear and is reflected not only in Bill C-36 but in these other bills as well. I do not need to go through the highlights of this: the victims of crime to be formally recognized, judges may delay parole eligibility of violent offenders and serious drug offenders to half the sentence, and so on.

Other members have gone through a review of the literature on this thing. Let just read you a few of these things. I am quoting from The Ottawa Sun of October 10, 1991:

> But remember we are living in a world where justice reform continues to move, sometimes rightly, it must be said, in the favour of the accused and the convicted. It is an achievement for the Tories to come up with a bill that would increase sentences for violent offenders and give victims a bigger say in how long they stay in jail.

This is the important part. He is referring to the fact that it took this Tory government to make even these few changes in favour of victims. "Mr. Nunziata", and I am quoting so I have every right to use his name, "can call the proposed legislation weak-tinkering by a weak minister, but it was the Liberal years in power which led to the tipping of scales in favour of criminals. While the NDP has given cautious approval to Lewis' bill, judging by the party's general policies, one suspects they would have followed the Liberal route if they had ever managed to gain office".

I will grant you there has been a terrible increase in crime. Last year there were 270,000 violent crimes in Canada, well above the 219,000 average for the 1985 to 1989 period.

There were 60,101 youth cases heard in Canada, 9,013 for violent offences, an increase of 14.7 per cent. This is why we have to bring in amendments to all of these bills.

I just want to go through what some people say about this bill. Gary Rosenfeld, executive director of Victims of Violence International, said in an interview from Ottawa that the proposal is a helluva step forward. He is confident that most government and opposition MPs will support it.

In The Times Colonist on Saturday, October 12, 1991 it is described as sensible and overdue.

> The bill which Mr. Lewis said could be law by next spring is being described as the first comprehensive review of the Penitentiary Act since 1868. It also proposes the greatest changes in the parole system since the Parole Act was passed in 1958.

We heard this morning that the hon. member had a chance to read The Toronto Star.. I wonder what other papers he does read. But The Toronto Star cannot find anything wrong with the bill. It did not say anything bad about it. Even the The Toronto Star cannot say a bad thing about it. "Tougher parole planned". Not a bad thing about it.

Mr. Milliken: Is this a speech or an apology?

Mr. Horner: It is certainly not an apology. It is no apology at all. It is an apology for what your government has done to take away victims' rights. I want to tell you that the only way to wipe the smirk off the criminal face of this nation is to come down hard and long.

> What we were pleased to see in Lewis' bill, however, is the recognition of victims' rights finally. Their voice should be the loudest voice heard.

I could go on and on with these reports from what various people say about this bill. As legislation goes, this is not a highly partisan issue, at least it should not be, and the Lord knows there are enough lawyers in Parliament to offer ideas. The ideas will come when this bill goes to committee.

I would recommend that without further speakers we refer this to the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General. Let us make the few small amendments we have to make. Mr. Speaker, I would like to recommend that this bill be referred to—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent to refer Bill C–36, an act respecting corrections and the conditional release and detention of offenders and to establish the office of Correctional Investigator, to the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General?

Some hon. members: No, no.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There is not unanimous consent.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): The member seemed to suggest that we on this side of the House were not supporting the general thrust of this legislation. I would like to clarify that. For our side of the House, we are supporting reform here. However, we also believe there are areas in this package that can be improved.

I have a specific question for the member. Do you not find it a little bit contradictory that during this week of safety in the streets, crime prevention, we come before the House with all kinds of legislation, yet at the same time you cut the budget by $2 million in terms of a National Crime Prevention Week? Is there not a little bit of a contradictory action there?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, we do not like to see any reduction in the moneys that will be spent for National Crime Prevention Week. We certainly abhor having to make these deductions, but we were left with an horrendous debt which must be reduced. I am convinced that these bills which are before Parliament now will do an awful lot more towards reducing crime than the $2 million given to interest groups would have ever done.

Mr. Speaker: It being two o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

CRASH OF HERCULES AIRCRAFT

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq):

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Inuktitut.]

Mr. Speaker, today I rise to honour the victims of last week's Hercules air crash on Ellesmere Island.

I also want to pay tribute to the rescue team. This tragic event of life and death and survival is filled with heroism. We know from the survivors that there was courage and caring and selflessness of the highest order.

We honour all these brave men and women, those who lost their lives, those who survived and those who gave their lives so that others might survive.

We honour those who risked their own lives in the rescue efforts. We honour Captain John Couch and Master Corporal Roland Pitre posthumously, Captain Wilma Degroot and Sergeant James West for their heroism and bravery.

Our sympathy is extended to the families of those who did not survive.

With great respect and admiration, we salute these truly Canadian heroes.

PRIX BILCOM 1991

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Louis-Hébert): Mr. Speaker, Saturday night, at the 16th Annual Convention of the Gens de l'air, it was my privilege to award the Prix BILCOM 1991 to Didier Féminier, a federal public servant.

This award is in recognition of his skills in French and his efforts to promote the use of French in his profession, in the field of aeronautics and aviation technology.

He has produced, in French, a number of outstanding manuals highly prized by aviation professionals, and has always tried to promote full recognition of the French language at work.

Our sincere congratulations to Mr. Féminier and to the two winners of the Prix Roger Demers, Pierre J. Jeanniot and Pierre Rivest—

ATLANTIC LIVESTOCK FEED INITIATIVE

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, for the last year and a half, the farming community has been waiting anxiously for the Atlantic Livestock Feed Initiative phase II agreement, better known as ALFI II.

This program was put in place in order to help Atlantic farmers reach self-sufficiency in grain production. It is extremely important for the future of agriculture in Atlantic Canada.

At the present time, Atlantic farmers pay a lot more for their feed grains than other Canadian farmers because of the very high transportation costs. ALFI II will help our agricultural community to become less dependent on transportation costs.

A couple of weeks ago, the Minister of Agriculture decided to maintain the ALFI II program for Newfoundland, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island.

I call on him now to make a positive decision for New Brunswick because Atlantic Canadian farmers are awaiting his decision.

CRIME PREVENTION WEEK

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I have a statement.

Before I give it, I would like to acknowledge what the member from the Arctic said. I hope the government or perhaps even the Speaker as well would speak on behalf of the House for that heroic rescue.

My statement is on another matter.

The government announced a law and order agenda for Crime Prevention Week.

Canadians want strong measures to keep our country safe, but this Conservative agenda is as phoney as a $3 bill. I call it the blue box agenda. All these measures are basically recycled bills.

The Young Offenders Act, Bill C-12, was tabled in 1989 and cleared a committee a year later. It could have been called any time in the last year.

The same with the mental disorders act. It was drafted in 1986, and only a court decision forced the tabling. Also, with extradition, it is being delayed. Gun control is being watered down to satisfy the gun lobby.

If you want to prevent crime, let us be honest: You tackle illiteracy, you tackle child abuse, you tackle poverty and unemployment, you control guns and you face up to the problem of domestic violence.

That is the way to tackle crime, and the government should get serious about it.

STEWIACKE, NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, for decades the residents of Stewiacke, Nova Scotia have been fighting for improved safety at the very dangerous rail crossing in their town which has been the scene of many accidents, injuries and deaths.

I am pleased to report that the system works. Even though Stewiacke is not a major city, not even a major town, it got the attention of the Minister of Transport and his officials who have just announced that safety will be improved at this crossing. The plan includes a realignment of the intersecting roads, the installation of barrier gates and an educational program for students in the area. A cost-shared program has been proposed with the federal government assuming 80 per cent of the total cost. On behalf of the people of Stewiacke, I want to thank the Minister of Transport for his personal attention to this matter and the quick and positive action which will now result in a much safer crossing.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, seven years ago today the Tory government released its blueprint for action: "A New Direction for Canada: An Agenda for Renewal". That document urged that Canadians brace themselves for unbounded prosperity. Their new government was to ensure that Canadians could compete on world markets. Indeed, that same view was widely expressed by the Prime Minister during the election campaign in 1988.

Canadians know that prosperity is not unbounded. We are in a recession. The government's plans for increased competitiveness have led to the deindustrialization of Canada's manufacturing heartland. After seven years of gross mismanagement, the government has finally realized what Canadians have known all along. Its policies have been disastrously wrong.

Now it will spend $25 million of our money asking Canadians to tell it what it should do. This is not a government capable of leading anybody anywhere. Before it wastes any more money, it should resign and allow the people to elect a group of men and women of ability, many of whom now sit on the opposition benches in this House.

CANADA CAREER WEEK

Mr. Walter Van De Walle (St. Albert): Mr. Speaker, a high school student put it very well when he said: "Be cool, finish school". Canada Career Week is being held November 3 to 9. As part of the national stay in school initiative, Canada Career Week theme is "Start to finish". The emphasis is on students finishing high school and pursuing post-secondary education in a career he or she has chosen.

By the year 2000 it is estimated that two-thirds of all new jobs will require at least grade 12 schooling, and fully 40 per cent will require 16 years of schooling. These statistics only serve to illustrate the need for the government's stay in school program.

This government will continue to promote this initiative by strengthening partnerships between business, educators and young people. Youth are our future. We must ensure that they are well prepared to meet the challenges of the 21st century.

MIGRAINE AWARENESS MONTH

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, November is Migraine Awareness Month. Migraine is a far more serious and costly condition than many imagine. Almost 3.2 million Canadians over the age of 15 suffer from some form of migraine. Doctors are still unsure about what causes the attacks. Seventy-seven per cent of migraine sufferers have had to restrict their normal activities because of an attack.

There is currently no universally effective medication available for migraine, although many migraine sufferers can learn how to recognize what triggers the problem and regain control over their lives. The occurrence of migraine in Canada has a significant economic impact. Almost 4 million work days a year are shortened or lost due to migraine, resulting in an annual work place productivity loss of almost $500 million.

The purpose of Migraine Awareness Month is to focus public attention on this devastating problem. I urge all members of Parliament and all Canadians to support the Migraine Foundation in its efforts to promote awareness of migraine and the appreciation of its impact on its sufferers, their families and on society as a whole.

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Speaker, I rise to express my concern about a federal government employee passing on to the media that the federal government might be considering a fee to be paid by cross-border shoppers to help pay for the emergency farm aid package. Today I would like to voice my strong opposition to such a measure. A surtax at the border will be interpreted by my constituents as a simple action by the federal government to inhibit cross-border shopping.

What we need are policies which address the roots of our uncompetitiveness, not measures which can be interpreted as attempts to close off or set up artificial road-blocks. A levy of this type also appears to overlook its potential impact on our customs officers. It would increase their workload significantly and seems to me runs counter to our efforts of maximum efficiency.

I strongly believe our government must not be entertaining any notion of a levy or fee on cross-border shoppers. I hope that members of the House of Commons will join with me in voicing their concern on this important matter.

NORTH THOMPSON RIVER

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, just last week a spokesperson for a Vancouver based company confirmed that they are proceeding with plans to construct a dam near Valemount, British Columbia, on the North Thompson River, which is a tributary of the Fraser River, in an effort to divert water flow into the Columbia River watershed and then using a series of canals and pipelines to transfer this water into southern California.

This is part of a plan to divert a number of western Canadians rivers into the southwestern United States and northern Mexico known as the North American Water and Power Alliance Proposal.

Canadians have always been worried that the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement may eventually end up giving Americans access to our fresh water and now, with the Canada-U.S.-Mexico negotiations under way, the worry is even greater.

Water is not another commodity to simply sell to the United States. It provides the very lifeblood for a delicate ecosystem.

Therefore, I call upon the Prime Minister and the Government of Canada to state categorically that our waters are not for sale, that our waters will not be dammed and diverted into the United States.

VIOLENT CRIME

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, during the last few months, the citizens of Delta have become more and more concerned about the increasing violent crime and vandalism in our community. I am sure the people of Delta will be encouraged by the federal government's initiatives recently introduced before the House, as well as those forthcoming changes which will be proposed in the near future.

Changes to the Young Offenders Act were long overdue. I am also pleased with the amendments to the extradition laws and to the Corrections and Conditional Release Act.

While controversial in many areas, the firearms legislation is a step forward in controlling violent crime and the use of dangerous weapons.

The government is to be commended for taking these steps to protect its citizens against those who would abuse the freedoms we have and destroy the way of life and freedom which we cherish. Law-breakers in Canada must be made responsible for their own actions and Canadians must again be able to feel safe on their streets and in their homes.

AIRCRAFT INDUSTRY

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, the Cyrus Eaton group has offered to buy the American Piper Aircraft Corporation and move it to Canada where it could eventually employ some 3,000 people.

Experience shows that for every job created in the aircraft industry, two more jobs are created in supply and service industries. Because of Canada's relatively high wage rates, we need high tech jobs such as those in the aircraft industry if we are going to compete internationally. Jobs like this are particularly important right now because the Toronto area alone has lost 175,000 jobs during the past year and now has double digit unemployment.

The government must do everything possible to encourage Piper to come to Canada. Let us not blow this one.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, the jobless situation in my constituency of Cape Breton Highlands—Canso and indeed all across Cape Breton Island is reaching crisis proportions.

Instead of acting to alleviate this situation, this government is putting additional road-blocks. A good example is the changes to regulations and procedures for qualifying and receiving UI benefits in the wake of Bill C-21. Not only have the provisions for receiving UI been tightened, but the red tape required to explain and administer these new rules has created additional barriers.

As a result, the numbers of unemployed calling on the services of our local CEIC and Revenue Canada offices to deal with outstanding claims has multiplied in recent months. The resources to deal with this demand simply cannot cope. Constituents are waiting six to eight months for decisions to be rendered by understaffed government departments.

Several months without a decision on an unemployment insurance claim quite simply can mean several months without money for rent, food and clothing.

When will the ministers of these departments act to cut back on these lengthy delays?

S. O. 31

HERCULES AIR CRASH

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay tribute and honour to the brave men and women of the Canadian Armed Forces who, over the last few days, were part of a tragic accident and an heroic rescue in the high Arctic.

For more than 30 hours, a group of survivors of the crash of a Hercules aircraft struggled to cling to life. Outside the fuselage were the bodies of four others who made the ultimate sacrifice for their country.

Overhead and ready to leap into the blindness of an Arctic storm were search and rescue technicians who did not blink in the face of an incredibly dangerous and selfless assignment.

There are many heroes in this story, but none greater than the captain of the aircraft, John Couch. In the words of his co-pilot, Lt. Joseph Bales: "If anybody was a hero it was John Couch who threw so much into surviving and keeping us going and keeping people organized. If you are going to paint anybody a hero you should paint John Couch. He worked the whole time like an extremely dedicated professional. He just did not give up one single bit and when he had finished helping others, John Couch closed his eyes and died".

CHILD POVERTY

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, according to The Toronto Star, the Minister of Justice has announced that this week the Commons will have a blitz of law and order legislation. Last week we had a conference here on Canada's children and they reported that one child in six in Canada is poor, that half of the Canadians who rely on food banks are children. There are still more poor children than there were 10 years ago, that many poor children in families are struggling on 50 to 60 per cent of poverty line income and that in 1988 almost two-thirds of the children in families headed by single mothers were living in poverty, that more than half of all aboriginal children in Canada are poor.

How about equal time for the children of Canada? If we can afford a week of legislative time to blitz for law and order, how about two weeks for our children?

MERCHANT SEAMEN

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I simply cannot believe this government's continued refusal to recognize merchant seamen as veterans. With what went on in the other place, it is evident to me that there is no commitment on the part of this government to recognize these people and extend their rightful benefits to them.

I am particularly upset that even though support for such recognition has come from all quarters, the government continues to turn a deaf ear to this serious problem. The invaluable contribution made by the merchant seamen during the Second World War must be recognized by the Government of Canada. More than 45 years have passed since the end of that war and time has definitely arrived for this government to take the just and long overdue step of recognizing the efforts of the merchant mariners as veterans.

I strongly urge the government to take prompt action in recognizing the heroic contributions made by merchant seamen to the war effort by extending to them the full range of veterans' benefits.

CANADA CAREER WEEK

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the House to Canada Career Week which will take place from November 3 to 9. It is a national event that promotes the importance for young Canadians to focus on future careers while they are still in school.

This year's theme, Start to Finish reinforces how important education is to career planning. Communities all across Canada are pitching in to stage a range of imaginative events such as career fairs, exhibits, poster contests and conferences. Students, teachers, parents, the government and the business community are all taking an active role in helping young Canadians to look ahead to their career opportunities and a smooth transition from school to work.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. Every day Canadians are saying that the main problem facing the country now is the state of the economy. However, the government doesn't seem to listen. This morning, for instance, workers in the construction industry in Quebec heard some bad news: one-third of these workers are unemployed, and the situation is expected to get worse in the months to come.

At this very moment, unemployment is also widespread in the pulp and paper and forestry industries. Yesterday, lay-offs were announced in Dolbeau, in the riding of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and there will be more. And at this point, all the government has to offer in the way of programs is publicity stunts.

When will the government, the Deputy Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance start concentrating on the real problems that concern Canadians, and when will they take steps to ensure that our goods are competitive, instead of keeping the dollar at 90 cents as they are doing now?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated to the House on Friday, the economic strategy of the government is to bring down inflation and inflationary pressures so that interest rates can come down. That is the key to economic recovery.

The hon. member shakes his head negatively but I hope he would not disagree with the fact that interest rates in Canada have come down by over six percentage points. The spread has narrowed and continues to do so. As long as we can continue on that track, I am sure the hon. member will agree that that is the recipe for economic recovery.

I am sure that he will also be interested in knowing that today, for the fifth consecutive month, the leading composite indicator, which covers everything from housing to stock markets, has again shown an increase of 1 per cent. That is the broadest rate of growth in six years, and the hon. member should be applauding that rather than criticizing it.

• (1420)

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the minister does not realize that the survey of 153 companies showed that corporate profits are down 33 per cent across the board, down 88 per cent in mining, down 47 per cent in his own province in oil and gas, down 29 per cent in manufacturing products. Everything is down.

We still have a dollar that is around 90 cents. Interest rates are down in Canada, yes, but they are down in the United States and the spread is still the same.

When will he change his policies and make Canadian products competitive so that Canadians can go back to work? They have been out of work for more than 18 months as a result of the policies of this government.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure what the policy of the federal Liberal Party is with respect to the exchange rate. The last I heard it is the same policy that the hon. Leader of the Opposition had when he was finance minister. He said back in 1978, and I quote: "We believe that market forces should continue to determine the appropriate exchange value for our currency. What we are doing as we have done consistently for the past eight years is to smooth out erratic fluctuations in the value of the dollar as they occur in the marketplace". That is precisely the policy of the federal government.

The issue is not to manipulate the exchange rate. He knows that. If he is calling for a fixed exchange rate or if he is calling on us to adopt the American currency as our currency, why does he not stand up and say so. Canada is sovereign in its own power to determine and maintain the value of the currency and that is one of the most fundamental aspects of any economic and monetary policy.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the main economic problem we face is that the people of Canada want to work today. Everybody knows, and every commentator says that the Canadian dollar is too high. The only recipe this government has at this moment is to maintain the high dollar and to put forward their advertising campaigns. The only people doing well these days in Canada are the people in advertising.

There was a program for advertising the Constitution last month. There was one on productivity last week. There is one this week on law and order. When will the government give jobs to Canadians, and not only the people who are friends of its party who work in the advertising business?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. Leader of the Opposition might advise us what his policy is with respect to the exchange rate.

If he does have a view on the value of the dollar, what is it? How would he get it there and how would he keep it there? Perhaps he might want to take us into his confidence and advise the House. Come clean with Canadians. Do not just stand there. You cannot have it both ways.

GAINES PET FOODS CORPORATION

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Gaines Pet Foods Corporation of Cobourg, Ontario, employs 110 people, exports two–thirds of its product, yet faces a crisis today because of the high dollar.

Despite aggressive business strategies, the company tells me it loses $150,000 in potential profit for every penny increase in the value of the Canadian dollar, causing Gaines a $1 million profit loss this year alone.

Gaines has to make an important decision; stay here or shift its production to the United States. What is the minister's advice to Gaines Pet Foods Corporation?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there is more to being competitive than just simply looking at the exchange rate. There are many components that go into making a business competitive and productive and show a profit.

The hon. member does express a point of view and it is one that concerns us all. There is in fact a depression in commodity prices throughout the international marketplace.

I remind the hon. member that our merchandise trade balance for this year is $8.1 billion. The merchandise trade balance rose $8.1 billion at an annual rate to $13.5 billion in August. That would indicate to me, Mr. Speaker, that Canadian concerns are in fact meeting competition. They are cutting their costs. I am sure that with the reduction in interest rates, the lessening of inflation and inflationary pressures, that competitive opportunity will be all the more fruitful for them.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the same minister. I would be happy to share with the minister the fact that statistics show that this company has been very aggressive and has taken on some very innovative policies to improve its ability to compete.

Gaines Pet Foods Corporation is in jeopardy; 110 jobs in a small Ontario community are in jeopardy. Across Ontario, over one-third of our businesses are looking to moving out. Staying here means shutting down.

Will the government explain why it refuses to take direct action to lower the Canadian dollar or provide other emergency relief today to Gaines and other Canadian businesses in distress because of the high dollar, in order to give them a fighting chance to survive here in Canada.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we have taken definitive action, first of all, in bringing down inflation and inflationary pressures and the corresponding reduction in interest rates that have come down by over six percentage points. That trend is continuing. We have addressed the problem of prosperity and competitiveness. Of course that is an issue that all Canadians must face in the form of a partnership.

The hon. member talks about all the firms that are leaving the country. I said in the House the other day that Chrysler Corporation was putting a third shift on its Windsor plant for the manufacturing of mini-vans.

Imperial Tobacco announced a $16 million retooling and expansion plant in Elgin—Norfolk County about two weeks ago.

Dupont Canada triples profit. It is adding that the free trade agreement with the United States enabled the company to boost its profits.

Piper Aircraft, Mr. Speaker, chooses Canada. Dupont opens a world-scale plant.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Acting Prime Minister. Contrary to the Deputy Prime Minister's statements, this country has lost 410,000 jobs because of the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

Bankruptcies are near an all-time high. Le Soleil has just done a poll which shows that most Canadians are opposed to the Canada-U.S. deal and are opposed to the Mexican deal.

An hon. member: You better believe it.

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister this question. Is he prepared to table in this House all the documents, all the research and all the back-up papers that this government has prepared in dealing with the Canada-U.S.-Mexico deal. Where is the evidence that Canada will benefit out of this proposed deal? Are you prepared to document it?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, in terms of the free trade agreement we already know that over the last two years our exports to the United States have increased substantially. Interestingly enough, some of our exports to other parts of the world have not increased at all. Surely that would tell you that the free trade agreement as such with the United States is working.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I did not wish to embarrass the government, but now I am compelled to.

Mr. Speaker, in my hand is a document the government spent—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member knows the rule against using props. Perhaps the hon. member will put his question.

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, I will not use a $1 million document presented by the government as a prop, even though I may think it is a crock. But, Mr. Speaker, in the document that the taxpayers of this country paid $1 million for, Mr. Porter says unequivocally that thousands of jobs have left Canada because of the free trade agreement, and I refer to page 69. This is not my argument but Mr. Porter's argument in this document which I will not use.

• (1430)

I put the question to the Deputy Prime Minister. In face of this government's own evidence after spending $1 million on the Porter report, what research is available to this House and to the people of Canada that shows that entering into an agreement with Mexico will be any better than the one we got with the United States?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, it is quite interesting that members opposite did not want a free trade agreement with the United States presumably because the United States would outgun us with its high-tech and its power. Now they do not want a free trade agreement with Mexico for exactly the opposite reasons.

It is kind of hard to know what they really do want.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, what the Canadian people want is the 410,000 jobs back right now.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Barrett: What the Canadian people want back are the industries and the spinoffs we once had from those branch plants. What we want is our place in the economy.

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister whether or not this government is prepared to table all the documents and research it has done, if any, which show that the Mexican deal will be a good one.

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, it is kind of interesting to go back and look at what we wanted out of the free trade agreement with the United States.

We wanted for example a dispute settlement mechanism, which we got. We wanted economic benefits, which we have and I have just given the numbers. We wanted market access, which we have got.

Just last Friday afternoon I had a firm in my office in Guelph saying: "The reason we are here talking to you is because of the FTA". I said: "Come on and talk some more".

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Over the last two years this government has increased UI premiums by 44 per cent to $1.95 per $100 in 1989 to $2.80 per $100 in 1991.

Given the desperate state of third-quarter profits of Canadian businesses outlined by the Leader of the Opposition, given that Canadian workers in this country are already taxed to the teeth, will the Minister of Finance tell this House, and through this House tell Canadians, that the government will say no to an increase in UI premiums at this time?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would only indicate that while premiums have indeed gone up so have benefits. Benefits have improved by about 55 per cent. As I indicated in the House the other day—

Some hon. members: Nonsense.

Mr. Mazankowski: Hon. members say: "Nonsense". They may just want to check their facts and figures on this because that has in fact occurred.

With respect to UI premiums, as I indicated in the House the other day there is a process where the recommendations are brought forth by the commissioners for ratification. I have not received such a recommendation at this time.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, the only thing the government accomplished in Bill C-21 was to withdraw the government from funding of the unemployment insurance account and to force the unemployed to pay for their own retraining program. That is all the government accomplished, and the minister should admit it up front.

Given that 10,000 Canadian small businesses must change their computer software to accommodate any change in the UI premium, a change that is supposed to be legally in place by January 1, will the minister tell the House today that there will be no increase in the UI premium? Will he make that news available to the Canadian business community as soon as possible, a community that is bleeding under excessive taxes and poor fiscal and monetary policy by this minister?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have indicated to the hon. member earlier that I have not received a recommendation from the commissioners. There is a process that is to be followed and we will follow it in the usual manner.

SHIPBUILDING INDUSTRY

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

As he will know, the shipbuilding industry in this country has been brought to its knees by the government of which he is a member. The national ship building policy that was promised by his Prime Minister in 1984 during the election is nowhere in sight.

Will the minister undertake now to wipe out all the tariff exemptions on boats entering Canada? Will he now require that all fishing boats fishing in Canada be built in Canada?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I can tell the hon. member that one thing we are thinking about is making sure the ships of one of his fellow members eventually bear the Canadian flag.

[Translation]

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the same minister.

The minister can create a lot of confusion and wave his arms, but the fact remains that thousands of construction workers are unemployed, all because of this government's broken promises.

Will the minister implement measures today to guarantee that all goods now being shipped between domestic ports are carried by ships built in Canada, manned by Canadian crews and sailing under the Canadian flag?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to offer my sincere congratulations to the hon. member opposite who, like many of his colleagues, has been practising in front of a mirror. I am sure I will never achieve his degree of skill in making gestures, but I repeat that perhaps he could use his influence on his colleague to ensure that owners of Canadian ships start by flying the Canadian flag.

NUCLEAR VESSELS

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

According to confidential briefing note JLO–1006, a U.S. submarine made an illegal submerged passage through Canada's internal waters at Dixon Entrance in June 1990. On Friday the minister denied knowledge of the matter despite the fact that a formal written protest was made by External Affairs.

Is the minister suggesting to the House that last Wednesday she approved blanket consent for U.S. nuclear subs in Dixon Entrance without knowledge of the earlier illegal activity?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member would reflect on what was actually said on Friday, what I said was: "Not to my knowledge but I will look into it".

Indeed there were transits through the Dixon Entrance in 1989 and in 1990. There was a formal protest lodged by the department through diplomatic notes and indeed that led to the discussions which enabled us to provide guarantees for Canadians as a result of the new policy and the co-operation on the disputed waters.

I think that the hon. member should at least be relatively more open about his questions.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

It is the minister who signed the Order in Council on Wednesday providing blanket prior consent for the U.S. subs to go through Dixon Entrance, and on Friday she was trying to tell Canadians she had no knowledge of previous illegal activities by the U.S. sub fleet.

During the furious debate over Arctic sovereignty on the illegal voyage of the Polar Sea in March 1987, the right hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs gave categoric assurances as found in Hansard that "there will be no secret agreement sprung upon anybody" and to "consult extensively with all those Canadians who are interested".

Why the double standard on Dixon Entrance: no consultation and a secret agreement?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it was hardly a secret agreement since we announced it.

What we did was get guarantees from the U.S. concerning the transits through Dixon Entrance because the United States co-operated with us. We had registered protests. The Department of National Defence found out through normal discussions with the U.S. defence authorities the potential for SEAFAC. We were able then to get some guarantees from the U.S. as a result of that, and then we announced it. It was hardly a secret agreement.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. In his annual report the minister announced that he intended to facilitate access to this country for immigrants with a trade, at the expense of the family reunification program. How will the minister explain to a mother who has been waiting two years for her son to come to Canada, that she will now have to wait a little longer because the government has changed its priorities?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. member and I am sure he would not want to mislead his fellow citizens. The proposed changes certainly do not imply there will be a longer wait for family reunification in Canada, but that is what the hon. member is trying to make people believe. I hope he will correct this impression.

[English]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, when the minister increases the independent class it automatically decreases the family class because the number is now fixed. Maybe he should read his annual plan closely.

Family reunification has taken a back seat to the Tory economic agenda as a top priority of Canada's immigration law. How can the minister justify increasing entry into Canada of other groups when it now takes three years or more for a husband and wife to be reunited in Canada?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it takes some gall. I mean this is the political party, following the tabling of the immigration level for the year, which said that the family class was in jeopardy.

In the family class this year 100,000 people will come into Canada for family reunification. Perhaps I could just add this: in 1984 the Liberal Party that formed the government at that time was welcoming 88,000 people to Canada. This year we will be welcoming 250,000 and I do not think that he should be complaining.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister concerning the environment.

Evidence from the government's own environmental experts shows conclusively that 47 pulp and paper mills using chlorine bleach are pouring toxic substances into Canadian waters.

Since the Minister of the Environment agrees that the entire effluent from these mills is poisoning fish and causing birth defects, why has the government refused to regulate these substances and protect our water from these poisons?

Hon. Pauline Browes (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, I say to the hon. member that we will be bringing forth very shortly the new pulp and paper regulatory issues. The substantial increase in the AOX, which is the 350 chemicals within that effluent, will be decreased substantially to 2 kilograms per tonne from 5 kilograms per tonne which was in 1988.

I think the member will see on the regulatory system that is coming in very shortly that we will have good success on that.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, the minister of state is referring to regulations that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has been sitting on for over four months.

We are talking about something different. We are talking about toxic substances and the entire toxicity of effluent from mills. Knowing this, knowing that the entire effluent is toxic, will the minister of state admit that the Minister of the Environment has made a mistake by saying he will not regulate this effluent? Will she assure the House that regulations will be brought in?

Hon. Pauline Browes (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, yes, I will assure the member that regulations will be brought in concerning dioxins and furans. That is going to have a substantial effect on the whole soup of chemicals of the AOX. We expect about a 60 per cent decrease in all of those.

At the present time there is a tremendous amount of research going on in terms of the kind of process to have the paper the whitish colour that we want, the substitute for the Kraft process. There is a process going on in British Columbia which is really quite excellent. We are pleased about that. The peroxide and the ozone being used in that process is certainly a result of some good technology.

I am very pleased that science and technology is doing a $60 million report on some of the new technology that can be used in order to reduce this effluence.

HERCULES AIR CRASH

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Associate Minister of National Defence.

I am sure all members of the House and all Canadians will join in offering our deepest condolences to the families of those who were killed in last week tragic accident near Alert and paying tribute to those who were involved in the heroic effort to rescue the survivors.

Major Lloyd Clifton, the chaplain at Canadian Forces Base Edmonton, said yesterday speaking of Captain John Couch's self-sacrifice: "It is the kind of stuff the Victoria Cross is awarded for".

Will the government be considering giving this country's highest honour to those who were involved in that heroic effort, in particular to the late Captain John Couch?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, again I thank my hon. colleague for his thoughts.

As I said in the House on Friday, I know that all hon. members join in condolences to the families of the five who lost their lives in this crash and to the survivors. I had a chance to visit with most of them this morning and talk to them. They are coming along very well. What they went through in this ordeal is an incredible story. Of course we also express appreciation to the search and rescue people who did an outstanding job.

I know all of these issues will be reviewed. Where honours can appropriately be given, I can assure my hon. colleague that appropriate consideration will be given to that.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for that as do all members of the House.

I would just like to ask a follow-up question. On Friday the minister indicated that there was a report being prepared on the causes of the accident. As the minister knows, four other Hercules were involved in earlier crashes. There have been some questions arise about the cause of this, about the adequacy of the equipment available, about the potential involvement of the Innu people in the rescue operation, and various other questions.

Will the minister table a report on all of these issues with the standing committee on national defence so that the committee can decide whether a further public inquiry can take place on the events surrounding this accident?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, there is a board of inquiry which has been established to investigate what the causes of the accident were and what the contributing factors were. The black box has been found and interviews of course will take place with all the survivors and others involved.

I think it is too early to say just how long that process will take. Obviously it has to be a thorough process. As in the past the information about the causes of the crash will be made available to the public and to the standing committee in the course of making that information public.

PIPER AIRCRAFT CORPORATION

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister who is acting on behalf of the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology.

The American Piper Aircraft Corporation has offered to create up to 3,000 jobs in Canada and has indicated at the same time that it would prefer to do so in the Toronto region.

I would like to ask the minister if it is true that the government is trying to discourage Piper from establishing in the Toronto region? If it is not, what is the government doing to help Toronto get those jobs?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful for the opportunity to respond to that question because neither Investment Canada nor the Department of Industry, Science and Technology attempts in any way to indicate where it would be most appropriate for businesses to locate in Canada.

In this particular instance the company wanted to know something about regional development programs, so WED and ACOA were there to provide that kind of information. We certainly do not want in any way to be directing jobs to Toronto, to Montreal or to any other place.

It happened that in this instance there was no provincial representation at all on the request for people to go down to Florida to talk about this issue.

• (1450)

We understand that there has been no deal made at the present time and that there are still four countries in the running for this particular plant.

FORESTRY

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Forestry I will put my question to the Deputy Prime Minister.

The Deputy Prime Minister knows that the Canadian forestry industry today is facing the worst crisis with the lowest commodity prices in a decade, with a countervail duty on softwood lumber and with an overvalued dollar.

In the face of this crisis the government has reduced the support program for its federal–provincial forestry agreement with the province of Ontario by 66 per cent from the previous five-year agreement.

I wonder why the government is cutting support to an industry like this that is drowning in a sea of red ink.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to tell my hon. friend, who should be aware of this since his riding is in northern Ontario, that we announced this morning, the provincial government of Ontario and the Government of Canada, a major new agreement for northern Ontario: $95 million over the next four years. It includes a large forestry component which the Minister of Forestry also signed this morning.

This will give a tremendous boost to forestry in northern Ontario and is just one tangible example of the kind of action the hon. member is looking for. He should have been aware of that announcement this morning.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, the problem is that the people in northern Ontario are too aware of an agreement that cuts support by 66 per cent.

I would like to ask the minister about the forestry agreement. The previous agreement planted hundreds of thousands of hectares of seedlings to reforest areas in northern Ontario. Why, in an agreement that was signed today in Sault Ste. Marie, is some 12 per cent of the agreement being spent on public relations and advertising rather than on long-term benefits to an industry in very serious trouble?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the problem with the party opposite in just about every industrial component in the Canadian economy is that they overlook the importance of research. They overlook the importance of new technological adaptation. They overlook the importance of developing consciousness among the people of Canada about how to improve the industry and to make it more competitive.

That is what this agreement does.

NAPPAN EXPERIMENTAL FARM

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture and it refers to the commitment to expand the Nappan Experimental Farm in Nappan, Nova Scotia.

Although the commitment was reaffirmed in March of this year the original commitment was made in 1986. I do not want to rush the minister, but I wonder if he could indicate when this important project might proceed.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): I can inform my colleague, Mr. Speaker, that Nappan is in a group of 10 research stations which we studied. I can inform him also that further to that study as to necessary capital expenditure, some $100,000 has been spent to upgrade Nappan research station. We have identified other research locations which must be included in the study. Public Works has been contracted to carry the studies out, and we hope to have our major capital construction plan available for the hon. member before the end of fiscal year 1991.

CRIME PREVENTION WEEK

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, one of the most important concerns of Canadians right across the country is the increase in crime, whether it be in our urban centres or in rural communities. Canadians are concerned about the proliferation of guns and drugs in their communities.

This week is Crime Prevention Week. At a time when the government says it is concerned about the increase in crime in our country, it has totally slashed, cut the budget for Crime Prevention Week.

I would like to put this question to the Deputy Prime Minister. Can he explain why at a time when Canadians are crying out for reform, at a time when Canadians are crying out for some leadership from the federal government, that this government has totally eliminated the budget for Crime Prevention Week?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, if my hon. friend had reviewed the 1991-92 Main Estimates he would have seen that in fact the announcement was made at that time that our participation in National Crime Prevention Week was going to be eliminated. Contrary to media reports the figure is not $2 million. The funding was in fact $340,000.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, the fact is that the government is not contributing one single solitary cent to Crime Prevention Week, and that is the travesty.

Canadians are concerned, and in particular in metropolitan Toronto. As of yesterday there were 74 murders this year already in metro Toronto. The previous record was 60 for all of 1987, and there are still two months to go in this year. Canadians are concerned about crime prevention.

I would like to put this question to the Deputy Prime Minister. When is this government going to show some leadership as far as criminal law reform is concerned? If it is truly concerned about criminal law reform, why has it cut completely the budget for Crime Prevention Week? Why has the government totally washed its hands of criminal law reform?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend not only missed the Main Estimates. He missed the question immediately in advance of his question from the hon. member for Algoma wherein the whole point of the Liberal Party was: Why are you spending money on public information?

In fact many of the original aims of National Crime Prevention Week are completed. We have outside groups involved in it. For that reason, since they are working with police forces across Canada, we decided to use our money elsewhere.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER INDUSTRY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister in the absence of the Minister for International Trade.

It concerns the softwood lumber tariff memorandum of understanding. News reports have quoted Canadian officials as saying that the government was going to present Canada's case on the softwood lumber tariff and its dispute with the United States to GATT. Given the high dollar and the loss of many jobs in this important sector, can the minister confirm whether this is actually happening and/or what steps the government is taking to fight this regressive action by the Americans?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, we have said in this House before that we are taking every step we possibly can under the free trade agreement and under GATT to ensure that this memorandum of understanding causes us no further difficulty.

We believe that there are no subsidies in the Canadian softwood lumber industry and we believe we can prove it.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

Canadians are concerned that this government will sell out Canada's forest industry as it did in late 1986 when this was negotiated before.

My question is: Can the minister tell this House and Canadians, all of those people who are involved in these negotiations, to have the broadest possible consultations? Would he speak to his colleague, the Minister for International Trade, and have the minister appear before the Commons forestry committee to give a detailed briefing to members so we might be aware of the complete approach the government is taking on this?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, what the government is doing in this instance is precisely what industry wanted us to do. It wanted us to take this approach.

I remind the hon. member that in terms of the countervail in 1986, the methods we are now using going through the free trade agreement were not available then. We wish they had been.

HOUSING

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, despite very low interest rates and lower real estate prices now, a lot of would-be, first-time home buyers have a tough time raising the capital for a down payment. My question is for the Minister of Finance. Can he tell the House what the status is of proposals to allow the use of RRSP funds for the purchase of homes by first-time buyers?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's ongoing interest in this very important subject.

As he knows this is a proposal that has been brought forward by the Canadian Real Estate Association. I have had officials in the Department of Finance examining this very closely. I am myself somewhat intrigued by the idea and the principle.

My understanding is that the finance committee is going to be studying this issue as well. I certainly look forward to its views and recommendations on that. As soon as this review is completed I will be in a position to advise the hon. member and other hon. members in the House.

OCCUPATIONAL TRAINING

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Last Friday, the minister again proceeded with a unilateral announcement, over the objections of the government of Quebec and that province's employment minister. The minister announced another occupational training program, although he knows perfectly well that in Quebec there is unanimous support for patriating all this money to make the program more effective.

• (1500)

My question is this: Why this unilateral gesture, which is an insult to all groups in Quebec, since they are all agreed the minister should get out of this area?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, regarding the government initiative referred to by the hon. member, when he says that the provinces were not consulted, he should recall, if that is not too much trouble, that when we proposed amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act by tabling Bill C-21, all the provinces, employers and unions in this country were consulted. In fact, they indicated that they approved of these amendments, and on that basis, decisions are being made on how to make the allocated funds productive. The Bloc Quebecois is asking us to let Canadian workers suffer for the sake of the constitutional process, at a time when these measures are needed to train the labour force in Quebec and the rest of Canada.

POINTS OF ORDER

TAKING OF VOTES

Mr. Mike Breaugh (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, you will be aware that on last Wednesday evening during the course of the taking of a vote on a private member's matter concerning senior citizens a number of members raised the very point that they were unable to vote because the vote occurred slightly earlier than they had anticipated.

Without casting aspersions on anyone, I would simply like the House to know that we intend to pursue the matter and to raise it at the House management committee where the rules are being reviewed to make sure that members are not prevented from voting on matters and that if we have a repeat of that incident we will all know precisely when the vote will occur.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I may remind the hon. member that I was in the chair during that incident. My ruling was that the Speaker had no choice but to proceed with the vote when, in accordance with the Standing Orders, the two Whips indicated to the Speaker that members on both sides were ready to vote.

If hon. members wish to change the Standing Orders, I think the hon. member made a very good suggestion, and perhaps the committee could consider this matter. That being said, I do not think there can be any further discussion in the House about the incident and the ruling I made last week.

USE OF FRENCH IN THE HOUSE

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I imagine that during Question Period, you also noticed the valiant efforts of the hon. member from Burin—St. George's in French. In fact, I strenuously object to the fact that the Minister of Transport and other government ministers laughed at the hon. member's performance when he made a very special effort to speak French. Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am not sure what part of the Standing Orders the hon. member is referring to.

Mr. Lapierre: I am referring to the fact that the Speaker asked us to show some decorum and respect for other members in this House during exchanges in the course of debate, and the leader of the government did as well. Today we witnessed a valiant effort while the other side of the House indulged in rude behaviour. I think that if we want both languages to be used in the House we should respect those who make the effort.

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I just want to make the record clear. There was nobody on this side of the House within my earshot who was at all critical of the attempt by the hon. member to use French. In fact we applaud it.

We do not applaud the substance of the question. The fact that it was articulated in French does not make it a good question.

We do applaud the fact that he asked the question in Canada's other official language and there is no criticism of that whatsoever. The substance of the question is a different thing.

An hon. member: Absolutely. Well said.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): I simply want to confirm what the government House leader has indicated. Sitting on this side, certainly in good view of the cabinet benches, while the hon. member was speaking in French and at the completion of his remarks there was genuine applause, I think by all sides of the House on that initiative.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I think this closes the incident. All parties have had their say. I am sorry, but I do not think we can reopen the debate. You have given your point of view; the other party has given its point of view, and the people listening and other members of the House are now in a position to make up their minds. I am sorry but I consider the incident closed.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

RESTORATION OF DEMOCRACY IN HAITI

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to outline the steps Canada is taking in the international effort to restore democracy in Haiti.

The winds of democratic change that have blown stronger around the world have been a source of much hope to all of us. Real progress has been achieved in many countries, including dramatic change in this hemisphere where for so long military dictators dominated political life.

In December 1990, less than one year ago, Haiti joined the community of democratic nations with a free and democratic election. This election was clearly a source of much pride and joy for Haitians. It was also a source of much satisfaction for Canadians who had watched the people of that troubled country tormented for so long under the oppressive yoke of dictatorship.

Canada, along with other countries from the OAS and the UN, helped this transition to democracy through direct electoral assistance and observation to ensure that the election of President Aristide was free and fair.

The conclusion of all international observers was that President Aristide had won by a landslide in remarkably fair elections.

The coup that overthrew the legitimate and democatically elected government of President Aristide flew in the face of the will of the Haitian people and the democratic achievements throughout the Americas. It was totally unacceptable and remains totally unacceptable.

[English]

Canada moved quickly and decisively in response to the coup. The government immediately suspended our CIDA bilateral government aid, government-to-government assistance, the whole program in Haiti.

We supported an early meeting of foreign ministers of the Organization of American States, which this government had joined less than two years ago, to develop an effective regional response to this threat to democracy in our own hemisphere.

The OAS acted. Within days of this coup, foreign ministers met and sent a delegation of foreign ministers to Port-au-Prince to demand the restoration of democracy.

I was a member of the delegation which flew to Haiti on a plane provided by the Canadian government. On our return, OAS foreign ministers met again and passed a second resolution calling on member states to impose trade, economic and financial sanctions against the illegitimate authorities in Haiti.

• (1510)

There can be no doubt of the resolve of the OAS countries. These resolutions were passed unanimously by all 34 OAS members.

I would like to outline in the House today how Canada will give effect to these OAS resolutions.

[Translation]

First, the government has placed Haiti on the area control list and the import control list under the Export and Import Permits Act; this will halt bilateral trade with Haiti. The government will only allow exports of food we judge are required for humanitarian reasons.

Second, the government has suspended all other bilateral development assistance in Haiti that has been executed by NGOs. Since 1987, this has formed the bulk of our bilateral program in Haiti.

Third, the Export Development Corporation, the Canadian Commercial Corporation, the CIDA Business Cooperation Division and the Trade Facilitation Office of Canada have been instructed that funds, credits and advice are no longer to be made available for applications involving Haiti.

Fourth, activities relating to Haiti are no longer eligible for funding under the program for Export Market Development.

Fifth, the Trade Commissioner Service of the Department of External Affairs and International Trade has suspended all assistance to exporters to Haiti.

Sixth, Canadian representatives at the multilateral development banks have been instructed to oppose any proposals for new credits or loans, or the provision of technical assistance to the illegitimate regime in Haiti.

[English]

Canadian representatives at the International Monetary Fund have also been instructed to impose any standby or credit or any other arrangement for Haiti.

Seven, federal government departments and relevant Crown corporations have been instructed to suspend activities involving Haiti.

Our aim in implementing these measures is not to increase the suffering of ordinary Haitians who are having a difficult time, our quarrel is with the perpetrators of the coup and not with the Haitian people.

For this reason, and consistent with the OAS resolutions, Canada will continue to provide humanitarian assistance through multilateral and non-government organizations.

Finally, this government will shortly introduce legislation that will allow Canada to freeze all assets of the Haitian government in Canada. We have already advised financial institutions in Canada to exercise special prudence so as to ensure any unauthorized transfer of Haitian government funds does not occur.

It is especially heartening that the Organization of American States has seized this occasion to assume its proper role in the maintenance of hemispheric security and the defence of democratic values so newly won in many parts of this hemisphere. All active OAS members, with the exception of Haiti, now enjoy democratic government.

Many countries in this hemisphere, however, have military establishments with a tradition of interference in civil affairs. The governments of these countries share our determination to send a clear message to military establishments and to others. The nations of this hemisphere, acting through the OAS, will not tolerate any longer interference in the democratic process.

[Translation]

Canada's goal is simple and through these actions our determination must be clear to everyone.

With the measures I have just announced, we have gone as far as any country in the hemisphere in responding to the OAS call for a strong signal to the regime in Port-au-Prince that we will not tolerate that the will of the Haitian people be thwarted.

Together with our OAS partners, we are determined to restore democracy in Haiti.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak in this debate.

[English]

It is important. As Jean-Bertrand Aristide, the President of Haiti, said himself in an article which appeared in the New York Times dated Sunday, October 27, the public should not forget about the dreadful situation which exists in Haiti.

To quote him directly, it said: "As news of massacres and repressions slip off the front pages, there is a danger that active support will wane, and with it, the hopes and dreams of the Haitian people for democracy".

On December 16, 1990 the people of Haiti fulfilled a dream that they have felt, many of them, could never happen. Democracy came to Haiti with a free democratic election that brought to power Jean-Bertrand Aristide, the first democratically elected president to that country in over 200 years.

It has a population of over six million who had been cowed for over 200 years by the likes of the dictatorship of the Duvalier family and the Tonton Macoutes who together brought to the Haitian population a misery unknown certainly in the western hemisphere.

We are very pleased today to accept the minister's statement of her commitment to follow through on the resolution that was made and voted unanimously upon by the OAS on October 8 to bring in sanctions against the illegal government that now exists in power in Haiti.

However, the power of the regime in Haiti is tenuous but only if we continue as a country to mount pressure against that regime and try to assure the restoration to power of Jean-Bertrand Aristide.

The people of Haiti today under this new illegal dictatorship are being routed by the army in the countryside. I have had conversations with people involved in relief work, charitable work at the grassroots level in Haiti who talk about new terror in the countryside as the army goes out killing, for example, church workers, people working with non-government organizations who are trying to build up the people in Haiti from the grassroots.

They however are willing to confront the army and the dictatorship in that country for the first time, and this is a remarkable change in attitude for the people of Haiti who for too long have been cowed into silence and submission by very cruel and abusive regimes.

They are willing to try and confront the illegal dictatorship which exists in that country today. They do need our support. They do feel that they cannot do it alone. I understand through my sources that they welcome our imposition of sanctions against their country, but they wanted our action to come before now.

It is unfortunate that it has taken until today for our own government to make its announcement of sanctions. We hope now that the statement has been made the government will proceed quickly to make sure these sanctions have effect.

I am also concerned with the legislation the minister alludes to which will come forward shortly and will allow Canada to freeze all assets of the Haitian government in Canada. I am very concerned that legislation must be brought forward to the floor of this House as quickly as possible because in Haiti, the disparity between rich and poor is enormous.

It is the rich who must be convinced that Aristide must return to their country. They can be so convinced if we make their affluent lifestyle difficult to achieve. Already it is shown that in Haiti there are cracks in the ruling elite families in that country. Of those who traditionally would have been opposed totally to Aristide, some of them are now changing just with the threat of sanctions to thinking that perhaps Aristide must return to their country.

• (1520)

One of the issues that was also raised by the minister was that of Canadian aid delivery to Haiti. The announcement was made within days of the coup in Haiti that our government would be immediately suspending bilateral government to government assistance to Haiti. I think it is very important to point out that by far the bulk of that bilateral government to government supposed assistance to Haiti, or what we normally think of as government to government, in this case of bilateral aid, was the Canadian government acting through Canadian non-government organizations for assistance programs to help people in Haiti at the grassroots level. It was not the Canadian government's direct funding and assistance to the Haitian government that was cancelled. It was Canadian government assistance which, in the majority, supported Canadian non-government organizations in their work at the grassroots level in Haiti.

It is very important that, as the minister says, we are not applying sanctions to damage or bring damage to the Haitian people, the grassroots, the more than six million citizens of Haiti who live in stark poverty. We are bringing in sanctions to try to bring back their democratically elected president.

We therefore must be very careful when we say that we will cut aid to that country, we are not unnecessarily jeopardizing the very people in Haiti who support Aristide. It is important perhaps to review some of the programs that might have brought direct assistance which is still necessary to the grassroots at this time.

We have a long list of Canadian NGOs which are receiving funding through that program. For example, there was a program to Ameliorer la viabilité économique des micro-entreprises rurales et urbaines. Another project that was proposed to bring about l'augmentation de la production agricole ainsi que l'amelioration du niveau de santé de la population, the improvement of the health of the population. That is of concern to us as well.

It is important that this country also follow through on the agreement to send an observer mission into Haiti. There has been a promise of 1,000 people going into Haiti. I would like to know what Canada's particular role is and what proposals there are for our involvement in that team in the country at this time. As we want to protect against human rights violations in Haiti, it is important that this observer team be in there to help the growth of the democratic process in Haiti. We want to be assured that our government is also committed to that action.

In conclusion, we are pleased that at last we have heard from the government very specifically about the sanctions it is bringing into Haiti starting today. We hope the government will continue to add to the program which was supported by the Organization of American States to assure that President Aristide is returned into power in Haiti.

[Translation]

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, we as New Democrats support wholeheartedly the measures announced by the government. The international community, including Canada, must do everything it can to restore the government of Jean Aristide. For many years, Haitians were denied social justice.

[English]

We fully and completely support the measures the government has announced today in respect of Haiti. I would just like to make it clear that we have a couple of concerns, but before I do just let me restate our complete support for any effort the government can make to try to see that the democratically elected government of Jean Aristide is restored to power as quickly as possible. The government has our complete support on that and on any measures it can take in this respect. Let me ask a couple of questions indirectly. This is not really Question Period, so I cannot do it in that way. Perhaps I could encourage the government, in whatever way the minister can do so, to clarify a couple of points.

First, in respect to humanitarian aid, the government seems to define this as food but presumably there would be other items that might well be included in humanitarian aid, such as medicine.

Second, I wonder if the government could also clarify the situation in respect of existing bilateral development projects undertaken by NGOs. It has come to my attention that there are still some questions about the extent to which government measures affect those existing development projects and the existing lines of credit and loans.

I should say that we do understand and support sanctions in this context. I would find it helpful if the government could also, at some point in the near future, indicate to the House the context of this as part of an over-all strategy, including the timing the government would anticipate to keep the pressure on the regime now in power in Haiti. Sanctions alone are a tool. They are a difficult tool because they create problems for the people involved. The government will be aware of the reflection, the echo in this Chamber of the debate of a year ago about sanctions in Iraq. Then we had the government saying: "These are not going to work quickly enough, therefore, we have to be prepared to move in with military force".

Obviously all members of this House would agree that military force here should be only used as an absolute last resort. It is important that sanctions be seen within a timetable, within a general strategy that the OAS and other countries that are focusing on this problem are using.

Let me conclude with a couple of comments about the larger context. All countries which are members of OAS, particularly all the rich countries and the industrialized nations in general, have to share some responsibility for the plight of the people in Haiti. For too long governments in rich societies have essentially participated in the exploitation of the people in countries like Haiti, and Haiti in particular. It is very important that we learn the lesson here. We are in an almost intractable situation unless these sanctions can work.

We could have intervened long ago to respond to the efforts of those people when they had the opportunity to build social justice and to recognize the causes and to see that. In the larger world picture, we are going to have to change our ways in the rich part of the world if we are going to build a world of social justice so these terrible tragedies do not happen.

I particularly plead with the government and with this minister to take a second look at the direction CIDA is going in terms of its development, the moneys and funds available for development assistance and for the direction this government is going in terms of the international economic world order. We need a change whereby social justice for the poor and disaffected in this world have an opportunity to be heard. This would be a place to start.

[Translation]

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I attended the presidential inauguration in Haiti of Jean-Bertrand Aristide, and I want to express my regrets—and I believe I am not alone in this respect—that under the present Standing Orders we cannot take part in this debate.

I see my friend, the hon. member for Saint-Léonard, the whip who allowed me to go to the inauguration in Haiti, and I simply wanted to give the House advance notice—and I see here my colleague, Mr. Cole, who was in Quebec City with me and also in Toronto—I simply want to give notice that I, as a member of the House management committee, and my friend, the hon. member for Saint-Léonard, the vice-chairman of this committee, intend to raise this question, because so many people are asking us why we cannot take part in a debate that is really important to all members. This is an opportunity for all members to take an active part in debate in the House.

We herewith give notice that we intend to raise this question before the House management committee, at the first opportunity. Thank you for your patience.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

PRESENTATION OF THIRD REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the third report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts. Chapter IX of this report deals with the Auditor General's Report for 1990. The report that I am presenting deals in particular with verifying the security of information. Pursuant to Standing Order 109, the committee asks the government to table a reply within 90 days.

Furthermore, I would like to draw the attention of the House to the fact that the committee which I chair studied very carefully the whole issue of the security of information contained in the government's computers. The committee would like to have a debate on this question. I will publish a notice to have this report debated and, hopefully, adopted by the House.

PETITIONS

WATER DIVERSION

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise under Standing Order 36 to present a petition to the House signed primarily by the residents of the interior of British Columbia. It is on the very important matter of water diversion.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to urge the government to state categorically—because as far as we know that has not been done yet—that it will not permit our freshwater rivers to be dammed and diverted into the U.S.A. and to state that our Canadian rivers are not for sale.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I too have a similar petition signed by a number of residents mainly from the Shuswap Lake area in British Columbia. They also point out their concerns with plans announced by a Vancouver based company to dam the North Thompson River at Valemount and sell water to the San Diego, California, region.

The petitioners are asking the government to state very clearly to all the principals involved that our waters are not to be dammed for export purposes.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): On another matter, Mr. Speaker, petitioners from Kamloops, and that region, point out their concern regarding the continued service of the RCM Police and note that they want to ensure that the RCMP have the proper financial support to fulfil its mandate.

The petitioners are urging the government to properly fund the RCMP.

EDUCATION

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, I would like to present a petition that was circulated by Mrs. Hazel Gontier of 90 Falstaff Avenue. This petition is about national responsibility as far as education is concerned.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to urge the government to commit itself to the importance of accessible education for all Canadians and urge it to increase Established Programs Financing for education and remove other barriers from preventing students from obtaining a quality education.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I too have a petition signed by several constituents, mainly from British Columbia, who urge the government to consider restoring proper funding to the RCMP so that it can fulfil its mandate and role as the only visible police force for communities across British Columbia and remain as a viable symbol of Canadian unity.

Does the Department of the Environment distribute news clippings to persons and/or organizations and, if so, (a) what is the cost per page (b) which persons and/or organizations have been (i) deleted from the distribution list (ii) added to the distribution list since the appointment of Jean Charest as minister?

Mr. Cole: I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Riis: I have a very short point of order, Mr. Speaker, following up on my colleague, my hon. friend from Oshawa.

There have been some informal discussions between the parties regarding the items and actions that led up to the mace incident. Regarding the whole matter of bells, when they should ring, for how long, and the role of the Whips and so on, this matter is now being referred to the appropriate standing committee for reconsideration, study, and presumably some recommendations back.

I would like to make that point clear and hopefully the management committee will look into that whole matter and bring back recommendations for the House.

CORRECTIONS AND CONDITIONAL RELEASE ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lewis that Bill C-36, an act respecting corrections and the conditional release and detention of offenders and to establish the office of Correctional Investigator, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee G.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): When the debate was suspended at two o'clock, seven minutes remained in the period for questions and comments after the speech by the hon. member for Mississauga West. Questions and comments. The hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River.

[English]

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, in the remarks which were made by the hon. member for Mississauga West just prior to Question Period, I took note of the fact that he mentioned the concept of crime prevention.

Lest anyone be under an illusion that the government's bill here addresses crime prevention, I wanted to ask a question of the hon. member. I know that he is the chairman of the justice and solicitor general committee here in the House. He does a real good job in that capacity.

We all know that simply passing a law or amending an act does absolutely nothing to prevent crime. Since the hon. member did mention crime prevention, and I am sure he would acknowledge that simply passing a bill does not prevent crime, perhaps he could give us the benefit of his wisdom and experience in explaining some of the crime prevention initiatives that the government has undertaken in the last while, at least since I have been elected in 1988, and in the near future.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, he is absolutely right. I did mention crime prevention only by saying when it was brought up that the $2 million budget set aside for crime prevention was to be cancelled.

I have since found out that that $2 million in the budget was in fact $340,000, and crime prevention week had been so well received that it was possible to cancel the program. It has been taken over by community groups.

However, the hon. member asks: What does this bill do for crime prevention? We all know that this bill does not do a lot for crime prevention, but during crime prevention week, we are bringing in other bills. Does he not believe that the bill to increase gun control will help? Does he not believe that the amendments to the Young Offenders Act will help? Does he not believe that some of the other initiatives that we are putting forward will help?

Maybe this bill will not directly reduce crime, but think about it. If you have a dangerous offender that cannot be rehabilitated and you keep him in jail longer, surely it cuts down on the danger and the crime that will be heaped upon the public by this person while he is out.

We will keep him within the penitentiary system.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to question the hon. member for Mississauga West. In the whole process of parolees, the idea is to make sure they are integrated back into the community.

I would like to ask the hon. member how many halfway houses does he have in Mississauga West, and where does he recommend that these halfway houses be established under the present legislation?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I believe we only have one halfway House in Mississauga West at the present time.

These are established in various places around the country in accordance with where the present population is so that they can have support of their families and their friends when they are being reintegrated into society.

They must be set up where the largest prison populations are. Right now, the largest prison populations are in Ontario.

I will admit that one of the things we must be working toward, striving very strongly toward, is rehabilitation.

I believe that rehabilitation must take a back seat to protection of the public. That is what this bill does, it does protect the public.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Very briefly, the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park.

Mr. Flis: I would like to ask a short supplementary.

In 1986 when his government was in power it did open up an Exodus Link in Parkdale—High Park without any consultation with the community. The community was up in arms because it was getting fed up with trying to integrate parolees, very severe former convicts, sex offenders, murderers, et cetera in Parkdale—High Park.

My point is this. Should not all communities accept their fair share in integrating these former convicts into their communities? I submit to the hon. member that maybe he should have a talk with Peel county because I do not believe Mississauga has taken its fair share of halfway houses and as a result poor Parkdale residents have to shoulder the burden.

Mr. Horner: I well remember the Exodus Link situation and I do agree that there must be consultation with communities before halfway houses are set up.

We must remember that Parkdale—High Park is within metropolitan Toronto and if it is the largest group of penitentiary inmates coming out to halfway houses, the inmates must be able to go to a halfway house close to their families so that they can have family support. Family support is very important. I beg your pardon?

Mr. Flis: They do not all come from Parkdale—High Park.

Mr. Horner: They must come from close to Parkdale—High Park then.

Mr. Flis: From Mississauga.

Mr. Horner: No, they are not all from Mississauga, I can tell you that. Mississauga will certainly do its share, I can tell you that.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have an opportunity after being in this House now for almost three years to address a bill that approaches a reform initiative, one that my constituents and I and all other members of the House have been waiting for for a long time. It has been a little bit too long in coming, but let us pass over the niceties here and get down to the bill itself.

In 1987 and 1988 members of the justice committee at that time devoted long hours of labour and study to produce a report entitled Taking Responsibility. Today in the House the member for York South—Weston, the member for Peterborough and the member for Mississauga West were on that committee. That was actually, I thought, a bit of a landmark. It was comprehensive, it was direct and to the point.

That report was not replied to by the government because of the election which occurred about two months after it was reported to the House. The justice committee which was formed after the last election, and I have been an active member of that committee, found that report so good and comprehensive, it readopted the same report, and it reported it to this House.

The government did reply and as part of the reply it included a number of initiatives. Although much belated, they did appear to address a number of the problems, at least optically.

The background of this is more than just a committee report. There are, in the corrections area, a whole litany of tragedies which I do not want to dwell on for too long, but they are an essential part of the understanding of what has brought the government to this reform initiative. They are tragedies, they are horror stories, they are sad, they involve innocent victims, and they involve individuals who were serving time or on parole in the correction system. The names involved are, and I use the name of the offender as opposed to that of the victim, Stanton, Gingras, Legere, Fredericks, and there are others.

• (1550)

These cases and others are the worst of them. They involve homicides. They involve the deaths of innocent Canadians, men, women and children in those four cases, totally innocent individuals who fell victim to individuals who, with 20/20 hindsight should never have been free, whether they escaped or whether they were released on the streets in Canada.

These cases involved errors in judgment and systemic errors, gross systemic errors, some of which have been rectified. But there are others which remain to be rectified through this legislation and, in my view, in other things that still must be done.

These unfortunate cases manifest flaws in the corrections system and in the criminal justice system. They manifest an insecurity on the part of the Canadians in our criminal justice system. This sense of insecurity is really there and it is there for good reason.

We must remember that the public safety issue is much broader than corrections and conditional release and parole. It is much broader than that. The public safety net includes the Criminal Code and sentencing. In all of that, I would point out that the government's promised Criminal Code reform initiative has not yet been brought to Parliament. I have been here three years. It has been promised and it is not here yet. I take note of another part of the criminal justice system which is not solely a federal responsibility. That is criminal procedure, which is the responsibility of the provinces. In the province of Ontario, where my riding is included, a relatively recent Supreme Court decision, referred to as the Askov decision, is now resulting in the dismissal and withdrawal of numerous criminal cases, criminal charges. This is not just a few but thousands of charges. The numbers are still accumulating.

Is it any wonder that Canadians feel insecure when they read that thousands of charges against alleged criminals, many of them repeat offenders, are being withdrawn and dropped because the Crown is not able to proceed?

The Criminal Code, the sentencing regime, the Young Offenders Act, the Extradition Act, mental disorders reform legislation, gun control and other aspects are in front of this House. Some of these reforms attempt to address problems in the system. Others try, but in my view they are not going to achieve the goal intended. At least the initiative has commenced.

Historically the people in our democratic society cut a deal with their king and their deal was: "We will give you tax dollars; you must take care of public safety". If that did not happen, the ordinary Canadian was going to go out and take care of justice himself or herself. That is a system that leads to chaos. We opted for another one and we did it many years ago.

Canadians are not going to accept a system that delivers anything less than the public safety they bargained for in the social contract that was built up over centuries in the western world.

The government's reform agenda now, including corrections, I submit is not simply their own initiative. The motivator for much of what the government is presenting to the House this year is media driven and Supreme Court of Canada driven. You do not have to look very far to see what pushed the government to address these reforms. It was not an awareness that problems existed. It was media and decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada.

The Swain decision in the Supreme Court of Canada was the factor that prompted the government to introduce its reforms in the mental disorder and insanity area. It was the Gingras case, which took place principally in the province of Alberta, that made the government come forward with reforms in the corrections area. There was also the Stanton case. It was the Ng decision in the Supreme Court, the Charles Ng fiasco, that caused the government to finally pull the Extradition Act off the back burner. It had been sitting around long before I came to this Parliament.

I understand that it was addressed in the early 1980s and it sat and sat until that unfortunate incident involving Mr. Ng. There were other offenders as well.

I want to address for a few moments in my remarks the concepts which lay behind the parole conditional release system. They are important to keep in mind as we address this bill. When the corrections system operates properly, it depends on a balance of factors. There are at least three which should be kept in mind.

The first one is public safety, the second is rehabilitation and the third is deterrence. Number one on that list is public safety. It was number one on the list of Canadians when they made the bargain with their government. This was the social contract that was conceptually made way back in the 1300s, 1400s and 1500s with the king. In any event, that was number one on the list. Somewhere between then and now it went down the list. I do not know how far down but somewhere along the line someone in government forgot about public safety.

I am pleased to see at least in the press releases accompanying this bill public safety is touted as being back up in the number one spot.

I want to note for the record that I am not under any illusion that by reforming or amending the corrections system we are perhaps going to solve all of the public safety problems. We are not. By dealing in the corrections area, with one exception, we are only treating the symptoms of crime and public safety. We are not dealing with the causes. That one exception is when the correction system succeeds in the rehabilitation, or assisting in the rehabilitation, of an inmate who does not come back, who is not a recidivist.

I do not have any illusions and I hope that neither Canadians, nor anyone in this House, have any illusions. The reforms must be there and we have to address them.

This has been a terrible year in metro Toronto. There has been a large increase in crime. We have had more murders than we have ever had before.

I noted a 34 per cent increase in youth crime across the country. Those figures do not include Ontario. For reasons which have not been explained to me, Ontario was not able to get its statistics organized in time for that survey. I have already mentioned the fiasco in criminal procedure as a result of the Askov decision, whereby thousands of criminal cases are not being proceeded with or prosecuted.

I do not think that dealing with this corrections and conditional release bill at committee, we are going to solve all of the problems. We are going to start to work on some of the obvious systemic problems that have developed over the years.

On the issue of deterrence, which is one of those three factors, I wanted to spend a moment or two on the issue of deterrence and white collar crime.

• (1600)

As part of this bill there is a proposal that access to parole would be expedited, that the parole eligibility date would be accelerated for non-violent offenders.

I am trying to understand if the government has lost sight of deterrence for white collar crime. By white collar crime I am talking about crime where there is no violence. I am talking about fraud, the so-called victimless crimes potentially involving millions of dollars. What deterrence is there for a white collar criminal who might receive a sentence of five years or seven years? That is pretty heavy for fraud, but let us say that is what the sentence is. Who knows that because they are non-violent they are going to get out sooner? They would get an accelerated parole date which would even be earlier than the one-third of sentence threshold which is usual now. Even under this bill it will continue to be usual for consideration of parole eligibility. I think the government has lost sight of deterrence in this bill, at least in regards to that type of crime.

There are a few other elements of the bill I thought I would address quickly, if for no other reason than to signal my friends opposite that the provisions in the bill may present problems. I took note of clause 22 of the bill which indicates that the government may pay compensation for death or disability attributable to a person's participation in an approved program for an inmate. This is compensation for an inmate who gets hurt in a penitentiary.

I do not have a big problem with that except I wonder what happened to the victim. I do not understand how the government can put this forward as being an important element of its bill when it has not bothered to stop and ask about any compensation to the victim. I do not believe that this bill addresses restitution, which is part of sentencing. I just have a sense that that particular provision, which the bureaucrats may think is needed to help them address problems within the system, has not been well thought out.

In clause 25(2) there is a reference to notifying police at the time of a release of an offender. It does not say which police. If the offender is released from a prison in British Columbia, will every police force in the country be notified: the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the Sûreté? It does not say; it is a little vague.

Last, concerning the placement and transfer of inmates there is possibly a very alarming signal in the criteria set out that will be considered when an inmate is classified as being maximum risk or medium risk. The bill lists the criteria that the correction service will take into account. Here are the three in order: the safety of the person and the persons in the penitentiary, the inmate; the security of the penitentiary; and, the third criterion, safety of the public.

I am sure I read in the press release accompanying this that safety of the public was first. Even if I did not read it, I think we all agree that safety of the public is first. That is why the penitentiary was built in the first place. Someone in drafting this bill has the criteria upside down. As the committee goes through this bill I hope that is just an isolated incident.

In wrapping up I want to indicate that we all know that the criminal justice system needs a lot of work and a lot of work quickly. I did not mention sentencing. We were promised a sentencing reform package almost as soon as I began sitting as a member. It has not reached the House yet.

In fairness, the justice minister is promising it soon. The Solicitor General has said it is coming. Let us say I am anxiously awaiting it, we all on this side of the House are, because sentencing goes hand in hand with corrections. It is an integral part of the justice system.

There is a lot more than this particular bill in addressing the field. The Young Offenders Act is before this House now. I want to point out something about the Extradition Act. It has been referred to by members on the government side as being a really important part of this.

The Extradition Act does not permit this country to get rid of anybody. The Extradition Act only is triggered when another state requests that Canada send somebody out of the country. We cannot use it as a tool to get rid of anybody. We can use it as a tool to get someone back into Canada from another country, and so let us not overrate the importance of the extradition system.

The problem in that area is the Immigration Act. That is where the problem is. This bill has been a long time coming. Someone said that the public seems to like this particular bill. Some of the newspapers have said that, but when you are in the Sahara desert there is no more important commodity than one cup of water. The public certainly does want to see this bill. It has been waiting a long time and it is very thirsty.

I will conclude my remarks there and I look forward to being able to deal with this bill in committee in the near future.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I have a comment and a question.

I should say I have asked the page, if the member does not mind, to send him a glass of water, and two for the government, plus I stole the line from the Solicitor General.

I have this question to the hon. member who last spoke. He mentioned the Extradition Act. He said the Extradition Act was sitting around.

I do not know what he meant by that. Where was it sitting? I think he must be in the Mental Disorders Act. It was passed in 1986 and then the court a few months ago said in the Swain case: "You have to bring in a new act. You have to change the procedure". It was the Mental Disorders Act. The government has brought in a new act and then claimed it was part of its fight on crime. It was forced to bring it in by the courts.

There was a private member's bill from the member for Peterborough. We debated that in the House and so on. That act was not really sitting around that way.

One of the criticisms if I might say, and I do not want to be too partisan here, is that people say the Liberal Party does not have any position on anything. It is always on both sides of every issue, and there is never any position for the Liberal Party.

An hon. member: You know better than that.

Mr. Waddell: I am just telling the members what people are saying to me. The Liberal Party has no position. I want to know from the hon. member, what is the position of the Liberal Party on the new Extradition Act?

Mr. Lee: I want to thank the hon. member for his question about the Extradition Act.

I said the Extradition Act reforms were sitting around for a long time and I meant it. The hon. member has been here a lot longer than I have and maybe he was asleep at the switch.

We have signed extradition treaties with countries in South America. They are called imperial treaties. They were entered into with Spain. The whole extradition area is hopelessly out of whack with reality and we have been flying along by the seat of our pants with our neighbour to the south, hoping that everything would fall together.

It is only some of the more recent cases that have finally pushed the government, the bureaucracy, the Department of Justice to make reforms in their treaties and acts. This Extradition Act is not the responsibility of the Solicitor General, and it is perhaps out of order to get into a debate now about our position on the Extradition Act.

Make no mistake about it, Liberal members on this side of the House are eagerly awaiting completion of the Extradition Act reforms. I have been waiting ever since I entered this House in November 1988.

• (1610)

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague from Toronto for speaking on this very important bill. It is nice to see so many of our Liberal members from Toronto here today, participating in this bill because we in Toronto right now are in a desperate state. The seniors in our community have never been as nervous because of the lack of control in terms of the crime that is running rampant. Children are afraid to take subways at night in Toronto now. Their parents are meeting them at subway corners. They do not want to walk the streets at night.

Last week in my riding alone in Danforth we had something like 29 break-ins. Many of the police in the metropolitan Toronto area believe that the lack of attention to reforming bills such as today is one of the reasons why their job is a lot more difficult to do.

I wonder if the hon. member would give us an opinion as to whether these reforms, these amendments that are being put forward, are going to make the job of police officers not just in Toronto, but coast to coast, a lot easier.

Some people are purporting that this is basically tinkering and it is really not going to address the substance of the issue.

Mr. Lee: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for Broadview—Greenwood for that question. A short answer in my view is that the amendments proposed will improve the system for people working in the corrections system. It may help the odd police officer in the odd jurisdiction. There is certainly provision for more communication between the corrections system and the police community. It is actually mandated in the bill.

The question that the member asks points up another question which had been addressed a little earlier and that is the whole issue of crime prevention. Every one of these bills with one or two minor exceptions addresses the symptoms of breaches in the criminal justice system, and not the causes of crime.

I know that other jurisdictions have been able to successfully commence programs targeting crime prevention. France has done it. The United Kingdom has commenced and a few United States jurisdictions have. One or two of the Scandinavian countries have. They have federal programs that address crime prevention, programs that attempt to go to the causes that turn individuals to crime.

That is something which this government is not addressing. I concede that about a year ago the Royal Canadian Mounted Police hosted a conference on crime prevention. It was a good initiative but I was stunned by the fact that hosting this and having spent all the money on it, it did not invite one member of Parliament. Shame on the RCMP.

If it really cared about this initiative on crime prevention, the issue that has been raised by my friend from Broadview—Greenwood, it would be doing more now, it would have done more then, and we could accomplish more in the future.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to thank my colleague from Toronto for making submissions. He has worked diligently over the last three years since his election in this particular field of criminal law reform.

Much to my chagrin, and this is my question to my colleague, I understand that the government will no longer participate in this debate. It does not intend to put up any more speakers. It has some 170 members in the House and yet it does not have any other members who wish to address this most important issue facing Canadians.

Can the member for Scarborough—Rouge River shed some light on the reasons why Conservative members of Parliament just do not appear to care about criminal law reform?

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before recognizing the hon. member, I may recall that according to the Standing Orders there should be no reference to the presence or absence of members in this House.

[English]

Mr. Lee: Mr. Speaker, I had no intention of addressing that very sensitive issue.

I know there are members opposite who do care a lot about the area that we are dealing with here today. I think the goal of members opposite is to get this bill through quickly without too much debate. However, without any reference to my own remarks, but with reference to the remarks of my colleague from York—South Weston and there will undoubtedly be some very positive constructive remarks of other colleagues, there are issues which we believe must be brought to the floor of the House for inclusion in debate and consideration with this bill.

The silence of members opposite need not be taken as a lack of interest but rather as a belief that their minister, the Solicitor General, and the government's bureaucrats have it all down perfectly right now and there are no mistakes. We take a different view. We want to try to improve this bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. Solicitor General on a point of order.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I would like to advise the House that this bill had plenty of discussion in our caucus and comes forward with the full support of the government. We have not spun out the speaker's list in order to give the opposition a full chance to speak.

Some hon. members: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I rise and would ask for unanimous consent, as agreed upon between the parties, to refer Bill C–36 not to the legislative committee, but to the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General. Therefore, I move:

> That Bill C–36 be referred after second reading to the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On a point of order, the hon. member for Edmonton Southeast.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, with respect, a minister cannot get up on what is patently not a point of order to make a motion. He has to have the floor legitimately. It is I think clear to all of the members here, I hope including yourself, sir, that the minister did not have a bona fide point of order and was simply trying to get the floor so he could move his motion.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): According to the Standing Orders, a minister of the Crown may rise in the House at any time. To find out what the subject is, the Speaker must first recognize the minister, and when I saw the Solicitor General rise before debate was resumed, I felt it was entirely proper, considering our Standing Orders, to recognize the Solicitor General, who presented a motion under Standing Order 73. Of course, the consent of the House is required for tabling this motion.

[English]

Is there unanimous consent to accept the motion of the Solicitor General of Canada?

An hon. member: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On a point of order, the hon. member for York—South Weston.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, we do not object on this side of the House to referring this bill to the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General rather than the legislative committee when the debate at second reading is concluded in this House. We do not agree at this point to that particular motion.

We would like to see how the government conducts itself over the next few hours.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There is not unanimous consent and the matter is settled.

On a point of order, the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I think the reason we are having a little difficulty here is that the minister rose on a point of order. He started the point of order by objecting to some comments that were made by the last speaker. That was not a point of order. Liberal members were shouting at the Chair on that. The Chair should have ruled, with respect, that it was not a point of order and told the minister to sit down on it. Then the minister could have risen on a point of order and put what he originally wanted to put.

• (1620)

If the minister does that again, on behalf of our party I would be prepared to—

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member is right, but when someone raises a point of order, the Speaker must listen to find out what the point of order is about. I recognized the minister, and he raised a point of order which may not have been in order, and subsequently presented his motion, which did not receive the unanimous consent of the House. Consequently debate is resumed.

[English]

But before resuming debate, I wish to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 33(2)(b), because of the ministerial statement Government Orders will be extended by 22 minutes.

[Translation]

It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Burin—St. George's—Fisheries; the hon. member for Don Valley East—The Economy; the hon. member for Ottawa West—Great Lakes; the hon. member for Victoria—Yugoslavia; the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie—Algoma Steel.

[English]

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I want to confess at the outset that this is a bit different, perhaps for some members. I actually know something about this subject so I want to be very careful in my remarks.

I had the very good fortune or misfortune early in my career before becoming a politician of having spent my professional time as a worker in prisons. I worked in the prison setting, in corrections and in probation and parole at a very beginning position as a corrections officer. Prior to entering politics I worked in a private agency as a supervisor, and prior to that I was responsible to staff training in the province of British Columbia.

The tragedy of this particular bill has been partly touched upon by the previous speaker. This is a global problem in a community, and we pick away at it bill by bill by bill. The problem of crime in society is very complex. While we focus during a week that some suspect has political overtones on law and order for political purposes on this particular bill and other bills, we still have not dealt with a range of fundamental problems in this area.

My good friend, the Liberal member, touched on white collar crime, and I commend him for that, but I also want to talk about corporate crime. When we talk about violent crime against the individual, it is horrible, it is often amoral, it is reprehensible, and we want to punish.

However I have yet to see the director of a corporation who has poisoned water in a community knowingly and not done anything to clean it up, go to jail for that violence against the community. I have yet to see corporate directors, board members and chief executive officers who allow poisons to spew into the air from their factories go to jail. I have yet to see anyone from the corporate sector accept the moral responsibility of criminal acts such as the Ford Motor Company when it produced one of its automobiles, the Pinto, with the knowledge that the car would burst into flames unless it had a shield around the gas tank and that shield cost $1.50 and it did nothing about it.

Let us understand what we are talking about in broader terms than just an individual crime and an individual act of violence. As horrible as it is, let us understand that we have not one standard of law, not two standards of law, but perhaps three or four.

When I talk about the global picture I make the claim that one of the areas in the global picture that has been absolutely neglected is the criminal aspect about corporate decisions that violate the health of individual citizens in our society.

The white collar criminals to whom my friend alluded tend to get off with a a light slap on the wrist for offences that destroy the lives of tens of hundreds of people in our society: witness the failure of financial institutions by fraud, witness the failure of large savings institutions where the corporate offenders have been quietly slapped on the wrist and walk away from their responsibilities.

Let us look at who is in jail, the people who are in jail. I am not making a plea for them just because someone else is not in jail, but frequently people who should be in jail are not in jail because the global view of responsibility in our society is not all encompassing. Having said that and the government having listened, I know it is going to bring in redeeming legislation immediately.

Turning to the matter at hand in this bill, my good friend, the Liberal member from Toronto, also touched on another aspect of this that he was perfectly correct on, and that is prevention. Since 1936 this Chamber has authorized at least eight separate royal commissions on the question of crime and punishment, our federal penitentiaries and our dealings with probation and parole. In almost every single instance none of those recommendations has been followed by any succeeding government since 1936, be it Liberal or Tory.

Let us understand who the victims are, who the criminals are and our response to both. I want to deal first with those who end up in our prisons. It is a fact that rich people do not go to jail. Rarely do they go to jail. On occasion when they do go to jail for violent crimes, frequently they end up as the focus of a television show or a movie because it is so rare.

But when poor people go to jail it is just to continue the system and the system does just as much harm to the people who are the victims, the criminals, the staff of the institutions, as well as society.

Let me deal with one glaring fault of this kind of legislation, although it is a step forward. When we talk about parole, the whole parole system is based on the concept that if you behave yourself in jail you will get out earlier.

An hon. member: Not any more.

Mr. Barrett: "Not any more", my friend says. Let me tell my friend that those who learn to adjust in prison, those who learn to play the game, those who are able to manipulate, are the ones who get the recommendation that they are at low risk in parole.

Let us talk about low risk. If somebody is at low risk in parole, should they have been in jail in the first place? I submit that there is a significant number of people who should have been placed on probation in the first place with the loss of time and the loss of income.

In my province of British Columbia we modelled a program on a scheme of weekend jails. We sent people to jail on weekends once they were convicted of a crime of a minor nature. During the week we asked those people to continue at their jobs and pay back the money they stole or pay for any damage they created. On the weekend they went to prison and their social time that was most valuable to them was taken away as a punishment. While they were incarcerated on the weekends, not in a full-fledged prison but incarcerated nonetheless, we demanded they pay room and board while they were in jail.

Is that a novel idea? People within the normal range who bend the rules and commit minor offences should understand that the first obligation is back to the victim in society. You pay back, you make restitution, and you do that by working, not by living in jail. Second, if you are going to be deprived of your weekend because of this crime, we insist you pay for your own room and board. The state should not do that. That concept came out of Holland and it is known as diminished responsibility.

• (1630)

Why were the Dutch still leading in the world and still continue to lead in the world in the concept of diminished responsibility? It was because at the beginning of World War II most of the Dutch politicians were thrown in jail. As that horrible experience ended at the end of World War II, those politicians came out and changed the whole criminal justice system in the country of Holland.

Far be it from me to suggest that everybody in this place be locked up for a while. It might have a salutary effect in an understanding of what prisons are all about.

Now let us talk about the unspeakable, what happens in prison when we talk about rehabilitation. When a young male of 16, 17 or 18 comes into a prison setting in a federal penitentiary after being convicted of a crime, and especially if he is from a poverty background, the first thing that is done is that straws are drawn to see who that young male will service in homosexual acts perpetrated on new young offenders in the prison, simply because they are without guile, they are without experience, and they become the prey of older, wiser men in prisons.

This may come as a shock to my colleagues. Prisons are not a pretty place. We have made no conscious effort to separate young offenders from adult prisons and, as a consequence, some of the most unspeakable experiences that happen to young people happen in the two or three weeks after they enter prison.

That is not discussed in committee. That is not discussed with the parole board. We do not make physical separation between the older, tougher prisoners who really run the institution in many instances. We must remember that the prisoners are there 24 hours a day. The staff is only there doing life on the instalment plan, eight-hour shifts as they go along. The institutions are generally hopeful that they will be run quietly, and the way to run an institution quietly is not to have any trouble and to turn the other eye.

I want to commend this minister for having the good sense to have at least condoms made available in our adult male prisons. It was he who did that, was it not? I want to commend the minister for realistically dealing with the fundamental problem.

Mr. Nunziata: How about needles? Do you support needles in prison too?

Mr. Barrett: Wait a minute. I am very serious about this. I am not talking about needles, but I will come to drugs in prison in a minute.

I want to be very clear about what I am saying. I want to support the minister for making condoms available, because at least it is a realistic, honest statement about part of what is repulsive that happens in prisons.

The public should understand that these things go on. When there is an effort within a prison setting to teach people on this word reformation, we must understand that we have to separate who we are dealing with and how we treat people. Violent sexual offenders are the most dangerous offenders in our institutions. Generally they are psychopathic or serial killers who are also psychopathic and are extremely dangerous.

Some of these people should never ever be released, never ever be released. We must devise a system that recognizes we cannot be successful in rehabilitation in every single case. When we give a mandatory sentence to particular offenders who are absolutely out of control and when the sentence is over we do not give such persons parole. We close the gates behind them and release them in most instances sicker than they were when they went into jail. That is no protection for the public.

I plead with the Solicitor General to deal with the problem of the right of individuals to end a sentence and to know that they can get out of prison.

I also appeal to the Solicitor General to look at the Dutch model, a diminished responsibility, and understand there are some people, in our limited capacity as human beings, whom we simply do not know enough about and they should never ever be foisted back in the community again. At the same time, those people should be separated, isolated and not blanketed under the habitual criminal rule that is a failure in this country, but examined on the individual basis of each offender.

For those we are going to release, and this act of parole, it is all very well to say that this particular offender has not behaved himself or herself in prison, this particular offender is a high risk and therefore should not be allowed on parole, but we cannot justify that in every case if we still continue a system that permits very sick people to come out at the end of their sentence anyway.

I think it is a shame on this Parliament if we diminish our role of supervision of a parolee closer to the end of their sentence only to have authority of perhaps the last six months or year of their limited time in prison and put the community at risk for a repeat of the crime.

Not every parole is a risk. Most paroles are safe and can be covered and adequately supervised. But for dangerous offenders it is a risk and that is where the maximum support, supervision and control must be maintained and that costs money. That costs a lot of money. You cannot do it when you have parole officers who have cases of 100 or 200 or 300 parolees.

In the case of seriously ill people whom we release, the parole officers should not have more than 10 or 15 cases, period. I allude to the horrible serial killing in Milwaukee recently. It did not happen in this country but I think we have to understand that we have a comparable social and cultural pattern, certainly on television.

The parole officer involved in that case did not have the time to go to that individual's home to check out complaints. It is a known fact that as one reviewed publicly the horror story and the build up around that serial killer, human body parts were being cooked down in that offenders own apartment and the parole officer never visited once. Why? Because he was frankly too busy with 200 and 300 cases. That is not good enough.

I appeal to this government to understand that if you want proper parole supervision, sexual offenders, dangerous sociopathic or psychopathic offenders, who are going to be paroled, must have maximum supervision and the caseload of highly qualified parole officers should not exceed 15 or 20 at the very, very most.

What kind of parole officers? In my day you had to be very highly trained to be a parole officer. The job paid a reasonable amount of money. Now I would ask the government to see what a parole officer earns. Check the turnover of the staff, see how many cases they carry and check on their qualifications.

When I first started as a social worker at the Children's Aid Society I had 78 children in care. Most of these children faced the trauma of being separated from their natural parents and put into institutions or into foster homes. When I left that first experience I knew very well, as a social worker dealing with 78 kids, that it was impossible for me to do the job properly.

Today, social workers in almost every province of this country deal with caseloads of 200, 300 and 400 children who need care.

I leave parole and go to preventative work.

• (1640)

If you track back to the primary beginnings of most of the offenders you find in many instances child abuse, neglect, poverty as common symptoms around which crime seeds itself and spawns.

The services to children in this country have actually been diminished by this government and other governments by putting a cap on transfer payments, by cutting back on services to children, by cutting back on auxiliary help in educational institutions.

You do not have to be an expert. In any home, in any community of this country, people sit down and over their own dinner table say: "If somebody does not do something with Johnny or Susie soon they are going to be in trouble". Unfortunately and regrettably most of our predictions are correct.

I make an appeal to this government to understand that we are talking here about a global picture. I have touched just a little bit on a number of points that stick out. All of this bill is meaningless, all of the bill on youthful offenders is meaningless unless we are prepared to go back to the very foundations of our community and guarantee every single child housing, food, education and access to love and to care.

An hon. member: Utopia.

Mr. Barrett: My good friend says "Utopia". I agree it is Utopia, but God help those who do not strive for Utopia, especially in the face of the facts of neglect that is now taking place in the social services and corrections in this country.

I have so much more to say, not because I am correct, but because I have seen it. I make this plea on the basis of what I have seen.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, I was very much interested in my friend's comments about the government's approach to white collar crime. I too share his concerns. The government seems to be placing less emphasis as far as the penitentiary service is concerned with regard to white collar crime.

When we talk about white collar crime, the government refers to it as accelerated review so that first time offenders convicted of non-violent crimes can go in and out of the system as quickly as possible.

The concern I have and the concern that a great number of people have is with regard to the issue of deterrence. What is there to deter a white collar criminal from perpetrating a major fraud, let us say, a lawyer or a banker from defrauding thousands of people of their life savings? What is there to deter a company from polluting the environment? That would be considered a white collar crime.

This government wants to send out a message that we are not going to treat these offences as seriously as we have in the past. I am a bit perplexed at the member. On the one hand he seems to want to come down heavy on the white collar criminals and then on the other hand he says that a lot of people who are in prison ought not to be there.

Would he not agree that we have to continue to jail white collar criminals in order to send a very clear message out that society does not tolerate these types of crimes that could be perpetrated on a large number of people?

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague for an earnestly put, very serious question. I want to go back to my very brief comments about the Dutch system which I would recommend to this House in committee in dealing with these problems. There is a particular psychiatrist in Holland who was the founder of this approach, Dr. Audubon and it was diminished responsibility.

My good friend raises the question about punishment and deterrence for white collar crime. If deterrence were a factor, say, in the Arabic code or in the Justinian code or our code, then it would have worked. Some societies cut people's hands off for stealing. They still steal. Other people still do it. Other places have capital punishment. It does not stop crime except for that particular person who has had the capital punishment.

In this country alone you will see that the absence of capital punishment has relatively no influence whatsoever on the incidence of commission of violent crime. I want the member to look at the statistics.

What do we do with white collar criminals? The first thing that I think must be done is a message must go out that we do not have a wink and nudge approach to white collar crime, that anybody who pollutes or steals from other people is going to be dealt with severely.

How do we deal with them severely? If you look at recent cases in the United States, in which people have stolen $10 million, $20 million or $30 million on the stock market and get fined, like Mr. Boskey or others, a million dollars, they are still nine million bucks ahead, or $10 million ahead. Every single penny that can be recovered from white collar crime should be immediately a part of the fine. Let it be understood that there is no reward, that you cannot buy your way out of the system and that if you hire the best lawyers in the world you are still going to lose your ill-gotten gains. I think we should make that as a basis.

Second, and the more serious one, the polluters of the atmosphere, the poisoners of waters or the continuous manufacturer of threatening goods such as the Ford Pinto should go to jail and taste what it is like to be in those abominable social situations at some of the worst penitentiaries in North America. Let them experience it, because on the basis of diminished responsibility, they will understand far more clearly the situation they are in than somebody who has been a repeat offender.

To my colleague, I will commend the Dutch system. My time is up, apparently.

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and to Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, thank you for giving me the floor. I listened very carefully to what the hon. member said, although I had some trouble following his speech, and I also have a few questions.

I do not know whether the hon. member has any penitentiaries in his riding, but my riding happens to have the biggest correctional centre in Canada. In fact, there are five in my riding, all next door to each other. If I may refresh his memory, I could name one that is very well known: the old Saint-Vincent de Paul "pen", the old penitentiary, a lot of escapes and a lot of problems for the community.

The hon. member referred earlier to cases of suicide among correctional officers and parole officers who I think are doing a wonderful job. Of course, these people are not perfect, they are only human, but we cannot afford to make mistakes. And above all, we must not try to bury the answer in the files, as is being done today. The truth is often buried in the files, and no one can find it, which makes it hard for people to do their job.

Earlier, the hon. member also referred to capital punishment and the negligible impact it has on our society. With respect, I do not agree. I voted in favour of restoring capital punishment, and I would still vote the same way.

Perhaps I may refer the hon. member to a case we had in Laval, where someone was given a maximum sentence of 25 years as we saw recently in New Brunswick. This was the case of a man who had been given a life sentence, subsequently commuted to 25 years without parole. As soon as the man was released he committed a murder. He took one of his girl friends hostage, and after this hostage taking which involved the whole city, the police and the neighbours, the woman was killed. This man killed a fourth, fifth and sixth time. We don't know how many times, but in any case, he was convicted at least once. Upon his release, he even had the nerve to hug the police. I do not know whether the hon. member remembers that, but it made the international news. He even had the nerve to hug the police. He was a character. I say he was a character once too often.

• (1650)

I have a very simple question for the hon. member. I do not know why he criticizes the government for giving petty criminals a chance to get out sooner and for using the expertise available inside our prisons to keep other inmates from getting worse, because some day, these people will be released. The government's purpose and the purpose of the minister's bill is to release them under more normal conditions than is the case today.

My question: Is the way we operate today better, in other words, when people commit murder, if they commit murder four or five times, it does not really matter, because they were sentenced to life in any case?

[English]

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the member for his very good question.

As I said in my speech, there are some people in my opinion who should never be released. They should never be released. We owe it to the community to say honestly that some people are so much out of control that as earnestly as we try in a society, we are incapable of understanding their violence or dealing with it.

On that basis, we have to make judgments in terms of protecting their rights, an appeal system, but still in the final analysis, not release them.

We may not always be right in our predictability, but the best way of ensuring the kind of protection you want is each individual case reviewed by itself, not the case fitting in the system, but the system fitting the case. That is a fundamental error we make.

I am not blaming this government. Let me go on record saying that it was this government that closed the British Columbia Penitentiary and began moving people into camps, and modified approach if you are going to incarcerate.

Why do you still have that many prisons? I do not know, but I would suggest to you that the same approach that the government took with the B.C. Penitentiary could and should be used in disseminating the inmates in a variety of institutions rather than one major centre.

The member and I do not share the same reading of statistics, but it has been my experience—I will end with this—that violence does not end violence. In a mature, thoughtful, worried society as we are concerned about our children, we know that violence is not the answer, back to the individual or to society.

I do not envy the government in this task. I am glad I was not a federal cabinet minister concerned with this. All I am doing is sharing an experience and making an appeal.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, it is always a pleasure to follow a member who has had first hand experience on a subject and shares that experience with other members in this House.

I do appreciate the hon. member's intervention. I wish to add the strong voices of Parkdale—High Park to Bill C-36, an act respecting corrections and the conditional release and detention of offenders and to establish the office of correctional investigators.

In my riding of Parkdale—High Park, I have many constituents who are very concerned about the Canadian criminal justice system not giving them adequate protection.

Whenever I see a new bill coming on the floor of the House, I look to see what is the purpose of the bill. I would like to refer members to page 3: "The purpose of the federal correctional system is to contribute to the maintenance of a just, peaceful and safe society.

(a) Carrying out sentences imposed by courts through the safe and humane custody and supervision of offenders.

(b) Assisting the rehabilitation of offenders and their reintegration into the community as law-biding citizens through the provision of programs in penitentiaries and the community".

This is where Canadians can see which party can deliver what the public wants. This is not the first time that the government is attempting to improve our correctional system. It has done it before. It did it in 1986 when I was not in this House. I had returned to education. The government tried something called privatization. It wanted to demonstrate that hard-core criminals, sex offenders, murderers, et cetera, can better be integrated into the community by a privately operated half-way house than one operated by the government. I think many members of this House who were in this Chamber in 1986 and 1987 heard about the fiasco around Exodus Link. This was the government's model of moving former prisoners from the jails into the communities—privatization. But it failed, it failed from step one.

Why did it fail? Because, as always, this government in its arrogance failed to consult with the community. It thought it would sneak it in. Because communities such as Rosedale and Peele and others would put up such a fuss, it was going to sneak in this Exodus Link into Parkdale—High Park thinking that the citizens of Parkdale—High Park would not notice this. Well they did.

To prove how the government neglected to consult the people of Parkdale—High Park, the Solicitor General of the day did not even consult the sitting member for Parkdale—High Park. He admitted publicly in public meetings in my riding that he did not know anything about it. Here is a government sneaking in a half-way house for hard-core criminals into a community, never checked with the community and never even checked with the sitting member. This is the government's approach of providing, as the purpose of the bill says, a just, peaceful and safe society.

This is the government that says: "The purpose of this bill is to carry out sentences imposed by the courts through the safe and humane custody and supervision of offenders".

I am pleased to announce that this year Exodus Link closed. The government, again not being honest with the people, forced Exodus Link to close by not giving it any funds, but I and the community know there were other reasons for its closure which I will not have time to get into now.

Another incident is happening in my riding that is happening because of the government's deregulation. This is the government of deregulation and privatization. This government decided that to own a CB radio you do not need a licence. Let us deregulate. So the government did. It deregulated. You no longer require a licence to own a CB radio. So a 10 or 12 year old can go and buy one and use it.

What is happening in our community is sexual harassment over the airwaves, death threats over the airwaves, jamming of the airwaves so that no one can speak to others, even in an emergency. I wrote to the Solicitor General about this matter. Do you think he has done anything about it? I am pleased he is sitting here today. I see he is running out to get some information. I hope he will and I hope he will come back to this House and say: "Yes, Mr. Flis, I have listened to the residents of Parkdale—High Park and I will reinstitute the licensing of CB radios". Because, Mr. Speaker, this again—

• (1700)

Mr. Waddell: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member but what does this have to do with the Parole Act? It sounds to me like a cheap way of getting some local publicity in his riding.

Mr. Flis: If the hon. member would just listen he would know what connection there is. The people of Parkdale—High Park are so fed up with the lack of law and order in this land that they do not want a piecemeal approach to tightening up the laws in our society. It is all these things that are happening.

It is my area where the three-year old girl was abducted, sexually molested, and murdered. What does that have to do with parolees, you might ask. It is all integrated. Some of these people who are using CB radios will also be offenders. They may even now be ex-offenders. They may be pushing drugs through the CB radios.

If the hon. member will just be patient he will see the linkage I am making. He will have an opportunity to express his voice.

Privatization, deregulation, yes in some aspects it works, but when it means to protect the people on the streets, that is when the government must act. You cannot turn that away to a private organization and the purpose of that organization was to make money on that halfway house. As I say, I am glad it folded.

At least this bill is a first step. It is about time. It is a first step, so let us support it. Let us get it into committee, and let us improve it with our amendments and let us get on in making it a safer society for people in all communities.

I am glad to see that this bill provides for the rights of the victims to participate in the entire process, from the initial trial through the parole board hearings. I think we must recognize that individuals are suffering as a result of criminal actions of others. As well, we must realize that society suffers.

In areas of metro Toronto where there are particularly high rates of drug and prostitution related crimes, the people who live in the areas are being held hostage. They are afraid to walk to the corner after dark. They are afraid to let the children walk to school on their own. They see crack houses operating on their streets, and they see the police watch helplessly as the dealer arrested in the afternoon deals again in the evening. My constituents give me street and number where cocaine is being sold and purchased and the police are helpless to do anything about it.

I attended a public meeting on this issue. What is happening at these meeting? The police blame the city because the city is not giving them enough resources, enough foot patrol, enough money to lay further charges.

This is something else the government fell down on. I have recommended, again from my community, from the mayor's task force, that when there is a drug bust and there are assets to be sold that some of that money be returned to the local community so that the police can continue their work.

Here I must compliment the Solicitor General because in one of his replies in Question Period he said that he is looking at doing this exactly. Through you, Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the Solicitor General.

The police were blaming the city. The city blamed the province. Implementing the law, et cetera, is provincial jurisdiction, so the city is blaming the province. The provincial MPP gets up. He is blaming the federal government. The federal government has to toughen up the laws for us to implement.

The buck stops here. We cannot blame anyone else. A government was elected for four or five years. Now seven years in office, the situation is getting worse. At least if there was a halt, at least if there was a trend to better street safety, less drug pushing, we would see some improvement, but there isn't. So we must all accept the blame. I feel as a federal member of Parliament I am letting down my constituents if in co-operation with the three other levels of government—metropolitan Toronto, Toronto, the province—we cannot bring a resolution to providing safer streets for our children so they can walk to school without fear.

Because the citizens feel trapped and feel that the system is letting them down, they are in a mood to do something instead of just waiting for us politicians. What they have told me at a public meeting is this: If you cannot provide the law and order, we will do it ourselves. They are talking about forming vigilante groups to bring protection to their communities. I have had two calls now, Mr. Speaker, because some people in the community want to bring in the Guardian Angels from New York to patrol our streets.

So far, reasoning with the people, they agree with me that that is not the route to go. My constituents of Parkdale—High Park are counting on this and other bills. I hope we do not stop just with this bill. Looking at all the bills, be it the Immigration Act, the Privacy Act, our Constitution, I hope that Canada again can be a country where immigrants come and they just cannot get over what a safe country this is. Tourists come and they cannot get over what a safe country this is. I hope we can get back to that just, safe society, because we are losing it. We are losing it.

I am concerned about what is there in the bill that is respecting corrections? Where is the funding for the corrections? I do not see it. On any programs that were started up, the funds dried up and the programs went downhill. Where is the funding for rehabilitation, training and skills so that criminals do not have to go back to a life of crime? Where is the treatment for drug addiction, so that the drug dealers do not have to go back to dealing drugs, treatment for sex offenders, so that they do not repeat their crimes?

I will never forget the call I received from one of my constituents, a father over 60 years old. His son was picked up for peddling drugs and got 10 years. The son served his sentence. The father has no bitterness to that, he felt the son did commit a crime and he served his sentence. But now, the son is in his forties and the father is worried that if he dies who is going to look after his son? Because the drugs damaged his brain and he cannot go and get a job. He cannot look after himself. He must depend on someone to look after him. The father is saying: "When I go, what is going to happen to my 40-year old son?" Somehow, in that 10 year sentence, our system failed. We did not prepare that son to return him back to the community. In this case it was our community and we are willing to take this person back. He is a vegetable, 40 years old. If his life span is 70, society has to look after him for another 30 years.

Just this week I received a letter and to protect the constituent's identity, I will not use the person's name. It says: "Dear Mr. Flis: Greetings. My name is—and I am a 29-year old Canadian citizen, born and raised in metropolitan Toronto, Parkdale area. At this writing I am presently incarcerated in the state of Michigan, serving two life sentences for possession and conspiracy to possess 650 grams or more of a controlled substance, cocaine, and have been for the last three and a half years" and on and on.

This constituent is asking me to intervene so that he can serve his life sentence in Canada and not in Michigan.

An hon. member: Do you know why?

• (1710)

Mr. Flis: An hon. member asks if I know why. He might raise this in Question Period and maybe he will get the answer.

Again, I point out this person has a life sentence. Let us suppose the person is paroled after half the sentence is served. What does this person do? He is almost 30 now, and may come out at age 50. What do we do with this person in our society if the person is paroled earlier. I do not know the laws in Michigan. Maybe they do not parole for drugs.

It is not enough to lock people up and throw away the key for a specific period of time. Even with more stringent parole laws and greater supervision it is simply not enough to assume that any person of a criminal mindset will get over that mindset simply by being locked up. I think this is a serious shortcoming in the bill.

However, it is long past the time for individual components of the entire justice system to be tinkered with and amended. The world has changed drastically in the last 100 years and the system which was designed to deal with the criminal element of society at that time is no longer relevant. The criminals have better guns than our police. They have better electronic equipment than our police. They have better lawyers in the land than our police have.

We have for too long been papering over the cracks and putting a fresh coat of paint over rust. It is time, as parliamentarians, as representatives of different parts of Canada and different communities, that we took the time to evaluate the goals and priorities and expectations of our society with respect to the criminal justice system.

When I think of the chaos which will result from individual communities taking the law into their own hands, as my constituents wanted to do, because corrections do not correct and detention is at the discretion of individual judges, I get afraid for the very fabric of our society.

I can support this bill as far as it goes, but there are only so many times a leaky roof can be patched. I urge the minister to be aware of the mood of the nation and act soon to provide adequate enforcement of the system we have and new guidelines for the future.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, during his remarks, my hon. friend made reference to correspondence to me on a question of CB radios. I can advise him that I cannot quite connect how that might be a matter for the Solicitor General. We have checked our outstanding correspondence list and we cannot find anything from my hon. friend. We will continue to check. Perhaps he might provide me with a copy of the letter and I will follow it up.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague from Parkdale—High Park for his submissions. He and I represent two ridings in west metro that are adjacent to one another and the concerns of his constituents are the concerns of my constituents in York South—Weston.

I know many members in metropolitan Toronto share the same concerns. The hon. member has been in the House for a number of years and he knows that in the last seven years since this government took office, there have been a number of, shall we say, high profile cases involving the criminal justice system that has led the public to seriously question the criminal justice system in Canada.

Recently we heard about the Nina deVilliers case, the young woman who was murdered just outside of Hamilton. In the Klaudusz case, the young child who was murdered, the family resided in my colleague's riding.

Over the last seven years we have had the Foster case in British Columbia where an inmate who was incarcerated proceeded, after being released on parole, to commit a number of other offences.

There was the Gingras case in Alberta where a convicted murderer was given a pass to celebrate his birthday at the West Edmonton Mall. He broke away from his escort and murdered two other people.

There was the Melvin Stanton case in Toronto where a convicted murderer was given a pass to Toronto and proceeded to murder a young woman. There was the Fredricks case. Mr. Fredricks, who had a record of child abuse and had been convicted or raping a young child, was released and proceeded to murder a young boy in Brampton. We had the Sweeney case here in Ottawa, a convicted rapist who was released on parole and proceeded to murder a young half-way house worker. We have the Rallow case in Hamilton and the list goes on and on and on. Over the last seven years the public has been crying for reform. Here we are in November 1991 and there really has not been any meaningful reform in the criminal justice area.

I would like to ask my friend about these high profile cases and whether his constituents have expressed concern to him about the crime in his particular community and could he share with us the concerns of his constituents in terms of the priorities in his particular riding.

Much is said in this House about the Constitution and other matters. As far as crime is concerned, how would he rate that as a concern of his constituents in Parkdale—High Park?

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, I have a system of town hall meetings. Every time I send out a parliamentary report, I announce my next town hall meeting. This way every household ion the constituency knows of the meeting and can come out and share their concerns.

In the last two town hall meetings I have not had one question raised about the Canadian Constitution, not one. The top priority and most of my questions are around street safety, illicit use of drugs, prostitution, former offenders who come and pick up a three-year-old child, and not one question about the Constitution.

The next priority is the economy. I am flooded with questions and representations about people without jobs. These are university graduates who have been working three to five years and now are unemployed. They are embarrassed to come to their MP to say: "Help. Maybe you can help. Maybe you know of someone who needs a qualified architect or a qualified engineer".

This is why this government has its priorities all wrong. It wants to deflect the country's attention on to the constitution debate. We must have the constitution debate, but let us get our priorities straight. Let us get the economy rolling. Let us get the street safety in place and the Constitution will fall into place. Canadians will be more agreeable province to province, community to community once they have jobs and once they feel safe that they can walk the streets, that they can send their five and six-year-olds to school without having to walk them to school as they did before.

It can be done in this beautiful country. We did it before. What happened to it? Have we been watching Detroit and New York for too long?

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State of Canada and to Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, I did not want to interrupt the hon. member, but I agree with my colleague from the New Democratic Party that he was going on the wrong track, but in any event he came back to the bill. He spoke about everything. I want to hear more about the bill because at least he congratulated the minister and the government for this bill which has to go to committee.

I must tell my hon. colleague that my people were consulted for the last three years. Three ministers were working on the issue. My people, because of the fact that I have five jails, asked for more protection and also asked something I have not heard in this House today, and I hope I will before this bill goes for second reading. Nobody spoke about the victims. This must be respected too.

I had a case in my area where Collin— I will not even call him Mr. Collin— killed Mrs. Berard.

• (1720)

Every day in the paper we had his picture and a full page on his history. Nobody mentioned the lady's name or what happened to his son who is all alone in my city of Laval while that man Collin was on a nice little vacation after he was in for 25 years. At the same time he was having a little hug with the police but nobody spoke about the victim.

I am glad when somebody mentions some names.

[Translation]

In my riding, we have had a number of cases—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I would ask the hon. member to finish his remarks or ask his question, since his time is running out.

Mr. Della Noce: We have had prison riots, murders and assassinations. I therefore ask the hon. member whether he agrees with the bill or not. Does he want to advance the bill to protect my fellow citizens, the victims and their families?

[English]

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, I support our critic and our party in getting this bill to committee to bring about amendments where needed, fine tune the bill and address the plight of the victims.

If someone is murdered, he or she is not the only victim. The victims are the whole family. The victim is sometimes the whole community. I am glad that he is very sensitive to that and I hope he will make the bill stronger when it is in committee. I am pleased he addressed that.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, we have heard a lot about homicide, attempted murder, assaults, robbery, sexual assault, the statistics and, what is more important, the human cost to people.

I would like to address some thoughts as to how we could have a national strategy to reduce violent crime in this country. I might as a westerner point out that unfortunately generally speaking as we go west in Canada violent crime gets worse.

I do not know whether that will cheer up my colleagues from Toronto, but it is an unfortunate reality in Canada. As to the effect of the present state of the economy and the effects the recession is having on crime trends, common sense would suggest that at least some crimes are being committed by economically desperate citizens.

A study prepared for the joint economic committee of the Congress of the United States about 15 years ago noted a definite causal connection between rising unemployment and increased crime. The letter of transmittal of that report contains the following interesting paragraph: "Table 2 shows in fact that the 1.4 per cent rise in unemployment in 1970 is directly responsible for some 51,570 total deaths, including 1,740 additional homicides, 1,540 additional suicides and 5,520 additional mental hospitalizations. These are not major portions of the total number of deaths, homicides, suicides and mental hospitalizations which occurred in 1972–75. Unlike most other factors which contributed to those statistics rising unemployment can be readily avoided".

It seems clear to me at least that the great depression of the 1930s did not produce a per capita crime increase of the proportions experienced during the 1970s, 1980s and now the 1990s. The American criminologist, George Silber has asserted that: "The general relation of economic conditions and criminality are so indefinite that no clear definite conclusion can be drawn".

Let me suggest what I believe are five probable causes of the increased crime we are witnessing including crimes of violence. First, youth attitudes: a larger majority of young Canadians today and elsewhere in the world is unfortunately failing to learn integrity, personal responsibility, respect for others' rights and property, and that one's right to swing a baseball bat in a free society ends just before the point of another's nose.

Parents, churches, schools, colleges, the media and above all young people themselves will all have to take a more positive role in reversing the current trend.

Illegal drug abuse: heroine addicts commit, I think from all indications, a large percentage of property crimes. Unfortunately again I have to refer to an American study. It found that 237 heroine addicts in the city of Baltimore committed more than 500,000 crimes over an 11-year period.

No doubt a similar pattern exists in our own country. Many addicts in both of our countries must steal enough goods to fetch the hundred dollars or so necessary to sustain their daily habit of crack or heroin on the black market seven days a week. The rule of thumb a few years ago when I was a drug prosecutor was that stolen goods fetch about 15 per cent of the replacement value on the stolen goods market.

Third is media violence. The media to many observers glamorize not only the use of cocaine, say, but hard core violence as well. The Lamarsh commission on television violence, for example, estimated that the average Canadian child, including your children and mine, I assume, see approximately 13,000 television murders by the time he or she graduates from high school.

A study a decade ago by the U.S. National Institute of Mental Health noted that prime time American television currently provides an average of five acts of violence per hour and for weekend programs aimed at children, an astonishing 18 acts per hour. It concluded after a decade's research that there is now overwhelming scientific evidence that excessive violence on television leads directly to aggression and violent behaviour among children and teenagers.

Fourth is the demographic overload. Charles Silverman has pointed out in his seminal book Criminal Violence: Criminal Justice that a major reason for increased crime in his country, the United States, was the more than 50 per cent growth in the 14 to 24–year–old population between 1960 and 1970, with a resulting weakening of conventional social controls.

Relative to the growth of the adult population, a similar pattern is reflected in our country. Teenage peer pressures and the need for the right records and clothes, as Silverman points out, "combined with a weakening of adult social contacts has provided a lethal crimogenic force".

Fifth is social causes. It was a number of years ago, but I think it still applies, when the U.S. National Commission on Causes and Prevention of Crime said that the war against crime could be better waged by: "better schools, better teachers, full employment and fair wages, work opportunities for youth, especially those of the criminally prone ages, a rebuilding and restoration of the tax base of our cities, better housing, reduction of dope addiction and the ultimate elimination of the ghettos". Thank goodness we do not have as many ghettos or have many fewer ghettos in Canada, but I think this statement has at least a limited application to our country as well.

There are a number of proposals which should be made and have been made with respect to areas of major concern. The first is bail. It seems to me that Parliament should be providing clearer guidance to the courts than the legislation currently does. A text was proposed south of the border which was sponsored by Senator Edward Kennedy who is not usually identified as being a hawk on crime prevention. The text seems reasonable and I would suggest that some such wording might be adapted to our own situation. Basically it would say that several things should be considered. These include: the weight of evidence against a bail applicant, the nature and the circumstances of the events charged, and the history and characteristics of the person including his or her character, mental condition, family ties, employment, past conduct, length of residence in the community, financial resources, record of convictions, record of appearance, flight to avoid appearance or non–appearance at court proceedings, illegal drug use, whether he or she was on probation, parole or other release pending completion of sentence for the conviction under federal, state or local law at the time of the current arrest, whether he or she was on pre–trial release or release pending sentence or appeal for an offence under various legislation at the time of the current arrest.

With respect to hard drugs, the causal link between heroin and coke addiction and crime is about as well known as anything in this House. Organized heroin and cocaine traffickers thus constitute a prime target for any stepped up national fight against serious crime.

I just give three suggestions as to how we can make life more difficult for heroin traffickers and simultaneously better protect our most important national resource, our young people.

First is a more soundly based education program across Canada to mobilize parental, educational, youth and religious groups to reduce heroin, coke and other drug abuse. One of the United States has an excellent program which might well serve as a model for parents in Canada. More than 3,000 groups of parents have already formed a parent movement to counteract the drug culture as a whole by first educating themselves about drugs so they can avoid misconception, myth and error in their dialogue with children. There is also a video cassette called Consider the Source produced by the Ontario Chiefs of Police who suggest it be shown to children in grades 4 and 5. That is a step in the right direction.

• (1730)

I might point out since I see the Solicitor General here that my understanding is the only person at the head office of his department who was an expert in drug and alcohol abuse was let go about two and a half years ago. He was on a term contract and after I believe four years that individual, a Ph.D., was simply let go by the department to save a few dollars. They may have replaced him, but certainly as of two and a half years ago, they had nobody in the head office of the department who knew anything about drug and alcohol abuse.

Additional equipment, expertise and training are required for our customs and Coast Guard officials, although I think some steps are being made in that direction. The use of more trained dogs for airports to detect heroin in air cargo and passenger baggage has proven successful in West Germany, the United States and elsewhere. I think we should give more emphasis to that.

Third and last, a senior customs official told me some time ago that thousands of letters containing drugs are being delivered each year within Canada. Our current postal legislation appears to be unique in the free world in not permitting the opening of a letter, except in the presence of an addressee, no matter how overwhelming the indication that it contains heroin, coke or whatever.

It seems to me that customs officials should be given the legislative authority to seek a court order to open and stop mail in specified circumstances. If that law has been changed I will stand corrected. I wish somebody would get up and say that the law has been changed, but I do not think it has.

Finally on victims of crime I would like to quote from an article published in Policy Options of March 1991. It is called "The Rights of Victims" and it begins with this chilling paragraph: "In 1985 Larry Takahashi of Edmonton was charged with the sexual assault of 138 women across the country. After hearing the testimony of the first 16 victims it was jointly decided by the crown attorney and the defence lawyer that enough evidence had been presented to guarantee a guilty verdict on at least 16 of the charges. The sentence that could be obtained at this point would presumably provide sufficient punishment for Takahashi, without unnecessarily prolonging the long and costly court room proceedings. The remaining 122 women were accordingly released as crown witnesses and their respective charges were dropped. The accused was found guilty on the first 16"—I think the author may be in error; I think it may have been 13, but it was 13 to 16—"of 138 rape charges and sentenced to a total of 86 years plus three life sentences. All 16 sentences, however, run concurrently. He could thus be eligible for full parole in seven years and for day passes in as little as two".

The author of that article goes on for many pages about the plight of the victim. I hope every member of this House, including the minister, is aware that Mr. Takahashi was out playing golf with his friends on leave near Chilliwack in B.C.

I would like to say something about mandatory supervision which as other speakers have mentioned is an ongoing cancer in the system. The present system has been in effect since 1970, except for the provision that was added a few years ago with respect to gating. A study about a decade ago by the solicitor general's department indicated that during a five-year period examined fully 5,301 of 15,627 persons pre-released on mandatory supervision after fulfilling two-thirds of their sentences came from the maximum security status. Fully one-third of those pre-released on mandatory supervision by operation of law, that is before the gating provision, I should add in fairness for having earned remissions or for whatever reason, were not considered safe enough to be in the medium or minimum security institutions.

The success rate for those studied who left maximum security institutions is given as 48.6 per cent. In other words, approximately half were returned to custody for either committing a fresh violent offence or for breaking the condition of their release. The same study also indicated that mandatory supervision in its present form is about equally unpopular with the public, the National Parole Board, the police and offenders themselves. The same study also indicated that about 90 per cent of the people in the federal correction institutions "earned" all possible remission in each quarter of the year.

My colleague spoke on the question of parole. I think we will have a very interesting debate on whether there should be parole as he indicated earlier. When we talk about violent criminals we are not talking about people who write bad cheques. We are talking about people who go out and maim, beat and kill other citizens of Canada—and I hope those who sell drugs would also be included—and whether they should be eligible for parole or whether those people should serve the full sentence.

I might make a comment on the question of judicial appointments because I believe ultimately, having spent 12 years in the courts either as a Crown or defence lawyer, the federally appointed judges across Canada and the provincial ones—but we have no jurisdiction there—have a pivotal role in our criminal justice system and that only the best qualified men and women should be appointed.

The present practice, it seems to me, is far too often still based on past political loyalty rather than merit. I would never release the name of the person who told me this, but I must tell the House about a Superior Court judge who when appointed asked for a computer for the office. The computer word processor was denied, and I think that most members of this House know that Charles Ng had a computer in his cell in Prince Albert paid for, I would assume, by the Canadian taxpayer. In other words, unconvicted accused mass murderers in our system get computers at taxpayers' expense but Superior Court judges, at least in one province, are not able to have computer word processors in their offices as of now. That is how upside down or inside out the system has become.

How do we ensure that all appointments to our Superior Courts across the country are the best qualified men and women in the 10 provinces and territories? I would respectfully suggest that the model in use in both British Columbia and Alberta would be a better system than we have now. In essence appointments are made only from successful applicants to councils representative of both the bench and the community.

If those opposite are going to get up and say that the system they have now is working the way the B.C. and Alberta models do, I would suggest they read Peter Russell's article of a few months ago in the University of Toronto Law Journal which basically suggests that the old patronage system is working unimpeded.

I guess I will end with a couple of thoughts on sentencing. A number of Gallup polls have indicated that Canadians across the land judge that the courts do not deal firmly enough with criminals. The regional breakdown in one poll I have here indicates that the prairies were the region where that was the most strongly felt.

What I call the confidence gap between the public and our courts is now, it would appear, at an all-time low. A careful look, therefore, at what is called—and I am only speaking for myself; not for the Official Opposition of course—presumptive sentencing for some violent offences would appear to be necessary. Under the model currently in use in California the legislature prescribes the range of penalty upon conviction, for example three, four or five years, for aggravated sexual assault and the court presumably chooses the middle figure unless the over-all factors indicate that the lesser or greater term should be handed out.

As other speakers from this party have indicated, we think the bill should go to the justice committee. I hope that the more glaring defects, and hopefully all defects in the bill from the standpoint of the safety of the public, will be screened out at that committee.

Mr. Flis: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In my debate I falsely accused the minister because I said I sent him a letter on the licensing of CB radios. My apology. It was to the Minister of Communications that we wrote with copies to our critic and to Jim's CB Club that drew it to our attention. My apologies to the minister and to his staff who were trying to find the letter and could not. That will explain why.

• (1740)

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I rise just briefly. I thank my hon. friend for his comment. I did not take any offence from what he said.

I want to compliment my hon. friend who just spoke on the research he obviously did. I think a lot of parallels could be drawn between research that is done in the United States and here. I think we can take instruction from him.

With respect to the person who was supposed to have left the Solicitor General's Department, the only explanation I can have is that the government has split its efforts in terms of the war on drugs. The RCMP basically has the control and co-ordination of the interdiction in conjunction with Fisheries and Oceans and National Defence. Education and that type of thing would be done by health and welfare. Probably the expertise in the drug side of it in terms of pharmacology and that kind of thing would be in health and welfare. The effort is still being made by the two departments.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his comments. The problem, as I am sure he knows, is that the solicitor general's department and Corrections Canada have a number of rehabilitation programs, thank goodness, across the country.

The person who was working in the Ottawa head office had a good deal of experience with alcohol and with drugs. He was acting as a resource person for programs carried out in penitentiaries across the country. I have every reason to believe, knowing him well, that he was a competent individual, worked extremely hard and was very dedicated to what he was doing. Yet he was the only person who had had, as I understand it, direct hands on experience with alcohol and drugs, which as the minister knows is the reason that a great many people are in our institutions. This man was hired on term for three and a half years, I think it was. Then the problem, as the minister will know, got to be if he was kept on for another matter of months he would be deemed to be permanent and have to be given permanent status. Instead of doing that, somebody in the department—the minister probably did not even know it had happened—decided just to let him go. Whether it was professional jealousy, whether it was incompetence, whether it was to save a few dollars at the expense of rehabilitation of programs, I do not know. Having written to his predecessor about it, I certainly was extremely unhappy that one of the rehabilitation programs in the department was in effect being decapitated.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, without commenting on the presence or absence of any member in this House, I find it rather curious that we have been debating this bill all day long and we have not heard from a single solitary member from Alberta, other than the member who just spoke from our party. There are a number of Conservative members from Alberta who have claimed to be very concerned about criminal law reform and to be concerned about high profile cases. They label themselves as law and order type politicians, yet we have not heard a peep from any Alberta member on the Conservative side and there is every indication that not a single member will speak.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I again remind the hon. member that parliamentary tradition forbids mentioning the presence or absence of members in this House.

[English]

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, I was not commenting on the presence or absence, just the level of participation in the debate. I have not indicated any particular member but perhaps the member, when I do ask my second question, might comment on the silence we are hearing from Conservative MPs from Alberta.

I am glad that the member has spoken. He is a member from another major city. We have heard from a lot of members, Liberal members from Toronto. The member who has just spoken represents an Edmonton area riding. I would like to know whether the crime statistics in his particular community are anything like the crime statistics in metro Toronto.

Yesterday metro Toronto had its 73rd and 74th homicide, murder of the year. It is an all-time record so far. It has broken the record set in 1987. There were 60 murders that year. The 73rd murder was a North York senior citizen. I quote the newspaper article: "A partially paralyzed North York man was beaten to death in his bedroom by an intruder, as his elderly wife ran for help". That was number 73. Number 74 was a motel guest who was found by the maid in his motel room murdered.

There are still two months to go. Toronto is fast becoming the murder capital of Canada. At the rate we are going in Canada we will soon be competing with American cities as far as the crime and murder rates are concerned. Not only is murder up, but violent crimes are up 22 per cent so far this year in metro Toronto.

Between January 1988 and December 1990, while the population in metro Toronto increased by less than 1 per cent, the robbery rate was up 84 per cent. There has been a proliferation of guns used in bank robberies or in robberies. That rate is up 207 per cent. Violent crimes, according to Statistics Canada, rose 59 per cent between 1975 and 1989.

All these statistics have been available to the government and it has done absolutely nothing for seven years. I would like to know from the hon. member whether his experience in Edmonton is anything like my experience in Toronto.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I do not have the homicide, armed robbery and so on figures for Edmonton. I was hoping to speak tomorrow. I might have had them tomorrow, but I do not have them today. However, Edmonton has a very high crime problem, particularly violent crime.

If I may, I think members everywhere may be interested to know that I am sure this one study would apply to Toronto, Montreal or Edmonton. It found that 237 heroin addicts in one city in the United States committed more than half a million crimes over an 11-year period.

I am thinking of a person I once defended on a heroin trafficking charge. Basically he would get up in the morning at ten o'clock and he would go to work. He would break into homes and apartments all day until about two o'clock. Then he would take his $100 from fencing his materials and go down and get his two or three caps of heroin. He would go home and shoot up and spend the rest of the night watching television. That was seven days a week.

Many of the homicides in Montreal, Toronto or Edmonton are as a result of crack. In other words, I think drugs is the matrix of most crime and this influx of hard drugs is the reason the crime rate is going through the ceiling.

An hon. member: Improve the bill.

Mr. Kilgour: With respect to my friend from Montreal, I do not think this bill is going to stem the tide. I think we have to get very specific and go after drugs. I do not think this bill is going to do much about the hard drug problem.

Mr. Nunziata: Just for the member's information, the murder rate in Edmonton is number four.

An hon. member: It has nothing to do with the bill.

Mr. Nunziata: The member says: "It has nothing to do with the bill". It has everything to do with the bill. We are dealing with offenders in the federal penitentiary system in Canada. We are dealing with an increased crime rate. We are dealing with criminal law reform, and the dumbo from Montreal says it has nothing to do with the bill.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

[Translation]

Mr. Della Noce: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to interrupt my colleague, but he has been giving us a whole lot of statistics that Statistics Canada probably does not have yet, they are so recent. But that has nothing to do with the bill. I would like us to talk about prisoners and the bill before us today.

[English]

Mr. Nunziata: One final statistic from Statistics Canada is the murder rate in Canada in 1990: 656 homicides which include murder, manslaughter and infanticide; 33 per cent of those victims were stabbed, 30 per cent were shot to death, and 21 per cent were beaten to death. Those were 1990 statistics and according to Statistics Canada that record will be exceeded this year.

• (1750)

I would like the member to comment. Obviously these statistics add to the public concern out there about our criminal justice system. Is he satisfied that the government has done anything meaningful in the area of criminal law reform?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The time for questions and comments has now expired. Resuming debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Della Noce: Mr. Speaker, I will speak because it was agreed earlier that be two members would speak for each party. However, since everybody is talking, I will take advantage of this opportunity, but not because of the hon. member's invitation.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On a point of order, the hon. member for York South—Weston.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, the member has just indicated that there was an agreement that only two members would speak from this party. There was never any such agreement. Members on this side of the House wish to speak to this legislation because it is a priority with our constituents.

It may not be of concern to Conservative members but it is of concern to Liberal members of Parliament. That is why we are speaking. There is no such agreement to limit speakers to two.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I was sitting downstairs and I heard the member invite Alberta members to speak on this bill. Alberta members would rather see action than talking out of two sides of their mouths. What is happening here today is a filibuster. From the point of view of the Chamber it is a filibuster which will stop the legislation from coming into force if it continues by opposition members.

If they do not want the bill, they should have the courage to stand up and say it. If they do want the bill, they should quit talking so it can go to committee and we can do something about it.

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State and to Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member would care to listen, he will get a lot of information, because I am going to talk to him about the bill, about inmates and about penitentiaries, because I have the privilege of having five penitentiaries in my riding, as I said earlier to one of our colleagues, and of course I am lucky in that I can come and go as I like. In fact, I have gone to prison often since I became a member of this House. However, when I go to prison, there are times when I talk to the inmates as well as to management and the guards. I have had the pleasure of going there several times with a number of ministers, and I can tell you that the subject of today's debate is the result of many years of consultation.

I can also inform hon. members that our people, perhaps unlike Parkdale, were consulted and said exactly what they wanted to say. I can tell you we have had our share of escapes and murderers and hostage takings, and if this bill could at least provide some security and enhance the value of the system and restore the confidence of the people, it will be a success.

I also congratulate the government and the minister for the positive aspects that we added to this bill, but I still think there is room for improvement, because not enough is done for the victims of crime. Victims, unfortunately, are not as well protected as I would like, and I know this from past experience. Several times I have seen cases where people were accidentally caught up with inmates who probably were released at the wrong time, when they had a relapse. Earlier, hon. members were naming names and reading letters. Perhaps I may give an example of what happened during a prison escape when someone was taken hostage. Believe it or not, rifles and machine guns were used, and people were wounded. The inmates went straight to the hospital, which is practically next door to this detention centre, because I also have a hospital in my riding, the Cité de la santé de Laval. The inmates were lucky to be able to go straight to the doctor. Can you imagine that my constituent, who was innocent, who was going to the Credit Union to deposit her paycheque, was taken hostage by these bandits—and hostage-takers are bandits—and when people asked what to do about the victim, the association in Quebec that takes care of victims, the IVAC, told her to take the bus to go to the hospital.

For the benefit of those who do not know the area, the bus at Saint-Vincent-de-Paul goes directly past the old penitentiary, right where the crime was committed. Imagine, the poor woman had to go past the scene of the crime! It just didn't make sense. However, thanks to Correctional Services, thanks to the people we put there and to Deputy Commissioner Jean-Claude Perron, who is to be commended for this decision, they boldly decided to give us a car because the victim's car had been seized by the police as evidence. Thanks to the deputy commissioner, we were able to get a car to take this woman to the hospital, because the association which is supposed to defend victims in Quebec was taking its own sweet time. Imagine, when you need medical care that is not very reassuring.

Another thing: if you have more centres, you get more accidents, and I could give a few examples. In Quebec, the Organisme pour la défense des détenus got exactly what they asked for. They said: "Let petty criminals out on parole, and keep people who need more attention inside and give them programs to put them on the right track". That is exactly what they have been asking since I went into politics, at least since 1984. Before that, it was the same, but nobody was listening. So that is exactly what they wanted.

I think this bill is reassuring for Canadians. I think there is not enough protection yet for victims, but it's a start, and victims are starting to have a say in what is happening. If they have any information for parole officers, that information will not be buried in a file, to help the case of those poor inmates who are to be released on parole.

The hon. member also mentioned that our Canadian system was not as bad as all that. I think it was the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park who said: I have someone who has a son in jail in the United States who would like to be transferred to Canada. I have many cases that are similar. You know why they want to be transferred to Canada? Because they are better off in Canada. They are treated better. Sentences are shorter and parole is more flexible. In some places in the United States, there is no parole at all, although I have no statistics to prove this.

I have also received a number of requests. I know that Canadians would rather be detained in Canada than in Florida. I know that by experience. There have been several cases. So it isn't as bad as all that. We do more than offer condoms in prison. Conditions are quite good. They are very well treated. I don't know whether I could say the same for the victims. When you see corrections officers bringing an inmate to hospital after a fight or an accident, and when you see them walking past 50 people who have been waiting for three hours—these are taxpayers who see these inmates. I agree, we cannot leave this inmate on a chair in front with two guards—but you can be certain, dear colleagues, that our telephone has not stopped ringing for three days with people saying: "I am a taxpayer. Why must I wait for three hours when a prisoner goes in directly? He does not even pay tax, he does not even pay his credit card". They may be right, but that is how the system is. Maybe that can be corrected some day too.

There is something else. My colleagues were just saying—I will not use up my 20 minutes, Mr. Speaker, I will try to be very brief, I just want to get some messages across. Correctional officers—

An hon. member: It's your bill!

Mr. Della Noce: My colleague says that it is our bill. Just because we are on this side does not necessarily mean that we always agree with everything. We call that being wimps. I am with the government. I am a team player, but in my riding there are responsible people who need my attention and who asked me to speak here. That is democracy. I will try to do so in accordance with the rules; if they like something, I will say so and if they don't, I will say so. I will try to work with the minister and with the government to improve it. I congratulated the minister. I congratulated the government. I say that it is good and inspires confidence. I also said that there was not enough for the victims. I do not defend criminals, I defend victims. I will never defend criminals. Where I come from, I have seen too many criminals, people who killed, raped, mutilated children and even threw them over the Jacques Cartier Bridge. One cannot defend such people. However, I am prepared to defend the victims who are alone and abandoned as if they were worthless.

• (1800)

I also want to say that we have people throughout Canada who do an outstanding job. Someone, I think it was the hon. member for Parkdale or York South—Weston, just told me that guards spend only eight hours a day in prison. Yes, that is true; it is only eight hours and not twenty-four. But it is eight hours every day. And those people do not do it just for the money. They are serving the country, Canada, and they deserve high praise from us because they work and have to put up with the insults and bad mood of those prisoners and cannot do anything about it because the law is the law and sometimes one just does not feel like answering back. So those people deserve a medal.

That is why when some of them retire from the penitentiaries in my riding, I am the first to go and give them a medal because they have served Canada for 30 and even 32 years. They have been paid for their service, I agree, but I assure you that they deserve a medal from Canada for spending 25 or 30 years with prisoners and criminals. I am proud to honour them when they leave their job.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I believe that society must do more. I also believe that the service, the police and journalists must do more. When there is a hostage taking too much is made of the one who got free but nothing is ever said about the poor victim or the children of the person who was killed by that man or woman—it is usually men—as in Laval, for example, where he had already killed or raped or mutilated and committed 10 to 15 crimes. And they are still given a chance, they are allowed out, although they are dangerous, to kill someone else. When will it end? Where does it stop, where do we draw the line?

That is the purpose of this bill. This bill tries to draw the line in the right place. Parolees are not as bad as all that. Their success rate is nearly 99.4 or 99.5 per cent—I checked the figures the other day. Sure, it is not easy to say who in advance, but those people do a darn good job. We must stop criticizing them. We must remember that it is not easy to judge a prisoner, a criminal who has spent 25 years behind bars, to try to make sense of his story and things did not always happen as they are reported.

Mr. Speaker, all I ask of committee members and all my colleagues is to try to do more, something to please everyone, especially taxpayers, the public, our fellow citizens who elected us and who want the most efficient system possible and to be safe. When you live in a place with 1,000 prisoners and hear about escapes or when something happens like a prison riot—we have seen that in Laval. We have had prison riots, crimes, jailbreaks, everything in Laval—I can tell you that it is not funny for society, for the people who live in the surrounding area.

My job is to make it as safe as possible for them and this bill will enable us to do so. I will keep on working to improve it even more and to think especially of the victims, which I recommend my colleagues also do.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Questions and comments. The hon. member for Parkdale—High Park.

[English]

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased the hon. member did get up on behalf of his party. He did add some valuable contribution to the debate, but I think he missed the whole point of what I was trying to say. He was talking about the prisons in his riding.

That is not what I am talking about. Those people are under very close supervision. I know about the prisoners who have to go to the hospital. They go there under very close supervision.

I am talking about the people who leave the prison to be integrated into their communities. Let me give the hon. member an example. Again, this pertains to the Exodus Link in my riding over which there was so much controversy.

In 1988, Mr. Fredericks was hauled back to prison by federal Solicitor General James Kelleher because of a furore in Toronto over the presence of sex offenders in halfway houses. He was ultimately released on a mandatory supervision program and angrily refused to go back to a halfway house. Shortly afterward he abducted an 11-year old Brampton boy, sexually assaulted him in his apartment and then killed him.

This is what the community is afraid of and I want to ask the hon. member who is not listening how this bill will prevent these incidents. If it is mandatory supervision, mandatory means it is a must. He must be under constant supervision.

How did this offender, a former sex offender, under mandatory supervision go out and kill an 11-year old boy? That is what I am talking about, not the people who are in his riding under lock and key, under guard. I applaud the guards too. They are doing an excellent job.

This is what this bill is supposed to address.

Mr. Della Noce: Mr. Speaker, I would like to answer my hon. colleague. Maybe my French was not very good, but I did speak about the person who came out and hugged the police after he killed his girlfriend and left the little kid alone. Nobody speaks about it. If the law existed as we propose to change it, these things would never happen.

I was ashamed to be from Laval when I saw this guy who got the whole city upset because he kept somebody inside who was dead for three days. When he came out with his sunglasses like a big shot, he hugged the policeman like a star. After one week we spoke about this guy. When he went inside the jail, he was a star because he kept the police on guard for three days.

That is what I am speaking about. This guy should never go out. If we had had the death penalty he would never have been out because he committed seven or eight crimes before he got out. He was on vacation, wearing sunglasses. That is what I am against.

If I spoke about the inside as these people come in, I could give you some examples. I could give you dozens of examples. I was ashamed to be from Laval when I saw this man hugging the police and I wrote to the chief of police in my area and said that I could not accept this kind of thing because he is a criminal.

Do you know that since then nobody has spoken about the victim and the little boy who is all alone with no one to take care of him. I wish I could do something about it.

This law will do something but I wish we could do a little bit more. I said, and perhaps my French was not perfect, was that the first-time offender should not be there. We should give him a chance to go back on the right path.

I believe from my own experience that 60 per cent to 70 per cent of the young offenders who are inside could go out in a safe way.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the member with regard to the parole system. He bragged about what his government was doing and the changes it was making. I want to know if the member is proud of the fact that a former member for Kootenay East, a member of the government, whose only expertise to my knowledge was in the expertise of explosives and also sitting as a stock broker, after being defeated in this House was appointed to sit on the parole board in British Columbia.

I ask the member if he feels that that person, with those qualification, is the type of appointment that should be made. We have heard about the various appointments that are made, but the people in Kootenay East recognize this as patronage of the worst kind.

Also comments were made by the judicial system about the appointments of these parole officers because of their concern of the knowledge that these people have when they sit and serve on this board.

I want to ask the member if that is the proper qualification and if that is what he is proud of with regard to his government because the constituents in my riding have a great deal of concern about that.

Mr. Della Noce: Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to say to my friend that it is impossible to analyse one single case and it is impossible to have on this parole board all experienced chiefs of police.

I do not think they are all as experienced as they could be on that committee, especially the one I had in Laval who hugged the criminal who just killed maybe half a dozen times. It is not for me to judge, but the people who name these people are smart enough to know if they are doing a good job. Possibly my hon. colleague thinks only NDP people can do that job. I never put in doubt the NDP nomination of Ed Broadbent. Like the Prime Minister said in May, anyone is good as long as he has good information. This bill will provide the good information which was locked in a little file before. The victims who will be allowed to say a few words.

• (1810)

An hon. member: Wrong.

Mr. Della Noce: It is not wrong. My hon. colleagues says wrong. Everybody will be allowed to say a few words and if the person in charge has good information, he will make a good decision.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Chairman, I would like to compliment the member on his speech and ask him to comment a little bit about the process that we have here today.

Hon. members and those watching these proceedings could easily forget that we are talking about changes to the Parole Act, changes that will keep dangerous criminals serving their sentences longer.

The hon. member for York South—Weston is shaking his head. That is one of the problems that we have here this afternoon. They talk a great game here about worrying about the judicial and legal system. Now, when we could get a bill through here this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, you will notice one Liberal up after the next all making the same comments about how concerned they are about crime. Then when there is a bill on the Order Paper, something that will do something about dangerous criminals, a bill that puts the protection of the public paramount, what do they do? They want to extend the debate on and on and on.

I would like to point out, Mr. Speaker, and I will ask the hon. member to comment on this in a second, that one of the things we are not getting to as well by the members extending this debate, is the final reading of the Young Offenders Act. Again, it is a bill that puts a new test into the Young Offenders Act that makes it clear that the protection of the public is paramount.

The members of the Liberal Party bleating about how worried they are about crime are making it impossible here this afternoon to get both these fine bills before Parliament. That is why some of my colleagues on this side, because they are more responsible say: "Let's get on with this thing. Let's pass these two excellent pieces of legislation", which apparently are not going to be passed this afternoon because of the actions of the Liberal Party.

Could the hon. member comment on that?

Mr. Della Noce: Mr. Speaker, I am very upset when I see my colleague shaking his head. He did not even speak on the bill. He gave all the statistics about crimes in Toronto. I could give you, Mr. Speaker, those for Montreal. It is not better.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): On a point of order, the hon. member for York South—Weston.

Mr. Nunziata: I would just like to correct the member. Perhaps you can, Mr. Speaker. He just indicated that I did not speak on the bill.

I do not know where he was this morning—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I apologize. It is not a point of order. The hon. member very briefly.

[Translation]

Mr. Della Noce: Mr. Speaker, I will conclude briefly and in very good French. I deeply regret what my colleagues are now doing; they are trying to put obstacles in our path when we present a bill so that people can regain confidence in Canada's prison system. That is what we want to do and I hope that all hon. members will co-operate with us.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I just listened with great care to the parliamentary secretary to the minister of justice. I think he has made a very important observation and that is that members would like to discuss this bill.

I think what we would like to do on this side of the House is to make that opportunity available to members. The House is supposed to move on to the adjournment debate at 6.22 p.m. I would like to offer to members of the House that we continue sitting and debate this important issue this evening.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order. If this government had any credibility at all, we would be able to talk in a very constructive way about expediting this bill. I have waited patiently for seven long lonely years for some meaningful reform in the criminal law area.

This government introduced the bill—look how thick it is, Mr. Speaker, hundreds of pages—on October 8. The government has called for second reading today and it wants it passed this afternoon, a bill that has over 100 clauses in it.

Is that any way to legislate? That is pure nonsense. We take a responsible position on this side of the House and we want to debate the bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Does the parliamentary secretary have a motion?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Yes, Mr. Speaker. If I understood the hon. member he said he wanted to debate the bill, so I assume that means we would sit beyond 6.22 p.m.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, we have debated this bill all day long. We have a number of other members who wish to speak to this bill. We will speak to this bill at 11 a.m. sharp tomorrow morning when the House resumes. We will be prepared to debate the bill all day tomorrow.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I am a bit confused here. I know the members would want to follow the traditions of the House, as I would.

An hon. member: A learned expert.

Mr. Waddell: And being a bit of an expert, I want to ask, Mr. Speaker, if the parliamentary secretary is moving that we sit extra hours. I am confused here. Would he tell us—

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to move under Standing Order 26:

> That this House continue to sit beyond the ordinary time of adjournment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Will those members who object to the motion please rise in their place.

More than 15 members having risen, pursuant to Standing Order 26(2) the motion is deemed to have been withdrawn.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to rise. I thought this was going to be dealt with this afternoon. I would have preferred that, but it has been sort of talked out by the hon. member over there. Obviously the Liberals want to keep debating.

I only have a couple of minutes, but I just want to add this. We are all concerned about crime. It does not matter where you live, whether you live in Laval or Edmonton or in Toronto, and especially in Toronto. I heard especially what the hon. member from Broadview—Greenwood was saying. I was listening carefully to what he was saying about people being afraid to go out, and so on. Quite frankly, we have similar problems. I am from Coquitlam in the suburbs of the greater Vancouver area. We have had murders there recently. We have had our share of the problems too. Canadians are concerned. As a matter of fact, as some members said, they are perhaps more concerned about this than the Constitution because they really feel this affects them.

The House really has to deal with it and the government has to deal with it. We support this bill. We think it is the beginning of dealing with very hard core offenders, but we want the government to commit itself to some procedure for effective rehabilitation.

We also want the government to be honest with the Canadian people. If you read The Toronto Star today, you see a big headline. The government has a law and order agenda. It wants to pass pretty well a bill a day to deal with all these matters.

As a matter of fact, the government has had the gun control bill. It has weakened it. It has had the Young Offenders Act bill here before the House for the last year. It had the mental/insanity provisions five years ago, and it only brought them forward because the court told them to do it. There are all sorts of other aspects that it has not brought forward.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. member would not want to leave this on the record. He said that the government has weakened the gun control bill. I believe that was a slip of the tongue, because in fact no such thing has happened to the gun control bill and I know he would not want to leave that on the record.

• (1820)

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I only have a couple of minutes.

Here is how I suggest we deal with crime. I think we have to get tough on guns, especially hand guns in our major cities and we have to have another look, not only at this gun control bill we are going to debate this week, but maybe at another gun control bill later on.

We have to look at mental patients on the streets. What is happening in New York is starting to happen in our big cities. You mentioned High Park and Parkdale. I know that area of Toronto. If we dump a lot of mental patients on the street, we are going to have problems if we do not provide facilities for them. That is what is happening in the United States and it is starting to happen in Toronto and in other big cities.

We have to pay parole and probation officers properly. The federal government cannot just keep cutting back money to the provinces and expect good services. We have to get off all the political hacks and get a good parole board so that we do not just make it a nest for Conservative patronage.

We have to look at our judges and not make patronage appointments and we have to have this House of Commons or a new Senate look at the kinds of judges we want to have in this country.

Then we have to tackle poverty and provide jobs for people. We have to deal with illiteracy and child abuse and family violence. That is the way to tackle crime.

We can give all sorts of speeches in this House, and I am as guilty of it as anyone. Let us get tough on crime. I believe we should get tough on crime. All members believe we should get tough on crime, but let us look at the real causes of crime and let us tackle them and let us do it soon.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, a point of order was raised in this House earlier and on a point of order a motion under Standing Order 56 was moved. I believe that the Speaker recognized that motion as being valid. As a matter of fact, we voted on it.

The point I am bringing to the Speaker is that perhaps the Chair together with the Table officers could review whether that procedure was in order. It is my belief, Sir, that vote should not have been taken and that the motion was not in order because a motion to adjourn can be proposed at any time. The kind of motion we dealt with tonight can only be proposed when someone actually has the floor during debate.

I would ask the Chair to review that and report to the House tomorrow when it begins to sit at 11 a.m.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I acknowledge the comment by the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and, if necessary, I will provide additional information subsequent to the ruling made this afternoon.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, back in September I raised in the House a question of a report on the state of the inshore fishery which had been done by a former employee of the minister of fisheries, now working in his capacity with the fishermen's union and doing this report for the Industrial Adjustment Services Committee of that union.

The report found that the fishermen and the plant workers on the northeast coast and throughout Newfoundland were headed for one unmitigated disaster in terms of the fishery. At that time I appealed to the minister to bring in some kind of an aid package.

He subsequently did that. He called it an aid package. I raised the matter on several occasions, in particular on October 21, pointing out that many communities including the community of Lawn in my district were facing particular difficulties. I mentioned Lawn at that time and let me tell you why I did.

Lawn has 70 fishermen. One of them told me today that it is the worst year he had ever seen in the fishery in Lawn. Forty-five of those fishermen will not even qualify for unemployment insurance this year, plus about 70 plant workers in that community, a community which normally lands about two to three million pounds of fish and this year has landed 150,000 pounds.

I could mention another community, Lord's Cove, with 32 fishermen, 16 of whom will not qualify. One fisherman told me today that in his boat he has had less than $1,000 income over a four-month period from May to August. English Harbour East was saved by the lobsters. There were no groundfish, no mackerel and no cod. In Seal Cove, Fortune Bay, there were no groundfish. It was saved by a bit of lump roe and some lobster. There was an unmitigated disaster all along just about every coast down there.

This 10-42 syndrome we hear about, that those fishermen are supposed to be lazy and they work for 10 weeks so that they can get UI for 42 weeks, let me dispel that one more time.

I was in McCallum a week or so ago and I asked a fisherman how many weeks he had this year. He said: "Do you mean this year or the usual?" I said: "Well give me both." He said: "Usually I do not bother to draw UI at all. It is not worth my while because I get 43 or 44 stamps or weeks of insurable earnings and by the time they get around to applying them I am back working again. Sometimes I get two or three weeks UI a year and sometimes I do not bother to apply". I said: "How about this year?" He said: "I am scraping it to get 10 weeks". That is the difference down there.

Now the minister in his bravado said: "Anyone who can show a reasonable connection to the fishery or to being a plant worker is going to be assisted or my name is not John Carnell Crosbie". Maybe it is not when I tell the House the following. Just after he made that statement, he or his department issued a dictum wiping out, removing from qualification, a whole group of people on the west coast of Newfoundland, St. Georges Bay, St. Georges Bay South, Port aux Basques and the southwest tip of the island, and the Rose Blanch area. He removed the whole category of people who, heretofore, would have qualified because, under the minister's words, they had a connection to the fishery, a very real connection. They had landed, in past seasons, millions of pounds.

What is his argument for removing them this year? He wants them to wait until the fisheries is over. He is saying to people down there now who do not have the money to buy groceries and who do not qualify for UI and have no source of income that he understands but: "Wait until the winter fishery is over. Would you wait until April because that winter fishery is, by law, January to the end of March".

The minister by his actions, by cutting off all those people, by changing the ground rules, is saying: "Wait another four or five months before you make the payment on the boat, before you make the payment on the mortgage on the house, before you pay on the car, before you buy the groceries, before you put clothes on the backs of your children". That is not good enough. I say to him, maybe his name is not John Carnell Crosbie, maybe it is something else.

I had to go all the way to Roman mythology to find this one. I say to my hon. friend, the parliamentary secretary, did he ever hear, and I am sure he has being an erudite, well educated man, of Janus Jemminus? I am sure he has. His modesty prevents him from saying so, but I am sure he has. Janus Jemminus is defined—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. Your time has expired.

Is there unanimous consent for the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Simmons: Janus Jemminus, in Roman times, was always depicted as having a two-faced head, sometimes without a moustache, sometimes with a moustache, sometimes as having four faces. Perhaps his name is not John Carnell Crosbie. Whatever his name, I ask John or Janus Jemminus or whoever to do the right thing here and come to the aid of those people, the fishermen and the plant workers who, through no fault of their own, are facing the roughest winter ever and are looking to the minister to do something for them.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I am sure we are all delighted to know who Janus Jemminus is. I am not sure the how hon. member invented this person or what history book he was studying.

Mr. Simmons: Roman mythology.

Mr. Belsher: It is Roman mythology, he says. It is mythology all right.

I know the hon. member opposite is very concerned about the total collapse of the fishery in many parts of the Atlantic area this past year, but I also want to remind the member once again that this government has been very concerned about responding to the people who are dependent on the fishery.

It was this spring that we responded to the ice program with the $18 million payouts for the people who could not get their gear into the water because of the ice and also because of the catch failure another program of $39.5 million was put into this and is being worked on right now. The people are applying for that right now.

This program will affect at least 10,000 fishermen and plant workers in Newfoundland, Labrador, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Quebec and the lower north shore.

I might add that there is clearly a need to develop a long-term approach to income and employment problems of fishermen and plant workers. It is for this reason that the minister announced as part of the Atlantic Catch Failure Program that a task force will be appointed to address this issue and provide recommendations to government. We do not have the answers because it is a shame that year after year people have to depend upon the government to come in with a special program in order to elongate their weeks of coverage so that they can collect UI for the remainder of the year.

The Government of Canada is committed to those who depend upon the Atlantic fishing industry for their economic well-being, and the government is responding as quickly as possible in conjunction with the industry as well as the provinces involved.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I want you to cast your mind back to some 10 years ago. That was a time of spiralling inflation, some 13 per cent, skyrocketing interest rates, 23 per cent, and double digit unemployment, 13 per cent. It was a frightening time, it was a time that we have come to call "the great recession", the worst recession since the dirty thirties.

When our government took office in 1984 we did so on a platform of jobs, jobs, jobs, and we did take action. Interest rates fell, government expenditures were cut, Crown corporations were privatized, deregulation was put in place, a free trade agreement was signed, there was tax reform, all of which were aimed at getting the economy moving again, keeping it moving so that all Canadians could benefit. They did until last year when suddenly the economy started to slow down.

We were told that we were in for a mild recession, and that we were going to have a soft landing. The recession has been anything but mild and we have had anything but a soft landing.

Fortunately, although inflation went up, it did not go up as much as 10 years ago. Fortunately, although interest rates went up, they did not go up as much as 10 years ago. Unfortunately, again we have double digit unemployment. It is even greater in my own area, the greater Toronto area. Ten years ago in the greater Toronto area some 113,000 people lost their jobs, but within the last year, 178,000 people have lost their jobs in the greater metropolitan Toronto area. This has impacted on Toronto worse than it did in the early eighties.

What can be done to help the situation without increasing our deficit or our national debt?

I have suggested a few ways in which that can be done, ways to stimulate demand and create jobs. First of all, it could be done by reducing down payments on the purchase of a new home to 5 per cent as well as using the registered retirement savings plans for down payments on homes. I have also suggested that the Bank of Canada can help by reducing the differential between the Canadian and U.S. interest rates to bring down the value of the Canadian dollar and to let us be more competitive and sell more to the United States, our largest market.

According to the Labour Market Productivity Centre, a federal government agency, we are not competitive because our unit labour costs are too high. Our unit labour costs are made up of three things; hourly labour compensation labour productivity and exchange rates.

Two–fifths or 40 per cent of our unit labour costs relate to exchange rates. In the short run it is going to be easier to impact and change and reduce exchange rates than to make any changes in our hourly labour compensation or in our labour productivity.

Today the spread between the Canadian and the U.S. interest rates is close to 3 percentage points. From 1980 to 1988 it was only 1.92 percentage points and during the 1970s it was only 0.53 percentage points.

We can lower the differential, reduce the demand for Canadian dollars, reduce the value of our dollar and increase our sales of Canadian products and create jobs all without increasing the deficit or the national debt.

We are going to have to do that by narrowing the gap between those interest rates, the U.S. and Canadian interest rates. Do not let the parliamentary secretary or the minister tell you, Mr. Speaker, that we are going to solve all our problems by lowering interest rates because without a job, no one is going to borrow money to buy a house or a car. No industry is going to invest unless they do.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, to the hon. member who has just spoken, I would like to remind him that it was back in 1990 that there was a difference in the interest rates of 565 basis points.

The Canadian dollar at that time was 84.6 cents. Today there is about a 290 basis point spread in the interest rates between the American and the Canadian dollar. These are the facts. You must deal with the facts as they are there. The Canadian dollar is now higher.

One thing about that is the Canadian dollar has been going up. Much to the chagrin of the people in Canada, and particularly the exporters, there are people in this House who say that we are propping the dollar up. Nothing could be further from the truth.

The very fact is that the Canadian dollar is being driven up because there is a demand for Canadian dollars. Changes have taken place in this world just in the last few months. The provinces also in the first six months of this year have been in the money markets and have borrowed over $10 billion. That is more than double the amount of what they had borrowed on the international market in the whole 1990s.

This is propping up our dollar. It is a message that the world financial community is sending to Canadians that their place is a safe haven for money. Money is something that is very scarce and it goes around. Yet this is the thing that is happening in our country now.

GREAT LAKES

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to follow up on the question I asked in the House on June 4, 1991 concerning the Canadian government action, jointly with the United States, to protect the Great Lakes.

Let me begin by reminding the House of the significance of the Great Lakes. These contain 20 per cent of the world's fresh water supply, the largest reservoir of drinking water in the entire world. They are the major source of drinking water for more than 26 million people on both sides of the Canada–U.S. border. If we include the St. Lawrence River as part of the Great Lakes basin, it is 40 million people.

Now the bad news. It is estimated that between 400 and 500 spills of hazardous substances occur into the Great Lakes every year. Toxic substances such as PCBs and DDTs have been linked to reproductive failure, population declines, developmental abnormalities and generational defects in fish and wildlife.

This summer's report of the International Joint Commission made it clear that the condition of the Great Lakes is a threat to the health of our children. It is producing infertility in adults. It is producing reproductive damage, poor verbal and memory skills in some 4–year olds and weakened immune systems.

Many of the scariest chemicals in the Great Lakes can be traced to one source, pulp and paper mills on the Great Lakes which use chlorine for bleaching. Along the St. Lawrence tributary rivers, and the Great Lakes themselves, 73 pulp and paper mills, out of the 150 in Canada, are discharging into those waterways. In Ontario alone nine mills are discharging 200,000 pounds a day of chlorinated organic substances into the waterways.

• (1840)

In the face of such alarming and well–known statistics, the government has still failed to announce a joint plan with the United States that was promised for last December, put off until March and in April postponed indefinitely. The goal is zero discharge.

Even Lake Superior, a relatively pristine lake in the Great Lakes system, is still not protected to the extent it should be within the commitments that Canada has made under the international water quality agreement it has with the United States.

It is now September and the government has failed to protect the Great Lakes and other waterways in Canada, even from dioxins and furans, the first two substances it should be regulating under the Canadian Environmental Protection Act which was passed in 1988.

This week we heard the minister say that even though it has been proven that the entire effluent of chlorine used in pulp and paper mills is a toxic substance and he recognizes that, he will not regulate the effluent from pulp and paper mills using chlorine.

We have seen the loss of wetlands in the basin and now we have Great Lakes United going to the United Nations. This is a binational organization that is concerned about the protection and clean–up of the Great Lakes. They are saying that deadline after deadline under the international agreement between Canada and the United States has been missed. It is going to the United Nations to ask it to investigate. Surely it is time for the government to protect this international resource.

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to address what is a very, very important issue. I would agree with the hon. member when she talks about the importance of the Great Lakes. The importance of that body of water has been understood both by this government and her own party when they were in power with the implementation of some agreements that go back for some time.

More recently the present government has announced a number of initiatives which are extremely important and which will make a very significant contribution to both the clean–up of the Great Lakes and the prevention of further pollution in the future.

As I said in the House of Commons on June 4, 1991, when the hon. member asked the question, members on both sides of the House understand that this is a problem which has been building for decades and the reality is that there are no easy solutions, there are no quick fixes.

There are several things that have happened, Mr. Speaker, that I am sure you understand. But I think it is important to remind others who may be watching.

There is in fact, as you know, the formation of the Great Lakes action plan which has $125 million in place to assist with the clean-up of the Great Lakes.

The inclusion of the $110 million St. Lawrence Action Plan ought to be mentioned because that is essentially part of the same basin system.

More recently, there is the announcement in the green plan of the $25 million pollution prevention initiative. This is important because it will be addressing the problems of the future rather than trying to simply look at what has transpired in the past.

The hon. member speaks of co-operation with the United States. There was an announcement that came out of the meetings in Traverse City, Michigan on October 1, 1991, at which the Minister of the Environment was present with his counterpart from the United States. The announcement was of the Lake Superior binational action plan, I think this is important because there is a commitment in that plan for ensuring that the practices of the past are not followed in the future.

There is also some good news. I know my time is expired. Unfortunately, we only have two minutes. The nutrient loading in the lakes, which was such a problem in the 1960s and 1970s, has actually been reduced. We are making progress.

YUGOSLAVIA

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my comments arise out of a question I asked a month ago about the situation in Croatia. The situation, of course, has not changed or improved. It has become worse since the question was put in the House on October 8, 1991. The issues in Croatia continue to bedevil all of humanity who are concerned for human rights, for human life, for freedom and dignity. The Prime Minister in his answer to the question that I asked in the House said: "The Yugoslav army is absolutely out of control and has caused extraordinary damage both to the Serbs and Croats in Yugoslavia who have lived for some four or five decades in a state of peace and economic growth and prosperity in that country".

The people of Croatia in June voted 94 per cent in favour of independence. The Yugoslav army has refused to recognize the validity of that vote and is using its armed might to move into Croatia and undermine the possibilities for the people of Croatia to have independence.

Unfortunately the world community has been powerless to prevent massacre, slaughter, innocent loss of life by innocent people, the destruction of some of the treasures of the world in Dubrovnik and there is no sign that I can see, and I hope the parliamentary secretary will be able to bring some news of hope, that there is some potential solution. We see almost weekly new announcements of cease-fires and nothing has happened.

There are three specifics that I asked the Prime Minister about on October 8 that I hope the parliamentary secretary can address in his reply to these comments. First, the question of humanitarian aid. The government did provide for some humanitarian aid through the International Red Cross, but reports out of Croatia say that humanitarian aid is not arriving in Croatia. I suggested at the time, and our party has put forward the proposition, supported by the Croatian Canadian leadership in this country that the aid should be routed through Slovania.

I would like to ask the parliamentary secretary to say whether any effort has been made by the Canadian government to route humanitarian aid through Slovania. I would like to ask whether any effort has been made to increase the aid from the amount announced. I think it was $250,000. Clearly the situation is they are heading into winter and the situation is going to be desperate for hundreds of thousands of people, many of whom have relatives here.

The second point I would like to ask the parliamentary secretary about is economic sanctions and what has happened about economic sanctions. We had today in respect of Haiti an announcement of economic sanctions imposed there. The government was quick to support economic sanctions against Iraq. What is happening about economic sanctions?

The third question I would like to ask is what diplomatic initiatives is Canada taking within these days? We know about the diplomatic initiatives before and we fully support that. We know the strong statements the Prime Minister has made on this issue. We know the initiatives the government took a while back to have the matter raised at the United Nations. What I would like to know is what is happening now when the situation is desperate.

I would like to see what initiatives the government is taking in recent days and proposes to take in the days ahead to try to head off further catastrophe and to give some hope to the people of Croatia.

[Translation]

Mr. André Plourde (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of International Trade): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may point out first of all that since the beginning of the Yugoslav crisis, Canada has spoken out firmly against the excessive use of force as reflected in the actions of the federal Yugoslav army in Slovenia and subsequently in Croatia.

Since June 27 this year, our government has criticized the use of the Yugoslav armed forces. In recent weeks, according to all observers, the army has reacted with a force out of all proportion to the acts of aggression committed against the army. However, we must not assume that all parties have been guilty of breaking the many cease-fire agreements to which they were committed.

We have indicated on several occasions that strict and unconditional observance of cease-fire agreements is an essential condition for seeking a negotiated settlement. Canada still believes a comprehensive solution to the crisis is possible. I am referring to the twin track approach adopted by Serbia and Croatia on October 4. We believe that concentrating on a single aspect of the problem, such as withdrawal of federal forces, is not likely to be helpful in reaching a comprehensive settlement. An agreement between the Yugoslav republics should involve a set of guarantees including protection of human rights and minority rights and respect for the principles of international law.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs has already announced publicly that Canada was prepared to join the international community in imposing economic measures on those parties that obstructed the peace process. To be effective, such measures must be taken in close co-operation with all trading partners of the parties involved. Since Canada's economic ties with Yugoslavia are relatively modest, we can only act in consultation with our European partners, preferably under the aegis of the UN Security Council.

If the House gives its unanimous consent, I would like 30 seconds to deal with a question that was raised by the hon. member with respect to Canada's contribution.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Plourde: Economic sanctions should only be applied if political negotiations fail. They must be imposed carefully to ensure that they have the desired impact, which in a federate country in that part of the world is not assured.

As you know, Canada contributed $250,000 to the International Committee of the Red Cross for Yugoslavia. We believe that the Red Cross is respected by all for its impartiality in providing services to those in greatest need. The Red Cross with its six local offices in Croatia and Serbia is the best way to send our humanitarian aid. We will keep in touch with the ICRC and the UN High Commissioner for Refugees to assess their needs.

ALGOMA STEEL

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, on October 7, 1991, I asked a question that I think I have asked three or four times. I have not received the answer in Question Period. Perhaps in adjournment proceedings the parliamentary secretary will give more specifics, so I am looking forward to the response.

My question is with regard to the Canadian steel industry that everyone agrees is certainly at peril. It is the cornerstone of any country's manufacturing and everyone agrees that the steel industry in Canada is at peril.

I have spoken, no doubt, regionally and parochially about Algoma Steel at length, but also recognizing that Sysco Steel in Nova Scotia is about to close or possibly it shall close, and most of the other major steel producers in Canada are losing money. They are losing millions of dollars and in some cases hundreds of millions of dollars.

For one year now at Algoma the problem has been very real. It is a crisis that continues. I do not know if the community can withstand the crisis on an ongoing basis. We have lived from deadline to deadline, extension to extension. The last time we made a request to the federal government was for a $10 million loan guarantee. At that time, they waited and waited and spoke and said we are talking to players. They talked it out and there was no $10 million loan guarantee.

This time we are again on a deadline. We are looking at December 16, an extension, to take a look at the restructuring of Algoma. We all recognize and we all know that there will be less people working at Algoma. I have asked the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology on numerous occasions as well as his senior staff what the federal government is prepared to do. It has suggested that it is still talking with all of the players and it is waiting yet again until the final proposal comes forward.

It is difficult for a community to stand on the edge for one year, and December 16 is precariously near the Christmas season. We would like some specifics from the government. I know it cannot say it will address 2,000 people for retraining and it will address 575 older working people under the older workers adjustments program, but it can do more than just say it will continue to talk with the players and it will help where it can help when the restructuring is in place.

I ask the parliamentary secretary to respond on behalf of the minister. Can he give us some specifics? Forget the generalities now and say that, yes, we are prepared to get involved in tax credits so that employees may buy out an ailing company. Just follow the Ontario government lead.

Will the government recognize the older workers adjustment package and introduce some flexibility?

I met with the Minister of Labour and he suggested that some flexibility is possible.

Will the government offer any assistance in some pension enhancement so that we can get older workers to step aside for younger workers so that the community is not really decimated with all of the young families forced to relocate?

I ask the parliamentary secretary if he can give us any indication, any solace, that there are some definite specifics in mind that the federal government is considering.

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I hope that the answers and information I will provide will answer some of the concerns of my hon. colleague from Sault Ste. Marie.

The government has been actively involved in the restructuring of Algoma Steel from the beginning and we remain deeply involved.

In February 1991, as my colleague knows, the government along with the province of Ontario, Dofasco Inc., and the Royal Bank, participated in a loan guarantee for Algoma enabling it to borrow up to $60 million. This bridge financing was made available to the company to ensure that it kept operating until it received the proceeds from the sale of its coal mine in West Virginia.

A major condition of that loan guarantee was that the federal government would not be involved in subsidies for restructuring. Direct financial assistance would doom Algoma since it could provoke U.S. countervailing duties and preclude Algoma from selling to its primary export market in the United States.

When the government's participation in this loan guarantee was announced we noted that the government will abide by the terms of its policy statement on the steel industry that was made in 1984.

That policy, which is still endorsed by the industry and which has been observed, states that the federal government will not provide any form of capital assistance to the steel industry. The steel industry is in agreement.

Rather, any further federal involvement with Algoma would be limited to the use of existing programs focusing on worker adjustment, retraining, community adjustment and the provision of marketing, trade and technical assistance.

Having said that, government officials are examining a proposal by the steel workers union to establish a training and economic development institute in Sault Ste. Marie.

Although the company has not made a formal proposal to the government, there have been discussions regarding the availability of funds to support an older worker early retirement program, if that proves necessary.

My riding is an iron ore producing riding. We ship large quantities of iron ore to the Canadian steel industry. I have the same concern he has because when the steel industry goes down the shipment of iron ore goes down also.

I would like to assure my hon. colleague that we on this side are as concerned as he is about the steel industry and the iron ore mining industry and we will try to do everything possible to alleviate the hardships caused to the workers and the community.

TABLING OF DOCUMENTS

EXPENSES INCURRED BY MEMBER FOR ABITIBI

Mr. Saint-Julien: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order I would like to have the unanimous consent of the House to table in the House, in both official languages, a disclosure statement on the expenses incurred in the performance of my duties as member of Parliament for Abitibi in July, August and September 1991.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There is no unanimous consent.

Mr. Saint-Julien: On a point of order, this refusal is considered to have come from the opposition, namely the Liberal Party, the NDP and the Bloc Québécois. Thank you.

BILL C-3

REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, the legislative committee on Bill C-3 completed its deliberations yesterday.

In presenting its report, I would like to present four very brief compliments; first, to the Clerk and the research staff assigned to the committee. The briefing materials and summary that they prepared were excellent. Second, I would like to compliment the minister, the President of the Treasury Board, for his attendance and for addressing all concerns that were raised by the committee. Third, I compliment the chairman, the hon. member for Labrador, for his expeditious handling of the committee and finally, committee members from all three parties for the co-operative, constructive way that they filled their obligation.

On their behalf I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the report of the legislative committee on Bill C-3, an act respecting the acquisition, administration, disposition of real property by the Government of Canada, with one amendment.

PETITIONS

NORTH THOMPSON RIVER

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to present a petition on behalf of a number of residents of British Columbia from a number of communities which indicates their opposition to damming the North Thompson River at Valemount in an effort to divert the water into California.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, on another matter, the residents primarily of Kamloops point out through their petition a whole variety of reasons for their support of the RCM Police.

The petitioners urge the government to continue with proper funding for the RCMP so that it is able to fulfil its mandate and role as the only visible police force for most communities across British Columbia.

YUGOSLAVIA

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present two petitions from many residents of Mississauga and other communities in the greater Toronto area dealing with the current problems in Croatia and Slovenia.

Clearly we all have our concerns about the Yugoslav army slaying innocent people of Croatian, Slovenian, Hungarian, Macedonian and Albanian backgrounds.

This petition calls upon Parliament to ask for justice for those responsible for these crimes against humanity, and to recognize without delay the independence of Slovenia and Croatia.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to present a petition today.

The petition is signed by numerous residents of Inverary, Wolfe Island, Elginburg, Joyceville, Harrowsmith and Howe Island.

Many of these individuals are in the neighbouring riding of Hastings--Frontenac--Lennox--Addington. A few are in Kingston and the Islands.

The petitioners are virtually all members of the farming community. They are seeking to uphold article XI of the GATT, and they call upon Parliament to instruct the government to hold the Canadian system up as an example to all the world, to protect it at all costs in the upcoming negotiations and indeed, to strengthen article XI of GATT so that the dairy industry in Canada may prosper.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to present a petition from people in Preissac, Matagami, Val-d'Or, Amos, Malartic and Villemontel in Abitibi who say that the Canada Labour Code must respect the principles set forth in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and therefore is supposed to protect women's rights. They also say that preventive withdrawal for pregnant women is a desirable and necessary option for working women.

For these reasons, they humbly ask Parliament, when it reviews the Canada Labour Code, to consider seriously the deficiencies in it and to recognize the need to include in the code clauses concerning the preventive withdrawal of pregnant women, with pay.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

YUGOSLAVIA

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am in receipt of a notice of a motion under Standing Order 52 from the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I gave notice this morning to the Speaker's office asking for an emergency debate on the situation in Yugoslavia. If I might, I would like to address the central question of urgency which is always the point upon which Your Honour has to make a decision.

The urgency is caused first by the situation in Yugoslavia itself, the deteriorating conditions, the loss of life, the destruction of an historic city, and the potential of the absorption of a whole region of Croatia by the Yugoslav army and by the Serbian state. That clearly is a condition that deteriorates day by day.

Second, we received information today that the United Nations is about to consider whether there should be a major trade embargo, particularly on the question of oil, which is to be debated at the United Nations within a matter of days. This would demand some kind of expression from the Canadian government and from the Canadian people as to how they would like to see our country participate and to ensure that we took a leadership role and were supportive of the application of those kinds of embargoes.

Third, I would point out that we have had no opportunity thus far in the proceedings of this House to debate Yugoslavia. There has been some discussion about trying to get a joint resolution but that has not come to fruition. We heard today by way of petition the real concern of many Canadians about the deteriorating situation and it can only be resolved by debate in this House.

This is a prime example of how Parliament must speak on behalf of the Canadian people on an issue that affects us all as international citizens. Mr. Speaker, I really would ask that you give serious consideration to giving parliamentarians an opportunity to speak on an issue that bothers us and is of such great concern to all Canadians.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South--Weston): Mr. Speaker, I would like to support the application by my colleague for consideration of this matter before the House of Commons. I have received many representations from my constituents about this issue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I apologize for interrupting the hon. member, but according to the rules, only the hon. member who moves the motion to adjourn under Standing Order 52 has the floor.

I am ready to rule. I think the hon. member raises a very important question, but according to the rules of this House, I cannot today give a positive answer to his application.

POINT OF ORDER

EXTENSION OF HOURS OF SITTING

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, last evening in the House a question was put by Your Honour to the House concerning a motion made by my colleague, the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader for the extension of the hours of sitting. My learned friend from Glengarry--Prescott--Russell raised this issue last evening. I think Your Honour has reserved on it but I want to support the submissions that he made at that time because I think it was clear that the parliamentary secretary gained the floor on a point of order and got the question put on a point of order. It has been the invariable practice since I was elected to this House that such a motion could only be made by a member who had risen in debate on a speech, not on a question or comment, not on a point of order.

• (1020)

The question was put to the House and it was objected to of course by the requisite number of members and blocked. But in my submission, it ought not to have been put to the House. It appeared in Votes and Proceedings as a motion that had been put. No objection was made at the time and unfortunately I was not in the Chamber. I walked in as the members were rising in their places to object and was unable to be here to object more vigorously.

Since the member for Glengarry--Prescott--Russell raised the matter I did not stand.

I want to reinforce the point that it is most unusual for that motion to be put in that circumstance. I would ask that Your Honour review the practice very carefully because the invariable rule since I have been here is that only a member rising on debate could put the motion. For example, if a member of the--

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. For the sake of brevity, the question was raised yesterday evening by the hon. member for Glengarry--Prescott--Russell. After due consideration, the Chair is now ready to announce its decision.

I am willing to entertain further arguments, if you insist, but I think the case was clear from the start, and I admit that the request made yesterday by the hon. member for Glengarry--Prescott--Russell was entirely legitimate. I was in the chair at the time, and I thought there was unanimous consent for the motion presented by the parliamentary secretary. However, it is true such motions may not be moved on a point of order, and I should not have allowed the motion at that time. I think the incident is now closed.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, on a point of clarification, I would like to know the Standing Order on which the ruling is based, that a motion such as that could not be put on a point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Milliken: To help the parliamentary secretary, I may refer him to the commentary on Standing Order 26 in the Annotated Standing Orders of the House, published by this House in 1989. In one of the paragraphs on page 67, we read as follows:

> Such motions have been disallowed when moved on a point of order.

There are many precedents in this House for disallowing these motions, as you yourself said, Mr. Speaker, and I hope the parliamentary secretary will read the Annotated Standing Orders.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am still willing to listen to what others members have to say, but I think the Chair has received ample clarification and that there is no lack of precedents in this respect, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. I may refer the House to page 67 of the Annotated Standing Orders, French version, where it is clear the kind of motion presented yesterday was not in order. However, I am prepared to again recognize the parliamentary secretary.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: I do not want to take time from the House so it can get on with its business, but I do want to make this point. If one were to look at Standing Order 26(1), item (a), it would seem to me that it is fairly obvious, and if I just may read the relevant parts:

> --the motion must relate to the business then being considered provided that proceedings in any Committee of the Whole may be temporarily interrupted for the purpose of proposing a motion under the provisions of this Standing Order;

In other words as I read that, the only way you could interrupt the proceedings in the Committee of the Whole would be by way of point of order. I would argue that in spite of the fact that you may have precedents not to move such a motion under a point of order, our own Standing Orders provide for that and we need to re-examine those precedents. I think Standing Order 26(1)(a) states that it would be in order to do that in Committee of the Whole. It should therefore be in order to do it during regular debate.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member's comments will be part of the record and, if necessary, the Chair will provide further clarification. We shall now proceed to the orders of the day.

CORRECTIONS AND CONDITIONAL RELEASE ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Monday, November 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lewis that Bill C-36, an act respecting corrections and the conditional release and detention of offenders and to establish the office of Correctional Investigator, be read the second time and referred to Legislative Committee G.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak to Bill C-36 and express the views of my constituents, because our penitentiary system is a very important issue in the riding of Kingston and the Islands. There are probably more penitentiaries in this riding than in any other riding in the country. There are also quite a few prisons near Kingston, for instance in the riding of Hastings--Frontenac--Lennox and Addington. I believe four are located right near Kingston. This means that many people in my riding are employed by the Solicitor General and Correctional Services Canada.

[English]

This bill represents an important change and a very important updating in the law that the minister introduced with great fanfare yesterday. We were told that this bill was part of a package of law and order legislation that the House would deal with this week.

Certainly the government's interest in this area is new-found. After seven years of inactivity it has decided that something needs to be done that Canadians have been crying out for for a considerable period. I am delighted that the government has finally decided to move after numerous studies, lots of consultation and a lot of foot dragging.

The minister in his speech yesterday spoke eloquently and in glowing terms about our justice system. I want to say that from my own experience as a member, I have visited all of the numerous penitentiaries. I think there are nine including maximum, medium and minimum security penitentiaries. There is a correctional staff college in Kingston. The Solicitor General's Ontario regional headquarters is located in Kingston. I have visited all these places and have had the opportunity to see first-hand the kind of services that are provided. These include those facilities that are operated by the National Parole Board in Kingston and grant parole, including day parole and day passes to inmates in various correctional facilities.

On the whole I have been extremely impressed with the quality of service that is provided by our penitentiary service. It appears from any fair and balanced observation that Canada is a leading country in the corrections field. We provide a very high quality of correctional service. I am not so sure it is the best in the world but it is certainly a very good one and measures well against any other correctional service. I think that the strengths of the service lie in the rehabilitation facilities that are offered, particularly in the minimum security institutions. I hope that in looking at the law and order legislation that the minister is bringing forward the rehabilitation of offenders will not be lost in the shuffle.

There are three basic principles that must guide any corrections service: first, protection of the public; second, the rehabilitation of offenders; and third, deterrence to others. There may be others but those are certainly three of the principal ones.

In the minister's speech yesterday and in the press releases that accompanied this bill on its introduction, he indicated that this bill represented a major change because it put protection of the public at the top of the list.

Frankly it was a bit of a specious argument on the part of the minister. I am surprised that he trumpeted this so loudly. Of course protection of the public has been the primary concern of all the correctional facilities and institutions of this country since they were established. To suggest somehow that this law represents a major advance in terms of protection of the public is a bit thick.

I am glad that the minister is concerned. We are all concerned and to suggest that any member is not would be unfair. I think that the protection of the public is clearly the primary motive for penitentiaries in the first place and it is certainly one that we would fully support.

There are parts of this bill that my colleagues have indicated we will support. We do support the bill in principle.

The issue of rehabilitation of the offender is really extremely important because protection of the public does not just involve locking up. It involves making it safe for the public when the person is released. Inmates invariably get released and for the government to ignore the issue of rehabilitation is to ignore protection of the public. The two are very closely intertwined. We cannot have one without the other.

My fear is that the continual cutbacks in funding for penitentiaries that we have had under this government in all fields will be felt most keenly in the rehabilitation field.

Rehabilitation is vital for the protection of the public. It is vital for the citizens of our country who are locked up in the prisons. We must not forget that almost all of them are citizens of Canada. They will be out of these prisons eventually and we need to make them working, capable and diligent members of society upon their release.

We want them to take their place again in society and contribute to the benefit of our country. We do not want them to continue in a life of crime. We must create the atmosphere in prison where rehabilitation can work. We must offer the rehabilitative services that are so vital in terms of retraining. If we do not do these things then we are failing in a primary objective of corrections.

If we stress the protection of the public and the importance of incarceration, we will lose track of the importance of rehabilitation. That part of corrections is something that we in this party believe is very important and deserves more consideration than it is getting in the current debate.

I am surprised to hear the minister say that the protection of the public is now paramount as though it had not been in the past. The thrust of his bill is to change the rules in part relating to parole. The bulk of the changes that he says will protect the public allow judges to keep an inmate incarcerated for a longer period by terms of his sentence so that the National Parole Board gets no jurisdiction to consider early release of a person in custody.

If that is the case what is the problem? Has the National Parole Board been too generous in allowing prisoners in our institutions to be released? I do not see much evidence of that. I do not see a lot of facts and figures brought forward by the minister to suggest that the National Parole Board has been playing fast and loose with the safety of Canadians.

The fact that inmates are entitled to be considered for parole does not guarantee that they will be released. If the minister feels that is a problem, I wish he would have brought forward some figures to back up this kind of contention. He did not make the statement directly but the suggestion is that the National Parole Board has somehow allowed too many inmates to be released.

I do not believe that is so. If it is, the changes have clearly taken place in the last seven years. Perhaps it is because the good members who were on the National Parole Board before the government took office were not reappointed. Maybe it is because it put too many of their own supporters on the National Parole Board and perhaps they were less than enthusiastic about keeping people in prison. I do not know. But if that is a problem, perhaps the minister should replace them with the people who were there before. It did not appear to have been a problem until 1984.

Mr. Dick: I thought we were trying to be less partisan.

Mr. Milliken: We are. If that is the kind of comment the minister is making, I would just point out that perhaps that is where the difficulty lies. The Minister of Supply and Services may disagree but he can make a speech in this debate too.

In my experience with the National Parole Board, I think it is extremely careful in its review of cases. It is extremely thorough in its review of cases. Admittedly there are problems. There are always some people who are released who should not be released. Let us look at the system.

We are dealing with a group of men and women appointed to the National Parole Board who like us are not perfect. They make mistakes. We are also dealing with a group of men and women, mostly men, but some women, in the penitentiary system who apparently are not perfect either. They have been convicted of various crimes. Therefore the National Parole Board, in its interaction with these people, has to deal with a real variety of individuals. Its success rate, particularly on day paroles and arrangements for temporary absence, is extremely high.

Unfortunately the minister did not cite a lot of statistics to support the work of the National Parole Board. I wish he had done so because, in my view, by and large, it has been quite successful in the work it does.

Parole is very important in our system. It is a carrot that is held out to a person who is facing a lengthy period of time in an institution that can help induce a real desire for change. It is vital. If we do not have that kind of carrot, what is the incentive to the inmate to change his views or his ways or to try to improve his situation in life upon release? I suggest that there are not many carrots available and parole is one of the very good ones.

The change that allows victims to attend parole board hearings, where the chairman of the parole board so decides, is a very important, significant and good change. The minister is to be commended for that. Many other jurisdictions allow much more open hearings than Canada does. We should be moving toward more open hearings. This is a first step and I commend the minister for that effort.

If the system is as bad as he says it is, I wish the minister had beenmore clear. I wish he had stated figures to support his contentions but he did not. I suggest that the minister has fallen into a trap which has consumed many members and it is that we tend to criticize the system because of the mistakes that have been made which are so sensational.

There have been some serious mistakes and there will always be mistakes. That is a problem we cannot solve. To simply lock people up and throw away the key does not solve the problem of crime in Canada. After all, most of the people who are in the institutions are not committing crimes. There are some committed within the walls of the institution of course but the crimes that are committed on the street are not committed by inmates. In my submission we ought not to be expanding our prisons at an enormous rate to hold more and more people. We need to attack the roots of crime to try to prevent these crimes from happening in the first place. Unfortunately this bill does absolutely nothing in that regard.

There are two things the minister said to which I particularly want to draw attention. I have touched on one already. The first statement that was made is recorded at page 4429 of Hansard:

> There is a very real and disturbing perception within society that the balance is all wrong.

As Solicitor General, I wish the minister had done his best to convince society and this House that the balance is not all wrong. The person who is incarcerated does not lead the life of Riley. I have been to the institutions. I have toured them. I wish more Canadians could see the living conditions in some of the maximum security institutions, particularly in our country. It is not a piece of cake. Life in prison is not a pleasant experience. I do not think there is anyone in this House or anyone I know who would particularly enjoy being in one of those institutions. It is a far cry from a pleasant life, in spite of statements by people like Harold Ballard who said that he enjoyed his time in prison. I suggest that that was a specious comment. He did not. Had he been in a maximum security institutions he would have enjoyed it even less. That is the first thing and I think that we tend to forget that. We talk about the good food that people get and the fact that life is organized for them. That is true. But many of the strictures on their lives in prison, the long hours spent alone in cells, would not be a pleasant experience for many people.

• (1040)

Second, I think the minister might have pointed to the success rate of the parole system that we now have in Canada and the success rate of our prison system. They could be higher but by and large the system has worked reasonably well. It is unfair for the minister to suggest, without correcting the suggestion, that there is a perception that the system or the balance is all wrong.

In my view the minister should have said the system is not all that bad. We are seeking to improve it. There is room for improvement but we want to stress the strong points of the system too. They are there and the public should know about them.

I think there is a lack of boasting on the minister's part about the accomplishments of his department. I would hope that he would make more statements about the success stories that exist within Corrections Canada.

The second part of his remarks that I wanted to deal with is one that surprised me. The minister is usually very erudite and clear but there was a lot of obfuscation in his speech yesterday, particularly on page 6 of his notes. He talked about the possibility of having people eligible for parole at various times in their sentences.

> It is a curious truth that sometimes society is better protected by moving certain offenders through the system and out of prison faster rather than leaving them behind bars where hope, job prospects and family support can fade away all too quickly. The rationale for doing this, while well supported as a rehabilitative measure, will also allow us to free up almost $1 billion which we spend each year to lock people up. By doing so we can place a greater emphasis on keeping the violent and dangerous offenders behind bars longer.

The plan is to move through the system more quickly those who have been convicted of property offences but not violent offences. Then the plan is to lock up drug offenders and violent offenders for longer periods.

Frankly I do not think there is going to be much of a saving. The minister suggests that somehow part of the $1 billion is going to be saved by moving these others through the system more quickly, yet in the same breath he says he is going to lock people up with longer minimum sentences and with longer dates before parole eligibility comes up. This really flies in the face of reason.

What he is doing is saying that he is going to save on one hand and spend with the other. What he should be doing is saying that we need to commit more funds to rehabilitation in our system however it is done.

Locking people up for longer periods in and of itself is not going to do that because it will drive up the costs of operating the penitentiary system which admittedly is a significant cost in this country. We need to find ways of doing it more efficiently and in a less expensive way per inmate but at the same time try to maintain a level of care and rehabilitative service that is reasonable in the circumstances. As always in these matters there has to be a balance struck.

I wish the minister had been a little clearer on this point instead of trying to suggest in one paragraph that he was going to save Canadians money and in the other suggest that early release was just the thing for one group of offenders.

I agree with him. The early release may be appropriate in those circumstances. We will see. Experience will teach us something. But I suggest that he must have some figures and facts to back up his suggestions, and yet there were none presented in the course of his remarks yesterday. Nor were there any that I am aware of in the background papers that were distributed at the time of introduction of the bill.

To conclude, I want to say that I commend the government for its effort on this. I believe this bill can be carefully and usefully studied in committee. I see that the government has incorporated a change which I myself had proposed in a private member's bill to the Penitentiary Act. That is to allow access for members of Parliament, senators and judges to prisons. I see the government has hedged a bit by providing that it may make regulations governing the rights of those persons to visit institutions. I have concerns about that. The reason that I had put it back in the bill is because the government was seeking to regulate it too much and it was not in the bill. That particular provision needs rewording in my view.

The minister has indicated his willingness to consider amendments in committee. I hope that that is a serious commitment on his part. I hope he will consider amendments that are presented by the opposition in a reasonable light because we will have some amendments to move to this bill. By making changes at the committee stage we can improve the bill so that we end up with a correctional service in Canada of which we can all remain very proud.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview--Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I would like to compliment my colleague from Kingston and the Islands for his remarks. Being a member who has nine federal institutions in his riding, he perhaps does have a better grasp on the complexity of this issue than most of us have.

He mentioned during his remarks that this bill does not do anything to attack the roots of crime. He also talked about the fact that we needed to educate our society as to what happens in these correctional institutions and make people more aware of just how our whole parole system works.

I wonder if he could give me his opinion on an idea that I have been thinking about for a while. It has to do with younger people. I think students in grade eight or high school should be exposed to a federal institution as part of the educational system. I do not mean where they come into contact with hardened criminals or even talk to them. The hon. member says that the condition is not very flattering.

Does the hon. member think that it could be a deterrent to crime if more of our youth in a supervised way were exposed to the conditions of some of these federal institutions? Does he think that is too harsh or too dramatic? I know in my particular riding there is a city jail. It is the old Don Valley jail. I know that when you drive by that institution and see the remnants of the old institution it is a pretty scary thought. I tend to think that if some of our younger people had an early taste of just what that institution is like from the inside and not just the outside that it might go a long way toward crime prevention.

I wonder if the hon. member could comment on that.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood raises an interesting question. I am not an educator, so I feel a little apprehensive in answering his question directly.

I think he has suggested it is a good idea. I would agree it is a good idea but I would leave it to the teachers in class to decide what if anything pupils ought to be exposed to at that age. The place I would have in mind is Kingston penitentiary which I think was built in 1853. It is a very old institution. When you go inside you are well aware of that fact.

The inmates that I have met with have complained in one of the ranges of having a racoon and rats in the range. Birds fly in the windows that are broken and open. I have been in the range. I have seen the windows in this condition. I know that it is like that. I am told it is being repaired.

It is not a pleasant place to be. Obviously with the cells being just bars, these animals are free to get right into the cell where the inmate happens to be. It is not a picnic being in these places.

I think young persons would be shocked to see what they would see if they were there. Whether it is worth exposing them to that kind of environment I am not sure. If more of the public could see what it is like, particularly in some of our older maximum security institutions, I think their view of prison life being some kind of picnic would radically change.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South--Weston): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my colleague a question about the role of victims in the criminal justice system. The government is proposing that victims be formally recognized. We have been pressing for some seven years now for victims to have a greater role in the criminal justice system. They seem to be all too often forgotten. The government is proposing that the victims be kept informed of an offender's prison and parole status if they request and information from victims be considered at a parole hearing.

• (1050)

At present, victims can only appear before a parole board hearing if the inmate consents. What the government is proposing is that the discretion should be in the hands of the National Parole Board. It should be up to the parole board to decide whether or not a victim or the families of a victim can attend.

Would he not agree that this should be taken one step further and that victims should have the automatic right to participate at parole board hearings, that all too often the victim's concerns are not addressed?

Yesterday I indicated to the House a case where one of my constituents was brutally raped. One day she went to the corner grocery store, paid her bills, turned around and there was the person who had been convicted of the rape. She was not informed of the person's release. There were no conditions attached to that person's release, for example ordering that person not to go back into the community where he committed the crime.

There have been a number of other very high profile cases where had the victim or the family of the victim been in attendance certain tragedies might have been avoided. We know of the Melvin Stanton case, the Allan Sweeney case, the Joseph Fredricks case, the Daniel Gingras case, the George Foster case and numerous other cases where the absence of another perspective or another point of view at the parole board hearing could have avoided certain tragedies.

Can my friend comment on the role of victims in the parole system and would he not agree that victims should have the right in law to attend parole board hearings?

Mr. Milliken: I listened yesterday, Mr. Speaker, to my learned and hon. friend's speech.

I think there are two issues here. The first is the right of the victims at the stage of the trial. I think the criminal law was amended not that long ago. I think it was about 15 or so years ago. I was practising law at the time. I recall that victims were allowed to make some kind of a submission to a judge in writing or something at that time. Occasionally a Crown Attorney will have a victim there and will invite comments from the victim at the time of sentence. It is not unheard of for that to happen in our criminal justice system. When was some change made in the law? I am sorry, but I am not familiar with the technical change.

In my view, it is entirely appropriate that at the stage of sentence, the victim have something to say about the disposition to be made in the case. Having done that, the question of parole becomes an issue of rehabilitation of the offender. That is what parole is for. It is not to continue to satisfy the need for revenge or the need for punishment. It is there to try to rehabilitate the offender as a useful member of society again.

The parole hearing, in my view, is a different thing. It is a professional assessment by professional parole officers of the offender's ability to rehabilitate himself in society and take a useful place there and whether or not the offender should be released on a temporary or part-time basis or into various living arrangements in society.

I agree that the victim may have something useful to say at that stage and that is why I think the government's proposal is a sound one, that victims should be able to go. As to whether they should have a right to attend, I am not sure. I can imagine there would be circumstances where their attendance would be very disruptive to the hearing because of a continuing anger, if you like, on the part of the offender or on the part of the victim toward the other, an animosity that exists. I am not sure that having a right to attend is really going to further the cause of rehabilitation. It may, but it may not. Since the purpose of the parole hearing is rehabilitation, I am not convinced that the right is necessary. Where it is appropriate that the victim attend, the law allows it. The victim still has a right to make submissions under the law under this new bill to the chairman of the parole hearing and I think that is entirely appropriate.

The hon. member may be right in saying that there should be this absolute right. I am not absolutely convinced of it. Maybe I could be in committee, but I think we have a system that is worth trying. We should try this and see how it works. If it is successful, I would be in favour of expanding the rights beyond what are proposed in this legislation. However, I think it is important to remember that parole is not a second trial. It is a hearing for the purpose of seeking the rehabilitation and re-establishment of the offender in society. The offender is going to be released sooner or later. The question is when. The parole hearing is to determine whether or not the release should be done earlier, subject to conditions, so that there is some continued restraint imposed on the offender. That is the purpose of it, and I hope we can bear that in mind in looking at the two types of situations, the trial and the parole hearing.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview--Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I will not be long. I just want to make a few short remarks on this because, as I mentioned in the House yesterday, this is a very complex issue for us in Toronto because we, of course, right now are facing crime statistics of such proportion and magnitude that people are afraid to walk the streets at night. In my own riding, just in the last week we had over 29 break and enters on one street in my riding on the Danforth which is a street of mainly merchants.

The police feel that they are not getting support from the system. Therefore, it is important that when we have a bill in the House like today on reforming the correctional system that we do not just push it through with a couple of speakers on each side of the House, but that we spend some time talking about it to see if we can put forward some amendments that will address t[illegible]hese concerns.

I realize this is a complex issue. As my colleague from Kingston and the Islands said earlier today, life in a federal prison institution is not the life of Riley. It is a very tough existence. Of course, most people in urban centres feel that it should be a tough existence. They do not feel that this should be an easy kind of existence. There is a feeling in most urban centres today that our entire parole system is really not working. They feel that criminals are able to use the system as it exists now to their own advantage. They feel that the justice system has really broken down and they want radical reform.

In my particular riding there are parents of younger people who have in fact been sentenced to federal penitentiaries. They tell me stories about first-time offenders who are put into federal institutions with hardened criminals. We talk today about rehabilitation. It seems to me that it is very difficult to develop a program of rehabilitation when you have first-time offenders in with hardened criminals.

As we look at the reform of this piece of legislation, we should not be governed so much by the $6 billion cost that goes with running our federal institutions, but we should be paying attention to the fact that the system as it is operating right now is not working. With the over-crowding, first-time offenders with hardened criminals, maybe it is time that we build some new institutions where we take the process of rehabilitation in a much more serious way. We have situations right now in some of these federal institutions, and I hear this from people in my riding, that there are sometimes two to a cell, where the first-time offenders are exposed to all kinds of drug habits, that in fact there is no way that a person has a chance at getting solid rehabilitation.

• (1100)

The other thing, of course, is in the area of crimes of violence. There is a feeling right across the country today that those people who are convicted of crimes of violence and who are being paroled too early, without sufficient notice to police forces, are causing an even further breakdown in the system and the public's confidence in our correctional system.

When we take this bill back for amendments, before we have its final reading, we should come forward with something that is not only reasonable in terms of human rights within those institutions, but we must do something that puts a sense of confidence back into the people, mostly in urban areas, who are afraid right now to walk the streets at night. Merchants who are nervous in terms of their own security because our basic parole system is not working.

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin--St. George's): No, Mr. Speaker, the House is far from ready for the question on this one.

I agree with my friend, the minister, that we are having a hard time to get speakers. I held back for a moment, hoping that the hard time would get less hard and that some of the Conservative members over there would stand up. If they will not stand up, we will get up and speak for some of their constituents who are calling, even as we came through the lobby this morning. We will speak for them if they will not speak for them.

There are some things we cannot do, on behalf of the minister, who has all kinds of things to say on this issue from his bench but little from his feet. Will he tell us, for example, just why it is that at this particular time the government is cutting funds for Crime Prevention Week, cutting $2 million in funding?

We hear the strategy of the government: Speak to the bill. All right, let us speak to the bill.

What could be more germane, Mr. Speaker, than a missile from the government labelled "The Proposed Corrections and Conditional Release Act Highlights"? These are the government highlights, these are put out by the government.

The government says this is a highlight of this new bill before us. This is highlight number one: "Protection of the public will now be the paramount consideration in all decisions relating to the treatment and release of inmates".

Mr. Nicholson: That's the kind of legislation Canada needs.

Mr. Simmons: There is the gentleman from Niagara Falls struggling to make his maiden speech in this House. He was applauding and I applaud with him this sentence. I mean, can you get any more salutary? Is there anything more commendable than this first objective? "Protection of the public will now be the paramount consideration in all decisions relating to the treatment and release of inmates." I am sure the member for Niagara Falls, when he gets up to speak in the debate--

Mr. Nunziata: If he does.

Mr. Simmons: --will explain to us the implicit contradiction in terms in that first highlight, that first statement. Listen to it one more time. In part it says: "protection of the public will now be the paramount consideration".

What has been their paramount consideration up till now, I want to know. Are they telling us they have discovered something new? Are they admitting in that first highlight that until now it has not been the paramount objective, that we need some new legislation? Good Lord, I would hope that any government worth its salt, any Parliament worthy of the name, would have long since made that the objective. That is the kind of drivel you get from this crowd. They are now going to rediscover motherhood.

The difficulty with this bill is not that there is a need for it. That is not the issue at all. In this House we cannot find anybody in any party in this Chamber or any Independent who sits in this House--and they are getting more by the minute almost around here--who would disagree that there ought to be updated legislation to ensure that the public is adequately protected on this matter. That is not the issue.

On this as on so many other issues that we could mention, whether it is free trade, foreign overfishing, unemployment insurance, the national railway system or any issue that we can connect to this government over the past seven years or this bill, the issue is the same. They are speaking out of both sides of their mouths at the same time. They are saying one thing and doing the exact opposite.

Yesterday in the late show debate on a fisheries question I had to go to early Roman history to make the point that I wanted to make. I found that there is a term in early Roman history, janus geminus. Geminus means two or twin. I know no Latin but I understand that janus means gate. The term janus geminus came into usage because it connoted a gate that looked in two directions, that had two faces. Hence the origin of the term two-facedness, looking in two opposite directions at one time. When they wanted to characterize that notion in a coin of the day, they characterized it in terms of head with two faces looking in two completely opposite directions.

I went to the library yesterday and dug out the origin of this and some of the description. Yesterday in fun, but making a point hopefully at the same time, I was applying it to my good friend from St. John's West, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, who had said in response to a question from me in October that anybody who was at all remotely connected with the fisheries would get help under the program, the fish aid program, and then the next week issued a directive cutting off at the knees everybody in the western and southwestern part of my riding making them ineligible just on the basis of where they live.

I used it strictly as an example of where the government does one thing and says another. The description, just in passing before I get back to the point I want to make here, of janus geminus was absolutely delightful because it said three things about janus geminus. Two of them can be said about this government and the other one can certainly be said about the gentleman from St. John's West. It said that janus geminus is characterized as normally having two faces, but sometimes having four faces and is sometimes depicted with a beard and moustache and sometimes without the moustache. The third certainly applies to the gentleman from St. John's West. The first two make this government a janus geminus particularly on this parole issue, on this parole legislation, because it says one thing and does another.

• (1110)

Let me give a clear example of what I am talking about. The few Conservatives over there who have been allowed to speak, the three who have been allowed to speak, their basic thesis is the following: first, this bill like everything else the government has done is the best thing since sliced bread. That is their first point. Their second point is: To wit, we are going to see to it that those dangerous criminals serve half their time. That is a nice objective. Nobody can argue with that except the criminals concerned I suppose.

Mr. Nicholson: You are arguing.

Mr. Simmons: The member for Niagara Falls is misleading the House.

An hon. member: Come on.

Mr. Simmons: We are not arguing that at all. If he were fair he would understand.

An hon. member: You are holding it up.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, this nonsense from the member for--

An hon. member: We have not had five hours of debate on this bill yet.

Mr. Simmons: I would not want to interfere with what you are saying. My friend from Kingston and the Islands is making the point extremely well. The member for Niagara Falls over there is lamenting. His charge across the floor out of the camera's range, because he will not stand up in front of the camera, I tell his constituents including his several supporters down there--

An hon. member: There are not many left.

Mr. Simmons: He has blood relatives.

An hon. member: They too are deserting.

Mr. Simmons: The member for Niagara Falls is saying we are holding up this debate. I am sure he would want that on the public record, because that is what he said.

This bill has been in second reading for 24 hours already.

Mr. Nunziata: Less than 24 hours.

Mr. Simmons: I say to my friend from York South--Weston, our critic on this issue, that is the most indecent thing I have ever heard. You have actually held up a bill for nearly a full day?

Mr. Nunziata: We have waited seven years.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, how dastardly can the member for York South--Weston be? He has actually been here as the critic for this bill and is allowing this thing to be held up for almost 24 hours. How agonizing. It is almost 24 hours.

We have to take out of that 24 hours a few hours for sleep. We stopped yesterday for an hour for Question Period. There were some Routine Proceedings and there was a late show last night which is another half hour or so. So it has not really been 24 hours.

I suppose in terms of debating time it has been more like three or four hours. We have had three or four hours of this genuine Niagara Falls-style filibustering where the gentleman from York South--Weston has been out there fighting tooth and nail to hang it on. What is he holding down? He is holding down a bill, not exactly a Simpson's or a Canadian Tire leaflet but a bill yea thick. Let me see how many pages are in it.

Mr. Nunziata: There are 125.

Mr. Simmons: There are 125 pages. We have had three hours of debate on this, three agonizing hours of debate. We have heard from all of three Tories over there. The whole clique over there tells us its concern about protecting the public but it is not about to get up and say anything about its concern.

I use this and I take time to make this point to show how hypocritical, how two-faced that crowd can be whether it is talking protection of the public or gouging the public on taxes or anything else. They are two-faced. Janus geminus rides again.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the hon. member for Niagara Falls rising on a point of order?

Mr. Nicholson: No, Mr. Speaker. I thought finally the member had exhausted himself and his comments. I thought it was time for questions and comments.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, I have to say something. I am going to say something, Sir, which will probably get me run out of this place. I watched this farce yesterday and I am not going to be a party to it today. That clown from Niagara Falls has not got the guts to make a speech, and when we are making a speech he gets up and you allow him to do so. You knew he had no point of order.

Mr. Nicholson: Shame on you.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): As an experienced parliamentarian, the hon. member for Burin--St. George's should know he is getting into dangerous territory here. I would appreciate the hon. member's co-operation in maintaining decorum in this debate, and I am sure I can count on his support and co-operation. The hon. member has the floor.

[English]

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, my experience in this Chamber and the other one tells me that when a member rises on a point of order, if he does not state what his point of order is in the first sentence, he is not permitted to use that point of order to abuse the rules of the House and try and make a cheap shot that he does not have the guts to make in debate.

An hon. member: Sit down.

Mr. Simmons: No, Mr. Speaker. The member for Niagara Falls may have instructions from his clique to sit down, but my people sent me here to stand up.

An hon. member: Rubbish.

Mr. Simmons: If he wants rubbish, I will give him some rubbish. I think we are hitting a few nerves.

An hon. member: A testy bunch across the way.

An hon. member: At 12 per cent in popular support, who would not be?

Mr. Simmons: If they want some rubbish, I will give them some rubbish. I will give them some genuine, unmitigated rubbish.

The Tories say: "We want to keep those dangerous criminals in for at least half their sentence". What dangerous criminals? The ones who are not in for half their sentence. There are none of those, unless they are now saying they have no faith in the parole system and all the cronies they appointed to the parole board. The practice now is that dangerous criminals do not get out until they serve half their sentence. So, it is rubbish, just as he asked me for.

It is rubbish for them to suggest that this bill is going to change anything with respect to how long dangerous criminals are incarcerated. It is not only rubbish, it is a lie. They are deceiving the public. They could not get on bandwagons with free trade and everything else. Now they figure the latest sop to the public is that somehow they are going to protect them more.

God Almighty, the ones they need protection from most is not the guys in the jails but the guys over there. That is who the people of Canada need protection from.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I would urge him to be more moderate in his comments. I know I can count on his co-operation, but I think we are really borderline here.

[English]

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, with respect, if you think I have been immoderate, you owe it to me to tell me in what particular. I now repeat what I just said. There are many laws. There is an administration of justice which sees to it that people who ought to be incarcerated are. That is one point I want to make.

Point number two, I said the people this country needs protection from the most are the Tories over there. That clique over there. Now, Sir, you may not believe that, but I want to say that 85 per cent of Canadian people do.

I repeat, Sir, if I have in the last few minutes said something that was immoderate, you owe it to me to tell me in specific terms what I said and then I owe it to you to withdraw what I said if it has been immoderate.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): To be perfectly clear, the hon. member used the term lie, and that is why I asked him to apply some moderation.

[English]

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, I realize the term lie was unparliamentary. I withdraw that. I did not realize that you were referring to that particular term at the time. The allegation or the suggestion that this bill is going to change anything in terms of how long the dangerous criminal is incarcerated is just not true. It is an untruth. It is just not true. It is, as my friend said, garbage.

• (1120)

Now these people are incarcerated for at least half their time already but let us see what the bill states. The bill provides that the time of incarceration before parole would be altered, would be increased, but it gives discretion to the judge.

It is not automatic. It is a double deception, Mr. Speaker, to be out there saying that this bill is going to increase the time of incarceration. That is based on what the judge will do or, in most cases, what we would hope he would do.

This whole thing is an absolute scam on the public. It is an absolute scam what the government is pretending to be doing here. Do not let that comment be confused with the reality, with the need to have adequate legislation to protect the public.

In committee we will deal with this. We have already said that because we support the stated objective of the bill, i.e. to see to it that the public is adequately protected and so on, we support the principle of the bill. Of course we do, and of course we will.

But we give notice and my colleague has already done so that there are many changes that we will seek in committee because while the objective is clearly stated, the way they go about it is extremely clumsy and a bit two-faced in a number of places.

I wish I had a little more time. I thank you for your indulgence, sir.

Mr. Nunziata: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. I know that my colleague has not completed his submission and I would seek unanimous consent of the House to allow my colleague to continue speaking.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I have a couple of questions for the hon. member. Why would he first of all insist on using the sum of $2 million for the crime prevention week reductions when in fact the Solicitor General informed the House, and I am sure the hon. member's own party knows, that in fact the sum in question is $340,000. Why would he continue to insist upon using the sum of $2 million is one of the questions I have.

Why he would object to the fact that the programs started by the Solicitor General within crime prevention week have been so successful that now they are being carried on in the private sector and by non-profit groups? In view of that, why would he insist that the federal government continue to spend money when it is obviously no longer necessary?

I would also like to know this. The hon. member stated earlier that he and his party are not opposing this legislation but later on he said it was garbage. Well the hon. member should make up his mind. If the Liberal Party believes it is garbage, but they are supporting it, maybe he should make that clear. If they are not opposing the bill, then let us get on with it.

The other point the hon. member made on just that point was this: he said it had been debated for 24 hours, with a few hours for sleep.

Let me put it to him that yesterday at six o'clock the parliamentary secretary who sits in front of me put it to the House that we could have extended hours beyond six o'clock. The members of his party said no. I want to know if it is the case that the members of the Liberal Party all fall asleep after six o'clock? That is what he is saying. If he was prepared to debate, they should have debated. We were ready to sit here all night if necessary. You were in the Chair, Mr. Speaker, and you will remember that. It was the hon. member's party members who started bleating and squealing that they could not stay here after six o'clock. Now he says that it is because they want a few hours sleep.

Is it the case that his party goes to sleep after 6 p.m.? I know they were asleep at the switch for 15 years when they ruled this country. I know that one for sure, but I did not know it was just after 6 p.m.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, that has to be--

An hon. member: He doesn't have the guts to deliver a speech.

Mr. Simmons: No. That has to be the most delightful intervention that you will ever witness in this Chamber, Mr. Speaker. It demonstrated how wrong I was that the man can stand and put words together. It demonstrates that he is not completely muzzled over there and so I withdraw any inference that I made earlier.

An hon. member: He is smarter than he looks.

Mr. Simmons: It also demonstrates that he was listening to some things I said. Fourth, it demonstrates that he did not understand very much of what I said.

Yes, I used the term garbage. I responded to his invitation to spew some garbage and so I gave a genuine example of garbage. If he misconstrued it, thinking I meant the principle of the bill, he is wrong because I very clearly said two things. I said we support the principle that the public deserves protection and legislation ought to be updated accordingly. I said that very clearly as the last sentence before I sat down. I wanted to be clear that not only I but my colleagues in caucus support the principle of the bill.

What is garbage, and what I said was garbage, I am sure that unless he is being mischievous, he understands. What I said was garbage was the government pretending that this bill would keep the dangerous criminals in any longer than it is keeping them in right now. I demonstrated in the two examples, the one with the present situation where they serve half the time anyway. Just check individual stats and you will find that.

Then I gave a second example, where even under the new bill, it is up to the judiciary to decide whether that inmate will stay any longer. That is what is garbage. But he knows, he knows the distinction I made earlier and he is playing a little mischief. I do not mind that because if you sit here day after day with instructions to sit but not to stand, it must get pretty boring over there. Mr. Speaker, I understand.

He asked me first about the $2 million versus the $360,000. He may not trust the senior public service but I happen to trust the senior public service. Let me read a bit of information.

Solicitor General Department spokesman Claude Rochon said the decision to axe the $2 million in funding was made last February.

The $2 million in funding, which is the figure I used earlier, the member alleges was only $300,000. I would like to make two points. First, I submit that my figure was correct because I just quoted the spokesman in the department from whom I got that figure. Second, whether the figure is $300,000 or $2 million--and I submit the latter--the member has just made an interesting admission, that there has been a cut. He is the first person over on that side who will even admit that they have cut anything.

Finally, this nonsense about this latest crime of Liberals, that they sometimes actually get a few hours sleep a night. Well, my apologies, Mr. Speaker. We have had three hours of debate on this. We have waited seven years. If it is a serious piece of legislation requiring some thought and contemplation, why do we have to stay up all night and pour coffee into ourselves and pull our hair to keep awake so we can ram this thing through? We have waited seven years. The people whom it will affect and help can wait another 24 hours, another day or two.

That is not the issue. The issue is that the member for Niagara Falls is skating very badly, but he is skating. He is trying to cover up the fact that only three members, including nobody from Alberta I noticed, on that side have even spoken on this bill. If he wants to know how long it is going to be going on, it is going to be going for awhile yet until we hear what their views are on the issue so I can tell his constituent who is calling me what he thinks because she cannot find out from him.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South--Weston): I would like to thank my colleague for his submission. He makes a very important point. The government has been selling this bill. It has been looking for headlines that read: Government gets tough with violent offenders. That is the message the government is trying to get out to the public. My friend has pointed out that it is nothing but a public relations scam, that in effect this bill will not offer any further protection to the public than they already have.

Today inmates under existing legislation become eligible for day parole after serving one-sixth of their term. They become eligible for full parole after serving one-third, but the reality is and the statistics show, as my friend has pointed out, that most violent offenders serve at least half. In any event judges will be given the discretion.

• (1130)

Would he not agree that if the government is truly serious about getting tough with violent offenders that it would eliminate mandatory supervision, which is not parole but is a process whereby violent offenders are released automatically after serving two-thirds of their sentence? Would he also not agree that it should be automatic that judicial discretion should be removed and that a person, by operation of law, should be required to serve say three-quarters of their sentence before becoming eligible for parole?

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague from York South--Weston and, of course, both points that he makes he will be making in committee and that is why he is the critic. He has led the caucus and has advised the caucus on what the pitfalls are in this particular bill. We will be supporting him and others who know this file much better than I do. We will be supporting those amendments in committee. I know we can count on men like the gentleman from Niagara Falls to see that his side also supports those amendments.

In the first part of his question, my colleague alluded to the real agenda here. It is unfortunate but it is true. This has so little to do with the protection of the public and of course it should. At that level it is a very serious debate but at the other level it is the cynicism that runs through this whole process, where the Tories cannot speak, ram it through and pretend that somehow we are now going to protect the public.

This bill, like every other initiative of this government, is the latest cynical attempt to do something on the backs of some people. It so happens now it is going to do it on the backs of the public it wants to protect and the people who, for reasons of sick minds or weak moments or whatever happened, are behind prison bars.

In other times the government was riding fishermen, in other times it was riding poor people, in other times it was riding already over-taxed people and today it is riding the public at large and the inmates and that is what this is all about, sad to say.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an occasion to talk on this bill but in more general terms on the issue of crime, the prevention of crime in particular, enforcement of sentencing and issues related to response to victims of crime.

I would like to put these in the context of admitting that this is not an area of expertise for me but that I do want to go on the record as expressing my very great concern about the fact that many Canadians, especially in our large cities, are growing increasingly concerned and anxious as they see rates of crime increase, as they see more frequent incidents of violent crime and as they begin to fear for their personal safety in the streets of our cities in Canada.

It is something Canadians have always taken a bit of a smug pleasure in, that our rates of crime and our incidents of violent crime were significantly less than those of our neighbours to the south. As we watch and see these incidents of violent crime increase and as the reporting of them on our nightly news becomes more and more extreme, the level of concern among our citizens is increasingly greatly.

It is very important that governments at all levels emphasize response to this rising trend of crime and assure our public that they can be safe in the streets of Canada.

The first thing that I would like to comment upon is that we need to focus in Canada, first of all, on crime prevention. The response to dealing with issues of sentencing should follow a focus on the necessity of preventing crime before it occurs, dealing with the causes of crime, dealing with educating people to avoid and to prevent crime. All of us I think share the concern about the government's cutting of the funding to the Prevention of Crime Week program. Whether it is $2 million as officials say, or $340,000 that the government has cut from this program, the point remains that prevention of crime is in part based upon education.

To suggest that the program, as the parliamentary secretary just did, is so successful that it has been taken over by other governments and therefore no longer needs to be funded by the federal government in the face of statistics that show the occurrence of crime is increasing in Canada does not make any sense at all. In fact, we need greater education toward the prevention of crime.

We also need to look at some of the other issues related to the occurrence of crime. It strikes me that perhaps the primary issue that we should be dealing with is that of poverty. It is indisputable I believe that the occurrence of poverty on a growing scale in our cities in Canada is directly linked to the occurrence of crime. The more that people despair the easier it is for them to justify taking the law into their own hands.

I think that the government's policies on the economic front that have contributed directly to the increasing disparity between rich and poor in Canada, the increasing frequency of very serious poverty problems in Canada, contributes to the occurrence of crime and needs to be part of the focus of any strategy. We do need a strategy to deal with the rise in crime statistics.

I would also like to say a few words about the bill in respect of how it deals with victims of crime. I think that it is common for many Canadians to express concern about the fact that so much of our system focuses on the perpetrators of crime and so little on the victims of crime.

There is a little element in this bill that attempts to give some additional support to victims of crime by enabling them to attend a parole hearing at the discretion of the parole board. I understand that currently the law permits victims of crime to attend the parole board hearing only where the consent is obtained of the inmate.

While moving that discretion to the parole board is a move in the right direction, I would suggest that victims of crime, particularly victims of violent crime, ought to enjoy the right with no one's discretion at issue to appear before the parole board to make submissions at any time a perpetrator of a crime, an inmate, is up for parole consideration.

On the issue of delaying eligibility for full parole to a half of sentence, this seems to be again a move in the right direction, but one on which you have got to raise questions about whether it really achieves the result that is sought.

In a recent editorial in The Kingston Whig Standard by N. Kershaw, she points out that only one-third of federal prisoners are even released on parole. Those who are have on average served 50 per cent of their sentence. In other words, what the change in the law that is proposed is doing is simply recognizing the status quo by increasing to what is already the average sentence for those who are paroled to 50 per cent of the sentence.

This raises other broader questions though. I understand that the Law Reform Commission has done some work on these issues. The average Canadian is concerned that sentencing is relatively meaningless when the fact that one-third or one-half of a sentence is served is becoming so common place. The average Canadian thinks that the determination of sentence ought to be very closely linked to the amount of sentence that is actually served. After seven and a half years in power, surely the government is by now capable of dealing with some of these issues, of grappling with them. What we need to be addressing is the issue of whether our current sentencing procedures and time frames are adequate to the reality of dealing with the criminal justice system as it now stands.

• (1140)

One of the things that has always concerned me is the fact that sentencing, because of the discretionary nature of sentencing, often leads to widely divergent results in cases in which the facts are very similar, depending upon what judge happens to have jurisdiction over sentencing in a particular case. If our system of justice is to retain the respect which it deserves and which it should have, surely some consistency in sentencing between judges at least, between regions, between sets of circumstances, should be the rule rather than the exception.

Part of the proposal that the government has included in this bill is delaying eligibility for full parole to one half of sentence, subject to judicial discretion, in other words, a further broadening of the discretion the judges may exercise in the question of sentencing.

Discretion number one, what level of sentence to require,and discretion number two, whether to impose the one-half of sentence requirement before parole can be granted.

I suggest that adding to the discretion of judges is a questionable policy where there already exists quite a large divergence in experience between sentencing as it occurs by judges in different courts in different communities.

The other point that I would like to raise is the issue of granting passes from prisons. The proposal is that the National Parole Board must approve passes for inmates serving mandatory life sentences or inmates convicted of violent offences, serious drug offences and sex offences against children. In addition, no unescorted passes will be allowed for those classified as maximum security inmates.

I would like to indicate that these changes meet some of the concerns that exist in incidents that have been generally reported in the media. Serious offenders are able to enjoy golf at federal taxpayer expense, they are able to visit local malls on their birthdays, despite the fact that they are serving sentences for having committed serious crimes. The raising of the discretion from the warden to the National Parole Board should be seen as a move in the right direction to addressing concerns that are raised about day passes.

In conclusion, I would like to refer again to the editorial from The Kingston Whig Standard in which the executive director of the John Howard Society of Ontario, Graham Stewart, is quoted as saying: "It is very difficult to see how the changes will actually make any difference to the amount of time served". Mr. Stewart goes on to say: "There is not a shred of initiative in these proposals that is going to reduce the risk to the community one iota".

I suppose every community in Canada has faced the problem of crimes resulting from people who have been released on parole, people who are on day passes, and so on. Ottawa is no exception. We have had some very well publicized cases, very tragic cases, along those lines.

When I look at this legislation, what worries me is that it is an attempt by a government that has had many years to come to grips with essential problems in our criminal justice system, to do so in a very ad hoc way, without the kind of broad based reform that is essential, so that it can put together one page of its campaign for re-election that says: "Look what we have done to address the issue of crime". I said at the beginning that I am no expert in this area of the law, but I am very concerned about issues of crime and justice because those in a way are the essential issues of any liberal democracy.

The fact that people are afraid to walk on the streets of our major cities ought to be something that preoccupies each member of the House of Commons on a daily basis. It is not acceptable and it should not be the case.

To come forward with a package of ad hoc reforms so that the Solicitor General can appear on The Nation's Business and talk about what he is doing to address the concerns of crime is just not good enough. I applaud our critic, the member for York South--Weston, for the initiatives he has taken on this bill. I think we are right to support it. Any improvement is worth supporting. It just does not go far enough. It just does not come soon enough and it does not address the need for comprehensive reform that so many Canadians have recognized and are calling for.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South--Weston): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague for his very timely submissions. I know that his constituents are as concerned as mine are about crime and safety in the streets.

I know that in the Ottawa area the concern was highlighted during the Celia Ruygrok incident several years ago. An individual by the name of Alan Sweeney was paroled to a half-way house here in the Ottawa area. He had been serving time for a 1975 mutilation murder of a woman. It was later shown that he manipulated the system. He was released to a half-way house where he brutally murdered a young woman by the name of Celia Ruygrok. I know that the Ruygrok family has participated and has been urging the government to bring in amendments.

I recall the Ruygrok family coming before the justice committee a number of years ago pleading with the committee to do something. In fact, the committee did put together a rather extensive report entitled Taking Responsibility. I was part of that committee. We travelled the country and came up with 97 recommendations. This particular report has been sitting on the shelf for the last three years and the government has not taken any action whatsoever. Now that they are at 12 per cent in public opinion, now that they are a desperate government, a desperate political party, they have decided to take some action or introduce some legislation. But it is all smoke and mirrors.

We have not only had the Sweeney case but a number of other high profile cases that have caused the public to be that much more concerned about their security and the security of their families.

In my community in the Toronto area, there was a fellow by the name of Melvin Stanton. He was a three time rapist and was convicted of killing a 14-year old girl. That was his crime. He was sent to a federal penitentiary and then in 1988, he was given a 48-hour unescorted pass, unescorted. "You are free my friend. Go take a drive down Yonge Street. Go into whatever bar you want to go into. We know you are serving a life sentence for murdering a 14-year old girl, but here is an unescorted pass from Kingston Penitentiary". He was booked into a Toronto half-way house. I am surprised, given the circumstances, they did not book him in at the Royal York or the Hilton in downtown Toronto. I do not make light of the situation.

He then proceeded to kill a young woman by the name of Tema Conter. It is the Ruygrok, the Conter, the Fredricks cases and the Gingras cases that my friend referred to, where he was given a pass to go to the West Edmonton Mall to celebrate his birthday, and the George Foster case in British Columbia that caused the public to throw their arms up and say: "What is this government doing? Has it not learned its lessons?"

I would like my friend to comment on the impact that the Ruygrok case had on the Ottawa community. I know it was a national story. In particular, a lot of people in the Ottawa area were especially touched by this particular incident. I know he may have had dealings with the family of that particular victim.

• (1150)

Mr. Manley: Mr. Speaker, I am grateful for those comments because I think they bring into relief exactly the concerns that many of our constituents have. There is a suspicion that this system has somehow crumbled around them and that they are living in peril as a result of it.

The Ruygrok case was very well known in the national capital area. My friend is right. I know the victim's father. I have met with him on numerous occasions. He has in many ways committed much of his time to issues of criminal justice reform, both in areas of parole as well as firearms control. His dedication is very apparent to anyone who meets him.

The Celia Ruygrok case was made that much more tragic by virtue of the fact that the victim was a very highly motivated and dedicated young woman who was a student of criminology. She had undertaken work on behalf of the John Howard Society in the context of a half-way house. She was tragically and uselessly murdered while she was the sole person on duty in the house by this character who should never have been released from prison on parole at all. I think in retrospect it is easy to say he should not have been released.

That does a number of things to a community. First of all, it raises these underlying concerns about whether there is integrity in the system or whether the system has somehow run amok, allowing people who are genuinely and clearly dangerous out and about on the streets in vast numbers. I suspect that is not true but I think the perception is that there are a lot of people out there. It does not take a lot of people. It only takes a few like Sweeney to cause people to have continuing fear and lack of trust in the system.

The other thing that it does is to create a great deal of intolerance on the part of the public as to the real motives behind our justice system. These are only partial deterrents but they include the need to rehabilitate those who have committed crimes including violent crimes. The result of a case like the Celia Ruygrok case is that people become very intolerant of efforts to rehabilitate. What that imposes on the parole and justice system is an obligation to exercise very great care that the rehabilitation objectives are not undermined by incidents such as that one where gross and violent crimes are committed.

I noticed in the proposal that the government now wants to make the protection of the public the paramount consideration of all decisions relating to treatment and release of inmates. I should have thought that in the case of violent criminals the protection of the public should always be and should always have been the paramount concern.

What we do with people who have committed violent crimes has got to be seen by all members of the public as addressing their fundamental right to safety in public places and in their homes in Canada. We engage in talk in this country day in and day out about rights and privileges and whose rights are being transgressed. After everything, the fundamental right should be the safety of the person in the home and in public areas.

I hope that we can move toward reforms that give Canadians much greater assurance that indeed that priority is being enforced.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, I would like to now ask about the role of victims in the criminal justice system.

My colleague from the Hamilton area will be speaking a little later in the debate and she will be talking about one particular case. I would like to just comment briefly on the Pollington case and the John Rallo case.

A couple approached me about the Pollington case a year ago. Their daughter and their two grandchildren were murdered by their son-in-law. This was about 14 years ago. The person to this day does not admit to the murders. He has not assisted the police or the family to locate the body of the second child. Yet this person was granted day passes into the Hamilton area so there is a chance that this family will come face to face with this individual who was given a life sentence.

This family has been told that they cannot participate as a matter of right at any National Parole Board hearing. This individual is John Rallo. He will be eligible for judicial review next year after serving 15 years of his sentence. This means that even though he was given a life sentence for the murder of his wife and two children he will have the opportunity to have a judge and a jury decide whether his parole eligibility should be reduced to 15 years. The Pollington family has been told that they have no right whatsoever to attend that hearing in order to make submissions.

I would like to ask my friend whether he agrees that families of victims should be given the right to attend National Parole Board hearings--

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The time for questions and comments has now expired.

Mr. Manley: Surely now I can reply.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent to extend the period of questions and comments?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There is no unanimous consent.

Before resuming debate, I want to inform the House that the first five hours of the debate have now expired and the time for speeches is a maximum of 10 minutes.

Mr. Manley: Mr. Speaker, I think I must have misunderstood because I cannot believe the Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General would inhibit me from making a brief comment in response. I think he was saying that I had consent. I would just like to clarify that indeed the Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General of Canada does not want me to respond to that question.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I heard a no. I cannot see the entire House at once. However, when seeking unanimous consent, if the Speaker hears a no, he must conclude there is no unanimous consent. I cannot see the entire House at the same time. I heard a no in the House, and that is why I could not assume there was unanimous consent.

[English]

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew--Nipissing--Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I want to say first of all that the proposed corrections and conditional releases act has taken seven long years for this government to bring forward. It has talked about it. It wants to be on top of the heap, running down the road, waving the flag and trying to make Canadians believe that they are the greatest law-abiding citizens and putting laws into place that are going to be tough for criminals and so on. It has waited seven years to bring this important piece of legislation before the House.

Then the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice has the gall to stand up in this House today and berate Liberals for not wanting to debate this bill last night. Surely the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice should not believe at this stage in his political career that the loudness of his voice makes up for the lack of rationale in his argument.

An hon. member: Let's get on with it.

Mr. Hopkins: He wants to get on with it because he does not want to hear about his own comments. He did not want to allow my friend for Ottawa South to comment either because the government does not want to hear those answers.

This bill is such weak medicine that none of the law and order abiding MPs on the government side from western Canada and various parts of this country are speaking on it at all. One can only assume that they are thoroughly disgusted with the content of this bill. They are not trying to sell it so they must be fed up with it.

The government wants headlines to prove that they are trying to be tough when in practice their actions make them look like a bunch of pussycats.

• (1200)

There is one thing that I find to be really revolting about this bill. It does zero in a great deal on the parole board operations. For the first time victims of crime will be formally recognized in the federal corrections and parole processes. For example, victims will be kept informed of an offender's prison and parole status if they request. That is natural. There is nothing tough about that. It is just plain common sense that they should be kept informed.

Information from victims can be considered at a parole hearing. It should be mandatory that information from victims be heard at a parole hearing. Where are the rights of the victims? I have sat here and heard this government over many years talk about the rights of the victim. Now it comes forward after seven years with a piece of legislation that can only be compared with an elephant giving birth to a mouse because of its intent and its content.

Another part that I find really revolting about this legislation is that the victims can attend a parole hearing at the discretion of the parole board rather than at the discretion of the victim. Again I ask this government, where is their big argument about the rights of the victim? The victim should automatically be allowed to appear before the parole board. Who is calling the shots? Is it the criminal in prison or the person who has been the victim of crime?

Another point says that judges will be able to lengthen the time that violent offenders andserious drug offenders spend in prison by delaying eligibility for full parole to one-half of the sentence. This provision is called "judicial determination". In other words, it is at the discretion of the judge.

Many other people have made the point that while they could be considered for parole after serving one-third of their sentence, they had usually served one-half of their sentence anyway by the time everything was settled. So there is no change here in practice. The government is simply putting into law something that has already existed in practice for a long time. Then it calls that progress.

They should be automatically made to serve one-half of their sentence and it should not be left to the discretion of the judge. If one is going to be tough, then put the law into practice. Sometimes they serve that half of their sentence before the hearing even comes before the parole board.

Under existing law violent offenders who are considered at high risk to commit new violent crimes if released may be kept in prison for their entire sentence. Serious drug offences and sex offences against children will be added to this category. That is common sense. Why would we not do that? There is no great revolutionary concept in that at all. It is something like Bill C–30 which we debated in this House a while back and will be again. It is still before the House. In that bill people who were declared innocent because of insanity were categorized into those who were safe to be let out on to the streets and those who were not.

This legislation was brought in because the Supreme Court of Canada told the Government of Canada that it only had six months to bring it in because of the charter conditions.

The government did not have it done in six months. It has now asked for an extension of time and has been granted it. This is another case where this government talks a lot about its actions and yet is dragging its feet.

It has taken seven years to bring Bill C–36 forward. It took more than the six months allowed to it by the Supreme Court to bring in Bill C–30.

Correctional resources in this bill will now be focused on violent criminals by streamlining the parole process for first–time offenders convicted of non–violent crimes. If these inmates are considered unlikely to commit a crime they will be eligible for release at one–third of the sentence. That is the existing practice. There is no change there.

What is the big deal? These offenders will remain under supervision in the community until their sentence is complete. This provision is called the accelerated review.

On the business of cutting funding for crime prevention week this is the week for crime prevention. It is an attempt. It is also a privilege or a chance for the law enforcement agencies of the country to relate to the public at large and to carry on a conversation and communication with communities right across the country to talk about crime solving and to make people aware of the types of crimes that are going on.

It is to make them aware of what is being attempted to prevent crime in the streets, to get the public behind the law enforcement agencies of this country, to tackle the problems of the street warfare that is going on and the fact that our streets are becoming unsafe for people to walk around at night.

The government has cut the funding for this crime prevention week program. That is the kind of backing it is giving to the law enforcement agencies of this country. It is saying that this is no longer necessary. Its excuse is that other levels of government have taken a greater interest in it.

We are in the Parliament of Canada here. It is the duty, the responsibility and the necessity for the federal Government of Canada to be the leader in solving crimes in the nation, to make our streets safe in the nation. It is the federal government that must deal with the international relationships around the world that are causing problems with crime in Canada through drug trade and so on.

The Government of Canada is neglecting to give the law enforcement agencies of this country the chance to relate to the general public and get their support behind them to try to enforce the laws that are already on the books to make the streets safe for Canadians.

We do not want to have our streets Americanized. We have seen enough of that. We want this nation to remain safe for people and it is only going to do that if the government shows its muscle. It has to show that it is going to enforce the law and it is going to support its law enforcement agencies across the country, particularly when they are dealing with the international community.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There is a five–minute question and comment period.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody––Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the member who last spoke a question. He accused the government of being a pussycat in this. He said: "The actions sure make the government look like pussycats".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There is no question or comment now. That was only for a maximum of ten minutes.

[Translation]

Mr. Kaplan: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak on a point of order. Perhaps we could have unanimous consent for some questions on the interesting point raised earlier by my colleague.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member asks if there is unanimous consent for a period of questions and comments.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There is no unanimous consent.

• (1210)

[English]

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to make some comments on this bill. This is a very important piece of legislation for Canadians and I think it is one that most Canadians, certainly the people I represent, will be very interested in. It changes the eligibility for day parole. A person was eligible for day parole after one-sixth of the sentence had been served. That has been changed to six months prior to the eligibility for full parole. One of its important provisions for violent offenders is moving the parole date from one-third to one-half.

All these are good measures. The reason that government members have not been on their feet today is that they want this bill to progress and go to committee. Obviously there are those who have some problems with that for their own reasons.

Last night as you know it was impossible to get the members of the Liberal Party for whatever reasons to sit beyond six o'clock. I am now going to give them the opportunity to sit through lunch as well.

I move:

That the House continue to sit through the lunch hour for the purpose of continuing consideration of Bill C-36, an act respecting corrections and the conditional release and detention of offenders and to establish the office of Correctional Investigator.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Does the hon. member have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I heard clearly there was no unanimous consent.

[English]

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, I do not know if the parliamentary secretary was intending to continue his speech. We are down to 10-minute turns and I am very glad to have even a brief opportunity to speak on the bill.

I would like to pick up where my colleague left off but I want also to reinforce the general theme from our side. There is enough critical analysis of it to back us up as members of the opposition on this. This is nothing more than a public relations gesture coming seven years after a government promise to get tough on crime with a measure which will give them a point for campaign literature--

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I apologize for interrupting the hon. member but I made a mistake just a minute ago. The hon. member does not need unanimous consent to table his motion. I have no choice but to put the question before the House.

The hon. parliamentary secretary moved:

That the House continue to sit through the lunch hour for the purpose of continuing consideration of Bill C-36, an act respecting corrections and the conditional release and detention of offenders and to establish the office of Correctional Investigator.

Fewer than 15 members having risen, pursuant to Standing Order 26(2) the motion is adopted.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Waddell: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. I rise to get clarification of House business.

We are ready to proceed with gun control. All parties are supporting this bill. I am not quite sure what we are doing in this House. Perhaps the Liberal critic or the Whip could give us some idea as to how--

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It is not up to the Chair to determine the business of the House. Since this morning, we have been considering Bill C-36, and the Chair has no authority to end the debate.

The House has just adopted a motion to continue sitting during lunch time.

[English]

Mr. Nunziata: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. The NDP critic has made a comment and I would appreciate the opportunity to respond.

The NDP and the Conservatives have chosen not to participate in this debate--

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I would appreciate the co-operation of both sides of the House. I think the situation is quite clear and that we are still on Bill C-36.

Mrs. Venne: Mr. Speaker, when you asked members opposed to the motion to rise, I asked my colleague here who belongs to the New Democratic Party whether it was about objecting to sitting during lunch time. My colleague said no, so I did not rise. I am sorry but I wanted to vote, and I wanted--

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I took the trouble to read the motion very slowly, so that all members of this House would understand what the motion was about.

I understand the hon. member's position, but the House has spoken, and I cannot reverse a decision made by the House.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, before I take the floor, I would like to know whether all this arguing will be deducted from my speaking time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I can assure the hon. member that he will have his full 10 minutes.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, in that case I would like to say that for the opposition it is not a matter of objecting to a bill like this one which provides so little. We want to take this opportunity to make it clear to Canadians that for a government that for seven years has been promising Canadians it would tighten up the judicial system, it has actually done very little.

In fact, many comments from non-partisan sources imply that nothing will change and that no major changes will be made as a result of the bill before the House.

[English]

We cannot support the bill without making it clear to the Government of Canada how much we object to their failure to deal with serious problems within the criminal justice system of our country.

When I was Solicitor General I had the honour to propose and sponsor the first crime prevention week in Canada. I watched the program grow during our administration to make a very worth-while contribution to reducing the amount of crime in Canadian society.

I was also the first Solicitor General to devote funds to support victims. I called for the first victims' conference which took place--I still remember all of it very well--in the Park Plaza Hotel in the city of Toronto in 1980.

From that event a tremendous amount of understanding developed of the plight of the victim in the criminal justice system. This bill makes a very small addition to the measures we previously had to bring victims to a sense of justice in the development of the criminal justice system. I am not going to focus on the shortcomings and the smoke and mirrors that are contained in this bill. I have something much more important to say about what it is that the government is trying to do with this bill.

It is trying to make this small package of very little look like a method of fighting crime and reducing the amount of crime in Canadian society. While this bill may reduce some victimization that would otherwise take place without this bill, of all of those who are accused of crimes in Canada less than 2 per cent end up in federal penitentiaries. When they are released the great majority of that 2 per cent do not reoffend, whether they are on parole or not.

If the government wants Canadians to think that this is a measure that is going to do something about crime, I want people to realize that this bill does very little. This government has done very little in areas where we can make great strides in reducing the amount of crime in Canadian society. In fact it has moved in a retrograde direction.

I want to talk about crime prevention week not only because I was its sponsor. It focuses on an area and on a series of techniques and programs which really do reduce the amount of victimization in Canadian society in a very measurable and remarkable way that does not always involve police action. In fact I want to talk about crime prevention measures which may not even have occurred to this Solicitor General or to his parliamentary secretary. They are measures that really do address the aberration in society which leads to crime. The government's focus is on that very small percentage of 2 per cent of those who run afoul of the criminal justice system.

Crime prevention week focused on such programs as neighbourhood watch which keeps track of households when families are away from them. It focused on many other programs and drew on volunteer participation. It is now going to be abandoned by this federal government because it says other levels of government can take it over now.

I want to make the point that this is just another example of our national government, the Mulroney government, abandoning an area of authority and responsibility that Canadians want to be very involved in.

When you ask Canadians what is special about Canada, they talk about some of our social programs, our safety net and so on but they also talk about the relatively low level of crime that we have known historically compared to other countries. That is changing and this bill is not going to reverse the trend, I can tell you that.

I think Canadians are proud of the low levels of crime in this country and they want their federal government to be identified with that. It is a national value in this country that we have historically kept crime at low levels. To hear the federal government say: "The provinces are happy to take this program over. We have no business doing it", is just one of the reasons why this country is in jeopardy. It is because we are not reinforcing our national strengths. We are not seeing the national resources used to preserve and strengthen the things that the Canadian people believe in.

The most successful crime prevention program in the history of the world--I would love to be able to say it is one that I introduced but it was not-- is day care. I want members of the House to realize what an enormous opportunity was lost when this government broke its promise to deliver a day care program in this country based on need. The reason I can make such a dramatic statement about the impact that day care has on crime is because in the United States of America during President Johnson's administration, which in many ways does not get the recognition that it deserves, one of the so-called great society programs was Head Start. This program was begun in the early 1960s and it lasted for seven or eight years. It was offered in almost every population centre in the United States. Thousands and thousands of young people, many of them living in substandard living conditions, were brought into programs where they were given the opportunity to develop.

What is interesting about this program and why I mention it now is that the oldest of these young people are 35 and 36 years old. Important longitudinal studies have been made of these people who went through the program, tens of thousands of them all around the United States, comparing them to people who lived in similar circumstances but did not have the benefit of the Head Start program. There are enormous differences between Head Start young people and those deprived of that program in the amount of criminal activity in which they engage and the amount of all forms of deviant behaviour they contribute to: alcoholism, chronic joblessness, drug addiction, and more relevant to today, crime. The differences between that group of young Americans and the others is so categorically demonstrated that it is time for the government to recognize that crime prevention and fighting crime through crime prevention is infinitely more significant and also considerably less expensive than the kind of measures that are being proposed today.

This bill is barely worth having. It is being presented to the Canadian people as a way of dealing with crime but experts doubt it will make much of a difference. The program on which the government promised action and on which it broke its promises is a program which would really have worked to reduce the amount of crime in Canadian society.

Mr. Thacker: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.
